Kelsen and Justice

Hannele Isola-Miettinen[1]

Abstract: Hans Kelsen has had a great influence on the European legal theoretical thinking. We know him as a so called positivist and as a founder of the "pure theory of law". Kelsen saw that law is social phenomena, in its nature. For Kelsen the law is legal norms. But because of the scientific attitude to law, Kelsen wanted to separate and purify the concept of law from other norms in society, like political or moral system of norms. Kelsen excluded the idea of justice from his concept of law. Although doing so, Kelsen reflected wide the principle of justice in his writings. He concentrated to study how to achieve knowledge about the justice and, more deeply, how to cope justice in the work of law giver. This paper analyses Kelsen's writings on justice and his arguments about justice in his definition of concept of law. Hans Kelsen developed his theory in the era of big "isms" and in the sequence of events when nation states were strengthening their status in Europe. For example, the European constitutional court system, first established in Austria and later in most European countries, based their systems on the legal architecture and idea by Hans Kelsen. Kelsen in his writings was reflecting deeply the problem of pluralism and the polarisation of the great "isms". Kelsen's choice in this turbulent political situation was the scientific attitude to law. In his theory he put aside the content of law, also the values and principles like justice. He invented the "Grundnorm" to present kind a hypothetical basic norm of law in his theory.

1. Introduction

Hans Kelsen (1881-1973) definitely has had a great influence on European legal theoretical thinking. We know him as a legal positivist and as a founder of the theory named the "pure theory of law". We also know well Hans Kelsen's dogma on the Grundnorm (basic norm), understood as a necessary presupposition of any positivistic interpretation of the legal material[2]. Bindreiter's interpretation is that Kelsen's Grundnorm is the justification of valid law. It is a formal justification of valid law. It does not refer to any moral or political aspects. Bindreiter writes that the Grundnorm is figurative and theoretical and it does not have any normative content.[3]

This article analyses Kelsen's writings on "the justice". The interest in this article is on Kelsen's attitude towards the concept of justice and on the arguments why he rejected the concept of justice in his concept of law. And did he really so? The interest of the article is on Kelsen's writings on values related to the justice or such topics like basic rights or fundamental rights. Which were the arguments by which he excluded the justice from his concept of law? Kelsen actually grasped a lot the natural law idea and the concept of justice. He was also interested the topic like achieving knowledge about justice, in general and also in the work of law giver (legislator).

Hans Kelsen developed his theory during the era of European big "isms". That era was the sequence of events when the nation states were strengthening their status in Europe. There was a tendency of polarisation of "isms" in the political climate of Europe of that time. As a matter of fact, the whole European constitutional court system, first established in Austria, later instituted in the most European countries, is based on the mental architecture and proposals given by Hans Kelsen. His influence on the European constitutional doctrine has been immense. Vinx writes that Kelsen's political-theoretical works were "honest" in that respect that he did not wore two hats but explained the starting points of his pure theory of law[4].

2. Definition of law in Hans Kelsen's theory

For Hans Kelsen the law is "an order of human behaviour" and an order is "a system of rules."[5] Kelsen writes "Law is not, as it is sometimes said, a rule" but "It is a set of rules having kind of unity we understand by a system"[6] Kelsen writes that "Every rule of law obligates human beings to observe a certain behaviour under certain circumstances."[7].

[2] KELSEN, 1945, pp. 116-117, basic norm is not created in the legal procedure by a law creating organ, it is presupposed., it is kind of juristic consciousness. See also KELSEN, 1945, p. 395, positivism and epistemological relativism belong together just as much as do the natural-law doctrine and metaphysical absolutism.

For Kelsen the norm functions as a scheme of interpretation both in the physical world and in the law. Kelsen explains that the "legal cognition" separates the human law from the laws of causality prevailing in nature[8]. And Kelsen explains the "is" and "ought" worlds do that the objective meaning of the "ought" is called norms. In this legal cognition of Kelsen's theory and in the "ought" world Kelsen finds two dimensions, the subjective and the objective. Namely, in this subjective dimension the "…legislative act, which subjectively has a meaning of ought, also has an objective meaning". That objective meaning for Kelsen is the meaning of a valid norm "…because the constitution has conferred this objective meaning upon the legislative act."[9]. For Kelsen "Meaning is norm". The meaning is not the wording of any actual statement (like criminal code or other law code) but "it is a command or an authorisation". So, the "ought" has two dimensions, the subjective meaning is an act of will, the objective meaning and this is called a norm.[10] Conklin writes that the norm in Kelsen's theory is language-dependent. This means that the act of will is expressed through a language. One has access to legislatures willed concepts only trough a language.[11]

Kelsen defines the concept of the "imputation" to connect the facts determined by the legal order as a condition with a consequence determined by that order.[12] Kelsen is adopting the model concerning the imputation from the natural science world and from the thinking of causality. Although Kelsen tends to think scientifically, the origin of the Grundnorm is explained to be "transcendental-logical", in its nature, like in Kant's epistemology[13].

2.1 Scientific approach to law

Kelsen in his pure theory of law saw that the law is social phenomena, in its nature. Anyhow, Kelsen wanted to separate and purify the concept of law from all other norms systems in society, like political and moral[14] system of norms.

Kelsen in his theory was looking for the scientific approach to law. What was Kelsen's main incentive to look for that scientific approach to law? Was the motivation based on the general development in philosophy, science and law? Or was the main reason the turbulent political timeline in Europe?

In his studies Kelsen reflects widely the development of social theory and the problem of justice. Kelsen reflects in his writings the progress of natural science as a model of method in science.[15] Kelsen sees that until the rise of historical school, the science of law was the science of the law of nature. And the law of nature believed to the necessity of treating positive law only in close connection with natural law[16]. Kelsen first time drafted his pure theory of law in the study "Hauptprobleme der Staatlehre" (1911) where he is strongly referring to the idea of Georg Jellinek. One must not forget that Georg Jellinek was the professor and teacher of Hans Kelsen. Kelsen stressed and emphasised that theories in law are not unchangeable in time. Kelsen was also welcoming the constructive criticism for his theory. In his "Pure Theory of Law"(1934) Kelsen was worried with the diversity of the contents of positive legal orders are increasing. Kelsen thought that as a consequence of this diversification, "a general theory of law" is in danger of missing some legal phenomena among its fundamental legal concepts: some of these concepts may turn out to be too narrow, other too wide.[17]

In Kelsen's eyes natural law was not made by human will. That criteria of human will made law was separating the positive law from natural law. Secondly, the validity of natural law is different from positive law because its rules flow from nature, they are immediately evident as the rules of logic, that is why they do not require no force for their realization.[18] Kelsen's concept of law was influenced by the thinking of historical school. What Hans Kelsen in his theory elaborated further, was that he assimilated and coupled together the law and the state. As a consequence of that coupling there was the state which was representing an organ performing the law as commands.

2.1.1 Comparison and descriptive approach

As a matter of fact, in the preface of the study "General Theory of Law and State" (1945) Hans Kelsen explains that the positive law is always the law of a definite community, law of United States or law of France or Finland and so on. Kelsen explains in the preface of the study that the theory presented in this study is resulting from the comparative analysis of the different positive legal orders, and it furnishes the fundamental concepts by which the positive law of definite legal community can be described.[19] Kelsen in this study mentioned above adopted the comparative and descriptive approach to law. He thought that it is the method by which ensure the scientific approach to law.

2.1.2 A science of positive law must be distinguished from philosophy of justice

Kelsen writes that "Law as distinguished from justice is positive law". Kelsen continues …"a science of positive law must be clearly distinguished from a philosophy of justice."[20]. Kelsen thought that his concept of law must be separated from such ideals of justice like democracy or liberalism which are two possible principles of social organisation[21]. For that purpose and in order to structure the law Kelsen has been innovated the hypothetical Grundnorm idea.

2.1.3 Rational human cognition criteria

Kelsen writes that rational human cognition can grasp only a positive order evidenced by objectively determinable acts. This order is the positive law. Only this can be an object of science; only this is the object of the pure theory of law, which is a science, not metaphysics, of the law.[22] Kelsen was interested in the rational human cognition. Adjective

[19] KELSEN, 1945, preface, p. xiii.
[20] KELSEN, 1945, p. 5.
[22] KELSEN, 1945, p. 13.

"rational" in dictionary means "having a reason or understanding"[23]. What human cognition actually means? Human refers to human beings. Generally the cognition has been defined to be an experience of knowing that can be distinguished from an experience of feeling and willing, it refers to the brain and mind. The essence of cognition is the judgement.[24] There are two main approaches to that contemporary cognitive theory, one is information-processing theory approach, the second is Jean Piagets theory viewing the cognitive adaptation.[25] So, for Kelsen it was only the positive law which could be the object of science. In pure theory of law Kelsen rejected metaphysics and other aspects outside the positive law. Anyhow, the problem of this approach is that the act of will is expressed through language and that the norm as such is language-dependent. Is it only the language which is the object of science in law studies?

3. Real and possible law, not the correct law

Hans Kelsen writes that his theory "…presents the law as it is, without defending it by calling it just, or by condemning it by terming it unjust. It seeks the real and possible, not the correct law. It is in this sense a radically realistic and empirical theory. It declines to evaluate positive law."[26]. Vinx has stated in his study that Kelsen tries to understand the law as a kind of social fact[27]. The concepts like "realistic" and "empirical theory" in Kelsen's studies necessarily give the impression that Kelsen understood the law as a reality.

3.1 Real law and not mixed with natural law

Kelsen stresses that pure theory of law presents itself as the "real" law. Theory of law which mixes the latter with natural law or any type of justice in order to justify or disqualify the positive law must be rejected as "ideological". In this sense the "Pure Theory" has outspoken anti-ideological tendency. Kelsen explains that "The Pure Theory of law exhibits this tendency by presenting positive law free from any admixture with any "ideal" or "right" law. The "Pure Theory" desires to present the law as it is, not as it ought to be. It seeks to know the real and possible, not the "ideal", the "right" law. Kelsen writes, in this sense the "Pure Theory" of law is radical, realistic theory of law, that is a theory of legal positivism.[28] Kelsen's theory took sharp separation towards the legal philosophy of legal science. Kelsen writes that juridical science has maintained its interest on the "just" and "legal" antithesis, which manifests itself in the sharp separation of legal philosophy from legal science. Until the historical school of law, the science of law was the science of law of nature.[29] Kelsen seems to reject the role of legal philosophy in his attitude towards legal science?

Kelsen in his theory saw that there was no reason to identify law and justice. Hans Kelsen thinks that if only a just order is called law, a social order which is presented as law, is at the same time presented as just, and that would mean that it would be morally justified. Kelsen writes that the tendency to identify law and justice is the tendency to justify a given social order. Kelsen continues "It is a political, not a scientific tendency."[30] So, what Kelsen articulates is that one must not identify law and justice. Hans Kelsen finds this kind of tendency to be political aspect, not a scientific tendency. Kelsen sees that law and justice are different categories of knowledge.

Kelsen writes that "At any rate a pure theory in no way opposes the requirement for just law by declaring itself incompetent to answer the question whether a given law is just or not, and in what the essential element of justice consist." Kelsen continues "A pure theory of law – a science – cannot answer this question because this question cannot be answered scientifically at all."[31] So, as it reads in the writings of Hans Kelsen, he admits "that positive law could or should be just", Kelsen sees that this requirement is self evident. Anyhow, to this discussion about justice Kelsen answers "what it actually means is another question."[32]

Kelsen writes about the limitation of positivism. Kelsen writes

[29] KELSEN, 1945, p. 391.
[30] KELSEN, 1945, p. 5.
[31] KELSEN, 1945, p. 6.
[32] KELSEN, 1945, p. 5-6.

that the basic norm of given legal order is not itself a made, but a hypothetical, presupposed norm. It is not positive law, but only its condition. Kelsen writes that even this clearly shows the limitation of the idea of legal "positivity". The basic norm is not valid because it has been created in a certain way, but its validity is assumed by virtue of its content. It is valid, like a norm of natural law, apart from its merely hypothetical validity. The idea of a pure positive law, like that of natural law, has its limitations, writes Kelsen.[33] But Kelsen continues, the basic norm of a positive legal order cannot have the function of guaranteeing the "justice" of this system. This would be against the principle of positivism. Basic norm has to establish not a just but a meaningful order.[34] Kelsen explains with the rich and various vocabulary the status of "just" or "justice" in his theory. The most important message in this respect is that positive law and just/justice are separate categories of knowledge.

3.1.2 Justice and legality

In his discussion of justice and legality Hans Kelsen writes that the concept of justice as a secure ground of given social order means the same than legality. It is just for a general rule to be actually applied in all cases where according to its content, this rule should be applied. It is "unjust" for it to be applied in one case and not in another similar case. Justice in this sense of legality, is a quality which relates not to the content of positive order, but to its application. Justice in this sense is compatible with and required by any positive legal order. "Justice means the maintenance of a positive order by conscientious application of it". It is justice "under the law", Kelsen explains. The statement that the behaviour of an individual is "just" or "unjust" in the sense of "legal" or "illegal" means that the behaviour corresponds or does not correspond to a legal norm which is presupposed as valid by the judging subject, because this norm belongs to a positive legal order. Such a statement has logically the same character as a statement by which we subsume a concrete phenomena under an abstract concept. If the statement that certain behaviour correspond or does not correspond, to a legal norm is called a judgement of value, then it is an objective judgement of value which must be clearly distinguished from a subjective judgement of value by which a wish or a feeling of the judging subject is expressed. Kelsen writes that the statement that particular behaviour is illegal or illegal is independent of the wishes and feelings of the judging subject; it can be verified in an objective way. Only in the sense of legality can the concept of justice enter into a science of law.[35] So, for Kelsen, the justice seems to be kind of criteria of application law.

As Kelsen writes "Justice is a quality of a social order, secondly a virtue of man." Kelsen grasping justice thinks that a man is just "if his behaviour conforms to the norms of a social order supposed to be just." Kelsen continues asking what it really means to say that a social order is just? For Kelsen it means that this order regulates the behaviour of men in a way satisfactory to all men, "that is to say so that all men find their happiness in it".[36]

3.1.3 Justice and social happiness is in the hands of the law-giver

Kelsen reflects widely the topic of just social order. Kelsen thinks that this order regulates the behaviour of men in a way satisfactory to all men, that is to say, so that all men find their happiness in it. Kelsen continues that "The longing for justice is men's eternal longing for happiness. It is happiness that man cannot find as an isolated individual and hence seeks in society. Kelsen writes that "Justice is social happiness."[37].

3.1.4 Two forms of social happiness

Hans Kelsen makes distinctions in this concept of "social happiness" in a: a) narrow sense of individual happiness, happiness of one individual will which in some time be directly in conflict with that another or in a b) happiness in the collective sense, satisfaction of certain needs, recognised by the social authority, the law-giver, as needs worthy of being satisfied (such as need to be fed, clothed, housed). [38] For Kelsen "happiness" is not happiness in subjective-individual sense, it must be happiness in a collective sense.[39] In this discussion of happiness Kelsen turns to the problem of ranking and values: "which human needs are worthy of being satisfied, and especially what is their proper rank"? Kelsen writes that these questions cannot be answered by means of rational cognition. "The decision of these questions is a judgement value, determined by emotional factors…"[40].

The timeline Hans Kelsen was reflecting the happiness fits with the era he analysed the Treaty of United Nations in his study "The Law of United Nations. A Critical Analysis of its Fundamental Problems" (the study is signed by Hans Kelsen 1949). In the study he was reflecting "rights", also the social rights and the conditions and problems to enforce rights written into the treaty. Kelsen grasped from that point of view the needs and their satisfaction from very realistic point of view.

3.1.4 The answer to the values is given by the generally valid norm

These subjective and relative judgement of value is usually answered by presenting "an assertion of objective and absolute value, a generally valid norm". Hans Kelsen writes:

> "It is a peculiarity of human being that he has a deep need to justify his behaviour, the expression of his emotions, his wishes and desires, through the function of his intellect, his thinking and cognition. This is possible, at least in principle, to the extent that the wishes and desires relate to means by which some end or other is to be achieved; for the relationship of means to end is a relationship of cause and effect, and this can be determined on the basis of experience, i.e. rationally."[41]

Kelsen continues this topic

> "To be sure, even this is frequently not possible in view of the present state of social science; for in many cases we have no adequate experience which enables us to determine how certain social aims may best be attained."[42] Kelsen is admitting the difficulty to determinate and realize the aims of legislator in society. What Kelsen is looking for is the experimental knowledge in this respect of helping the social planning in society.

[40] KELSEN, 1945, p. 6.

3.1.5 Problem of justice cannot be rationally answered

Kelsen writes that there in this respect are more usually given subjective judgements of value than objective insights into the connection between means and end, that is, between cause and effect. And Kelsen writes "and hence, at least for the moment, the problem of justice, even as thus restricted to a question of the appropriate means to a generally recognised end, cannot always be rationally answered."[43].

In his "Essays of Justice" Kelsen concludes that it is impossible to answer to the question what is justice. Kelsen continues that since science is his profession, and hence the most important thing in his life is, justice, is that social order under whose protection the search for truth can be proper. Kelsen writes that "My justice then is the justice of freedom, the justice of peace, the justice of democracy - the justice of tolerance".[44] Kelsen through his own subjectivity and emotionality gives meanings to the principle justice. Justice in this respect refers to freedom, peace, democracy and tolerance.

Declared appropriate means to the presupposed ends is not "true judgement of value" but a judgement concerning the connection between cause and effect and as such a judgement about reality, writes Kelsen.[45] Kelsen states that a judgement of value is the statement by which something is declares to be an end, an ultimate end which is not itself means to a further end. Kelsen sees that "Such a judgement is always determined by emotional factors."[46].

Every system of values, like a system of morals and its central idea of justice, is a social phenomenon. Every system of values is the product of society, and hence different according to the nature of the society within which it arises.[47] Hans Kelsen lifts up the difference and distinction between values, truth and correctness: "That many individuals agree in their judgements of value is no proof that these judgements are correct. … The criterion of justice, like criterion of truth, is not dependent of the frequency with which judgements about reality of judgements of value are made. "[48]. Kelsen remarks that since humanity is divided into many nations, classes, religions and so on, often variance with one another, there are a great many very different ideas of justice; too many for one to be able to speak simply of "justice".[49]

4. Natural law theories

Kelsen writes that …"one is inclined to set forth one's idea of justice as an only correct, the absolutely valid one." Kelsen continues that "The need for rational justification of our emotional acts is so great that we seek to satisfy it even at the risk of self-deception." [50] Kelsen sees that the rational justification of the postulate based on subjective judgement of value, on the wish, for example that all men should be free or treated equally is self-deception. Kelsen assimilates that self-deception to the ideology. Kelsen in this respect of natural law speaks about the nature of things or nature of man, about the human reason. The doctrine of natural law means that there is an ordering of human relations different from positive law, higher and absolutely valid and just, because emanating from nature, from human reason, (or from the will of God). The law created by a legislator is positive law, natural law, according to that special doctrine, is not created by the act of human will; "it is not the artificial, arbitrary product of man."[51].

4.1 Innate or inborn elements vs. not conferred by human legislator

Natural law "can be and has to be deduced from nature by a mental operation."[52]. Kelsen writes that by "carefully examining nature and especially the nature of man and his relations to other men, one can find the rules which regulate human behaviour in a way corresponding to nature and hence perfectly just. The rights and duties of man, established by this natural law, are considered to be innate or inborn in man, because implanted by nature and not imposed or conferred upon him by a human legislator."[53]. Kelsen remarks that none of the numerous natural law theories has so far succeeded in defining the content of this just order in the way even approaching the exactness and objectivity with which natural science can determine the content of laws of the nature or legal science the content of a positive legal order.[54] Kelsen critically writes that so far put forth as natural law, including justice, consists for the most part from empty formulas or meaningless tautologies like categorical imperative, better known as Kant's doctrine that one's acts should be determined only by principles that one wills to be binding on all men.[55] There are questions which remain without answers, like the question what is rights what is wrong Kelsen writes.[56] But interestingly, Kelsen lifts up and deal the elements which are in modern life known as human rights based on human right conventions.

Private property belongs into to the so called natural, inborn rights of man, writes Kelsen. It is, however, hardly possible to prove this doctrine.[57] Kelsen in his analysis of rights writes that property is a typical absolute right: the proprietor has a right to demand from everybody to be left in undisturbed possession of his property. For Kelsen an absolute right there corresponds an absolute duty. Relative right corresponds a relative duty. Kelsen says that in as much as the right of one individual is possible only in relation to the duty of another, rights are relative rights.[58]

4.2 Doctrine of natural law

Whether the principles of natural law are presented to approve or disapprove a positive legal order, in either case their validity rests on judgements of value which has no objectivity, writes Kelsen.[59] Kelsen says that doctrine of natural law "is concerned not with the cognition of positive law, of legal reality, but with its defence or attack, with the political not with the scientific tasks.".[60] In his analysis concerning the dualism of positivism and natural law Kelsen concludes that justice is an ideal inaccessible to human cognition.[61] The ideal of justice has ultimately no other meaning that the hypothetical basic norm of critical positivism with its function of constituting the empirical legal material as an order. For example, examination of the conceptual treatment of the principle of equality by the natural law theorists, who find in it the essence of justice, shows that they never have been able to determine what or who is equal.[62]

5. Conclusions

One is able to conclude that Kelsen's argument for establishing his legal science was based on the epistemological criteria, in other words, on criteria what is possible to know objectively and on aspects of human cognition and on the limitations of human cognition. Kelsen's purpose was to avoid metaphysical arguments or value judgements, which he categorised to be subjective and emotional, in their nature. Kelsen's ambition was to elaborate pure theory of law based on realistic and empirical theory.

Kelsen writes that "rational human cognition" can grasp only a positive order evidenced by "objectively determinable acts". This order is the positive law. For Kelsen only this positive order can be an object of science and the object of the pure theory of law. Positive law seeks real and possible. Positive law is free from metaphysics and any admixture with any "ideal" or "right" law. Kelsen based his approach to the idea of objectivity which is separate from the subjectivity and emotional aspects.

Kelsen excluded the idea of justice from his pure theory of law, because justice was for him an ideal inaccessible to human cognition. Kelsen analysed deeply the concept of justice and a topic how to achieve knowledge about justice. Kelsen elaborated the concept of "social happiness" for the activity of legislator. Kelsen prefers the collective happiness, he does not consider the individual-subjective happiness to be fruitful starting point. The ultimate problem in the decision making of legislator is how to prefer those values which are promoting social happiness in society? There is no absolute dogma to that. For example, social science is not able to give any solid answers to question how to gain the social happiness and full satisfaction of certain needs in the just way.

Kelsen comes to the conclusion in the problem of ranking and values, and in topic which human needs are worthy of being satisfied, and especially what is their proper rank. Kelsen's conclusion is that these questions cannot be answered by means of rational cognition. The decision of these questions is a judgement value, determined by emotional factors. This is a task given to the legislator. Kelsen concludes that there are both absolute and relative rights of human, but it is not possible to prove them. None of the numerous natural law theories has so far succeeded in the defining the content of just order in the way. In his analysis, concerning the dualism of positivism and natural law, Kelsen concludes that justice is an ideal which is inaccessible to human cognition.

The dialectics[1] between the law and the practical virtue in the Aristotelian thought: the philosophy between normative and critical approaches

Abstract: The discussion between these two great streams of the Western political thought, normative and critical philosophies, can't forget its political-philosophical Greek root in the Aristotelian thought. His philosophy defends a path that doesn't adhere to extremes, but focuses on allying logically the ontic purpose and the unforeseeability of the results, which are only likely. In this paper, we address the dialectical movement between the ethical awareness of the individual and the political and legal organization of the excellent polis, in the thought of Aristotle. The man can only fulfill his end as a human being by internalising the heteronomous good expressed in the ethically constituted nomos and by the conscious exteriorization of the good in his own praxis. In short, the man may only become complete while an ethical being as he lives in an ethical community, i.e., a politically and legally organized community.

[1] In this article we mean by dialectical the way of explaining the becoming, the process of being what it is in essence of the human being, but without finding a causal or necessary link between the stages because this is the field of practical reason. We state that in the Aristotelian thought the fulfillment of the purpose of the human beings is a dialectical process of interaction between the law – the objective and social reason – and the virtue – the individual conscience. In this movement, there are continually exteriorization of social standards that contain abstract concepts of order and freedom and a progressive conscious and individual interiorization of these standards that allows each one of us to criticize them and improve them.

1. Introduction

The Aristotelian ethical and political thought, even though finalistic and thus liable to be characterized as normative for the contemporary philosophy, has the peculiarity of recognizing its boundaries and limits, as it will be discussed below. According to this author, life in the righteous polis is the only possible way to men to carry out their essences and therefore to be what they should be.

However, the life path that the inductive observation of human behavior points out is only a probable path. It is not a necessary and progressive process that historically reveals itself to reason and because of reason. It is not a necessary path, because there is no absolute guarantee that the consciousness of virtue is formed in the free ethical subject, because man is always tensioned between desire and reason. Even though not a necessary path, this path is the most probable way to create virtue, and thus, the most probable mean for men to become precisely what men already are in essence and the most probable mean to live a good life both individually and collectively.

We can conclude that Aristotle is not isolated inside a normative castle. He does not lose sight of the reality that unfolds beyond it, even though he points out the guidelines that can lead to self-realization of men in their existences. His thought keeps a critical perspective regarding ethical-political human societies, to the extent that it argues that the guidelines of those societies are not in themselves necessary, as they can't guarantee the occurrence of the result so desired, the eudaimonia.

We, therefore, believe that a discussion that counteract these two great streams of Western political thought, the normative and critical philosophies, can't forget its political-philosophical Greek root in the Aristotelian thought. His philosophy defends a path that doesn't adhere to extremes, but focuses on allying logically the ontic purpose and the unforeseeability of the results, which are only likely.

In this paper, we address the dialectical movement between the ethical awareness of the individual and the political and legal organization of the excellent polis, in the thought of Aristotle. The man can only fulfill his end as a human being by internalising the heteronomous good expressed in the ethically constituted nomos and by the conscious exteriorization of the good in his own praxis. In short, men may only become complete while ethical beings as they live in ethical communities, i.e., in politically and legally organized communities. In Aristotle's thought, there's no doubt that reason is capable to grasp and to express this movement. On the other hand, reason knows it has boundaries when effectively intends to determine the choice to the ethical purposes it identifies.

2. Ethics, Politics and Law

To Aristotle, human existence has as its end the actualization of the specific work that defines us as human beings. The peculiar function of man is rationality. To live is to be in motion and our work is the activity according to reason. We must add that as the flute player, we can simply perform our work or we can exercise it well. The excellence of the rational activity is the purpose and the ratio essendi of every human being (Nicomachean Ethics, I, 1, 1094 a 1-16; I, 2, 1094 a 18-22; I, 2, 1094b, 7-10).

Rationality operates by capturing the immanent intelligible form in the sensible, contained in the sensation or fantasy, which allows us to identify, explain and transform the entities. However, the cognitive performance is only possible when reason curbs appetite. Thus, the apprehension of the intelligible for us also means the possibility to identify, from the apprehension of the surroundings, a course of action that presents consequences more enjoyable or more appropriate to the activity of reason. However, the excellence of reason, according to Aristotle, is not achievable by the individual man.

Our reason is logos enhuloi. Its activity can't be and is not separable from the body. It is conditioned by the material world on which it operates and the material world is its limit. The sensitive organs can't simultaneously receive all possible internal and external sensations. The existent is composed of form and matter, and matter is subject to movement, is subject to the continuous updating of its potentiality. Because of that, the material world is in constant state of corruption. Therefore, reason is not able to predict or anticipate all contingencies which govern its activity while attached in the matter, i.e., while in constant transformation. Each singularity lived provides more data to the next experience, but not the wholeness of the information which would enable reason to select the perfect or final option.

Furthermore, reason is also subject to movement, even though not to the same extent and degree that the body is. Our reason is not the same throughout our existence. It matures itself and degenerates itself.

It is in itself apatheia, but the logos enhuloi is affected by the matter, i.e., the reason in itself doesn't corrupt or change, but the compound that acts rationally corrupts itself and transforms itself (On the Soul, I, 4, 408 b 18-30). Man becomes by the passing time more fit to reasoning because he exercises its reasoning, because everyday experience increases his database, i.e., increases the amount of sensations and sensitive images stored and from which the intellect draws the intelligible. In addition to that, the reason in this compound seeks the intelligible immanent to the sensible corruption not only of the compound itself, but in the reality itself, i.e., the reason seeks the permanent in change. Thus, even if reason itself does not change, reason in the matter is perfected by its own activity. As Aristotle says: "[…] intellectual excellence in the main owes both its birth and its growth to teaching (for which reason it requires experience and time)." (Nicomachean Ethics, II, 1, 1103 a 15).

There is more to consider. The body is the instrument by which reason acts. As composed of matter, the body matures and degenerates. In our childhood we are not capable of the same degree of judgment that we have in our adult lives. Likewise, our memory and understanding are not the same in our old age. In old age, deterioration of the body begins to interfere with our ability to collect the sensitive shape, to reserve it and access it, which undermines the role of reason in the capture of the intelligible.

In our childhood the amount of experiences lived is minimal and thus the possibility of reason to identify and to anticipate a broad scenario of consequences is also reduced. Therefore, our choices do not represent, albeit rationally pointed out, the excellence of the rational activity. In general, we say that children hardly act rationally and, at least in most cases, they act without the full awareness of the consequences of their actions. Owners of a reason so feeble, they seem to succumb to the sensible wishes and move like animals, driven by external forces.

The desire for pleasure is limitless and opposes itself to any form of restriction. Rationality is limit because it's shape, i.e., determination, individualization of matter, of the shapeless, of the indeterminate (Nicomachean Ethics, I, 13, 1102 b 23-31). In each individual, a battle between the limited and the boundless, between reason and irrational is waged having as its purpose the supreme end, i.e., the self-realization of man. This self-realization is the achievement of what we should be (and are in potentiality) since the beginning: outstanding rational activity. However, if the reason operates over matter and, as such, is 'weakened' by the movement of matter, it fails to place the desire in the right measure. In this case reason requires aid. This aid is provided by the ethical habit formed in the subject by the paideia, that is, the rectification of the appetite towards the end rationally fixed (Nicomachean Ethics, VI, 1142b 15-35; Magna Moralia, I, 6, 1185b 38 – 1186 2).

The relationship between rational beings exponentially increases the unique experiences sensitively gathered and rationally interpreted. The sharing between subjects of countless singularities is what allows reason to leap from its former position as a mere servant of bestiality to the place of threshold imposed on the non-limit. Although rationality major duty is the capture of the intelligible form immersed in the matter, in the individual subject it is tied to the ephemerality and to the process of corruption-and-generation of the body and of the material world.

Only in front of another subject who makes the same tasks and communicates his work is reason capable of raising itself to the rank of master of the body. The work communicated is the result of the rational activity of the other subject. It works as a portal which connects us to a myriad of experiences, inductions and generalizations and which allows us to start our own walking now equipped with all that information. Thus, we will recognize objects not seen because they were rationally learned from the experiences of others. We shall be able to anticipate the consequences not experienced by us, but that we memorized from the communication with others.

There is more. The contact with other rational beings can arouse in us the reason that was overshadowed by instinct and necessity. Reason then seeks to act in the achievement of its own goals and realizes that only by controlling the desire it will be able to accomplish its purposes. Thus, that reason which first was an instrument of the instinct becomes a means to itself, i.e., starts to pursue its own activities and accomplishments. Reason is now competing with the appetite for the fulfillment of its own goals.

However, appetite is opposed to the rational imposition and obeys it only when conditioned to want what reason determines as correct. The rectification of appetite is the work of the community which guides the individual through education to act according its rules. Thus, eudaimonia will only be achieved by men raised by a good community, i.e., a community which has rules in agreement with what is right in accordance to reason (SIMPSON, 1998, p. 2-3).The acquisition of the virtuous habit requires others, who have the power to convince us, to transmit to us what is good and to constrain us to practice it. To Aristotle, the political community is the one which holds this power and the law is its instrument of persuasion and coercion in the achievement of this goal (Nicomachean Ethics, X, 9, 1179a 33 – 1181b 15).

The law is the main instrument of paideia insofar as it orders the practice of all virtues and prohibits all vices. So conceived, it is universal justice, i.e., it is the result of the ongoing process of reflection and of collective decision of the reason about the good. It is what promotes the conscious evaluation of the ethos and what universally imposes it, through the apparatus of state power. It pursues social order and harmony, and as such, promotes the formation of the ethical habit in the individuals, which is the essential way to the acquisition of the ethical virtue. This result does not depend on any arbitrary law, but on the righteous law, that law which was drafted by the legitimate rulers of the polis in accordance to reason and considering the promotion of the ethical virtue (SIMPSON, 1998, p. 4-5).A righteous law is the one that distributes the goods of the city among its members in the proportion of their merits, promoting equality between them (Nicomachean Ethics, V, 1, 1129 b 26 – 35).

We must add that it is not enough for the law to be fair, but it is necessary the proper application of the law to the relations and disputes of men. When someone breaks the equality established by the distribution of goods, acquiring in the everyday negotiations and exchanges more than he should acquire, intentionally or not, the political apparatus of the community must intervene in this relationship and return the parties to equilibrium, to the status quo ante. The good polis is the one that applies law fairly. It is up to the rulers, thus, the development of righteous laws and the fair application of the law to the solution of the private conflicts, so that the polis is indeed able to provide the conditions for self-realization to its members (KRAUT, 2002, p. 378-379).

3. Discretionary power and law

However, Aristotle knows that it is possible that the laws do not meet these requirements. First, because the one who creates them can be wrong as to what is the benefit of citizens, even if he is able to create suitable rules for the promotion of the evil that he had conceived as good. Second, because those who create the laws, right or wrong about the welfare of men, may be unable to implement in the laws this idea of good. Thus, evaluation of justice in a city should be assessed in relation both to the design of good that it has, and in its ability to perpetuate such ideals in the laws.

Even the righteous are not exempt from mistakes (Politics, III, 16, 1287a 30-31).Human reason is not omniscient and can't anticipate all the circumstances in which one act is circumscribed. Besides that, excellence is not achieved in one action, but throughout the whole existence, and during this journey, even the most virtuous of men may give in to the pressure of his own desires. On the other hand, even if the law is based on the work of sentient beings, law itself does not have passions (Politcs, III, 15, 1286a 19). When the law is not the result of selfish desire as in tyrannies, it is not the result of the will of a single man, but represents the conscious reflection of an entire community about what we should or should not do. In regimes in which law prevails over the egoistic will of the rulers, it is usually the representation of the repeated and rationalized praxis of a community. Thus, we believe that for the Stagirite the guarantee of a good polis, or of righteous laws and fair application of these laws, can be attained by all legal political regimes, i.e., for all political systems in which the egoistic will of rulers is submitted to the law[3]. All legal systems are suitable to the formation of the virtue of its citizens, although there is some hierarchy amongst them in the achievement of such purpose.

However, the law is designed and implemented by men and therefore is subject to theirs vicissitudes. Bad men make bad laws. The law also does not foresee any possible circumstance. The law is general and will always require supplementation in order to be applied to current facts, especially when we consider that the human needs are in constant change (Politcs, III, 15, 1286a 10 -13).The finding of the supremacy of the law over the selfish desire of the ruler does not elide the issue. Although the law might be the more reliable parameter of conduct that men provide to themselves - to the extent that stems from the examination and of judgment of the various choices of the various men throughout history and do not stems of a selfish desire of a single man - it does not represent the definitive option for action (Politcs, III, 16, 1287a 18

[3]In this sense, we disagree with the position of Kraut which holds that only the monarchy and aristocracy can lead to human excellence and the republic (politia) can, at most, form good citizens (and others regimes not even good citizens). For the arguments of Kraut, check: 2002, p. 383-470. The choice of the regime does have some repercussions, for the Stagirite, in the reaching of the common good and of the individual good, but if the regime is legal, that is, if the will of the rulers submits itself to the rule of the law, the polis can provide the formation of the virtue of its members. In this sense, check: MAGALHÃES GOMES, 2010, p. 201-213.

– 1287b 20).The law is the product of human deliberation and, as such, can't anticipate all the circumstances which we shall face throughout our lives. Of course its selection of situations covers much more cases than those that a man could live or even imagine. But the law does not cover all possible human concrete experiences and not even those of one man.

The modus operandi of reason is the unification of the infinitely diverse and complex things into similar traits, general and simple. When the legislator examines the myriad of human experiences, his rational inquire seeks amongst them similarities that can bring them together and make them an increasingly smaller subject to be understood. Each situation that seems unique to sensitivity becomes, gradually and faced with the reason, common to other facts. The natural human reactions to that same event are compared with each other and in relation to their consequences. After that, one of these actions is chosen as the one that should be taken every time that this event occurs. In this process what was concretely exclusive of this or that situation examined is dropped when setting the fact that unifies them. In concrete, however, the situations we face regain its former uniqueness. The real will always be singular.

One could say that there would be no problem on the illustration described above if the goal of the law was, simply, to list any course of action to men. But if the purpose of the law, as intended by the Stagirite, is to prescribe the best path of conduct possible to citizens, then we can't overlook its generality in relation to the facts.

If the law is, by its own nature, a generalization of concrete situations, its immutability or its strict application to any particular case will not be the best solution, it will not achieve justice, its raison d'être. It is necessary that those who exercise the functions of government in the polis can judge the law and change it, because of new unforeseen circumstances, or adapt it, because of the singularities of the case to which the law is being applied. Because of its generality, the fair application of the law depends on the discretion of the rulers, both the legislators and the judges (Politcs, III, 15, 1286a 20-25).

To what extent the discretionary power of the rulers is legitimate? How can we ensure that the rulers do not go beyond this measure, given that they own the force of the State (Politics, III, 15, 1286b 32-33)? The law is the product of human deliberation. And if those who govern us and create the laws are not good men, what will guarantee that the rules established by them are fair?

As regards the discretionary power, we understand that there are limits which the ruler must obey, otherwise his decision is illegitimate. Formally, the highest limit to the discretionary power of the ruler, whether he is the legislator or the judge, is the politeia. The decisions of the ruler can't overtake or denature the fundamental principles that characterize the regime of government established by the politeia. Otherwise, there is no established order and we are at the mercy of the selfish will of the ruler. Sets the Stagirite:

> "A constitution is the arrangement of magistracies in a state, especially of the highest of all. The government is everywhere sovereign in the state, and the constitution is in fact the government. [...] (Politics, III, 6, 1278b 9-11) – emphasis added.

If the decision of the ruler is in accordance with the underlying principles of that regime of government, it was not arbitrary; otherwise is unlawful and must be reversed (Politics, V, 3, 1303rd 21-24; V, 7, 1307b 2-6). The politeia is the true nature of a political community and thus the essence of its unit. Thus, for Aristotle, the duty of every citizen is to preserve their politeia.

Materially, the decision must be judged in the light of the common interest. The correct regimes are those in which rulers act in the best interest of all (Politics, III, 13, 1283b 36-42). The ruler can't put the interest of certain parts of the city above all others, but should guide their decisions by the achievement of the good of the city as a whole; they must be impartial (KRAUT, 2002, p. 389). In each case, the discretionary power of the ruler should be confronted to the common good: if there is the intention to strongly favor the interests of one part of the city at the expense of the good of others, the decision is unlawful and must be reversed; otherwise it can be maintained. Finally, it is necessary to comment that the Stagirite warns that the alteration of laws can't become a habit; otherwise laws will lose their strength (ROSS, 1957, p. 365).

4. Dialectics between Law and Virtue

Regarding the guarantee of the justice of the laws, the position of the Stagirite is circular. In order to the laws to be good, men should be good. In order to men to be good, laws must be good.

The laws of a city, as long as circumscribed in a legal regime, are a minimum of justice, although its content is not perfectly virtuous.

First, because they establish order and security, a way of proceeding in everyday actions which applies to everyone and that is the same under similar circumstances. The prevalence of the law is the realization of some portion of justice, because it guarantees the existence of some impartiality of the lawmakers, or of some consideration for the common good despite their own interests.

Moreover, even the law created by non-virtuous men (but law-abiding men) captures, even if partially, the experiences of his community throughout history. There was, in the preparation of that law, some reflection about the customs of his community, and, therefore, some evaluation from those decisions taken earlier on. So, the choice of one of them as a parameter is made it because that one experience was considered the best to run. Although this reflection and choice may have been misguided – because they didn't identified the true purpose of our actions, or because they didn't identified the best means to achieve it – there was, in this process, examination, judgment and choice about what to do in certain circumstances, which makes this path of conduct better than that instincts impose on us.

More than this, the creation of the law is not a lonely reflection out of a small number of personal experiences about a choice. The whole process of creating the law is a collective one. The experiences that serve as its parameter and that are analyzed and compared by its creators are the customs, the ideals and opinions of a large group of men, contemporaries and ancestors of the legislators. The decision, implementation, execution and subordination to the law are also acts of several men, even if carried out, at a given moment, by just one man.

The law is – when not an exclusive product of a selfish desire – usually, a conscious and collective model of conduct to the individual man. It is the product of the reflection and of the choice of a whole group of men over the best way to conduct them in life; and as such, their goals surpass those who we might establish individually for ourselves. This does not make it perfect, but our best option of action at a given time. This does not make it unchangeable, but a constancy, which guarantees some order and security in this so fickle world.

The relationship between social rules established in a certain community, that informs human behavior, and the concrete actions of the individuals of that society, which reinforce or undermine the prevailing ethos and nomos, involves different moments. The reiterated praxis of the group forms the body of rules, i.e., shapes the rational and collective conditions of the action of those individuals. This diffuse social order, in turn, is evaluated continuously by those who create and enforce the obligatory social rules, the nomoi. The laws of a community result from comparative reflection about the various maxims of action, about the customs, about the ideals, about the opinions of the group and about the laws that already exist. From this analysis there is the choice and the setting of a mandatory parameter of conduct for all the members of that community, which is the objective rationality of this group. The custom is not irrational, but its effect on individual conduct is pervasive and unconscious. Rather, the creation and application of each law result from conscious reflection on the circumstances of the action and of the careful choice of the action parameter to be laid down for all those who live in that community. There is, therefore, an overlapping spiral of the causal circularity of the ethos. To the dialectical movement custom-habit, mediated through individual action, overlaps with another circle. In this second circle, there is conscious evaluation of the first and its outcome is the nomos, which feeds back the ethical circle. The nomos imposes itself on the action and shapes habits that reinforce/modify the ethos. Over this second circle a third one arises: the judge evaluates the fact in the light of the nomos and of the ethos and, then, he decides. His sentence informs individual action and reinforces/modifies the ethos and the nomos.

But for men to behave in accordance with existing regulations it is necessary that they know it and therefore the ethos and the nomos must be transmitted to individuals through education. The group reflects on the ethos and the nomos, even if not yet methodically, and, then, it shapes upon those principles of action a knowledge that enables its transmission and collective representation. At the same time, to the extent that the individuals steadily acquire the habit of performing certain actions, the ethos and the nomos reassert themselves as a tradition of that people and, then, they effectively exist in the conduct of each of those individuals.

The aforementioned argument does not mean, however, that the subject becomes virtuous. Individuals can obey the rules only because they fear the consequences of the noncompliance. Nevertheless, the continuity of action in accordance with the rules creates a habit to carry them out and enables the rectifying of the appetite of men. But man isn't an external moldable mass that can be casted without any reflection or self-direction. The rules imposed socially act on a rational being, capable of understanding them and judge them. The individual that at first wanted only what was imposed by desire, now wants what the rule imposes. In this continuous movement of exteriorization of duty, the man, as a rational being, becomes aware of the value of the rule itself and consequently of the value of his actions. The consciousness of the good contained in the rule and practiced by him may cause that the abiding of the rule happens for its own sake, for its virtue. The man practices virtuous actions by themselves, because they are the good towards he moves as a way to achieve his perfection.

The social life of the law allows, in principle, the formation of civic virtue, that is, respect for and defense of the existing order. Citizens come to understand that the existence of the group depends on the permanence of the order that sustains it. Not all the citizens of this political community are excellent men; maybe none of them are. But, at least, they are good citizens, because they understand the importance of their laws and they guarantee, by respecting them, the continuity of their polis. In a second moment, the rational maturing of that political community allows a deeper reflection and evaluation about the law. Yes, the existence of a set of rules is vital for the continuity of the group, but that does not mean that every rule should be kept, whatever the cost. Order and safety are not the only ends of the political community. The ultimate end of the polis is the good life of its citizens. The one that fully lives is the one that excellently realizes (makes real in concrete) his work, and, for rational beings, the one that excellently realizes reason. The polis should create the conditions for the development of virtue and, to do so, its rules can't prescribe any arbitrary content, but should impose the practice of all the virtues and banish the vices.

The final statement is: the rule of law possibly enables the building of good citizens, and good citizens can possibly create good laws, and good laws possibly enable the building of good men, and good men can possibly create good laws and so on and so forth[4].

5. Conclusion

The State is a community of men organized towards a common end. Its existence and its success (the accomplishment of its ultimate end) depend on the building of those men. It means that the State is only possible if its constituent parts (individuals, families, organizations, and so on) want and act towards the realization of the common goal. Those parts should cooperate with each other and each one should realize its specific function.

We can say, nevertheless, that the individuals are the core of this organization, because only they can act towards the ultimate end. They create the rules, they give life to the institutions, they are the ones that should be built in order to want and act towards their own ends which are, by consequence, the end of the polis. Therefore, the State can't rely exclusively on familial and social training of its citizens. The State must also be a promoter of the education of its members, so that their will and acts will be according to its purposes. And the law is the appropriate instrument of the State in the building of their citizens[5].

The process of formation and improvement of laws and men is a virtuous circle, in which the mechanical compliance of the law can become the awareness of the importance of the existence of the law for the community and the consciousness of the importance of the good content of the law for the self-realization of man.

The continuous process of formation of human excellence through the awareness of the virtue of the law will not necessarily make all men good, but it can make all citizens good, and probably most of men good. Of course this is a slow and difficult process, but it is the only possible way.

Reason is capable of apprehending and explicating the diversity of the ethical conduct, as the normative posture of philosophical thinking defends, but it can't guarantee that, even in the presence of the ideal conditions, man will necessarily choose to act in accordance to the ethical end by the reason revealed. The probability and not the certainty of the action is what allow us to recognize some critical traits in the Aristotelian thought.

An historical evaluation of constitutional principles from Aristotle's Politics for human rights

Lourenço Torres[1]

Abstract: This work presents a comparison of ancient Greek thought confronted with current conceptualizations of Human Rights, their constitutive characteristics, especially when they drafted the text of the Brazilian 1988's Constitution. It studies initially a few characteristics of the Greeks, the Sophists, Aristotle's thoughts and modern Human Rights contents, confronting them, in an attempt to establish a historical relationship. In conclusion demonstrates if some hypotheses were incorporated or not, in current conceptions of Human Rights. The study acknowledges that such historical base influenced the Liberal content of individual Human Rights, today internalized in several jurisdictions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights signatory countries including Brazil.

Keywords: History of Law. Human Rights. Rhetoric.

1. Introduction – Definition of the terms to be studied.

Certain elementary values of human beings had been established as rights and therefore they had been called Human Rights. My objective here is to search and to communicate the possible influence of Aristotle with his undoubted rhetorical contribution to individual basic rights, to establish an apposition to the liberal argument of natural law in the evolution of the contents of western Human Rights. For this, the methodological instrument that I used was a comparative bibliographic revision. The bibliographic content includes the text of Aristotle - Politics - as representative of classic literature and some other doctrinal commentaries on the Universal Declaration of the Human Rights. In addition, I also took as paradigm the Brazilian Federal Constitution of 1988, with its explicit conceptual advances on the matter of Human Rights. However, here I abstained myself, strategically, of any evaluation concerning the ideological-political influences that probably have influenced its formation.

The definition of Human Rights is very wide and ample according some perceptions and rhetorical perspectives; it is something that certainly depends on ideological agreements and social interests, as well as cultural construction. Although today these agreements have become more known in general, and, therefore, more easily assimilated inside occidental cultures and its societies, it is far from being something pacific, mainly because of its ideological and political bonds. Yet, it is a wide concept because and is closely related to the evolution of philosophical, legal, sociological and political thought about inherent goods of humanity and, also, to social conviviality of human beings. They include, among others things, understandings about freedom, justice, equality and democracy. Moreover, there is an interrelationship with national and international legal systems, effective and historically dominant.

The constitutional principles of Human Rights that I analyzed in short are those contained in Brazilian Federal Constitution of 1988. It tried to simplify the content of these rights listing then firstly as individual rights in the final part of the caput of its 5th article: "the right to life, to freedom, to equality, to security and property" and after that, the content of the social rights in article 6th: "Are social rights the education, the health, the work, the housing, the leisure, the security, the social welfare, the protection to the maternity and infancy, the assistance to the abandoned ones, in the form of this Constitution" [2]. In truth, both, individual and social rights have been called simply "Human Rights" in the text of article 4th.

[2] Quoted from the original Brazilian Constitution text - Art. 5º: "o direito à vida, à liberdade, à igualdade, à segurança e à propriedade" and Art. 6º: "São direitos sociais a educação, a saúde, o trabalho, a moradia, o lazer, a segurança, a previdência social, a proteção à maternidade e à infância, a assistência aos desamparados, na forma desta Constituição". In: BRASIL. Constituição da República Federativa do Brasil. Vade Mecum. 8. ed. atual. e amp. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 7.

Generically speaking, the expression "rights and fundamental guarantees for the Human Rights" holds, at least, two groups of ideas. One aspect of these ideas analyzes, at first, the earliest grounds of the rights and its interdisciplinary relevance, therefore, more including; whereas the second aspect analyzes the relations of the warranting legal mechanisms of such rights in the practice of modern States such as constitutions, treaties and conventions. Thus, this implies a fluid concept and in constant construction. However, importing primordially one of the meanings, the humanist and anthropic, this flow of ideas can be summarize in the affirmation that they are essential rights that man possesses just for being human; designed for its proper nature and the proper dignity that the humanity inherent[3]. For legal effectiveness, must be highlighted the fact that these rights are claims that, once written or normatized, they can generate obligations to particular people and to public service.

Thus, I adopted as object of study the concepts on the rights to life, freedom, equality and property. Although article 5th of the Brazilian Constitution detaches security, we must include it in the right to life, because of the intrinsic necessity of its preservation.

Life (βιος) presupposes auto-existence in an independently individualized and equalitarian form. That embodies self-defense and the prohibition of aggression to another life human being. Under a humanist perspective, since life is individualized, it should not have to be submitted to discrimination and to servitude. That is something that unleashed rights to different ones, accordingly to their conditions and limitations. Freedom (ελευθερία) corresponds to the rational behavior independent of restrictions and without coercion from power and violence; in it, the limit of freedom is reciprocity. Although the text of the 3rd article of the Universal Declaration of the Human Rights of 1948 does not have enclosed equality (ισότης) and property[4], those rights can be seen in articles 1 and 17 of that declaration, respectively[5]. This Indicates that major human values can still be in discovery or development, whereas individual and social conscience grows.

Although the studied terms could seem equal, the historical contexts are not, and then, their contents and significances are not the same for different times. Even though it seems obvious that throughout history even concepts suffer changes, which are these differences? Why are so clamorous such historical differences thus? Which ware the possible evolution that these contents had suffered, and, which were the influence that remained from Aristotle's legacy? Perhaps these questions will not be answered directly, but this study, by means of its events description will be able to leave some sort of the impression in the mind of the reader.

2. The Greek context as a stage for a possible origin of the idea of Human Rights.

The similarities, and also some differences, about the basic characteristics of the contents of Human Rights with the classic Greek philosophical movement are unquieting. That society (the Greek) use to discriminate and to enslave, but amongst philosophers like the Sophists innovators, some questioning could be heard already against these preconceptions that traditions considered something normal. Those cultural expressions and philosophical dialogues recommended possible changes.

It was with the Greeks that fundamental progress for culture and all what concerns living in community was found. Despite all artistic, religious and politic accomplishments of peoples who lived before, "the history of that which we can with full conscience call culture only started with the Greeks" [6]. Jaeger also affirms that

> The universal importance of the Greeks [...] drifts out of their new conception for the place of individual in society. [...] If we contemplate the Greek people under the background of the old East history, the difference is so deep that the Greeks seem to merge themselves in a unit with the European world of the modern times[7].

Obviously, Jaeger's perception is attached to the Greek education. But it was not the Greek education that spread for all the known earth, through its conquests, also what today is known as culture, the Hellenism? The Greeks committed themselves in a solid way to art, to aesthetic, to oratory, to style and to rhetoric. This aptitude derived simply "from the spontaneous and full-grown sense of the laws that govern the feeling, the thinking and the language, which finally leads to the abstract creation and technique of logic, grammar, rhetoric"[8]. Their politics and laws changed the understanding and the perception about the human being and these concepts, offered to the normative force, revolutionized and developed the human being existence itself.

At that time tyranny, war, slavery and death penalty in an institutionalized form still existed. Not that today these do not exist in a "legal" form in various societies around the globe. We can perceive, discursively or at least conceptually, that they are undesired practices and we have the hope that one day they would be extinguished. However, democracy or some sort of democracy was born there. Even war's objective among them changed from mere expropriation to a civilizer one. Guthrie affirms that > Aristotle describes some slaves speaking freely, and sometimes brazenly to their masters. To the intelligent ones they gave responsibility ranks as secretaries and bank controllers, and could finally be freed by its proper owners. [...] One common practice was for the owners of industrial slaves allow them to work independently, paying a fixed addition of their profits and being remaining portion for themselves, and these could save sufficiently to buy their own freedom[9].

And continues coating Aristotle in saying that "Demosthenes also says that enslaved ones in Athens have greater rights of free speech than citizens of other states"[10]. If he is not very implausible, his understanding is, at least, admirable about the Aristotelian view which demonstrates displeasure and criticism to that Greek social moment. In chapter sixth of his book Sophists, this author brings references, confirmed by Sophists, on equality politics, equality of wealth, social equality and racial equality.

3. Probable influence of Aristotle's Politics in the development of practical concepts as contents of human rights.

Since the persuasive influence of the Greek culture on social and political factors is well known, either by its literature, theater or philosophy, a great jump in history will not be necessary to find the paradigm author that coexisted with the roots of the ideas that later, probable became concepts of Human Rights in the present time: Aristotle.

As we know, the encyclopedic knowledge of Aristotle produced considerable work on politics, such as Politics, the Athenian Constitution and the Economic. Also two works are told as composed by him when he was teacher of Alexander and to him were dedicated: In favor of the Colonies and On Reign whose content are currently still lost[11].

The meaning of politics for Aristotle seems to be entailed to an only object, the human happiness in the convivial gathering of the polis, either as an individual as citizen of the polis, either as a politician who searches the collective good, so from this politics can be then considered a practical science. Such idea can be perceived in the inaugural passage of the book in epigraph, transcribed as follow:

> Every state is a community of some kind, and every community is established with a view to some good; for mankind always act in order to obtain that which they think good. But, if all communities aim at some good, the state or political community, which is the highest of all, and which embraces all the rest, aims at good in a greater degree than any other, and at the highest good. (Pol.,

In similar way, the Aristotle's observation for democracy is not in a simplistic way. For him, democracy did not mean merely the government of the people or the government of the majority (Pol, 1290b) [13]. Majority was an accidental contingency. Democracy was the government of free men, but also not of some few free and rich ones, this would be, then, an oligarchy, and, for him, "there is a democracy when the free men withhold the sovereign power" (Pol, 1291a) [14]. The goal, yes, aims the satisfaction, the happiness and well-being of the majority.

> The end of the civil society is, therefore, to live well; all its institutions are just means for this, and the city itself is only one great community of families and villages where life finds all these means of perfection and sufficiency. This is what we call a happy and honest life. The civil society is, therefore, least a society of common life but a society of honor and virtue (Pol., 1281a) 15.

4. The Aristotelian understandings about the right to life, freedom, equality and property, important for today's Human Rights.

4.1. On the right to life.

In chapter I of book VI of his Politics, Aristotle, after a quick analysis of his master Plato's ideas and the Constitutions of some city-States, before discoursing on the government forms, brings his comprehension on the idea of a perfect city, a city he understands as "a community constituted from some towns". According to him, this community must have something of self-sufficiency, that is, beyond having "conditions to assure the life of its members, it [the community or city] also must grant a better life to them" (Pol., 1253a)[16]. A clear reference to the right to life in those communities. More than biological life; it should grant life in quality. A parallel to that is firmed with the Brazilian Constitution in its 5th article that ratifies the Universal Declaration of the Rights of the Man of 1948, guaranteeing, before anything, the inviolability of the right to life. This is because among all rights nothing is more basic than that, the right to life, one that is estimated for the existence and the exercise of all others rights.

[15] "O fim da sociedade civil é, portanto, viver bem; todas as suas instituições não são senão meios para isso, e a própria cidade é apenas uma grande comunidade de famílias e de aldeias em que a vida encontra todos esses meios de perfeição e suficiência. É isso o que chamamos uma vida feliz e honesta. A sociedade civil é, pois, menos uma sociedade de vida comum do que uma sociedade de honra e virtude". ARISTÓTELES, 2006, Idem., p. 56.

As said, in the Greeks communities certain guarantees with respect to the biological life already existed, however their understanding surpasses mere existence and searches arguments to convince other governments and constitutions with respect to a life worthier and better in quality. The understanding of what comes to be a "better life", more than an object of exhausting philosophical speculations, finds in Aristotle some disposals, at least, interesting.

Previously, he already had said that there is "something of good in the simple fact of being alive" and this, independently of the way of living, since "men in its immense majority are linked to life despite they have to face many misfortunes, as if it contained in itself certain enchantment and sweetness", although this life should not be "overloaded excessively with harms to be supported" (Pol., 1278b)[17]. This is an argument that follows all the work and that is what he is determined to prove.

However, as the expression holds that relativist ambiguity ahead of the practical experience of the rhetoric of a philosopher, the "perfect life", even so "many times was unattainable" (Pol., 1288b), is that one where "men do not acquire and preserve the moral qualities thanks to the external goods, but they acquire and preserve exterior goods thanks to the moral qualities" (Pol., 1323b). Independently of any judgment of values attributable to this concept, more pertinent to Philosophy than to Rhetoric, Aristotle presents a decreasing scale of life quality opposed to some values and the goods, in a way that, already at that time, it would not be any normative system that, according to his suggestion, men would become worthy and happiest.

The "happy life", despite of depending on pleasure or moral qualities, or both, is found more frequently between those that cultivate the most good qualities and intelligence but are moderate in the acquisition of exterior goods, than those that are possessors of exterior goods beyond their capacity to usufruct them, being deficient in qualities and intelligence; not only in this way, but also appealing to reason, one can arrive at this conclusion. (Pol., 1323b)[18].

And Aristotle continues to verify that, independently of the way a city or a State is rule, what is reflected in its Constitution, "the happiness of a city is the same the happiness of each man [...] where the best form of government is that where any person, whoever could be, can act better and live happily" (Pol., 1324a)[19]. Still in the same passage he establishes a relation between qualities and participation in political life. All this suggests, according to a contemporary understanding, the entirety of important contents for humanity: life, human being dignity, quality of life and politic freedoms.

4.2. On the right to freedom and equality.

In despite of it, man, as citizen, must be free. Shortly, Greek freedom (ελευθερία) must be understood not as living in nature with the absence of laws, this Greeks mainly applied to the Barbarians. Since the archaic Greeks, free men were those ones that belonged to a pólis and were submitted to its laws.

> Only in this public space and between its equal the Greek ones were free, worthy to say, its citizenship and its freedom are not qualities attributed to man as human being, as it is the modern sense of the word [freedom], full of Christian philosophy and centuries XVII and XVIII jusnaturalism; rather, it was the essential prerequisite for politics action or participation in the public space[20].

Therefore, finishing up the idea, the use of the term freedom among the Greeks had a strong connotation both legal and political. They lived in one pólis where the equal ones lived under the principal of isonomy. So, freedom among them should not be understood as being a quality of man will, then, connected to subjectivity[21]. This transposition from the external plan to the internal was a late philosophical creation.

According to Hannah Arendt, in all Antique Philosophy there was not concern with freedom as a phenomenon of the will. Freedom, as attribute of the will and of the thought, freedom as free-will, only emerge in the philosophical tradition with the apostle Paul and later with Saint Augustine, both motivated by their religious experience and an innovative argumentative approach[22]. Also, freedom for the Greeks, according to Jaeger, consisted in feeling subordinated, as members, to the totality of a pólis and its laws[23]. It was political freedom, nothing similar to the understanding of freedom in the modern individualism. Therefore, among Greeks, the relations between law and freedom were external, dependent of an organization (the pólis):

> […] reason for which it does not make sense, in the analysis of the Greek law, to speak of a subjective right as an attribute conferred to a citizen, or to speak about a concept of right that has for essence the subjective freedom[24].

In truth, to the Greeks, freedom is a status described for Latin expressions: it is the status libertatis in opposition to status servitutis. On contrarius sensu, when dealing with slavery in chapter II of book I, Aristotle displays the thesis of some (another masters, the Sophists) that, "contrary to the nature [...] the distinction between slave and free person is only made by the laws, and not by the nature" and still, according to this thesis "by being based on force such distinction is unjust" (Pol, 1253b)[25]. This seems to demonstrate that, already in that time there was an agreement in some, that the slavery could be banished, even it was tolerable for economic and social circumstances. In the midst of a culture that believed in natural slavery, Aristotle used that rhetoric artifice who was an imported thesis from others to present innovative concepts. In the case of slavery it was accepted only in virtue of law or by the use of violence between men. Again, he suggested the possibility that it could be suppressed, as it is perceived in his subsequent arguments.

Among fellow creatures, honesty and justice consists in that each one should have his turn. Only this conserves the equality. Inequalities between equals and distinctions between fellow-man are against nature and, therefore, against honesty (Pol., 1325b)[26].

It is an intermediate step for the subjective concept of freedom supported for equality. Although in truth, at least theoretically, freedom would be the legitimation of authority. Thus, following that, and still to support the essential condition of freedom, he affirmed that authority has distinct natures, the domestic and the political. This principle prevails here, at least, on the aspects of freedom, equality and property. The family head governs his whole family, including the slaves. The magistrate governs the free and equal men. Such distinction would indicate that the government authority would be restricted to the equal and free citizens. That, for inference, suggests that, if slavery was abolished, the government would not pass for any crisis of authority, because that authority would be attached to the familiar power. Furthermore, "in strict political terms", and corroborating for this all the cultural context of old Greece, "the pólis did not know the distinction between governed and governor, once that the not-citizens were not, strictly speaking, governed", that fit specifically to the families, "and to be a citizen implied in to participate in order not to be governed"[27].

Retaking the Aristotelian exposition on freedom, chapter II of book III from Politics externs his thesis on the government and the governing, affirming that the authority of the governor, the politician, is "an authority form through which a man governs people of the same race, and free men (Pol., 1277b)[28]. Such concept, common between the Greeks, did not cogitate the possibility that somebody being free could be enslaved by some of its own, even so this "is equivalent to say that there was two species of nobility and freedom, one absolute and other relative" (Pol., 1255b)[29]. This detaches the Sophist parameter of relativity. What an advance, exactly in face of an eastern society as the Jewish one, which tolerated the slavery of countrymen for its equal ones and even the self-slavery.

3. On the right to property.

Citizenship and property were linked. A citizen necessarily had property. It was practically impossible, if not at all, a man without property to be a citizen in old Greece. Thus, for them it also was a man's natural law beyond the power of acquisition and needing to be guaranteed when adjusted to its general thesis. With respect to the right to property, Aristotle foresaw three combinations between the property and its use: a) private property and common use; b) common property and private use and c) common property and use[30]. He did not cogitate of the private property and private use, concept that came out of the liberal full and absolute property, a thought influenced by absolutisms that had preceded it around century XVIII. For Aristotle, the justification of property was according the perspective of politics, that is, it was a requirement for the well-being of the citizen. Aristotle developed three arguments to justify the property. In Politics, I, 4-10, the property is justified under the [27] "A polis não conheceu a distinção entre governantes e governados, uma vez que os não-cidadãos não eram, a rigor, governados", pois isso cabia especificamente às famílias, "e ser cidadão implicava participar de modo a não ser governado". perspective of the house; in Politics, II, 5, he argues about which property system is better to the city; and finally, in Politics, VII, 9-10, he makes a connection between property and citizenship.

Under the perspective of the house (οίκος), Aristotle presented an instrumental justification of property: who governs a house needs property to play the function to provide its sustenance. As part of his argument, dissecting each main point to arrive to the details, he stressed out three aspects in the treatment of property in the scope of the house: the property was a dominial relation, that lord's power of the house over slaves, woman and children; the second aspect is that property is an attribution the lord of the house has, he carries out functions of the house and not as individual while such; the third aspect is that the acquisition of property is something natural in contraposition to the artificial acquisitions, derived out of commerce. Aristotle contrasted the acquisition art that aimed to satisfy the house's necessities and the limitless character out of commerce acquisition forms.

Aristotle condemned the artificial acquisition (called crematistic [χρεματιστική], from Gr. χρημα, wealth, possessions) that he identified with commerce (Pol, 1, IX, 1256b, 40 – 41). Arguing that things have two uses, a proper one identified with its destination and other deviated to some another finality. Thus, for him, the commerce was artificial, since the property had to assure a "happy life" and should not be destined to the limitless exchange:

> Hence we may infer that retail trade is not a natural part of the art of getting wealth; had it been so, men would have ceased to exchange when they had enough. In the first community, indeed, which is the family, this art is obviously of no use, but it begins to be useful when the society increases. But the members of the family originally had all things in common; (Pol, 1, IX, 1257a, 1-4)[31].

Thus, out of the two ways to acquire and be enriched, one by economy and the rustic works, and another by commerce; the first one is indispensable and deserves compliments; the second, on the other hand, deserves some censure: it receives nothing from nature, but everything of convention (Pol, 1258b)[32].

[32] ARISTÓTELES. A Política. Tradução Roberto Leal Ferreira. 3. ed. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2006, p. 28.

In Politics, II, 5, Aristotle modified his justification argument from the context of the house to the scope of the city and with it intended to answer the following questioning - the property must be had in common by the citizens or must be in private? He explain the combination of private property and the common use based on the following arguments: a) common property gave cause to quarrels and claims about the way to distribute things; b) common property favored the recklessness of each one in the treatment of common things and, on the contrary, private property stimulated that each one was dedicated to what it was proper; c) private property stimulated the natural pleasures, in particular self-respect; d) private property favored friendship for the pleasure on helping and giving to friends; e) private property made possible the exercise of virtues, as long as generosity and moderation Thus, Aristotle concluded that property must be, in general, private, but according to utility, common. The common use did not modify the nature essentially private of the property, but rather assume it.

Therefore, Aristotle was not a defender of the sacred character of private property. Private property had to be limited for the common use. Also richest citizens should distribute part of its prescriptions among the poor citizens, not as a requirement of the State, but as a consequence of good customs. That's why Aristotle's ideal State assured, also, some public services to all the citizens, rich or poor: education, meals, justice and security. Strengthening its argument, Aristotle gave the model of Esparta, where the property was individual, but when necessary it was use commonly. For example, the slaves were used in common and, when necessary, also the horses. Although each citizen had its own property, one part of it was for use of friends, another part for use of all e, finally, one third part alone for personal use.

Aristotle still pointed another weight reason to explain its preference for the private property of the goods and its common use: the immeasurably great pleasure generated for property. Another derivative is the pleasure that friends take out in giving aids to friends. Aristotle considered the virtue of friendship a presupposition for the "happy life" (eudaimonia). Without private property, the friends would see themselves incapable to rescue the necessities of their friends and to place for service to them some of their goods. Without private properties, the citizens would be hindered to practice two essential virtues to the "happy life": the friendship and the liberality.

> Again, how immeasurably greater is the pleasure, when a man > feels a thing to be his own; […]there is the greatest pleasure in doing a kindness or service to friends or guests or companions, which can only be rendered when a man has private property. These advantages are lost by excessive unification of the state. [...].Therefore how to be liberal if there is nothing to disposal? (Pol, 1263b)[33].

Finally, Aristotle defined the subjective scope of property, that is, who should be proprietor, owner. For Aristotle, the citizenship had to be restricted, in the context of the best city, to those that have natural capacity, virtue and availability to play the military and legal-deliberative functions. According to Aristotle, it was convenient that the properties were at the hands of these people, therefore was necessary that the citizens had an abundance of resources and these people (the military and the ones who deliberated) were the citizens. The vulgar ranks, the manual workers, did not participate of the citizenship. On the other hand, the happiness of the city, necessarily followed by virtue, had not only to be extensible to all the citizens and people and not only to some. Thus, in the ideal city, all the citizens had to be owner and all the proprietors, citizens.

5. Conclusion - A civility ideology of the contemporaneous States with roots in the principles of Aristotle's Politics.

The first conclusion I arrive in this study, therefore, is that it is possible to confirm the thesis that the development of the normative concept of the contents of the Human Rights had some base in Greek thought. I also observed that politics for Aristotle is tied to one object, the human happiness in the convivial gathering of polis (as individual, as citizen of the polis or as a politician that searches the collective good). Also for him, democracy did not mean the government of people or the government of the majority. Democracy was the government of free men, not some few free and rich ones, but of the free men who withhold the sovereign power with the objective to promote satisfaction, happiness and well-being of the majority. Therefore, under such perspective and purpose, his considerations on the rights to life, freedom, equality and property are more than pertinent, but were persuasive in its positive rhetoric throughout the centuries.

In the same way, but under a posterior influence, the modern constitutions of some contemporaries States had been searching a persuasive and an up to date rhetorical speech, receiving the protectionist ideals of equality and freedom, also defended for the liberal ones. Also they searched in old Greek statements the social function to social ideals. Or, as Aristotle would say, "common use for a happy life", especially in respect to property. This adjusts current rhetorical propositions on defense of Human Rights to its historical roots in Classic thought, even so, not consistently.

Thus, I can conclude that the classic literature of Aristotle and the influences that he absorbed had had a historical paper in the source of the positive Human Rights. In it, the roots of the contents of the current Human Rights can be found, because the protective necessity came out of the judicial practice and politics. Certainly the studied terms had not perpetuated the same meanings throughout the years and with this, they had evolved to construct ideologies. We could not see this evolution in this study, but the participation and the help that Aristotle offers, more than important, is especially exciting, for unmasking part of the thought that was gaining form about necessities that today, still continuing to be necessary, had been legalized in the Constitutions of some modern states.

E-Citizenship:
Observations from the theory of communication of Lee Thayer

Ricardo Menna Barreto[1]

Abstract: The present text part of a theoretical interdisciplinary, aiming to establish a vantage point differentiated virtual communicational processes and their relationship with the Office of the e-citizenship. Starting from Cybernetics and the Theory of Organizational Communication, it seeks to understand the communication as a process that account with four levels of analysis, as proposed by Lee O. Thayer. In This way, the issue of e-citizenship will be seen from the observance of a "zone of overlap" of various levels of communication and their combinations. In fact, the establishment of an understanding of the relationship between communicational e-citizens and e-administration allows discovering the challenges of an effective expansion of (virtual) democratic space.

Thayer), searching for theoretical communicational inputs that promote a complex reflection about e-citizenship. It is about an interdisciplinary approach, based on scientific paradigms supposedly exceeded, however, in our understanding can serve as a motto for the establishment of a differentiated observation point about communication and agreed upon it, e-citizenship.

Originating thus, from forgotten theoretical stimuli harbored in the decades of 1950-1970, we comprehend the communication as a dynamic process underlying the existence, the growth, the modification and the behavior of all living systems(individual or organizational), through means of which the system relates to its environment and with each other.

Our main objective is to verify the applicability of the conceptual model of organizational communication of Lee Osborne Thayer to an interdisciplinary theorization(cybernetics/communicational/social) of e-citizenship. Certainly the present challenges of e-citizenship find themselves linked to not just the problematic of the digital inclusion/exclusion, but also equally dependents on a political deliberation kept by a public administration that proposes a diversity of services to online e-citizens.

E-citizens need, moreover, to be interlinked harmonically to the technical hardware that allows them an active e-participation – apparently today utopic, for being distant from the Brazilian reality.

The following text will be divided in three parts. In the first, entitled "Cybernetics: between the command and communication" (1), we will seek to present, in a general sense, the cybernetic en its interdisciplinary character, demonstrating how this knowledge opened new perspectives to the comprehension of not only the machines, but also the human beings and its society. It is about a scientific field that opens temporarily in parallel to the theorizations of Lee Thayer about the organizational communication.

Thereafter, we shall see the "Fundamentals of Communication theory on Lee Thayer"(2), where will be based the foundations of this barely remembered theoretician of organizational communications. We will demonstrate how Lee Thayer don't distance himself from the Cybernetic theoreticians, since they also concerned themselves about communication – especially from the information problematic. Therefore, we will propose a comprehension of the communication from four analysis levels about communicational problems, determinants to understand the very Thayerian idea of communication and its technological instrumentality.

Finally, we will approach the E-Citizenship: limits and possibilities in a communicative perspective" (3). In this topic, the problematic of e-citizenship will be viewed in the communicational perspective of Lee Thayer, Observing thus the "zone of overlap" from the many levels of communication and its possible combinations. This "zone of overlap" indicates a symbolic point that develops a complex communicational plot between human beings (to an intrapersonal, interpersonal and organizational levels), and machines (technological level), allowing then a more sophisticated observation about the e-citizenship problematic.

It is understood that a social-communicational comprehension about the existing relationship between e-citizens and the e-management makes it possible to detect the complexity of elements of the current technological society and its challenges when it comes to an effective extension of the (virtual) democratic space.

1. Cybernetics: Between the command and communication

Cybernetics is a starting point chosen for out reflection. However, its pick is not random. Lee Osborne Thayer – Theoretician which reflections will serve as a basis to unveil our analysis about communication and e-citizenship -, upholds as well as it researches in the area of communication must seek assistance in a certain number of "contributor subjects" as empirical-conceptual nourishment. Something from the interdisciplinary nature of any serious attempt at theoretical preparation, evidenced by the vast scale and heterogeneity of its conceptual tributary principles, highlighting, amongst them, the cybernetics, the systems theory[2], the Communication theory(human and physical), the linguistics[3], amongst others[4].

In the plan of cybernetics it was Norbert Wiener who realized, from the end of World War II, researches that were species of ramifications of the called "messages theory". Wiener cared not only about transmission of messages in the field of electrical engineering, but also with the study of linguistics, with the development of machines (computers) and other automatons[5].

Thus Wiener, together with W. Rosss Ashby[6], Heinz von Foerster[7], Gregory Bateson[8], amongst other thinkers of diverse areas consolidated, between the years of 1940-1950, this medley of ideas nicknamed by Wiener of Cybernetics.

It is about the derived expression of the Greek word kubernetes, or pilot – the same Greek word from which is derived the word Governor[9]. To Wiener , the objective of "cybernetics is to develop a technical language that enable us, in fact, to have with the issue about the control and overall communication" [10]. More than that: Wiener and his research companions went beyond, unveiling the link between cybernetics (seen as the science of auto-regulation), the theory of information (both human and machine) and the calculation of probabilities. This way the cybernetics erected, in time, a complex interdisciplinary web of knowledge that would start seducing thinkers of different areas.

The interdisciplinary Character of cybernetic thought was well shown by Helmar G. Frank, from the institute of cybernetics of the college of Berlin. Frank realized an analysis that transits between cybernetics and philosophy, sustaining that, even though one isn't originated on the other, they're both related amongst themselves, or even can be considered complimentary. Ergo, from this interface can arise both a cybernetics philosophy as a philosophic cybernetics. Frank claims that cybernetics is initially, the general mathematical theory of Information processing systems. Thus, its concretization happens in processes and Information processing systems that we can call physical, physiological or psychological. Finally the cybernetics can be viewed as a technical realization or trans- formations of said information and systems. Synthesizing, to Frank, cybernetics is the theory or technique of messages, and message processing systems[11].

We realize Frank doesn't diverge much from Wiener in his general theorization about cybernetics, but before, it seeks to place it from its own categorization in General cybernetics (formal) and Material Cybernetics (regional), both which would suffer, according to the author, subdivisions that would result in "seven fields of cybernetics". These fields, on the other hand, would be distinguished in "four problem levels of ascending cybernetic complexity". In such context Wiener would stand beside the "Command Theory", namely, that space that would constitute the "restricted cybernetics" (Wienerian Cybernetics), that belongs to the "theory of self-regulatory schemes in a circle", part of a not so widespread cybernetics: the post-Wiener learning system theory[12].

According to Frank, the "four problem levels of ascending cybernetic complexity" would be thus, the following: 1) The message theory, that concerns itself with different sign species, signals, their message structuring and information value; 2) the Informational systems theory [data processing theory], busy with the functions, algorithms or continual processes; 3) the theory of relational schemes in circle, which is charged with the influence that exert delivered data by an informational system over its following data assimilation; and 4) the theory of system complexes, where its own environment of an informational system contains, again, at least an informational system that cooperates with it or the opposite [in this level of cybernetics, can be also found the mathematical theories of games and cybernetics pedagogy] [13].

Notwithstanding, Frank's main concern lies actually in the following point: at least one part of the data to be elaborated by a cybernetic system, are not originated from said system, but from its environment, what leads to a series of relevant questioning, amongst which: is it possible that a servomechanism[14] can classify, learn, deduce, describe its environment? Could a servomechanism describe itself? Or, maybe: how is developed a conjunctive system composed of many servomechanisms communication amongst themselves? [15]. Questions like these appear to find easy answers in modern informatics and in the systemic-constructive thinking, however, in this time; they serve as a mote to interesting problematic in the philosophical plane. In such context could be seen cybernetic reflections entwining themselves with philosophy, epistemology and the communications theory.

Certainly it were "cyber-philosophical" reflections as Frank's that led important scientists like Gordon Pask, to realize researches in the field of learning observation and prediction. To Pask, "observers are men, animals or machines capable of learning its environment and taken to reduce, by force of learning, the uncertainty around its occurring happenings"[16].

In a cybernetic perspective, the prediction is linked to the problematic of uncertainty. To Pask, an observer will be, initially, uncertain about its own objective, in other words, about the predictions it wishes to realize. The observer (usually a scientist) will also always have a functional uncertainty that will rest upon the kinds of studied structures and even upon their own mediations. This leads Pask to study the many sources of uncertainties and get to the following conclusion: Uncertainty always results from us and our contact with the world[17], In other words, the uncertainty did not reside in machines, but they would be an inherent phenomenon from human beings.

Gordon Pask, observes that the theoretical cyberneticists have as an object of study every kind of system, "whether artificially built, resultant from the abstraction of the physical structure of a natural system that reveals interaction amongst its parts, in a way that they control each other, and independently of the physical character of these parts" [18]. Its emphasis will be thus, in the study of structure, for the cybernetic way of leading with issues, according to Pask, can reach the generality and emit severe affirmations about the organization[19].

In a sense close to Pask, Jacques Guillaumaud points that cybernetics can be useful in many analysis of which, offering the possibilities of learning in its diversity, in its own device, the organized matter, can need the notion of structure. The essential task of cybernetics to Guillaumaud, would be thus, the scientific conquest of the organized systems, in other words, to study, under a different angle, the highly complex matter (living beings, societies) in their evolution[20]. Guillaumaud defends that cybernetics roots itself deeply in the technics of the automatism that allow men to substitute themselves in the most elementary tasks of control, for a machine capable of reproducing some of its own movements[21].

In effect, amongst the cyberneticists this was one of the most hot topics for discussion: Up to which point would a machine be able to reproduce the "movements" – and even for some, the "thoughts" or "feelings" of humans? Herbert A. Simon, considered the father of the "artificial science", sustained that if we added "a learning capacity, it is certain that the computer would be able to create for itself new competencies, being able to even 'self-program' to resolve new issues […][22].

Norbert Wiener, based on such discussions, raises a concern exemplified from the automatic chess machine. At the time of its reflections, Wiener believed that a machine able to "play chess perfectly" would be something unachievable[23], for it would require too great a number of combinations, so that even with superfast computers (it should be noted: computers at the time, on the decade of 1950), would reach, with a certain success, the evaluation of every possibility two moves ahead, in the legal time for a game for a move[24].

Wiener's concern with the "automated chess machines" – also a concern of Shannon[25] – was that if transcended the mere automatized chess machines, building intelligent machines capable of measuring military situations and determining to its best accord in any specific stage, what would be a most dangerous and imminent contingency[26].

It is worth to observe that Wiener is not as naïve to think that danger itself lies in the "machine itself", in the sense that we are at the risk of "domination from the machines", as science fiction suggests in literature and cinema. The threat, to Wiener is that "such machines, albeit defenseless, can be used by a human being or a group of human beings to increase their dominion over the rest of humankind" [27]. Wiener explains, fundamentally, why we do not need to fear the domination of mankind by the machines (on their own); he argues:

> Machine's greatest weakness – a weakness that has saved us so far from being dominated by it – is that it cannot yet take in consideration the wide range of probabilities that characterizes the human situation. The domination from the machine presupposes that a society in its last stages of growing entropy, when probability is insignificant and the statistical differences between individuals are null. Fortunately, we have yet to reach said state[28].

Certainly the fear of "domination from machines", at the time transcended the discussions from cyberneticists, reaching other fields of knowledge, such as Psychology. At that cybernetic-technologic context, was unveiled the questioning about "where we are now and where we are headed", taking Erich Fromm, important social psychologist to affirm (in 1968):

> It seems to me that the main issue is not the possibility of the creation of a computer-man; it is before to know why the idea is becoming so popular in a historic period when nothing seems more important than to transform modern man in a more rational, harmonic and peace-loving man [29].

Inside this heated discussion, Guillaumaud ponders about what effective differs, in essence, living beings from machine, explaining why the waiver to recreating a living being 'externally': "the electronic machine looks infinitely closer to men than the steel man from romances of scientific forwardness […]. This robot was reduced, usually in fact, to a remotely operated mechanism by men. [30].

Polemic questions such as these dazzled scientific communities for decades, in the most distinct countries, whose researchers accompanied the unveiling of cybernetic thought and its interfaces with distinct areas of human knowledge. And so it was with Law. At the beginning of the 1970s there were already in Brazil, lawyers concerned about the influence of the cybernetic innovations in legal practice.

Luiz Fernando Coelho was, possibly, one of the first theoreticians of Brazilian law to speak properly about a "Cyber Law" [31], claiming to have forged this expression on 1974. Notwithstanding, Igor Tenório had already realized years before an interesting analysis of the relations between Cybernetics in Law [32]. One way of another, the objective of both authors was the same: To study, from this new branch of legal knowledge, "the law as a phenomenon of communication and control through computers"[33].

Coelho, for instance, shows how the Cyber Law permeates distinct branches of knowledge and legal practice: from the judicial process (with implications relative to jurisprudence, data processing, etc.), up to public management – which went on to serve on the spoils of "mechanized systems" to the processing of the main jobs that would be translated into bureaucratic hassles[34].

This is because of a creative dialectic, crystallized between the diverse mechanisms of control and communication of which individuals and society would benefit from.

Well, on Wiener's cybernetics there was already a tracing of a relationship between "law, control and communication. For this author "law can be defined as the ethical control applied to communication, and to language as a means of communication, especially when such normative aspect is under command of any authority sufficiently powerful to give its decisions the character of an effective social sanction"[35]. Rightly, complements Wiener, affirming: "the problems of law can be considered problems of communication and cybernetics – that is to say, problems of systematic control and repeatable of certain critical situations.

Based on this brief exposure, we can infer that cybernetics is not, in any way, "lost in time": it is about a knowledge that has yet to find able to provide bases of the historical-theoretical character useful to comprehend our present technological society. Erected interdisciplinary, cybernetics redefined important notions, such as system, control and communication – of which can with due care , be better appropriated by jus-philosophical reflection.

It is worth noting that the theorization about communication in Lee Thayer, to be outlined in the next point, finds itself in many aspects tuned with the presupposed theoretical cyberneticists. This way, a review on the proposed categories by Thayer, in light of certain cybernetic bases, can be of great value to unveil the theoretical route that culminated in what we know today as the Information and communications technology (ICT).

2. Fundamentals Of The Communications Theory In Lee Thayer

Lee Osborne Thayer was the director of the Center for the Advanced Study of Communication of the University of Missouri, city from Kansas, Being also a member of the Council of National Society for the Study of Communication (USA). Renowned theoretician in the communications area, Thayer became very known on Management for his organizational communication theory, realizing researches marked as interdisciplinary parallel to cyberneticists especially between the years of 1950-1970.

Thayer doesn't grow far, therefore, from the cybernetic theoreticians, as these also worried themselves with communication – notedly starting from the information problematic. In effect the first possible parallel between the communications theory of Thayer and the cyberneticists happens by the fact that both recognize that communications begin from 2 basic functions: a) the adaptation, that is, the fact that we are destined and to a certain degree programmed to receive the communication from our environment, what allows us to adapt and maneuver in order to achieve our objectives; and b) To communicate with a living being (a person for example) from the environment, what enables the establishment, maintenance and exploration of different measures in the relation of said living being with ourselves. In the first case, we receive and process internal and external facts, aiming adaptation, in the second, we produce (generating or scattering data managed to others) in order to adapt a person to our reality[36].

In the same way, both Thayer and Wiener recognize that we can find, in the study of the nature of the communications in the society, the answer of how communication sediments its own social structure. It is in this scenario that the concepts and analytical instruments outlined by Thayer, to be seen next, can be of basic importance to erect a theorization about the communicational processes that involve the e-citizen in a complex society.

2.1 Levels of analysis of communication

Lee Osborne Thayer Propose that we think about communication from four levels of analysis. Nevertheless, before we observe such levels, we must unveil the Thayerian concept of communication. Between the many possible definitions of communication, Thayer's approach is different, especially, for recognizing not only the complexity, but the humanity of the communicational phenomenon.

According to Lee Thayer, the communication is, for the sentiment and the human intellect, what the physical metabolism represents to the physiological processes of the body. Accordingly, the communication can be seen as "one of two basic processes of all living beings - the transformation of food in energy and the transformation of the facts in information" [37]. In other words, the communication maybe considered a dynamic process underlying the existence, the growth, the modification and the behavior of all living systems, whether subject or organization through which will be established a relationship with the environment, with others and their own parts[38].

Once such concept is agreed on, we pass onto the analysis of the four levels (intrapersonal, interpersonal, organizational and technologic) of problems of the communications area, thus exposed by Lee Thayer[39].

To Thayer, it is necessary recognize, initially, the existence of the [1] Intrapersonal level, from which is studied the behavior of the subject, namely, what is going on "inside" people during the development of the communicative process.

Thereafter, in the level [2] of the interpersonal communication is studying, basically, the way certain subjects affect each other mutually over the intercommunication and, thus, regulate and control each other.

The next level, [3] is the organizational. It is about the data system networks that link between themselves the members of a certain organization and "provide the means of which the enterprise relates to the environment".

Finally, the ultimate level of analysis is the [4] technologic. To Thayer, when the center of attention rests on the technology of communications, "we start worrying about the equipment, about the hardware and the formal software to generate, store, process, translate, distribute or exhibit data". Note that Thayer doesn't neglect the human element in this plane of analysis, because to him, "the ears and eyes must be considered an aspect of the communications technology, along with the television and the modern personal computers" [40].

Certainly any theoretical initiative about reflecting on the aspects that shape the e-citizen must pause on the technologic level, what doesn't prevent, however, that it rests its attention, for example in aspects of the second level (interpersonal) – even because the technologic level comprehends of all the others[41]. The diagram below, proposed by Thayer, seeks to illustrate the four levels of communicational analysis[42].

In such perspective, the communication must be seen, initially as a cognitive process originating from the internal level (subject), in direction to the external plane (social), generating thus reflexes on the environment. And strengthen up the theoretical proposal of Thayer that does not address these levels in a tight manner, for they overlap, intertwining each other. In the following matter, we shall see how the communication still divides itself in instrumental and consummatory, what will show that the virtual communication coats itself with a certain instrumentality, generating consequences (still not so clear) in the field of e-citizenship.

2.2 Virtual communication: Instrumental technology

Thayerian distinction of the communication in instrumental and consummatory finds echo in the philosophy of language of John Searle[43]. Lee Thayer understands that part of our communication serves as an "end and itself", even if sometimes we can produce or receive information without any intention, direct or indirect. In other words, at times we can communicate in a "consumable way", that is, "we can consume part of our own behavior and of another person's, without anything else in mind but its mere consumption(…); [one possible example is] the fact that someone speaks only to hear its own voice. A consummatory communication" [44].

However, if on one side John Searle emphasizes the utterance of who speaks and their intentions, Thayer doesn't find itself distant by explaining what he understands for instrumental communication: it is about that communication with an objective in mind, in other words, intentional, "because we cannot neglect the fact that communication always generates some con sequence, even when said consequence is not sought out" [45].

Thayer contemplates his idea, asserting: "any communication that happens and has any consequence to the interpersonal or organizational relationship with the persons involved is instrumental" [46].

In this point, we can observe the interpersonal/technologic interface and the instrumentality of the communication, transposing these ideas to the plan of the virtual communication (harbored, obviously in the technologic level of the communication problems). For that, we must consider, initially, the following premises: the human communication happens always in a structured context and, therefore, organized, in a manner that the basic function of the communication is to evoke and invigorate behavioral systems[47].

On the interpersonal level of communication, it is interesting to know up to what point there is a "control" of the subjects through communication. This presupposes a teleology of the communication act itself, in other words, the existence of the intention of an alter in controlling your relation with ego. This communication level (Interpersonal) does not discard the "social dimension" (the individuals belong to a more inclusive social unit – a nation, for instance) and of how everything is subject to the ideology-technology of time and space[48].

In effect, reflecting over subjects in interaction/communication implies in recognizing the existence of a determined kind of natural organization: the society. For Thayer, this special form of organization consists in the "structure of relations between people and departments, and the rules through which is governed the behavior between them"[49].

Therefore "to rule the behavior" of others is only possible instrumentally, since the instrumentality of communication starts, nowadays, to coat itself of a technological drapery. Not that the computers themselves "communicate between each other, but they start being used > to increase and amplify the processing capacity and production of information of men. The computers do not transport data from one place to another, as great part of previous technological innovations; processing of data. They are projected and programmed for reducing, analyzing, synthesizing, reorganizing and for, in many ways, exhibit or publishing ways or series of data that cannot be, in other way, be available to us, or can require considerably more time for its production or processing[50].

Thayer, at the time outlines a conception of compatible computing with what we understand as a computer today. Moreover, it is the interface man/computer that configures the symbolic-communicational space presently known as cyberspace. Pierre Lévy understands as cyberspace that "space of communication open by a worldwide interconnection of computers and the memories of said computers" [51].

In this context, analysis both in the area of communication and sociology must seek to comprehend how the Internet affects the social relationships; but not only as the mediation as computer affects the quality of said interactions and the social relations as a whole – in the sense of knowing if online relationships will be "better" or "worse". We must know, beyond that, up to which point the communication mediated by computers affects the "mix" of interactions and social relations[52].

We understand that a complex mix arising from the virtual interaction (through the Internet) between individuals is situated in a "zone of overlapping of the many levels and their combinations", in other words, in the surface of contact indicated by the dashed central space[53]. This space points to a complex communicational web embraced by the technological level, making it possible to speak, hereinafter, in a computer mediated interaction (technologic communication) – as the picture below states:

Observing this contact zone we realize it is not with the "affairs" (material or immaterial) of the world that we deal with. For Thayer, we deal with the information about these affairs, in a way that the "affairs" are mere physical data that are sensed and translated by the sensorial equipment of a subject, endowing him with gross sensorial data. It is the psychological system of the subject that will transform these "gross data" into information[54], to which it can be communicated both physically and virtually.

Brennand and Brennand show us how the recent process of aggregation of social virtual networks and its actors have relational dimensions (interactional) complex, because virtual communication, complexifies the very social web, allowing for new social aggregations, collective identities and horizontal cooperation [55]. This way, the flux of the information networks and communication brings to spotlight the diffuse and places in evidence the temporal indetermination generated by a process of which interact human intellect and intelligent machines[56].

It is the interaction between human intellect and intelligent machines that will lead us, in the next chapter, to consider the areas of contacts interpersonal ↔ organizational and organizational ↔ technologic. In it we mean to unveil the limits and possibilities of thinking about e-citizenship from the theoretical stimuli of Thayer.

3. E-Citizenship: limits and possibilities in a communicational perspective

To comprehend the e-citizenship[57] we must establish before a comprehension about what is a political participation coated technologically. Edouard Bannwart, on unveiling the configurations of the "multimedia society", shows us how through political participation we can understand the intervention in matters of opinions and decisions in the most diverse areas of public life, what substantially reconfigures in a context of which the technological advances offer new opportunities in the plane of political participation[58].

We would be, in this context of technological advances, therefore, before a "new citizenship"? Michel Miaille helps to answer this question, by confirming that "whether about a new citizenship to come or an already committed citizenship, everything depends on the type of comprehension that we testify in relation to what is new about this citizenship, namely, the most contemporary technology that is allowed to exercise"[59].

The "contemporary technology" highlighted by Miaille can be seen as a powerful instrument "see, for example, the handouts of the Web 2.0[60] that must according to Sanchez, be accompanied by a "ca-

[57] We adopted in this research, the term e-citizenship, despite some authors use other terms to mean the e-citizen, such as "virtual citizen" as intended MIAILLE, Michel. O Cidadão Virtual. [60] "Web 2.0 is the business revolution in the computer industry caused by the move to the internet as platform, and an attempt to understand the rules for success on that new pacitation of society, especially civil society, to understand it and use it according to democratic values. Otherwise, there will be just a vertical transfer of power – from bureaucracy to the government – through a better control of information" [61]. This capacitation is, thus, a way of overcoming the present mismatch between "civil society" and the "technological society", in a way that the inception of new technological devices becomes not only useful, but closer to each citizen's reality.

Without further ado, let us pass, thus, to observe the problematic of the e-citizenship in the communicational perspective of Lee Thayer. For such, we need to go back to the referred "zone of overlapping" of communication levels and its combinations – previously illustrated. We mentioned that the surface of contact indicated in the diagram by the dashed central space represents a symbolic point in which is developed the complex communicational web; in it, the technological level covers the other levels (Intrapersonal, interpersonal and organizational). In the dashed area we can observe and comprehend how is developed the interaction/communication mediated by computer.

Similarly, we mention that the areas of interpersonal organizational and organizational technologic are the ones that is of our interest to observe. But why? Foremost, by the fact that Lee Thayer proposes a Theory that aims to explain a problem rather practical: the behavior of the subjects in a interpersonal contexts. Nevertheless, such contexts do not end in themselves; they must be observed as dynamically involved in an organizational context. There is no way to unlink the interpersonal and organizational planes. , for any interpersonal encounter that persists (repeats itself) becomes (generically) an organization[62].

Every interpersonal relationship can be seen, thus, as an organization, even if the essence of any organization consists properly in the "structure of relations between people and departments, and the rules through which is governed the behavior between them" [63] – that platform. Chief among those rules is this: Build applications that harness network effects to get better the more people use them. (This is what I've elsewhere called "harnessing collective intelligence)". See O'REILLY, Tim. Web 2.0 Compact Definition: Trying Again. may result from the relations from other people, or can be imposed by planned relationships[64]. The structure of the organization characterizes itself thus, "by the pattern or by the flux networks of information-decision, inside the organization and by the channels and networks that describe its communication with the environment" [65]. From cybernetic stimuli, we can also assert: organizations presuppose a decrease (but not removal) of uncertainties – once that the uncertainty is synonymous of "little information". This way, the observation (in the organizational level) can be faced as an effective process of uncertainties removal of a mass of possibilities [66].

Today, the natural organizations (individuals in organized interactions, or societies) structure and regulate themselves from technology coated relations. However, there is, in this point, a communicational problem - that was also an object of concern to cyberneticists: The compatibility. Technologies (notedly the information systems) need to be compatible to the systems to which they link to be considered efficient. Accordingly, an example is the necessary harmony of the user's language with the computer's language, imperious condition for an efficient relation man/machine[67].

The e-citizen can be considered that citizen that appropriates and makes use of digital tools that lead him to an effective interaction and political participation in the organizational-technologic plane of public management. Or according to Ferreira [et. al.], "from the moment in which the citizens have a right of access to public services, to educate themselves, to communicate though TIC, it can be said that in e-citizenship, a way of exercising citizenship with the support of the technologies of information and communications"[68].

Regardless, today we do not have e-citizens operating in line, homogeneously, consisting of digital supports that make them able to interact with public management. To an effectiveness (practical) of the e-citizenship, we must remember that the citizenship itself must count on a "way to be and live marked by the ideals of equality and dignity, as well as liberty"69. But we could also add: marked by the idea of compatibility. It is about compatibility between the services offered online by the public management and the sociocultural reality of Brazilian citizens.

Rodegheri, Santos and Oliveira address the necessity of the existence of an > Annexation of the space offered by the web as an alternative way of the exercise of democracy, not substituting the current model, but reinforcing it and deploying a new medium, in which stand the ease of use, access and transmission of information[70].

But we reinforce: Not necessarily the new Technologies incorporated by the public management are synonymous of "easy and dynamics services". Ease of usage will only exist if there is a compatibility and incorporation of these technologies by their recipients: the citizens. On the other hand, we do not doubt that, on its own the virtual space opened by the web, when incorporated by the public management, strengthen, amongst other factors, the visibility, allowing for a bigger possibility of controlling the public acts. As well sustains Temis Limberger, such fact enables us to talk (without utopias) in the observance of the principle of publicity and the right to be informed of the citizen, on which rests the legal system in the Democratic State [71].

This administration, transparent, publicized, coated by new technologies is being called "e-management", for it counts on a plentiful set of activities, realized through the internet, in which the citizen can consult, inform himself, and realize formalities and online transactions with governmental organs. This way, governs seek with such activities, to offer more comfort and haste to e-citizens, eliminating thus the middle-man between said entities and the State[72].

The positive aspect of the e-management lies in the fact that it is not about a "project" anymore, but a reality in a big measure put in motion. Meanwhile the organization, the e-management plans and establishes information systems that guarantee the necessary communication to keep this "virtual organization" in motion and by reach of all e-citizens. However, its negative aspect is that there are no effective stimuli – capacitation/compatibility – on the government's part so that "common citizens" can effectively become e-citizens. This happens because of a (still existent) scenario of digital exclusion[73]. Speaking about digital exclusion, we're not dealing with "just economical exclusion, but also cultural exclusion. The complexity and the abstraction of the society of information are really factions of acceleration on the distance between 'info-elected' and 'info-excluded'[74].

In a way or another, the brand of the modern public managements, since the availability of the new information technologies and communications, is the [attempt to offer citizens] the usage of these technologies, in an aggressive way, be it to offer services of informational nature, to give support and favor the supply and the utilization of the public services[75]. In other words, there is a pretension to coat the relation between citizens and public management in a technological suit.

We understand that a communicational comprehension of the existing relationship between e-citizens and the e-management allows us to recognize the inherent complexity in the overlapping of the many levels of communication analysis, especially from the point of view of three (of four) levels: Interpersonal/organizational/technologic. The common point between the different levels is that all of them deal with communication systems (or information processing), in which operations consist in the conversion of data into information. The intertwining of the factors that compose the unique levels of analysis leads us to detect the existence of a mismatch between the technologic and the interpersonal, so that the technologic increment coating public management still requires an effective digital inclusion of their management in its broadest sense: cultural, economic and technologic.

If political liberation, sustained by the riches of the public virtual spaces, to occur effectively – with the participation of the e-citizens – in now virtual and not just territorial space, we can have, who knows, in a near future, more important decisions taken both in the cyberspace and the territorial space, in a symbiosis that will make no distinction between the legitimacy of the word proffered in the physical of virtual plane. In this way, the tendency is that the acts founded on the public management will be made more transparent to the citizens, who will contribute with their ideas, opinions and solutions to the debate over public matters[76], crystallizing what can be called today the e-participation.

Conclusions

This text had for its basic objective to establish, interdisciplinary, a communicational-social comprehension of the e-citizenship. For this, our starting point was the cybernetics, aiming to open a perspective for the comprehension of the organizational communication. The interdisciplinary character of the cybernetic thinking, could show how this area of the scientific transcends the mere technical realization or the transformation of processes and systems: cybernetics should be seen as an yet present point of problematic of the social implications and philosophical of the interaction man/machine. In this sense, the cybernetic theory of complexes of systems shows how the environment of an informational system keeps other systems (humans, mostly), that can cooperate with it, or be against it. Cybernetics, thus, serves as an observation point to all kinds of systems, whether artificially built, resultant from the abstraction of the physical structure of a natural system. Its relevance is in offering a theoretical instrument able to study the structures and the problematic of the information/communication.

Not very distant from cybernetics, it was possible to see in Lee Thayer that the fear of cyberneticists of a "domination from the machines" has yet to find grounds to support it, because speaking of machines we are dealing (presently) of communication machines. Furthermore, the communication, in Thayer, must be seen as a dynamic process by existence, growth, modification and behavior of all living systems (machines do not have a life of their own!), be they an individual or an organization through which will establish a relationship with the environment. What there is, thus, is a communication led by living beings, but coated of a Nano chemical or technologic coating. The "zone of overlapping" of the many communication levels, seen from Thayer's point of view, can show exactly that: how the dashed central space is a symbolic point where the complex communicational web can unveil between human beings (on the intrapersonal, interpersonal and organizational levels) and machines (technologic level). The "dashed point" is, thus, the ideal point of observation – in a communicational perspective – in order to comprehend and learn the problematic of e-citizenship.

Surely, e-citizenship finds itself, today, linked not just to digital exclusion/inclusion, but equally dependent of a political deliberation kept by a public management that proposes a diversity of services to virtual citizens in line. In a context in which public management finds itself, gradually taking advantage of the digital Medias, ideas like visibility, transparency and control of the public acts can become a possible reality. Notwithstanding, this will only be possible if the e-management is marked by the referred aperture and the horizontality – recognizing that the public management and citizens find themselves in the same symbolic plane (cyberspace)

Finally, we sustain that the perception of the exchanges occurred between e-citizens and e-management in the cyberspace can be better unveiled from the theoretical instrument proposed by Lee Thayer. From this point, we have a different observation of the plot e-citizens/e-management, perceiving thus not only the complex aspects that coat the technological communication, but recognizing that "by amplifying in the internet, the public space aspires sociability, private life and the expressivity of individuals" [77].

Open source software, access to knowledge and software licensing

Marcella Furtado de Magalhães Gomes[1]
Roberto Vasconcelos Novaes[2]
Mariana Guimarães Becker[3]

Abstract: The world depends more and more on computers. Open source and free software create the ideal conditions to access the fundamental digital tools, allowing the advance of knowledge, research and development in countries such as Brazil that would be otherwise deprived of these kinds of benefits.
In spite of the common terms, there are different ways to license and distribute open source software. The open source spectrum ranges from complete grant of commercial uses to those that demand that derivative works are distributed under the same license terms. These differences have important economical, legal and technical consequences. Those different structures affect software development, longevity of projects and software distribution.
In USA there is a better developed and structured legal precedent collection. In Brazil, however, the legal sphere is yet to study the precise rules and consequences of open source software, especially concerning intellectual property and patents.
Nevertheless, in the past decade Brazil government had supported the utilization of the open source software in its internal organizations. There is also a new legislation that illuminates the uses and advantages of those technologies. In this paper we present this Brazilian legislation regarding open source software licensing, and also analyses the gains of productivity or economic benefits derived from the adoption of those systems. This way, we intend to show that the availability of open source and free tools is a fundamental factor to promote development that could otherwise be haltered due to high costs and private control of technology. The access and availability of open source software is a vital way to create better governments, public transparency and human rights enforcement.

Keywords: Free Software, Software Licensing, Access to knowledge

1. Introduction

In a world where our activities depend heavily on software performance, to create and disseminate free software, i.e., software that allows users to have access to its structural code, means to be able to provide meaningful technological access to many societies.

Despite its universal nomenclature, these tools have different kinds and levels of openness and use, which allows for various serious legal, economic and technological repercussions.

Campaigners of this technology argue that its use provides access to the most advanced digital tools, contributing to the progress of knowledge, research and development in countries, such as Brazil, in which the absence of these platforms would be more sharply felt, as a result of its technological gap, if compared to developed countries.

In this paper, we present what is free software, which open source legal arrangements there are and what are the ramifications of the different types of licensing, as well as the impact of its use, particularly in Brazil, which has adopted a government policy of encouraging the use of this tool.

2. Free Software and Open Source Software Concept

In 1985 the Free Software Foundation was created, a non-profit organization, dedicated to eliminating restrictions on the use, copy, distribution, study and change of software. These actions are pillars of the free software definition; even though this definition is in constant improvement, due to the different social demands and constant technological developments in IT.

According to the Free Software Foundation (FSF), by free software we should understand software that respects the freedom and sense of community of its users. It reaffirms, thus, the foundations that enabled the creation of the FSF, i.e., free software users have the freedom to run, to copy, to distribute, to study, to change and to improve software in order to control the program and what it would be able to do. (http://www.gnu.org/philosophy/free-sw.html)

This freedom regards both the software's use and implementation, as its ability to process and adapt data to new needs and applications, and it can only be exercised concretely by providing the source code that makes up the software for further analysis and modification by its user.

When the source code is available, it allows for a high degree of innovative technological production. A program can be disassembled and refurbished to generate several other programs which are different from their originals. It also allows certain social freedom, due to the occurrence of new partnerships between several programmers and users, which are not possible in software developed under proprietary license.[4]

The sheer amount of contributors can also lead to increase in software reliability by the simple fact that several developers, from all around the world and with all kinds of skills, work to improve them. Additionally, users who use these programs may report more fully the limitations and errors in its operation and are in a better position to deal with these failures, as they have access to the structure of the software they use.

All these contribute to the programs greater longevity. Proprietary software may go out of line, preventing their recycling into programs that are more modern or with new applications. Free software, although they are also liable to fall into disuse, are easily accessible to be reused.

The various licenses governing free software use[5], first of all, revolve around preventing commercial exploitation of exclusive nature of its source codes. This does not mean that it cannot occur any kind of economic exploitation using free software or its source code; but only that the user must have access to the source code and thus, enabling, further than economic gain, that the user may relish the software intellectual value and have control over the program.

[4]The term proprietary is used to refer to programs and licenses that cannot be considered free according to the given definition.

[5]To be considered truly free these licenses cannot restrict the freedoms mentioned, having as its purpose to guarantee them.

Therefore, free software bears this name because its user is free to learn and use the structure on which that system was build:

> "Thus, "free software" is a matter of liberty, not price. To understand the concept, you should think of "free" as in "free speech," not as in "free beer"." (http://www.gnu.org/philosophy/free-sw.html)

The FSF has identified four essential freedoms that must be present in software so that it can be called free:

- "The freedom to run the program, for any purpose (freedom 0).
- The freedom to study how the program works and change it so it does your computing as you wish (freedom 1). Access to the source code is a precondition for this.
- The freedom to redistribute copies so you can help your neighbour (freedom 2).

> The freedom to distribute copies of your modified versions to others (freedom 3). By doing this you can give the whole community a chance to benefit from your changes. Access to the source code is a precondition for this." (http://www.gnu.org/philosophy/free-sw.html)

The only limitation to these freedoms, particularly to freedom 3, is what is known as Copyleft, i.e., the possibility of imposition by the free software license that the distributed copies must be licensed in the same way as the original software is, not allowing for the addition of restrictions contrary to the central freedoms. This rule has the ability to prevent free software from losing, in its process of modification by the community, the qualities that characterize them as such.

Open Source Software is another term commonly used to refer to free software, and, in fact, basically define the same type of programs. Nevertheless, the use of these two terms as synonyms can be regarded as mistaken. Open source software is not necessarily focused on user's freedom, one of the main issues of free software. Here, what really matters is the practical aspects of making the source code available, i.e., the way it was developed, its benefits, its great capacity for innovation and reliability. Free software movements have a more politically and socially engaged view, and therefore care about access to knowledge and freedom to use that knowledge.

3. Law and Software Licenses

In Brazil, Law No. 9.609/98 - Software Law and Law No. 9.610/98 - Copyright Law governs computer programs, both free and proprietary software. Regarding free software, it is necessary to emphasize that the application of copyright must first be recognized so that, later, it may be waived in favour of other users and programmers. However, free software regulamentation depends heavily on its licenses, specially developed for this type of program, as they stipulate, in large part, the legal consequences of using this type of software.

Through our study of Software Law, we verified that users can do close to nothing with a purchased program beyond using it on their own computers and making one copy for safekeeping. It is the author's prerogative to authorize less restrictive uses of the programs. These permissions are usually granted through licenses that, in turn, ensure the freedoms that underlie the concept of free software.

The permissive character of free software licenses is not absolute. There are certain licenses, such as the original BSD License (Berkeley Software Distribution), that require mentions to the program's authorship, and others like the GNU GPL (General Public License from GNU Project), which endorse Copyleft.

Free software licenses can be classified in two groups, permissive licenses and licenses that apply Copyleft. Permissive licenses such as the MIT License and the Apache License, only refer to the use, redistribution and modification of software. They do not require that in redistribution the software keeps itself free and do not require that open source versions be distributed, which allows free software to become proprietary. These licenses, however, are interesting to be used when the purpose of the project focuses on its wide dissemination.

In a certain way, permissive licenses are the maximum guarantee of freedom of speech and users have autonomy to use free software in the way they wish. On the other hand, it might also end up restricting this freedom to the extent that it might omit freedom of third parties that would come in the chain of redistribution. This leads to the big problem that the code of programs distributed under this type of license, be they modified or not, can go closed. Permissive license admits that redistributors combine open source with material based on closed source, which allows developments latter added to the code to end up being made under a proprietary license. Now, softwares are dynamic structures that are only useful if they follow the constant changes and new realities and needs of users. Therefore, even if the original code remains free, if their subsequent developments become proprietary, in the long run, this can derail their use without purchasing the subsequent modifications, which ultimately force the user to acquire later developments.

Licenses that apply Copyleft, on the other hand, require, in case of redistribution, conditions that ensure the software will keep its original freedoms, acting to prevent that a later version will become closed. This limitation on the maximum expression of freedom imposed by Copyleft can be regarded as a precaution so that the freedom of others may remain assured.

The GNU GPL license was the first one to apply the concept of Copyleft, developed by Richard Stallman, original author of the GPL. Copyleft uses Copyright laws to ensure that the code will remain freely available:

> "To copyleft a program, we first state that it is copyrighted; then we add distribution terms, which are a legal instrument that gives everyone the rights to use, modify, and redistribute the program's code or any program derived from it but only if the distribution terms are unchanged. Thus, the code and the freedoms become legally inseparable. Proprietary software developers use copyright to take away the users' freedom; we use copyright to guarantee their freedom. That's why we reverse the name, changing "copyright" into "copyleft."" (Stallman, 2002, p.91)

By requiring that the source code be available, GLP propitiates modifications on the software and, if they occur and the modified program is redistributed, the new version's source code should also be available, enabling new subsequent modifications.

In theory, the combination of open source code with proprietary code would cause any software that includes material derived from a combination of codes to be regarded as free. Therefore, theoretically, to combine free licenses that apply copyleft with proprietary licenses or other permissive licenses would be impossible.

However, that does not mean that it is not possible to simultaneity use programs with both licenses, or even combines them. Each free software license applies its precepts in different ways and to different degrees, and there are several ways to combine programs.

4) Development and economic exploitation

To refer to software as free alludes to its ideology of respect for its essential freedoms that are crucial to society, especially considering that our daily activities are increasingly digitized and depend on the performance of the software that structure them. In this context creating and disseminating free software has the power to give relevant technological access to several nations, promoting economic development and freedom in general.

The anti-free software speech often argues that for the production of software to be possible is necessary to pay many people, especially programmers. The debate on the economic issue in free software, i.e., how to generate income and profits from its production is, in fact, an argument about this model's durability, because there will always be a need for resources, whether economic or workforce.

Programmers need indeed to be paid in some way and companies that develop it must work with profits. However, various models have already shown that it is possible to combine free software with forms of exploitation so that its production can still occur.

Free software sales may seem, at first, somewhat contradictory, but a deeper analysis shows that it is exactly the opposite. As already discussed, free software are free and not for free, thereby, whoever acquires free software is free to share them, which includes selling, enhancing its natural tendency to spread. This does not occur with proprietary software, whose distribution without previous permission is illegal.

Furthermore, a major source of income from these programs is work for hire, providing classes on the use of software, technical assistance, specific adaptations that interested parties may request. As they say in the free software community: software are free, people aren't - "software are free to be reproduced and distributed, but for people's knowledge you must pay."

Generally, the original developers can best offer these improvements. It is also pointed out that free software are often used as subsystems and applications for electronic devices, i.e., as by-products of another main business that provides the income.

Free software market provides people and businesses capable of offering maintenance and technical support for programs and products that work based on free software. In theory, anyone can become an expert in a given program, and, therefore, capable of offering this kind of service, mainly because there is not, necessarily, a dependence on the support of the software's producer and its authorized service providers. The user, thus, is free to choose who they want to hire.

Free software have been providing a new vision on how to deal with computer programs, which cease to be something static, dependent on its original developers to originate new improvements and applicability. They have started to have a dynamic nature, on which the user has control to use them however they want in any given circumstances, being able to adapt them, improve them and make them more useful. Such dynamism leads to the emergence of several new updates and software derived from their original with such a speed that cannot be verified in proprietary software. The dissemination of new or upgraded technologies has a potential benefit to society as a whole.

Moreover, one of the great merits of free software is exactly to demonstrate, through successful practical examples, that production models based on non-proprietary structures actually work. It is possible to extrapolate these models to other economic areas and verify their productive, financial, technological and social impacts. With the internet it is possible to transmit knowledge and culture at levels never before dreamed.

For example, the approach to commercial exploit the music industry is changing. The easiness of downloading music illegally has reduced physical album's sales making music sales over the Internet at a diminished price possible. There are artists who offer their works on the internet to be purchased at the price the consumer wants to pay. It applies here, too, the model of work for hire, in which the main source of income is no longer selling products but profits from the concerts.

> "In a way, free software is a cutting edge that is experiencing, from many points of view, new models of production of intellectual works. Models that do not restrict the user's freedom to protect the author's. Models in which anyone can improve the work of others. Models in which, in the end, we are rediscovering how to cooperate. "(González-Barahona et al., 2012, p.29)

5. The Brazilian government experience

Brazilian government has been encouraging free software development in the country with various motives, such as saving public money by not paying for expensive proprietary licenses and developing local IT industry. Free software is seen as an excellent alternative for sharing information to meet specific government needs.

Expenses on software and IT in general have increased in all sectors, including in the government. Free software offer the possibility of reducing costs, saving public funds by not payment for proprietary licenses. There is independence from suppliers, which avoids the usual proprietary lock-in, for there is no obligation to acquire new licenses from a single manufacturer with the release of new versions. With free software, there is no dependency since there is a wide range of companies that could be hired to upgrading them. This would even encourage domestic market with the increase in demand for IT professionals. Furthermore, using free software also aims to universalize services for citizens through Brazilian population's digital inclusion, taking into account communication and education rights through access to technology.

Seeking to enable this project Brazilian government has adopted favourable laws and measures. In 2005 the "Free Guide: Migration Reference to Free Software by the Federal Government" was created, having "The IDA Open Source Migration Guidelines" of the European Community, in its second version, as a basic reference. This document establishes a strategy for free software implementation, aiming to sever technological dependence on large groups:

> "Over the past three years, we have implemented a strong policy of technological independence, strengthening high performance computing research, digital inclusion and adoption of free software." (Reference Guide for Migration to Free Software by the Federal Government - Organized by Working Group Migration to Free Software - Taken from the Introduction text by President Lula)

This independence also avoids a problem that has occurred in some countries, where old files can no longer be accessed due to the change of the default code in which they were developed. Proprietary software does not allow that these files source code be updated so they become obsolete and the information they contain inaccessible.

Arising out of the free software implementation initiative, the concept of Public Software emerged as a way to share software developed by the government. The GPL License was adopted by government in its search for ways to make the sharing of solutions between public institutions feasible. To this end, in 2004, the National Institute of Information Technology, responsible for the Technical Committee for the Implementation of Free Software in the Brazilian Electronic Government, commissioned a study on the constitutionality of the GPL License. It resulted in the "Study on Free Software" by the Getúlio Vargas Foundation, which concluded that the GPL is consistent with the Brazilian legal system. The study generated the book "Free Software Law and Public Administration".

Public Software is developed by the government and as such is a public good. The availability of software by the public sector goes beyond the world of open source, so the basis of Public Software concept was established as a manifestation of public interest for a given solution. In this respect, the study mentioned above says that "the note that allows the administration to assign, as its discretion, the particular use is compatible with the public interest [...]" (Falcon et al., 2007, p. 161).

In 2005, it was licensed the first federal free software, whose guidelines was based on what was available in the country at that time, the Copyright Law, the Software Law and the Resolution No. 58 of the National Institute of Industrial Property. This program, initially developed to meet the demands of government, exceeded the federal public sector.

The availability of software in a public environment of collaboration enabled the intensification of its use and the speed of its adoption meant that a network of service providers arose rapidly throughout the country. Society assumed a dynamic role in software development process.

In 2007, the Brazilian Public Software Website was created, whose goal revolves around its effectuation as a public good, promoting a collaborative environment for users, developers and service providers. The available services are accessed by other countries, such as Uruguay, Argentina, Portugal, Venezuela, Chile and Paraguay and the software that are available on the website follows the guidelines of Instruction No. 1/2011 of the Secretary of Logistics and Information Technology in the Ministry of Planning, Budget and Management:

> "Article 2nd –The Brazilian Public Software is a specific type of software that adopts a free license model for its source code, protection of its original identity which includes its name, brand, source code, documentation and other related artefacts through > the Trademark Public License model and is available on the Internet in a public virtual environment, being treated as a benefit to society, market and citizen [...]."

The Trademark Public License, launched in 2010, has as its main legal objective to protect software trademarks offered in the Brazilian Public Software Website. Its graphical representation was an idea copied from Copyleft, being the letter "R" inside a circle used to indicate trademark, only reversed. It is in its first version and is based on models developed in the various versions of the GPL and the Creative Commons License, especially the License for Trademarks:

> "Article 3rd V - Trademark Public License: type of trademark license that preserves its original identity which includes its name, brand, source code, documentation and other artefacts related to the Brazilian Public Software and in which the registration holder allows generically, without any kind of prior and / or specific approval, that others use it for free for the purposes of copy, distribution, sharing and transmission in any physical or virtual appliance, including commercial purposes [...] ". (Instruction No. 1/2011 of the Secretary of Logistics and Information Technology in the Ministry of Planning, Budget and Management)

Considering the Brazilian legislation on trademarks and patents the Trademark Public License ensures the mark's original structure and recognizes its authorship, so the author can just waive its exclusivity on the developed program. It allows the user some free software basic principles, its copying, distribution, sharing, transmission and marketing in a permissive way, not requiring prior permission, provided that the brand continues unchanged and there is respect to its definition and proportionality.

6. Political interferences on free software use: Paraná's case.

Even before the creation of the Federal Government Guide for migration to Free Software in 2005, the State of Paraná was already establishing itself as a national reference in independence and sustainable technological innovation being indicated as one of the biggest free software user and developer in the country. The Information Technology and Communication Company of Paraná (CELEPAR), organization that centralizes the activities of information technology in Paraná, conducted this strategic policy.

The State Government aimed to raise public informatics and intensify the democratic process, knowing that public investment in this area should be done in a responsible and sustainable manner.

In 2003 were sanctioned state laws 14.058/2003 and 14.195/2003 on the preferential use of free technologies and of open source by the State Government. These laws state that, when purchasing software, Paraná's administration should opt for free software, operating systems and word processors of open source and, in case of proprietary software acquisition[6]; preference should be given to those that operate in multiplatform environment, enabling implementation without restrictions on free software operating systems. With this measure, public coffers saved U.S. $ 127.3 million[7] in just the first three years of its implementation.

Thus, public administration bodies' softwares were available to society by editing a General Public License (GPL) based on international copyright laws. Paraná's public informatics had been progressing through a more participatory management, with the support of technology to government decisions.

However, in April 2013, Carlos Alberto, who was Governor of Paraná at the time, signed a memorandum of understanding with Microsoft whose proposal was to provide free technology solutions for training people in IT and the use of a virtual learning platform for a period of two years. Software options to be implemented by the government in the areas of education, skills, innovation and entrepreneurship will be provided. A similar agreement was signed with the State of São Paulo stating that domestic and international investors trust was rescued with the government new guidelines.

This bland disregard of Law 14.058/2003, about the acquisition of proprietary software platform, demonstrates a common problem of Brazilian public administration: public policies instability because of the different political inclinations that are in power. Moreover, this situation also reflects a serious problem that the free software movement faces, pressure from large companies to bar initiatives of adopting them.

When the State of Paraná started treating software as a means of [6] Law 14.058/03 - Article 3 - It is understood by software with a proprietary license one whose usage license implies license payment for the intellectual property of their creation, and offers manufacturer's warranty regarding its effectiveness and exact use.

[7] http://www.softwarelivre.gov.br/noticias/News_Item.2006-06-23.3734/

production and not only as a product, enabled the development of technologies that, in turn, drove the emergence of new economic enterprises, thus contributing to socioeconomic development of the state and the country. A clear example is the software developed by the Paraná called Expresso, which functions as an agenda, calendar, email, whose community; Expresso Livre is constantly improving the program. With over half a million users spread across 167 institutions, Expresso Livre shows that developing technological solutions of high quality and in a collaborative way in Brazil is possible.

As it is, this agreement with Microsoft may mean a setback in digital inclusion and independence, including those regarding the economic factor, given that the offered software has its gratuity restricted to two years. In addition, Microsoft's software is not multiplatform, which renders the use of concurrent programs impossible.

In the public sector, the adoption of free software seems imperative. Not only aimed at saving resources, but also because the government stimulus leads to the emergence and strengthening of communities of IT and software alternatives that benefit society as a whole.

7. Conclusion

Since the beginning of its development, software has always been associated with cooperation and with sharing being generally developed in academic environments and in enterprise collaboration. Software was not seen as something separated from hardware and its source code used to be provided so that potential failures could be corrected and further improvements could be made. Software was free at least for those who had access to the technology available at the time.

The concept of free software as we know today emerged during the 1980s as an alternative to the trend that grew stronger to block the user's ability to access the source code in order to prevent its study and modification. Software industry was changing; the constraints were increasingly more common. Richard Stallman, then a member of MIT, attempted to gain access to a Xerox printer so he could fix a code error, but access was denied. From this experience, Stallman devised the free software movement, starting the GNU Project and subsequently creating the Free Software Foundation.

Since then, the free software community have been growing, its programs become increasingly known and used by the average user, allowing anyone access to free software. However, this expansion is still somewhat shy especially in regard to its freedom and cooperation philosophy. There are misconceptions, vague ideas, and a large lack of knowledge that hinders the understanding of its advantages.

The free software concept was developed in certain a way that, as it primarily considers the set of freedoms that are guaranteed in their licenses, makes it a legal concept. The licences that generally govern non-free software, as well as the laws about copyright that govern software rights, impose the conditions under which they can be used, distributed and modified, and always in a very restraining manner. Users have no right to exercise freedom of use over acquired software unless explicitly authorized by the license holder.

Our society is used to prohibition, not permission. Free software licenses act in a permissive way, guaranteeing freedom of use, distribution and modification.

Software has an amazing ability to adapt, and may be reproduced in different contexts and easily adapted to perform numerous tasks. Current legislation prohibits exploring this capability, which can obstruct economic development of poorer nations. These limitations make them extremely rigid and immutable, even if the user has the technical expertise to adapt it according to their interests or those of their community. Interestingly, adherence to free software also provides technological independence from suppliers.

It is argued that a capitalist society cannot be based on products that do not comprise property concepts, but when dealing with income generation and profit from free software, many examples have shown that it is possible to combine them to various forms of economic exploitation. In addition, the experience with free mode of production and software distribution has been overcoming the technological field, being noticed in various intellectual fields. Internet has had a major role in enabling this expansion, increasing the transmission of knowledge and culture.

As another interesting example of free software applicability, we can point out Brazilian government's successful experience, whose encouragement of free software has generated tremendous savings in public spending with proprietary licenses and development of the local IT industry.

From this initiative the Public Software arose. It was considered a manifestation of public interest for a particular solution for sharing software developed by the government. In order to protect it, the Trademark Public License was developed based on the GPL License and the Creative Commons License. It ensures the mark's original structure and recognizes its authorship, so the author can waive its exclusivity on the program. To assist Public Software implementation, the Brazilian government has developed a guideline to free software migration.

Despite all these efforts for its introduction in government sectors and expansion in society, large corporations' particular interests and political disagreements act as a barrier to free software establishment. The change of political groups in power reflects often in a change in government policy, in order to benefit different interests that often do not coincide with those of the population.

The State of Paraná was in the forefront of sustainable technology in Brazil by the enactment of two state laws that give preference to the use of free technologies, or at least that operate in multiplatform environment.

However, changes in the state's political power led to the signing of a memorandum of understanding with Microsoft, which marks not only a setback for the free software community, but also for Brazilian society which is back to its technological dependence from a single vendor prison. Microsoft's choice to offer this technology for free (for a period of two years) for essential areas of development to the country as education, innovation and professional qualification can be seen as a strategy to investigate this dependence.

The Ontological Nature of Value on Miguel Reale's Tridimensional Theory of Law

Alan Mariano Bezerra de Carvalho[1]

Abstract: Miguel Reale is mostly known in Brazil and overseas for his Tridimensional Theory of Law. One of the most intriguing contributions Miguel Reale has made to the Philosophy of Law is his work on the fields of Epistemology, Ontology, Gnosiology and Axiology. He proposes a distinct approach to the problem of knowledge, which he deems "ontognosiology", that can be summed up as the necessary complementary dialetic implication between subject and object. This "complementarity dialetics" permeates his work on Ontology, Gnosiology and Axiology, and should be considered when dealing with his thoughts on Value as an object of knowledge, especially on its distinctive "relative objectivity". This article will seek to present this "relative objectivity" of Value on a comprehensive manner considering the author's larger work and unravel some of its consequences on the knowledge of Law as a subject, for both academic research and professional practice. The article will also try to convey the role of this peculiar object on the tridimensional structure of facts, values and norms that compose his Tridimensional Theory of Law, a structure that claims for the interdisciplinary vision on legal phenomena.

Keywords: ontology, value, tridimensional theory of law.

Introduction

Reale's axiology, or theory of value, was the turning point for the creation of his theory of law, widely known in Brazil as Tridimensional Theory of Law. It is so called for, as Reale says in his work, Law should always be regarded as having three distinct and interwoven dimensions: Fact, Value and Norm.

Reale recognizes that this distinction is not by any means originally his, and in his book "Teoria Tridimensional do Direito"[2], strives to look historically and contemporarily around the world on how other thinkers developed this distinction, also looking on its development in terms of approaching a "concrete experience" of Law.

In this search, Reale goes from some of the authors that predated and heavily influenced his work, such as Giorgio Del Vecchio, Santi Romano, Maurice Hauriou, Emil Lask, Gustav Radbruch, and Roscoe Pound[3], to his contemporaries such as Luís Recaséns Siches, Luigi Bagolini, Hans Welzel and Wilhelm Sauer.

His Tridimensional Theory differs from the authors that predated him in that it not only sees the distinct dimensions of Fact, Value and Norm as methodological guidelines for the scientific study of law, prompting independent Sociological, Axiological and Normative studies.

His "concrete tridimensionalism" goes further to say that these three dimensions should be considered on the problematic level of experience, an idea he develops through the study of Edmund Husserl's phenomenology and of the role of structure on the sociological studies of Talcott Parsons and Robert Merton, and the works of Eugen Ehrlich and his "living law"[4].

Reale sustains that Fact, Value and Norm are interwoven on the level of experience by an implication-polarity complementary dialectic between Facts and Values. This dialectic gives rise to the creation of Norms posited by power to try to stabilize the polarity between "is" and "ought".

This particular form of dialectic can be considered an "open dialectic", as the Norm posited will never really overcome the conflict between "is" and "ought", but will become part of a new Fact-Value polarity. The Norm will, as long as it can, stabilize this polarity, until the Fact-Value tension calls for a new Norm.

In this way, Facts, Values and Norms are an example of culture in motion throughout history, being part of this value driven spiral as human beings seek to continuously realize their potentials, searching for the limit of what they are and they ought to be.

1. Ontognosiology.

Reale names his approach to the theory of knowledge "ontognosiology". This big and maybe clumsy word, made by the fusion of the known philosophical terms ontology and gnosiology, serves, in Reale's works, to sum the fundaments of a particular conception of how knowledge is processed.

The subject and the object of knowledge are in correlation, a point that Reale takes from and shares with Nicolai Hartmann[5]. Reale differs from Hartmann, however, when he sustains the dialectic nature of knowledge, an implication-polarity complementary dialectic between the subject and the object of knowledge.

The subject does not passively receive an impression that reveals itself in him as an object, and something does not transfer itself to the subjective plan, reduzing itself to its subjective structures. When an object is known, there is something of its structure that conditions how it can be known and, just as well, the conditions of the subject interfere on how said object will be known.

Object and subject call for and interfere with each other on the process of knowledge, deeply interwoven but still distinct. Reale sustains that this dialectic nature, this mutual interference, on which the elements of the dialectic process are never consumed or reduced to one another, must be considered on the study of any subject, calling for a transition from an abstract methodology to a concrete methodology.

When considering Law as a subject of knowledge, this concrete methodology must consider Law's three dimensions, Fact, Value and Norm, and allow for a kind of approach that could be summed on Reale's maxim "to distinguish without separating".

When studying the factual dimension, a role generally assigned to the subject of the Sociology of Law, the axiological and the normative dimensions cannot be overlooked. They will not be the focus of the sociological study, but Law can never be treated as being pure Fact, on pain of showing a distorted view of the concrete phenomena.

The same applies for both the dimensions of Value and Norm. While the tridimensional approach from a methodological point of view is not new, as Reale himself built on this pre-established theoretical base, his "concrete" approach, taking the question of experience as means to escape a purely abstract approach to knowledge, can be considered to go a step further.

And so, the theory of knowledge would be composed of the study of the positive conditions of knowledge, the well known category of Logic, and also of the transcendental conditions of knowledge, the category of ontognosiology.

2.Value as an object of knowledge.

Reale regards the change on his view of Value as the turning point of his theory of law[6].

Reviewing Franz Brentano's theory of objects, based on a realist comprehension of Kant's distinction between "is" (Sein) and "ought" (Sollen), Reale considered that the "ought" should necessarily be converted, at a moment in history, in something that could be updated or realized, or else it would just be ethereal.

With this view, he came to understand Value as being not an ideal category of "is", but consisting on a pure category of "ought". While you cannot pass from the "is" to the "ought", the contrary is not entirely true.

As Reale sustained previously, if Value did not manifest itself, or realized itself in history, it would persist being a purely ideal and ethereal concept. It is then that Reale points out to a new category of object, the cultural objects.

3. Value and cultural objects.

On his review of Brentano's theory of objects, Reale adds the category of cultural objects. This category, in Reale's words, consists of the objects that "are as they should be"[7].

Cultural objects are an integration of an object of "is" and Values of the "ought". Values reveal themselves to knowledge by being manifested throughout an object used as a support for its meaning.

The main example Reale uses for a cultural object is that of a sculpture. Using stone as a support, the sculptor seeks to convey a meaning of Beauty. Ink on paper, language, can also have the same role as a support, as the reading of a literary work, or the listening of an inspired speech can attest.

As such, Value has a relative objectivity. It can never be fully understood in the same way as other objects of knowledge, but it can be understood throughout them, as they are used as supports of meaning.

Reale gives a few pointers of particular characteristics of Value as a category of "ought"[8].

Values are always bipolar. While a possible characteristic on ideal objects, it is an essential characteristic of values. To Justice there is Injustice, to Good there is Evil, and so on. This polarity of positive and negative Values is what drives the dialectics of culture throughout history.

A second characteristic of Values is that they reciprocally implicate each other. This means that the realization of a Value always interferes, positively or negatively, on the realization of other Values. They have, as such, an expansive nature and a pretension to universality, which inevitably brings to situations of tension.

As a third characteristic, Reale says that values have a need of orientation, which he calls referability. Values always transcend the Facts, as they can never be reduced to them, but they refer to the Facts as a means for their realization.

When faced with a Fact, the human spirit is provoked to take a stance, to act in face of it. For this action, Values are understood with an orientation, a direction, being, as such, vectorial entities. They are, as such, determinant for human conduct, an End being a Value rationally recognized as a motive of conduct[9].

And that brings us to the fourth characteristic of Value, preferability. These distinct vectors of action can be chosen by the acting party, and one does not automatically reveals itself as the one true path.

Our actual experience, however, points that some of this choice can be preconditioned, and the fifth characteristic pointed by Reale is the possibility of hierarchical graduation of Values. A society can establish a table of preference of Values, even if they cannot be measured.

At last, Reale points out to the three last characteristics of Value, objectivity, historicity and inexauribility. These characteristics point out that Values have objectivity in cultural objects, that they are revealed and updated throughout history and that they can never be truly, fully realized on the plane of "is".

4. Conclusion

The recognition of Values as having a relative objectivity manifested on cultural objects, and the reference for the need of a concrete methodology, bring forth a few challenges on tackling Law with interdisciplinary research.

A concrete methodology must take into account the nature of its object of study, and when several distinct sciences intend to face different dimensions of a same object there is a need for a unifying element on the Sociological, Axiological and Normative approaches.

Interdisciplinary research must be able to cope with the constant interaction of Facts, Values and Norms and, for those inclined to face the challenge, of the peculiar nature of the axiological content that exists in Law.

The missing link between property law and labour law

Martin Dumas

Abstract: A refined understanding of the theoretical repercussions entailed by the addition of a societal value to consumer goods is essential in examining the role of market transparency in the development of consumocratic law. Considering that the foundations of the liberal order is the subject of differing positions depending on one's socioeconomic viewpoints, a fair understanding of the consolidation of this power requires that we revisit pre-consumocratic conceptions of commodity valorisation. In contrast with the work of prominent analysts who regarded the act of purchase as a process mainly guided by individuality, non-responsibility, or fallacious wants – in turn by 'alienated' (Marx), 'hypnotised' (Baudrillard) or 'manipulated' (Galbraith) consumers – it is examined that the societal value of consumer goods may embody social meanings, social responsibilities, as well as calls for moderation in the mouvance of ethical buying, corporate social responsibility, and sustainable development.

Keywords: Consumocracy, product evaluation.

1. Introduction

Popular initiatives, behaviour and techniques now commonly referred to as 'fair trade', 'ethical purchasing', and 'societal labelling' remind us that consumers are increasingly exposed to a wider range of information pertaining not so much to market goods themselves as to conditions linked to their production or usage. Such other-regarding attributes of market goods, when revealed, empower them in ways that predictably enrich their ability to be citizens (Scammel 2000; Canclini 2001; Kysar 2005). Consumers are indeed called upon to acknowledge some part of responsibility in the persistence of a number of irritants which the sole intervention of the state, in the operation of markets, cannot seem to combat satisfactorily (Stiglitz 2005).

More precisely, informational barriers between the loci of production and consumption are being gradually removed, providing consumers with the choice of combining, in their purchasing decisions, both the final attributes of goods (e.g., their price or manufacturing quality) with their peripheral attributes (e.g., the social, environmental or ethical conditions under which they are produced). By the means of societal marketing[1], the spheres of production and consumption may connect through a third, informational sphere – a societal window, as it were. This bridging device may turn a potentially oppressive state of affairs into an object of regulation by consumers who pay attention to societal information. It makes it possible to appreciate the value of commodities from a wider perspective and to redefine one's perception of what is a desirable product or service. In other words, the societal window serves a potentially emancipatory function, in so far as widespread socio-environmental conditions of production are deemed unacceptable by significant segments of the population. I call 'consumocracy'[2] this system by which consumers can exert authority on corporations through the broadening of what qualifies as a desirable consumer good.[3] Consum-

[1] One may define societal marketing as the marketing of goods or services whereby societal information is signaled to consumers through various means. Societal information in turn pertains to certain conditions or effects observed or to be observed at the stage of production, distribution, or usage of goods, in accordance with the terms of a corporate code (Kotler and Levy 1969: 10). For an earlier vision of this marketing form, see Crane and Desmond (2002).

[2] From consummare (Lat.), to consume, and kratos (Gr.), authority. See Midgley (1996) for an account of the early departure of the consumocratic movement, in England; and Cashore (2002) for an analysis of how such 'non-state, market-driven governance systems' are gaining rule-making authority.

[3] No comparative study appears to have been conducted recently on the relative dependence of firms on the preservation of market shares likely to be boosted or curtailed by consumocrats. But it has been suggested in 1979 that a minimum relative market share is needed for the long term sustainability of a business and that such 'critical share is (often) of the order of ¼ of the leader's share' (Abell and Hammond 1979). It is implied for instance that a corporation should keep a minimal share of approximately 4 % when the leading corporation controls 16% of a given market. In the United Kingdom, Asda (Wal-Mart's former supermarket chain) is still doing well economically, with 17.5% of the market share (in 2009) while the leader in that region, Tesco, has a 30.4% share of the grocery market (Longbottom 2009). By comparison, Wal-Mart stores in Germany captured only 2% of the grocery market following their entry on the territory in 1997 and remained a marginal player there, far behind Aldi, the leading competitor with a 19 per cent share. Wal-Mart pulled out of Germany in 2006 with a financial loss of about one billion dollars (Newsweek 2005). It is therefore suggested that, under certain conditions, ers who pay attention to societal information will thus be referred to as 'consumocrats'.

In a non-consumocratic setting, concerns which do not traditionally belong to the sphere of consumer influence are usually seen as sensitive issues to be (pre-eminently) examined by states (Bator 1958). They are traditionally estranged from the foundational values of commodity markets. In a consumocratic setting, protection and equity concerns may reach individuals through the transparent diffusion of societal information. The type of commodity value which is emphasised in the process is the societal value of the commodity.

Understanding the theoretical repercussions entailed in the addition of a societal value to consumer goods or services is essential in examining the role of market transparency in consumocratic developments. One must recall in this regard that the foundations of the liberal order is the subject of distinct views depending on whether one is a partisan of Marxism, neo-liberal economism, Keynesianism, or post-modernism and, accordingly, that a fair understanding of consumocratic developments require that we reconsider earlier conceptions of commodity valorisation.

This article is intended to elucidate these reconfigurations by contrasting the societal value with the use, exchange, sign, and fallacious value of the commodity – a result generally alien to the thought of classical and contemporary theoreticians. No veritable theory of consumption is said to exist and, given the tentacular nature of the subject, it is affirmed that no such theory could ever be developed (Miller 1987: 175). Although a growing 'puzzle' (Campbell 1989), modern consumerism may be examined through the prism of product valuation – i.e., by paying special attention to the use, exchange, sign, or fallacious value assigned to products, the societal type of which has not yet been integrated in the literature. This article is therefore intended to start filling this lacuna by critically contrasting the representation of societal value with earlier, influential critiques of commodity value, developed prominently by Marx, Baudrillard, and Galbraith. It will thus reveal the social meanings (2.), the social responsibilities (3.), and the likely calls for moderation (4.) embodied in the societal value of consumer goods, where these theoreticians saw a process guided by individuality, non-responsibility, or fallacious wants created by the marketing industry. It is a prerequisite for a better understanding of the development of consumocratic law on the margins of state law (Dumas 2013).

2. Beyond use and exchange values: rediscovering social meanings

The theory developed by Karl Marx identifies the isolation of the spheres of production and consumption as a necessary condition for the exploitation of labour by capital. The alienation of labour first rests on the estrangement of labour on modern production sites in that salaried workers work independently from each other, following the 'objectification of labour'. Salaried workers neither see consumer goods in their final form, nor do they consume them directly; they are here estranged from the fruits of their labour. This alienation would reveal itself in the corresponding estrangement of a worker's product, i.e. in the 'loss of the object' to which the worker would otherwise relate more authentically. According to Marx, this process does not take place at the individual level only; it is immediately extended to the wider social sphere within which the alienated worker relates to other people:

> 'An immediate consequence of man's estrangement from the product of his labour, his life activity, his species-being, is the estrangement of man from man. When man confronts himself, he also confronts other men. What is true of man's relationship to his labour, to the product of his labour and to himself, is also true of his relationship to other men, and to the labour and the object of the labour of other men.' (Marx 1975: 330).

The relationship of a salaried worker to commodities or consumer goods is further translated in the division of the product of labour into a 'useful thing' and a 'thing possessing value'. Marx was particularly concerned with the transformation of useful things (bestowed with use value) into such things possessing value (bearing exchange value). Whereas the use value of the useful thing derives principally from the satisfaction of human needs, the exchange value of the thing possessing value signals a thing which 'transcends sensuousness' and which may therefore possess mysterious attributes. For Marx, as soon as a useful thing emerges as a commodity ready for exchange and turns into a thing possessing value, it lends itself to an undesirable fetishisation:

> 'The mystical character of the commodity does not arise from its use-value (…) [The] fetishism of the world of commodities arises from the peculiar social character of the labour which produces them. Objects of utility become commodities only because they are the products of labour of private individuals who work independently of each other.' (Marx 1976: 163, 165).

As a result of the rupture between the spheres of production and consumption, consumers are made unaware of the nature of the social relations governing the production of commodities and are invited to evaluate these commodities on largely uncertain grounds. The mysterious character of the commodity would arise from its exchange-value, as opposed to its sensuousness as an article of utility: '[Exchange][v] alue, therefore, does not have its description branded on its forehead; it rather transforms every product of labour into a social hieroglyphic.' (Marx 1976: 167).

To better appreciate the societal value of the commodity, it is useful to effectuate a rapprochement with the Marxist conceptions of use value and exchange value.

Marxist and several classical economists struggled in vain in their attempt to assess the use-value of a product. In spite of its relatively low (high) exchange-value, the use value of bread (gold) must be high (low), the old theory goes, if one is to consider that by its properties it satisfies human needs. The central problem they were facing derived from the fact that defining human needs strictly and distinguishing between degrees of authentic use value proved too deterministic a process. Human needs and wants not only appear to be diverse, but they also seem to defy simplistic attempts to theoretical prioritisation. One may recall Veblen's pertinent observations in this regard:

> 'No class of society, not even the most abjectly poor, forgoes all customary conspicuous consumption. The last items of this category of consumption are not given up except under stress of the direst necessity. Very much of squalor and discomfort will be endured before the last trinket or the last pretence of pecuniary decency is put away. There is no class and no country that has yielded so abjectly before the pressure of physical want as to deny themselves all gratification of this higher or spiritual need.' (Veblen 1957: 85)

gist, who first endeavoured to establish a hierarchy of 'human needs' (1943). Although by no means authoritative in the way it offers to structure the process leading to the satisfaction of human needs,[4] the pyramid of Maslow is a notable reminder of their patent heterogeneity.[5] A better understanding of the complexity of such needs eventually led economists to abandon their search for an all-embracing theory of use value to the benefit of a more flexible theory of exchange value.

The fact remains, however, that we normally do not value things or activities deemed useless, and that the use-value problem is primarily one of measure. Paying more attention to the types of human needs likely to be satisfied through market mechanisms may actually become a necessary step in improving instruments of global governance. A closer examination of the types of needs and motivations potentially satisfied through market relations reveals some important imperfections in popular theories of consumer behaviour. One of these imperfections relate to the neglected role of markets in their capacity to help fulfill so-called higher needs – such as 'self-actualisation needs' – understood in a non-narcissistic sense. This is particularly relevant in the examination of expanding consumer-sanctioned schemes or 'fair trade' initiatives which are essentially predicated on a consideration for others.[6]

The Marxist conception of use value is explicitly linked to the notion that a useful thing possesses some degree of 'sensuousness', the general property by which it can satisfy 'human needs'. With his con-

[4] See Herskovits (1960: 462) [observing that 'higher needs' may displace 'lower needs' (i.e., physiological ones) and that 'families of a man aspiring to great prestige may go hungry', as cited by Campbell (2000: 69)].

[5] Maslow suggested that there are five major groups of human needs, which he placed in a hierarchy ranging from physiological needs, to safety or security, to a sense of belonging (i.e., the desire to be accepted and appreciated by others), to ego-status needs (which motivate a person to contribute to the efforts of a group in return for numerous forms of reward), to self-actualisation needs (which motivate a person to enrich his or her life in order to experience a sense of achievement through doing). According to Maslow, some minimal degree of satisfaction is required before a lower need ceases to preoccupy an individual to the exclusion of higher needs. Once that point is reached, the individual may then be motivated by higher needs, in ascending order (Maslow 1943: 370).

[6] Such considerations in economic theory have been the object of models describing the behaviour of philanthropic corporations and family members in particular. The same literature suggests that the altruistic reflex would not be as widespread in the consumer market as it is within families because it would not efficiently produce the 'psychological income' sought by the altruist (Becker 1981). Freeman (1994) exceptionally offered an economic model for the endogeneisation of altruistic consumers' motives.

temporaries, Marx did not contemplate the satisfaction of non-physiological, diverse needs and motivations, while theorising on the use value of commodities. It is not by its sensuousness, however defined, that a 'fair trade' product may genuinely satisfy consumers' 'higher needs'; in spite of its potential instrumentality, the societal value of the commodity therefore falls outside the meaning of the use value as defined by Marx. The societal value, as I will explore in more depth, is the expression of a transformative appeal more than a strict or broad appreciation of usage.

As regards the Marxist conception of exchange value, one must first note that it differs from its Marshallian variation in at least one important respect.[7] It is also in that respect that Marx's original notion proves pertinent in the uncovering of the societal value of commodities. Unlike neoclassical attempts to assess the value of a commodity, Marxist ones are mainly based on the idea that, if one had perfect knowledge of the relations and activities which govern the production of commodities, one would then be in a position to provide an accurate, materially informed elucidation of the valuation process:

> 'The determination of the magnitude of value by labour-time is therefore a secret hidden under the apparent movements in the relative values of commodities. Its discovery destroys the semblance of the merely accidental determination of the magnitude of the value of the products of labour, but by no means abolishes that determination's material form.' (Marx: 1976: 69-70)

It is precisely because consumers are not aware of the true status of these workplace relations that commodities ready for exchange would be endowed with the imaginary and mysterious attributes reflected in their pricing. This determinism has proved false in so far as what consumers are prepared to pay in exchange for products and services delivered painlessly or with great effort may simply run counter to Marxist assumptions. Marx's intuitions are none the less worthy of interest in two significant ways.

[7] While stressing the significant role of some environmental and conjectural factors in the determination of the (demand-side) exchange-value of commodities, Alfred Marshall, founder of neo-classical economics, clearly separates this evaluation process from the workplace social relations that characterise any sphere of production. The key notion retained by Marshall in this regard is the fairly subjective amount of 'satisfaction' derived from an eventual purchase, in comparison to that derived from the status quo: 'We may now turn to consider how far the price which is actually paid for a thing represents the benefit that arises from its possession. This is a wide subject on which economic science has very little to say (…) the price which a person pays for a thing can never exceed, and seldom comes up to that which he would be willing to pay rather than go without it: so that the satisfaction which he gets from its purchase generally exceeds that which he gives up in paying away its price' (Marshall 1997: 124).

First, the idea that the rupture between production and consumption may turn into a source of oppression is not devoid of sense. Let us consider the situation of fundamental labour rights. By the standards of the International Labour Organization, there are certain things that one should not do to people in their place of work. In this sense, workers are the holders of fundamental rights. We count among these rights the right to physical integrity, and the rights to freedom of mobility and expression. In the labour context, they consist of the right of children to a task and a work environment that do not pose serious risks to their integrity; the right of under-age children not to perform work; the right not to be subject to forced labour; the right not to be subject to discrimination; and the right to associate with the goal of agreeing upon suitable working conditions.[8] These rights attach to individuals in their workplace. In no way do they commingle with the rights in those things manufactured by a person at work. Besides, the conditions under which a thing is produced do not legally qualify the traditional status of that same thing. It follows that 'real rights' attach to the thing (from a civilist perspective, more particularly), but are alien to the conditions under which the item was made. Under both the common and civil law regimes, the sale (which implicates the private law of contract) of a stolen carpet (property law pertaining to the private right in goods) might be stained with illegality,[9] whereas the sale of a carpet manufactured

[8] These are, more precisely, the rights envisioned in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (87), the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (98), the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (29), the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (105), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (100), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (111), the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (138), and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (182), which are brought out by the ILO Declaration on the fundamental principles and rights at work (1998).

[9] This relates to a rule that is firmly rooted in both legal traditions: in the common law, one may refer, for example, to the decisions rendered in Lipkin Gorman v. Karpnale Ltd. [1991] 2 AC 548; R. c. Ilich (1987) 69 ALR 231, 244; Merry v. Green (1841) 7 M and W 623; Rex v. Hutton (1911) 19 WLR 907 (the simple theft of water might be – or have been – an exception); or, in the civil law, to the French Code Civil (articles 1599 under illegal working conditions would not normally be stained with such illegality, whether or not the buyer is aware of the manufacturing conditions. Within this institutionalised rupture between the spheres of production and consumption, goods produced under conditions that violate the workers' fundamental rights can therefore be offered and sold legally on the markets.

Second, the proposition that this rupture is also responsible for consumers' illusory views about the value of commodities is interestingly progressive. At this level of generality, it lies at the centre of any contemporary consumocratic initiative. Consumers who are in the impossibility of knowing the conditions under which goods are produced may in effect be valuing things in a non realistic way, depending on how one defines such things to be valued. It is in the details that differences become apparent between the rationales underlying a 'fair trade' initiative, for instance, and Marx's conjectures on the separation of production and consumption. From a Marxist perspective, this separation is radical and its effects on the 'mysterious' exchange value of commodities are irreversible. The social relations that characterise the labour process being determined materially and in isolation, their true nature is inevitably unknown to consumers. Moreover, the conception of 'estranged labour' resulting from the rupture between labour and the fruits of labour presupposes the impermeability of the production and consumption spheres to any post-production linkage. Hence the impossibility of a 'reconciliation' of labour and the fruits of labour within capitalist societies, and the abolition of private property as a desirable solution. From a consumocratic perspective, informational barriers between the loci of production and consumption are partially removed, thereby providing consumers with the choice of combining, in their purchasing decisions, traditional and peripheral attributes of goods. Efficient societal marketing, this societal window through which the spheres of production and consumption may connect, may thus help improve the management of forests (e.g., via the FSC code) or augment the number of schools of quality (e.g., via the Rugmark / GoodWeave code). Less predictable societal marketing objectives include the reduction of extreme remuneration disparities, the direction of corporate political financing, the downsizing of the military industry, the passage from unqualified material growth to 'sustainable' or 'viable' production within liberal society, and other concerns which do not traditionally belong to the sphere of consumer influence.[10]

The extent to which the societal value of the commodity is taken into account in the appraisal of its exchange value then becomes a matter of fact, a process made plausible.[11] In the absence of consumocratic devices and of such reconsiderations, the exploration of new areas of regulation within the modern order's economic socket would remain, at best, a utopian project. In this sense, the theorisation of the physical isolation of labour and consumption as a source of alienation is non-consumocratic or, more deterministically, pre-consumocratic.

3. Beyond sign values: rediscovering social responsibilities

One of the most influential critiques of consumerist capitalism comes from Baudrillard. From a puzzling although less naïve notion of human wants (i.e., 'interchangeable myths'), Baudrillard advances that commodities are social signs and that modern consumption is more properly understood as the consumption of signs hierarchically placed according to a logic of social differentiation – supplanting other systems of birth, class, caste, and positions.[12] The resulting system of objects/signs provides a code to such signs and thereby constitutes a new language; with the spread of consumerist capitalism, it is becoming a universal code of recognition, deprived of any mutual obligation.

[10] With similar views in sight, relatively complex regulatory instruments, such as the Filos Mundi code, are incidentally being developed (see for instance: http://site.filosmundi.org – accessed on 10 July 2012).

[11] Financial constraints undeniably act as a deterrent if consumers must pay a substantial premium in the aim of supporting those corporations engaged in integrating pre-targeted rights into their practices. Since the ratio of a product's price to the total income of a consumer is likely to favour the elasticity of demand as this ratio increases, societal marketing is clearly doomed to failure if consumocratic premiums are out of the consumers' reach.

[12] Baudrillard's semiotically organised system of consumer goods may allude to earlier periods, as suggested in a mockery of Marx's representation of the commodity value in the secluded world of Robinson Crusoe, a favorite reference with classical economists. Marx once wrote: 'All relations between Robinson and the objects that form this wealth of his own creation are here so simple and clear as to be intelligible without exertion… And yet those relations contain all that is essential to the determination of value.' (Marx 1976: 170), to which Baudrillard replied: 'the Crusoe myth describes, in "transparent" isolation (where the anterior mode of agriculture and craftsmanship reappears, and the laws of the market and exchange disappear), the ideality of bourgeois relations: individual autonomy, to each according to their labour and their needs; moral consciousness bound to nature – and, if possible, some Man Friday, some aboriginal servant (but if

In so far as individuals, in this language, may be described in terms of their possessions, the new functional code is 'symbolically and structurally impoverished'. The universal character of the code would not only suffer from drastic simplification, but also emerge as a 'regression in the language of values' (Baudrillard 1988b: 21). Examples of this impoverishment include the 'sign-wars' of art auctions: 'art-lovers' would often not offer money for the intrinsic value of the work of art, but overtly wager it with a view to outbidding more than exchanging. Moreover, kitsch 'pseudo-objects' are seen by Baudrillard as trashy imitations more tied to social mobility constraints than consumers' bad tastes: they are signs in a code of social distinction, a hierarchy separating the abundance of kitsch from the non-abundance of 'high-class goods'. More subtly, and as hinted by Veblen, inconspicuous consumption is the new sign response of the wealthy as lower classes may now enjoy consuming conspicuously.

If commodities are social signs, they also 'lose their reality' in their pre-arrangement to become 'hyper-real' or 'simulacra' (images of something), insists Baudrillard. Marketing specialists have long understood this phenomenon: 'Any buying process is an interaction between the personality of the individual and the so-called "personality" of the product itself.' (Baudrillard 1988b: 14). The 'loss of the real' here is reflected in the general 'triumph of art over reality' and, more demonstrably, in a shift from advertisements which contain product information to those which incorporate loser, 'lifestyle imagery' (Featherstone 1991: 83). It is in this sense that marketing messages may neither be true nor false; as simulacra, they generate their own 'reality'. Marketing is 'the art of making something true by saying that it is true' (l'art de rendre les choses vraies en affirmant qu'elles le sont).

It follows among other things that marketing messages are often not 'falsifiable' in the Popperian sense. When a message pertains to a simulacrum (e.g., any variation of 'lifestyle imagery'), it indeed excludes itself from the domain of empirical verification. This may reinforce the Crusoe's relations to his labor and his wealth are so "clear", as Marx insists, what on earth has Friday got to do with this set-up?). In fact, nothing is clear about this fable… the whole system and its "mystery" were already there with Robinson on his island, and in the fabricated immediacy of his relation to things.' (Baudrillard 1988a: 75).

code described by Baudrillard, for '[o]bjects are categories of objects which quite tyrannically induce categories of persons'. Simulacra thus reflect the categories of an authoritarian code potentially reinforced by its own magical character. And everyone would be involved in the perpetuation of the code:

> '[N]o one escapes it: our individual flights do not negate the fact that each day we participate in its collective elaboration. Not believing in the code requires at least that we believe that others sufficiently believe in it so that we can enter the game, even if only ironically. Even actions that resist the code are carried out in relation to a society that conforms to it.' (Baudrillard 1988b: 20).

Only one type of exchange would escape the impoverishing, non-responsible, system of sign values: it is the symbolic exchange, the platform from which Baudrillard launches his critique of consumerist capitalism. A symbolic exchange involves a social obligation between individuals, as exemplified in the exchange of (non-substitutable) wedding rings; a reciprocated, ambivalent act charged with unique significations. 'Gifts' (objects, but also rituals, courtesies, and dances) in the earlier societies described by anthropologist Mauss (1968) enter into symbolic exchange as well for the reason that their recipients were under social obligation to 'repay' them. The modern regression in the language of values would then result from the loss of symbolic values in liberal democracies (Baudrillard 1970: 309).

If, according to Baudrillard, the development of exchanges could be traced from a symbolic ensemble of social obligations to untrascendental emissions and receptions of substitutable signs, it must be assumed that contemporary market exchanges do not effectively lend themselves to the expression of 'social obligations'. This is a valid assumption if, in turn, one is to retain a strict interpersonal conception of these obligations – involving reciprocated responsibilities between one giver and one receiver. For the expression of social responsibility on commodity markets may well occur between consumers and producers who do not interact directly with each other. Through the transmission of societal information to consumers, producers are in principle committed to exercising a certain social responsibility, and consumers who respond positively to that information equally exercise a social responsibility by encouraging such behaviour. This interaction, albeit desensualised, is made possible by the means of societal marketing; and what it elicits is precisely the societal value of the commodity. It is ultimately appropriated by the individual consumocrat who, in a conscious or more instrumental way, is furthering collective interests.[13]

In general terms, the societal value of the commodity is typically revealed through an act of non-indifference towards distant people or things – an act of responsibility, more or less consciously and instrumentally carried out. Its basic ingredients, in the form of societal information, may or may not be mixed with the simulacra and imageries of modern marketing. Unlike the sign value described by Baudrillard, though, the societal value is less hardly shielded from the results of investigations designed to authenticate its claims. The degree of transparency retained in communicating societal information to consumers may thus lie at the centre of a more highly receptive social interface. This requires some precisions.

First, the societal value of the commodity partly differentiates itself from the sign value in that its ingredients are still presented under a falsifiable format. Unlike the sign value, which arises from the social pre-arrangement of objects within hierarchies of objects, the societal value of commodities typically reveals itself in the appreciation of more concrete elements. In general, the promises of societal marketing may be validated and they often are. There is nothing very magical in verifying whether corporations are paying 'living wages' to their employees, using fishing nets of a certain size, treating waste water, employing adults while funding schools for their children, or else conducting themselves like 'socially responsible' organisations. Messages supporting the societal value of commodities may, as a result, prove sensitive in comparison to those which more freely entertain the code of sign values. It is no doubt another mission to try to falsify the code of sign values and confirm or infirm whether, for instance, buying a certain item helps 'make the most of now' or 'look right / feel right' – hence perhaps the determination of producers and advertisers to exclude societal information from false advertising regulation.[14] [13] See in this regard the developments surrounding Micheletti's oxymoronic though interesting notion of an 'individualized collective action' (2003).

[14] The Nike case provides a now famous illustration of this. When faced with charges of labor exploitation, the transnational company attempted to depict itself as a 'socially responsible employer' but nevertheless sought the protection of the First Amendment to isolate this very claim from the false advertising regulation applicable to commercial speech. It contended that commercial speech should not be considered as encompassing attributes other than 'the qualities of a product as such (like its price, availability,

Second, it is not implied that only societal information is falsifiable, but rather that it is perhaps more likely to shock consumers, when falsified and found to be deceptive. Evaluating the final or so-called 'tangible' attributes of products, such as their availability and suitability is unquestionably within the reach of empirical verification. But as stressed earlier, marketers tend to incorporate loser, lifestyle imagery into contemporary advertisements, to the detriment of information which contains more falsifiable elements – i.e., under a traditional format, to the detriment of the final attributes of products as such. It is also admitted that the mystification of sign values reflected in the passage from falsifiability ('Product A is more resistant to shocks than product B') to unfalsifiability ('Look right', 'It's the real thing') in advertising is not the preserve of product information management. Under a less traditional format, it could as well characterise the treatment of societal information. Nothing in effect prevents societal marketers from associating a 'smart car' – or other so-called environmentally friendly cars – with a 'right look'. It is not clear however whether this transition towards more sign values could equally characterise the treatment of product and societal information. One may question in this regard the equivalence of flaws detected in societal attributes (e.g., a 'cool' green car polluting as much as regular cars) and products as such (e.g., a 'cool' sports car accelerating like regular cars). And more particularly the likeness of their potential effects on two advertising campaigns using sign values. It is not clear indeed whether the code of sign values would prove equally impermeable to an eventual exposition of both types of flaws. One may hypothesise that flaws detected in the societal discourse could more effectively upset consumers. Given the societal nature of the code, flaws likely to disconcert and affect others (in the form of relative increases of pollution) may be more severely judged by consumocrats than flaws likely to affect product users mainly (by way of a relative decrease in car performance). All the more so since beguiling consumers' other-regarding attentions is likely to attract more extensive media coverage; under the social code of sign values, an uncovered defective societal value may indeed convey more long-term liabilities than a disappointing use-value.

and suitability)'. See Nike, Inc. v. Kasky, 45 P.3d 243 (Cal. 2002); 123 S. Ct 2554 (2003). (note after "car performance: "In the language of Baudrillard, there would be grounds for advancing that not-so-green cars could see their sign value deteriorate along with their faulty societal value in a manner inconsistent with the fate of not-so-fast cars sign value.")

Lastly, one should consider the possibility that the societal value of a commodity remain covered under an undisturbed code of sign values. A really smart car could end up being successfully and closely associated with a coded right look by the means of modern marketing. The resulting situation is interesting to say the least: it is more or less consciously that 'hypnotised consumers' (to borrow the phrase of Baudrillard) would contribute to improving pre-targeted socio-environmental conditions, without the intervention of states. Complex and real non-consumocratic 'market failures', in this context, would be successfully attended to by means of… simulacra.

4. Beyond fallacious values: 'Moderation tastes better'

As capitalism developed in parallel with minimally protective laws and arrangements, analysts such as Galbraith became more interested in the 'production of consumption'[15] than in the consumption of production. While Galbraith did not regard the salaried worker as an alienated person in a Marxist sense, it was his view that, as a consumer living in an affluent society, that person was being manipulated. He was particularly concerned with what he saw as the creation of new wants and valuations by influential institutions of 'advertisement and salesmanship'. He set up, following Marcuse (1964) in particular, a view of consumerist capitalism which has not lost all its appeal. This view is essentially based on a distinction between urgent, original wants, and fallacious ones:

> 'If the individual's wants are to be urgent, they must be original with himself. They cannot be urgent if they must be contrived for him. And above all, they must not be contrived by the process of production by which they are satisfied. For this means that the whole case for the urgency of production, based on the urgency of wants, falls to the ground. One cannot defend production as satisfying wants if that production creates the wants. (…) So it is that if production creates the wants it seeks to satisfy, or if the wants emerge pari passu with the production, then the urgency of the wants can no longer be used to defend the urgency of the production. Production only fills a void that it has itself created.' (Galbraith 1987: 127)

[15] The expression is borrowed from Lukács, as quoted by Campbell (2000: 48).

We have seen that Marx was alarmed by the shift from a logic of instrumentalism to a logic of exchange in his portrait of the relationship between labour and the fruits of labour. For Galbraith, it is the manufacturing of wants more than the manufacture of products which is a cause for alarm in affluent societies. That production may generate more wants and, sequentially, the need for more production, would initiate a 'Dependence Effect' to be ignored only to our peril. Whether this effect is partly responsible for the concomitant 'pathologising' of increasing forms of 'addictive consumption' – from drugs to shopping – (Reith 2004) remains unclear; whether both phenomena shed a critical light on the (pre-consumocratic) notion of 'consumer freedom' is certainly less so.

But with Marx, Galbraith fell into the trap of reductionism while establishing a rather strict correspondence between original wants with primary or physiological ones:

> 'The fact that wants can be synthesized by advertising, catalyzed by salesmanship, and shaped by the discreet manipulations of the persuaders shows that they are not very urgent. A man who is hungry need never be told of his need for food. If he is inspired by his appetite, he is immune to the influences of [institutions of advertisement]. The latter are effective only with those who are so far removed from physical want that they do not already know what they want. In this state alone, men are open to persuasion.' (Galbraith 1987: 131)

Original, non-fallacious valuations, therefore, would not only stem from 'independently determined desires' or 'independently established needs', but also from a qualitatively restrictive pool of such desires and needs. Outside the pool of primary wants, needs are manipulated according to Galbraith, for whom the notion of need is pre-specified and strictly related to one finite object or another. There seems to be no room in this view for needs expressing themselves within more complex interactions between people and objects, such as the wants to interact originally and play a role in a network of choice – which may certainly be satisfied through consumocratic devices. It is not very clear, on the one hand, whether such wants would have been regarded as 'socially desirable needs' by Galbraith and have legitimised further increases in the production of goods and services likely to satisfy them. It is no clearer whether he, on the other hand, would have considered any desire supposedly 'synthesised by advertising' to be fallacious. Ironical cases are manifold in the mouvance of 'voluntary simplicity': what of some increasingly popularised wants to live simply, to consume moderately, to recycle things, or to be known as someone who lives simply, consumes moderately, and recycles things?[16]

More certainly, Galbraith did not seem to have envisioned markets in which instruments of marketing would encourage consumers to prevent or mitigate some of the very excesses for which he held these instruments to be responsible. It is indeed an ironic reversal that one solution to the generation of consumer addictions under the liberal order finds itself potentially of the same mind. And the expansion and diversification of societal marketing instruments may in the end call for a more nuanced appraisal of the sort of dependence Galbraith meant to condemn. It would otherwise appear contradictory to depict the societal value of the commodity as a rival to its fallacious type, in so far as the societal value is emphasised by marketing instruments – the very source of the dependence effect feared by Galbraith.

Communicational Theory of Law and topology of juridical legitimacy

Henrique Mello[1]

This paper is a result of the presentation given by me in the XXVI IVR (Internationale Vereinigung für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie) World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy[2], which took place in the city of Belo Horizonte from July 21st to 26th, 2013.

Such presentation was surrounded by the debates occurred in the Special Workshop of Communicational Theory of Law, coordinated by professors Gregorio Robles and Paulo de Barros Carvalho, to whom I'm grateful for the honor of having participated in the discussions between Brazil and Spain at that opportunity from the Communicational Theory and the Logical-Semantic Constructivism points of view, which are of great value for the development of the General Theory of Law and Philosophy of Law worldwide.

This text bears almost the same title of the mentioned presentation. Nonetheless, I've added the adjective "Juridical" to the term "Legitimacy" in order to make my argumentative intentions more explicit, which will be herein substantiated and detailed in comparison with my time-limited speech at the World Congress. Throughout this work, the title chosen will be further explained.

The following words serve as a testimony of the applicability of the Communicational Theory. We will notice that an empirical verification in the tax law field finds an explanation and a solution based on the theory above mentioned, attesting its usefulness as Legal Science for the improvement of its object.

In order to better comprehend this work´s content and, as a consequence, provide better control on the findings by the interlocutor, it's interesting to restate some premises without which this reading would be impaired.

Some necessary categories will be extracted from the Logical-Semantic Constructivism, viewed from the exclusive legal positivism[3], fact not to be confused with methodological syncretism[4], as the Constructivism chats very closely with the Communicational Theory of Law, as friends who have very similar conceptions of life and, in diverging, complement each other.

As to the proposed theme, it's important to highlight that, in this paper, whenever we refer to Law, we mean positive law, a crucial methodological perspective to this essay that excludes any analysis related to the inclusive comprehension of law toward the moral norms or any other conduct norms that are not positivated by the legal system.

Discussing the theme based on the teaching of the Communicational Theory of Law presupposes conceiving the positive law as language. Language characterized for prescribing inter-human (inter-subjective) behavior.

"For a hermeneutics dedicated to the "ought to" perspective (a) and restricted to the positive law (b), the thing to do is examine if the validity or the interpretation of the legal norms can admit the inclusion of morality (or social values). The ones who accept this inclusion share the positivist view called inclusive legal positivism (dualism) and the ones who deny it are allies of the exclusive legal positivism, the monists."

[4] The law is subject to multiple theoretical approaches, each one based on a given perspective of knowledge; therefore, it's subject to epistemological pluralism (see Robles, Gregório. As regras do direito e as regras dos jogos. São Paulo: Noeses, 2011, p. 10), and methodological plurality. The methodological syncretism would be the misguided combination of distinct methods which diverge about theoretical models adopted for the comprehension of the object in question. We believe there's no methodological syncretism in the dialogue between the Logical-Semantic Constructivism and the Communicational Theory of Law, once both of them are based on the same fundamental categories for the understanding of the positive law. About methodological syncretism, refer to Torres, Heleno Taveira, op. cit., p. 44-47; Sainz de Bujanda, Fernando, Un arquetipo de derecho tributario – Hacienda y derecho. Madrid: Instituto de Estudios Políticos, 1975, vol. 2, p. 225.

Law is a cultural object[5] idiomatically built by human beings in the attempt to prescribe behaviors, and bring them closer to the values considered to be relevant by the context in which are encased.

Paulo de Barros Carvalho has had the opportunity to teach us that there's no law without language.[6] Being language is the essence of law. The prescriptive language — as previously mentioned — makes itself present in communicational settings, once there's no other form of modifying conducts than through communication.[7] Every language, in the broad sense, is an instrument susceptible to producing communication,[8] which makes the positive law a complex and specific model of human communication. In other words, saying that law is communication is saying that, through linguistic signs, the addresses of the legal rules are communicated about how they should proceed to act in a coherent manner with the relevant values to a given society.

The positive law is constructed in such a way that its empirical content can be used by its recipients as a basis for the understanding of what conduct is expected by the legal system. Therefore, law is a communicational fact.[9] Its prescriptive language is conveyed as a message to its addressees, having as content the inter-subjective conduct considered coherent with the values regarded as relevant by the totality of the legal communicational system, encased by the respective social context.

To Robles, law is a means of social communication and its message is the meaning addressed to someone in order to lead his thoughts or behavior in a certain direction.[10] The sender addresses the message to the receiver so that the latter can apprehend its sense, establishing a communion of action between both of them.[11] The message of law is the legal rule,[12] issued by the legitimated authority, and directed at the members of the community.

Insofar as the language of law deals with inter-subjective relationships, the prescription of rules is fundamental, since the rules, properly conveyed, guide or address certain aspects of the human actions.[13] As Robles would like, that's why, in that sense, law can be compared to games, since it sets rules of conduct that, once disrespected, will unbalance the relationships and deviate the participants from the intended purpose, which is exactly the compliance with the imposed rules.[14] As with games, law fixes, for instance, who can act — who can produce speech acts, legislate, rule; how one can/must proceed (procedures); who is one supposed to obey; how to obey, etc.

an interesting combination of the analytical method and hermeneutics, advancing its structuring program of a new and thought-provoking Theory of Law, which handles the legal norms as messages issued by the competent authority to the members of the social community. Such messages are enlivened by the juridical tone, that is, they prescribe conducts, guiding people's behavior in order to settle the values present on the collective consciousness." [12] The expression "legal rule" is herein used in coherence with the Communicational Theory of Law. For the Logical-Semantic Constructivism, it is possible to consider it as a "legal norm".

[14] Talking about the teleological or finalist approach of Law, Gregorio Robles shows that, just like in the games, the ends that generally are attributed to Law are actually the ends pursued by the involved subjects. The author says: "The inherent purpose of a game is to play and the one of Law is to accomplish legal actions." (Op. cit., p. 14) Therefore, it can be said that the purpose of Law is not justice; it's the fulfillment of its rules. Justice or injustice is the purpose of the subject who applies the law. So, the legal certainty is the number one rule of Law (regarded as the rule which ensures the proper fulfillment of the other rules in the system).

The aforementioned communication, which aims to alter intersubjective conducts as well as any other forms of communication, in line with the teachings of Roman Jakobson, happens through the transmission of a message issued by the sender through a channel, to a receiver, according to a shared code, and inside a specific context.[15] The mentioned author identifies six elements that, associated, enable the existence of the communication process: sender, receiver, message, context, code, and channel.

The juridical messages, thus wrapped in a communicational context, are no exception to the rule: they are transmitted by a sender (e.g. legislator, judge), through a channel or means of communication (e.g. official journal), to the receiver of the message (which is the legal rule), according to a shared code (e.g. the Portuguese language), based on a context, which are the historical and cultural circumstances that surround the subjects of the communication.[16]

The adequate transmission of the legal message presupposes a sender properly designated by the legal system as competent for its production. This is one of the rules of the game. The only one who can send a message prescribing conducts inside the juridical context is the one whose actions are based on a previous and higher rule that allows him to proceed in such a way.[17] In other words, only the "competent authorities" can act as senders of messages within the legal communication system. By "competent authorities" we mean both the legislator, for the general and abstract norms, and the judge, or an administrative official, for the individual and concrete norms.

Nonetheless, the message does not come ready.[18] The receiver of the rule only has access to the channel through which the message is transmitted. It's up to him to construe the content conveyed by the sender. He is the one who, based on the context, must construe the meaning

[16] It´s not too much to remember that Paulo de Barros Carvalho adds a seventh element, which he called "psychological connection". It is the sender's and receiver's subjective concentration during the process of issuing and apprehending the message. (Op. cit. p. 167) In order to remain close to the Communicational Theory as proposed by Gregorio Robles, we shall not discuss the seventh element in this paper.

[17] De Barros Carvalho, Paulo. Op. cit.: The law appears "…as a great communicational fact, being the normative creation trusted to the entities accredited by the system", p. 169.

This path of meaning construction[19] starts from the physical support, that is, the means for transmitting the message itself, which, in law, is the ink impressed on legal documents (rules, sentences, notices of infraction, contracts, and so on). Then, the interpreter/receiver puts together the enunciations from the text, organizing them in the hypothesis-consequence format, which is proper to norms, obtaining the legal propositions[20]. Once the normative propositions (norm in the strict sense) are built, the receiver incursions the legal communicational system as a whole, relating his initial comprehension of the message to the context, which is formed by the other statements that compose the system, and to which the linguistic construction relates in a situation of hierarchy and derivation.[21]

For example, a Brazilian taxpayer who has access to the official journal organizes the linguistic signs he comes across in enunciations — statements that contain information about a certain tax, tax rates, tax base, collector, payer, etc. Then he arranges the enunciations in hypothesis and consequence, realizing that taxation has been imposed upon his income. He does so because it's written that all those who have a source of income must contribute with a percentage of it, to a certain entity, in a certain place, at a certain time. The taxpayer, receiver of the message, examines other messages of the legal system in the attempt to verify the coherence of the rule communicated with its context. At the end of this path, the message will be ready, construed by the receiver, who will have to abide by the rule that obliges him to pay the tax.

From a rhetorical perspective of law as a communicational fact, the sender of the juridical message always tries to convince the receiver that the prescribed content should be fulfilled. As said before, this is the purpose of the law: convincing the receiver that the rules must be observed, abide by.[22] To put it another way, it is possible to affirm the legal certainty is the most primary and vital of the legal rules.

[20] The expression legal — or normative — proposition was here used in the sense assigned by the Logical-Semantic Constructivism, not in the kelsenian sense.

[22] If the ultimate purpose of law is the fulfillment of the prescriptive message (its rule), the persuasion is the purpose of the juridical language, which makes law rhetoric. In that sense, see Adeodato, João Maurício. Uma teoria retórica da norma jurídica e do direito subjetivo. São Paulo: Noeses, 2011.

The main guideline for every single system of rules is that its rules are to be followed. Otherwise, it wouldn't be necessary to have them in the first place. Those authorized to produce speech acts[23] within the legal system, that is, those who are invested with the power to create new rules must, above all, obey the "number one rule". Only then the receivers of the legal messages will be able to fulfill the law, for they also must abide by the first of all rules.

To comply with the juridical prescription, the receiver should be convinced that, the sender of the message himself is the authority empowered by the legal system to transmit the message. Again, the rules of law dictate who can act, that is to say, the one who has the "capacity to exercise"[24] when it comes to sending prescriptive messages; the one who has been legitimated by the system to deliver speech acts. Determining the competence of the sender to act as such is part of the legal certainty principle.

That principle, in what concerns this paper, establishes beforehand that only certain people can issue certain prescriptive messages or generate speech acts within the system. Yet, according to the legal certainty principle, only the legislator can produce laws; only the judge can sentence; only the tax auditor can issue infraction notices related to the taxation matter; and so on. Thus, one should only abide by a law issued by the legislator, a sentence ordered by a judge, an infraction notified by an auditor, etc.

In order to follow the legal certainty rule, when a message is sent, it is necessary to ensure that its recipient is able to recognize, during the path of meaning construction, who the sender of the prescriptive content is. Otherwise, the meaning of the text is impaired, and the text itself ceases to be.[25]

[23] The expression "speech acts" is here used according to the teachings of Gregorio Robles. After the (extra- or intra-systemic) decision, a speech act always take place; a communicative action, through which the message is produced.

[24] Robles, Gregório. Op. cit.: The legal system points out who the subject is and under what circumstances he can act as such. p. 45. Being able to act as the subject accredited by the legal system is the capacity to exercise.

[25] Tomazini de Carvalho, Aurora. Op. cit.: "The physical support of a text is its empirical material. In the written language, it's the marks of ink impressed on the paper (…) The one who doesn't know how to handle such marks and can't link them to a meaning is not capable of constructing any meaning at all. He looks at that collection of symbols and only sees ink marks on a paper. This proves two things: (i) first, the meaning is not in

For that reason, it's needed that the channel — the material fact, the physical support — bear particular signs which will guarantee that the receiver construes the information about who the sender is, verifying, in the intersystem contextualization, if he's an individual or represents an institution who has the competence to act in that sense; someone legitimated by the legal system to take part in the communicational process of law actively.

It's imperative that the receiver of the speech identify the ethos in order to adequately comprehend the message transmitted, convincing himself of the need to observe the prescriptions contained therein. The pathos and the logos[26] are not enough. Under other circumstances, the receiver won't be persuaded to comply with the legal rules.

If only some individuals are authorized to send prescriptive messages to the receivers within the legal system, then the latter expect such messages to be effectively communicated by the former, being able to analyze who sent them swimmingly.[27] Without being capable of understanding the signification of the message by getting reliable information about the sender, the receiver will be prevented from certifying that the primary rule of the system — the legal certainty — has been observed by the responsible for producing the speech act in question. Consequently, the receiver himself will disregard the message and disrespect the most

the physical support, it's built in the interpreter's mind; and (ii) secondly, there's no text without meaning." p. 177.

[26] See Adeodato, João Maurício. Uma teoria retórica da norma jurídica e do direito subjetivo. Ethos, pathos e logos are the classical means for the rhetorical persuasion. (p. 109). According to Aristotle, those are the three dimensions of rhetorical which constitute the means for persuasion, since the goal of the rhetorical is to persuade. His classic definition states 'the first kind depends on the personal character of the speaker; the second on putting the audience into a certain frame of mind; the third on the proof, or apparent proof, provided by the words of the speech itself'. The terms ethics, pathetic and logic stem from Aristotle's ideas, with all their variations of meaning throughout the centuries. That's why Aristotle claims 'it's not true that the personal goodness revealed by the speaker contributes nothing to his power of persuasion; on the contrary, his character may almost be called the most effective means of persuasion he possesses'. (p. 294) Associating this idea to what we've been discussing, the 'character' of the sender of the legal message, as a condition to act in the legal communicative process, is extremely relevant to persuade the receiver to abide by the rules.

[27] Expecting the rules to be effectively fulfilled and, consequently, that the messages are only sent by those legitimated by the legal system, can be related to a study about legal certainty in the sense of expectancy of legitimate trust. See Torres, Heleno Taveira. Op. cit., p. 183 onwards, especially from p. 215 on.

All that is easy to be proved when we come across legislative documents (physical supports) which do not contain any proper signature or identification (for instance, sentences with no signature or carrying just the rubric of the office's employee). However, the matter we discuss here is more complex.

If it's true the receiver of the prescriptive message should apprehend it through a meaning-construction path, which begins once he has access to the physical support, it's also true that the physical support itself (the channel or means) ought to contain the sign or signs through which the sender can be identified. But where, in the physical support, must such information be inserted? Is there a particular place in the material fact where the sender's identification lies? Or is it enough that such identification rests anywhere in the physical support?

The sender's identification sign shouldn't only be located in the physical support from which the receiver's interpretation process starts. Moreover, the identification sign of the authority who is legitimate to produce speech acts in the legal system should be in a specific place within the material content.

The message will only make sense to the receiver if the sender as an individual is able to relate harmoniously to both the content of the transmitted message and the reflection of the communication on the receiver.[28]

The sender's identification inside the message is not sufficient. It ought to be specifically placed in the message. It's important to elucidate that we apply the term topology in the title of this essay in the sense of "study of the place, the specific place" where the identification of the one empowered by the legal system to convey rules lies. Juridical legitimacy, for our purposes, is the attribute of the one to whom the competence has been designated.

The Brazilian tax law provides us with a perfect example of a physical support in which, despite the existence of the identification sign of the sender of the legal message, it is not possible to understand the message adequately due to uncertainties regarding the responsible for the speech act.

We refer to the fiscal procedure mandate (approximate translation for mandado de procedimento fiscal - MPF),[29] a physical support [28] Ethos, pathos and logos together, inseparably.

[29] An administrative act through which a previously designated authority attributes spe-through which the message is sent by a competent authority ordering a second authority, hierarchically inferior, to initiate inspection procedures against a taxpayer.

The rules that specifically concern the fiscal procedure mandate state those inspection procedures must occur during a limited period of time, which can be extended by the authority who issued the inspection order himself.[30]

What draws the attention, however (and was the object of the empirical observation that guides this paper) is that the legal system itself foresees how such document (the fiscal procedure mandate) is supposed to be; it literally presents a model for the physical support, and how its alterations should be done, including the aforementioned time limit extension.[31]

The problem seen in this specific material content is that despite the rules clearly predicting that only the authority who has issued the document can alter its time limit, the model for this particular material content does not contain any identification of the message sender in case the time limit extension happens. There is indeed a blank for the sender's identification. Still, that signature blank comes before the time limit alteration blanks, which causes the latter to be included in the document without any identification of who inserted them. So you can better understand, we took the liberty of including the model for the message´s physical support, as envisaged by the legislation.

cific jurisdiction to another authority so the latter can initiate inspection procedures against a given taxpayer. The fiscal procedure mandate (approximate translation for mandado de procedimento fiscal- MPF) is foreseen in the Decree no. 3.724/01: "Article 2. The tax proceedings regarding taxes and contributions administered by the Secretariat of the Federal Revenue of Brazil will be executed, on its behalf, by the tax auditors of the Federal Revenue of Brazil, and will only be initiated with the specific order called fiscal procedure mandate, instituted by act of the Secretariat of the Federal Revenue of Brazil." It's ruled by the ordinance no. 3.014/11 of the same Secretariat.

[30] The sixth article of the ordinance no. 3.014/11 states who the Brazilian authorities who can issue fiscal procedure mandates are. "Article 11. The fiscal procedure mandates have the following maximum time limits (...); Article 12. The extension of the time limits comprised in article 11 can be executed by the issuing authority, as many times as needed, since each act observes the time limits fixed on the subparagraph I and II of article 11, depending on the case."

[31] The models for the fiscal procedure mandate are anticipated in the article 19 of the ordinance no. 3.014/11: "The models for fiscal procedure mandate herein are approved (…)". The models can be accessed on www.receita.fazenda.gov.br/Legislacao/Portarias/2011/portrfb30142011.htm.

We evidently encounter the problem. There's a field for the competent authority's signature, the sender of the message; however, below the time limit alterations (which, by the system of rules, should be executed by the same authority) there are no specific blanks that anticipate an identification in case deadline extensions occur, despite the fact that the rule itself defines who the legitimate person is to produce such speech act within the legal communication system.

That example demonstrates the relevance of the questions previously worded in this paper: Where, in the physical support, is the legal identification of the message sender supposed to be? Is there a particular place in the material content where that identification should be? Or is it enough that the competent authority's identification sign is inserted anywhere in the physical support?

It is not possible for the interpreter/receiver of the message,[32] considering the example above, to construe the transmitted information properly, once it hasn't been given him the chance to acknowledge who the sender of the prescriptive message extending the inspection period is.

It can be said that the blank assigned for the competent authority's identification sign, regarding the empirical fact presented, causes incertitudes for the receiver about whether the legal certainty rule has been satisfied or not.[33] Without being able to comprehend the ethos of the transmitted message, the receiver won't be persuaded into abiding by it.[34]

[32] It's interesting to notice that the recipient of the fiscal procedure mandate is both the subordinate authority, responsible for the inspection (tax auditor), and the taxpayer against whom the inspection procedure was issued.

[33] Pragmatically, we refer to the nullity of inspections extended by invalid fiscal procedure mandate due to the impossibility of apprehending the legal message (lack of sender — competent authority). To solve the matter, it would suffice for the Secretariat of the Federal Revenue of Brazil to modify the rules, foreseeing a new model of fiscal procedure mandate with a signature field for the competent authority placed below the time limit extension fields.

[34] In Robles's opinion, we can compare the legal taxation example to a soccer game. Imagine the final match of the Soccer World Cup. According to the rules, in the event of a draw, it's the referee's responsibility (the competent authority) to send the game to extra time. Supposing the match remains tied after the extra time, a penalty shoot-out should start. In that case, the 45-minute halves are officially over, and neither of the teams has scored. The referee — who is supposed to be on the field to act as such — should then blow the whistle to end the regular-time period, and determine the beginning of the extra time through sounds and gestures. So that the message sent by the referee is properly

The idea of the topology of legitimacy — or where the competent sender's mark should be — has always involved the human communicational activity. It´s from this idea that comes the expression "to sign under"[35], that means that by the act of signing below the content of the transmitted message someone is attesting that wrote the message or that agrees with its content to the point to sign it as his own. "To sign under" conveys the idea that the sender's identification sign has been placed there after all the other signs (signs of content of the message).

It's highly advisable that we rethink that matter nowadays. Since the emergence of electronic legal documents, to identification the senders of prescriptive messages is increasingly untrustworthy, often making it impossible for the receivers to recognize the issuer of the rule, once the electronic systems enable anyone who has access to them to include or alter data.

We're not saying the identification signs of the competent authorities should always be placed below other content signs in the message. What we've been trying to evidence is that, based on the understanding of law as a communicational fact that transmits messages to the receivers so they can construe meanings from the physical support, it's necessary that the sender's identification signs be located somewhere the interpreter of the message can realize they've been placed there after the content signs properly speaking. Only then it'll be possible to affirm with certainty[36] if the authority legitimated by the communicational system was the one who effectively transmitted the message content.

As mentioned earlier, the sender is one of the elements of communication. In a communicational system such as the legal one, which foretells who the issuers authorized to produce speech acts are, un-comprehended by the players and the audience, the recipients must be able to actually see that the shrill sound really came out of the referee's whistle, who was on the field. They must effectively visualize the competent authority exercising his competence in a valid situation. Otherwise, the players can assume it was a ball boy, or an assistant referee, or even a supporter who whistled, feeling free to disobey the transmitted message.

[35] The term signature derives from sign (Latin translation = signo) and it's connected to the Greek word logos (Latin translation = verbum). Logos and signo both bear the acceptation of imprinting a mark on something. Insegnare means to teach, to imprint ideas onto someone. These terms are also associated to the ethos, in the sense of The Logos of the Living World (the representation of God, the divine) or Jesus Christ the World´s Logos, the embodiment of God on Earth.

[36] Relative certainty, obviously. The matter will be subject of confrontation between proofs.

doubtedly, we must ensure that the receiver do know the sender of the prescriptive message; otherwise, there might be no sense in the interpreted text and hence no rule to be fulfilled.

So the signs of the message sender can be satisfactorily construed, put differently, so the issuer's legal legitimacy can be recognized and the message properly construed in the receivers' mind in such a way the they are convinced to abide by the prescription transmitted, the signs must be strategically placed in the legal document, the physical support, allowing the recipient to be sure that those linguistic marks were produced after the content signs of the message, and that the legal certainty principle was duly observed by the sender and will be also by him, the receiver.

The place, in the physical support, for the identification of the authority legitimated to issue speech acts within the legal communicational system is essential to the proper construction of the legal message.

Legal Validity As Membership

Félix Francisco Sánchez Díaz[1]

Abstract: The concept of "legal validity" offered by formalistic theories of law has been claimed to be insufficient. The Communicational Theory of Law (CTL) strives for proving just the opposite. This proof can be attained, it is proposed in this paper, by distinguishing between the "concept"of legal validity as "membership" and the "topic" "legal validity". Semiotics and theory of language will help by providing legal theory with the conceptual triad "syntactics, semantics, pragmatics". The threefold theoretical framework will make it possible to sustain a "pure", "formalistic" concept of legal validity, while semantics and pragmatics build up the "topic". "Concept" and "topic" compose together the whole "theory" of legal validity.

Keywords: Legal validity, syntactics, semantics, pragmatics, concept, topic, membership, reasons form membership, interpretants of validity, legal ambit, legal order, legal system.

1. It is the purpose of this paper to explore the couple of notions "concept - topic" in order to develop a theory of legal validity. This paper and its proposals should be placed in the context of the Communicational Theory of Law (hereinafter CTL) defended by Professor Gregorio ROBLES in his already extensive work on legal theory[2].

What is suggested in this paper is that it is possible to build up a theory of legal validity, based on the definition made by CTL of the term "legal validity" as membership; a definition that will make possible to explain and not just to describe the semantics of the term (its multiple meanings), and also connect functionally with the network of actions and institutions referred to by the term legal system, which is definitely a system of communications (the system of legal communication), but is also, perhaps derivative but nonetheless decisively, a pragmatic system or system of action. This explanation will require to use a set of theoretical tools that are specific to the structural-functionalist paradigm. Here we argue that this paradigm, which has been claimed as an asset of the sociological perspective, is actually an expression of an instrumental point of view, which is internal to the system where action develops. Thus, it is possible to defend the correctness of the conclusions and/or discoveries reached by using this paradigm, while limiting at the same time their scope, since they are not realistic descriptions of effective social events, so that such findings do not constitute empirical socio-legal views.

2. The question, what the identifier criterion of elements inside or outside the legal system should be, goes back to the origins of Western civilization. Originally linked with the distinction between good and evil, and also with the question of what is justice or injustice, the question of what is or is not legally valid has been answered in an evolving way throughout history: from an initial identification of legal validity with what is good or what is just to the more abstract, complex and yet more morally ambiguous answers given by the two main versions of legal positivism (sociologism and normativism)[3]. We believe that CTL has decisively contributed to clarify the deeper meaning of "legal validity", running under every use of that term in legal discourse. We argue that the notion of "lawfulness" or "membership" to a legal system, despite its naked condition of mere logical connective, and despite its "senseless" (in the sense Charles MORRIS uses the term "sense", as the result of combining signification and interpretants)[4], succeeds in introducing the element which is common to all possible meanings, according to current uses of legal language. The notion of "membership to a legal ambit" constitutes the formal concept of legal validity. But a theory of legal validity is not a mere conceptual recount. Rather, it is a discourse that makes use of concepts in order to explain a portion of the world: in this case, to clarify an essential aspect of a type of communication systems: legal systems. That is why we say that one thing is the "concept" legal validity and quite another is the "topic" legal validity. While the former refers to the meaning of the term, the second refers to the sense of legal validity.

It can be checked in these two articles how interesting and complex the theoretical debate on legal validity has become, since the time when legal positivism spreaded itself in western legal culture to this day.

3. Concepts and theory. Viewed from semiotics, every theory is a type of speech. As such, it uses syntactic and semantic structures, and serves to perform a specific pragmatic function. From this perspective, theory is, therefore, semiosis; and theoretical concepts, only the specific semantics of the theoretical discourse.

Whenever the subject of a theory is a communication system, the theoretical discourse becomes a semiosis of a semiosis. Moreover, if object semiosis is a communication system composed by consciously produced elements -in a higher proportion than is typical of natural language, then a dialogue develops usually between the discourse of theory and the communication system that theory tries to describe and explain. Such a dialogue operates changes on both sides: theoretical concepts will be used in the object language, undergoing modifications that in turn can cause parallel changes in the language of theory. This phenomenon, despite its disturbing air, can (and should) be led into a "productive" direction, that is, to improve both theory of the communication system and the communication system itself.

Conceived law as a communication system, the theory of law amounts to be a conscious semiosis of another to a great extent conscious semiosis, i.e, legal semiosis. The basic conceptualization of a theory of law, which deals with "syntactic", "formal", fixed, universal aspects, present in all systems of legal communication, must be done in such a way that a) reflect the actual legal language and therefore be aware that the theoretical terms acquire their own life in the ordinary legal language, but also b) be able to go beyond the mere reflection of the life of legal language, to become an explanation of the structure and evolutionary potential of legal language, searching for the deeper meaning of legal semiosis' elements. In this task, theory of law's basic concepts, under investigation by the formal theory of law, (hereinafter FTL, which is the formal subdiscipline of CTL)[5] should orientate the ordinary legal language. They must at all times demonstrate (and not merely claim) that they offer better descriptions and explanations of the systems of legal communication than other usual legal theory conceptions do.

4. From above it follows a proposal for a method in the sciences dealing with communication systems, as does the complex of disciplines grouped under the label CTL. The method proposed starts by (1) a study of the current uses of language, follows by (2) a discovery of the common element present in all meanings of a term that commonly occur in the respective communication system, in the hope that this constant meaning will help unveil the role that the term and its different meanings play; to this end, it is necessary a previous formulation of an hypothesis about the general role which communication systems play in the broader social interaction, and (3) once functionally outlined the basic meaning of the term (i.e., once it has been obtained a formal concept of that term), it will be possible to explain its various forms and meanings in a structural-functional way, i.e., in terms of the operation types the communication system makes possible. Such operation types are important insofar as a) they define the applicability of the term in its most abstract (formal) signification and b) they report on its role in the communication system through the study of their pragmatic interpretant.

Once implemented the method outlined above to the term "legal validity", some relevant findings are made:

4.1. The term "legal validity" has, in the ordinary legal language, as well as in the language of the theory of law, a plurality of meanings that CTL has to purify and clarify.

4.2. The common element in all meanings, practical or theoretical, of the term "legal validity", present in all possible uses of it, is the one of "membership"[6] or inclusion of the item legally "valid" in a system that receives it and in turn gives it full meaning. The very "membership" of the elements of a legal ambit is its lawfulness, i.e., its legal character.

4.3. The idea of "membership" as formal signification of the term "legal validity" expresses with the highest possible level of abstraction the common element in all cases where use of that term is conceivable. However, this formal signification involves a lack of meaning or sense, which is necessary to fill up. This is how analysis of the concept leads to a composition of the topic "legal validity". Again, such composition will start with an analysis of the uses in legal language, both professional and theoretical, and follow by making use of (1) theoretical tools provided with by semiotics, and of (2) the internal structural-functional paradigm which applies to (communicative) action systems, in order to compose a) a theory on the reasons for legal validity (a Semantics of legal validity) and b) a theory about the implications or consequences of legal validity (a Pragmatics of legal validity). Together, formal, semantic and pragmatic theories build up the topic "legal validity", that is, a theory of legal validity as due part of a communicational theory of law.

5. Membership, action and legal validity. The formal concept "legal validity" as membership makes legal theorist wins in terms of universality as much as she loses in terms of richness of content. "Membership" is a formal property of all the elements of a legal ambit, typically of legal actions and provisions. As to the latter, it is always possible to make a judgement of legal validity, which will be decisive in determining whether they should remain or be removed from the legal system (and therefore from the legal ambit). Not so with legal actions: they belong (or not) to the respective legal ambit, but it is not always possible to make a judgment of legal validity of an action. This is the reason why, despite being obvious that, for example, murder is an action which belongs to a particular legal ambit, it is however meaningless to qualify a murder as legally valid or invalid.

The above reflections should not be construed as a criticism to the formal concept of legal validity as membership advocated by CTL. However, they do point to the need to transcend the stage of formal conceptualization addressed by CTL through formal theory of law (FTL) in order to build a theory of legal validity that, starting with a formal concept of legal validity as membership, explain the mechanisms or operations leading to the making of a legal validity/invalidity judgment, as well as the mechanisms that organize the pragmatic interpretants of the term within specific legal systems/ambits. To this end, as already noted, it is needed to start making some remarks on the role legal systems play, as well as on their specific character as action systems.

The ascertainment of certain elements' membership to a legal ambit or, in other words, the formal determination of the structure of a legal ambit, is a function which is fulfilled inside the legal ambit by the complex legislation - doctrine - case law, which CTL calls the Complex Legal Order/Legal System, or "ORD/SYS"[7]. This function is connected with the general role that legal systems play in the context of the society in which they develop and evolve. Primary expression of it is the fact that legal systems define, organize, coordinate, channel, limit and repress actions, that is, that legal systems are action systems. They are, of course, communication systems, as long as communication is a feature common to all systems, both human in origin (as legal systems), and extra-human in origin (as the system of Physics). Not all systems are, however, systems of action, although it should be noted that the latter are multiple and varied: from guidebooks, through technology, to reach the highest peaks of culture (Policy , Law, Morality, Religion) there is a wide array of systems of action: they all share a function: basic, elemental, very low-level but really essential: the facilitation of human life by reducing the effort required to operate and attain goals, through action standardization or semi - automation fostered by such systems. Each system of action is a characteristic form of action standardization or semi - automation. This feature is connected with the specific function the system seeks to meet in society, which expresses itself communicationally within the system itself in the form of values.

It is claimed in this paper that the specific function of legal systems must be extracted from the hermeneutics of the dark and complex term "justice", a term which expresses, in spite of its darkness, the fundamental value that legal systems themselves raise as the guiding principle of his special way of organizing human action. It is proposed, in effect, to set this value in functional terms, as the function of ensuring the predictability of actions and expectations, while ensuring compatibility between the various systems of the existing social action, including the legal system itself. Legal systems play this role by creating a "virtual space" called legal ambit which encompasses and comprises all actions constituted and organized by the textual complex "ORD/SYS", along with the textual complex itself, which on its side works as the backbone of the field of action. "Organization" here means implementing, via communication, a specific combination of techniques of action standardization or semi - automation, These techniques operate by disregarding the specific object, content and purposes of standardized actions, to focus on certain features or properties present in every action, whatever the field of life or social subsystem in which they develop. These are generally action's procedural aspects, although in many cases standardization focuses on action's contents or outcomes. This latter form of standardization is a second - level standardization, in the double sense that it is less common than the first one and that it presupposes an underlying procedural standardization. In each contingently social subsystem where legal regulation focuses, the legal system set out actions to be placed in the legal ambit, in view of the presence therein of certain defined properties of a general or abstract character. Each legal system establishes these relevant properties by means of a particular "membership rule" which decides what actions are to be considered as included in the ambit. This membership rule is the most formal precipitate of a more substantial "theory of legal validity." As it will be shown, any theory of legal validity presupposes a particular and more or less accurate membership rule, not the reverse being necessarily true.

6. Legal systems constitute and organise action through a combination of four techniques of standardization or semi - automation:

a) Standardization of environment and actors, by means of ontic rules.

b) Standardization of procedures through technical rules which set various types of legally relevant actions.

c) Standardization of action's contents and/or outcomes, through deontic rules.

d) Standardization of judgment prior to legal decision-making, through principles: a kind of technical rules that govern intellectual procedures leading to discretionary decision-making.

It is the interplay of these four standardization techniques which makes possible to establish membership rules within legal ambits, at least in two levels: the first level membership rule results from a combination of ontic and technical rules. This level can be considered as basic and corresponds to the usual meaning of the term "formal validity", that is, the belonging of an action to a legal ambit in view of its formal properties, connected with the structural aspects of the legal ambit, which is a four - dimension (subjective, procedural, time-space) domain.

To the second level of action standardization belongs the setting of the results or contents of actions as either banned or compulsory. This standardization technique through deontic rules requires previous first level standardization. Indeed, rules can not impose duties if time-space environment, subjects and procedures in the ambit are not previously set. This technique appeals more to volition than to cognition of the players in the ambit, and is therefore more exposed to failure risks than techniques of the first level. For this reason, it is usual to reinforce it within the legal system itself, 1) by connecting deontic rules with other deontic rules specialized in organizing coercion (sanctions), or 2) by connecting deontic rules with second level membership rules, so that it becomes possible to judge about membership to the legal ambit of actions which, being legal under their "formal" properties, nevertheless violate certain deontic rules. This second level membership rule is usually called "substantive or material validity", i. e., the lawfulness of an action (most often, of a legal provision), its membership to the legal ambit, by reason of its compliance with deontic rules that serve as a vehicle for standardization of action's contents or outcomes.

A particular case is that of making the conformity with certain principles of legal action a prerequisite for such action (which is typically a legal decision) to enter the status of membership to a legal ambit (in legal decision-making, membership of the resulting legal provision to the respective legal order). Principles, as rules of thought, are clear cases of technical rules. Yet in virtue of their origin as generalizations or abstractions from deontic rules, standardization through principles seems to share traits with first and second level standardization techniques already dealt with. In fact, standardization through principles rises as a completely different mode of standardization, since it focuses on the weighting process which is inherent to any legal decision-making. Principles require consideration of certain duties (which are neither typically nor necessarily decision-maker's duties) when making a legal decision. Thus, deontic rules become part of the mental process prior to making a discretionary legal decision, however not directly standardizing contents or results of action, but rather making them the focus of decision as intellectual process. In this sense, principles are a specific type of technical rules, though its solemnity and the importance of the situations that make them invoked may lead to consider its use as a duty for actors present in the legal ambit. To make the respect of certain principles a reason for the belonging of a provision to a legal ambit thus becomes a particular case of first level membership rules (which make of the procedural properties a reason for membership) that is unique in that action is not only standardized in its "external" aspects (those that refer to action's external properties or elements) but also in its "internal", intrapsychic or intellectual aspects. True, these "internal" aspects cannot be accessed unless they show up externally (e. g., it cannot be known whether a discretionary legal decision has respected the principle of equality of the parties in the judicial process without checking what the effective treatment granted to the parties by Court, even fulfilling procedural rules, has been in effect. Yet it can be discerned, from the very external appearance of Court's performance, whether or not the principle of equality of the parties has or not weighted in the discretionary decisions made by the Court -for instance: when it comes to the admission of evidence offered by the parties. Such a judgment may determine the reviewing Court's decision about the discretionary decision made, even under all the procedural formalities, by the lower Court).

7. While membership rules operate automatically when passing judgment on the inclusion of an act or a provision in a concrete and specific legal ambit, non-membership judgments are not made in the same automatic way; instead, they are institutionalized in legal systems by a regulatory mechanism requiring a prior decision, expressly adopted by certain actors in the ambit (typically, courts or administrative bodies endowed with reviewing functions) that the act or defective provision ceases to belong to the respective legal ambit. This mechanism, called presumption of validity, emerges as a reinforcement device of the semi - automation operated by the legal system as a system of action. Presumption of validity ensures the system's operability and provides actors in the legal ambit with certainty in their operations; the latter 1) may (or) must invoke and use those legal provisions which, under external features, are shown to be effective members of the legal order and 2) can ignore a provision or action with apparent legal validity only in case that an institutionalized expelling decision, in accordance with the current theory of membership to the legal ambit, has been issued; a decision therefore based solely on internally established criteria for expulsion, either original (i. e., not taken from other action system but resulting from the internal logic of the legal system itself) or incorporated and re-enacted by the legal system (for example, the inclusion in the legal system of social, religious or moral rules).

8. The foregoing considerations have focused entirely on what is probably the most intricate aspect of the theory of legal validity: the general theory of the reasons for membership of actions and provisions to a legal ambit, which, based on the uses of legal language, has sought to explain such uses without disregarding the internal point of view, linking the linguistic utterance with action organization techniques, thus formulating a rough theory of the mechanisms of standardization or semi - automation that helps explain the heterogeneity of the meanings of "legal validity", both in the ordinary and in the theoretical uses of legal language, while allows to resolve certain paradoxes or apparent contradictions resulting from attempts to explain legal validity from a sheer "normative" view.

We would like to close this paper with a brief foray into the not so intricate, but equally critical other side of the theory of legal validity: the pragmatics or theory of interpretants of legal validity, which is the theory that informs on the consequences or implications of legal validity, being a research of the expectable reactions, according to the current in legal communication pragmatic rules, after a positive or negative judgment has been uttered on the legal validity of an action or a provision. Mention shall be made below of some of the more obvious interpretants.

8.1 Validity and referability of legal norms and provisions. Membership judgements of legal norms and provisions are essential to the work of jurists. They need to have as much certainty as possible about what their work material is. No less essential is that certainty, however, for non-professional actors in the legal ambit, as guidance for action and support for interests' promotion and defence, as well as basis for decision. Membership judgements help therefore build the legal discourse, for they provide with precise information about which legal norms and provisions are to be used.

8.2. Validity and intelligibility. Membership of an action to a legal ambit, i.e., lawfulness of an action, is the first condition of its intelligibility as legal action. Without a prior membership judgement, the specific meaning of the underlying set of physical and mental movements changes radically. Thus, e. g., the specific meaning of an economic association changes completely if we think of a group of friends who join themselves to fund a night out, as to when we think of a group of investors which establish a capital fund in order to undertake a common business. Key to this change of meaning, despite visible similarities between both cases, is the fact that contribution to capital funds is legally regulated, while party nights funds are not.

8.3. Validity and justification. Just as it is impossible either to invoke norms and provisions, or a right understanding of actions and action complexes without a previous membership judgement, it is equally impossible to make any justification judgement, on the one hand, of legal norms and provisions and, on the other, of legal actions, without having previously decided about their membership to the legal ambit. This latter judgment is formulated in terms of the inner values of the respective legal ambit, as they are produced by or accepted in ORD/SYS complex, particularly but not exclusively in the form of deontic rules. On the other hand, this legal membership judgement can be converted by the legal system that makes it possible in another element of legal action (especially when it comes to legal decisions) which in turn can be converted by the membership rule of the system in a reason for the membership of decisions to the respective legal order. Thus, legal system incurs a spiral "membership-justification-membership", so that the material justification (righteousness) of a legal provision is internalized by the legal system and becomes itself a part of its mechanism of action standardization.

8.4. Legal membership and action coordination. After the occurrence of a legal action, that is, an action whose membership to a legal ambit is accepted, it can be expected the performance of one or more actions, belonging as well to the same legal ambit and connected with the first one by rules of the respective legal system. Coordination is therefore a reflection of the institutions created within the respective legal system. On the other hand, coordination not only produces action-complexes that are usually perceived as a "coordinated action" (association, contract, administrative procedure...) but also action-complexes that are usually perceived as "conflicting" (e. g., crime and acts of criminal prosecution).

Communicational Theory of Law and Tax Computerization

Guilherme Lopes de Moraes[1]

Abstract: This work intends to show that computerized processes used by the Brazilian tax authorities may, and must, be analyzed in light of Communicational Theory of Law, since messages are poured in texts and their linguistic approach surely has to be the appropriate. And to test the applicability of this theory in terms of tax computerization, we opted for the Nota Fiscal Eletrônica system, real progress in Administration-taxpayer relationship, given how quickly the constitution of the tax legal fact, the facility in handling the data tax and the security at the trade relations.

Keywords: Tax Computerization, Communicational Theory of Law, Nota Fiscal Eletrônica system

1 Introduction

We have observed, in a surprising way, the communicational process of law being innovated by many information technologies, which seek to streamline this area of knowledge. They give better agility to the processes and permit that new uses can be incorporated by this digital communicational happening.

Individual and concrete standards are electronically issued and immediately become part of the legal system. Some formalities required for the constitution of some determined legal facts are being replaced by certificates and digital signatures, legal-virtual valid documents, magnetic files etc.

The Communicational Theory of Law has already proven to be an excellent tool for the positive law analysis and, knowing this reality, its scholars must use it to go deeper into the theoretical study of the legal issues imposed and exposed by the tax computerization.

Currently the acknowledgment of some administrative acts are digital and electronic tax addresses, which is a reality in the daily tax administrations. Moreover, taxpayers and documents exist only virtually because people hire, from kilometers away, through a computer connected to the internet.

This new digital reality will require new knowledge and attitudes from the positive law interpreter. The answers should be searched from the existing theories, in a way that only the ones properly tested, proven and approved will remain applicable.

The purpose of this study is to apply the institutes of the Communicational Theory of Law in this new legal-communicational reality. For that, we will discuss the institutes thought by Gregorio Robles (organization, system and legal scope) and the communication elements from Roman Jakobson, focusing our attention on the computerized process of electronic receipts issuance and on the reflexes that its usage brought in relation to the intersubjectivity of legal relations.

2 Brief History of Electronic Receipt

One of the greatest Brazilian tax computerization advances (if not the greatest) was the Electronic Receipt system (which we will simply call NF-e), which allowed lots of advantages, among the ones we can highlight the easiness of access to the electronic receipt, the speed in the information exchange among the ones who are interested (senders, receivers, tax administrations and other public bodies) and the uncomplicated and no cost storage.

The NF-e is an electronic receipt (sent and electronically stored, with only a digital existence) established by Ajuste SINIEF 07/05 of October 05, 2005, whose legal validity is ensured by the sender digital signature. It also has to have the authorization for the usage by the tax administration from the taxpayer's State/DF, even before the establishment of the legal tax fact ("occurrence of generator fact" according to § 1º from the First Clause of the related agreement). Thus, to complete the issuance of the NF-e, the taxpayer is required to transmit the electronic file to the Farm Department (or Finance) of his jurisdiction, which will return an Usage Authorization for the NF-e and generate a protocol confirming the file receipt.

Understood as a communicational computerized act, the issuance process for the NF-e will serve as a background to the issues risen on this paper, since it represents an important and current computerized resource.

3 The elements of communication by Roman Jakobson and the Electronic Receipt

It is important to remember that the positive law system consists of the set of legal rules and that have a main goal: regulate the intersubjectivity behavior. For this, it is necessary the efficiency of this system in informing the individuals about the legality or not of their possible behaviors.

After this quick introduction, we must observe that the communication process of the law fits the molds designated by Roman Jakobson[2], for which the constitutive factors of every verbal communication act externalize when

> "The SENDER sends a MESSAGE to the RECIEVER. To be effective, the message requires a CONTEXT which it referees (or 'referent' in another nomenclature something ambiguous), apprehended by the receiver, and that is either verbal or capable of verbalization; a total CODE or partially common to the sender and the receiver (or, in other words, to the message encoder and decoder), and finally a CONTACT, a physical channel and psychological connection between the sender and the receiver, which enable both of them to enter and remain in communication. "

Thus, we have six elements in total (sender, receiver, message, contact, code and context); without them is not possible the act of communication. There are two issues that are necessary to emphasize at this point of study. One of them is regarding what Roman Jakobson called contact. For him, as it can be seen in the text above, channel and psychological connection are part of the contact, being linked to it. It can be evidenced by the analysis of the phatic function of language, which is closely related to the contact. When we say "Hello, are you hearing me?" on the phone, we are testing both the channel and whether there is psychological connection with our interlocutor. Then, we can say that if the channel does not work perfectly or if the psychological connection is not maintained, there will be no contact and consequently, communication. Some scholars see the psychological connection as another element of the communication act, but it does not seem to be the best way.

The second issue relates to the positive law context, which shows a large amplitude in the communication process. This element is present in every act of communication, however a major difficulty is to establish its limits. Communication only occurs because it is within a context, which gives to any message a referential function (may be accompanied by others).

In summary, the law communication process is established when an individual, capable of, issues a prescriptive statement, from the receivers acknowledgment (express or operational, according to art. 3 of the Introductory Law to the Civil Code), becomes part of the positive law system. This statement will pass for an interpretation process, whose product is the standard law, result from the interpreter intellectual construction. This interpretative way is also known as path sense generator.

Our study focus will be on the individual and concrete standard, in other words, the one that performs a linguistic clipping in the social reality to constitute a legal fact. And we will seek, at the issuance act of the NF-e, understand and analyze the presence of the six elements of the communication act mentioned before.

As sender, we have the person who accesses the system through his digital signature previously registered in ICP-Brazil, which in this act, represents the company that is sending the merchandise (seller). As stated previously, the Medida Provisória n. 2.200-2/2001 established the rules to secure the system and give legal validity to digital documents issued.

As the message receiver, we have the tax administration of the federal unit where the NF-e sender company is located, which is addressed by the excellence of the information contained in the NF-e, whose message is exactly its content (type of merchandise, quantity, value, receiver company, carrier etc.). This communicational act contact is provided by the connection between the company's computers and computerized systems of the tax authorities, which should provide security in the transmission of computerized data.

To make possible that the company can use this channel and send a NF-e, it is required the prior register of your own digital certificate. As we stressed before, the NF-e expedition is completed with the "return of receipt protocol", which gives intersubjectivity to this specific communicational process. It can mean the confirmation of receipt message, which just became aware in its entire scope. This aspect will be important when we are analyzing the clipping linguistic made by the individual and concrete standard in the launch through approval, which, in our view, has undergone a substantial change with the NF-e acquisition.

The code is nothing more than the computerized language containing the information in Portuguese (numeric characters, letters, punctuation, etc.). The sixth and last element relates to the context, which is not limited to computational scope necessary for the NF-e expedition, but covers the set of legal standards that relate to each other, directly or indirectly, with the NF-e system. We cannot forget that this information is processed under a legal apparatus that gives to their acts and procedures the necessary legal power to release relations of the same nature.

4 Communicational Theory of Law and Tax Computerization

The communicational theories gain space among the existing ones, because they offer a greater apparatus of analysis tools, allowing a deeper approach to the context in which the digital messages transit.

At the vanguard of these theories, it is found the Communicational Theory of Law, which places this knowledge area as a great communicational process. In the words of Gregorio Robles[3]

> The communication theory conceives the law as a communication system whose pragmatic function is to organize the human contact through, basically, the actions regulation.
> Another way to express that the law is a system of communication obtained from the affirmation that the law is text. Unlike other texts, such as the literary or historical, the law is a regulator-organizer text.

In order to better understand this theory, we will analyze its three central figures: organization, system and legal scope. Moreover, it is important to relate these institutes with computerized processes, seeking demonstrate the application of those in the correct understanding of these ones.

The legal system, and the lines drawn by Prof. Gregorio Robles, is the set of written rules (laws, decrees, treaties, tax assessments etc.) that compose the normative outline. The organization, then, consists of what "went out from the legislator's mouth" (we use the term "legislator" in a broad sense, in a way to contemplate the numerous sender's agents of prescriptive statements). In other words, the organization is what has been published in the Official Diary (or other means of publication, depending on the normative act).

The legal system is result from the system regulation by itself, since it is by nature, disordered (or not completely ordered). The legal system, then, comes from the interpreter's construction work, who, from the raw text, tries to give a consistently scientific shape to the organization, adding their values and philosophic conception.

Another contribution from this theory, perhaps the one that completes its creator logic, is the figure of the legal scope. Thus, every or any situation involving something legal, belongs to the legal scope, without necessarily belonging to the organization or system. In the words of Gregorio Robles[4]

> A legal scope includes, therefore, the legal organization and the legal system. In addition it also includes a set of communicative acts (hence translatable into specific texts) that occur or may occur in relation to those. Finally, it also includes those acts which do not generate the text by themselves in the strict sense, but they acquire their sense since the "reading" that makes ordering from the organization/system.

After this brief reflection on these Communicational Theory of Law institutes, we believe that it is possible to establish some relations between them and the elements of communication. The organization is closely related to the communicational act's sender, since the legislator, when issues a prescriptive statement, gives life to it, which means that such a statement acquires autonomy in relation to the sender. This statement contradicts the authors' thinking who seek the message meaning in the legislator's wish, the old fashioned mens legislatoris. In another study, we had the opportunity to position ourselves in the following

> Here is registered the disagreement with the ones who defend the will of the law (mens legis) or the legislator's intention (mens legislatoris). The law, from this view, contains a message poured into language (...). On this way, the interpreter is stuck only to the legislated product, being irrelevant the issues pertaining to the legislator or to the production process, unless the text itself contains some reference.

Another interesting relation is about the legal system and the message receiver. The interpreter build the legislated message based on prescriptive statements, which does not mean that the result will be the one desired by the legislator (sender). The legal system is a result from this interpretive construction, which has the message receiver as responsible for the brute text organization.

At last, it remains to relate the legal scope to the context which the legal communication is established. We can observe that these two legal-communicational elements have a broad spectrum and it is difficult to characterize its contours. Again, the precise definition of the Law concept is crucial to delimit the boundaries of these institutes.

It is important the complementarity between the Gregorio Robles theory and Paulo de Barros Carvalho's teaching lines. Legal scope and positive law system (through the Professor Paulo's sense): what are the similarities and differences between these two legal figures? The legal standards (in the context of Paulo de Barros Carvalho's work) would be equivalent to legal acts pertaining to the legal scope?

5 Intersubjectivity

The law allows life in society and a peaceful coexistence among the individuals, because it stipulates rights and duties. According to Paulo de Barros Carvalho[6]

> The pragmatic function which convey to the law language is the > prescription of conducts, because its goal is to change the behavior in the interpersonal relations, guiding them towards the values that the society intends to implant. (...) And this is the way that the law works, making itself on the intersubjectivity conducts, since the intra-subjectivity ones go out from their scope, letting behind the precepts of morality, religion etc.

Based on these arguments, we can conclude that the intersubjectivity is an indispensable feature of prescriptive statements, requiring from its receiver's receipt that it can have its own legal effects and create new legal relations. However, there are situations that the sender's acknowledgment is not necessary for the system, such as the launches by approval.

As a rule, the prescriptive statement (law, decree, ordinance, tax assessment or a sentence) should have a specific form of science by its receiver. This measure is important to the law, because is only from it that the counting time begin (decay, prescription, to come in with an action or appeal etc.). The laws, decrees and other normative acts are published in the respective gazettes, and in most cases, the individuals do not know. This is a situation that the law seeks to get around with a statement which operates as a rule over the entire system. As we have already mentioned, it is the art. 3º of the Introductory Law to the Civil Code, which states that "nobody is excused from complying the law, claiming that do not know it." Although this article does not refer to the regulatory system constitution, "it establishes its principle of functionality and existence condition, which corresponds to the law command", in the words of Clarice Von Oertzen de Araujo[7].

In terms of the NF-e issuance act, it is important to highlight the legal effect of the "science of tax administration," which occurs before the issuance. As the positive law exists to moderate the intersubjectivity conducts, it is essential to verify the exact moment that the intra-subjective conduct passes to the intersubjectivity scope or, in other words, when a situation becomes legally moderated.

To better fix the situation, we will take the act of NF-e issuance in comparison with the previous system. In general, for covering up a commercial operation, the taxpayer emitted an official tax document and only at the end of the month (or the first days of the next month) the transaction was recorded in the tax book. After the deadline, the taxpayers should deliver a magnetic file, which should contain all the operations occurred throughout the period (arrival and departure of merchandise).Thus, the tax administration began to know about these operations a long time after their happening, since the files delivery deadline was postponed to the end of the month or beginning of the next one. However, this knowledge was only indicative, since there still was the need to check the veracity of the information electronically delivered, because these ones could not match with the ones contained in the legal books (legally valid). This reflection allows us to know the discern the "knowledge" of electronic information from the "science" by itself, in terms of communication, it requires the presence of the message receiver.

This procedure contained in the NF-e legislation, except better judgment, establishes an important innovation in the field of taxation, as the passive taxpayer, in advance, "scientific" the active subject of the operation occurrence of merchandise's movement, giving intersubjectivity to communicational act.

The event is taken from the competent legal language and the legal tax fact properly constituted at the NF-e issuance moment, since the active individual's acknowledgment is instantaneous regarding to the tax relation. We have set the self-assessment according to the precise teachings from Paulo de Barros Carvalho.

While the previous system of tax documents issuance did not permit the receiver's acknowledgment (tax administration), the NF-e issuance depends on this acknowledgment, in reason to the return of the authorization protocol. The NF-e has already set up a communicational act, since it counts with the presence of the message's receiver, whose content refers to all the criteria of the rule-matrix of tax incidence (in this case, from do ICMS). This digital document is the linguistic clipping of the factual occurrence (event) of the merchandise's circulation. This is the individual and concrete standard issued by the passive subject (self-assessment), who shall, in addition to properly apply the general and abstract rules, inform the tax authorities about the occurrence of the respective fact.

There is no way to get confused about the taxpayer credit with the debits from the occurance legal tax facts, however the fiscal book linked the two realities and showed them as standards of the same nature. With the NF-e system, it is clear the separation between individual and concrete standard for the legal tax fact constitution (NF-e sender emission) and individual and concrete standard to use the right to fiscal credit (arrival time of the respective digital structure with the entrances).

The tax computerization development observed in the most part of the countries is something irreversible. The usage of information technology reached many sectors and comes with the incorporation of values to the processes, in addition it also considerable decrease the costs.

The legal scope has been innovated really fast and it contains all the production of virtual legal standards. Being familiar with the legal organization, this new scope need to be deeply understood for the good comprehension of the tax standards, result from the virtual exposure process.

One thing is right: we have complete conviction that the topic does not finish in this brief and superficial paper. We look for the analysis of the communication elements and how to relate them with the institutes from the Communicational Theory of Law, having the NF-e as example of computerized process.

Some considerations done throughout this paper should be revised, such as the case of intersubjectivity. In our feeling, this characteristic is necessary to the law, it can exist legally without the receiver's knowledge, as it occurs with the assessments by approval. It is what used to occur in the previous systems that issued fiscal documents, which receiver just knew the linguistic clipping of the event in the approval act, if they occur.

Within this scenario, we understand that the Communicational Theory of Law can help the tax computerization processes, a reality in our legal-tributary everyday. As a reflex from this technologic advancement, the positive law scholar must worry about the proving issue, since the computerized processes (such as the NF-e) call for new approach to a better understanding of the virtual process for the enunciation of legal standards and their effects over the tax legal relations.

Legal Dogmatic And Theory Of Texts

1. Framework of the subject in the Communicational Theory of Law (CTL): some basic traits.

The aim of this paper is to analyse the relationship between legal dogmatics and theory of texts from the standpoint of the Communicational Theory of Law (CTL). I am working on these notions since the eighties and have published some books[2] and articles about this topic. As a matter of course, I shall here notably simplify some aspects of this theory that are much more complex, actually.

The aim of CTL is to understand the legal phenomenon from the human communication point of view, as a linguistic phenomenon, and consequently, as a text. All that is communicated or communicable can be conveyed through language and more precisely through a system of signs. Thus, all that is communicated or communicable can be translated into written texts. That is also true as regards customary law; although it comes from a complex of facts or actions by members of a social group, its meaning is necessarily verbalized. This is the reason why theory of texts is a substantial part of CTL, which endeavours to analyse law as a set of communication processes.

Before dealing with the subject of this paper –the relationship between legal dogmatics and theory of texts- it would be helpful to explain some basic traits of CTL: the nominalistic thesis, the concepts "legal order", "legal system" and "legal ambit" (or "framework") and their relationships, and the idea of law as text.

2. The nominalist thesis.

For CTL "law" has not a factual existence. "Law" is only a nomen whose reference is a plurality of legal ambits: those ambits which existed in the past, do exist today and probably will exist in the future.

Books of legal philosophy and legal dogmatics often begin by proposing a definition of the concept of law which is supposed to be universally valid. The fact is, however, that there is up to now no agreement on a particular definition. That is the reason why sometimes jurists are held up to ridicule for their lack of capability to settle in a definition. Here are some examples: "noch suchen die Juristen eine Definition zu ihrem Begriff des Rechts" ("still are jurists looking for a definition of their concept of law") (Kant)[3]; or "thousands of words have been written on the concept of law, without having found a definition which satisfies us all" (De Castro y Bravo)[4]. In fact, a very thick book with many pages could be written, full of law definitions proposed by the most outstanding jurists in history. This perplexing situation shows very clearly how "law" is a word suggesting so many things that it becomes impossible to reduce it to a shorter concept. Several notions of law have come as a consequence of diverse philosophical or ideological conceptions, each one drafted as the only representative of the definitive truth.

CTL does not defend a strong ontological thesis. It states that law only becomes meaningful through language and, consequently, CTL leans on the use of language as departing point for its analysis.

3. Legal order, legal system, legal ambit.

It is convenient to distinguish between these three concepts: legal order, legal system and legal ambit. These three realities are cross-connected. Even so, a system only exists in highly educated societies.

A legal order is a global text composed by a set of partial texts with normative character and binding effects within a particular society, at a given moment.

Imagine we visit a library containing all the legislation currently in force in a state nowadays, e.g. Spain. We will have the following texts there: the Spanish constitution, the various codes and statutes, the rules of the public administration (regulations and so on), the international treaties signed by the Spanish government, judgements –specially Supreme Court's and Constitutional Court's case-law, etc. We could accede to these texts and their updates since they are data-based. It will be an ever-changing texts-complex due to constant promulgation of laws, continued normative creation by the public administration and courts' everyday decision-making. This legal database demands daily updating so we can say at the end of each day: "Here we have all current Spanish law".

This "textual totality" –the legal order- presents some problems to be previously solved, in order to make it applicable to each case. These multiplicities of texts, which are integral part of that totality, were enacted by different authorities with not always coinciding points of view. For this reason, texts usually have gaps, contradictions, ambiguities, imperfections, strange concepts (at least for the layman) and often mysterious expressions. This situation requires doctrinal work, which makes possible to solve the above-mentioned problems and build a coherent legal system. On the one hand, legal system reflects legal order; on the other, legal system completes legal order. A legal system can be described as the best version of a legal order, its wisest version.

Inside legal dogmatics authors frequently disagree. Their opinions often differ, as it also happens in other social sciences. Disagreement pervades political economy, sociology, anthropology and psychology. Jurists, as opposed to economists and other social scientists, have "institutionalised" a way to determine which doctrinal opinions constitute a legal system. This is what classical authors called "common opinion" or "dominant opinion". Between legal order and legal system exists a nowadays very complex hermeneutic relationship.

Legal order and legal system represent two "textual totalities". Both are composed by partial texts, each of them acquiring its own meaning connected to the respective "textual totality". When reading any statute or judgement, we say: "these texts belong to the legal order". In the same way, when reading any treatise on commercial or criminal law, we state: "these texts belong to the legal system", or at least: "these texts aim to be a part of the legal system".

However, the idea of law as text applies also to other aspects of legal praxis. There are texts which are "juridical" but they belong neither to the legal order nor to the legal system; e.g., a legal report, a lawsuit, a criminal indictment, a legal counselling; on the other side there are texts, like bills, parliamentary debates, negotiations previous to the signature of an international treaty, and so on. All these texts and many others are a part neither of the legal order nor of the legal system. Nevertheless, they shape together the legal ambit. There is the Spanish legal ambit, the Brazilian legal ambit, the International legal ambit, the legal ambit of the European Union, etc. Every legal order implies a legal ambit, which is a kind of virtual framework. It is not equivalent to a physical space, although the latter is an element to be considered.

In modern legal world, the axis of each legal ambit is the duality "order-system" (ORD/SYS). However, there are ambits without system: primitive legal orders are legal ambits with no legal system, because a primitive community has no written law. In connection with this axis there are other communication processes that come or can be conveyed in texts. A legal ambit is composed of the axis ORD/SYS and the rest of related communicational processes. It also comprehends all legally meaningful actions. It can be said that a crime belongs to the legal ambit as long as some physical and psychological movements can be "read" through the axis ORD/SYS.

4. Law as text: legal texts.

From above we can infer one of the basic theses of CTL: Law is language, i.e. text. CTL's starting point is legal language, legal texts. The use of "is" in the phrase "law is language", does not imply a strong ontological thesis. CTL does not focus on the essence of law, which can be seen as the concept of law definition problem. CTL is not interested in finding out the essence of law. Its own perspective is based on communication, that is, on the language or texts where law comes to expression.

Legal language is the specific jargon of jurists and a part of ordinary language at the same time. This double character does not show up in other professional jargons. This is because, besides being an object of study and of practical application for jurists, law is also a part of ordinary human live. Law is the formalization of social life.

There are different types of text: descriptive, narrative, emotive, persuasive, interrogative, directive, regulative texts and so on. A descriptive text shows reality as it is. A narrative text aims to tell a story, true or not: in the first case we have a historical text, in the second case, a fictional text. Emotive texts transmit feelings to the reader; that is the case of poetry. The basic function of a persuasive text is to convince other people. That is the case of political language and also of lawyers' language, especially when they appear before the bench. The objective of an interrogative text is to raise a question or a problem. Directive texts are oriented to rule human behaviour. These texts can be grouped under several types: commands, advices, petitions, threats, promises, etc. Regulative or normative texts fall within the category of directive texts: moral and religious norms, social norms (social patterns), rules of games and legal norms. A theory of texts deals with the study of the diverse types of texts as well as their mutual relations. For instance, a legal text may have, besides its directive function, a persuasive and an emotive aspect.

5. Legal dogmatics: its relation to medical and to theological dogmatics.

The word "dogmatics" and its derivatives (dogma, dogmatic, dogmatism and so on) appeared in Ancient Greek medical literature[5]. A medical dogma is a true proposition coming from experience obtained in a lot of similar cases, that is, by induction. Its first meaning was therefore "a proposition referred to facts", that is, a true empirical proposition. In time these words were applied in the realms of jurisprudence and theology.

Theological dogmatics takes the Holy Scriptures as its field of work. Its goal is to explain clear and systematically the meaning of the different books of the Bible. Theological dogmatics is a hermeneutic discipline or science, because it reaches its aim through interpretation of sacred texts. These texts have been written by revelation, what makes them intangible to the interpreter, who may comment on them but not cause any change.

Jurists' approach to legal texts is similar to that of the theologian to sacred texts. Jurists may not change the legal text, they may only comment, systematize, clarify or complete it according to its proper spirit.

It is necessary to add that theologians and jurists, in their respective hermeneutic works, should not limit themselves to explain texts in abstracto. They are expected to make texts understandable and applicable to current circumstances. In theology, like in legal doctrine, a constant outcomes updating becomes a need.

Still, there are very relevant differences between theology and jurisprudence:

A) The object of Theology is a set of fixed texts : the Bible is a closed text: it begins with Genesis and ends with Apocalypse. In contrast, the object of jurisprudence is always an open and ever-changing text. Statutes are constantly created and modified. Court decisions increase in a daily base and are often modified.

B) In order to do Theology, theologian's faith is a must. A theologian who does not believe in God is an oxymoron: he would not be a true theologian but a literary commentator or critic, an anthropologist of religion, a restless spirit, or something similar. In contrast, lawyers do not need this internal engagement.

6. The communicational relationship between legal order and legal system.

It is easy to answer the question, what the texts of a legal order are: constitution, statutes, regulations, judgements, etc., as they appear in official bulletins. On the other side we have legal doctrine. Libraries are packed with all these contents: treatises, studies, reviews where articles about all subjects can be found. Now the question is: how can we pick from such a big repository of legal resources that one which is the relevant one in order to determine the content of the legal system in a particular moment? This is a hard task. It is necessary to adopt certain criteria that make it feasible. A legal system is built out of pieces that have their own tradition. This is why it is possible to distinguish between a system of constitutional law, civil law, criminal law, commercial law, etc. The whole legal system is the result of putting together all these partial systems or subsystems.

Inside each of these subsystems we face the same problem anyway: How can we know which doctrinal opinion establishes the subsystem's content? And, which opinions from what authors with auctoritas are the decisive ones? In each legal ambit this problem will be solved to a greater or lesser accurate way. For instance, this is what happened to Roman jurisprudence during a certain period of its history, when there was a group of jurists who had the ius respondendi. In current law, the common or dominant opinion among authors can be shown through the highest courts' decisions analyse. It is necessary to research each legal branch's specific doctrines applied by judges. This is a hard but perfectly possible task to undertake, as the permanent release of doctrinal books proves.

The idea of a legal system is also a kind of fiction. We wouldn't find a whole consistent legal system in a law library's shelves. Strictly speaking, a consistent legal system is unlikely to be found anywhere. This is a regulative idea whose function is to show how legal ambits work, and what are the textual relationships existing between their various elements.

Judges rarely mention authors whose doctrines they apply. They usually reproduce doctrinal arguments without quotation. They do not use legal doctrine in an abstract way, rather adjusting doctrine to the case they must decide on. The main difference between a mere doctrinal text (i.e., a text of legal dogmatics) and a judgement's text is this: a doctrinal text treats cases in a generic fashion, while in a judicial text a case is considered in itself. In legal dogmatics, cases are weighted up in general, as a hermeneutic "horizon" that allows interpreter to connect the legal text to any possible real-life cases. In a judicial decision this "horizon" is "the case". However, sentence's reasoning usually contains some general linguistic expressions, whose meaning can be applied to similar cases. Judicial reasoning, although focused on a concrete case, develops in the form of abstract expressions, in order to apply to similar cases.

An accurate research of the reasoning and of the corresponding legal doctrines appearing as judgements' content will show whose are the doctrines judges think of when justifying their decisions.

7. Functions of legal dogmatics: Legal dogmatics works by interpreting, criticizing and posing proposals.

A view on the best treatises of legal dogmatics shows immediately the functions this kind of legal texts accomplish. Their first function is the one of constructing the legal system. This only comes from an interpretation of the "legal matter" (i.e., the "brute text" of the legal order). Dogmatics, as a hermeneutic discipline, aims primarily to build a system able to reflect a legal order. This function undoubtedly helps legal practice. How could lawyers give a piece of advice to clients, produce documents and gain judges's confidence? Obviously they read first the relevant statutes and case-law, but that will not be enough; they need to deepen authors´ doctrine books. Otherwise they will undergo a scant and defective legal knowledge.

Presentation of the legal system is just one of the functions legal dogmatics carries out. It is also supposed to provide for a scientific critique of valid law and consequently to set out new proposals for legislative improvement. Besides the basic function of legal dogmatics (constructing the system through interpretation and systematization), legal dogmatics accomplishes two supplementary functions: first, as critique of legislation currently in force, and second, as proposal for law enhancement.

Legal dogmatics cannot change legal order texts by itself; this is a law-makers task. But legal dogmatics not only presents a reasonable interpretation of the existing law. Starting by the establishment of valid law, legal dogmatics is in the best condition to open debate on current legal institutions' functionality and their regulation. In order to change them, comparative research and sociological knowledge will be helpful too.

8. Inter-textual relationship between legal order and legal system.

As we know, legal system reflects, completes and perfects legal order at the same time. Not only it explains what is written in legal order texts, but also defines legal-dogmatic concepts, solves interpretive doubts, clarifies ambiguities, dissolves contradictions and overlaps, makes implicit rules explicit, and presents the outcome of all these operations in systematically organized texts.

As already said, legal system becomes the best version of legal order. But there is also a feedback phenomenon. Knowledge produced into the system returns to the legal order under the form of new statutes and/or more recent case-law. System is therefore a new starting point to improve and transform legal order's text. The elaborated text of the system becomes the basis of future legal order texts (the future "brute text"). This continuous feedback evolves and generates a "hermeneutic spiral", where new regulatory texts are born. The duality ORD/SYS shows itself as a very dynamic dialogical textual reality.

9. Legal dogmatics and sociology of law[6].

Legal dogmatics can be cultivated either in an open or in a closed way. It is frequently stated that so-called "conceptual jurisprudence" (Begriffsjurisprudenz) stood out as an extremely formalistic method, oriented only to legal concepts discovery. From these legal concepts it could be inferred rules of law through deductive reasoning. Instead of this "closed" dogmatics, the "second Jhering"[7] proposed a new model: the "interests jurisprudence" (Interessenjurisprudenz), that is, a new way of legal science: a science opened to research of the diverse (individual and collective) interests that can be found in every society. These two positions caused a debate on which kind of legal dogmatics is to be developed.

Pure Theory of Law was on the first group's top: its very name conveys how legal science needs to be purified of all extralegal (i.e., empirical and ideological) elements[8]. It is necessary to underline, however, that pure theory of law is only –its only aim is to be- a formal theory of law, that is, a theory of the formal concepts and structures of legal phenomenon. This is the reason why Pure Theory of Law cannot be considered as a theory of legal dogmatics.

Secondly, we find the idea of substituting sociology of law for legal dogmatics. This is the case of founder of legal sociology Eugen Ehrlich's writings[9]. Ehrlich understands jurisprudence not as real science, but as "art" (Kunst). According to his view, a real science should research facts. Legal dogmatics does not research facts, being instead a text-interpreting discipline. Theodor Geiger holds a similar position: his aim was to replace the general theory of law with a legal sociology[10].

I think that legal dogmatics can –and ought to- be a discipline open to empirical knowledge, that is: open to sociology, psychology, anthropology, economics, and all the factual sciences in general; in sum, it must be open to the so called social sciences. This does not mean, however, that legal dogmatics should give up its traditional style, which is interpretive, conceptualistic and systematic. This means it may incorporate extra-legal knowledge. In this fashion the above-mentioned social disciplines are to be considered as auxiliary, never as a substitute for legal dogmatics [11].

The Communicational Theory of Law (CTL) and the Language of Jurists

Aurelio de Prada García[1]

Abstract: Taking into account that the Communicational Theory of Law, defended by Prof. Robles, is presented as an analysis of the language of jurists, we will focus on the position of this theory within the secular dispute about the nature of legal language. Should it be a specialized language or a common language, the language of common people, so to speak? In order to achieve that goal, we will carefully analyse the concept of jurist, and therefore, the concept of Law, which the Communicational Theory of Law defends to draw the appropriate conclusions.

Keywords: Communicational Theory of Law (CTL), language, jurist and citizen.

"Legal language is the language of jurists."

"Leges ab omnibus intellegi debent."

1. Introduction.

One of the most interesting contributions to Law Theory in the last years has been the proposal of a "Communicational Theory of Law" by Spanish Prof. G. Robles, who has been drawing its guidelines with remarkable effort and rigour both in successive publications[2] and his inaugural address to the Spanish Royal Academy of Ethics and Political Sciences, titled Comunicación, Lenguaje y Derecho. Algunas ideas básicas de la Teoría comunicacional del Derecho[3].

Within those guidelines, undoubtedly the consideration of Law as language - "Law is language"-, as stated in his own words[4], stands out. However, this does not imply "the defense of a strong ontological thesis, but only that the way Law appears, in any of its modalities, is precisely language[5]. This remark does not end here, because the language that Law is, - the legal/ juridical language - becomes very special, according to the author, since "even though it belongs to the common language, to the language of the common people, it is at the same time the specialized language of a professional class, that of jurists" [6].

Moreover, - and this would complete this guideline-, jurists play a decisive part in the formation of legal language given that, according to our author, "as regards our culture, the words of the Law are mostly creatures of that professional class" so that " … it is perfectly right to state that legal language is the language of jurists"[7].

By making this statement –essential to his Communicational Theory of Law (CTL) conceived therefore as an "analysis of the language of jurists" [8] - Prof. Robles takes sides in a central dispute whose origins can be situated at the very beginning of Law, as it is known in Western culture. It is the dispute dealing with the features of legal language: Should it be a specialized language or a common language, the language of common people, so to speak, or should we adopt an in-between position?

Having said this, with the inclusion of one of the guidelines of the CTL in the dispute about legal language, it seems convenient to analyse this thesis in greater detail, within this dispute. Therefore, we will firstly sketch a short synopsis of that dispute; then, we will briefly expose the main points of the CTL. Finally, we will draw the appropriate conclusions.

2. A brief historical approach.

Of course, there is apparently no discussion as to when the dispute about legal language arose: at the very origins of Law, as known in Western culture. Not only is it agreed that the profession of jurists - related to the priestly function at the beginning – is one of the most ancient ones, as pointed out by Prof. Robles[9], but also, that Law itself appears with the distinction between jurists and laymen, between those who make use of a specialized language and those who do not[10].

In fact, at the very beginning, laws were considered to be revelations of God's will, or quasi-prayers that should be recited literally and at the right moment to be effective, to such an extent that any change made them completely useless[11]. The knowledge of these sacred formulas, of these prayers, was not general but monopolized, so to speak, by "pontifices" recruited amongst the most important patricians already at the very beginning of Roman law. Thus, the first jurists were priests, people with a special authority, with a specialised language, the juridical one that, therefore, appears as a "jurists' language" which is not accessible to common people.

However, as it is common knowledge, this conception of Law changes with the Twelve Tables in the 5th century BC. Law is no longer considered as unchangeable and divine, but as a human creation. Formerly conceived as a part of religion and, therefore as a property of the sacred families, it turned into a common heritage of all citizens[12]..

As a matter of fact, the juridical language, used by the "jurists-priests" at the very beginning, became part of "common language", as stated by our author: A language all people could "read and speak", but not in full, because the calendar of the judicial actions and the technical rules of legal procedure, i.e., the forms containing the words which had to be spoken in court to begin a legal action, were kept secret by the patricians and the "pontiffs" so that they could maintain their advantage over the plebeians.

These forms were still a part of a specialised language, the jurists' language, which was not accessible to laymen until around 300 B.C., when Cneus Flavius made them public, as shown in the Digest[13]. A fact that, understandably, the priests-jurists did not appreciate at all[14].

Leaving this resistance aside, even though it was strong, the publication of the calendar and the technical rules did not involve a substantial change, as the new jurists were still patricians, and kept making use of a technical, specialised language when interpreting the ius honorarium. This made those who were even able to read and write feel illiterate, to such an extent that they needed a notary (notarius) to draw up a contract or any other public document…[15]

In the classical period of Roman law, the function of jurists as producers and holders of juridical language became stronger because the answers of those jurists authorized by the Emperors (ius respondendi ex auctoritate principis) were the main source of Law from the first century B.C. to the middle of the 3rd century. These answers were binding for judges and were just recited in trials by other jurists. This is another change in the conception of Law and, once more, the constitution of a hierarchy of priests-jurists, as in Ancient Rome. It is not surprising that Ulpian then defined jurisprudence as the knowledge of divine and human things (divinarum atque humanarum rerum notitia), and jurists as priests of justice, as appears in the Digest[16].

The actual change in the juridical language, conceived once again as a part of "common language", takes place with the fall of the Western Roman Empire and the absence of any centralized power. These circumstances, along with the influence of the so called barbarian peoples, gave birth, during the upper Middle Ages, to a model of Law excluding both a specialized language and the role of jurists. Law emerged from the community through a spontaneous process –by means of custom- and became immediately accessible to everyone, as it was present in the commonly used language[17].

But, as it is well known, the disappearance of the jurist, as shaped by the Roman model and the transformation of the juridical language into a part of the common language was not definitive for Western culture. The discovery of the Digest in the 11th century and the renovation of Roman law meant the creation of the jurist profession, as it is presently known. The professionalization of an activity that, as just mentioned, did not require any special knowledge or dedication; from then on, demanded "learned/lawyers", as Law was not just technically complex but also written in Latin, a learned language. In this context, the juridical language became once again a specialized language for jurists, unavailable to laymen.

This new profession demanded social recognition at once, based upon Ulpian's approach, which defined jurists as priests of justice and was subscribed by the most important jurists of the 12th century, such as Azo. According to him, doctors in Law should be included among the highest dignities, "as they played the role of priests"[18] . A new type of social status gave birth to the militia legum, which joined the two previous ones, the militia armata of the knights and the militia inermis or celestis of the priests. This new militia spread very soon to the field of the arts subjects (militia litterata or doctrinale or doctoralis).

Endowed with privileges, as appears in the "Partidas"[19] , this new nobility became very soon hereditary. One of its most impressive examples is Charles Louis de Secondat, the father of the theory of the separation of Powers, along with John Locke; his uncle actually bequeathed him the office of "Président à Mortier" in the Bordeaux Parliament, provided he adopted his surname, Montesquieu, with which he went down in history[20].

But logically enough, this new transformation of the juridical language into a jurists' language, not accessible to laymen, generated early reactions and so, the detachment of juridical language from the common language, the ever-growing complexity of the laws and the return to formalism, which involved the renovation of Roman Law, became a common target of criticism in the 16th and 17th century literature:

> "King Ferdinand, sending colonies to the Indies, wisely provided that they should not carry along with them any students of jurisprudence, for fear lest suits should get footing in that new world, as being a science in its own nature, breeder of altercation and division; judging with Plato, "that lawyers and physicians are bad institutions of a country."

Whence does it come to pass that our common language, so easy for all other uses, becomes obscure and unintelligible in wills and contracts? and that he who so clearly expresses himself in whatever else he speaks or writes, cannot find in these any way of declaring himself that does not fall into doubt and contradiction? if it be not that the princes of that art, applying themselves with a peculiar attention to cull out portentous words and to contrive artificial sentences, have so weighed every syllable, and so thoroughly sifted every sort of quirking connection that they are now confounded and entangled in the infinity of figures and minute divisions, and can no more fall within any rule or prescription, nor any certain intelligence

"Confusum est, quidquid usque in pulverem sectum est."

As you see children trying to bring a mass of quicksilver to a certain number of parts, the more they press and work it and endeavour to reduce it to their own will, the more they irritate the liberty of this generous metal; it evades their endeavour and sprinkles itself into so many separate bodies as frustrate all reckoning; so is it here, for in subdividing these subtilities we teach men to increase their doubts; they put us into a way of extending and diversifying difficulties, and lengthen and disperse them. In sowing and retailing questions they make the world fructify and increase in uncertainties and disputes, as the earth is made fertile by being crumbled and dug deep.

"Difficultatem facit doctrina."

We doubted of Ulpian, and are still now more perplexed with Bartolus and Baldus. We should efface the trace of this innumerable diversity of opinions; not adorn ourselves with it, and fill posterity with crotchets." [21]

Moreover, the desire of a world without jurists and working with very few, easy to understand laws became explicit at that very moment, as can be seen in one of the most famous descriptions of the Utopians' customs:

[21] MONTAIGNE: Of Experience, in Essays, Vol. III, XIII,. Project Gutenberg's The Essays of Montaigne, Complete, by Michel de Montaigne.

> 'They have but few laws, and such is their constitution that they need not many. They very much condemn other nations whose laws, together with the commentaries on them, swell up to so many volumes; for they think it an unreasonable thing to oblige men to obey a body of laws that are both of such a bulk, and so dark as not to be read and understood by every one of the subjects.
> 'They have no lawyers among them, for they consider them as a sort of people whose profession it is to disguise matters and to wrest the laws, and, therefore, they think it is much better that every man should plead his own cause, and trust it to the judge, as in other places the client trusts it to a counsellor; by this means they both cut off many delays and find out truth more certainly; for after the parties have laid open the merits of the cause, without those artifices which lawyers are apt to suggest, the judge examines the whole matter, and supports the simplicity of such well-meaning persons, whom otherwise crafty men would be sure to run down; and thus they avoid those evils which appear very remarkably among all those nations that labor under a vast load of laws. Every one of them is skilled in their law; for, as it is a very short study, so the plainest meaning of which words are capable is always the sense of their laws; and they argue thus: all laws are promulgated for this end, that every man may know his duty; and, therefore, the plainest and most obvious sense of the words is that which ought to be put upon them, since a more refined exposition cannot be easily comprehended, and would only serve to make the laws become useless to the greater part of mankind, and especially to those who need most the direction of them; for it is all one not to make a law at all or to couch it in such terms that, without a quick apprehension and much study, a man cannot find out the true meaning of it, since the generality of mankind are both so dull, and so much employed in their several trades, that they have neither the leisure nor the capacity requisite for such an inquiry." [22]

This "utopic" ideal, as never so clearly expressed, was accepted in one way or another by the French Revolution in 1793 with the closing of the Law faculties, the places where jurists were formed[23]. A fact proving to be perfectly coherent with the denial of the old incomprehensible jurists' language by the revolutionaries and the clear desire the new laws to be made in an intelligible way, as Mirabeau stated[24]. All this was in fact present in the two first projects of the Code Civil and in the Declaration des Droits, aimed to be clear and easy to understand[25].

But this intention did not last much, as it is well known, because the third Project of Code shows a return to Jurisprudence and Roman law, whereas the fourth Project, enforced as a law later on , left aside the idea of an easy and understandable Code and came back to the former priest-jurist conception, and therefore to that of juridical language as the jurists' language, as can be seen in the famous Discours Préliminaire by Portalis[26].

As a matter of fact, the Law faculties, "les séminaires de la magistrature", so to speak, were reestablished in 1804, the same year when the publication of the Code Napoleon took place[27]. This fact seems to be definitive because, - as far as we know and leaving aside sporadic revolts, such as the famous "Pas d'avocats" during the Paris Commune [28] or the revolt against formalism with the Free Law Movement-, there have not been any other petitions intended to close Law faculties. In brief, we have to conclude that the dispute dealing with the features of legal language has come to an end, at least up to the present, with the triumph of the conception of juridical language as jurists' language.

3. The communicational theory of Law TCL and the language of the jurists.

After this brief historical approach to the dispute about the features of legal language we have just developed, and with the help of the conclusion we have drawn, it is time to analyze the main thesis of the TCL and to relate them to that dispute. This is something we have started before. As mentioned above one of the guidelines of the TCL defended by Prof. Robles is the consideration of Law as a language.

In relation to this, you will remember the following steps in that guideline of the TCL. The first one was precisely the consideration of Law as language. The second was to point out the specialty of that language as "even though it belongs to common language, to laymen's language, it is at the same time the specialized language of a professional class, that of jurists". Finally the author qualifies this specialty of legal language to such an extent that he makes it even contradictory by saying "as regards our culture, the words of Law are mostly creatures of that professional class" so that " … it is perfectly right to state that legal language is the jurists´ language".

Given the above, we have to conclude that the TCL supports the main conclusion of the dispute regarding the features of legal language: legal language is the language of jurists, but Prof. Robles does it in a quasi-contradictory way by saying that said language is created by the jurists and that at the same time it belongs to common language; in other words to the language of laymen. So we have to analyze whether this statement is contradictory or not taking into account the author's own words.

A first argument in order to conclude that the TCL is not contradictory at this point would be to consider those statements in which the author states that legal language is used by citizens or by the common people in daily life. This is something the author states very often but it cannot be considered as a strong, definitive argument, as it does not take into account the very fact that, according to prof. Robles, legal language is created by jurists and so, strictly speaking, it does not belong to common language, even though common people incorporate that language to their every day life.

A second argument would be to consider that, according to prof. Robles, jurists and citizens are not as different as one could think at first glance. Actually in Robles' opinion common people become jurists when drawing up a contract or any other public document and so forth. Once again we cannot consider this argument as a definitive. Even though citizens become jurists when acting in a legal way, they are not jurists strictly speaking, i.e, creators of legal language to quote our author once again.

Moreover, Prof. Robles makes a distinction among jurists, strictu sensu, in which citizens are not included. In fact he speaks about three different kinds of jurists. First the creators, so to speak, the ones that create the legal texts that constitute Law, the legal order; then, the appliers, those that apply the legal texts to the concrete cases; finally, the theorists, the ones that do not create legal texts and do not apply those texts to concrete cases, but think about the laws, about the legal system and try to expose it under the systematic form of a "hermeneutic science".

Due to the above, we would have to conclude that the TCL is contradictory at this point because the statement that legal language is created by jurists is not consistent with the statement that it belongs to laymen's language. But this conclusion is really too hasty since we are not taking into account the main function that Prof. Robles attributes to the third kind of jurists, the theorists which is to make the juridical practice easier by building a well-made legal language.

Not many words are needed to explain that with this statement the TCL comes very close to the second statement we have quoted at the very beginning of these pages; Leges ab omnibus intellegi debent "Laws must be understood by everyone". And really if the theorist- jurists have as their main function to make the juridical practice easier they must make legal language as close as possible to common language. They must build a legal language understandable to laymen, even though Prof. Robles, as far as we know, has not developed his theory to this end.

4.-To sum up: A well-made legal language.

After all we have seen up to this point, we can conclude that TCL, one of the most interesting contributions to Law Theory in the last few years, is not contradictory in regards to the consideration of legal language as both jurists' language and common people's language. Furthermore, one should take into account that TCL is not only descriptive but prescriptive. It aims at developing a well-made legal language, that is to say, to make all the communicative processes of Law easier and, therefore, to make them perfectly understandable to laymen.

Things being so the TCL would be placed in a very peculiar and original position in relation to the dispute about the features of legal language. In fact it would be in an in-between position: legal language is both jurists' language and common people's language. We really hope Prof. Robles develops this point in his future works.

Intertextuality among legal subsystems: the Brazilian tax experience on "revenue", "tax" and "inputs"

Cecilia Priscila de Souza
Fernando Gomes Favacho[1]

Abstract: This paper deals with law "as a text" and, therefore, impossible to be detached from its context. It includes the definition of legal concepts, and how to establish criteria for the use of such concepts when conflicts occur among them. It presents the study of "intertextuality" as a facilitator of legal interpretation, establishing the textual and contextual boundaries of normative discourse in conflict resolution. Given these assumptions, we apply the study of intertextuality in known controversies on the definition of three concepts in Brazilian tax law, namely, "revenue", "tax" and "inputs". This text is a study on the dialogue among different subsystems of the same legal system. To answer "what are inputs", for an example, tax attorneys who aim to use tax credits would say "if water is used in the making of a product, is undoubtedly an input". Some fiscal agents would say "inputs are only raw materials, intermediate products and packaging materials, as the legal tax regulation says"– and, with this thought, water could not be used as tax credit. This simple question reflects not only the aporia of a concept definition, but also the different values of society and its contingencies. It is imperative to discuss other issues, such as: Input to a tax shall have the same concept definition of another one? Who defines the concept of "input": the doctrine? The laws? The jurisprudence? A technical report? The legal concept may change according to social changes? Can it be detached from reality? The (non)technical writing of a law, and its longevity in the crossing of so many different legal systems could have changed the definition of the previous concept? These issues transcend the limits of Tax Law and reach the field of philosophy of language, with discussions on how they form communication processes and its failures (either because the participants do not share the same concepts - and to what extent these differences can be accepted in this language game, as taught by Robles).In this sense, in order to solve communicational conflicts, wondering if there is a way to define these concepts as to eliminate the issues related to vagueness and ambiguity, we begin to look into formal logic, but always considering empirical problems: as a process of formalization of knowledge, as taught by Barros Carvalho.

1. Introduction

What is input? Those who aim to use the credit coming from non-cumulative PIS and COFINS would say that the energy used in the making of a product is undoubtedly an input. Tax experts[2]would say that inputs are only the raw materials, intermediate product and packaging materials, as the Tax on Manufactured Products Regulation says. And, with this thought, energy costs could not be used to reduce the amount due as social security contributions. In a simple quest to answer the aporia of a concept definition, the society and its contingencies are reflected: its multi-value aspect.

We shall continue the quest: what is an input? What does the law (in the broad sense) say, or what is it to economy? Input to PIS/COFINS must have the same concept definition as to IPI? In law, who defines the concept of input? The doctrine? The laws? The jurisprudence? A technical report? The legal concept may change according to social changes? Can it be detached from reality? The (non)technical writing and its longevity in the crossing of so many different legal systems could have changed the definition of the previous concept? Is there a presupposed concept?

The scope of a term among users of legal communication and its interpretation in this field of knowledge are issues that transcend the limits of Tax Law and reach the field of Philosophy of Language, with discussions involving the formation of communication processes and its failures (considering that the participants do not share the same concepts and examining the extent to which these differences can be accepted). In this plan, we wonder if there is a way to define the concepts in order to eliminate the issues related to vagueness and ambiguity we begin to look into Formal Logic, but already considering empirical problems: as in a process of formalization and deformalization of knowledge to pursue the ideal for rigor and univocity.

With that, in the introduction we convey the first assumption/conclusion, namely: in order to solve questions involving communication noises, syntactic rules and semantic issues, we can use language technologies to approach the object of study.

This paper presents the study of intertextuality as a facilitator of legal interpretation, establishing the textual and contextual limitations of normative discourse in conflict resolution, in casu, in relation to tax activities.

At the beginning, we will deal with law as a text and, therefore, impossible to be detached from its context. We will also present intertextuality as an informant principle of interpretation, addressing the need for systemic interpretation before the partial. Later we will also address taxonomy and the definition of legal tax concepts, establishing the criteria for the use of the concepts when conflicts occur among definition standards. We will also explain the role of decisions and the relationship of concepts with the authority that defines them (doctrine, law and jurisprudence). Given such assumptions, we will apply the study of intertextuality in known controversies about the definition of three legal tax concepts, namely, revenue, tax and input. On a line, this paper is a study on the dialogue among different subsystems of the same legal system[3].

To address these issues, we will use the Communicational Theory of Law by Gregorio Robles, which alongside the Logical-Semantic Constructivism advocated by Lourival Vilanova and developed especially by Paulo de Barros Carvalho, presents an analytical-hermeneutic method, dealing with law as a text(limited to its context) and stressing the activity of creation of the world by the jurist, instead of giving a mere description.

[3]The work ahead is derived from the conversation between two texts produced in the academic sphere that, even with different objects, came from the same assumptions and methods: the Master's thesis of the Pontifical Catholic University of São Paulo:Definição do Conceito de Tributo(in a free translation: "Definition of the Concept of Tax"), by Fernando Gomes Favacho, and Intertextualidade no Direito Tributário(in a free translation: "Intertextuality in Tax Law"), by Cecilia Priscila de Souza.

1. Definition of legal concepts

1.1. The truth is not absolute

The concept of truth as a correspondence between knowledge and a thing goes back to ancient Greek thinkers. They believed that there was a "universal truth", in contrast to an apparent truth, an illusion. As they used to believe in an ideal being that was independent from the user, absolute truth was a redundancy to the paradigms at the time. For a sentence to be true, it should correspond to the truth. "True is the speech that says things as they are, false is the one that says things as they are not", argued Plato[4].

With the advent of the philosophy of language, we see a serious shift in thinking[5]. The truth becomes consensual, as there must be a prior consensus: any statement will only be true according to the rules of a system. To paraphrase Plato, in this new intellectual context, true is the speech that says things as they were agreed on; false is one that says things as they were not agreed on. "Strong ", unique and uncontroverted truths have no need for consensus. Determining the scope of any term depends on an agreement among the members of the community.

In the theory of knowledge, to say that the truth is absolute is to not admit the different existing systems, the different points of reference. The truth changes depending on the context, so it is only possible to think of something as "absolute ", in the sense of being timeless and non-territorial, if we adopt the philosophy of being, of Greek tradition. This is the vision of Flusser, when he says that language is reality[6] (footnote-work and page). As there are multiple languages, reality is relative – relative to each language, or relative according to each linguistic system. There is not a single reality for different languages, and there is not a single legal reality for the different legal contexts. Terms such as 'revenue ' or 'tax' may mean to Tax Law something that is very different from what they mean to Civil Law or Financial Law. Therefore, in order to expect a consensus on a particular concept, we first must establish the context to which it applies, the reality that we are talking about.

It is importantly to mention: in the case of law, the truth is an in-applicable value. The decisions of the Superior Courts, when they come from "what the law says", deal with the validity of the interpretations of the terms, and never the truth. To say that something is true or false is the role of the Legal Science, which describes its object (law).

1.2. Our reality is made out of language

In order to know we need to represent. To represent, we need language[7]. This representation through language shows that we do not exactly describe reality but we constitute it[8]: what is the raw data for us, other than what we know, that is, its representation, the linguistic cosmos? Hence, Vilém Flusser "language is the reality", because all we know is a representation made by language. Therefore, there is a need to understand language[9], which is our way to constitute (and de-constitute) the world.

The reality of law is like that. It only exists through language, but with a specific difference: legal language, competent under the rules of the normative system. There is no law outside of legal language, or, in the words of Paulo de Barros Carvalho[10], the legal reality > (...)is constructed by the language of positive law, taken here in its broadest meaning, that is, the set of prescriptive statements issued by Legislative Power, the Judiciary, the Administrative Power, and also by the private sector, the latter, indeed, the most fruitful and numerous, albeit with lower hierarchy than the other sources. Such statements articulated in the implicational form of normative structures, and organized in the superior system setting; they, again, form, create and propagate the legal reality.

Nothing exists without language, nor is there law without legal language. According to Clarice von Oertzen de Araújo[11], "language is included among the institutions resulting from life in society. Law is just [9] We clarify that language is the sum of language (set of signs) with speech (use and updateof the language). Language is the code,sign system that, by convention, has the same meaning for both the speaker and the recipient. Ferdinand de Saussure, Curso de lingüística general, p. 45-56.

one of the institutional social ways that is manifested through language, which enables and provides its existence".

To interpret is to build meaning from the contact with the object. It is to assign value. Language, as seen, is unremovable, since it participates in the constitution of the object: we build meaning through the use of language.

1.3. The difficulty in determining concepts

Natural language is marked by semantic problems caught in the concepts, either because they can represent multiple objects or because they not have a delimited meaning.

Luis Alberto Warat[12] discusses these two semantic problems: ambiguity and vagueness, present in the meaning we create when we get in touch with any linguistic sign. Such problems are what we call communication noise, and can confuse and hinder communication.

Ambiguity occurs when we do not know which of two or more meanings that we can build from the text is the best one to use in a given context. Vagueness, on the other hand, occurs due to an absence of parameters (conventions) for its denotation. There is ambiguity when we read the word "tax" because it can be connected to different meanings. Tax as a tax relationship? As a financial relationship? As money? And there is vagueness when using the word "tax", as it may denote various kinds of exactions. What tax? Duty? Fee? Contribution for improvement?

In Portuguese, as in all other non-formal languages, there is not a single word with only one meaning, particularly when used colloquially. Nor are there, without prior agreement, two or more words that mean exactly the same thing. We will just be able to find perfect synonyms in a totally artificial language, one that does not suffer the influence of pragmatic contexts: this is the case of formal logic.

Such communication noises always remain in informal languages, but may be decreased by a larger set of words, each of which adds up usage criteria and restrict the possibility of elements to be included. With the exception of Logic, there is no certainty of light and twilight in language.

Morris R. Cohen warns about extremely vague concepts, which "swallow their negatives", such as reality, experience, existence and the universe[13]. Examples in positive law are principles such as "justice" and "legalcertainty", values that are characteristically indefinable.

The uncertainty, thus, proceeds to give greater freedom to the interpretation of the user, revealing to be more permeable to the influence of ideologies. To Cohen, the efficiency of law depends on concepts that are more clearly defined, but that bring the curse of inappropriate and dangerous legalism[14]. Kaufmann thinks likewise: The indeterminate legal concepts leave a margin of free appreciation and offer the possibility of taking into account the particularities of the concrete case, but there is a risk of arbitrariness and legal uncertainty[15].

The possibility to give significance to terms, which could be obvious - and perhaps necessary for legal certainty - is inseparable from values. Therefore, we see a huge problem: the definition of concepts depends on indefinable entities. And, so, the problems persist, seeking points of reference to guide our interpretation.

In addition, there is the difficulty resulting from differences in definitions due to form and use: some for agreements on characteristics (the clock must have two to three pointers), and some for agreements on functions (the clock must show the time).

The major discussions on tax matters brought to the Superior Courts deal with disputes arising from the interpretation of the concepts used to create and, especially, to collect taxes. Such demands occur due to the different definitions that are assigned to concepts in the various branches of law, such as happens with tax law and private law in regard to the concepts of service, revenue, turnover, payroll, property, merchandise, and also within tax law, as recently occurred with the determination of the concept of input for the levy of PIS/COFINS, concept that is very different from the one used for IPI.

In tax matters, the regulation of intertextuality focuses only on conflicts generated by concepts, considering two different areas of law, in the same system[16], under Article 110 of the CTN[17], determining respect to the concepts of private law when these are constitutionally provided for.

[13]Morris R. Cohen, Concepts and Twilight Zones, p. 679.

[14]In the original: Hard and fast rules also depress social initiative and make legalism a curse. Ibidem, p. 683.

[15]Filosofia do Direito, p. 150.

The difficulty is in determining which concepts of private law are constitutionally determined for the attribution of tax powers and how this process takes place. This is what we will try to develop from this point on.

The term "definition" is seen here as a logical category: the understanding of the semantic aspect of a term occurs when we are able to include objects to this class (by criteria) and distinguish them from other objects (which do not have the required characteristics). Creating a name for a class, in this way of thinking, is similar to creating a definition.

The word becomes intelligible through other words existing in our collateral experience. To define an idea it is necessary to set the criteria for the use of the word that represent this idea. That is, initially have a word that represents a concept. Subsequently, we seek which words may be associated with that concept-word, thus defining the concept.

We can define a term in two ways: as we indicate the criteria for its use (connotative or intentional definition), or as we indicate the objects meant by the term (extensional or denotative definition)[18]. It is clear, therefore, the usefulness of studying the logic of classes for defining concepts. We see an example with our object of study: Article 3 of CTN says: "Tax is all compulsory pecuniary provision, in currency or whose value can be expressed in currency, and that does not constitute sanction of an unlawful act, established by law and charged due to administrative activity that is fully bound". It is a connotative definition. And Article 5 says: "taxes are duties, fees and contributions for improvement". It is a denotative definition. We will use the "connotative definition" in this work as a synonym for "concept definition".

[16] We state that law is a single system, whose division is presented with didactic purposes only. We do not intend to contradict this assertion, just to confirm it, since law is a single body of language, but, because it is prescriptive, it is regulated by deontic logic, submitting its proposals to the values of validity and invalidity and allowing, therefore, the presence of contradictions within it, which could not be conceived with the Science of Law.

[17] Article 110, CTN - The tax law cannot change the definition, the content and the scope of institutes, concepts and forms of private law, used, explicitly or implicitly, by the Constitution, the Constitutions of the States, or the Organic Laws of the District Federal or Municipalities, to define or limit taxing powers.

It is worth mentioning that the "clarification" concerning an expression also presents other terms that need to be interpreted, contextualized and understood, elucidations are limited, and this "pure" equivalence between explicandum and explicatum only exists in formal logic.

The term is a representation of its characteristics. This brings a certain practicality, as we do not have to present, at all times, such characteristics. But this substitution of the definiendum by the definiens has a price. It is precisely the impossibility to view, fully, all the details of the defining notes[19]. Tax, in a sense, will present characteristics that are different from the other possible meanings.

As in a molecule, the addition or removal of an atom makes it a totally different species. A different interpretation of the term "provision", "pecuniary", "compulsory" etc. may also differentiate a tax provision of an obligation without this note. So, in addition to not knowing when the word "tax" refers to the standard, to obligation, to pecuniary or to revenue, there are still terms like "compulsory", "that does not constitute sanction of an unlawful act" and "established by law", which are too controversial and need to be elucidated.

We observe that the 1988 Constitution has few legal tax concepts. Among them we find "non-cumulative" (Art. 155, § 2) and "duty" (Art. 145, § 1). The specifics of most terms have been left to the infra-constitutional legislator, under a tax sphere, the CTN (this is why it is seen as a "didactic" code). Of course, it is not because certain concepts are not defined that we cannot pass judgment on them - our collateral experience allows it to happen - but the more words that are used, the smaller is the twilight zone, as stated previously.

Finally, it is worth mentioning that it is not possible to say that meaning is in the text; law is only the physical support from which the interpretations of the hermeneutist will arise in contact with this support. Nor is it possible, therefore, to "extract the essence of the text", since the "spirit" of the text is not hidden in the paper marks. All subsumption is equivalent to the interpretation, which is equivalent to the translation. Law is never just applied, it is interpreted, translated. There is more than to it than a mere application: there is a creation.

2. Intertextuality among legal systems

2.1. The legal system creates its own reality(ies)

System is the set of elements that have one or more identifiable features in all of the elements and maintain a minimum of structural organization. To Tárek Moysés Moussallem: "the system (class - extension) exists when its elements (denotation) are propositions that fulfill the criterion of relevance stipulated by connotation,which, in turn, maintain relationships of subordination and coordination"[20].

Positive law is an autopoietic system[21]as it produces its own way of creation and organization, being autonomous in relation to the surrounding environment, that is, to other social systems, and does not accept the inclusion of schemes in a natural way, in a way that it cannot exert its force on these innovations.

There is no way to deny the communication established among the regulatory system and other social systems, since it is up to law the task of providing life in society, as it dictates the values that it considers necessary to individuals;however, we cannot state that this intersystemic intertextuality occurs indiscriminately, in a come and go of concepts and values, without rules or procedures.

In this paper we will deal with issues of intrasystemic intertextuality[22], that is, the conversation among subsystems of the same system.

With regard to its regulator aspect, law is monologic as it does not allow for the competition of any other form of control, always ensuring its own prevalence[23].

Although the various areas of law form a single reality, the peculiarities of each branch can define differently the meaning of the same word. 'Guilt' in Criminal Law is divided into 'malicious intent','conscious guilt ' and other categories necessary for the accurate dosimetry of the sentence. In Civil Law, there is no need for this differentiation. In Tax Law, the word 'property', for the incidence of property taxes, is not

[21]Vide Niklas Luhmann, Social Systems. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1995.

[22]There is also the intersystemic intertextuality understood by the conversation between the language of the legal system and other social systems, which, however, are related to law.

usually treated with the same rigor of Civil Law, which differentiates it from the terms 'possession', 'usufruct', etc.

2.2. Are there limits to interpretation?

The interpreter uses the text to build meaning contents. If the physical support presents problems that hinder this process, the possibility of two or more interpreters to have a fruitful discussion on the text becomes impossible, since each interpreter will establish very different assumptions for his/her reasoning.

To the interpreter, however, it is imposed constraint in the limits of what can be attributed to the concepts, limits that are imposed to ensure a minimum of consensus to enable a common code in the communication process. The teaching of Fabiana Del Padre Tomé[24] is fundamental in this matter:

> The logic-semantic constructivism does not allow for the conclusion that the interpreter has the freedom to assign to a particular word the meaning that s/he sees fit. Of course there is a stipulative freedom, but it is limited by the horizons of culture. Otherwise, we could not even mention the existence of ambiguity and vagueness in words, which are semantic difficulties that exist wherever there is language.

The limit for the creation of legal rules is established by the text itself, as well asserts Tárek Moysés Moussallem[25]:

> [...] positive law, through rules of structure, limits the activity of the interpreter/ applicator. This is why it is not any meaning that can be attributed to the words Federal Union, States, Municipalities, income, service, merchandise, tax, public employee and many other words. Otherwise, legal texts would not be worth anything.

It is up to law to establish the limits of this intertextuality, by issuing norms that determine how intertextuality can/should act in the legal system. The most common structure norm that expresses intertextuality in tax matters is the rules of jurisdiction. This limitation is stated in Article 110 of the CTN. The intertextuality norms should always be put in the legal game, this isa rule of paramount importance to the game and, as such, it could not be presented differently from the constitutional level.

Each branch of law is a part of the same whole, and receives a specific name to facilitate the analysis and application of legal texts, in accordance with the pretentions and the use made of them. Thus, some concepts may be used/defined in several of these branches, according to which each branch wants to regulate. It is essential, however, to reinforce the idea that all these "branches of law" form a single reality. What we need to focus on is the peculiarities of each branch, which influence, often in a different way, the attribution of meaning to the same concept.

Thus, for tax purposes, concepts that are already used in other areas of law may be used, whether in private law (civil, labor) or public law (administrative). And, in the opinion of Heleno Taveira Tôrres[26], > [...] when tax law does not state otherwise, the institutes, concepts and forms of the other branches of law will be preserved in their original characteristics.

This activity, however, operates in constant transformation, of pragmatic order, required by the evolutionary process that every organism is subjected to.

2.3. Concepts, intertextuality and the hierarchy of norms

As seen herein, normative texts present a constant relationship, as elements of the legal system. The way these relationships occur is what suffers variations. There are relationships among hierarchically arranged provisions, called subordination, as well as relationships that are held between diplomas of the same level, called coordination relationships, because the inferior norms are meant to give positivity to superior norms, and the more shallow their level is, the greater is the degree of concreteness that the norm will make use of,in a way that the inferior rule will always be more precise than the superior rule.

Disputes like this are a part of everyday law, as well emphasizes

Tácio Lacerda Gama[27]:

> [...]the relationship between tax authorities and taxpayers, the doubts concerning the incidence of tax rules, often are resolved by infra-legal acts - regulations, ordinances, interpretation acts– that turn positive the more analytical meaning of the text, if compared to the meaning posed in a synthetic form by law. Hence, this is why it is intuitive the notion that the infra-legal act assigns meaning to law in the same way that law assigns meaning to the Constitution.

As a consequence of the amplitude that is inherent to constitutional norms, often it is not possible to readily determine which concepts were defined and which are part of the constitutional definition.

There will always exist, however, this dialogue among the norms of the various hierarchical levels, a relationship that is possible and inherent to legal language, which does not allow us to conclude, in any way, that in establishing such relationships, with the justification of granting precision and concreteness to superior norms, the inferior norms change their content. That is because we know that infra-constitutional norms cannot change the meaning and scope of those placed in the Constitution as the rule of the arrangement game demand obedience to the hierarchy of norms, in accordance with its content, and the vehicle that introduces it to the system, the formal and material criteria, respectively, provide valid grounds for its creation.

2.4. What is intertextuality after all?

Intertextuality is a concept originating from Linguistics, whose adaptation is promoted in various communication systems, which is the case with law. This is intertextuality: fixing concepts, as they are incorporated into the linguistic system.

In this way, José Luiz Fiorin adds: "the real is presented to us semiotically, which implies that our discourse does not relate directly to things, but with other discourses that semiotize the world. This relationship among discourses is the dialogism"[28].

The construction of a text will always be the consequence of several other texts, so dialogism is presented between discourses, even if the speaker is the same in both texts. It is important to mention that in law this overlap of texts is limited by the system itself, as it is established, for example, in the rule of Article 110 of the CTN.

Intertextuality is equivalent to dialogism[29], which is the exchange of statements between discourses, between utterances between the self and the other.

Intertextuality can act in the production of texts in several respects: (i) in the context, (ii) regarding to voices, and (iii) in communication. Regarding the context (i), there is dialogism among the current text, the one that is being produced,and its predecessors, which contribute to the production of utterances, and they are competitors or are in dissonance. In this aspect, dialogism is equivalent to a scientific research, one in which the researcher seeks for already prepared material on his/her object of study, and from which s/he will build his/her positive and negative judgments, and adds this new knowledge to the prior knowledge, producing a new text on the subject. A Master's thesis is great example of this kind of dialogism.

Clarice von Oertzen de Araújo addresses other issues on dialogism in legal language, stating that

> The monologic aspect (verify) of normative language is in its prescriptive function as a form of regulating conducts. With regard to its regulator aspect,law is monologic as it does not allow competition of any other form of control, always ensuring its own prevalence[30].

As seen previously, intertextuality is presented in two ways: (i) among texts produced within the legal system and (ii) among texts of the legal system and other social systems.

The classification presented follows the pattern proposed by Paulo de Barros Carvalho:

> [...]intertextuality in lawis presented in two levels that are very characteristic: (i) the strictly legal level; which is established among the various branches of the system [...] and (ii) the one called legal in a broad sense, [29]The concept of intertextuality was developed from the work of Bakhtin. In his writings, however, there is not one mention of the term, making the scholars studying his theory have chosen to equate the concepts of dialogism and intertextuality. See José Luiz Fiorin. Interdiscursividade e intertextualidade. In: Bakhtin - outros conceitos-chave.

> encompassing all sectors that have law as the object, but consider it under an external angle, that is, in relation to other cognizant proposals.[31]

It is up to law to establish the limits of intertextuality, by issuing rules determining how intertextuality can/should act in the legal system.

2.5.The limitations of culture

Among the concepts that are worked in Semiotics, we will take the collateral experience, the prior intimacy with that which the sign denotes and that is contained in our culture. It is the area of intersection between the already known and what can be known. Without the minimal collateral experience it is not possible to produce meaning[32], because the understanding of the message assumes a series of such associations (common code). Therefore, every time a sign triggers in us the production of meaning, we interpret it according to our context.

The use of a term by the legal community depends upon the concept definition of other terms related to it. Therefore, there is no text that does not suffer influence of context. Even in an equation that seems basic to us, such as "1 + 1", in a binary context is not equal to 10 and not 2. And in this sense, Arthur Kaufmann teaches: "Only from the perspective of aggravated robbery can we use the hypothesis of hydrochloric acid as a "weapon"[33].

Knowledge of the data is language,and depends on the repertoire of the knowing subject. The greater the knowledge is, the more language can be produced on the data, and more complex and detailed the fact will be.

The representation depends on the knowing subject, his/her impressions of the event, which means to say that there is no real truth, what we have are points of view on the same object.

This translation depends on two linguistic bodies: the one for social language and the one for legal language. Buying a property occurs in a social context, an event, and will be translated into legal language, [31]Direito Tributário – Linguagem e Método, p. 195.

[32]Lucia Santaella, A teoria geral dos signos, p. 36. Invoking Peirce, the author adds, "to the extent that the interpret is a creature created by the sign itself,this creature receives from the sign only the aspect that he carries in his correspondence with the object and not all other aspects of the object that the sign cannot cover".

forming legal facts of different kinds: (i) the public record required by law, (ii) property rights, (iii) the tax relationship with taxes payable due to the transfer of the property;as we can see, a number of assumptions can be made out of the same occurrence.

Note that, even with the preservation of the text (in the strict sense), the society, in a continuous process of evolution, can at any given moment, assign new meanings to old texts. The maintenance, in this case, is unique to syntax, while semantics and pragmatics are subject to continual changes in the event of changes in the context (text in the broad sense).

It is impossible that the general rule enumerate all the events foreseen by it, determining that the applicator perform a new interpretation created for each created norm. There is no way to conceive the absolute closure of the types or concepts, so each decision must take into account the whole legal system, and not only an isolated norm[34].

2.6. Regulation of intertextuality and divergence of concepts

Clarice von Oertzen de Araújo approaches the subject with clarity:

> When a concrete questioning on the legality of legal relations established occurs, judicial decisions are often made in prestige to political values, making the imperativeness of one or more norms occur according to a semantic/pragmatic criterion, whose syntax does not match the general prediction of the law system. These phenomena cause doubt and force the development of reflections on the system. Often the produced result is reformulation or a proposal for new definitions, considering the possibility of faults or deviations from the previously established criteria for the establishment of legal relations.[35]

We do not aim toclaim absence of political arguments in legal decisions, of the Superior Courts; what we must have as a parameter, however, is that this politicism must match the measure imposed by the normative system and cannot extrapolate or counteract these limits .

[34]In this sense Rodrigo Dalla Pria strives for a new interpretation plan, the one for the norm in a concrete sense, or "S5", where the judge reinterprets the legal system to build the sentence. Cf. Constructivismo Jurídico e Interpretação Concretizadora: Dialogando com Paulo de Barros Carvalho e Friedrich Müller. In: Derivação e positivação no direito tributário, passim

The indetermination of legal concepts is an issue that is faced and recognized by the wider doctrine. Daniel Mendonca is clear in stating that "accepting that every linguistic expression always has a zone of uncertainty does not imply in saying that it never has an area of certainty"[36]. To deny the existence of this zone this would imply in a language without rules, or limits, whose users could not maintain a minimum of communication.

As seen previously, as if it was not enough the fact that the legal system uses some concepts differently from other systems, within the system diversity in concepts is very common. That is because, just as law gets from social reality only those aspects that are relevant to the normative incidence, to the various branches of law such relevance, that is, these aspects may also be different from one norm to the other. The concept will oscillate, therefore, in accordance with the legal reality in which it is inserted. Arthur Kauffmann exemplifies:

> The concept of "document", when talking about the crime of forgery, is essentially different from the concept of document in the procedural perspective of documentary evidence. It is precisely as Wittgenstein would say: the meaning of a legal concept depends on the legal relationship in which it is used. It is, therefore, not accurate to speak, in this context, of "relative legal concepts". It would be correct to use the word "relational" because the meaning of the legal concept is, as stated, determined by the relationship from which it arises.[37]

It is not correct to say, however, that in certain circumstances, there is defiance to concepts from other systems; the constructive activity of law is to get from reality the aspect that matters to it, attributing this aspect values that are inherent to the legal activity. It is up to the applicator to define the meaning of normative propositions, and this activity is solely limited by the legal context imposed by positive law.

To Tathiane dos Santos Piscitelli, "the interpretation of legal texts do not occur in a vacuum, but rather limited, initially, by the constraints of language itself, which we will call 'rules of use ' of the respective expressions"[38]. These rules are not imposed by pre-established criteria, but depend on the contexts in which texts are inserted, since it is the consensus delimiting the context, and due to the decisions (re)contextualize legal norms, that is, they are rules of legal language use.

As said previously, the legal reality focuses on the social reality, but it does not coincide with it. From this statement, we can formulate the argument that legal concepts can, not only be more comprehensive or restrictive than social concepts, but may also diverge from them: that is the autonomy of legal language!

Similarly, this divergence can occur internally, that is, in the universe of positive law, considered here a given system, which regulates the actions of a society, historically situated in time and space, about which there is no way to guarantee the absence of contradiction.[39]

There is no concept of reality that overlaps law. In other words, a legal concept can be detached from reality. The legal incidence, according to Clarice de Araújo, is a translation operation of the social environment to the legal universe. In her words: "Also to the legal universe reality itself and absolute truth are inarticulable, only ideally desirable, reached in an approximate extent, limited by the observation and conformation that this language confers to the consciences of its operators and to the world itself"[40].

Being positive law a linguistic body that, in order to exist, uses the terms of the Portuguese language and, in some cases, even foreign languages[41], whose core meaning is already embedded in society, traceitos de Direito Privado, p. 1231.

[39] Since the legal language is predominantly prescriptive of conducts, and not descriptive of the social reality, not being subjected to the logical law of non-contradiction.

[40] Clarice de Araújo, Da incidência como tradução, p. 160.

[41] The fact that a judgment may contain passages written in a foreign language does not justify its annulment. Although Article 156 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that it is mandatory in the case, the use of the national language, we have to verify if the passages in other languages hinder the understanding of the parties as to the reasoning of the judge. With this understanding, the 3rd Chamber of the Superior Labor Court did not accept the review appeal by Caixa EconomicaFederal(CEF) that contested the decision of the Regional Labor Court of the 3rd Region(MG) that had parts in English and Spanish in the lawsuit of the former employee request for wage claims after being unfairly dismissed. CEF argued that knowledge of a foreign language is not part of the curriculum of law or the examination of the Bar Association of Brazil. Therefore, the lawyer is not required to learn other languages".(BRAZIL. Superior Labor Court. Trechos em língua estrangeira não invalidam decisão judicial. News of the Superior Labor Court. ditionally the meaning of its terms will be that same used in social language. So far there is no great controversy. The problem starts when assigning meaning to legal texts leads to meanings that are completely different from traditional definitions.

In such cases, in which the legislator does not want to use the "common" or "vulgar" meaning concerning a concept, s/he (the legislator) must make an exception. This implies claiming that there is no assignment of meaning that different from the traditional, whether it is more restrictive or broad, that is given in an implicit manner.

Luís Eduardo Schoueri is timely when reflecting on the theme: "today it is fit to the interpreter to verify if the legislator took into account, or not, the structure of private law, in the definition of the tax hypothesis. The legislator is free to link, or not,to that law"[42]. From the analysis of the divergence found in our system, we can conclude on the possibility of a concept to suffer variations in scope because due to the values that we intend to protect.

The presence of concepts with varied meanings within the same system happens due to the form in which intertextuality is presented in the legal system, and does not make it inconsistent.

The consistency of the legal system is conferred by the exclusivity in the modality of each conduct: if it is required, it may not be prohibited; if it is permitted not to do, it cannot be required to be done. The logical structure of normative discourse is in regulating conducts and not in univocal meaning.

3. Application of intertextuality in legal tax concepts

We will now present three examples of concepts used in various forms, varying according to the legal subdomain which they refer to, to demonstrate how context influences intertextual relationships among norms, comparing the legislation that regulates the institute, a brief presentation on the ways use and, at the end of each topic, judicial decision recognizing the dissimilarities.

3.1. Revenue

Act 5,172, from 1966 (National Tax Code)	Art. 110. The tax law cannot change the definition, the content and the scope of institutes, concepts and forms of private law, used, explicitly or implicitly, by the Federal Constitution, by the Constitutions of the States, or by the Organic Laws of the Federal District or Municipalities, to define or limit the taxing-powers.
Federal Constitution of 1988	Art. 195. Social security shall be financed by all of the society, directly and indirectly, under the terms of law, using funds coming from the budgets of the Union, the States, the Federal District and the Municipalities, and the following social contributions I –from employers, levied on the payroll, turnover and profit;
Act 9,718, from November 27, 1998	Art. 2 Contributions to PIS/PASEP and COFINS, payable by legal entities of private law, will be calculated based on its turnover, subject to applicable law and the amendments made by this Act. Article 3 The turnover referred to in the previous article corresponds to the gross revenue of the legal entity. § 1 It is understood by all gross revenue the total revenue earned by the legal entity, irrespective of the type of activity it exercises and the accounting classification used for the revenue.
Constitutional Amendment 20, from December 15,1998	Article 195. Social security is financed by all of the society, directly and indirectly, under the terms of law, using funds from the budgets of the Union, States, Federal District and Municipalities, and social contributions of the following: I - the employer, company and entity under the law, relating to: a) the payroll and other employment incomes paid or credited, in any way, to the person who performs services, even without employment relationship; b) the revenue or turnover; c) the profit;

In the first square of the table, the National Revenue Code of 1966, approved by the Federal Constitution of 1988, prohibits the concepts of "private law" to be modified by tax law. In the second square, the Constitution authorizes the creation of social security contributions levied on the companies' turnover. In the third square, the Act 9,718 associates "turnover" with "gross revenue" which is the total revenue earned by legal entities. On the fourth square, the Constitutional Amendment 20 alters the Constitution, including the possibility of levying not only the turnover, but also the revenue.

This is not an issue to address right now, but the constitutionality of Act 9,718/98 was then questioned, as the Constitutional Amendment 20/98, which gave the Union the power to tax the revenue of legal persons (and not only their turnover), was published after the enactment of Act 9,718/98.

The disturbance was taken to the highest court of the judiciary by numerous processes that aimed at the declaration of unconstitutionality of the provision, with the justification that turnover was a concept of private law, especially of commercial law, maintained by the Constitution to divide the taxing powers among them - specifically regarding the powers of the Federal Government to institute social contributions to social security financing.

The total turnover as a calculation basis comes the idea of issuing invoices. Thus, there is incidence only on revenues from sales of goods and/or provision of services. Gross revenue, on the other hand, includes all entries of the legal entity, whether they are from the sales of goods and/or provision of services.

The Supreme Court ended up declaring the unconstitutionality of Art. 3, I of Act 9,718/98, for electing gross revenue as the basis for calculating the contributions without any prediction on FC/88 for this, being improper its subsequent "constitutionalization" by issuance of the CA 20/98[43]. The following is an excerpt from the Amendment:

> SOCIAL CONTRIBUTION - PIS – GROSS REVENUE - NOTION - UNCONSTITUTIONALITY OF § 1 OF ARTICLE 3 OF ACT NO. 9,718/98. (...) It is unconstitutional the § 1 of Article 3 of Act No. 9,718/98, in which expanded the concept of gross revenue to involve all revenues earned by legal entities, regardless of the activity developed by them and the accounting classification adopted.

Here are two limits present. As for the hierarchy of norms, the syntactic limit, the reconfiguration of the definition of turnover resulted in the expansion of the taxing power. As for the limits of culture, unless express constitutional provision to the contrary, the legislator itself has used the language of private law, where turnover does not include the gross revenue.

In this case, two points are equally important to be raised: (i) are gross revenue and turnover equivalent terms? (ii) where do we find the definition of each term?

In situations where the legislator innovates the legal reality not only for inserting into the environment new norms, which are related to prescribing behaviors, but also by changing the social reality, regardless of whether there is a consensus concerning its concepts, the interpretation of legal texts is facilitated.

Thus, for two classes to be considered equal, that is, governed by the logical principle of identity[44], all elements inserted into a class must also be presented in the other class, and the same reasoning is given to the elements that are excluded.

Bringing to the situation being analyzed, the gross revenue could only be used for purposes of contribution to Social Security if the situations encompassed by this concept were exactly the same involved in the concept of turnover; however, this is not the conclusion reached when a closer analysis is made on the subject.

The granting of meaning to legal texts will always be the result of interpretation and, as seen, grounded and constrained by the context. In tax matters, the Article 110 itself of the CTN highlights the concern to limit the content of the posed norm, which ignores the concept of private law.

The Minister Cezar Peluso presents the requirements for the interpretation of normative orders, saying: "when there is no legal concept expressed, the interpreter has to help to rebuild the semantics of the instruments available in the actual system of positive law, or in different bodies of language"[45].

With this, we can say that the Constitution cannot bring definitions to its concepts, as a rule, but because it represents the highest point [44] By the logical of identity, a proposition always implies on itself ($p \equiv p$), that is, antecedent and consequent are identical, equivalent concepts. From the application of logical rules, the interpreter maintains contact with knowledge of law as a system; in the proposed methodology of Lourival Vilanova, knowledge implies in knowledge of the principles, handling the categories, global, operational and functional systematic vision, being essential to relate law with the fundamentals in general and in the context in which it is inserted. Logic provides this knowledge, relating empirical data and logical structures. A legal form (content-free), in which the formal structure of law is establishedthrough the analysis of language of positive law, through formalization. However, the full legal experience presupposes the analysis of positive law: the logical in statements and the empirical in the actual data selected in the physical and social realities.

[45]Extraordinary appeal no. 390.840/MG. Rapporteur: Minister Marco Aurélio. Judgement: Nov 9. 2005. Judging Body: Full Court. Publication: DJ Aug. 15, 2006.

of the law system, it shall present harmonic linguistic body, providing instrumental in defining the concepts inserted to it, keeping a coherent discourse, and even if it does not present express definitions of its concepts, confer to the interpreter, the applicator and the infra-constitutional legislator, the limits of use of its terms.

The Minister Marco Aurélio was based on this to deliver his opinion: "In my vote, I had the assumption that the incidence basis was already defined in the Constitution, that is, turnover. And if it is already defined in the Constitution, there is no enforceability of the specific instrument, which is the complementary act."[46] It follows from this reasoning the inability of the infra-constitutional legislator to make equivalent, while exercising the authority to tax, turnover to gross revenue, since the imposed constitutional limit, whose classes contain different elements, is the reason why they cannot be equivalent.

That was the solution given by the Supreme Court in deciding to restrict the scope of the term gross revenues for all other exactions that use the term, ensuring compliance with the limits of the distribution of power of tax authorities.

We cannot conclude from this, however, the impossibility of the Union to tax revenue, but to do so, of course, it shall be guided by the rules imposed by the Constitution, that is, the constituent legislator assigned to it (Union) the power to tax situations that are configured as revenue.

3.2. Tax

[46]However the legislative procedure was ignored and has no Constitutional Amendment 20 prerogative to validate the act no. 9718/98. So says the Minister Cezar Peluso: "If the norm produces before the Constitution is compatible with this, it is received by the new system; if it is not, it is revoked, or, the same thing, loses its validityfoundation". With the advent of the said Amendment the jurisdiction of the Union was constitutionally enlarged guaranteeing the ordinary legislator the drafting of a new exaction that included as gross revenue as a hypothesis for tax incidence. The following are forbidden: IV - to bind tax revenues to an agency, fund or expense, except for the sharing of proceeds from the collection of the taxes referred to in articles. 158 and 159, the allocation of resources to the actions and services of public health, maintenance and development of education and to perform tax administration activities (...);

Part of the doctrine says it is not good for law to give definition of concepts. According to Luciano Amaro, "to define and classify the institutes of law is the task of the doctrine. Yet, in 1966, the newly enacted Tax Reform translated into the Amendment no. 18/65, the National Tax Code adopted didactic line in the discipline of the tax system, insisting, throughout its text, the establishment of certain basic concepts"[47]. And according to Geraldo Ataliba, referring to the concept of tax: "Of course, it is not the function of any law to formulate theoretical concepts"[48].

The explanation, perhaps based on the misconception of the doctrine as a source of law, it honors the scholars as if the legislator was, as if elected by the people, could prescribe conducts. Or, on the other hand, as if law, while defining concepts, could change the social (non-legal) reality by the simply saying, as if our congressmen and senators were gods.

The communicational noise caused by the adoption of the same physical support for the various meanings can be seen in several passages of the legal text. Without any explanation, it is possible to read: "the tax taxes, taxing tax". The same term, in the example, can be seen as a legal norm, as a legal relationship, as a procedure and as an amount of money.

At this time it is proposed to research definable notes of the concept of tax in the sphere of taxation and financial law. Such notice is imperative, before the two articles of the 60'sthat can interfere with work, namely art. 3 of Act 5,172/1966 (definition of the concept of tax in a taxation sphere), and art. 9 of Act 4,320/1964 (definition of tax in a financial sphere).

As a financial norm tax is seen as revenue derived from the empire power of the State, a "product of collection of taxes". It is tax as pecuniary, not in a taxation sphere, but in a financial sphere. The subjects of the legal relationship are no longer the taxpayer and the tax authority, but the various agents of the Public Administration.

The characterization of the tax as "revenue" has its regulations in norms for the allocation of tax revenues, contained in Section VI of the National Tax System (Articles 157-162). In art. 9 of Act 4,320/1964, we find a definition of the concept of tax in the financial sphere.

Inside the Brazilian system of positive law, there is a separation between the financial system and the tax system[49]. However, a possible approach appears with the Complementary Act 101/2000, the Tax Responsibility Act: Article 11. Constitute essential requirements of responsibility in the tax management of the institution, forecasting and effective collection of all taxes of constitutional power of the Federation's entity. The Tax Responsibility Act is concerned about the responsibility from the institution to public spending. However, it is still not possible to say that there is a junction between the two systems, because (i) the Constitution, of higher hierarchy, separates the tax system from the financial system, and (ii) the FRL only cares about tax norms for accountability at the administrative level, without taking into account the relationship with the Taxpayers, subject who is essential in a tax relationship.

[49]Marco Antonio Gama Barreto makes no distinction between the financial and tax systems. And with that, he does not consider the deletion of Art. 9 of Act 4320 by Art. 3 of the CTN, as if the later Act had revoked the previous one, but yes, he understands that they are complementary and coexisting. "It happens that we do not see the possibility of issuing a revoking speech act based on a comparison between Articles 3 CTN and 9 of Act no. 4,320 of 1964 because i) the CTN did not expressly repealed Article 9, ii) Article 9 does not show inconsistency with Article 3 and, iii) the CTN has not regulated entirely the subject matter of the Act no. 4320 of 1964". O conceito de tributo no direito brasileiro, p. 90

The law that addresses the preparation and control of budgets and balances of federal entities shows taxes as a type of revenue. About revenue (for budgetary purposes), Aliomar Baleeiro says:

> The amounts received from the public purse are generically referred to as "entries" or "entrances". Not all of these entrances, however, are public revenue, as some of them are only "fund movement", without any increase in government assets, since they are subject to refund or represent mere recovery of amounts lent or given by the government.[50]

The goal of Financial System Science is to understand where they come from, how and where public entries go. "Tax" in this context, is essentially treated as a kind of revenue.

A question that arises then is whether a new tax relationship can arise through a financial relationship, if there is a mix at the time: and if the money collected in a contribution does not go to its specific legal allocation? Can the taxpayer repeat the "undue" payment?

Albeit in different ways, many scholars believe that the legal allocation is not only relevant for the determination of the type of tax, but also for its control. Even Marco Aurélio Greco, who does not admit to be possible to return the collected amounts, understands that institutionalized allocation and non-application of resources through the analysis of the enforcement of guidelines law and budget law, according to the criteria that extracts from tax liability act, can lead to the recognition of the constitutionality of unenforced contribution in the purposes that are constitutionally foreseen in relation to future years[51].

We think that the allocation relevant to the characterization of a tax is only a "normative allocation", which specifies the purpose of the norm imposing the tax. At the time of drafting of the act, to the contribution it is necessary to foresee the legal allocation, because it is a criterion for the exercise of such powers. But everything else is irrelevant and posterior to the legal nature of taxes. The repetition of the [51]For the author, the correct or incorrect application of resources is a supervening event to the incidence of the norm, as it is extraneous to the tax norm. With the payment, the link between the amount paid and the partial disapplication of the feature set is diluted. Therefore, he believes it is not possible to repeat the divergence of allocation. Em busca do controle sobre as Cide's. In: Direito das telecomunicações e tributação, passim.

undue payment would only be possible, thus, through disrespecting the assumption (absence of allocation norm at the time of the institution, which would imply in the unconstitutionality of the norm), but not for disrespecting the legal regime to be adopted.

Both the Constitution (Art. 165 and its subsections) and the Tax Responsibility Act require responsible tax management. But these norms are aimed at the Administration, and not the tax authority-taxpayer relationship. Even the Annual Budget Act, from the Executive Power, not predicting allocation, does not create rights to the passive subject of the compensation obligation.

Nor do we think that the non-application of the raised funds can lead to the recognition of unconstitutionality of the exaction in relation to future years, as it is a norm that requires only administrative authority, and on it rests the control of the application of the taxes. The legal tax fact is the record in the adequate language of the occurrence of the hypothesis, and not the fulfillment by the state, of the contributions' purposes.

Finally, it is worth to discuss the ADI 2,925-8/DF, which has the following Amendment:

> ADI 2925 / DF - FEDERAL DISTRICT. DIRECT ACTION OF UNCONSTITUTIONALITY. Rapporteur: Min. ELLEN GRACIE. RapporteurtoJudgment: Min.MARCO AURÉLIO. Judgment: 12/19/2003. Judging Agency: Full Court.
> BUDGET ACT–INTERVENTION CONTRIBUTION IN THE ECONOMICAL SPHERE - IMPORT AND MARKETING OF OIL AND OIL PRODUCTS, NATURAL GAS AND NATURAL GAS PRODUCTS, AND FUEL ALCOHOL - CIDE - ALLOCATION - ARTICLE 177, § 4, OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION. It is unconstitutional the interpretation of the Budget Act No. 10,640, of January 14, 2003, that implies in the opening of additional credit in heading strange to the allocation of what was collected from the provisions of § 4 of Article 177 of the Federal Constitution, given the exhaustive nature of subparagraphs "a", "b" and "c" of subsection II of the said paragraph.

The Minister Ellen Gracie wrote in her vote that the contribution is the tax type "characterized by the purpose of its institution and not for the allocation of the respective collection"[52]. In fact, the definition that qualifies a contribution is the prediction in law of the "normative allocation" of the proceeds from the collection at the time of institution of the tax. The system of tax law deals with the pre-collection, collection and executive moments. It has nothing to do with budget issues.

And, if on one hand the divergence of allocation does not give right to the repetition of the undue payment or to the allocation in own funds of the quantum raised from contributions. Carlos Velloso exposes his opinion:

> Of course I'm not telling the Government to spend. The realization of expenditure depends on public policies. What I say is that the Government cannot spend the proceeds from the collection of CIDE outside from that the Federal Constitution establishes, Art. 177, § 4, II. In other words, the government can only spend the proceeds from the collection of the said contribution in what is established in the Constitution, Art. 177,§ 4, II.53

There is no legal possibility in Brazilian law to repeat undue tax payment when there is divergence in tax allocation. And we do not say this with joy, as it would be an excellent way of population pressure as to public spending, but sadly, due to lack of legal means for such control. The federal government is thus free to transform social contributions in taxes that are not shared among other federal agencies. And as for deviation of money by the public servant, it is limited functional liability.

Celso de Barros Correia Neto[54], in criticizing the division between Financial and Tax Laws confirms the different treatment given to the subjects.

> Moreover, it is curious to note that the accuracy of the defined limits makes the collection an element that is external in relation to Tax Law. In fact, by defining the payment as the last limit of Tax Law, it is evident that the revenues earned are not contained in this discipline: they are external and extraneous consequences. So much so that commenting on the Constitutional Charter of 1967, Pontes de Miranda states, with his enthusiasm: "The budget does not give al> location to taxes, it gives allocation to revenue". Upon termination of the legal tax relationship with payment, what comes next is fit to the other bodies of Law and not anymore to the regulations of the taxes. Tax revenues would be, thus, a factual consequence which follows from the imposing norm, a state of affairs that is external to what is produced.

With this, we make the following questions: is it possible the difference in the concept of tax in the tax and financial spheres? Yes, again by confronting issues of intra-systemic intertextuality. The peculiarities of the differences are put in norms of the same hierarchy (Act 4,320 and Act 5,172). Moreover, they are different spheres (Tax Law and Public Budget). This brings two visible consequences: the first is that allocation is not a part of the definition of concept of tax in the sphere of taxation, which could characterize the Guarantee Fund for Time of Service as a tax[55]. The second is that poor use of the tax can be of responsibility of the State's tax management, but does not entitle the taxpayer to repeat the "undue payment".

It is understood as inputs: I - used in the manufacturing or production of goods destined to sales: a) raw materials, intermediate products, packaging material and any other goods that undergo changes such as wear, damage or loss of physical or chemical properties, due to the action directly exerted on the product being manufactured, as long as not included in the fixed asset;

The third proposed issue deals with the definition of the concept of inputs for non-cumulativeness of the Contribution to the Program for Social Integration and Formation of the Public Servant Asset and the Contribution for Social Security Financing (PIS/COFINS), and the non-cumulativeness of the Tax on Manufactured Products (IPI) .

In the system of taxation, there are taxes incident in an operation, such as on the property, and other that are dependent on a number of previous steps in order to be required, as the ones resulting from manufacturing or revenue of a company, called taxes on aggregate value. In Brazil, the Vehicle Tax (IPVA) is an example of the first case. IPI and PIS/COFINS are examples of the second case.

To the taxes incident on activities resulting from steps, the "non-cumulativeness" was created, with the aim of charging only what is added. Non-cumulative is a term with concept definition in the Federal Constitution: at least for the IPI, it says that it will be non-cumulative, compensating what is due in each transaction with the amount charged in the past.

The basis for the calculation is the final value minus the taxes paid in the previous steps. Paulo de Barros Carvalho[56]says that the non-cumulativeness is an objective limit that aims to reach the value of the tax justice, so that the impact of percussion does not cause distortions. It works to determine the amount to be collected through tax, recording only the wealth added to the good or service[57].

In the IPI, the non-cumulativeness is based on production inputs: goods and services linked to the final product. The manufacturer can "credit itself", that is, decrease its tax burden with what was previously paid, provided that the inputs integrate or are used in the production process. For example, water to make a soft drink, kerosene as a solvent in the chemical industry. Water and kerosene, if used as a source of energy to make the same soft drink, do not fit the definition of input.

It should be noted that input may have broader concept, such as everything that is used to ensure a product or service object of the business activity. As the definition of Eduardo Marcial Ferreira Jardim[58], following the semantics of Antonio Houaiss, input means everything that enters, coupled with the paternal word "consumption". Equipment, capital, workforce and energy,and components associated with the production of goods or services would be covered by the concept. But not in IPI.

Frontally we have a divergence: goods and services used in the production or manufacturing of goods are not, necessarily, raw materials. Here the same fuel serves to deduct credits from PIS /COFINS. After the calculation of all revenue, the deduction of the credit amount corresponding to the rates imposed by way of contributions takes place.

The question, in this case, involves independent systematics, without any subordination relationship between them. They are contexts that should not influence one another, as each has its own regulations and, in this case, a norm does not preclude the other, in the same way that does not bring to itself the application of what regulates in the case of a tax. In the words of Bakhtin[59], they are parts of the same whole that do not communicate.

The concept of "input" applicable to PIS and to COFINS has been, little by little, changed by jurisprudence. The definition that, until recently, was very restricted begins to be shaped closer to the broad concept of "cost of production of goods and services" present in the Income Tax Regulation - RIR, especially in Articles 290 and 299, which include all the "necessary expenses to the company's activity and the maintenance of its production source".The Administrative Tax Appeals Council (CARF) has already ruled as follows:

> […]the term "input" used for the calculation of non-cumulative PIS and COFINS must necessarily include the operational costs and expenses of the legal entity, as defined in Articles 290 and 299 of the RIR/99 and not be limited only to the concept brought by the Regulatory Instructions No. 247/02 and 404/04 (which are based exclusively on the inapplicable legislation of IPI)[60].

Alongside this concept definition, arises doctrine and jurisprudence agreeing that the inputs of IPI have nothing to do with the inputs of PIS/COFINS, and little have to do with the "inputs of Income Tax", not including all expenses deductible in this tax. It is what we read in the STJ (Superior Court of Justice), in the vote draft by Minister Mauro Campbell Marques (Special Appeal No. 1,246,317-MG):

> 4. According to the teleological and systematic interpretation of the law system in force, the concept of "inputs" for the purposes of Art. 3, II , of Act no. 10,637/2002 and Art. 3, II , of Act no. 10,833/2003, is not identified with the concept adopted in the legislation of the Tax on Manufactured Products - IPI, since it is overly restrictive. Similarly, it does not correspond exactly to the concept of "Operating Costs and Expenses" used in the legislation of Income Tax - IR, as it is quite broad.
> 5."Inputs" are, for the purposes of Art. 3, II, of Act no. 10,637/2002 and Art. 3, II, of Act no. 10,833/2003, all those goods and services pertaining to, or that enable the production process and the provision of services that may directly or indirectly employed and whose subtraction results in the impossibility of providing the service or production, that is, whose subtraction prevent the company's activity, or implies in substantial loss of quality of the product or service as a result of this subtraction.

Given the different matters (manufacturing, revenue and income), it is impossible to compare inputs without getting lost in the understanding of such taxes. In the case of PIS/COFINS, the term "input" does not indicate a substance itself[61], included in a specific list, but in relation to the way in which revenue is acquired.

There is a common way to which it shall be submitted to the determination of what may be inputs to all taxes subject to the non-cumulative systematic. In this same sense, are the words of Fábio Palaretti Calcini:

> The expression "input" should be linked to the expenditures made by the taxpayer who, in a direct or indirect manner, contributes to the full exercise of his/her economic activity (industry, commerce or services) aimed at obtaining of his/her revenue[62].

The limitation of the meaning initially built by a norm will only happen on the basis of the other norms existing in the system, with contrary meaning, which are hierarchically superior.

The issue, in this case, involves independent systematics, without any subordinate relationship between them. They are contexts that do not influence one another, because each has its own regulation and, in this case, a norm does not preclude the other, in the same way that it does not bring to itself the application of what regulates it in the case of a tax. There is a genre of which both participate, but it needs to be specified so that both can incur.

Conclusions

The legal truth is arrogant: jurists are not mere descriptors of the reality of law, but the creative builders of this reality. If language is reality, we have at least two important consequences: (1) as law is a text, it is impossible to be interpreted without a context, and (2) the theory of law is the analysis of the jurists' language.[63]

The meaning of a word depends on the conversation that takes place with the other participants. There is no "basic" definition. What is there is a more intensive use of a term than of another, such as dictionaries are organized. This does not prevent law, as artificial language, to say that a word means something else than the existing meanings in the natural language, and also the limits of the legal system itself (such as the hierarchy of norms). The goal in defining concepts lies in reducing the vagueness/ambiguity of terms.

With regard to the contribution to PIS/COFINS, at the time the only possible basis for calculation was turnover. Initially, turnover implied in incurring only on the revenues arising from sales of goods and/or provision of services. Subsequently, the concept was widened, becoming equivalent to gross revenue, that is, all entries of the legal entity, whether they are from the sales of goods and/or provision of services. We believe that there is no such possibility. The issue of revenue implies in taxing power rules, increasing the powers of the Union. Moreover, unless there is an express constitutional provision to the contrary, the legislator himself has used natural language.

The word "tax" has different significance depending on the tax subsystem, if it is Tax Law or Financial Law. The allocation, in the tax subsystem, is irrelevant to the characterization of the tax. Without taking into consideration the allocation of the quantum collected as a characterization of the tax exaction, the Guarantee Fund for Time of Service (FGTS) can be considered a tax. Another demonstration is in the bad use of a social contribution, which does not entitle repetition of the undue payment by the taxpayer, and is the State's responsibility.

The definitions of input may vary depending on the context (IPI, PIS/COFINS or Income Tax). There is no subordination between one act and another. The same word has different meanings depending on the tax. Thus, intertextuality is within the same legal subsystem, the tax system. The non-cumulativeness is applied differently to both cases, but should have the same effect, due to constitutional hierarchy.

In general, we also conclude that:

1. The legislator and the judge always create, but are inserted in a given linguistic context that cannot be ignored.

2. For a concept to evolve and be accepted there must be coherence and consistency, at the risk of disabling communication.

3. An utterance is always modulated by the speaker to the social, historical, cultural and ideological context[64].

4.Concepts cannot be simply borrowed from different legislations, from taxes coming from different matters.

The "syndrome" of legislative reforms in Brazil: criticism of the institutionalization of law in peripheral capitalism[1]

Carolina Alves Vestena[2]

Abstract: This paper proposes a research agenda on the role of legal form in the social reforms lead by the state in the periphery, considering the dialogue between critical theory and postcolonial studies. In the first part I present the "state of the art" of the theories of legal sociology in Brazil and interpretations of the Law, which have certain emancipatory features. By doing this exploratory analysis, some criticisms are pointed out, for example, the maintenance of Eurocentric regulatory proposals and the lack of a critical reading about the limits related to the institutionalization of legal form. These aspects open lines for the connection between legal critique and postcolonial studies. In the second part, I bring a preliminary analysis, result of ongoing research, on the influential approaches of postcolonial studies for the Latin American social theory. With these contributions, it can be possible to indicate an opening of the field of social sciences to post-colonial studies, as well as the gains that these can bring to the analysis of the role of law within global capitalism. Finally, I resume the working hypothesis, namely, the proposed dialogue between critical theory and postcolonial studies as a research agenda that takes seriously the potential construction of a new imaginary for the critique of legal form.

Keywords: Legal form, post-colonial studies, critical theory for the state. They primarily represent the institutional managing model in capitalism, as the reforms are cyclically handled in order to provide conditions for economic progress and social equality. If observed from the point of view of this social formation, they mean, therefore, a repertoire of common action, and their characteristics may be different, as a function of the ideology of the elected government, the political and economic scenario, and the scope of the agenda of human rights and social justice.

The discussions on reform were born from social struggles promoted by workers. Nevertheless, over time, the reforms were linked to the possibilities of transformation within the capitalist system itself. Traditionally, the term "reform" lay within a critical theory that set the idea of reform to against that of radical social transformation, to the revolution (Luxemburg, 2007; Settembrini, 1983). In this debate, on one side was the revolutionary movement, which was economically, politically and culturally antithetical to capitalism, regardless of the means necessary to be so; on the other side was the reform movement, whose purpose was to improve and enhance the existing order, as the foundations of this order were considered absolute and necessary for the development of men (Settembrini, 1983). With the world changes introduced in the postwar period and due to criticisms of the totalitarianism of the Stalinist regime, the reform/revolution dichotomy gave way to the issue of the gears of the state and democracy. The different approaches to this subject include the debate about the "crisis of the State" in the 70s, which brought the discussion of hegemony and material determination of the State due to the conflict of their fractions of class (Poulantzas, 1969; 2001). This approach was extremely important to discuss the role of ideology and law in capitalism, showing how these assume a unifying meaning, of an intrinsic order of the social body, which no longer had a transcendent authority over all subjects, as stated by Buckel and Fischer-Lescano (2009). Hence, the forms of State action depend on control mechanisms of hegemony, which support the maintenance of political authority and its legitimacy (Buckel; Fischer-Lescano, 2009). Although the reform action is aimed at transforming some aspect of social reality, its intervention limits do not exceed the possibilities of political emancipation of the project of modernity linked to capitalism. Which factors characterize this model of State action? Is its reproduction widespread in the world system? Do center and peripheries use the reform discourse with the same meaning?

The last Brazilian governments, for example, have worked through reforms intended to improve their legal institutions in line with a project of democratic consolidation post-dictatorship and also with new-developmental proposes. To this end, the justice system should be efficient, rational and democratic, according to the models set out by international agencies, such as the World Bank and the IMF. [3] The reform of the Judicial Branch [4] and a number of law changes resulting from the reform of the civil code, the code of civil procedure and tax reforms have followed these requirements. The assumption inherent in these reforms comes from the following equation: a more efficient legal system means more investment, more development and, ultimately, more income to fight the economic and social inequalities. One might ask then, which rules determine investment priorities? Will an environment conducive to more investments necessarily result in social benefits? Which rules determine the governments' political choices of the reforms to be implemented?

The Latin American social thought, especially the dependency theory, also produced interpretations of the State, capitalism and reforms. These theories have sought to observe the overall dynamics of the economy and social relations, explaining the center-dependent development from the underdevelopment of the periphery (Dos Santos, 2010). This movement led to the reinterpretation of the concepts of center and periphery, based on unequal, yet interwoven positions for the widespread reproduction of capitalism in the world system. It introduced the foundations for the development of the world-systems theory refined by Wallerstein in the 70s, which added complexity to the criticism of capitalism by globalizing the social division of labor as the basis of social inequality in the world system (Wallerstein, 2000; Robinson, 2011). Therefore, it opened up space for a review of the political and epistemological hegemony of the global north (the West represented by Europe and the USA), bringing the Southern epistemologies as alternative interpretations of the constitution of individuals and civil society about the meaning of modernity in different locations and, consequently, about the political and economic processes of capitalism. The notion of "neoco-lonialism" started to be used in the social sciences as an explanatory key to the reconstruction of scientific interpretations embedded in a post-colonial view (Gonçalves, 2012, p. 23). Then, since this paper presents a research agenda, some questions and lines will remain open for further development. In resume, the main objective of this paper is to introduce some questions and steps for a critical interpretation of the legal reforms in periphery, and doing so, also an observation of the social reforms. The set of theories included in the "global south" presents the possibility of new interpretative dialogues on macro-social thinking.

2. About the Brazilian field of sociology and theory of law

In order to construct a frame analysis on the interpretation of social reforms in peripheral capitalism, it is important to explore the knowledge on the main theoretical approaches that have been developed in Brazil in the past years. I can state, in general, this theoretical field uncritically adopts the socio-legal standards of modernization set by the legal models of core countries. Because of this, it is unable to build criticism on the structural role of the legal form in global capitalism. This partial conclusion of the research study was drawn in the course of the first year of the doctoral program. The first objective of doing this diagnostic was the understanding under which roots the social interpretation of law in Brazil is currently framed. In the paragraphs below, I briefly present this first diagnosis based on such insights. I will present the systems theory approach, the theories grounded in the legal pluralism and, finally, the social interpretations of the Brazilian constitution, so called "neoconstitucionalism".

There is significant diversity of approaches related to the systems theory, especially with regard to the normative projects that resulted from their diagnoses of Latin America and Brazil. Campilongo (2000; 2002) focuses his analyses on the relations between the legal and political systems. In discussing the judicial politicization, the author offers interpretations of the need for operational closure in the licit and illicit code as an alternative. Neves (2000, 2003), in turn, discusses the structural problem of the Latin American economic and political inequality by describing this society as an arena of social miscellany that is an integral part of a negative modernity. Against this process, the author states the need for introducing the general principles of generalized inclusion and differentiation of the legal system. By reaching such decision-making parameters, the periphery would be able to recover from the tardiness caused by coronelismo and paroquialismo, [5] and would encourage citizens' active participation. Lastly, Gonçalves critically describes the structural damage to law which was produced by the process of systemic corruption of the economy. He emphasizes the impossibility of controlling the damage caused by judicial politicization, which led to its subsequent economization (Gonçalves, 2011). This statement also calls for the need to close the legal system under the standards of what Luhmann calls legal differentiation (autonomy of the communicative code and function). Legal differentiation means the congruent generalization of normative expectations, the creation of an autonomous legal dogmatic and an exclusively legal communicative code. This perspective corresponds to the standard of autonomy of the legal system of the central countries.

However, it should be noted that, influenced by Neves, the systems theory looked to the notion of periphery. The convergent receipt of this concept by the systems theory and by its tradition in the Marxist studies and in world-systems theory has not taken place, though. In Brazil, among the authors who have adopted the systems theory, this thought fed criticisms of the epistemological Eurocentrism that underlies the Latin American and Brazilian sociology in the construction of development models similar to those adopted in major capitalist nations (Gonçalves, 2010). From the perspective of the systems theory it is possible to identify a historical journey that begins in the legal differentiation as developed by the semantics of the core countries and ends at a more critical reception of such standards, but this kind of development is still in construction.

The second line of Brazilian social-legal theory analyzed in this study is the legal pluralism and its corresponding developments. The legal pluralism theory recognizes the mark of inequality among population groups and observes the specificities of the organization of their social relationships, assigning them forms of legal regulation, or, in this case, non-legal regulation. This perspective draws on the idea of social resistance comparing the law of favelas to the official law of the State. The pioneering studies of Santos (Santos, 1974) developed a theory that demonstrated the inability of formal law to promote social equality. Santos explained the intrinsic connection between formal law and politics in the modern Western state and its aptitude to oppress marginalized groups, while maintaining structural inequalities among the classes (Santos, 1988). The solution proposed by the author was linked to the movement of Marxist interpretations according to Gramsci, which advocated that the State itself should be used to offer resistance. In the last decade, in parallel to this discussion, Santos championed a project of democratic reform of the State and legal system (Santos, 2007, 2009). Note that despite advances in the criticism of the legal form of his early writings, the reception of his theory in Brazil has been used primarily to justify the reform projects, which means trusting in the role of the State and its mechanisms of representation. Therefore, his writings apparently fall into contradiction: they produce criticism of the legal form, but his interpretations are eventually and uncritically assigned an institutional view that adopts a meaning of achievement of human rights according to the semantics of the center as something to be developed by the dynamics of law in the periphery.

These approaches played a prominent critical role in the production of an alternative theory of law that uses patterns of material rationality to design the interpretation parameters to be used in court decisions. However, the criticism of the legal form, as expressed in reports against the hegemony of monism and the proposal of alternative sources of law, found its limit in the State itself. Interpretations of the possibility of resistance to the law based on the law itself were changed with the enactment of the 1988 Constitution, a starting point for redemocratization. This opened up space for the emergence of another trend consisting of the reinterpretation of the social role of law by defending principle-based models, the so-called "neoconstitucionalismos." This trend was received in Brazil by a number scholars and reputable lawyers, and is explained especially in the studies of Barcellos (2005) and Barroso (2002). Brazilian constitutionalism after the year 1988 sought to assert the actual effectiveness of the federal constitution. According with this new potentiality, it was open a new front for affirmation of human rights: the rights that were considered rebellious in the dictatorial periods became then part of the institutional and argumentative rhetoric inside the new constitution. The dispute for law was incorporated in the political strategy in this field. One of the problems to be solved would be the handling of complex cases, which allow inconsistent interpretations within the regulatory framework. To this end, techniques for building arguments, justifications and explanations of court decisions have assumed great importance vis-à-vis the criticisms of judicial majoritarianism and the expansion of law and its institutions on the social stage. Hence, this last trend stands out due to the democratic potential supposedly present in the exercise of legal technique through the guarantee of material contents of the rights ensured in the modern constitutions. This theoretical system presupposes the existence of a democratic institutional architecture that protects fundamental freedoms. It requires from the State, at the level of legal rules, the protection of individuals, but fails to address the reasons for the social and structural inequalities. Furthermore, it also stays away from post-colonial issues, since it assumes the universal meaning of the legal form as presupposed data, or in other words, it stays involved within the limits of the Eurocentric forms of social and political imagination.

According to such diagnosis, the Brazilian social legal theory oscillates between fully embracing the reform project and aspects of criticism of the legal form. It does not offer an alternative to the reform project, since, even though it came close to the criticisms, it did not assume the criticism as a regulatory path to be taken. The solutions resulting from this theory add further strength to the idea that the best way is the reforms, that is, the design of institutional solutions that will direct society towards the standards of economic and cultural development that are similar to the reality of the center of capitalism. This top-down process based on policies developed by the legislative, executive or judicial branches would be responsible for ensuring social and welfare services for all. Even if its ideas stem from empirical diagnoses grounded in the Brazilian reality, one should ask: would the reproduction of the Western modernity project be a constraint to its regulatory proposals? By considering that the democratic rule of law is the most democratic, egalitarian and fair model of sociability, wouldn't they be falling back upon the same modernizing projects inherent in a notion traditionally linked to the legal dogmatic?

The dependency theory had already spotted constraints in the action models adopted within capitalism and their lack of aptitude for the reduction of economic inequality and social emancipation. Theotônio dos Santos demonstrates the attraction that the social sciences had towards the theory of modernization and development, when they attempted to explain the progress made by powerful European nations in the post-war period. His goal was to relate the development to the adoption of "rules of behavior, attitude and values consistent with the modern economic rationality characterized by the pursuit of maximum productivity, savings and the creation of investments that would lead to the permanent accumulation of wealth for individuals and each national society" (Dos Santos, 2011). Earlier, due to the cold war, and today, as democracy is believed to be the only political system capable of promoting rights, the theories about law offer solutions embedded in the formal institutional framework and in the reforming action of the State. One should then ask: are the reforms the path towards social emancipation? In what context is an environment conducive to the reforms of the periphery forged? The next topic presents some of the theoretical assumptions that led to conclusions about the dependency theory. It will discuss the extent to which the interpretations of law based on post-colonialism have incorporated these conceptual acquisitions. At the end of this paper, some issues will be broached to demonstrate the limits of the current literature on post-colonialism and law and connected to them the open questions about the emancipatory or conservative character of the social reforms that have been taken place in peripheral countries in recent years, as example, in Brazil.

3. Contributions since Latin American' social and post-colonial theory

The previous topic supported that the current literature on Brazilian sociology of law and theory of law is limited when it discusses legal form and State action within the capitalist social formation. Regarding this interpretation, it is possible to state that the alternatives offered to consolidate the "rule of law" are merely idealistic regulatory parameters of law and policy according to standards established by the center. Considering the notion of "neocolonialismo" as a criterion of explanation for the phenomenon investigated, Latin American social thought, particularly the movements that led to the design of the dependency theory, served as a means of analysis to discuss the role of legal form in the State reforms.

When the dependency theory emerged, the view of the role of periphery in the world system and the criticism of the cultural, economic and political domination were not at all new. The foundations of this argument can be found in the writings of Mariátegui on the reality of Spanish colonization in Peru, or even in "internal colonialism," a theoretical movement that preceded the dependency theory, represented by the writings of Stavenhagen (1963) and Casanova (2006). Besides this, the political anthropology of Pierre Clastres (1989) discussed the meanings that the traditional ethnography assigned to the description of the Latin American indigenous people. It considered archaic the entire negative content of its fate doomed to subordination and colonization.

José Carlos Mariátegui, in his essays on the Peruvian reality, addresses the gradual transformation of Peru into a bourgeois economy, which took place together with the historical and political processes of the world system. As the author puts it, the feudal economy had, little by little, been transformed into a bourgeois economy, yet without ceasing to be colonial in the world context. In this respect, the author argues that the position of Peru in the process of widespread reproduction in world capitalism was, just like that of other colonies, one that provided support to the economic revolutions of the center. The progress in the production processes of the colony and its cultural changes maintained such supportive position, which was demonstrated by the author when he referred to the coexistence of different types of economy. Therefore, his concept of modernity is permeated by the dialectics of different conflicting social segments, ethnicities and economic formations that intermingle, thus producing social effects and forms of regulation or rights (Mariátegui, 1971).

In this aspect, Rodolfo Stavenhagen also criticizes the Spanish colonization model and the exploitation faced by the indigenous people in México in a much more contemporary essay. He recognizes that America was critical for the development of the Spanish model, since the exploitation of indigenous production in the colony supported the similarly weak Spanish production model. The development of the colony was maintained under the foundations of a local aristocracy that had been homogenized according to the interests of the colonizer. This colonizer, in turn, was not interested in the internal differentiation. Hence, the lands were transferred to homesteaders that arranged the evangelization and acculturation of the indigenous people (Stavenhagen, 1963, p. 244). Stavenhagen argues that the colonial relations were a mere aspect of the class relations that the mercantilist system forged on a world scale. As previously mentioned, the theoretical movement of internal colonialism put forward the debate that was later incorporated by the dependency theory by placing the colonial world within the generalized system of reproduction of global capitalism.

According to Stavenhagen, the development of the colonial "underdevelopment" resulted in the separation of individuals from their communities. The system of interethnic stratification is maintained as a conservative propeller. The modernity that arises vis-à-vis internal colonialism consists of two structures: the indigenous cooperative community and the global society, where the role of nationalism and the ladino — the mestizos who have local identity — gain strength. In short, four elements are critical in the modern society relations forged in the colonial experience: colonial relations, class relations, social stratification and the process of acculturation (Stavenhagen, 1963, p. 245). However, these interpretations are quite determinist: considering the economic and political conditions put before the center and the periphery, would the result always be the same?

To summarize this, it is worth listing the following contributions from the authors: (i) the history of the colony-Iberic metropolis relationship forged a sort of mining colonialism that was highly harmful to the autochthonous populations of Latin American countries, which eventually affected the society as a whole; (ii) the economic foundations of these places eventually reflected production methods based on different principles, which consisted of slavery, feudal systems and the emerging bourgeoisie, meaning that the modern society of the periphery presents such diversity, rather than a homogeneous process of "bourgeoisification" of the economy, the culture and the politics; (iii) the presence of indigenous people in these places triggered processes of legal control over these individuals through homogenization efforts aiming to include the indigenous people in society and in labor arrangements; lastly, also in terms of structure, (iv) the acculturation processes meant the resistance of these people, who used the discourse of protection of their identity and their forms of social relations as mechanisms of resistance to the acculturation. The arguments of the two authors present features of an original interpretation of the legal form that considers its strength to reproduce the dynamics that characterize capitalism – universalization and occultation of material inequalities, while it points to the possibilities of societal resistance. However, a central aspect remains unexplained: why is the cultural domination accepted and supported under the legal form? Isn't the perception of inequality enough to motivate the building of alternative, autonomous and free society models?

Mariátegui and Stavenhagen draw insights from the history of incorporations and resistance of indigenous communities in two Latin American locations to demonstrate how the legal form influences the infrastructure, providing the bases for the consolidation of the capitalist production model. This finding unveils the possibility of making criticisms of law, as it ultimately confirms that the legal form is forged from inequality. Put differently, the law that formally makes people equal is born to ensure that those considered culturally unequal be maintained in a position of permanent material inequality once they are received in the labor market. The material sense of maintaining inequalities, as assumed by the legal form, can be combined to a cultural blinding, that means, indigenous, primitive, archaic, peripheral are assigned characteristics that depreciate the subjects' position in this subaltern context. Hence, if there is extreme poverty, inequality, deficit of rights, it is because these societies have not matured and developed enough to overcome these obstacles. The logic of inequality is reflected in the individualist discourse that looks for the homo-economicus, "a rationalist and utilitarian individual that ultimately expresses human nature as freed from antihuman traditions and myths" from the modernizing project at all locations (Dos Santos, 1970).

A set of pairs of concepts is recurrent in the descriptions of society, politics and law in the peripheries. In Latin America, since the first ethnographic narratives, such terms as primitive and developed, archaic and modern, pre-political and political, non-historic and historic, enliven such classifications, which are filled by a valuing repertoire that sought to understand "new" social spaces from the grammar established in its scientific founding locus: the center of the colonial world system based in the most powerful Western nations of that time (Clatres, 1989). The maintenance of that grammar, after struggles for political independence and transformations in world geopolitics requires a daily process of epistemological decolonization. Why do the societies of the global south, regardless of their temporality, their process of economic change, their successful political strategies or their position in the international stage, still have a complex of inferiority attributed by the recurrent imagery of the model based on Western patterns and, therefore, on the center of capitalism?

As already mentioned, the dependency theory movement sparked fierce debates on Brazilian social thought by trying to debunk the myths of U.S. developmentalism and structuralism, as well as the determinations of a positivist Marxism that revolved around the experience of the Soviet Union. The supporters of that movement challenged the forms of characterizing the world, as represented by the theories of social evolution prevailing in the West. As Theotônio dos Santos argues, Latin America itself wanted full independence from the British and U.S. political pressures. In this context, it became a birthplace of theories that challenged the explanations that traditionally attributed the political and economic accomplishments of Europe to an alleged racial and cultural superiority (Dos Santos, 1970). Dependency theory allowed "understanding development and underdevelopment as a historic result of the development of capitalism as a world system that produced, at the same time, both development and underdevelopment" (Dos Santos, 2011, p. 09).

This theory critically considered the possibilities of internal development in a global capitalist system that stratified different nations in terms of economic status. The national bourgeoisies based their participation on the international capitalism, but did not compete on equal terms due to the constraints of a development started at a moment in history in which business groups of the center enjoyed a clear hegemony. Not even the crisis arising from decolonization, which opened up the doors to this issue, was enough to overthrow crystallized hegemonic positions (Dos Santos, 2010, p. 10). The dependency movement served as ground for Wallerstein's world-systems theory, which brought about a global view of the structures of capitalism reproduction as a background for the processes of cultural domination. Increasingly strong criticisms of Western epistemology centered in the universalization of the political and subjective ideal represented by the rational-emancipated European man are argued in the writings of the Latin American decoloniales thinkers Enrique Dussel (1995, 2003), Aníbal Quijano (1992; 2000), Walter Mignolo (1995; 2001; 2010) and Edgardo Lander (2005).

As a response to the economicist determinism of Marxist interpretations, a post-colonial line of interpretation sought to explain the cultural and symbolic elements of the relationship of domination between the center and the periphery. From the criticism of Said (2003) to the decoloniales researchers, the universal project of European modernity has been seen as a weapon of epistemological recolonization that covers all social sciences. It is worth incorporating into the legal field of studies a debate long embedded in the human and social sciences about the need to produce models that are both autonomous and independent from the Western-universal criteria for providing descriptions of world reality. In sociology, anthropology, history and political science, this debate has been enhanced by the defense of the idea of "provincilizing" European thought (Costa, 2006); that is, the idea that whatever is produced in the center derives from standards of sociability local to center, which, due to its political strength in the world relations of capitalism, consist of universalities of thought, politics and law. The interpretations presented by the Brazilian theory of law were restricted to the development of social and legal models that put the Brazilian society on the same footing as the cultural and intellectual standards of the capitalist center reality. As stated by Gonçalves, the use of parameters "forged by the European conceptual heritage" reinforces a vicious cycle of diagnosis of lateness and consequent frustrated reforms (Gonçalves, 2010). Once the central development standards are adopted, it is a matter of applying the European models to the peripheral realities whose historic processes triggered diverse sociabilities, which, therefore, do not fit the desired molds. The failure to fit into these molds causes the permanent intervention of social and economic reforms in favor of development, which also support permanent frustrations, which will entail additional interventions and the permanence of a discourse politically and hierarchically organized within global society (Gonçalves, 2010).

The post-colonial approach offers a lengthy debate on the relationship between universality and specificity of the "local", which is present in the issues of multiculturalism, protection and recognition of differences and in the hierarchies of the globalized world. However, the incorporation of this theoretical approach is still incipient in the legal field, which, as discussed above, neither goes beyond the alternatives of the modernizing project, nor discusses systematically the forms of domination and hegemony of capitalism in its normative formulations on law in the periphery. Therefore, it can be argued that the theory of law is very likely to incorporate post-colonial studies. Actually a set of scholars is bringing inside the field of law the pos-colonial perspective especially when they observe the multi-ethnic and multi-identity Constitutions in Latin countries as Bolivia and Venezuela. Despite the relevance of this approach, the main interest of this work is not the constitutionalization processes in Latin America, neither the recognition of rights inside the formal perspective of law, but instead the real possibilities of critique in these matters. This can mean, even the construction of other ideia of rights and the role of law.

One of the main risks that law field should care about this incorporation is falling into a reductionist criticism limited to the critique of importing models or of eurocentrism. To avoid this risk, it is argued that the critical theory of law as proposed by Buckel and Fischer-Lescano (2009) may expand the cognitive universe of post-colonial analyses of law. The dialogue of these two theoretical universes makes it possible to reinterpret the notion of reform in capitalism and its determining correlations with legal form. This is intended to observe how the notion of reform in the periphery operates within a certain "world view," which drives those that are determined to act consensually rather than from a mechanical perspective of power (Buckel; Fischer-Lescano, 2009). This calls for an investigation on how this consensus materializes certain values which underpin dynamics of reform deriving from a model of sociability that universalizes legal form, positions the strategy of the State as a birthplace for capitalism and places the subjects in the individualized figure of the emancipated rational man.

In short, the literature review in the first part of this research calls for new operative investigations of theory to analyze the assumption of work. On the one hand, the Brazilian theories of law lie on the border of projects for the improvement of the capitalist State, underpinned by legal form and based on the patterns of the semantics of the right of central countries. On the other hand, Latin American social thought, which flows into the dependency theory and into post-colonial studies, indicates the maintenance of social and economic differences and moral hierarchies between the global north and south, which allows analyzing the phenomenon of reforms in the periphery as a "syndrome" that moves towards continuous repetitions and frustrations. However, the reflections on dependency theory do not go beyond a determinist system that relates colonization and dependent development, failing to deeply analyze its cultural processes of resistance. Post-colonial thought, for one side, offers an important analysis key, which is the observation of categories from the notion of neocolonialism, which allows criticizing eurocentrism, but, on the other side, it is hardly able to broach the processes of domination by global capitalism. [6] These limitations call for a research agenda capable of extrapolating the conclusions of post-colonial studies into a critical theory of law of capitalist society. This is intended to identify the relationship between a model of modernization and the ideological dimension of reforms, which lead to the subordination to certain development standards grounded in Western epistemology, or a "world view" that determines the paths to be taken to ensure the support of global political power structures. This requires opening up for a theory of law forged from the concept of hegemony, as proposed by Buckel and Fischer-Lescano (2009).

4. Some steps for the further research agenda

The global purpose of this investigation is to develop an interpretation of the legal form of capitalism by mapping out State reforms, resulting from a dialogue between post-colonial thought and the critical theory of law. Research studies on Latin American thought and on Brazilian theory of law had been conducted as briefly presented in this project. A number of questions remained unanswered during the course of the first set of theoretical studies. Some problems that the Brazilian theory of law was not able to answer remain to be solved. It is necessary to review the critical theories touching the legal form in order to employ a macro-social approach on the strategy of reforms in global capitalism. At this research level, new analytical contributions can be offered to tackle the political and social variants of the phenomenon of reform in a non-deterministic approach, showing the processes of rationalization and fight for hegemony within this social formation.

As demonstrated in the theoretical background of the project, a key step of the research study depends on reviewing critical theories to the legal form that can be incorporated into the analysis framework to build a model for understanding the reforms in peripheral capitalism. Research on Brazilian theory of law found that these theories are not enough to develop an explanatory model that covers the structural analysis of the legal form and the mechanisms of rationalization of power linked to Western epistemology. A group of researchers in Germany has developed critical approaches that aim to distinguish the legal phenomenon as an instrument of power, stressing its paradoxical role, while concealing hegemonic visions of politics needed to support the operations of the legal dogmatic, creating new subjectivities, socially educating and opening space for counter-hegemony actions. [7] This interpretive key shows the process of rationalization of power in modernity, in which legal form takes a decisive role in the formation of social consensus, since domination does neither take place due to the existence of a transcendent authority, nor due to the violence monopolized by the State. This theory has a descriptive potential that can be operationalized for an interpretation of the most complex and sophisticated forms of domination that intertwine in the current social phenomena of reforms and their legal forms. It opens space for a fruitful dialogue with post-colonial studies, which, in recent years, have been consistently developed in innovative ways.

Most studies have focused on the economic and political effects of State reforms. In the case of legal reforms, as mentioned in this work, they were interpreted primarily by readings that justified their implementation without addressing the macro-social problems or limitations of such phenomena. In view of this scenario, the purpose of this research is to reflect on the Brazilian institutional situation, which has repeatedly sought strategies for social and economic development through reforms, whose results can be seen from a critical perspective.

Sovereignty in a world of tangled legal orders

Mirlir Cunha[1]

Abstract: Unlike the traditional view amongst legal theorists about the international order, this paper argues that we do not live in a world with global institutions able to enforce their standards to our social practice. This observation is based on the fact that the international relations are developing at the same rate as the sovereignty of the state is being reinforced. This is happening because global governance requires the state's infrastructure to make the international directives obligatory and respected by ordinary people.

This new situation can be described as a division of labour where every global instance of rule-making recognizes the others as important and limited. Nevertheless, the power to constrain is exclusive of the state's legal system, especially when human rights cases are under consideration, as some authors such as Marcelo Neves, Thomas Nagel, Amartya Sen, Joseph Raz, and Jurgen Habermas have argued.

Yet in the contemporary legal order there is no consensus about how this account of sovereignty is able to provide certainty and predictability. While Neves, for example, treats the "shared or divided sovereignty" as a set of constitutional interactions of tangled legal orders, where different cultures reflect about themselves and other analogous cultures with a view to learn something from the analysis of the other people's experience, Habermas focus on the level of democracy and how far politics becomes from citizens in this new context, and tries to identify the means to develop the idea of a dual citizenship, in which one can be at the same time a citizen of the country and of the international community.

However it may be, the solution to these problems must start from the acceptance that with a fragile international authority, state sovereignty is necessary to enforce the international standards, while, at the same time, cannot be seen as an excuse to disrespect that authority. Hence, the international community should move beyond the current strategy of reducing international aids for countries where international regulations are disobeyed. It should put these countries under pressure until their governments and their society revise their policies to respect the authority of the international community and the argument of human rights.

In the context of this interesting debate about the authorities of the international community and the state, this essay attempts to develop a jurisprudential theory of justice in a global world and to realize its effects on traditional concepts which figure in legal theory and in theories about the state.

Keywords: Global Justice, Sovereignty. Legal Theory.

1. The facts.

With the progress of international trade, interaction between people from all over the planet, global communication through the world wide web, and an increase in non-state institutions' regulatory activities, with different levels of entanglement between communities, it is possible to identify an interesting phenomenon—one that, until recently, had been making itself present in a rather shy manner. Around the discussions on globalization and its effects orbits the questioning of the realization of justice and promotion of human rights on a global scale. Furthermore, one must recognize its reflections on traditional conceptions of law that are the results of the theory of law and constitutional law, such as sovereignty, authority, and political self-determination of a people in its territory. Therefore, this is the important issue that guides the development of the present work.

When reflecting on the realization of human rights on a global scale, major contemporary philosophers and jurists, such as Jurgen Habermas, Amartya Sen, Anthony Appiah, Thomas Nagel, Joseph Raz, and Jeremy Waldron, made significant advances towards new interpretations that associate the aforementioned concepts regarding the protection of human dignity, the establishment of forms of political control that prohibits degrading treatment of human beings, and the institutionalization of the existing order beyond State borders. The recurrence with which the said concern is raised and the reasonableness of the analyses presented by these authors highlight the importance of this debate for understanding the legal practices adopted by our society.

Due to the importance and topicality of this issue, one can observe that the present discussion has been raising the interest of broad groups from the international community as the integrative effects of globalization policies are felt in a rather impactful manner, both inside the residences and over foreign policy-making. As can be seen in section two, this new approach significantly changes how the theory of law deals with international law and promotes the upgrading of traditional legal institutions based on concern for human dignity and human rights.

In section three, the author continues to delineate reasoning through the reflection on current solutions of control and the use of force in the international arena, in the face of the actual inefficiency of political and legal systems with regard to the current legal and political globalized practices. These developments are perceived as common constitutional problems that serve as foundations for serious issues that affect the globalized States, especially the democratic ones. Such issues are deemed too dangerous for the social stability of countries and will progress rapidly if political reforms are not effectively applied to various regulatory bodies whose decisions interfere in the relationships between individuals, organizations, and institutions.

As will be outlined in section four, mainly due to the economic crisis of 2008—which was the first major challenge to be addressed by the international community—and its consequences, the inequalities of the current practices of globalization denounced by intellectuals, not only in economic terms but also in social, humanitarian, and environmental, have become even more evident and have generated diverse reactions from the public policies of the community of states. This hard reality has set out a new form of organization of the National States, exposing a new concept of sovereignty. Contrary to predictions of great legal theorists of the first half of the twentieth century, there were no valid hypotheses intensifying national borders, nor letting them go altogether in favor of a central institution endowed with coercive power and control over political, legal, economic, and social issues. There was no central hypothesis in favor of a central institution that was skilled enough to develop core standards of recognition, change, and standards of judgment upon all States.

What happened, as discussed in section 5, was the realization that the solution to the current problems affecting political States and communities will not be arrived at unilaterally. There is a strong trend towards collective proposals, which require some loosening of the notion of sovereignty focuses on dialogue, cooperation, and negotiation with other States and peoples and is strengthened by enhancing its role as the guarantor of legal institutions within each nation. As a result, these collective proposals are able to protect the human dignity of the citizens of political States and promote human rights. This new direction shows that without the proper functioning of State institutions and official statements, as well as spaces for debate and discussion, any notion of global justice is an illusion too utopian to become a reality.

Therefore, the main thesis defended in this paper focuses on the issue of the reinterpretation of the notion of sovereignty under the influence of the phenomenon of transconstitutionalism, understood as the entanglement of constitutional orders and their impact on the design of a theory of justice in the international arena.

2. Law, coercion, and morals in international law.

Unlike the theoretical constructions about legal systems and the traditional theories of justice, which are well developed because they are linked to political and legal orders of States, the discussion on the functioning of the international order is surrounded by doubts and uncertainties. These doubts and uncertainties arise because any claim towards a theory of decision or a proposed theory for justice on a global level presents an obstacle. The obstacle is the idea that this field of human social relations is still in the early stages of development (NAGEL, 2005, p. 113), and therefore, suffers from a lack of basic constructions, such as the notion of authority and legitimacy of decisions.

For Bentham, the founder of the term international law (HART, 2009, p. 305), the idea of an order that regulates the actions between States should be devised in a manner analogous to the operation of the existing law in them. By transposing the notions regarding the rights of delimited space and groups, Bentham was faced with a number of incongruities that was inadmissible under the traditional General Theory of Law, such as the absence of coercion and institutions with authority to impose sanctions on transgressors whose behavior is regarded as deviant. In addition, there was no easy way to reconcile the notions of sovereignty with the imperative nature of a foreign legal system. These and other issues were the reasons that motivated the understanding that international standards should be taken as the rule of law only through their common use or convention, and therefore not constituting a proper legal system. The objections to this proposal, as Amartya Sen noted, led to an opposite understanding of what Bentham advocated. The said objections placed international law under an ethical perspective, the perspective of human rights that follows in the opposite direction, instead of understanding them as requirements and legal claims (SEN, 2011, p. 398).

The first contact with the debate on the ethics of international law in the General Theory of Law is a bit rough and generates a series of questions about legislation, legality, and coercion in international law. There are many doubts about the existence of a political community and international institutions that are able to coordinate the interaction between States and peoples. The more traditional texts, with a positivist view, do not address the issue with due importance. These texts are restricted to discussions either regarding the preparation of legislation in each State concerning the protection of individuals, or about the development of mechanisms for peaceful coexistence between States and peoples. Even sophisticated readings that critically address these standards, such as Hart's paper on International Law, start the analysis with the comparison between the former and internal law. In these papers, international law is compared to a simple system of primary rules of obligations. International law is then at a far less developed stage than domestic laws of national states, in which we see political and legal structures that are more organized and "sophisticated," and are regarded as a "luxury" (HART, 2009, p. 303). These domestic laws are the result of the hierarchical political organization of national states—something that is not perceived internationally.

Considering the long time lapse between the historical moment in which positivist conceptions were developed and the social realities of today, we see that historical facts overtook the assumptions of this theory on international law. Currently, they are an inadequate basis for contemporary reflection of the study of law, since international law can no longer be understood as "a set of standards accepted by States as binding norms" (HART, 2009, p. 304). Due to the failure of positivism in offering an appropriate proposal for the study of international law, some important jurisprudence philosophers became interested in the subject, and presented their contributions on it. Among these jurisprudence philosophers, we highlight the contributions of John Rawls.

Like Hart, Rawls also brings the elements of his theory to the international level. With this initiative, he goes on to defend the assumptions of political liberalism in the international order and the moral character of "International Law," which he called the "Law of Peoples." According to its design, the first step in the development of the Law of Peoples is the elaboration of principles of justice for a national society, according to which government, as a political organization of the people, is not the author of all its powers. That is because in reshaping the powers of sovereignty in the light of a reasonable Law of Peoples, the State would abdicate traditional rights to war and unrestricted internal autonomy (RAWLS, 2001, p. 34–5) when it comes to the protection of human rights.

Rawls' argument overcomes former positivists views according to which international law would be a simple set of rules of a factual character, denying an essential point for discussion about international law: the importance of moral character[2] contained in the notions of ius cogens and human rights. From then on, they are abandoned or reformulated, rendering space to the theoretical constructs compatible with the issues of justice and transconstitutionalism conflicts involving human rights.

This observation leads to the understanding of international law, today, not as a series of treaties and intergovernmental agreements (NEVES, 2009, p. 133), but as social and legal practices whose intentions express concerns mainly on issues relating to the defense of human rights. At the heart of the debate about constitutional aspirations, increasingly influenced by events and reflections developed around the world, is the concern for the protection and promotion of rights that tend to be seen as universal achievements. This fact leads to the recognition of a transconstitutional web established through the exchange of information and critical legal content.[3]

[2] In the view of Amartya Sen, Hart is one of the major proponents of the idea and the usefulness of human rights as a source of inspiration for legislation, according to positions presented by the jurist in the article "Are there any natural rights?" (SEN, 2011, p. 398–9). In this paper, there are no agreements with this interpretation of Hart's work. The proposal developed herein identifies the author as someone very concerned about the rights and fundamental guarantees of equality and freedom under the formalism of moral critique of law that may be held by official institutions, hence a coherent stance with the text of the known work. "The concept of law" (HART, 1955, p. 189). Regarding international law, our shared interpretation is that Hart argues (1) the thesis of separability between law and morality, since although the contents of international law resemble that of the primary standards (standards of conduct that establish obligations), it is improper to insist that all standards not supported by threat are a form of "moral" (Hart, 2009, p. 292); (2) the law critically accepted as a standard; and (3) the denial of the law as only a set of coercive orders.

Renowned jurists in the last thirty years, such as John Rawls, Jurgen Habermas, and, Amartya Sen, pointed out in their work on the notion of international law under the conception of human rights, which is taken as the basis of international law and therefore, as a connecting element between morality and law. In this way, human rights, when understood as coercive subjective rights that assure individuals a space for freedom and self-determination, would present two faces, much like Janus: one faces morality while the other faces the right itself (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 18).

Nowadays, support for the moral character of international law stems from the perception that one should care for the idea of justice in the context of international law, not only the differences involving conflicts between States, but also those that involve the State and its citizens in interdependent common cases that are often recognized in different legal systems. This interpretation makes the positioning of Rawls described above, although innovative, the target of much criticism, one of which came from Habermas. For the German philosopher, the theory presented by Rawls in his work "The Law of Peoples" is limited to the relations between people in the context of war, resulting in a subsidiary and insufficient protection of human rights in everyday relationships within States. It fosters a mild deflation of human rights into a new minimalism that ends up loosening the strength of human rights, by separating them from their essential moral impulse represented by the protection of the equal dignity of each. "This minimalism forgets that the continuous tense relationship, internal for the State, between universal human rights and the rights of private citizens is the legislative basis for the international dynamics" concerning human rights (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 35).

By developing a theory of justice in international law that strengths the relations between Peoples represented by States, Rawls underestimated the importance of the political participation of individuals that incorporates them into a collective will. The peoples conceive political participation and derive said participation from a binding contract. The advantage of the liberal democratic peoples is treated as inherent in this culture of political participation, leaving the analysis of the reason of success of these or the inhibiting factors of the development of other peoples, classified as "decent," "developing," or "outlaws." Rawls' rating system, besides being airtight and somewhat idealized when it comes to the nobility and morality of liberal peoples, presents a descriptive reason. This descriptive reason builds an international order lacking both mobility and the participation of individuals, through their critical positions, on the events happening around them.

Another important criticism of the proposal formulated by Rawls came from the acclaimed positivist Joseph Raz whose text, "Human Rights without foundations," posits that state autonomy was mistakenly appreciated by Rawls. Because state autonomy was mistakenly appreciated by Rawls, Joseph Raz insists that Rawls' doctrine of basic justice (structured on the State) cannot simply be extended to the international arena. The principles of justice that govern domestic relations cannot be extended to international relations. The criticism of Raz concludes that moral principles that determine the limits of sovereignty should not only reflect the limits of State authority, but also, relatively, set (establish) limitations on the possibility of justifying intervention by international organizations and other States in what concerns the offended State (RAZ, 2005, p. 16).

Notwithstanding the undeniable contribution made by Rawls' view about the law in the international arena, and through the criticism of his theory, it is possible to think of a theory of justice at the international level that does not depend only on the State. It is possible to identify the social and institutional practices that work in an inductive manner from the events and reflections from various locations around the world, which allow us to identify the occurrence of cross-pollination between constitutional challenges. Thus, on a case-by-case basis, it is possible to evaluate the aggregate result of this succession of episodes that affect the construction of moral concepts discussed by all spheres of the international community in a legal-constitutional political debate that is fostered within each State. From this point on, we must not only discuss the emancipation of the peoples, but also of individuals through citizenship, political, and democratic actions. Current theories are committed to the pursuit of interpretations that balance the ideas of shared sovereignty, public reasoning in the international community, institutions and control of transnational economic practices, and social policies that benefit the development of the dignity of individuals.

3. The concentration of force.

Instead of promoting a federalist hierarchy among nations that concentrates on, and is organized around, a center of power endowed with supranational authority, the discussion about the organization of the States of the international community has made good progress towards the defense of transconstitutional hierarchical cooperation between the international, national, and supranational structures that are in place today. This progress, however, has not yet allowed for a proper understanding of the social, political, and legal scenarios currently developing in the international community due to the exchange of practices stimulated by globalization.

As an achievement of the last fifty years, one can point to the deflation of the concern regarding the issue of the understanding of international law or human rights as law, as constructs that did not fit in the model of law as commands constrained by threats. The debate was overcome after the State concentrated coercive functions, concerning issues of human rights, in structures set up by the State. This means that, according to the history, as long as there is the absorption of the ideals shared universally by constitutions and the strengthening of transnational regulatory bodies, one can verify the importance of state institutions in the process of the achievement and creation of acceptable legal behavior by the international community.

In a multilateral legal and political cooperation, it is possible to observe that the external decisions of States are evaluated and interpreted for them through the institutions of such cooperation. The States only then later incorporate the external decisions in the laws of the inner plane. After performing an evaluative step, the reason constructed in the external arena is critically introduced within the internal orders by state institutions, which are able to welcome and legitimate demand, through the imposition of sanctions. The compliance with legal practices results from interpretations contained in external decisions, especially when these decisions relate to human rights (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 62).

Thus, the theme of human rights, which was viewed with some suspicion,[4] finds protection in the constitutional powers that mention respect for fundamental rights. At the same time, in order for the violations of these guarantees not to be hidden and therefore become invisible because of the sovereignty of each State, the defense of human rights must be shared with agencies and supranational entities or interstate bodies. From the point of view of the intertwining between legal systems, these agencies, entities, or bodies monitor and control the episodes of offense and divulge them through their agencies and media. Therefore, they are able to pressurize States, entities, or individual transgressors.

[4]Habermas, mentioning Neves, warned that "regardless of the strength merely symbolic of fundamental rights in many of the façade democracies of South America and other

Due to the problems of efficiency and legitimacy faced by organizations and international institutions that have the duty to oblige various States to respect and promote human rights, the international community has been structured in such a way that there was no concentration of political and legal debate about human rights in various forums. In spite of this lack of concentration and political debate, the implementation of coercive and corrective measures necessary for the realization of human rights, remained tied to the local forces and legal structures of each State (NEVES, 2009, p. 165).

As pointed out by Anne-Marie Slaughter (NAGEL, 2005, p. 139), one can verify that the recognition of the new order in the consolidation process involves the understanding that international governance must be conducted in accordance with the capacity and responsibility of the various actors belonging to the communities that make up the international community. In this scenario of constant negotiation and communication among stakeholders, a chain of "shared labor" is instituted by the articulation between external and local authorities. This exchange takes place within the sovereignty of the States. This type of network process connects disintegrated parts in transterritorial structures that share common responsibilities and powers beyond the boundaries of individual States.

In this sense, it is possible to agree with the understanding that there is a strategic gain by stimulating the defense and realization of human rights as a national project, built by the critical legal debate about the interpretation of these rights, according to the cultural perspectives and political community whose practice is under evaluation (NEVES, 2009, p. 153). It is believed that this attitude allows greater legitimacy of the decision making process, given that the interpretation of human rights is promoted through an adjustment of the claims inherent in the content of these regional expectations.[5] Concerning this point, the aforementioned author establishes that even with the diversity of the doctrinal and jurisprudential repertoire, Constitutional Courts of the countries or supranational communities seek legitimacy for their decisions through a process of questioning institutional practices that are contrary to the protection of the freedoms and rights of individuals. It can be observed that Constitutional Courts are becoming increasingly self-referential in the solution of common constitutional cases, in a typical case of migration of constitutional ideas. More than a phenomenon of reciprocal influence between legal states, or a case of transjudicialism where courts promote reciprocal referrals, transconstitutionalism between legal systems implies that, in typically constitutional cases, the decisions of Constitutional Courts invoke the decisions of other states, cited not only as obiter dicta, but also as elements of the rationes decidendi. This phenomenon implies a reinterpretation of foundations not only of the starter line, but also of the finishing line (NEVES, 2009, p. 166–167).

In the examples presented by Neves, it is interesting to note that even the more closed courts, such as the United States, have some concern with the debate being conducted in foreign jurisprudence (NEVES, 2009, p. 168). This demonstrates that Americans are not so oblivious to world events and hermetically focused on their propositions. They also accept the persuasive force of the arguments advanced by other peoples, although they are more reluctant to accept political reflections undertaken by other communities. Contrary to this American position, Courts in South Africa, Canada, India, Zimbabwe, Israel, New Zealand, Ireland, Switzerland, England, and Brazil, among others, did not adopt the stance of the immediate deployment of foreign law. Instead, they adopted a reception of foreign law through internal processes of critical self-validation (NEVES, 2009, p. 171). Thus, they turned the reception into a dialogue capable of representing the development of reflective self-consistency while maintaining itself constitutionally open to learning from the experiences of others Courts, in judicial practice or presentation of models based on the study of comparative law.

[5] Neves writes about the search for a model to "reconcile the dissension" between constitutional orders involved in the conflict and how to allow that there is a minimum balance between legal consistency (internal) and legal adequacy (external) in a transcontitutional "conversation" (NEVES, 2009, p. 165).

p. 184), we find that there is a form of rejection verified in less efficient Courts in the transconstitutional process that are characterized by the absence of a minimum standard with respect to fairness. This situation, however, is not so simple, since whenever a country does not accept transconstitutionalism, due to not adopting constitutional institutions in their modern sense, but radically rejects it, there is an almost an insuperable difficulty for the transconstitutional conversation that will change the status quo. And so proposes Marcelo Neves, following the trails of Slaughter, is the overcoming of this event and the search for interaction with these courts averse to constitutionalism, even though passive agents initially, through face-to-face meetings between judges. The success of this proposal is due to the assumption that the transconstitutionalism model imposes respect for the differences between constitutional orders and their particularities with regard to the normative content as well as procedures.

The realization of constitutional dialogue between legal State depends on the emergence of a "judicial comitas" and on judicial trading through which one might establish the following chain of events—while the former can provide the structure and rules for a global dialogue between judges in the context of specific cases, the latter is more limited and reflects the overall bankruptcy of cases that go beyond borders. This transconstitutionalism should not be confused with an overarching global order (NEVES, 2009, p. 186), but should be recognized as the provision of legal entities engaged in resolving disputes, interpreting, and applying the law in the best manner possible. The starting point of transconstitutionalism is not a denial, but the opening of State constitutionalism to other jurisdictions, either similar or from a different species.

Thus, one will deem a decision adequate, perennial and stable, and thus legitimate, when it was guided by dialogue and accessible arguments able to represent the desire of local people for pursuing the protection of individuals. Considering the peculiar aspects of the history of the regional community inside in a global context of the protection achievements by the international community, the achievements guide the ongoing debate, with the occurrence of internally influenced episodes that allow the change in parties' conceptions (NEVES, 2009, p. 228).

With the author of "Transconstitutionalism," it is manifested interest in this essay, but also demonstrates the concern about what he calls the development of a right "no punctual" (contrapontual in Portuguese) (NEVES, 2009, p. 154). A nice overview of this phenomenon is the realization that, at first, it promotes the adjustment of the tension between internal and external perspectives held by a constitutional entanglement founded in the conversation needed for reciprocal learning for the actors of an interpretive community, which is very positive. Although, at a different time, it authorizes the relativization of the normativity of human rights under the same matter between the States on the grounds of "direito contrapontual" (in Portuguese), a promoter of the autonomy of national melodies and shares with misaligned institutional practices that are being promoted by the community.

The harmful behavior, builder of fear, perpetuates cynical interpretations that deny rights and restrict the efficiency of the design rules provided by the history of these achievements. On this issue, Habermas also does not fail to expose the problematic side of the attempt to establish a world order made up of fragmentary institutions, because these, can be unsuccessful, can cause ambiguity of human rights, which makes its own standards suspect (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 32).

4. The new conception of sovereignty.

Regardless of the risks, the scenario that is set for States and international organizations and transnationals is that they are closely related in their actions and attitudes through a legal code, not just a moral code, in that this scenario is open to the experiences and social practices, political and economic facts, and interpretations, which are derived from its constitution. From start to finish, we verify that the various contemporary legal systems share a common identity since all of them share the same binary code of the common legal system, legal/illegal, and the problems they face (NEVES, 2009, p. 115).

However, what is legal or illegal and how the legal systems of a modern world society within a plurality of orders work, each with their different legal requirements and programs, in a theory of law, remains an empty question, as it is no simple task to correlate the basis of various legal barriers for cooperation. Thus, the relationship between systems must be done first before the possibilities of building a cross rationality through reciprocal learning and creative exchange can be optimized. In this way, the internalization and externalization of information arising from social spheres play various roles in the efficient realization of the binary code, legal/illegal. The internalization and externalization of information is reciprocal in a multitude of orders. The fact that there is a multiplicity of orders does not mean they should be isolated. Since always, even in classical international law, input/output relations and the interpretation of legal orders have been observed through treaties, the international legal order of representatives, and practical and legal perspectives.

As set forth by Marcelo Neves, Jurgen Habermas and Amartya Sen, the point of convergence between these multiple orders is the ability of people to question and act in a critical manner. The action should have political reflections when considering "problems" of their community and the achievements of other communities. The dynamics mentioned are moved by a sense of reciprocity that grounds the idea of equality between individuals and makes them act in pursuit of treatment and conditions similar to others.

For their potential in fostering a political-legal regime in which people are viewed equally, self-determination, political liberalism, and the democratic rule of law are seen as social constructions that contribute to the consolidation of the notion of human dignity, the central point of the fight for human rights claims today. This positive perception of these social constructions stems from the fact that these 1) highlight tolerance to individual choices regarding religion, sexual choice, 2) and are endowed with institutions that seek to suppress possible offenses based on gender, race, background, or financial ability, allow social advances, through the inclusion and participation of people in the design of community projects. It does not hold here that the aforementioned social constructions are not prone to institutional errors, but, if there are distortions, these have the environment conducive for corrections.[6]

In this respect, in his work "On the European Constitution," Habermas[7] defends a cosmopolitan attitude in which human rights, col-

[6] Nicolas Berggruen and Nathan Gardels, however, present a position somewhat skeptical about the ability of liberal democracies and participatory self-regulation. In their work, Intelligent Governance for the 21st Century, the authors point out flaws in the self-regulatory process of liberal democracies, which often fall prey to a "consumption citizenship" that presents populist policies unable to promote policies and structural unpleasant reforms to the population that are necessary for fundamentals of good governance in the long term. They question whether, like the market, a liberal democracy is able to regulate itself to preserve its system from malfunctioning (BERGGRUEN; GARDELS, 2013, p. 69).

[7] In the aforementioned work, as highlighted by Alessandro Pinzani in presenting the Brazilian edition of Habermas' book (2012: p. XIV), unlike earlier works, the German philosopher adopts a decidedly normative position on the concept of human dignity, lectively constructed through institutional achievements[8] has always found in its core the notion of human dignity. He regarded human dignity as "the conceptual hinge that connects the morale of equal respect for each with the positive law and the democratic legislation so that, in their cooperation under favorable historical circumstances, can emerge a political order based on human rights " (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 17–18).

Compatible with the thought presented by Habermas, Kwame Anthony Appiah highlights that the commitment to human dignity, built by local political movements with outpouring of support from the international community, is the attitude that avoids disrespectful actions towards others and allows the evolution of a legal system toward the preservation of individuals (APPIAH, 2012, p. 140). On the notion of human dignity, Jeremy Waldron argues that the spread of the concept of dignity offers one promising idea to envision to all people the right to the same noble treatment, previously restricted to the high caste. That means, he continues, building concepts that give everyone the same respect and equal rights, ideas worthy of egalitarian liberalism (WALDRON, 2009:28).

For a sense of reciprocity, it is necessary that before an identity geared towards guaranteeing the right to respect is established for the democratization of criticism, it is important to make the criticism a popular and common practice, thereby spreading reflexive thoughts. Thus, the concern is with respect to what makes the connection between the good life, built by the individuals' participation in government, and the place they occupy in the world. The universal dignity, which Habermas also attributes to all persons, supports the connotation of self-respect in social recognition, an attitude referred to by Appiah as one of honor. According to the philosopher,

> (...) The honor is not a vestige of a decadent pre-modern order, for us, it is what it always was: a mechanism driven by dialogue between our self-conceptions and consideration of others, which can propel us to fade seriously our responsibilities in a world we share. A person with integrity will care to live according to their

one that theories of justice have always avoided. This attitude can be illustrated by the passage according to which human dignity, for the author, is one and the same everywhere and for each, based on the indivisibility of human rights (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 16).

[8] According to the author, "Human Rights resulted from violent historical struggles for recognition and sometimes revolutionary" (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 28).

> ideals. If you can, we should respect it. But worry about doing the right thing is not to worry about being worthy of respect. It is the concern with the respect that makes the connection between living well and our place in the social world. The honor makes the integrity public. (APPIAH, 2012, p. 184)

In the same sense, Waldron also talks about honor, distinction, and position when dealing with the legal notion of dignity as it is conceived today. However, for him, unlike the majority of philosophers who believe in the loss of certain habits distinctive of value as the gain for the construction of the notion of dignity, there was a unification of the social classes. They share the same habits of nobility and equal respect as universal rights, and reject special privileges or honor as corresponding rights (WALDRON, 2009, p. 27).

Since human dignity is a concept about equal respect, it is grounded in a sense of belonging to a community that is organized geographically and temporally under the banner of a civil status. Hence, the concept of human dignity is promoted by combining the moral contents, with equal respect for each other and an order of citizens who are subjects and are endowed with rights that are recognized as equal and claimable (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 24).

Thus, the philosopher predicts that the validity of positive human rights is only perceivable when situated in a particular community, primarily within a state, in the form of fundamental rights. However, for Habermas, they are endowed with a claim to universal validity that transcends national boundaries and towards a "cosmopolitan inclusive community" based in a "democratically constituted world society," which does not need to develop the same characteristics and structures of the State itself (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 24). Right now, what we observe is an idea of "shared or split sovereignty."

Throughout the debate on the topic, especially based on the experience of community law of the European Union, the notion of sovereignty was reinterpreted through the concept of "shared or split sovereignty" between legal systems that intertwine in what can be referred to as the "transnationalization of popular sovereignty" (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 50), or the "transconstitutionalism between supranational law and state law" (NEVES, 2009, p. 152). The new paradigm means the transfer of a part of "competence of competence" for a more comprehensive legal domain present in a relationship of complementarity that is located in a "network of constitutional elements" in the view of the citizen (NEVES, 2009, p. 153–154). This phenomenon points to a constitutional conversation focused on mutual learning, rather than a monolithic hierarchical way, whose process consists of three components. These are: (1) the democratic communitarisation of the idea that the subjects of Law are free and equal, (2) the organization of collective action capabilities, and (3) the means to integrate a civil solidarity among strangers (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 50).

The similarities between Neves and Habermas concerning the matter in question go only as far as its identification, as they differ on the understanding of what it represents. Neves values the intertwining of orders through the process of reciprocal learning between the legal orders established in multilateral discussion forums, mostly officers, about certain shared constitutional matters. Habermas' argument about constitutional change focuses on dual citizenship accumulated by citizens of European nations in a unique process in which it is possible to follow the formation of a new form of sovereignty where the individual is at the same time a citizen of the nation and a citizen of the Union.[9]

Thus, Habermas supports the idea of transnationalization of popular sovereignty as a democratic alliance between nation states so that, on the one hand, nation states accept to undergo rights established at a supra-national level, and on the other, give citizens the constituent power of the union with a limited number of "constituent States," receiving a mandate from their people to be consistent for the foundation of a supranational community (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 49).

Thinking in terms of Habermas, according to whom honor and value the political capacity of each individual as a conductor of his own life project, raising it to the merit of the writer and interpreter of legal and constitutional history to be inherited by their peers, is to also report that the process of global governance performed by intertwining institutions and governmental entities, and non-governmental, lacks a deficit of democratic legitimacy. This deficit results in the gap between those endowed with power to decide and will be influenced by the consequences of political decisions. The reflection of this political abyss generates a series of distortions increasingly complicated and impractical to overcome with only localized measures (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 85).

This same observation is made by Berggruen and Gardels (2013:48), when they analyzed the changes in globalization, from the [9]According to Habermas "(...) the division of sovereignty between two subjects constituents, citizens and peoples of the States" (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 90).

1990s to the present day. According to them, the "economic power" experienced pre-2008 crisis resulted in a cultural and political assertiveness that led to a "pluralism normal" in the history of humanity. However, the complexity of a greater global integration in trade, investment, production, consumption, information flows, has pressed authorities to demand greater involvement of governments at the technical and policy levels, mega urban regional, national, and supranational level in order to manage systemic linkages of interdependence that exist today. In conclusion, everyone will lose if it all falls apart.

Thus, according to the authors, "the political awakening that is noticeable in many places requires the dignity of meaningful participation. The failure to find an institutional response to this challenge will result in a crisis of legitimacy for any government system, for the inability to function enabling inclusive growth and employment, or it is because a 'democratic deficit' that silent many voices of the population will harm an effective consent" (BERGGRUEN; GARDELS, 2013, p. 49).

The expressions above represent the current responses to writings, such as that of Thomas Nagel, in which institutions are sustained in a stage of pre-organization of world politics which, despite the abovementioned democratic deficit and in spite of being deemed "unfair" for not having passed democratic process, have the capacity to implement measures of common interest among States imposed by bargaining power between them, thus being able to minimize the problem of global justice in a system that may be centralized and then critically questioned (NAGEL, 2005, p. 146).

5. Politics in the contexts of life.

The pessimistic scenario described by Habermas (2012:85), derived from the unfolding of the global crisis of 2008, is about a society in which the political elite is far from the population, which in its turn, ignores the real intentions of those who made these policies that are followed by Nations; who change the rules unilaterally, focusing on efficiency, and deconstructing, in the wake of their advance, the guarantees and rights of individuals. About this Habermasian concern, Amartya Sen affirms (2011:377) that democracy, through the representation that it causes between citizens and government, allowed the development of measures that guaranteed freedoms and reduced social inequalities, which can stimulate the healthy growth of the individual. Without the controlling instruments of existing decisions in a democratic context, global governance would possibly become nothing more than a government of bureaucratic political elite, insensitive to the needs of particular communities and involved only with its power and institutional arrangements.

Discussing democracy, Sen (2011:359), citing Habermas, describes the need for a public arena where arguments can be defended freely during the process of decision making. This is recognized not only in solemn moments of the procedures of democratic decision-making, but also in the day-to-day speech and actions of the people of a political community that reinterpret social practices, allowing for reflection and improvement of these through transit of information and demands between stakeholders and those with power to decide (SEN, 2011, p. 438).

Because they are bound to the community they represent, the holders of political power should be aware of the fact that when the gap between what is said and what is perceived increases; when the difference between truth and propaganda is so great, people eventually simply cease to believe in the system—a system that will take only as much as a push to fall (BERGGRUEN; GARDELS, 2013, p. 81). Therefore, at any level of State action, authorities should cherish acting in accordance with the desires and expectations of their populations, favoring space for debate and accountability as a means to avoid being targeted or criticized by the public. Thus, the public sphere of debate is the environment wherein one will find the possibility of good governance that allows for an environment where plans capable of producing patterns of conduct and standards, and with the ability to ensure the promotion of human dignity and citizenship are discussed (SEN, 2011, p. 383–384).

To perform in the arena where public reason can be conducted, certain institutions are needed. As Nagel points out, the individual and political action of the people only makes sense in a manner capable of changing consolidated social practices when they are contextualized in a mechanism endowed with structures in motion, with the potential to be targets of the insurgency. Anarchy does not allow for progress as it seeks to restrict the ability of individuals to move toward a definite proposal for the long term. However, contrary to what the American philosopher supports, one should not be compelled to accept illegitimate and unjust institutions as a necessary evil to achieve global justice (SEN, 2011, p. 362).

As the capacity for action and communication is not limited to national borders, the preservation of the media and free press represents the maintenance of important arenas for the promotion of public argumentation and protection of human rights in transnational forums (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 84). After all, among the achievements of democracy and its inclusive process of participation is the ability to "make people interested, through public discussion, in the difficulties of others and have a better understanding of their lives" (SEN, 2011, p. 378). Defending the standpoint of Appiah, based on Habermas' communication and discourse theory, Sen (2011:427) explores the importance of pressure from the world media and human rights organizations in the protection of fundamental rights in the local communities, where hierarchical exclusionary practices disrespects the constitutional freedoms of weaker individuals by reason of their condition, subordination, or minority.

Thus, one can conclude that legal orders based on subjective rights, protected by the freedom of expression and the ability of political action of individuals, are indeed endowed with sovereign institutions, which can be deemed legitimate, as they are constantly subject to correction by their population. Although regarded as the most efficient ones to date, even these institutions face major challenges over the economic and political entanglement in the international arena, which despite being touted as a stage for decisions with serious effects on national constitutional spheres, are characterized by the absence of any form of coordinating or legitimately established power that hinders the development of responses to shared problems.

There is no denying that all sovereignty nowadays is open to transnational learning, even though some are more than others are. It is observed that such opening has as its foundation the quest for efficiency that reflects the quality of life of society and its political maturity, economic and social. Such is the new format of State sovereignty that needs to be articulated at various levels—national, international, and transnational, which can develop individuals and make a system thrive. Due to the tangling of very similar and interconnected dilemmas, in all corners of the planet, States must share the idea of the realization of the protection and promotion of human rights as a type of justice in the international arena, endowed with reflexivity, impartiality, and transparency.

6. Conclusion

The discussions on global justice have progressed towards the ability of societies to associate the regional interests of their population in broader perspectives that affect all others. From the moment one verifies the existence of connected practices through a network that surpasses the code of sovereignty with relative ease and familiarity, one might notice the consolidation of other decision-making arenas in different environments which, with or without mature Institutions, will require a new attitude from the traditionally practiced policies in the current constitutional States of nowadays. This evidence left behind the limitations and doubts posed by legal positivism of the first half of the twenty-first century as to the existence of international law and the sharing of common ideals such as human rights.

That which affects the populations of the world today the most is directly linked to their ability to generate welfare societies, or efficiency societies, and to promote a sense of dignity. Socioeconomically stable societies tend to persevere in their territories without serious conflicts and promote the strengthening of institutions endowed with legitimacy and credibility. Their development is so great that it renders them able to generate patterns capable of influencing other societies, to the extent to which they are presented as viable after an incorporation process through procedures and local interpretations.

As pointed out by Marcelo Neves, who innovatively verified the strengthening of what he called "cross-pollination" between constitutional systems of the world, pointing out the decisions reached by major courts of the world that were in full dialogue, we now realize that there is more than dialogue in this new social formation that affects the interdependent global society as a whole. There are legitimate demands for representation, in different spheres of power, that use of the media as grounds for action and political pressure.

It is unsettling to acknowledge that there is a mismatch in the international arena between the economy and law, on one the hand, and politics on the other, the latter being practiced in an unsatisfying manner—or none whatsoever, depending on the subject. Flowing from the thought of Habermas, it is seen that this gap has caused political instability in many countries, even liberal democracies, whose systems, by themselves, are not capable of generating responses to the welfare demands of the population.

The actions outlined until now by political leaders have been insufficient or hopeless since their early stages, due to the lack of ability from the structures to articulate internationally concrete policies that combine efficiency and legitimacy. Although limited and with little success, in Europe, as pointed out by Habermas (2012:62), there are already global forums such as the G20 in which, according to appointment by Nicolas Berggruen and Nathan Gardel (2013:53), one can point to an outline of international coordination skilled to control organizations and practices that erode the national structures, thereby causing serious imbalances and constitutional problems.

We can refer to this phenomenon as politics being required to expand its borders beyond sovereignty boundaries in a process of "political globalization," arising from economic and cultural globalization. This historical moment is characterized by diffuse uncertainty due to the lack of market transparency, to government omission, as well as to the convenience of various governments regarding risky and ambitious economic practices. Faced with the current disarray of institutions in the face of adversity, the actual stage demands a concern with stable and sustainable growth. Therefore, the capability of survivability of States and their institutions depends directly on the willingness of their societies to self-correcting in an articulated and critique-wise way, mixing regional, supranational, and international actions that both seek results and focus on the development of people and strengthening of human rights.

This means that if at first national policies stimulated economic globalization, resulting in an opening of markets and cultures, which established a certain easing of sovereignty, now the same policy sees the need to share this sovereignty and to render accounts to external parties, or risk having to forfeit the credibility and trust of the international community, risk-averse, and eager for growth.

As a new chapter in the history of mankind begins, we perceive that the current form of organization and production will tend to stabilize this cycle when the sense of belonging to a broader community becomes more encouraged in a way that the highest standards of human development goals are taken seriously by any government. When the expansion of rights and the rule of law occur in a sustainable manner, public demonstrations and popular political demands shall be taken seriously by governments and institutions, as they will be supported as sources of information about the system malfunctions that may contain the key to improving governance and the development of the peoples.

Saulo Monteiro de Matos[1]

Abstract: In this paper, my intention consists in trying to shed light on the debate about authority and law. I argue that the current debate on authority and law corresponds "cum grano salis" to the classical claim of the doctrine of popular sovereignty. According to the classical formula of popular sovereignty, all state authority is derived from the (will of the) people. Different from many current answers to the challenge of justifying legal authority, modern constitutional texts claim that political actions in form of legal commands are only justified (and hence legitimate) if and only if they correspond to the will of the people. This idea gives rise to the following paradox: people are at the same time authority and subject of legal commands. Accordingly, there are two ways to solve a paradox: either denying one of the paradox premises or accepting the paradox in a dialectical way. On the one hand, one can deny the existence of such a necessary relationship between the will of the people and the law. In this case, law should be obeyed not in virtue of a necessary identity between law and society, but rather as matter of contingent reason. Accordingly, the consent of the subjects has a role of improving the efficacy of laws. On the other hand, one can state that a weak and defeasible obligation to obey the law follows from the necessary identity between law as social action and its subjects. According to this argument, people are not just likely to obey the law if it corresponds to their will. Rather, it is necessary to the concept of law to be a result of a social will. I believe that this second way to deal with the paradox of popular sovereignty will turn out to be better able to deal with law's own understanding, especially regarding the legitimacy of (constitutional) court decisions.

I. Introduction.

Although political and legal philosophy have concentrated their efforts on elucidating basic issues of contemporary political authority since the second half of the last century, basic concepts of contemporary constitutional law – like human dignity, popular sovereignty or social State – have not been regarded or considered as a possible way to approach such problems of politics and law. Contrary to this approach, current legal science (above all in Europe) remains using these basic legal concepts in order to approach fundamental issues of law and, hence, to construct a legal conceptual framework, which should be able to give legal and often ethical answers (Bogdandy 2009, 364–400).

Concepts are the basic structure or unity of our thoughts. They are formed through unities of representation and propositions. From these basic structures, legal science generates rules and norms that are intended to form institutions and guide human actions. Furthermore, these concepts are able to generate values, that is to say, to guide principles that can direct legal, i.e., political actions.

One of these basic legal concepts of contemporary constitutional law is popular sovereignty (I am going to abbreviate it as "PS"). PS is usually associated with two formulas: "We the people …" and "all State Authority is derived from the People". These propositions isolated are usually not taken as being able to generate institutional rules or norms in the sense of standards of actions, but rather ideas, values or principles. PS is, therefore, conceived as a kind of value which should guide political actions and institutions. Furthermore, it is possible to say that PS should, according to modern constitutionalism, provide an answer to the question of the legitimacy of political authority in a constitutional State.

I will, in this sense, approach the question of this paper as a question of the possible meaning of PS in the law. In doing that, I will be approaching the problem of what the meaning of the proposition "all State Authority is derived from the People" is and, precisely, what should be accepted as the best explanation of this idea so that it makes sense. Nevertheless, I am not able to present any concluding view about PS. This concept has a paradoxical life due to its nature as physical liberty and I am not sure if this paradox should be solved or the dialectics of modern political authority presupposes such a paradox. Although the subject of PS is extremely large, the goal of this paper is very limited: it consists in reconstructing the modern idea or value of PS and defending the possibility of talking about PS in context of political authority debates.

II. The concept of popular sovereignty in law.

One of the fundamental cruxes of modern political and legal philosophy seems to consist in identifying State authority with reference to individual wills, the fundamental Kantian dichotomy between autonomy and authority. Law consists in the most fundamental instrument of exercising State authority in the modernity. In this sense, a political authority can be regarded as legitimate if and only if there is a relative clear connection between the political action of the State and the individual actions in lato sensu.[2] Politics and law go hand in hand in the enterprise of justifying the political authority of the State, that is to say, in making a clear route from the individual will to the will of the State. In sum, political philosophy has to do with the attempt to guarantee self-determination through the law.

Expressions such as "popular sovereignty", "parliamentary sovereignty" or "national sovereignty" are still used by lawyers in order to justify State actions. Despite the possible relevance or contingent meaning of these concepts in a national legal framework, it is, nonetheless, hard to grasp their real or relative necessary conceptual meaning. Indeed, it is hard to see whether it is possible to relate a central meaning to each of these terms, but it seems to be the case that these variations of sovereignty have always meant something like the unlimited power of a parliament, a people or a nation due to a specific concept of sovereignty (Eleftheriadis 2010, 537).

In spite of this possible meaning of sovereignty as unlimited power, popular sovereignty has possibly more to do with a most fundamental enterprise of justifying the State authority. I follow, in this particular point, the basic idea of Tocqueville regarding democracy and PS: "Sovereignty of the people and democracy are two perfectly correlative words; the one represents the theoretical idea, the other its practical realization" (Tocqueville YTC, CVh, 22). PS is without doubt a central legal concept not just because of its historical character as normative claim of the constitutionalism movement of the eighteenth and nineteenth century, but above all due to its presence (Vertextung) in almost all currently democratic and non-democratic constitutions in the world. The invocation of the People as the source and the only fundament of political authority represents the basic claim of modern political philosophy.[3] In this way, PS raises a claim of universality: only the subjects, i.e., individuals can justify a political authority.

Thus, PS leads to the view of a limited political authority; an authority which has to be justified through the individual interests. But, there are two other concurrent views to the PS model of State.

On the one hand, there are of course other kinds of legitimacy transfer between sovereignties in the history of political philosophy, for instance with reference to God or another authoritative will. A political authority would be justified should there be another authority, who is able to transfer its power to the currently one. According to PS, this kind of enterprise clearly fails to provide a rational answer to the fact of political authority due to the very nature of a political authority, that is to say, due to its essence as collective action (Hobbes 1839, 74). This ontological argument runs thus: if political authority must be regarded as a collective action, i.e., someone has authority over a number of individuals, this political authority as collective action presupposes individual actions in order to be a political or collective authority. The acceptance act of a given authority is a necessary element of the authoritative phenomenon and the mere reference to God or another authoritative will cannot take this fact into consideration.

Another kind of justification in contrast to PS, on the other hand, seems to embrace the acceptance act of an authority and, furthermore, turn it in the only possible justification of political authority. Accordingly, the political authority of a State can be identified either with the fact of a sovereign power or with the fact of a so-called rule of recognition. Political authority is a social fact and, hence, one should not seek to justify it or to establish its conceptual deduction.

In the case of political authority as the fact of a sovereign power, the State action has authority because someone with a sovereign power made it such, not because of what they demand or entail (Eleftheriadis 2010, 539). And this sovereign power results from a pure historical process of confronting powers and prevalence of one, the ultimate domination of one historical power.[4] According to Austin (1995, 166): "1. The bulk of a given society are in a habit of obedience or submission to a de-terminate and common superior: let that common superior be a certain individual person, or a certain body or aggregate of individual persons. 2. That certain individual, or that certain body of individuals, is not in a habit of obedience to a determinate human superior". Hart (1994, 53–58) has already proved the failure of such enterprise in providing a plausible explanation for the succession of sovereigns. I will offer here only a brief account of Hart's criticism, since they have been well explored in the bibliography of legal theory. According to Hart, there are two basic problems of this account: (1) it cannot accommodate the idea of the succession of the sovereign. "When Rex I dies there will have to be an unbridgeable gap in the legal system. There cannot be a legal system until Rex II establishes his authority through a pattern of obedience" (Eleftheriadis 2010, 544); and (2) that idea of political authority as a matter of fact fails to take into account the necessary procedure of identifying a command issued by a political authority. For it is necessary to what makes the case that a give speech act must be taken for a command or law. "It is usually the case, even in states where sovereignty is in the hands of a single person, that laws are created only when the sovereign follows a certain accepted procedure of legislation" (Raz 1980, 38)

The fact of a rule of recognition as possible explanation for a political authority turns to be very similar to that of the fact of a sovereign power. Accordingly, a command has authority not because of its content, but rather due to the existence of a given secondary rule. A rule of recognition consists in a necessary secondary rule, which transfers authority to State agents. It is the fact of a rule which creates a sovereign power and entails necessarily the habit of obedience regarding the people (the acceptance of the rule) and the use of the rule by officials, courts and others as authoritative criteria for identifying primary rules and obligations (Hart 1994, 100). In spite of the clear necessity of such rule regarding a modern political authority, the theory tells us only that there is a secondary rule and, however, fails to present a justification for the political authority.

These explanations of political authority are concurrent views to PS in the sense that either they do not embrace the individuals as ultimate source of political authority, or they refuse to provide a justification for a given political authority. Even if one accepts Austin's or Hart's explanation of legal authority as a fact or rule, it does not follow that the authority is justified, i.e., legitimate. Authority as a fact or secondary rule does not explain the authority per se, that is, why it is rational to obey the States' or a political authority's commands. PS, like the reference to will of God or some hereditary rule, seeks to provide a kind of rational deduction for the political authority and, therefore, cannot be satisfied with a mere reference to the existence of an habit or rule. In Tocqueville's ironic words: "There are even some who have discovered it (the national will) fully formulated in the silence of the people and who have thought that from the fact of obedience came, for them, the right of command" (Tocqueville 2010, 91).

The common birth of constitution[5], as the basic result of the historical process of Enlightenment (called constitutionalism), and PS, as the basic value of that justification, can be regarded as the attempt to justify the authority of a modern State.[6] It represents above all the necessity of an ethical deduction of the State as political authority. Fundamentally, PS consists in a kind of normative invocation of the people as source (degré zéro) in the sense of justification for all political authority (Müller 1997, 25), which is intrinsically associated with two constitutional formulas: "We the People …" (Preamble of the United States Constitution) and "All State Authority is derived from the People" (Art. 20 par. 1 of the German Fundamental Law). Because of these fundamental relations between the concepts of PS and constitution, it seems possible to say that the constitution is an attempt to justify the political authority of the State through the PS.

Despite the fact that PS is part of innumerous constitutions and a central claim during constitutionalism, it is far from clear what the legal proposition "all State Authority is derived from the People" means (Möllers 2011, 337). Constitutionalists seem to regard PS as the basic principle of democracy without being aware of its real meaning. Principle in this sense means something like value or idea of democracy, that is to say, a kind of very abstract concept which should found our democratic system. However, maybe due to the abstractness of this concept or, perhaps, the necessity of a minimal reference to the individuals in order to justify each State authority, a number of non-democratic States make also references to PS as a means of justifying their authority. In some sense, the vagueness of the concept of PS in modern constitutional law and political philosophy contributes to fundamental problems regarding the justification of modern State authority nowadays and of a [5] According to Tocqueville (2010, endnote "k", 96): "Say that it (constitution in America) is only a changing expression of the sovereignty of the people, that has nothing of the perpetual, that binds only until it is amended".

[6] The invocation of God in addition to the people in many contemporary constitutions should not put doubts on the central character of PS for the modern States justification.

By reflecting on the justification of State authority, PS goes besides an actually legal concept, like leasing or donation, and can be regarded, therefore, as a legal relevant concept (Radbruch 2003, 114), which embraces very abstract features, like State, sovereignty, authority, individual and legitimacy. For the justification of modern political authority does not only mean a reference to democracy as State form and its rules (for instance, majority rule, representation etc.), but rather presupposes specific evaluations on the relation between individuals and States. If the central task of political and legal philosophy consists in providing an ideal balance between moral autonomy and political authority (Wolff 1998, 14), it is clear that PV is a conception (Rawls 1971, 10; Dworkin 1986, 70–72) and has to do with the foundations of modern political and legal philosophy.

III. Stating the paradox.

In philosophy, paradoxes can be defined as a kind of argument which apparently holds truth but in fact involves two possible contradictory propositions as premises or an unacceptable conclusion of these two propositions. Paradoxes centrally involve difficulties in determining truth values (Cargile 2006, 105). For the sake of this paper, a paradox is a set of individually plausible but jointly inconsistent propositions (Sorensen 2003, 6). It is different from a riddle since a philosophical paradox must be able to be resolved rationally, i.e., it must be justifiable before the court of reason. Therefore, it is easy to see that a paradox must entail a cognitive element which allows us to criticize its presuppositions and conclusions.

In Kantian philosophy, this kind of knowledge reflects the second part of each philosophical enterprise, the so-called Dialektik, in contrast to the first part called Analitik. A good example provided by Kant (1974, 279) is the paradox or antinomy of taste in his third critic (Kritik der Urteilskraft): (1) Thesis: taste is not based on concepts because otherwise we could dispute (talk about proof) about taste; (2) Antithesis: taste is based on concepts because otherwise, regardless of some differences, we could not dispute about it. In this way, a simple antinomy of PS would be something like: (1) Thesis (Political Authority): State has the supreme political authority over the people in a given territory because political authority is a fact; (2) Antithesis (PS): the People has the supreme political authority because it is the source and only fundament of all political authority.[7] Like in the case of Kantian taste, we are in a dispute between facts and reasons.

But, let me try to explain more precisely the problem of PS. Like other relevant legal concepts with a high degree of abstractness, verbi gratia "human dignity" or "rule of law", PS as normative proposition "All State Authority is derived from the People" has usually been regarded with a skeptical look by political and legal philosophers, although a clear development of this concept can be observed in other fields, especially political science. Therefore, the primary connection between PS proposition and law has been taken to consist in a straight association between sovereignty of the people and legal mechanisms of direct democracy, that is to say, the right that each individual among the people would have to take part in the government. Ergo, PS has nowadays been taken for a concept of political science, which describes – and not prescribes – some practices, facts or rules associated with direct democracy, like plebiscite or referendum. For instance, even in the context of the German Constitution, the normative character of that proposition is usually seen as extremely weak and sometimes even completely limited through the second proposition of art. 20 par. 2: "It shall be exercised by the people through elections and other votes and through specific legislative, executive, and judicial bodies".

Indeed, PS has to do with self-determination and self-government and, therefore, with legal mechanism of participation in political decision making, as I stated above and is well known.[8] However, this association between PS and direct democracy consists only in possible representation of PS or, indeed, a descriptive moment of PS.[9] Such an understanding of PS as direct democracy raises the question as to whether it still makes any sense to speak about PS since direct democracy is just a form or a possible realization of democracy, like indirect democracy or direct-indirect democracy. For if democracy is just a State form, like it seems to be, PS has no specific function in explaining this phenomenon.

PS can only make sense if we take the modern project of political authority seriously, that is to say, if we preserve a (even weak) norma-

[7] "In a democracy the people are, in certain respects, the monarch; in other respects, they are subjects" (Montesquieu 2011, 10).

[8] For instance: "Yet another fundamental law in democracy is that the people alone should make laws" (Montesquieu 2011, 14).

[9] See Tocqueville 2010, endnote "e", 93.

tive character of PS. For the modern project of constitutional authority, this association of PS with direct democracy does not solve the difficulty in the idea of political authority and, therefore, obscures any possible normative sense of this concept. If democracy has to be regarded as the best standard for legitimate States, it is necessary to identify its value or basic idea.[10]

Although I believe PS is a central concept of modern political philosophy and, especially, constitutionalism, the term "PS" did not appear or was not frequently used by the central philosophers of the enlightenment. In spite of this fact, PS remains, nevertheless, a central concept for the democratic enlightenment enterprise. One, for instance, can compare PS with "human dignity", which is considered nowadays not only a central concept of human rights but also of Kant's moral philosophy, despite the fact that Kant himself rarely used the term "human dignity" in his moral philosophy (Pfordten 2009, 9).

Although Montesquieu (2011, 22) calls democracy a popular government and tries to establish its fundamental principles, the first attempt to identify the real meaning of PS with reference to democracy as a form of legitimate State or the right to command was apparently made in the nineteenth century by Alexis de Tocqueville (2010) in his famous De la démocratie en Amérique. He dedicated one chapter in the first part of the book in order to elucidate the idea of PS, namely chapter 4 "Of the Principle of the Sovereignty of the People in America". As I noted in the introduction, Tocqueville's goal was to defend a necessary relation between PS and democracy: "When you want to talk about the political laws of the United States, you must always begin with the dogma of the sovereignty of the people" (Tocqueville 2010, 91). In a manuscript, he even wrote that PS represents a theoretical ideal and democracy its concretization (Tocqueville YTC, CVh, 22). Like Montesquieu (2011 ,21), Tocqueville differentiates between the nature or form of a State and its principle or political virtues[11], that is to say, nature as what makes it what it is, and principle as what makes it act.

If my view holds any truth, Tocqueville has two basic claims regarding the relationship between PS and democracy as State form. (1) [10] This view can be taken as a natural law argument: "The central claim of natural law political philosophy is that law has this reason-giving force through the common good of the political community" (Murphy 2006, 1).

[11] "I speak about political virtue, which is moral virtue in the sense that it points toward the general good, very little about individual moral virtues, and not all about that virtue which relates to revealed truths" (Montesquieu 2011, endnote 9, 25).

PS is the base of all human institutions because all States claim a right to command and therefore to be obeyed, and the only way to create this right and obligation is through the will of the people (Tocqueville 2010, 91). PS is then a necessary concept when you talk about a legitimate modern authority. (2) Democracy is the only State form which is able not to hide or sterile PS (Tocqueville 2010, 91). In democracy, State power exists only inside the society, that is to say, the political authority or the right to command is exercised only by and on the society. Democracy is the only possible form of individual self-determination regarding political authority since it allows in some sense the people, i.e., the addressees of political commands to take part in the creation of these commands. In this way, Tocqueville follows Montesquieu once again in his classical relationship between the four forms of Government and their corresponding principles, namely, democracy – virtue, aristocracy – moderation, monarchy – honor and despotic – fear, although democracy seems to be the only form of a legitimate State according to Tocqueville.

It is, however, even for Tocqueville, evident that the will of the people does not sometimes – or usually – correspond to the will of the State in indirect democracies or even in direct democracies. This idea gives rise to the following thoughts according to Tocqueville's political philosophy:

(L) All States claim legitimacy or the right to command.

(PS) A legitimate State presupposes that people are at the same time authority and subject of legal commands, that is to say, that the will of the State must correspond to the will of the people.

(D) Democracy is the only possible form of legitimate State.

(C1) In democracy as the only possible form of a legitimate State, people usually do not have authority over all commands emitted, that is to say, the will of the State does not usually correspond to the will of the people.

If democracy is the only possible legitimate State, that is to say, the only possible State form, in which there is, in fact, a right to command, how is it possible that the will of the people does not always correspond to the will of the State in democracy? Why should we regard democracy as a legitimate State if the moral right to self-determination is not always preserved?

Of course, I do not intend to solve all the possible problems of this paradox here. My attempt consists in showing that the content of PS is possible, that is to say, the premise of PS itself does not form a paradox, as many philosophers believe. In doing that, I will briefly reconstruct the basic idea of PS and democracy according to Tocqueville. It is possible – and maybe only possible – to speak about the identity between authority and subject in a constitutional State. Constitution and PS have a common birth, as I stated above.

IV. A life in paradox.

There are basically two fundamental problems regarding the foundation of a constitutional State on the basis of PS. The elucidation of these two problems regarding PS consists in the basic solution to the paradox formulated above.

1. Sovereignty + People ≠ Popular Sovereignty.

On the one hand, some authors believe that PS is a self-contradictory concept. In this sense, a strong paradox of PS can be formulated when the term "popular sovereignty" is literally taken for a mere addition between "sovereignty" and "people". Sovereignty can be formulated like: (R) S is obeyed by everyone; (O) S does not obey anyone. People consists in all addressees of the sovereign commands. When you add sovereignty and people in this way, it follows an identity between sender and addressee of the commands: (R) Everyone is obeyed by everyone; (O) No one obeys no one, where everyone and no one are people, i.e., addressees. In this case, PS turns out to be a kind of direct and consensual democratic theory, which is far off from our current democratic States.

Another way to think about the same problem is to take for granted, as we did above, that every political authority presupposes a secondary rule in order to establish authority (transfer of authority and identity of commands). In this sense, since each authority is necessarily subordinated to secondary rules, people as the addresses of State politics are not sovereign even in the case of constitution making. Every political authority and even the people as political authority are necessarily subjected to rules, like the rule of recognition or adjudication.[12]

In order to understand PS, it first seems necessary to grasp its function in a legal and moral system. Both Tocqueville and Montesquieu are very clear at this point: PS is a virtue, idea, value or principle. In this sense, it consists not in a specific reality in the sense that the addressees of commands turn to be the commanders.[13] Democracy as the concretization of PS can be developed in many ways and PS is just the virtue that moves this realization. In this way, the second dilemma of PS regarding necessary secondary rules turns to be unproblematic, since PS should not be regarded as a reality or, in this case, a specific State form.

Thus PS has to do with the question of how one can say that the State has the right to command. "C is legitimate" is the fundamental evaluation regarding PS. "C is legal" or "C is just" are other different evaluations. In this sense, it is possible to state that the question of legitimacy of political power is the fundamental question of PS. In a constitutional State, one needs to make a reference to the people in order to answer the question whether a political authority has the right to command or not, as PS prescribes.

It is clear, then, that the first problem about the identity between sender and addressee of commands is indeed not a real problem for PS. As I argued above, PS is an idea or principle of democracy.[14] Is it, nonetheless, not possible to say that the idea of PS consists in a direct and consensual democratic view, something like "one man/woman, one vote"? I believe the answer must be "maybe". Although I will not make an argument regarding this problem now, PS presupposes the question of political fundamental rights, like the right to vote, equality, fairness and so on. In this sense, if we can put the question in another way, as "Does the idea of PS not consist in a kind of direct and consensual democratic view with the guarantee of political fundamental rights?", I believe the answer is "yes", although I cannot address this question further at this point.

2. Justice and Legitimacy.

As I stated above, PS has to do with the legitimacy of political authority and it should not be confused with its justice. Justice embraces only a content justification for political actions, whereas legitimacy has more to do with the participation of the people, i.e., the addressees in the deliberative political process; justice regarding political actions is a moral liberty, whereas legitimacy in the sense of PS is a physical liberty [13] Against this view, Maus (2011, 11) argues that there are two models of democracy, namely presidentialism and parliamentarism, and only a parliamentary system corresponds to PS.

[14] See Pfordten 2009, 59–79.

(Schopenhauer 1977, 44).

I am aware that this possible tension between the two basic values of justice and legitimacy concerning political authority cannot of course be solved so easy and, so far as I can see, it has been subjected to innumerous approaches in the history of modern political philosophy and especially since the second half of the last century.[15] Therefore, my attempt concerning this topic consists only in reconstructing the paradox of PS regarding justice and legitimacy in a comprehensible way.[16]

Liberty can be conceived as a negative concept. When we think through the concept of liberty, it is often the case that we imagine the absence of all obstacles or impediments. But, obstacles or impediments are, indeed, positive concepts, that is to say, a kind of force which creates hindrance to something. In this way, physical liberty is the absence of all kind of material obstacles or impediments. Concerning the animal nature, that is to say, movements that come from the will, these are called free when there are no material obstacles that can render the movement impossible. Thus, the physical meaning of liberty has to do with actions that are determined only by the individual will. In its first sense, the concept of liberty refers to action or movement possibility without material obstacles.

We can call some people or nations free and this proposition has usually to do with a kind of physical liberty (Schopenhauer 1977, 44). That is to say, we understand through this evaluation of a political community that they govern according to the laws which they themselves created. It is only through this concept of liberty that we can state that the people of a State obey their own will. The political liberty concerning PS is, in this sense, a kind of physical liberty.

The traditional and here unsolvable paradox of PS emerges when we add another kind of liberty, a here called moral liberty (Schopenhauer 1977, 45). According to this concept, liberty consists in the absence of all necessities regarding the action will. Necessity is, then, the opposite of contingency. We can say that an action is necessary when there is a reason/cause for this action. Free is an action when there is an absence of reasons/causes for this action. In this sense free will would be the case when the will would not be determined through reasons but rather would be formed from itself.

[16] This part of the paper is based on Schopenhauer 1977, 43–49.

On the one hand, liberty in a moral sense creates the paradox that even a consensual and direct decision of the people regarding a political action, i.e., a free decision according to the physical concept of liberty, would be not free if it is determined by interests or reasons, that is to say, if it is necessary. On the other hand, a political action on the basis of a moral concept of liberty does not need to regard PS since it seeks a kind of absolute contingency.

V. Conclusion: the possibility of living in a paradox.

The basic point of this paper was to shed light on the possibility of PS as the foundation of a modern justification for political authority. That means that I tried to defend a possible meaning for the fundamental proposition of PS – "All State Authority is derived from the People", which, as I claimed, should be regarded as the foundation of a constitutional answer to the problem of the State authority. Due to its abstractness, that is to say, comprehensiveness PS turns to be, however, a very weak answer or justification for the necessary political claim of legitimate authority.

It is, at the end of this paper, frustrating not be able to give a direct answer to the problem of political authority through the concept of PS, that is to say, PS cannot give a accurate answer to the question "why should I obey the law?". Ultimately, it is only possible to say that the reference to people in most contemporary constitutions in the world implies that the political authority must be justified through the people, i.e., the addressees of politics. Therefore, from the invocation of people on the bottom or inside of many constitutions follows the necessity of a minimal reference to the people in every political action.

The reference to the people through the legal concept of PS entails a kind of value and, therefore, an evaluation of political authority. Some conclusions regarding this view were already presented in this paper: (1) PS is an idea or value and, therefore, should not be confused with direct democracy, which is a possible concretization of this value; (2) As a value, PS has to do with legitimacy, that is to say, with the evaluation of a State in the sense of attributing to it the value of legitimate or illegitimate; (3) PS does not imply that the people should have absolute authority in a legitimate political State, but rather that PS is a limitation to the political authority in a negative sense of the concept or something that moves the political society in a positive sense of the concept.

Finally, PS is linked with the first kind of liberty, that is to say, the physical liberty. In this sense, people are considered free if the obstacles for ~~the~~ their participation in the political process are absent or not so strong. PS has then a paradoxical life when we think about it in terms of moral liberty. Moral liberty as absence of necessity regarding human actions does not presuppose PS and the common birth of constitution and PS implies, above all, the necessary paradox between these two liberties in the heart of modern legal systems.

An ontological turn of political obligation

Hirohide Takikawa[1]

Abstract: Thomas Hobbes claims that everyone in the state of nature agrees to establish a commonwealth to avoid his violent death because his primary purpose is self-preservation. A traditional approach, by reference to game theory, regards the state of nature as the prisoner's dilemma or the stag hunt, and then shows that Leviathan is necessary to reach a Pareto optimal solution. But it is well known that in an infinitely repeated prisoners' dilemma, the option of conditional cooperation is more rational than the option of unconditional defection under some conditions. This paper aims to show that human death offers some essential reasons to enter into a civil state, which are very different from the grounds that Hobbes and his successors have supposed. The conclusion is that we would owe no political obligations if we were immortal.

1. The State of Nature

An important method to defend the legitimacy of a state is by comparing two conditions: the one we would experience if we lived in a civil state and the other we would face if we lived outside of one. The latter has been traditionally called the state of nature (SN). Many authors accept this thesis:

SN: Everyone gets more expected benefits in the civil state than in the state of nature.

Thomas Hobbes endorses the SN thesis by stating that in a state of nature, men are "in that condition which is called war, and such a war as is of every man against every man"(Hobbes 1651:13.8). In the state of nature, the life of man is "solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short" (Hobbes 1651:13.9). In De Cive, Hobbes showed a comparative list of the state of nature and the civil state: "Out of it [i.e., the state], there is a Dominion of Passions, war, fear, poverty, slovenliness, solitude, barbarism, ignorance, [and] cruelty. In it, the Dominion of reason, peace, security, riches, decency, society, elegancy, sciences, and benevolence" (Hobbes 1642:10.1).

Hobbes's claim is much stronger than it first appears. He does not claim that in some civil states, people would be better off than in the state of nature. In contrast, his position is rather that in any civil state, people are better off than in the state of nature. He writes the following: "the greatest that in any form of government can possibly happen to [attribute] the people in general is scarce sensible, in respect of the miseries and horrible calamities that accompany a civil war" (Hobbes 1651:18, 117).

Hobbes's way of describing the state of nature has been criticized on several grounds. Samuel Pufendorf proclaimed that it is just "a description by fiction." He maintains that, instead, a real state of nature is not a state of war but a society where people lead cooperative lives (Pufendorf 1673:II.1.6). Since Pufendorf's objection, the state of nature has not been generally depicted as a state of war. John Locke, for instance, claimed that the state of nature is "a state of liberty" but not "a state of license" because "[t]he state of Nature has a law of Nature to govern it, which obliges every one"(Locke 1698:II.6). There is a "plain difference between the state of Nature and the state of war" because men live together according to reason (Locke 1698:II.19). Jean Jack Rousseau joined the troops by writing that "there is no general war among men" (Rousseau 1997:166). The state of nature is "the most peaceful and the most preferable state" (Rousseau 1755:153). Inequality is almost zero in the state of nature (Rousseau 1755:193).

Thus, we find two contrasting ways to depict the state of nature: Hobbesian war versus non-Hobbesian peace. Philip Pettit tries to reconcile them by introducing a historical hierarchy for the state of nature (Pettit 2008:99). In general, the state of first nature is the state of animals, and in this state, a human being can live an untroubled life. This is the non-Hobbesian state of nature. Once humans acquire language, they live a different life; they get into strife about honor. This is the Hobbesian state of nature. What divides them is a divergence in their focus on the stages in the state of nature, but not a disagreement about the concept of the state of nature. Even Rousseau could accept the Hobbesian SN; i.e., "the natural state" meant the state of the second nature, or what he calls "the civil state" (Rousseau 1755:121).

2. Basic Assumptions

On what grounds does Hobbes characterize the state of nature as a state of war? Hobbes's basic assumption is that men are equal in the faculties of body and mind; i.e., "the weakest has strength enough to kill the strongest, either by secret machination, or by confederacy" (Hobbes 1651:13.1). As no one is strong enough to avoid being killed by others, men are fundamentally vulnerable to each other. This assumption is in sharp contrast with the Aristotelian view that some are born governors and others slaves.

From this equality of ability, Hobbes argued that conflicts arise. Hobbes found three main causes of conflicts in the nature of man: competition, diffidence, and glory. Hobbes wrote that "the first maketh men invade for gain; the second, for safety; the third, for reputation" (Hobbes 1651:13.6). It would be an interesting task to precisely understand this line of his argument. Before exploring this issue, I will examine Hobbes's basic assumption on motivational elements. According to Hobbes, men's end is "principally their own conservation" (Hobbes 1651.13.3). While the best among the good things is self-preservation (sua conservatio), death is the worst among all the bad things (Hobbes 1658: 11.6). As we will see later, since death is morally bad, fear of death is considered politically good. Vainglory is the most frequent cause of crime among various kinds of passions (Hobbes 1651:27.13). Vainglory, or pride, arises from men's imagination of their own power and ability, which is not grounded on their actual achievements (Hobbes 1651:6.49). Vainglorious men delight in supposing themselves superior to others. These two motives, fear of violent death and pride, are considered as the two major passions in Hobbes's human beings since Strauss (Strauss 1965). According to Strauss, vainglory is a vice; it is the ultimate cause of injustice. Fear of violent death is a virtue; it is shared by every human being and enables humans to overcome the bad effects of pride and live under the same sovereign.

3. Prisoners' Dilemma

The arguments above can be described and clarified by game theory. Noncooperative games have two basic assumptions: players are rational and their agreements are not trustworthy. These two assumptions correspond to two origins of conflicts discussed by Hobbes: competition for gain and diffidence by safety. On the basis of these assumptions, game theory can show how the state of nature turns into a state of war. The state of nature has the following payoff matrix.

D	4,0	1,1

This is called the prisoners' dilemma. The two players, X and Y, each have two options: cooperate (C) or defect (D). They are rational, and they attempt to maximize their own expected benefits. Because option D is the best response for each individually, they each choose D. In other words, (D,D) is a Nash equilibrium. However, (D,D) is worse than (C,C) for them collectively. In theoretical terms, (D,D) is not a Pareto optimal. Because they seek their own gain, they get into the worst situations, i.e., a state of war. Individual rationality causes irrational results on a larger scale. This is a social dilemma.

Humans in the state of nature cannot solve the dilemma by contracts or agreements because they cannot be certain that others would not break the agreement, even if everyone managed to agree for all to choose option C in the first place. They cannot trust the other party's words because concluding that the other party will betray is logical, given the assumption that the other party is rational[2].

To get out of the prisoners' dilemma, the matrix must be changed by punishing the betrayers. Hobbes writes the following: "there must be coercive power, to compel men equally to the performance of their Covenants, by the terror of some punishment, greater than the benefit they expect by the breach of their Covenant" (Hobbes 1651:15.3). Suppose that the commonwealth punishes the betrayer by depriving him of his gain. The matrix can now be rewritten as follows.

[2] Hobbes used the term "the state of nature" in his De Cive, but he stopped using it in his Leviathan because it would be impossible to leave the state of nature and go into a civil state if we suppose that a state of war exists at the beginning of hypothetical history. Hence, he called several difficulties in our real societies "natural conditions" and explored those conditions under which we can live together peacefully.

D		0,2	1,1

In this Leviathan, option C is the best response for each individually as well as for both collectively. Therefore, (C,C) is a Nash equilibrium. In addition, (C,C) is a Pareto optimal. They can now solve the dilemma by introducing the commonwealth, which Hobbes named the Leviathan. This is the first argument to justify the state: the state facilitates cooperation among those who would struggle among themselves without it.

This model goes along with a basic assumption that humans are eager to avoid violent death. In the prisoners' dilemma, they choose D because they avoid being killed by the betrayer. In the Leviathan, they choose C because they avoid being killed by the sovereign. Here the fear of death is a good passion that enables humans to leave the state of nature.

4. Stag Hunt

It appears that the prisoners' dilemma provides a good reason for a Hobbesian interpretation of the state of nature. However, it is important to notice that Hobbes's own assumption about human beings may lead to a contradicting conclusion: a non-Hobbesian interpretation. Because everyone is equal in vulnerability, the betrayer will face a counterattack. In that case, the matrix is modified as follows.

		Y
D		2,0	1,1

This is known as the assurance game, or the stag hunt (Skyrms 2004). In this game, option D is not dominant; it would be rational to take C if the other player takes C. Both (D,D) and (C,C) are Nash equilibria. In other words, if the state of nature is regarded as a stag hunt, (D,D), a state of war, might not emerge. (C,C), which is a state of peace and is beneficial to everyone, can arise without a coercive state, the Leviathan. Rousseau describes the state of nature as a stag hunt in his "A Discourse on the Origin of Inequality" (Rousseau 1755:96-97) and not as a prisoners' dilemma. In contrast with their assumed behavior in the prisoners' dilemma, men can naturally cooperate with each other in the stag hunt. Therefore, they do not need the state's punishment to live peacefully together. Rationality does not necessarily disturb cooperation. Self-interest goes hand in hand with self-preservation.

5. Pride Game

Why does Hobbes then equate the state of nature with a state of war? To answer this question, we must bring glory or pride into the model, the third origin of conflicts suggested by Hobbes[3]. Glorious men break the natural law that requires men to "acknowledge other for his equal by nature" (Hobbes 1651:15.21). They feel delighted in finding themselves superior to others. They are not only interested in their absolute benefits but also in the relative difference between their and others' benefits. They can be called "negative altruists" (Taylor 1987) because while an ordinary or positive altruist gains utility when the other party gets more benefits, they gain utility when the other party gets less. Vainglory is the power that makes men blind (Strauss 1965), and therefore, they misconceive their own benefits. They take relative superiority and inferiority seriously. A payoff matrix in a glorious society can be described as follows.

D	4,−2	1,1

Compared with the stag hunt, the worst case for X occurs when X is defeated by Y and the best arises when X defeats Y. This game can be called the pride game. In this game, any rational player takes option D, and then option D is dominant. Therefore, (D,D) is a Nash equilibri-

[3] Michael Oakshott points out that Hobbes recognizes a twofold meaning: pride as a virtue and vainglory as a vice. The latter is an endeavor to put oneself in place of God, and can be an obstacle to peace. The former is an endeavor to imitate God, and can promote peace (Oakshott 1975:130). I examine the latter meaning of glory.

um. In other words, even when the state of nature is per se the stag hunt, glorious men consider it a pride game, and the state of nature turns into a state of war. The reason for this conclusion is clear and simple; the pride game has the same payoff structure as the prisoners' dilemma. This shows that pride of glory is the ultimate cause of conflicts. To avoid the state of war, even humans capable of living cooperatively in the state of nature need a civil state. Hence, the Leviathan is called the "King of the Proud" (Hobbes 1651:28.27; Job 41).

6. Repeated Game

To sum up, the state of nature is a state of war whether it is naturally supposed as a prisoners' dilemma or is depicted as a stag hunt, which then turns into a pride game that is also a prisoners' dilemma, originating from vainglory. If this process is accurate, is it necessary that the state of nature is a state of war? The answer is no. In an infinitely repeated prisoners' dilemma (or a prisoners' dilemma supergame), the option of conditional cooperation is more rational than the option of unconditional defection under some conditions. This folk theorem proves that defection is not the only Nash equilibrium. Conditional cooperation stably arises because, over repeated games, the betrayers are excluded from future cooperative gains. Exclusion from cooperation has the same effect as punishment by the state (Kavka 1986:140). In addition, in evolutionary games, where the component ratio of each strategy changes in promotion to its benefits, the strategy called tit for tat can be an evolutionarily stable strategy (Axelrod 1984).

This could mean that even when the state of nature is a prisoners' dilemma, people would cooperate without any coercive sanctions provided that the state of nature is infinitely repeated, lasts for a long period of time, or has no end. Men can solve social dilemmas in the state of nature with no help from the state. Therefore, it is not the case that the state of nature is a state of war even when it is a prisoners' dilemma. However, this line of argument, which tries to solve the dilemma, faces at least two problems (Taylor 1987).

The first problem concerns the number of people involved. The argument above supposes a two-player game. However, in a game of prisoners' dilemma with n-players (n is more than two), a dynamic has been observed where the more players that engage in the game, the less likely it becomes that cooperation among them will emerge. People will stop cooperating if they find that others do not cooperate. Therefore, they will probably not cooperate in a large society because they cannot watch others to ensure their cooperation. The second problem arises from people's attitude toward the future. Those players with a high discount rate evaluate their future benefits in comparison with their present ones. I will examine this point later in Section 8.

7. Coordination Game

The state of nature is sometimes depicted as a coordination game. Coordination problems are "situations of interdependent decision by two or more agents in which coincidence of interest predominates and in which there are two or more proper coordination equilibria" (Lewis 1969:24). In other words, any out of a given set of equilibria will do, but one of them must be selected. A typical case of the coordination game is known as Hume's boat, which has the following payoff matrix.

D	0,0	1,1

When both X and Y row the boat (C), the boat runs. When neither X nor Y row (D), the boat does not advance, but X and Y can rest. When only one of them rows, the boat stays and rolls and neither can rest. (C,C) and (D,D) are Nash equilibria, and they are also Pareto optimal. Our society faces many coordination problems such as traffic rules, tax systems, and social security arrangements. John Finnis maintains that "[t]he ultimate basis of rulers' authority is the fact that they have the opportunity, and thus the responsibility, of furthering the common good by stipulating solutions to a community's coordination problems" (Finnis 1980:351). In other words, the state acquires legitimate authority because it solves coordination problems by showing a salient equilibrium. Salience solves the problem of competing but otherwise equal solutions (Lewis 1969:35; Schelling 1960:91). A public announcement made by the state, such as "Now we drive on a right side of the road," is more salient than a single person's declaration.

Does this argument justify the state's authority? The answer is no because the state is not necessary to solve coordination problems.

When some conventions emerge spontaneously, society will progress well without a state. Where some conventional rules of right-side traffic are brought into existence through social cooperation, it is unnecessary for the state to declare those rules. Some might argue that the state's punishment is necessary to solve coordination problems as it is necessary to resolve the prisoners' dilemma; however, it is not. As Lewis observes, "punishments are superfluous if they agree with convention, are outweighed if they go against it, [and hence] are not decisive either way" (Lewis 1969:45). The conventions will be stable without any back-up of the state once they arise because the actions prescribed by them are Nash equilibria; nobody has incentive to break these conventional rules[4].

8. Mortality

The argument above seems to show that people do not require the state to overcome those difficulties they would face in the state of nature. Whether the state of nature is a prisoners' dilemma or a coordination game, people can cooperate without any help from the state.

However, I claim that this conclusion overlooks one basic human condition: mortality. I will suggest that human beings are in need of the state's authority because they are destined to die. As I examined above, two approaches have been offered to understand Hobbes's argument about the state of war. The first approach, which stresses an element of self-preservation, regards the state of nature as a state of war because humans compete with each other as they cannot trust each other. As they aim for their own gain, they paradoxically fall into a state of war, which would be the worst case scenario for each individually. This is shown by reference to the prisoners' dilemma game. The second approach, which emphasizes an element of vainglory, considers the state of nature as a state of war because people are sensitive to their relative status. Because they are obsessed by their priority over others, they fall into a state of war. This is shown by reference to the pride game. Both approaches show their own routes to the state of nature being considered a state of war. However, in infinitely repeated games, these approaches fail to show that the state of nature is a state of war.

Folk theorems, which show that conditional cooperation arises in repeated games, do not necessarily hold true because humans are mortal. Mortality changes the calculation matrices of both above approaches for two reasons. First, because humans are mortal, they do not believe in the infinite repeat of games, and thus, the game will come to an end at some point in time. When games repeat only a finite number of times, players are rational by choosing not to cooperate in the last game. Because they predict that other players will also not cooperate in the last game, they will not cooperate in the second-to-last game either. Following this line of thought, people will not cooperate from the beginning in finitely repeated games.

[4] The coordination game can be considered a variation of the stag hunt game. Therefore, as the state is unnecessary in the latter case as mentioned above, it is so in the former.

Second, because humans are mortal and they do not know when they will die (they might perhaps die at any instance), their discount rates tend to be high. When discount rates are high enough, (D,D) is a Nash equilibrium. Mortal creatures will betray others when they earn more current benefits than discounted future benefits. Human beings in the state of nature often discount their future interests for several reasons. First, as they will seldom meet the same party again, they figure that they will not see the same party whether they cooperate or defect. Therefore, they are inclined to give priority to their present certain benefits over future uncertain benefits. Second, they are so fragile and mortal that they might not survive until they see and cooperate with the other party again. Cooperative benefits, which they can only get in the future, might not fall into their hands. Third, they tend to become risk-averse because they are exposed to high risks regarding their security. Thus, they try to keep their current real benefits above all else. In conclusion, an infinitely repeated prisoners' dilemma turns into a one-off game because the benefits accruing only in the future do not carry enough weight.

We have several potential ways to overcome the problems originating from discount future benefits. The first way is through an ideological construction or religion. Even if men are mortal, those with some kind of religious faith can believe in their eternal life: their souls are eternal, or they transmigrate. Men with these beliefs can cooperate in this world even though they are mortal. However, in contrast, those who do not believe in this kind of virtual immortality are not likely to cooperate because they think their lives will come to an end. We require other means to enable cooperation. One such way is social security. By offering a secure future for people and giving them a good opportunity to survive, social security can reduce their discount rates. In well-arranged social security, people are not exposed to the risks of avoidable death.

This encourages them to cooperate with each other. A third way is coercion. People can work together by punishing those who do not cooperate. The state can utilize the second and third ways to ensure that their subjects cooperate.

As for coordination games, we have seen that the state is unnecessary because some conventional rules can coordinate people's behaviors. However, mortality does matter in the coordination games because people cannot wait for conventions to emerge. They hope that coordination problems will be solved within their era. Some conventional rules will probably emerge in the long run, but that would be too late for them. Here the state can create rules to solve problems through its saliency. Once it declares certain rules, their conspicuousness gives subjects enough reason to follow them. The enactment of rules by the state can abridge the process of conventions emerging.

It is important to reconsider the significance of death in legal and political philosophy. Hobbes and his successors suppose that human deaths are politically good because they enable men to leave the state of nature and go into a civil state. I have shown that human deaths are politically bad, let alone ethically bad, because they force men to struggle with each other. If we were immortal, we would not need a civil state.

Biomedical Principles:
Systematic aspects[1]

Oscar Vergara[2]

Abstract: Beauchamp and Childress propose four basic principles that can be used when making ethical decisions in the biomedical sphere. These principles were determined by means of the coherent specification of a set of rules. The purpose of this paper is to analyse principlist methodology by applying the theory of normative systems. Such an analysis throws up problems with the normati-vity of the system; in the formulation of its axiomatic basis (regarding its formal properties, namely plenitude, coherence and independence); in the deriving of rules through specification; and in the choice of the right set of norms. The aim of this study is to shed a critical light on all these issues.

Keywords: Biomedical ethics. Principlism. Specification. Normative systems. Hermeneutics.

Approach

This paper is located in the biomedical sphere and its purpose is to analyse a specific aspect of the decision-making methodology known as "Georgetown Principlism", as it has been developed by Tom L. Beauchamp and James F. Childress[3]. The standpoint from which this methodology has been analysed is that of normative systems. Beauchamp and Childress propose four principles that, from this standpoint, can be seen as the axiomatic basis for a normative system that makes it possible to derive an increasingly specific succession of rules, with a view to providing answers to all the bioethical problems that may arise in the medical field, and to do so coherently. The issue at point is whether this has been achieved.

Elements of principlism

The first thing to consider are the famous four principles. There is indeed a great deal of food for thought here, but for the purposes of this paper a mere overview will suffice, since what interests us is not so much the semantic issue concerning how these principles should be interpreted, but rather the syntactic issue, which concerns not only the relationship between them, but also that with their eventual specifications. According to the principle of respect for autonomy, a patient should be able to act in accordance with a plan of behaviour he or she has him or herself chosen[4]. The principle of non-maleficence can be summed up in the classical aphorism primum non nocere, i.e. "first, do no harm"[5]. The principle of beneficence refers to the obligation to procure the patient's wellbeing[6], whilst, finally, the principle of justice concerns what is traditionally known as distributive justice, which deals with the fair distribution of goods and burdens[7].

With regard to their scope, it is evident that these four principles cover much of the range of cases that may arise in the sphere being analysed. It is therefore an easy matter to find sufficient support in one principle or another to provide an ethical justification for the way in which a given case is resolved. Similarly, and as far as their content is concerned, they are certainly intense or fertile, since each of them displays a wealth of moral content that can easily be brought into play in the case of any eventuality. The problem with this great breadth and density is that they favour the justification of conflicting solutions for a given case, according to which principle is invoked or whether it is interpreted in one way or another. To give an example, faced with a patient who asks her physician for a Caesarean delivery on the basis of the principle of autonomy, the latter can justify his or her refusal by appealing to the principle of non-maleficence. It is therefore necessary to descend the scale of specification of these principles, something which, furthermore, must be done coherently.

Following the line taken by William D. Ross, Beauchamp and Childress take pains to indicate from the outset that the four principles do not present any absolute requirements, only prima facie ones. This means that we have to wait for each individual case before deciding which of the principles that come into play carries most weight[8]. In the face of the criticism of intuitionism levelled at them, from the fifth edition onwards Beauchamp and Childress have recourse to a contribution provided by Henry Richardson. This is none other than what is known as "specification", the purpose of which is to establish some kind of rational control between the principles and a specific case. This mediation is performed by formulating rules of an increasingly restricted scope, a process that involves specifying elements such as what, where, when, why, how, by what means, by whom and to whom[9].

However, the same problem that arose at the level of the basic principles reappears, with exactly the same intensity, at the specified rule level. Indeed, both Richardson and Beauchamp and Childress admit that there is no unique and necessary connection between the general norm and specified norm[10]. Returning to our previous example, if we try to find a rule we discover there are two (if not more) that share equal legitimacy: "any mother can choose the method of delivery by virtue of the principle of autonomy"; and "any mother, by virtue of the principle of autonomy, can decide the method of delivery, provided it is compatible with clinical indications".

For this reason principlists turn to the concept of "reflective equilibrium", derived from Rawls' theory of justice. The basic idea it represents is that from all the various possible specifications the one that should be chosen is that which "favours reciprocal support between the set of norms considered to be reflectively acceptable"[11].

This a fundamental requirement of the idea of a normative system, which, to the extent that it aims to guide behaviour, cannot be home to contradictory norms. This, however, merely transforms the problem of the validity of a particular norm into one of the validity of a set of norms. Indeed, the choice of a valid set of norms cannot be made deductively, as Beauchamp and Childress themselves admit[12]. We will return to this issue at the end of this paper, but first we need to look at other difficulties concerning the methodology being analysed.

Difficulties of the principlist system

a) To begin with, the system claims to be "normative"[13]. The principles, however, are taken from common morality, and far from justifying themselves, the authors state that are of a historical nature[14]. If this is so, the system cannot aspire to any kind of normativity, since, logically, duty cannot be derived from being. But if their principles lack normativity, so will the both the specified norms (if the latter do indeed logically derive from the former) and the solutions indicated for any particular case.

b) Secondly, the axiomatic basis of the system, constituted by the four principles, suffers from several problems with regard to its formal properties. In the case of plenitude there is no justification of how the four principles are drawn from an alleged common morality nor why such a formulation is preferable to others, such as, for example, that of European principlism. Reference has at times been made to "moral imperialism" to denote this attitude[15]. In that of coherence, it has also been pointed out that the principles are mutually contradictory. Gert, Culver and Clouser have stressed the lack of unity of these principles, each of which has been taken, according to them, from widely differing ethical theories[16]. Finally, the question of independence also presents problems, since the principles in question overlap and it is hard to establish the boundaries between them[17].

c) Thirdly, and as García Llerena has pointed out, derivation from a principle is, by definition, unviable, since it is impossible to establish whether a particular kind of action is able to satisfy the initial norm or not[18]. Indeed, Richardson states that his theory of specification is based on certain ideas expressed by Aristotle and St. Thomas Aquinas, without giving any more detail. However, it is extremely useful to see how the latter distinguishes between conclusion and determination[19]. He refers to the derivation of human laws from natural laws, but the same distinction can be applied, by analogy, to the case that concerns us. By virtue of this distinction, one norm derives from another by conclusion when the content of the former is derived as the conclusion of a judgement or practical syllogism. This is obviously the assumption analysed by Alchourrón and Bulygin in their book Normative Systems. Indeed, from the norm "only over-22s are allowed to vote" there logically follows the norm "30-year olds are allowed to vote". The derived norm is as valid as the initial one. However, a norm can also be derived from another by determination when we are faced with having to choose between two or more possible ways of fulfilling the first norm. And this is precisely what occurs, in our opinion, in the case of specification. Let us think once again of our running example. Other moral considerations apart, from the standpoint of the specifying operation itself, both rules, i.e. the one that gives preference to the mother and the one that subordinates her autonomy to clinical indications, are perfectly legitimate. A choice, however, has to be made between them.

This has considerable consequences, if we are to go by what St Thomas Aquinas has to say: "Accordingly both modes of derivation are found in the human law. But those things which are derived in the first way, are contained in human law not as emanating therefrom exclusively, but have some force from the natural law also. But those things which are derived in the second way, have no other force than that of human law"[20]. Applied to our case, this plainly means that the principles do not cover the validity of any subsequent specification. To put it another way, the latter do not belong to common morality and have to demonstrate their own plausibility.

Doubtlessly in order to avoid this consequence, Richardson states that what we have referred to, following St Thomas Aquinas, as "determination", and which he calls "a less formal procedure", has nothing to do with specification. According to him, the latter does not modify the norm, whilst the former implies the creation of a new norm. Specifying, then, is only a question of interpretation, which is why it requires an explicit connection between the original norm and the specified norm. One must not say, "follow a patient's prior instructions when they are clear and pertinent", but "respect a patient's autonomy by following his or her prior instructions when they are clear and pertinent". However, the use of this merely nominal expedient does not avoid having to make a choice and perform an act of will, so what we have is the creation of a new norm. In the example we have followed it is clear that both rules need some kind of additional justification in addition to having to show their connection with the basic principles. In reality, what we have here is a determination, and, therefore, a new norm that needs, to use Richardson's own words, "complex [individual] justifications".

d) Finally, we have to return to the issue that was left pending above. By means of reflective equilibrium we can construct a provisional set of principles and rules that serve both to justify, as a result of the requirement of coherence, subsequent specifications and to at the same time self-adjust the system. But, as has already been mentioned, a coherent system that justifies a particular rule has no greater legitimacy than another coherent system that justifies the opposite rule. Beyond respect for the four basic principles there is no way of discriminating between the two or more resulting systems. We are still at square one.

For this reason Beauchamp and Childress, once again following Rawls, have adopted their notion of "wide reflective equilibrium". This implies calibrating the various different moral systems in the light of the alternative moral theories (Utilitarianism, Kantianism, Perfectionism, etc.) of procedural theories of justice, personality theories and even of sociological theories of an empirical kind.

However, regardless of the critiques this notion has received, which revolve around the model's lack of practicality, if indeed it can be considered to be practical at all[21], attention must be drawn to a logical impossibility deriving from the postulates of modern hermeneutics. Indeed, according to this, pre-undestanding is a transcendental condition of all understanding[22]. Following this argument, even though one may compare one's own moral theory with those of one's neighbours, one will not be able to help seeing the latter in the light of the former. Attempting to avoid the hermeneutic circle by means of wide reflective equilibrium would appear to be, from this point of view, as fruitless as trying to tread on one's own shadow.

Conclusion

The purpose of this paper has been to analyse North American Principlism from the standpoint of normative systems and to point out the difficulties that might become apparent when seen from this perspective. Without prejudice to the great contribution that Principlism has made to bioethics, the most significant difficulties can be outlined as follows. Firstly, it has problems in justifying the normativity of the system because common morality is characterised in historical terms. Second, the basis of the system reveals certain problems regarding its formal properties (plenitude, coherence and independence). Third, the rollout of the system by means of specification is in reality an operation of determination that implies a break in the logical link between the initial norm and the specified norm, preventing the latter from claiming the support of common morality. Fourth, and finally, if Narrow Reflective Equilibrium is considered to be an unsatisfactory way of regulating relationships between systems due to its relative nature, Wide Reflective Equilibrium is not less so due, amongst other reasons, to its being able, to the contrary of what it claims, to overcome the hermeneutic circle.

Complexity as a metatheory on relations between Law and sustainable development

Prof. Dr. André Folloni

Abstract: Traditionally, legal disciplines close themselves in the descriptive study of normativity, restricting their work to mere exposure, although critical, of the legal rules governing a particular field of legal expertise. There is this legal cognition formed in previous period to contemporary constitutionalism that simultaneously delivers new functions to the state apparatus and society, founded in axiological choices that become determinants, and complexificates law, receiving inputs from other areas of study. The theories and metatheories are built before contemporary constitutional moment, when the constitutions were restricted to protecting individual rights and organize the state, so they face difficult or impossibility while dealing with this new law. There is a dysfunction in the relationship between legal science and the transdisciplinary content that run throughout the legal system. In developing societies, one of these contents is sustainable development – that in Brazil is a constitutional determination and one of the fundamental goals of the Republic. The relationship between this subject and the specialized legal disciplines remains unknown when it restricts the possibilities of legal theories to mere description of the supposedly isolated legal system. The new constitutionalism, especially in Latin America and Brazil, demand epistemology and hermeneutics legal that permit dialogue between legal disciplines and between law and the knowledge produced originally in other areas such as Economy, in the case of development, or Ecology, in the case of sustainability. Law, Economy Ecology – as well as other knowledge – are fragmented views that perceive the same complex reality under different and isolated viewpoints. The difference and isolation, however, are more in the study that is done to reality than in reality itself, which consists of all these aspects together. Satisfactory knowledge of contemporary law depends on the recognition of this inherent complexity of social realities and the creation of forms of cognition that are appropriated to face complexity, instead of the traditional disciplines founded on reductionism. The epistemology of complexity presents itself as an appropriate way to deal with the complex reality, conscious of his own limitations, but also their possibilities when reality is faced considering its interconnections. The epistemology of complexity, as developed by Edgar Morin and others, presents categories able to produce legal knowledge closer to reality, such as recursive systems, organization and disorganization from interior and around, dialogy, individuality, diversity, event, ideality, racionalization, reflexivity, and solidarity.

Keywords: Complexity; Law; Sustainable development.

1. Introduction

Traditionally, legal disciplines close themselves in the descriptive study of normativity, restricting their work to mere exposure, although critical, of the legal rules governing a particular field of legal expertise. There is this legal cognition, formed in previous period to the contemporary constitutionalism that simultaneously delivers new functions to the state apparatus and society, founded in axiological choices that become determinants, and complexificates law, receiving inputs from other areas of study.

The legal theories and metatheories are built before contemporary constitutional moment, in those times where the constitutions were restricted to protecting individual rights and organize the state, so they face difficult or impossibility while dealing with this new law.

This article is about the foundations of the modern model of legal science, including its basis on the ancient modern sciences and its main philosophers – Francis Bacon and Rene Descartes. It goes on trying to understand how these conceptions of science – and also later ones like the Vienna's Circle – influenced the Philosophy of Law of the 20th century, Hans Kelsen's in particular. This paper relates these models of science with the modern Constitutions in the first half of the 20th century and suggests that maybe those models were appropriate to that period of constitucionalism.

Going on, the article exposes how the western Constitutions change in Europe and Latin America after the Second War, becoming much more complex than the ancient Constitutions. So the article shows how inappropriate are those old models of science to face the new complex reality of a Law that does not apart itself from Moral anymore, and assumes the function of somehow influencing social and economical development. When Law complexificates itself, science must assume its need to understand and work with complexity and not to reduce it or try to escape from it.

2. The Model Of Science Of The Early Modernity And Its Influence In Theory Of Law

Among Law theory's objectives during the first half of the 20th century was the construction of a pure theory of Law. It would be an independent Science of Law that would make itself distant from Politics, Economics, Social Sciences and Ethics. The goal was to achieve a true science of Law, according to the model of science in which the early 20th century believed.

The most notorious legal philosopher working in this direction was Hans Kelsen. Kelsen called his theory a "pure theory of law" because of basically two reasons. The first is that law theory should only describe norms as ought-statements, while other sciences describe facts in is-statements – the classic dualism between is and ought, Sein and Sollen: "…the Pure Theory of Law separates jurisprudence, describing norms in ought-statements, from natural science describing facts in is-statements". Law science is a science of the norms and only of the norms, and nothing else. Kelsen continues: "The second reason is that it [the pure theory of law] separates jurisprudence from ethics". Ethics is the other science that works with ought-statements, but it should describe moral norms and not legal norms.[1]

While working in this method, legal scientists would restrict their work. They would be only allowed to describe normativity, the mere exposure, although sometimes critical, of the legal rules governing a particular field of legal expertise.

That kind of law theory is justified in an epistemology of the reductionism, the one that takes knowledge as the work of dividing its object and reducing it to its minor part, reducing complexity.

This science model is related to the modern science of the 19th century, which is an evolution of the ancient science that began in the 15th and 16th centuries and theorized by Francis Bacon and Rene Descartes.

Francis Bacon's work was destined to create a secure knowledge about the nature. In his opinion, the knowledge that began with the Greek tradition, Socrates and Plato, was insecure because was based mostly in the opinions of the philosophers and not in nature itself. And it was an useless knowledge since it was not enough to dominate nature and make it serve humankind. According to Bacon's thought, science was supposed to control nature and to make human beings its lords or masters. So Bacon began what would be later considered as the paradigm of disjunction. He separated philosophy and science and separated facts and values.

It's interesting to realize that the modern science of Law developed in the 19th and 20th centuries is influenced by Bacon's model and follow its steps in a lot of relevant aspects.

One of the main influences is the wish of provide security to Law knowledge. When legal science claims that the scientist is only allowed to describe Law and not to expose opinions about it, it intends to create an objective knowledge that won't change depending on the values of the scientist himself. An objective and stable science is able to provide law some security and to dominate it.

Also, Bacon's science was empirical.[2] That means that knowledge must be grounded and justified in the facts of nature. So the scientist must do experimentation and create his theories from experiments. There's this need of a experimental basis on which science can be constructed. Based on experimentations, science could provide a definitive knowledge and the absolute truth about nature. Legal science needs an experimental basis as well. When legal science focuses only in legislated law, this law acts as some kind of experimental basis. Knowledge would only achieve science dignity if it is made about legislated law, which is the same to every scientist that describes the law of the same country and so enable every scientist to test law theories.

Bacon's kind of science is meant to be able to discover all the laws that rule the universe and the nature. Once humankind knows the rules of the universe, and since those are eternal and universal rules, human beings can absolutely dominate nature.

Later, Rene Descartes would develop his theories about science that influenced legal science as well. He would create his own science method that influenced not only legal science but every science made after him. Descartes' science was based in reason and rationality, in the constant question of all truth that came before, in the mathematical way of reasoning and in the reduction of complexity.

Modern legal science also is based on reason and rationality. Legal scientists must guarantee that their work is not influenced by any of the irrational aspects of human life. In Law it is even more important because it is common that legal scientists are also lawyers and judges. So no interest must direct the work of the scientist except finding the truth about law. That includes questioning truth that came before because it's suspected if not made by an objective scientist working under the scientific method.

But the main feature of Descartes' scientific method to the objectives of this paper is the mathematization and the reductionism as a method.[3]

The mathematics way of reasoning that rules science method put aside any value questioning and excludes values from legal science. To talk about values is to get away from scientific precisianism and rigorism. So if law theory intends to keep itself a real science it must give up on thinking about values. Only the quantitative and structural aspects of law can be treated in the way modern science functions. So law theory develop theories of law rules and norms and of the whole normative system, describing what is a norm and its structural elements and what is a normative system and its structural elements as well. Norm is seen as the connection between an hypothesis and a consequence, and normative system is understood as groups or series of norms related to each other in definite ways. The large use of logic among the legal scientists was very important in that period and still today it is practiced.

Also, if all these norms or the normative system itself are good or bad is a problem that science of law can not solve since it is not able to talk about values. Law theories made in the 19th and in the 20th centuries take the form of general theories, like those "Allgemeine Theorie" that were famous on that period.

Descartes' method was based on reducing reality's complexity as a necessary procedure to comprehend it. So he recommended that the scientist would divide his object of study in many parts as it is possible, based on two principles: first, that knowing the small parts is easier than knowing a complex reality, maybe knowing a small part is the only possible knowledge when a complex reality is supposed to be known; second, that knowing all the small parts would allow the scientist to know the whole reality when putting all these minor knowledge together.

It is following this method that law jurists begin their scientific procedure by separating law from its environment, putting apart Law from Economics, Politics, Ethics, Religion etc. With this first reduction, the scientists abstractedly create the object of the scientific law theory.

Then, legal scientists separate one portion of law from the others. So, for example, Tax Law is separated from Criminal Law, Civil Law, Economic Law, Procedural Law and others. Legal scientists now have before them an even smaller part of reality, deepening the reducing procedure.

Inside that portion of law that the scientists decide to work with, another separation is made, by isolating one law or a few laws from the others that would be included in that portion. For example, the Tax Code is separated from the rest of the Tax Law and studied as if it was the whole reality to be known.

Than, proceeding in the complexity's reducing procedure, legal scientists focus on one norm, isolated from others. And law theory even studies the pieces of the norm – for example, studying the norm hypothesis, the consequence, the sanction etc.

So, when law theory separates law from its environment or separates one law portion from others, it reveals itself as a theory governed by Descartes' metatheory of the reduction of complexities.

The Wiener Kreis, or the Vienna Circle, influenced Law theory during the 20th century as well. It was an association of scientists and philosophers formed around the University of Vienna from 1922 on and leaded by Moritz Schlick. Its philosophy and epistemology were created based on the ideas of Ludwig Wittgenstein's Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus. Although the group didn't have any jurist, except for a few participations of Hans Kelsen, it had a major influence in general philosophy and epistemology and in Legal Philosophy as well.

This concept of science was called "logical positivism" or "logical empiricism", expressions that demonstrate the two main aspects of its conception: knowledge must derive from experience, so it must be empirical, and must be made from the logical analysis of the scientific propositions. If the logical analysis perceives that some statement is not empirical, logical positivism takes it as a meaningless and irrational statement. So a lot of traditional philosophic problems, such as the ones in metaphysics, were reclassified as false problems because of its supposed absence of meaning. Besides the analytic statements made a priori from the experiment, such as the ones from Logics and Mathematics, only the a posteriori empirical statements had the scientific dignity.[4]

This important conception of science influenced law theory that was made by strictly describing the norms or the normative system. Since the norms or the normative system could be understood as facts, as empirical realities, science made by describing them could be classified as a true science in logical positivism's conception of science. But any valuation of the norms or the system, such as naming them fair and unfair, was not an empirical statement but a metaphysic statement and, in that condition, meaningless and non-scientific. So the traditional problems of Legal Philosophy were excluded from a legal science that could properly use that name.

So the first half of the 20th century saw the rise of a legal science model based on the modern science, including Francis Bacon and Rene Descartes, and the logical empiricism of the Vienna Circle. Somehow Hans Kelsen's theory and metatheory of Law is a peak of this model of science philosophy.

3. The function of the constitutions in the 19TH and early 20TH centuries

This method of law studies is somehow appropriate when law separates itself from its environment. It is explained when we remember that the theory of economic liberalism that was strong in the 19th century recommended the separation between law and state, in one side, and the operation of economy in other side. It is somehow appropriate also when Law, the States and its Constitutions were mainly destined to the conservation of individual rights that must be guaranteed, such as life, property and liberty, and in the limitation of the State power, establishing, for example, de separation of the state functions in different organs – Executive, Legislative and Judiciary – in that well known system of checks and balances.

This is how article 16 of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen (Déclaration des droits de l'Homme et du citoyen) of 1789 defines a country with a Constitution: "A society in which the guarantee of the rights is not assured, nor the separation of powers defined, has no constitution at all".

The Constitution would then have to guarantee certain civil rights to individuals and, within the state apparatus, to impose the separation of powers or functions. Both aspects denote clearly the intents of modern constitutionalism: protect citizens from those who exercise state power, so that power is neither exercised without internal constraints, even without external constraints. Internal constraints because power would be exercised by the separation of powers, that involves a major system limitation and mutual surveillance among state agencies – the famous checks and balances system. Thus, inside the state power, the person who creates the abstract norm does not apply it to concrete cases, the person who applies the law to specific cases does not create the abstract norms. If the applicator extends beyond his competence, creating standards, a third one judges such conduct as unlawful. Also, the legislature moves away from its duties to deal with individual cases, the illegality of this behavior will be measured and declared the third one – the judiciary. This system separates the state functions of legislating, administering and judging, and delivery to organs that should be both independent and harmonics. A system of internal constraints. On the other hand, to guarantee rights is a system of external limitations: concerns on the relations between the authorities and the citizens who support the exercise of that power. The power may be exercised up to a point, from which it becomes illegal. This point of limiting the power is found in the rights that the Constitution enshrines and protects. For example, the state power cannot confiscate the property of a citizen or imprison him on a subjective persecution. Property and freedom are rights enshrined in the Constitution and may be opposed to the exercise of power, limiting it and shaping it. These rights can only be overcome in situations where the Constitution admits it.[5]

A historical hermeneutic of that system of internal and external constraints on the exercise of power highlight the situation in Europe of the 18th and 19th centuries, with the rise – social, political and economic – of a new bourgeois class of merchants. This social group would no longer admit unlimited and absolute power, which could suppress their business and projected growth of wealth.

This system of limitations would then be seen philosophically prior to power and legally able to constraint it. It is the Constitution that now allows and regulates the exercise of power. The power ceases to be absolute and self-referential to be relative, conditioned, limited by the Constitution, though there still was quite a wide and extensive presence of discretion and freedom in the production of rules. This is one of the concepts of "rule of law": a state that not only creates and applies the law, subjecting the conduct of others, but subjects itself to the legal limits of the exercise of power.

The rights guaranteed by the constitution are seen and treated as "civil liberties" or negative rights, which impose abstentions to the State. The Constitution exists to say what power can not do. Outside of that power is allowed to rule in any direction. But the violation of those constitutional rights, the classic "civil rights", is prevented. Constitutionalism protects the citizen of the State. The idea of fundamental rights in this period is a highly protective idea. Fundamental rights, which are confused with individual rights, are rights protecting citizens against the State, which can not commit certain excesses. The Constitution establishes an area of individual freedom within the holders of state power cannot interfere. It is the consecration of what would become known as "the fundamental rights of the first generation".

Furthermore, those who hold power in modern constitutionalism become elected as representatives of the people to whom the regulation would return. This means the decline of power legitimized by transcendent forces or family ancestry. No more tolerance with a State power exercised on the basis of religious or hereditary. It is the age of democracy, which wins the monarchy, and the age of the secular state, which supplants the clergy as a forum for legitimate production of legal norms.

Elected by the people as their representatives, those in the power to legislate are in that part which becomes the only legitimate center of production of rules, since this production is made within the constitutional limits. These limits provide minimum protection of fundamental rights of liberty and property, which are formal boundaries. Legitimacy derives from the notion of competence: the members of the legislature may establish rules, because this power is granted to them by the Constitution. But they can not apply or judge, because this is already competence of other parts.

In traditional constitutionalism, the idea of a formal constitution is predominant. Constitutional rules are the ones put in the constitutional text, and only those are constitutional rules. It is only much later that the possibility of implicit constitutional norms is admitted. If everything that is stated in the Constitution is likewise constitutional, there is no normative or axiological hierarchy among the various constitutional contents: all have the same dignity of constitutional rule, with no preference for one over the other. And this is also why it is not possible to admit the possibility of unconstitutional constitutional norms: if all that is written in the Constitution is the Constitution, then it cannot be unconstitutional.

The judiciary, in the constitutionalism tradition of the civil law, has a minor function, and ordinarily connected with private law issues, compared to what occurs in contemporary constitutionalism. Judiciary has the competence to give solution for private issues according to the rules created by the legislature, without questioning them, unless the regulation violate the separation of powers and individual rights. The judiciary should be neutral and impartial: it would verify the existence of the law, created by the competent authority and respecting individual rights, and apply it to private labors, without leaning to either party, as a third party that would be perfectly equidistant. Two neighbors conflict about their properties: the Judiciary apply the law created by the Legislature if it, when disciplining these private relations, has not violated the separation of powers or individual rights. The court will apply the law and its job is done.

With the advent of constitutionalism, the role of jurists mutates drastically. This point is of great importance. In the period prior to constitutionalism, legal doctrine was the science of normative development. Norms were dictated by the theoretical excellence and rational capacity of jurists. The medieval law was an essentially doctrinal law, under the influence of both the university and religious doctrine. Create the standard was much more an activity of rationally understanding what would be the best possible regulation, or to obtain transcendental revelation of these possibilities. The doctrine had the authority to create academic and intellectual standards that would govern society. In the constitutionalism, this legitimacy escapes from the hands of jurists and is delivered to the legislature, made up of people not necessarily versed in law. The law is no longer doctrine; it is now rules made by common people. Rationality could no longer create rules because this is now a work of the freedom of the representatives of the people, legitimately elected and endowed with powers also legitimized by the Constitution. The doctrine loses its creative legitimacy, and assumes a secondary and derivative role: it would exercise its work after the creation of the law, not before. It becomes the doctrine of understanding and explanation of the rules put the legally competent ones. And if, in exercising their job of explaining the right position, the doctrine try to create rights where none exists, it will be acting without constitutional legitimacy and, therefore, illegally. Trying to cover the production of rules as it was its simple explanation is a conduct denounced by modern constitutionalism as a subversion of the possibilities of doctrinal work and even an extrapolation of the limits that republican and democratic constitution imposes. Doctrine is not elected; it is not legitimate to create standards. If under the cloak of science it tries to do that, doctrine acts dishonestly and with illegitimacy. Kelsen insisted that point: there is not a reason that may impose certain constraints of conduct as reasonably necessary and that would overcome the freedom of human beings to rule themselves as they want. Being restricted to a description of the legal system, it is appropriate that jurists work in a logical, analytical and instrumental rationality, which put emphasis on syntactic and semantic aspects of the language.

4. The different functions of the constitutions in the 21ST century and the new role of legal theory

During the first half of the 20th century Law and State rarely had the functions of transforming reality and promoting social rights. So Law was mainly destined to maintain rights, creating rules that would punish who violates private property and liberty (criminal Law) and rules that would regulate the use of property and liberty among the citizens (civil Law). Criminal Law and Civil Law were the most important portions of law back then.

But after World War II, the Constitutions began to create new functions to the States and the Law, especially in the not developed countries. The Constitutions began to bring States the function of not only protect rights that were already effective, but the function to promote effectiveness to rights that were not – and still are not, in many countries. Rights such as health, habitation, education, transport and others demand positive activities from State, and it must interfere in the natural operation of society to correct its contradictions and injustices. So State must create economical conditions and social situations that would not happen without its intervention. And these interventions must be effective, in the sense that the economical and social results must be achieved. In this new conception, law must cause effect on economic and social life, transforming them.[6] [6] BOBBIO, Norberto. Dalla struttura alla funzione: nuovi studi di teoria del diritto. Roma: Laterza, 2007, p. 13.

Later, when Constitutions around the world began to worry about environment and ecological issues, State and Law begin to be destined to cause also effect on how the environment is preserved and maintained. And many other issues. From now on, Law must influence social, economic and environment realities.

Brazilian Constitution, for example, includes among the "fundamental objectives" of the Brazilian Republic "to guarantee the national development" (art. 3.°, II) and at the same time includes "ecologically balanced environment" among the "rights of all", in a way that it is a "duty of the State and the citizens to protect and preserve it" (art. 225). So this is why legal scientists correctly say that Brazilian Constitution determines that Brazilian State pursues sustainable development.

It is easy to perceive that contemporary law increases its connection with moral. In the traditional constitutionalism, among the few moral decisions converted in law were the protection of individual rights and the restriction of state power. These contents continue present in contemporary Constitutions, but a lot of other moral decisions are admitted by law, such as equality, human dignity, new rights, pluralism, tolerance and others. The Law and Moral are closer now, and the decisions of Legislature are now more restricted because Constitution is now not only formal but also includes material contents that must be respected.[7]

Therefore, Law theories must be made considering this new reality. It is something different than ever before in the history of Law and Law theories. It is easy to notice that law theories based on – and restricted to – subjects like obligation, prohibition, sanction etc., like the ones made until last century, are not appropriate to this new law.

In this new perspective, Philosophy of Law and specific law disciplines begin a new phase in which it is necessary to work with new concepts. One good and important example is the theory of the law principles, its condition of a real legal norm and its relations with other norms, the rules. It is a problem that was absent from legal theories in the 19th century and in the beginning of the 20th century. Some call this new period "post-positivism", but the theories made under this name are very different from each other and sometimes even opposed.

5. Complexity as a metatheory for the contemporary philosophy of law

This paper suggests that the Epistemology of Complexity, made from the systems and the systemic theories, is a good instrument to deal with this new Law that the 21st century presents. Complexity epistemology brings an interesting vision of reality and of the scientific theories that can be developed to explain and interact with it, and brings as well some concepts and categories that may be useful in law theories. It works as a metatheory, theory of the theories, and a Law Complexity Metatheory can be developed to theorize law theories as well.

Epistemology of Complexity can be based on some statements. One of them is assume that human beings in the 21st century are connected by a new kind of solidarity, since nowadays decisions or actions taken by individuals are able to affect an entire nation and in some cases the whole humanity. We can think of actions that drastically affect environment or cause wars that could kill millions or billions of people, or the whole humanity, like with nuclear bombs. This is a new situation that demands new ethical responsibilities to the scientists – and we can include here the legal scientists. So that choice of not considering values in the scientific activities, which was an important precept in traditional epistemology, is just not acceptable anymore. Scientists must be engaged, which imposes a new approach to scientific procedures.[8]

This new vision of scientific work is especially helpful when legal scientists must act pursuing objectives based on values, such as sustainable development. If the scientific traditional metatheories would maybe be an obstacle for legal scientists to work pursuing the necessity of actualize realities based on values, the Complexity metatheory enable it.

Other important statement is that, differently from what Descartes and the modern science in its traditional form believed, Epistemology of Complexity assumes that it is often impossible to know a totality by knowing its parts than adding them. It happens like this because in a lot of cases some reality, when divided, loses crucial properties that the study of its parts is not able to comprehend, not even when adding it to the study of other parts. These properties are called "emergences" and are not visible when only one or a few parts of reality is focused. That brings scientist to a paradox: it may be impossible to know the totality by knowing its parts, but it is as well impossible to know the parts without knowing the totality. It is the famous Pascal's paradox of cognition.[9]

This is also a statement that can be useful in the study of a Constitution that determines that the State pursuits sustainable development. In a reality like this, legal scientists must understand how law, economy and environment interact. The scientist has this challenge beyond him, which consists in trying to understand the interactions among realities formerly studied in isolated disciplines. Disciplinary knowledge traditionally forget what lies beyond disciplines, what is in its frontiers. It is not enough to know law or economics, but there is the need to know the relations between law and economics. Traditional modern science would interdict this kind of work, what would impede legal scientist to actually do what is required from him.

Complexity assumes that reality is formed by elements that, since they are part of a totality, its possibilities and potentialities are reduced. This is because totality often imposes conditions and determinations to its elements so they are not able to realize all of its possibilities and potentialities. In this sense, the addition of isolated elements would be more than the totality itself, because if they were not included and determined by this totally, they would have their potentiality not reduced. In other sense, though, those elements only act the way they do, achieving other potentials, because they are involved in a totality and only if involved in a totality. In this sense, the totality, in which new characteristics emerge, is more than the addition of its isolated elements. Totally is more and less than the addition of its isolated elements.

Since law forms totality along with economy and the environment, this way of thinking can bring new possibilities to legal scientists that are involved with sustainable development issues. Law would probably have more possibilities if it was not reduced by the need and duty of sustainable development, and the legal scientist must be able to identify its possibilities and discard them. Otherwise, law has other possibilities that only appear when we think of it as an instrument to pursue sustainable development, and legal scientist must be able to identify these new potentialities as well.

Another important statement is the one that assumes that reality is an organization permanently subject to be disorganized and then reorganized in a new form. This disorganization can be caused by an internal occurrence or by an external occurrence. That is another reason why scientist must be open to consider realities often studied in other disciplines.[10]

When we think of legal science, it is not rare that a disorganization and a reorganization in the economic system is caused by an occurrence in law, and also an occurrence in economy may cause a modification in normative system. This is another reason why legal scientist must be open as well to consider realities traditionally studied in Economics or Ecology.

Things are more interesting than this though. Complex science assumes that the "cause-effect" line is actually not a line, but somehow a circle. Some facts cause effects that function as causes for other effects that affect that first fact, like as if it was a circular "cause-effect-cause" line. Complexity calls it a "recursive circle".

When the notion of recursive circle is applied to the relations between law and sustainable development it can be useful to perceive that sometimes an occurrence in law can affect development and sustainability but also this new configuration can affect law again.

Actions taken by people or operated machines, including the ones taken by legal scientists, have the potentiality of causing effects not foreseen by the player, and event effects opposed to the ones that were intended by the player. Epistemology of Complexity sometimes call this the "ecology of action", and it moves us to think about the effects that our actions may cause when they leave us and enter the incessant game of causes-effect-causes of the environment. Sometimes a norm made to achieve a goal happens to not only not achieve this goal but also to produce a contrary effect. This leads to a new kind of perception of the ethical responsibilities of the legal scientists and the way they interpret rules and principles for its application to concrete cases.

Differently from the general theories that governed science in the 19th and 20th centuries, complexity assumes that sometimes reality does not fit in our scientific models, and than a reality occurrence or fact can be different from every other occurrence that happened before and that is going to happen in the future. So Epistemology of Complexity suggests that scientists must learn to work with individualities that would not fit in the general theories.

As well as other sciences, legal science also produced general theories – Kelsen's pure theory of law was, aside from an epistemology of law, a general theory of law, the norms and the normative systems.

This is also an important statement for legal theory. Jurists now assume that there are some cases that does not fit in previous cases or legal theories and demand a totally new answer, something that would be very difficult to deal with in the general theories' model of traditional modern science.

All these conceptions of the Epistemology of Complexity can be useful to legal philosophy as an appropriate metatheory to enable legal theories about the relations between law and sustainable development. It can offer to legal scientists a secure basis upon which legal theories can be constructed regarding Law, Ecology and Economics, besides other disciplines that would be necessary for the knowledge of the object of the research, enabling an interdisciplinary knowledge of law and the reality in which it is included and take part.

Hart's conception of Law

Diego Fonseca Mascarenhas[1]

Abstract: This article aims to describe the criticism that the legal system is not based solely on the character of the authority coercion. This analysis will be designed from the dialogue held between Austin and Hart in "The Concept of Law". Hart understands that there is diversity in the rules, if taken together, may contribute to the promotion of human rights in the context of democratic societies, given that standards are met by a sense of obligation and not by force.

Keywords: coercive order; morality; legal system.

1. Introdução

The rule of law is very important to establish political legitimacy in democracy. The conception that coercion and law are the same produces distortions in meaning of legal system because it attacks both the human rights as the relationship between morality and norms. Thus, this concept compromises the analysis of this last mentioned relation, since the legal system is used as a coercive instrument to hold the power.

It could be easily mentioned many cases that testify the trouble of authority in countries not provided of democratic regimes, as in North Korea and in Iraq, where dictatorships are effective. Actually, in all kinds of politic regimes, there is indeed a wide sort of troubles between morality and rules. The goal in this paper is to approach the meaning and the influence of state authority in the social system. Thus, the aim converges to clarify the criticisms made by H. L. A. Hart, in the book The Concept of Law, around the deficiency of the Austin's legal system. This project requires the approach of coercion and moral as distinct but related social phenomena.

The dialogs between Hart and Austin are presented to research the perplexities of the legal theory (2); the relationship between laws, commands and orders (3); the perspective of variety of laws (4); and the idea about sovereign and subject (5).

2. The Perplexities of the Legal Theory

In chapter I, Hart arises the question over what is law. He explains that there are different theories concerning the meaning and the working of law. Among them, two answers are more usual: the Natural Law tradition, which links law to morality, and legal positivism, which conceives law exclusively as a coercive order.

Why when we make the question "what it is math?" the answer is so simple, but when we ask "what it is Law?" the response is complex? Maybe it is the fact that mathematics is an exact science, objective, timeless and universal, whereas legal positivism it is temporal, due the fact that it is located in the axis between time and space, where there is a legislative change according to each geographical area which lies range of values and customs in each society or country. But, at the same time in this regard, there is also controversy launched by the natural Law, which states that the right is timeless, ie, valid at any time by virtue of being just and universal because it is an universally valid law and applicable in any space. Furthermore, the object of the Law is society, which consists of men who possess the characteristic of uniqueness and individuality, so the right is subjective in its interpretation to become applicable to your subject.

It could be raised several controversies regarding the implementation of human rights in the legal system, as the case of circumcision of the clitoris which is applied in certain communities in Africa or the application of the death penalty in the United States. But I limit myself to say that it revolves around the ambivalence of human rights discourse, because the right it is in eternal identification and determination and continuous determination so that it is not possible to put an end on a debate that involves par excellence, subjectivity and search of meanings of social facts.

On the Law there are the standard cases and borderline cases. Standard cases are understood as easily identifiable in which the simple application of the legal subsumption logic it is enough to resolve the legal controversy. The problem is in the borderline cases, because these are indeterminate cases, and there is not a clear concept to show the application of legal provisions. Hart cites the example of a man with a full head of hair and the bald man. The identification in this case is clear, but what if we faced with the case of a man who has several strands of hair loose and scattered? How we would identify this man? Certainly the search for some definition in this case will be more problematic.

The degree of indeterminacy of Law also derives from the fact of the legal text is a language, nay, a written language open to interpretation. This means that the degree of indeterminacy of law has its source in the language because men recognize the right, but do not know how to conceptualize it.

To do deep analysis on the meaning between law and morality and its impact on the appearance of authority we will approach the perspective of legal positivism and natural Law.

The Positive Law examines the meaning of the statutory Law, produced by the man who put in it any content regardless of the moral aspects. It is the analysis of the real right being the Law actually existing encodings, which seeks to answer how they operate. It is noted that there are several theories of Law, each of which is divergent as their interpretations.

The Positive Law is opposed to the natural Law, because it lays down the Law in a direct relation with Morals and Justice. The theory aims to support Law in a moral basis, putting mandatory standards because they are morally correct and carry with them a moral obligation that must be met in the community.

Natural Law aligns with the hypothesis of a dual reality set both in a real plane as in an ideal plane. Natural Law is an ideal right that should always be covered by law. In this sense, Natural Law would be a just right, where all the rules are correct and moral. Therefore, a rule could only be positively valued if it coincides with a natural law. The rule is then considered fair when this convergence occurs.

On the other hand, the prospect of Legal Positivism presents the thesis that there is only one Law, the Positive Law, eliminating the dichotomy of Real and Ideal Law. In this perspective, it is also possible to establish legal validity without adopting any conception of justice. Thus, the Positivism makes Law and Justice autonomous and disconnected. Then, if Law and Moral converges, it would be nothing more than coincidence.

Austin's thoughts are developed over the approach of Legal Positivism. Then, the debate about the reasons that lead to obedience of legal rules arises. In Natural Law, the answer is in the justice of the rule.

In other words, the rule is obeyed for being fair. However, even assuming the answer of Natural Law, how there would be obedience of unfair rules? Positivism conceives a new foundation for this, the coercion. The discussion between Austin and Hart is held in this context.

3. The Relationship between Laws, Commands and Orders

In Chapter II, the author's analysis builds robustly the theory of Austin, in order to enable its refutation in the following chapters, by indicating the impossibility of constituting a legal theory of law only by commands and threats. In Austin`s thought, the legal positivism is developed on the basis of strength, featured in the will of the authority to determine the content of the rule and in the coercive power as a complement to the will. The description of Austin's theory can be viewed on the command to deliver cash, executed by an armed robber for the employee of a bank under threat of fire. Initially there is a order for the money to be delivered. Then, there is a threat or a punishment, depending on the employee's response to the command. According to Austin's thoughts, there would be no difference between the law and the relationship of the bank clerk and the bank robber, since both would have command and punishment for noncompliance with the described content.

According to Austin, the relationship of legal positivism with strength is established between will, power and violence, related to each other in a complementary way. Holding the power, the authority determines the content of the rule according to its will. Thus, the legitimacy of the rule does not derive from its content, but from the power that emanates of the authority. Power is understood as complementary to the will. The holder of the authority to dictate the rules has means to compel anyone to not violate the rules. It should be noted, however, that there is also a certain relation concerned to respect, from a kind of natural authority, that explains that this obligation could be not exclusively guided by fear. When the possibility of obedience does not occur for respect, power is also complemented by violence. Therefore, violence is exercised by the state monopoly, and the state is the only one capable of influencing the individual so that his will becomes law and is subsequently followed.

Waldron (2008, p.5), in this regard it really is not much different from the casual positivism of earlier generations of jurists stretching back through John Austin and Jeremy Bentham all the way to Thomas Hobbes: law is any system of command with the power to dominate all other systems of command in a given society, where the chain of effective command can be traced to a single politically ascendant source.

Indeed, it is characteristic of the modern state to be the only endowed with power, and to be the only who has a monopoly on violence. In this sense, the violence committed by the individual, however just, would be a crime, because the state punishes the whole exercise of violence which is not carried out by it.

In other words, from Austin's perspective, the monopoly of violence has therefore the meaning of monopoly of power. All would then be submitted to the State hostages and victims of violence in a manner similar to the act committed by the bank robber. Since positivism conceives obedience to the law enforcement, then the state would be the only one able to produce the right and the only one with the power to concentrate violence.

The concept of rule as combination of command and threat supports Austin's hypothesis. However, Hart identifies four critical additions to this concept, stating that rules should be understood as a combination of general orders, standing orders, general habit of obedience and sovereignty. Hart's goal is to point out that it is impossible to provide a theory of law based exclusively in commands based on threats.

Legal rules are characterized by being general orders because, as a rule, it is not possible for the State to establish orders directed individualized for each person. However, the exception can be seen from this example of the traffic cop when he issues the command to reduce the car speed in order to check the documentation of the vehicle. On the other hand, the bank robber orders are always personal because they intend to be directed always face to face the other person.

Another feature of the rules is that they are permanent, since the individual's relationship with the State is not extinguished, because orders are not specific and momentary, or persist over time. The relationship between the robber and the cashier is temporary and provisional; it will vanish with the end of the assault.

Continuing, the standards also include the feature of having the general habit of obedience, since the number of compliance with the laws is bigger than its noncompliance, because people present an obedience routine to the Law. Otherwise it would be impossible to preserve the life in society. What provokes the question of whether the Law is also based on the parallel threat it is when there is the perception that the Law would be obeyed in their impending inspection and punishment. In this vein, the penalty would not only be the sole reason for the phenomenon of obedience to the Law.

On the other hand, the bank robber case cannot be compared with the structure of the legal system, given that his commands are obeyed only by the victim because of threats of firing the firearm. The orders in this case, are not met by a sense of moral obligation, but by coercion.

Himma (2012, p.5) argues that as these obligations arise under law, they are thought to be legal in source and character. This, of course, is not to suggest that moral obligation is irrelevant to ordinary talk about legal obligation; it is simply to assert ordinary legal talk and practice presupposes the existence of legal obligations analytically distinct from moral obligations. Although the content of law and the content of morality frequently converge, they frequently diverge as well; in such cases, however, the law defines a legal obligation if not a moral one.

The last feature of the standard is the aspect of the sovereign who has the power. Within the state, there are several authorities and institutions that wield power over the individual, yet they undergo a hierarchical impersonal organization that has at its top of the hierarchy the sovereign power that is constitutionally limited in modern democracies, but at the same time also prove the assignment of their power. In the case of the robber his commands are personal and sovereign conception is mistaken in just have the monopoly of violence.

4. The Perspective of Variety of Laws

In chapter III, Hart refutes the idea that legal rules should not be reduced to a single model of commands based on threats. Actually, there happens a meeting of different forms of legal rules that talk to each other. Thus, Hart defends the conception of the variety of laws, noting that there is, in the legal system, rules with characteristics of permission, authorization and organization.

Hart points out three main objections to Austin's thesis, aiming to discuss that legal rules can not be reduced to commands based on threats. The first objection is based on the fact that not all rules are impositive, since there are also authorization and organization rules in the legal system. The second objection is concerned to the fact that, unlike the commands, rules also link their creators, the legislators. Finally, the third objection is the existence of standardized behavior by customs without the necessity of a legal command describing them.

On the first objection formulated by Hart at the thought of Austin to counter that all legal rules are commands it would be initially required that all standards were prohibitive.

Thereby, Austin falls in mistake to assimilate that the legal void has the same effect of the sanction. For example, if a will is not made under the legal rules, like in the case of not being present two witnesses in the celebration of the marriage contract. This nullity is seen by Austin as its sanction.

According to Austin, the nullity is perceived as a loss for the individual that is applied by the State due to noncompliance with certain legal norm. In this sense, the standard that establishes the need for two witnesses to the will, as well as other contract validity conditions would be the command.

Deal with sanction as if it were nullity is a mistake, given that sanction is a step that is taken by the public as a result of the disobedience of certain legal norm, while nullity as a sanction would be understood as a lack of requirement for constitute the legal act which would render null.

The standard that establishes the obligation of the two witnesses in a will does not carry with it an obligation for a particular person, but establishes a condition to the intent that can produce legal effects if properly entered into the constitution of a will. So the difference is that the sanction is complementary and not essential to the standard, due to provide efficacy in cases where it is not obeyed; as in "contracts", the absence of nullity removes the very purpose of the rule because it would lose sense of how to prepare the said agreement, by virtue of being seen imprecisely compliance with the requirements of its procedures for the constitution / realization of a particular right.

With regard to the second objection that legal rules are not limited to be commands, that consists in the fact that the rules also link their creators, once the legislature may edit rules that apply to himself as a legislator, as can be found in the legal rules that stipulate the legislative procedure for the formulation of new laws in the legal system. On the other hand, commands are always unidirectional, just as standards require, including those that create them.

Moreover, Hart also argues that should be considered the aspect of interpretation of legal norms, because the meanings extracted from the legal text do not detach nor limited the legislature's intention, given that the rules can be interpreted in various ways, which the legislature did not foresee.

Finally, Hart formulates the third objection to the Austin conceptions to question that the customs establish behavior standardization in society just like the norm, but does not establish a command relationship between people, but it is a social practice that has been repeatedly repeated in society and ends up providing a sense of obligation to their continued compliance.

Moreover, Austin tries to refute this conception of the law in relation to custom, stating that since it does not contemplate compulsory provided by law, it cannot be seen as a Law source.

Raz (1997, p. 37) suggest that the customs and laws of previous sovereigns present a further problem, since their apparent direct legislator cannot be regarded as the sovereign's agent. Custom is not made by legislation at all, not being command in Austin's sense or in any recognized sense, and previous sovereigns cannot be subordinates of the present sovereign. It may be attempted to modify Austin's explanation of the creation of these laws, in order to by-pass the objections just mentioned, as follows: customs are not law until they are legislated by the courts, and laws of previous sovereigns are legislated for a second time by the courts of the present sovereign, thus becoming his laws. The courts, however, do not legislate them in the ordinary way, i.e. by expressing their wish that some persons should behave according to custom, etc. So they are said to legislate them tacitly, that is by (1) enforcing them while (2) being at liberty not to enforce them.

Thus, custom can only be seen as a Law source if there is legal permission or if it is adopted the precepts and practice in the standard itself. Thus, fulfilled the obligation to be admitted into law, the custom then becomes legal source. However, Hart notes that the legislature does not have the knowledge of all customs realized in social practice, then your "not watching" it comes to omissions which may be understood as tacit permission to the legal system.

5. Sovereign and Subject

In chapter IV, Hart concludes his criticism about the Austin's theory approaching the conception of sovereign and the habit of obedience. For him, obedience is by sense of obligation rather than by threat.

Hart conceives again three objections to the thought of Austin. The first one states that habits are different of rules; the second is related to the fact that habits of obedience are not able to explain neither the continuity of the authority of the legislator nor the persistence of norms; the third objection is that the assumption of a sovereign is not necessary to give sense to the notion of law, since the idea of binding authority is compatible with the idea of limited authority.

The first objection surrounds the question that habit cannot be confused and assimilated as if it were equal to the rule even if both provide repeated and obeyed pipelines in different situations in order that the disobedience to the habit is no reason to criticize how the breach occurs in a particular rule. For example, it is a habit to remove the hat when entering the church which if not met will not entail problems.

In the same line of reasoning, the deviation from the established pattern of the habit is accepted, since there is a good reason to justify the change in behavior, while a rule does not allows you to breach it.

Beyond that, another factor that culminates in the confusion of differentiating between habit and rule occurs when there is no knowledge between the internal senses of the rule. Hart mentions that in the perspective of an observer which has no prior knowledge of what are the relevant rules of a given society, the subject is not part of shared social practices in society. So, this subject will not be qualified to realize what would be the internal sense of the rules, but merely just visualize what can be observed, while the prospect of an inner observer who is a member of the community, he will identify what the internal senses of all the rules involved. Illustrating, in a game of chess, from the perspective of an outsider who cannot tell if the parts were moved correctly or incorrectly; if the other person does not react negatively to the movement, it is assumed that the movement is correct. However we could not believe absolutely in it, because it is not known if the motion is required or if the participant would have other options. Only the participants would understand the actions of the game. Thus, the observer perspective could at most describe what is observed. After all, a practice governed by rules would only be understood by understanding the rules that are clear from the participant's perspective in the game.

The second Hart objection is that the habit of obedience is not able to explain the continuity and persistence of standards, as habits of obedience are personal, transmitted by a particular person to another particular person, but standards still exist and are mandatory, regardless the permanence of their creators or recipients.

Finally, the third Hart objection is that, in modern democracies, is not necessary the state sovereignty to be associated with absolute authority, because the current understanding of sovereignty is understood in the internal supremacy where all are subordinate to the law of the State within its territory and external independence, by virtue of it not being subjugated to any other State in the International.

Modern states authority is impersonal, and belongs to the office or position, not the person. The state power is organized and distributed by the legislature, executive and judiciary, all being regulated by norms and obligations, but all having the authority. The concept of rule of law is the situation in which the ruler has absolute power, governed by rules that set limits and obligations. In other words, the state cannot go beyond the law and the concept of absolute sovereign who ruled the Absolutists states is dispensable to characterize the current law in democracies.

Therefore, the power of the State is not only limited by the laws because state power is also made from legal norms. Thus, the judiciary has the authority, but only within the sphere of its competence and its territory, as well as the magistrate only has power to act on social controversies when provoked court. Thus, the conception of absolute sovereign is dispensable to characterize the current law in democracies.

6. Conclusion

Obedience of rules is not focused exclusively on coercion, but derives, in its reason of existence, from the sense of obligation and respect to its observance.

It is poor the analysis of democracy based on the distorted conception that the only basis of validity of the legal system is founded on the strength, cause this position ignores other features in the legal system. It is not uncommon the belief that, to ensure the spirit of obedience to the laws, in the democratic state, it is enough to formulate laws with harsher penalties. Obviously the problem will not be solved if laws do not continue to be properly applied.

The pluralism of the legal system should always be analyzed in order to avoid the occurrence of the dangers produced by the radical betting on the centrality of state's violence monopoly, since states can repress, via institutionalized instruments of coercion, individuals' free speech, to actively influence the public context. The legitimacy of state authority is in the assurance of a freedom structure, where people can share opinions about political issues surrounding democracy, in order to maintain the meaning of the law as a product of the social fact that is in constant enhancement.

The influence of Ethics in the concept of Law:
Questions about actual stage of the "Hart-Dworkin"

Leonardo Figueiredo Barbosa

Abstract: This work intends to question the role that ethics plays in the identification of the concept of law. With this purpose we established a theoretical specific point: It will start with an analysis of the debate between Herbert Hart and Ronald Dworkin, focusing on relevant points to the study of the relationship between law and morality. Notwithstanding the debate called "Hart-Dworkin" has started in the 70's and has more direct origins in the debate initiated by Lon Fuller and Hart in the 50's, remains relevant to this day as it can be seen both in the last few books published by Dworkin before his death in 2013 - Justice in robes (2006) and Justice for hedgehogs (2011) - as in the current discussion between proponents and detractors of theories where the connection between morality and law is the focal point of divergence.

Keywords: Hart-Dworkin Debate. Concept of Law. Ethics

Introduction

This presentation is derived from an ongoing research that intends to question what is the role moral values[1] may play in identifying

[1] Although there is an extensive literature discussing the existence, or not, of differences between the ethics and morality concepts, we will not review such discussion in the development of this project and we will take the terms as synonymous. This decision is due to two reasons: first of all, because the objective of this work is to evaluate whether there is a required relation between the moral values and the legal system, whether such axiological standards refer to a specific person, group or society or to supposedly global or globalizable values because they can be discovered by the reason or through the idea of dignity. Secondly, because the existing divergence on the subject would require a more detailed analysis, as well as explanatory notes each time one of the terms was quoted, what would deviate from the scope of work and would make it more tiring than necessary. Just as an example to show the diversified handling of the terms: Hart, The Concept of Law (1994, pp. 168 and 184) deals with ethics and morals as "associated or nearly the concept of Law and, specifically, the role of such values in decisions taken by the Judiciary Branch in current democracies, that is, at the current moment of construction of judicial decisions. A specific theoretical section has been established with this objective: this problem shall be analyzed from the discussion between the theories of Herbert Hart (1907-1992) and Ronald Dworkin (1931-2013).

The Theses Of Hart and Dworkin

Presenting the main points of a debate that lasts nearly five decades can be a risky task; in spite of this, we seek to summarize below, in a logical chain of ideas, the main points in the debate between the binding and separation theses between law and morals.

Hart's theory

Hart's work search focus on the structural issue of the law, trying to point out the common elements that this social construction would have in any contemporary community and, therefore, that could be identified by any reasonably educated person, as "important points of similarity between the different legal systems" as listed below:

> (i) rules forbidding or enjoining certain types of behavior under penalty; (ii) rules requiring people to compensate those whom they injure in certain ways; (iii) rules specifying what must be done to make wills, contracts or other arrangements which confer rights and create obligations; (iv) courts to determine what the rules are and when they have been broken, and to fix the punishment or compensation to be paid; (v) a legislature to make new rules and abolish old ones. (HART, 1994, pp. 3).

Later, along the work, Hart would summarize these five characteristics of the similar structure that the several contemporary legal synonymous terms", although making a distinction between the "accepted morality" and the critical moral that can be opposed to the former. Dworkin, Justice for hedgehogs (2011, pp. 13), however, in his latest work – Justice for hedgehogs – understands that ethics is the study on how to live well, while morals would be the study on how we must treat others: "I emphasize here and throughout the book the distinction between ethics, which is the study of how to live well, and morality, which is the study of how we must treat other people".

systems present into two different types of rules: primary (that determine that the individuals do or do not do something) and secondary (that allow the creation of new primary rules, extinction or modification of old rules; determine its incidence and application; and identify the aspects or characteristics able to define which law rules are valid), the interaction of which is considered by the author as the "key for the law science". Therefore, Hart elects as the central or paradigmatic case for his project of identification of the law concept, the combination of primary and secondary rules, arguing that their correct observation and description could clarify a number of issues that were not adequately explained by imperative theories of law (such as John Austin's theory).

Obviously, all theoretical assumption has some consequences and that would not be different here. Among the various consequences resulting from the selection of this paradigmatic case, we can point out the following ones:[2]

a) Social sources of law –The idea that the law is comprised of a set of standards – regardless whether they are rules or principles – that may be identified through the observation of the social practice, raising the argument that the ultimate criterion of legal validity derives from the courts' practice to accept what Hart called as "a rule of recognition".

b) Judicial discretion - If law can be characterized, at least in central cases, as this set of primary and secondary rules, this means that there may be cases not covered by these rules. In addition to the possible absence of rules, Hart admits that the incompleteness of law may also derive from limitations derived from human language itself, as well as the relative ignorance of fact and the relative indefinite purpose that are typical of any undertaking that aims to influence future behaviors-resulting in what the author calls open texture of law. Due to all this, it is reasonable to say that the law is partially incomplete or indefinite - in cases where there are no rules that are clearly applicable (either because this fact has not been anticipated or because the rules created incur in the open texture of law), there is no "law" previously established – and, in such case, if the Judiciary Branch need to make a decision, it is up to the magistrate to exercise a discretionary power - since there is no applicable legal rule and, therefore, there is no compulsory binding rule (for the positivists, only the statutory law is required to be complied with) - for the creation of a law for that specific situation.

c) Conceptual separation between law and morality - Ultimately, if it is possible to identify the law based on the impartial observation of these rules that occur in social practice, there would not exist any required relation between morality and legality (for others, between what the law is and what it should be, between ethics and law, between validity and justice) - although there may exist contingent connections in certain communities –, that is, the existence of the law is one thing; its merits or demerits, is another.[3]

Therefore, these three pillars of Hart's positivism would be logical consequences of his theoretical assumption, that is, that the heart of law is constituted by the gathering of primary and secondary rules that can be objectively identified by a descriptive methodology.

To this work, one of the most important consequences of Hart's assumption is the impossibility to evaluate the value, within a purely descriptive science, since the methodology aims solely at observing and describing the elements listed above. This does not mean that the community's values (included the internal point of view) cannot be present among the elements that will be described – it is in this direction that Hart (1994, pp. 244) states that "description may still be description, even when what is described is an evaluation". Here, the author intends to defend that the descriptive approach not only makes prevents the consideration of values that may be present in the object of study, but, also, that the reporting of these values does not mean researcher's acceptance of the values reported. MacCormick (2008, pp. 203) – in order to defend the reasonableness of Hart's vision – states that it is possible to consider "important for the improvement of understanding to study a particular object, institution, or set of institutions without ascribing particular moral value to the object or institution(s) studied ", which, in turn, does not mean to say that what has been described is not subject to moral evaluation; it only means that such evaluation shall not be made

[3] This statement, which is the true mantra of legal positivism up to present time — or, as Hart would say (1994, pp. 207), evidences the battle-cries of legal positivism – is based on Austin's work, originally published in 1832, The Province of Jurisprudence Determined: "The existence of law is one thing; its merit or demerit is another. Whether it be or be not is one enquiry; whether it be or be not conformable to an assumed standard, is a different enquiry. A law, which actually exists, is a law, though we happen to dislike it, or though it vary from the text, by which we regulate our approbation and disapprobation. This truth, when formally announced as an abstract proposition, is so simple and glaring that it seems idle to insist upon it. But simple and glaring as it is, when enunciated in abstract expressions the enumeration of the instances in which it has been forgotten would fill a volume". (AUSTIN, 2007, pp. 157) within the science sphere (or, at least, within the project sphere) but that it only intends to be descriptive and not evaluative.

This does not mean that Hart does not see the possibility of influence of ethics on law. Since the original version of "The Concept of Law", in 1961, Hart had already recognized several possibilities of connection between both of them (Chapter IX, Section 3), however, for the author, all these relationships would be merely contingent or would not have as a consequence the required inclusion of morality as a criterion for validity of legal rules, what would allow us to state the existence of morally wicked rules.

Once again, after this particular context is explained, it is possible to consider intelligible Hart's statement that his project "is morally neutral and has no justificatory aims: it does not seek to justify or commend on moral or other grounds the forms and structures which appear in my general account of law"[4] and, therefore, is an undertaking radically different from Dworkin's theory of law, which is envisioned as evaluative and interpretative.

Such statements indicate that the characterization of Hart's theory as something that seeks to define the law only based on the linguistic or semantic use of the word may be a frivolous accusation – notwithstanding the issue of the philosophy of language being actually crucial for Hart's works. However, it is important to clarify that although Dworkin (2006, pp. 165) continues featuring Hart's thesis of social sources as a "semantic statement", the U.S. professor also recognizes, at least in more recent works, that "Hart did not mean, of course, to offer a simple dictionary definition or set of synonyms for any particular word or phrase".

However, even if Hart's project is not solely about the search of the concept of law through an analysis of the use of the word "law", but rather is characterized as a proposal for identifying a social concept through a descriptive methodology that focuses on central or paradigmatic cases, characterized by the gathering of primary and secondary rules, there still remains the question on whether the assumption adopted by Hart is true or if it is the best option in the identification of the concept of law, as well as whether the methodology adopted based on this assumption is appropriate and why it would be a better project than the evaluating and justifying alternative proposed by Dworkin.

To take a position on this question, we will use the path suggested by Hart to compare different concepts, although this suggestion is also used here to compare the different methods to achieve the definition of a concept:

> For what really is at stake is the comparative merit of a wider and a narrower concept or way of classifying rules, which belong to a system of rules generally effective in social life. If we are to make a reasoned choice between these concepts, it must be because one is superior to the other in the way in which it will assist our theoretical inquiries, or advance and clarify our moral deliberations, or both. (HART, 1994, pp. 209).

Therefore, we must question whether a solely descriptive methodology complies with the mission to find the concept of law, than a methodology that also adds an evaluative and justificative dimension of that institution (value dimension) stating that there are goals to be achieved and assessing which, among the interpretative options, match the actual practice, can be considered the best methodology from the moral point of view. In addition, there should be made an analysis on the assumption that the central or standard case of law would be characterized by the set of primary and secondary rules regardless of the moral values.

Dworkin's theory

In this presentation, it is assumed that the initial discussions – on whether the law is composed only by rules or by principles as well and whether the rule of recognition is able to deal with these new standards – are relatively overcome. This work will not analyze these oppositions, since we will focus on the latest arguments which, even according to some positivists (SHAPIRO, 2007, pp. 27), still represent an "extremely powerful objection" to the legal positivism. [5]

Dworkin's subsequent arguments, mainly after his book "Law's Empire", focus on stating that positivism is not able to explain the occurrence of situations that Dworkin refers to as "theoretical legal disagreements". These would be cases where people, although not disagreeing on historical facts relating to a particular situation and not even on the existence of certain provisions of law (which would drain the veracity conditions of law, according to positivists), still disagree on the application of the law to the case under analysis.

[5] "Indeed, it is one of the great ironies of modern jurisprudence that in spite of the huge amount of ink spilled on the Hart-Dworkin debate, so little attention has been paid to this second, more powerful objection. To be sure, legal positivists have relentlessly attacked Dworkin's positive theory of constructive interpretation. Yet they have made almost no effort to defend their own theory against Dworkin's negative arguments in Law's Empire. They have made no attempt to show how theoretical legal disagreements are possible".

In order to understand this criticism, we must first consider the main argument of the "Law's Empire" (DWORKIN, 1986, pp. 190, emphasis added): "the concept of law [...] connects law with the justification of official coercion. A conception of law must explain how what it takes to be law provides a general justification for the exercise of coercive power by the state". This argument seems to be grounded not only in the opinion many jurists would have about law – at least in the contemporary democracies –, but it also seems to reinforce the position defended by Dworkin since the work "Taking Rigths Seriously": rights as political assets that the citizen has against the State.

Once again, as noted in the explanation on Hart's theory, all theoretical assumption has consequences:

a) If the law has a purpose, this means that its identification and application are, at some extent, associated to such purpose. This is why the law consists of an argumentative practice, that is, it is characterized by understanding that the participants need to submit reasons so that the legal propositions they defend are understood as true by other participants of this practice. Consequently, any proposal on what law means must be an interpretation that considers the intentionality and purpose (value dimension) assumed by the practice.

b) Any interpretation of a social practice, exactly because it has an evaluative dimension, is characterized partially by more abstract propositions that are shared by the members of the Community (concept - consensual part), but from that abstract level of consensus, it is possible to propose sub interpretations of that more abstract and consensual idea (conception - non-consensual part). Therefore, to Dworkin (2006, pp. 10-11, emphasis added), law would be an interpretive concept, that is, one of those concepts that people share, despite acute differences on the criteria (there is no consensus) for concept identification and application (e.g. winning a round in boxing). Such concepts "encourage us to reflect on and contest what some practice we have constructed requires. […] the answers to these questions turn on the best interpretation of the rules, conventions, expectations, and other phenomena [of social practice] and of how all these are best brought to bear i0n making that deci-

c)Therefore, it would not be possible to define an interpretive concept perfectly through a purely descriptive methodology: (i) either because there is no perfect consensus on the criteria to be used to define/identify the concept; (ii) either because such concepts require an interpretation and not simply an account of what occurs or has occurred throughout history. This does not mean that the descriptive methodology is not important and even necessary; however, it is not sufficient in these cases, because an evaluative methodology is also required.

Maybe, after developing Dworkin' line of reasoning, it is now easier to understand why he accuses the hartian positivism of being unable to explain the "theoretical legal disagreement". If the law can be explained simply as a descriptive form from its structural elements (factual elements), why people disagree on what the law determines in cases where, apparently, everyone agrees about the existent facts and legal texts?

Dworkin (1986, pp. 3-6) proposes that in order to understand the true nature of the disagreements that exist when the legal experts differ on law, we need to understand two basic concepts:

(a) propositions of law are those claims that indicate what law allows, authorizes or prohibits – which can be true or false - and the truth, or not, of these propositions depends on what he calls;

(b) "grounds of law" which are "other, more familiar kinds of propositions on which these propositions of law are (as we might put it) parasitic", and that specify when these propositions of law "should be taken to be sound or true" (DWORKIN, 1986, pp. 4 and 110 respectively). That is, ultimately, what 'the law really is' depends on what we consider as grounds for the identification of the law. [6]

Therefore, for Dworkin (1986, pp. 5) "they disagree about whether statute books and judicial decisions exhaust the pertinent grounds of law" as well as on the corollary of this divergence: If these elements do not exhaust the grounds of law, what else could be considered as an element able to make legal propositions true?

Dworkin (1986, pp. 5) declares that the disagreements on the veracity of what is determined by law - propositions of law - can occur in two ways:

a) empirical disagreement – people can have the same vision as

[6] These two concepts are critical for Dworkin's recent proposal - in Justice in Robes - about the different meanings that the word law can have.

to the fundamentals of law, but they differ with regard to the effective factual occurrence of such grounds in a case (it would be a ?);

b) theoretical disagreement – people may disagree exactly about the identification of the grounds of law, that is, which are the arguments that make a proposition of law true, although agreeing on the facts, "even when they agree about what statutes have been enacted and what legal officials have said and thought in the past"[7]. They are disagreeing about what must take place in their legal system before a proposition of law can be said to be true or false.

For Dworkin, Hart's positivist theory could only explain the empirical differences because it assumes, based on the rule of recognition - accepted by the community as the last rule of the system, which allows the criteria through which the validity of the other rules of the system is evaluated –, that the grounds of law are fixed by consensus among legal officials. So, for the positivists, in general, they either simply disregard the existence of theoretical differences or simply disqualify this kind of disagreement stating that this is nothing more than an illusion, it makes no sense or is it just a disguised policy (DWORKIN, 1986, pp. 6-11).

Despite of that, the observation of cases decided by the courts – at least in Western democracies – and the understanding that jurists themselves have of their practice is sufficient to say that the theoretical disagreement effectively occur: in several cases, jurists, although agreeing about factual issues and on what legal texts say, disagree on what the law determines for that specific situation.

Conclusion

While recognizing the merits of Hart's theory, in particular concerning the evolution that represented to the positivism, we consider that Dworkin's theory corresponds more to the judicial practice accomplished in the democratic countries.

Hart's theory – even considering that it is a purely descriptive proposal - seems to disregard that there are concepts that can only be fully understood through an analysis that does not end with the observation of what occurs in social practice, but that also positions itself on the aims and objectives of this practice (see the epilogue that MacCormick includes, in 2008, at second edition of his book H. L. A. Hart). Some examples in the history of mankind can help clarify this argument:

[7] (DWORKIN, 1986, pp. 5).

One thing is to describe the differences that the concept of "citizen" suffered throughout the history of mankind, another thing is to defend the conception that is considered appropriate to the assumed purposes of this concept; one can define the concept of "equality of opportunities" based on the idea that everyone should be treated in a formally equal manner, in another case, in a manner substantially equal; the concept of "marriage" - if we were to adopt a purely descriptive methodology based on its occurrence in the West after the middle ages - could not have evolved to encompass the same-sex unions, as it has occurred in several countries. Each of these examples, although considering elements of a descriptive methodology (the observation and description of different social systems throughout the history of mankind), at some point, goes beyond the mere description and positions itself on its own merits and demerits.

It is true, however, that Hart does not exclude the possibility and even the need for an assessment of the merits of the law, but he claims that the validity (either of individual rules or the legal system as a whole) does not depend on such evaluation, as this would be made externally to the concept of law. Hart may be right in saying that the consideration of moral values is a political choice, however, he seems to be wrong when he gives the impression to suggest that it is possible to identify political concepts or any other social concepts as if we were archaeologists looking for something that is just waiting to be disclosed.

Analysis and criticism of Kelsen's arguments for a necessary relation between law and coercion[1]

João Vitor Penna e Silva[2]

Abstract: Hans Kelsen argues that law and coercion have a necessary relation based on three arguments: a) in all known legal orders law and coercion are linked; b) without coercion a normative order would not have efficacy; c) normative orders are not legal orders without coercion. Such arguments have different natures and statuses: "a" takes a descriptive (the Law is linked to coercion) and a factual approach (concerning how things are), while "b" takes a normative (the Law ought to be linked to coercion) and a counterfactual approach (concerning whether things could be otherwise); "c" apparently makes a stipulative concept of law (a concept chosen by the scientist before the research, not as a result of it), in opposition to a real concept. This paper aims to list and analyze the arguments in favor of Kelsen's concept of law as coercive order and then see if they are suitable for what he intended to prove. We summarize those three arguments, confront them to each other and present a critique exposing the conceptual possibility of a legal order without coercion. We conclude that the thesis, in Kelsen's terms, cannot be valid.

1. Introduction

The kelsenian jurisprudence develops a theory about the Nature

[1] This paper was first presented at IVR's XXVI World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy, at Special Workshop "Concepts and Conceptions of Law". I would like to thank Professor André Coelho for the orientation and suggestions and my friends of study group, especially Filipe Rodrigues, Gabriel Lima, Matheus Baraúna and Vitor Marcellino, for their friendship and support in this challenge we did together.

of Law that links necessarily law and coercion. In short, Hans Kelsen's concept of law states that law is a coercive order of human behavior, containing socially immanent and organized sanctions.

Kelsen affirms that an order is a system of rules. When a system like that refers to human behavior, it is called a social order. Law, morality and religion are examples of these social orders. A social order prescribes certain behaviors considered desirable and usually establishes sanctions for individuals who act in opposite way. According the author, sanction is the element that differentiates a social order from the others.

Law is different from morality because is law itself that enacts its measures of coercion and establishes them in a socially organized form. In Kelsen's terms: "[…] the great distinction still remains, that the reaction of the law consists in a measure of coercion enacted by the order, and socially organized, whereas the moral reaction against immoral conduct is neither provided by the moral order, nor, if provided, socially organized" (2005, p. 20).

On the other hand, religion enacts its measures of coercion as sanction, but these are of a different kind from the law or morality sanctions. Religion uses transcendental sanctions, i.e., that are realized outside of human's world, established and applied by superhuman entities. In the opposite, law uses socially immanent sanctions, i.e., that are realized in the human's world, within the society, established and applied by humans to humans themselves.

Another important characteristic of law, that differentiates it from other social orders, is the form how the legal obligations are created. A conduct becomes binding and individuals becomes legally obliged exactly in the moment that the legal order creates a measure of coercion to be applied to whom acts in opposite way. That is because, according to Kelsen, the legal order is directed to officials, authorizing them to apply sanctions when certain conditions are present. The "ought" is not in the behavior, but in the application of the sanction. On the other hand, the morality, for example, creates a moral obligation only by prescribing a behavior, staying sanctions only as consequences of the opposite conduct. Moral sanctions do not have the nature of creating obligations; the existence of a norm is what creates it.

However, to maintain the idea that the law is a coercive order, Kelsen is obliged to establish some important consequences for the theory. He needs to accept, for example, that certain norms, like power-conferring norms, are not norms in a complete sense, whereas they do not create legal obligations. Complete norms are norms that create legal obligations, as we said, justly when establishes measures of coercion against the individuals whom act in opposite way of the prescribed. Power-conferring norms, as incomplete norms, are mere fragments of these complete norms, being called dependent norms.

Because of it, Kelsen was placed by contemporary jurisprudence in the group of authors, in which John Austin is the main name[3], criticized by H. L. A. Hart in the first chapters of "The Concept of Law", understanding that Kelsen's thesis in favor of the coercive orders does not obtains success exactly by the same reasons whereby Austin's thesis of commands backed by threats fails.

This paper will investigate which arguments Kelsen uses in favor of the thesis of the necessary relation between law and coercion, trying to expose what is the central idea behind this thesis, and then try to make some critical considerations. To begin, we will list, as a hypothesis, the possible arguments in favor of Kelsen's thesis, summarize and analyze them to see which corresponds to his intentions. Then we will make an analysis of the consequences of these arguments when related and, after, present a possibility of critique showing why the thesis of the necessary relation, as formulated by Kelsen, cannot be valid.

2. Arguments for the Necessary Relation Thesis

In Kelsenian theory, the search for which arguments support the thesis of the necessary relation between Law and coercion and, therefore, the concept of law as a coercive order, takes us to three possibilities:

Argument A: There is a necessary relation between law and coercion because in all known legal orders Law and coercion are linked.

This is a classical argument in Kelsen's theory. He believes that, irrespective of the great differences between the legal orders of ancients and the law practiced today, there is a conceptual core that allow us to recognize what is legal or not in all human societies. Kelsen wanted to create a general theory that could be applied to all known legal systems in history of humanity. To do that, he needed to create a general concept, applicable in all system of rules commonly called law.

[3] Austin is Hart's major theoretical opponent, but we have to remember that, in certain moments, Hart criticizes Kelsen directly, in points he believes that Kelsen's theory is different from Austin.

In that sense, one of the elements he verifies as presents in all known legal orders is the coercion, and it is a good reason to believe, he thinks, that law is conceptually linked to coercion.

Kelsen affirms: "The first characteristic, then, common to all social orders designated by the word "law" is that they are orders of human behavior. A second characteristic is that they are coercive orders. This means that they react against certain events, regarded as undesirable because detrimental to society, especially against human behavior of this kind, with a coercive act; that is to say, by inflicting on the responsible individual an evil — such as deprivation of life, health, liberty, or economic values — which, if necessary, is imposed upon the affected individual even against his will by the employment of physical force" (2001, p. 33). And also: "History presents no social condition in which large communities have been constituted other than by coercive orders" (1941, p. 82).

Argument B: There is a necessary relation between law and coercion because a legal order without coercion would not have efficacy.

The argument B arises when we go beyond, asking if a legal order without coercion is possible. Kelsen works with this possibility in his article "The Law as a Specific Social Technique".

First of all, the binding character of an order without coercion, Kelsen says, results directly from its content, being, thus, a kind of Natural Law. This order would have to be just and make humans happy as no other can make. The individuals would obey this order because they know that prescribed behaviors are those that will make them happier, and "there is no need to compel people to their own happiness" (1941, p. 83).

Kelsen denies the possibility of existence of an order like that. The law is linked to coercion because there is no other effective form to compel individuals to act in desired way. In that sense, he says: "On the basis of our knowledge of human nature it must be considered very unlikely that any social order, even one which, in the opinion of its creators, assures to individuals every desired advantage, runs no risk of being violated, and hence need take no precautions to prevent such violations against the will of actual or potential violators, that is, by measures of coercion" (1941, p. 84). Thus, Kelsen argues that, without coercion, the legal norms would not be obeyed, in other words, would not have efficacy.

This idea derives from Kelsen's unbelief on human nature, in his conviction that the human is not "by nature" good. The existence of an order without coercion would allow individuals to do whatever they wanted, without suffer consequences of their conduct. This kind of order reestablishes a "state of nature", that is, in other words, a "state of anarchy", and for that we have to suppose that human is "by nature" good, what is unreal, he thinks, at least by our knowledge of the human nature. Accept this hypothesis would ignore "the innate urge to aggression in men" and "the fact that the happiness of one man is often incompatible with the happiness of another" (1941, p. 84).

Therefore, supposing that law must at all costs avoid violations and try to be more effective as possible, Kelsen says that law needs coercion as a way to obtain the desired behaviors, i.e., as a way to be effective. It only makes sense, of course, because he thinks that coercion is the most relevant and effective technique of motivation that law may have.

Argument C: There is a necessary relation between law and coercion because normative orders without coercion are not legal orders.

When Kelsen denies, categorically, the existence of legal orders without coercion, one can think in a hypothesis that he is delimiting the concept of Law to a certain point and saying that he will not consider legal what does not fit in this concept, all for a mere theoretical choice.

In this sense, the argument C appears to have a purely conventional concept, in which Kelsen would have linked law and coercion by a theoretical convenience. The form and characteristics of that argument will be more clear next, when we consider the stipulative concepts, enabling us to show why this possibility is not valid. But, anyway, it is important to think about that, because if we admit it as true, the discussion about the relation between law and coercion in Kelsen's theory becomes completely invalid and useless.

3. Analysis of Kelsen's arguments

Before we start to study of these arguments, let's first turn our attention to some concepts derived from the theory of definition that will help us in our analysis Kelsen's concept of Law.

First, let's work with the distinction between real concepts and stipulative concepts. A real definition shows how a phenomenon is manifested in its current use, in other words, how it is usually used in the language. It is established as a result of the research. Thus, can be true or false, and can be rectified. A "real definition" is true when corresponds to the current use of the term, and is false when diverges.

In other side, a stipulative definition gives a definition for an object X in order to distinguish it from non-X, by utility and convenience criteria established by the researcher. The main characteristic here is the freedom that the scientist has to stipulate the meaning of the term, according to your convenience. Thus, a concept is chosen before the research, not as a result of it. That is why the stipulative definition cannot be said as true or false and, thus, cannot be rectified, since there is no previous use of the term that the scientist have to respect.

With that explanation we can see that the arguments A and B presents a real concept of law, since they want to show a characteristic that the law always has, while the argument C presents a stipulative concept of law. In this sense, the argument C is quite different from the others. Is saying that the Pure Theory of Law uses coercion to define a normative order as legal order, and this is a choice of the author to establishes the difference between law and other normative orders, and, therefore, this theory will only accept to recognize a normative order as a legal order if it is coercive.

Accept the hypothesis of a stipulative concept of law, however, contradicts the persistence of other real concepts, for two reasons: 1) if, by stipulation, we establish that a normative order without coercion is not legal, would become irrelevant verify that in all known legal orders the coercion is present (as in the argument A), because would be impossible to find any legal system that was devoid of coercion, 2) would be impossible to say that a law would not be effective without coercion (as in the argument B) because the legal character of this order would have been excluded in principle by definition.

Adopting the hypothesis of argument C would nullify the other arguments, which contradicts Kelsen's own writings, in which these arguments are present. Moreover, adopting a stipulative concept would contradict the author's interest in describing the legal system as it is (and not as it ought to be), which corresponds better to a real definition of law than a stipulative definition. The argument C is not a good reading of Kelsen's theory. Therefore, we have to exclude the hypothesis that the concept of law as a coercive order is a stipulative concept of law, having to be understood as a real concept of law.

Excluded the hypothesis of the argument C, we must analyze the arguments that brings a real concept of law, namely, the arguments A and B. Before, let's make again a previous analysis on the nature of definitions, emphasizing now, some kinds of approach that a concept can appeal to justify yourself.

We will begin with the distinction between descriptive and normative approach. A concept links the object that will be defined, called definiendum, with the elements arranged in concept, called definiens. A descriptive approach states that these two elements are linked, while a normative approach states that definiendum and definiens ought to be linked to the object be presented in a better form, even if this links actually exists or not.

Next, we will show the distinction between factual and counterfactual approach. One approach is factual when it takes account how things are, while a counterfactual approach takes account, besides the way things are, whether or not they can be different.

With this clarifications, we can observe that the argument A ("in all known legal orders law and coercion are linked") presents a factual and a descriptive approach. The approach is factual because takes account how things are, only affirming that the relation between law and coercion currently exists. Is also descriptive because affirms that, in all known legal orders, that the Law is linked to coercion.

In the other hand, the argument B ("a legal order without coercion would not have efficacy") presents opposed approaches. Uses a counterfactual approach because not only says that law and coercion are necessarily linked, but questions if it could be different.

Presents also a normative approach because affirms that law ought to be linked to coercion. This assertion needs more explanations. To say that, Kelsen uses these arguments: if the law ought to be effective, and if an order can only be effective imposing measures of coercion against violators, so the law ought to have coercion. Every point of this formulation is important and requires our attention.

First, law ought to be effective because efficacy is a contingent element in law, for more useful and important as it is on practice. This is because the existence of a system of coercive rules directed to human behavior does not imply that this system will be obeyed. At least conceptually, according to the concept established by Kelsen, the law is not necessarily effective, then, it is not effective, but ought to be effective.

The second point is even more controversial. For quite obscure reasons, Kelsen links the efficacy of an order directly to the presence of measures of coercion. The coercion is a necessary condition to law's efficacy. For him, could not exist an effective order based only on other technique of motivation, like rewards. In social reality, the punishment technique has more important role than rewards, and because of it are largely verified in known legal orders.

This thesis has been criticized by some authors against the idea of a necessary relation between law and coercion. In truth, its not clear what makes Kelsen think in this way, not going beyond the empirical observation. The question still remains: why a social order, with all basic characteristics of law, but only based on rewards as sanctions, cannot be said as legal, at least conceptually?

However, if we think this way, an important consequence for the theory becomes evident. If we take account that Kelsen is using a normative approach, the assertion that his theory is purely descriptive becomes false. He might answer this question by attacking the first point: saying the law is linked to coercion, not ought to be linked, as we said. But, for that, he has to argue in a way to introduce efficacy in the concept of law, i.e., has to say that we cannot imagine the existence of an ineffective legal order. The kelsenian concept do not appears to include that.

The problem in defending this hypothesis is that would give more force to an old problem pointed by critics: if Kelsen's theory wants not to reduce law to matters of fact, keeping it in a plain purely normative, how the concept of law could depend on efficacy, that is purely factual? This problem was already pointed to validity of legal norms, whereas, for him, the efficacy is a requisite of validity. But, now, this problem is been brought to the concept of law. Or not; this problem may have been there before. We are not certain that is possible to establish a distinction between validity and legality in Kelsen's theory, because this is not clear in his texts, as well as the concept of validity itself is not clear and have been causing great discussion in the debate of the theory.

The concept of law, as we introduce in the beginning of this paper, do not appears to require neither the efficacy, nor the validity. In truth, Kelsen already develops a distinction between a static and a dynamic concept of law, reinforcing the primacy of the static concept: "According to this concept, law is anything that has come about in the way the constitution prescribes for the creation of law. This dynamic concept differs from the concept of law defined as a coercive norm. According to the dynamic concept law is something created by a certain process, and everything created in this way is law. This dynamic concept, however, is only apparently a concept of law. It contains no answer to the question of what is the essence of law, what is the criterion by which law can be distinguished from other social norms. This dynamic concept furnishes an answer only to the question whether or not and why a certain norm belongs to a system of valid legal norms, forms a part of a certain legal order" (2005, p. 122).

With these explanations it is clear that we are facing very different arguments, that were constructed with very different strategies, which want to prove the same thing. Such arguments are different, but only relatively independent. They do not need each other to exist and be real, but they need each other to produce the result they want, which is to prove that the Law is conceptually linked to coercion. It is not difficult to show how they can exist and be true even separated. The counterfactual approach of the argument B can be said as true even denying the argument A, we only need to say the Law never used coercive acts, but that is possible and would be recommended. The opposite, more plausible, is also entirely possible. We can say that B is incorrect, without denying the truth of A, in other words, we can say that all known legal orders have coercion, but that does not mean that law and coercion are conceptually linked, because a legal order without coercion is possible too. This way is usually followed by the critics of this position about the coercion in law.

However, the relative dependence between those arguments brings important consequences for the analysis of the thesis. As we only can say that something may or may not be different from what it is using a counterfactual approach, as the argument B, and we only can make a generalization about link theoretically two elements if we are certain that those elements never can be disconnected, then we conclude that, more than a factual approach, a counterfactual approach of a argument is necessarily to establishes the elements of a concept. In this sense, the argument B won a great importance and gives support to the assertion of A.

Thus, we can argue that denying the argument B, we can also deny the thesis of the necessary relation between law and coercion, even considering the argument A as true. Taking this account, the argument A does not require our attention, because it presents a fact that, in the limits of this work, we will not question, which is that in all known legal orders the coercion is, in some form, present.

4. Is a legal order without coercion really impossible?

Moving our analysis to argument B, we verify that it arises from the observation of the difficulty of theory to answer that question: what if we found a society in which individuals live peacefully, guided by a system of non-coercive norms, with general efficacy, this system of norms would be an example of a legal order?

To answer that problem, we can make three statements: a) this is a legal order without coercion, in which needs the revision of Kelsen's concept; b) regardless of this fact, it is not a legal order; c) this is impossible to be verified. Kelsen would avoid the response "a" at any price and the response "b" would be only compatible with a stipulative concept, already previously denied. Kelsen adopts the answer "c" when developing his argument B. The author states that a legal order without coercion would not have efficacy and, with it, assumes that the legal system has efficacy as a goal. Therefore, no legal system would stop establishing coercive acts, making it impossible to verify that situation.

Kelsen is saying here that the Law is not "suicide". The legal order know that individuals need coercion to, ultimately, act as the norms requires and, therefore, the legal order will not born with hope that individuals would follow norms without presence of coercive acts. An order that tries this would "die" by losing efficacy.

Kelsen answers why individuals would not follow norms without coercion, and why that order would not have efficacy, linking it with his your skepticism about human nature. He states, for example, that man is not "by nature" good and has innate aggressive impulses, putting their personal interests ahead of the collective interests. With this, he develops a theory about the nature of law linking it with a theory about human nature, with a theory that is many degrees more difficult and problematic.

This thesis is the Kelsen's central argument and should be the focus of a criticism of the concept of law as a coercive order. However, there are no sufficient elements in theory that enable us to discuss or adopt this position, because the arguments in favor of it are very unclear.

But let's take a hypothesis: a group creates a system of rules without sanctions, inside an organized and recognized structure, creating also institutions that helps or makes possible obey these norms. They are followed by the whole group, and there are no reasons to believe that it will change. The group is formed by people who believes that the best way of living is obey these norms, not by fear of a coercive act (kelsenian positivism) or by faith that these desired behaviors are those that produce the best life (natural law, in Kelsen's vision), but by the belief that if everyone follow these norms, the life of all will be better. The only ele-

Kelsen affirms that, even if individuals have the interest and feel morally obliged to follow norms, the legal system still would has the risk of being violated and, because of it, a legal system would have to use coercion as a way of discourage violators. Answering in this way, Kelsen does not deny the possibility of existence of a legal system without coercion, only says that this hypothesis is improbable, not impossible.

In fact, a situation like that is empirically difficult to be verified, a great utopia. However, if it existed, firstly, the people who are part of the group would continue being considered humans, even without violator interests or innate aggressive impulses. Second, there would have no reason to consider that these order would not be understand as a kind of law by the group, and by the officials that command the institutions of that society or by members that have authority to create these norms.

This hypothetical situation exposes a important point. Appears not to have in concept of human something that determines if he is good or bad. Thus, conceptually, we cannot say that a legal order without coercion will not have efficacy because it is not in the nature of men obey norms without coercion. Appears to have no conceptual impediment for the existence of an effective legal order without coercion. No doubt, it is only a conceptual possibility, which Kelsen could not say that is impossible, no matter how unlikely.

In this way, we could think that if we adopt Kelsen's view about human nature, a skeptical view, we would have to accept his argument in favor of the thesis of the necessary relation between law and coercion. However, this is not true. Let's take another hypothesis. Kelsen is concerned in how the law tries to motivate individuals to follow its norms and not in the reason why individuals follow them. So, we cannot say that is impossible that a legislative authority creates a system of legal norms without coercion. As we states, this would be a "suicide" legal order, according to Kelsen, since would "born" with a great probability to die by losing efficacy. However, to be effective or not, a system must have validity and be binding by a certain time, so that individuals can follow or not. In this certain time, we cannot deny that these norms are legal, so we have to characterize them as a legal order without coercion.

Based on all points exposed above, the Kelsen's argument B can be said as false. Argument A remains true, but cannot, alone, deny the possibility of a legal order without coercion. In this way, denied the argument B, we conclude that the thesis of the necessary relation between law and coercion in Kelsen's theory fails.

Compatibility between content-based judicial review and the dynamic principle in Hans Kelsen's theory[1]

Gabriel Santos Lima[2]
Vitor Marcellino Tavares da Silva[3]

Abstract: This paper aims to show that the exercise of the judicial review, even in it content-based version, does not involve violation of the Kelsen's conception of law as a dynamic system of norms. In the Pure Theory of Law, Kelsen defends the idea that the legal system is ordered based on the dynamic principle, commonly understood as a source of creation of norms. This conception provides the challenge for Kelsenian theory to explain the concept of content-based judicial review, in which certain laws and administrative acts are declared invalid because they are materially incompatible with the Constitution. The argument is that a purely formal concept cannot explain satisfactorily this review, all because the dynamic principle is not based on the content-based relation. The work begins whit that mischaracterization of the dynamic principle as a source of creation of norms, replacing it with the idea of a chain of authority. This exchange is justified on the basis that Kelsen characterizes the dynamic principle as assignment of power to a legislative authority that, in turn, gives rise to the creation of norms, in the manner and within the material limits in which its jurisdiction is conferred by the higher norm. Surpassed this obstacle, it will be demonstrated how this concept based on authority is compatible with the main features of the modern constitutional theory. It will be shown that content-based judicial review is nothing more than a checking of lower norms, verifying whether they are formally and materially restrained within limits that have been settled by the Constitution for the ordinary legislator. In other words, whether these standards are within the spectrum in which the legislative was authorized by a superior rule to legislate, a situation explained by a dynamic principle understood as a chain of authorizations. Therefore, content-based judicial review becomes compatible with the Kelsenian theory of law only with the aggravating factor that it emphasizes descisionism, since the judge in charge of the review has to deal with general clauses, with no other option than resorting to extra-legal criteria. So, all the possible interpretations searching for justice to concrete case can be taken.

Key-words: Judicial Review; Dynamic Principle; Authority.

1. Kelsen's Normative Theory

According to Hans Kelsen, the Law is a normative system. To be composed solely of norms, the legal order needs to establish its validity in the norms. For this, Kelsen argues that the validity of an individual norm is only based on another norm, which is superior than the first one. Kelsen maintained the distinction between the is and ought to intact, and also avoid factual or metaphysical foundations for the law. The creative action by the legislators for example, have to be based on other norms that confer competence to them. The entire legal system is based on norms and in the relations between them.

But, this search for the foundation of validity can not be followed to infinity. At some point of the legal order, some norm has to be regarded as presupposed, serving as a condition of possibility for the existence of the entire legal system. As a presupposed norm, its validity can not be questioned. Therefore, the entire chain of legal validity and the whole relationship between the rules is based on this norm presupposed, taken as a fundamental norm of the legal system.

From the assumption that exist one basic norm, Kelsen notes that all system of rules can be constructed according to two principles: dynamic and static. These principles determine the relationship between the norms. According static principle, the norms are organized according to the content of the basic norm. In turn, the dynamic system is characterized by the fact that the relationship between the norms is not dependent of the content, but just by the fact that all of then has the same basic norm as foundation. The basic norm is the point of union of all the norms. In this sense, the basic norm, presupposed, is one norm of competence, which would delegate powers to a legislative authority to create a Constitution.

From the creation of the Constitution would be created new norms of delegation of powers to the new legislative authorities to create other norms of the system. Consequently, the norms would be related to each other because of all of then were created by the same procedure established in the basic norm.

For Kelsen, the dynamic principle is the principle who regulate the legal order. Thus, is possible to concludes that a legal norm is not valid because of it's content, but in order to being created in a specific way, which ultimately obeys the basic norm.

2. The Revolution of the Concept of Judicial Review and Kelsen's Theory

The concept of judicial review come from double origin. Primarily by American constitutionalism in the famous case Marbury VS. Madison. This case generated the embryo of what would later be known as incidental judicial review and culminated in the widespread use of the principle of stare decisis. At European level, the judicial review was designed by Kelsen, as a concentrated control, through a special tribunal created specifically for the purpose of protect the Constitution.

The judicial review would be the main task of the Constitutional Court. But, when construct the idea of the judicial review, Kelsen seems to limit the review to the formal analysis of the norms. By the fact of the legal order is governed by dynamic principle, then, from this perspective, the Constitutional Court should be responsible for make sure that the norms were created in the way stipulated by the Constitution.

Occurs that the period after the Second World War caused changes in the Constitutions. The Constitutions began to integrate into their texts fundamental rights and guarantees of these rights, like the Judicial Review. After it, the norms started to be confronted with the fundamental rights and values, and these norms began to be controlled by the Constitution not only formally, but also apparently materially and evaluatively ways too.

The Constitution turned to be important in two ways: a) in create a structural system and formal legal order; b) impose axiological limits to the content of all ordinary legislation.

From this new interpretation of the Constitution, the traditional doctrine began to discredit the Kelsen's theory, since it sustained that the Law as a system of norms governed by dynamic principle, and not by the static one. After all this processing, for the traditional theory, the Constitutions started to link materially the ordinary legislation, and this axiological link that could not be explained by the dynamic principle. Therefore, a material judicial review would be the ultimate expression of the incompatibility between Kelsen's theory of law and this new juridical reality.

The dynamic system would be incapable of understand the judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality, since it is precisely incompatible with the characteristics of most modern legal systems. These modern orders established the fundamental rights in the constitutional norm and required that all the ordinary norms followed the principles established in it.

3. The Compatibility of Kelsen's Theory and the New Theories of the Judicial Review

Based on the dynamic principle Kelsen establishes that a legal norm is valid because it is created in a specific way, which ultimately obeys the fundamental norm. However, this basic norm does not provide the foundation of the latest positive norm of the system. That foundation is simply that "In short: One ought to behave as the constitution prescribes" (2005, p. 201). So, two conclusions can be taken from it: 1) is not any material content that derive from the basic norm to the others, 2) there is nothing that gives to the first positive norm compulsory basic content from which it derives other standards.

The normative pyramid makes that the legal order institutes the special process of creation of norms. Basically, it works in the following structure: a) authorities are competent to establish valid norms b) valid norms only have validity in the ground of other norms c) Therefore, the authority is derived from a norm.

The basic norm is the starting point for the creation of norms and is it who allows that establishes authorities. Through the norms is allowed that someone gives rise to the creation of other norms. However, the authority can not create any type of norms. Exist two very clear limitations: a formal and a material one.

The formal limit establish a specific form for the process of creation of norms. The act of creation have to have a peculiar manifestation, or an exact number of votes, for example. The material limit establish the limits of content that one norm could have.

The judicial review consists in verify if norm agrees or not with the formal and material limits stipulated by the Constitution. The judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality of the legal orders aims to extinguish those laws that legal order beyond the material limits set by the Constitution. It is a factual verification by a competent authority if an authority created a norm in the limits of content that are constitutionally defined. If the norm is inside the field which could be set, this will be Constitutional.

What is operated as judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality does not seem very far from the Pure Theory of Law. According to Kelsen, the Constitution is crucial to establish the competent authorities, the legislative process and the limits of the competence of the legislators. The norms that are created by the legislators eventually can not respect the limits imposed by the Constitution. It is common, for example, that some act that do not correspond to the limit of freedom established by the Constitution. In this occasion, must have a control to protect the Constitution against these violations of competent.

The moderns Constitutions had created clauses to protect fundamental rights exactly because the process of creation of norms could origin some norms that are beyond the competence of the authorities, in order words, that could not be created for the legislators. Such material clauses, unlike defend the traditional doctrine, not bind the content of the infra-constitutional norms, but only establish a limit in the competence of ordinary legislators. So, they do not have sufficient authority to create laws that unjustifiably and disproportionately restrict these rights.

The judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality in view of the traditional doctrine is one way that judiciary power uses to control the activity of the legislative power, verifying if the norms produced by this last power are or not in accordance with the content established in the Constitution. But, in truth, what is been analyzed is just the competence of the legislature to legislate on certain matters.

Thus, if the material limitation of the norms is merely a question of limitation of competence, is clear that the dynamic principle can easily explain this phenomenon. In fact, this implies, as Kelsen had already anticipated, that the legal systems never worked based on the static principle, in which a specific provision is declared invalid by the fact that it has certain content. If there is a declaration of invalidity based on a violation by some specific content, this in fact is merely apparent. In truth, what is being analyzed is the competence of the authority that created the standard.

Therefore, the judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality is perfectly explained by Kelsen's theory. The traditional doctrine just read the legal situation in a wrong way, implying that the norm would be governed by the static system. In fact, what happens is a reaffirmation of the dynamic system, by the formation of a Constitutional Court which objective is the defense of the Constitution and of the materials and formal limits of competence established in it.

4. The Consequences of a Conclusion

Definitely, the judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality does not seems to be so far from the idea propose by Kelsen in his Pure Theory of Law. The idea of control the norms is something very characteristic of the dynamic theory itself. The analysis of the formal limit obeys all the times the idea of chain of authority, and the analysis of the material limit does. However, adopt the compatibility of the exercise of the judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality has a high price: it accentuates the decisionism of the courts.

According to Kelsen's decision theory, the exercise of law enforcement involves an immanent interpretative activity. In any cognitive exercise, like the legislature process of creation of norms for example, there is always an act of knowledge that comprise all possible meanings inherent in a particular normative text. However, above this act of knowledge, there is another act, an act of will, since all directions are equally possible. So what justifies the choice is the authority of the legislator, it makes his will be materialized in the sense attributed to a particular text, have binding force.

Analyzing any decision of a constitutional court, could be observed that in many cases to decide if a norm is or is not entered in the field of competence of the Legislative Power, the Courts have a very wide space to decide. In Kelsenian language, the Court has a very wide frame. To verify this fact, we just have to remember that the fundamental rights have been constructed in the form of legal principles, which, understood as rights or as optimization commands, are open clauses by which the Court has almost unlimited power to determine where are the limits of competence of the Legislative Power.

Therefore, in consequence of the large margin of decision given by the structure that were constructed the fundamental rights in the modern constitutions, the Constitutional Court have a real liberty when is deciding and establishing the powers of the Legislative power. In this case, the authority in at least two senses would explain the exercise of the judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality: 1) analysis of the authority of the legislators; 2) the authority of the Constitutional Court, as every legal decision, which will legitimize the established interpretive choice in the sentence or judgment.

The decisionism ends up being a consequence inherent to the exercise of the judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality, which, on one hand impose a limit to the legislative powers of create laws, but increases the competence of the Constitutional Court when it judging the constitutionality of the norms. Despite the mentioned side effects, there is no doubt that the judicial review of content-based unconstitutionality is perfectly explained by the dynamic principle of the Pure Theory of Law and its chain of authority. This became obvious since what is ordinarily understood as a material binding in the infra-constitutional norms, actually is an analysis of limits of competence and no more than that.

The Pure Theory of Law: the transcendental argument and the criticism to reductivism

Filipe A. O. Rodrigues[1]

Abstract: My objective in this work is to provide an analysis whether the pure theory of law really sustains its fundamental principle of purity. With that in view, I do an analysis of the basic norm, evaluating whether it compromises the intended purity. According to Stanley L. Paulson, in his article The neo-Kantian dimension of Kelsen's pure theory of law (1992), the Pure Theory searches for a solution to the antinomy between empiric and normative Reductivism. A successful answer would need the basic norm, for it has the function of taking the law from the realm of fact into the realm of ought. Paulson shows that Kelsen only uses a regressive version of transcendental argument, that, in the end, fails, which does not destroy the theory, but makes it necessary to seek another foundation. Paulson gives us an alternative in Joseph Raz's view, of the basic norm as a point of view. I believe that Raz does more than putting the basic norm as a possibility.

In The concept of a legal system (1980), Raz diminishes the importance of the basic norm, defending its uselessness for explaining the conditions of identity. His argument is that we can only understand the acts of creating norms if we already know how an already established legal system works. Another point is the fact that we cannot explain, by means of the Pure Theory, a situation where a norm of certain legal system creates the constitution of another legal system, which lacks a different basic norm. Concerning the conditions of validity, Raz criticizes the Kelsenian argument that there must exist a presupposed norm to base the originary constitution, answering with the possibility of rules that regulate their own existence, argument that could be understood better with the article Kelsen's theory of the basic norm (1974), for Raz explains the unnecessity of a basic norm through the concept of social normativity, where people obey the law because of some social facts. Raz's arguments change a core point to the understanding of law as a system of norms by Kelsen, initially into something less important, and later into something unnecessary to the Pure Theory, leading us to the conclusion that Hans Kelsen did not sustain his transcendental argument or justify the basic norm, failing in the purpose of providing a successful Pure theory.

1. Preface

My main objective is expound my text, entitled "The Pure Theory of Law: The transcendental argument and the criticism to Reductivism", that was presented at IVR2013. I shall explain through an analysis about the basic norm, proving how this element, which should support the system´s normativity, harms Kelsen´s proposition and forces him into one of his own criticisms, the reductivism. Along this text, I´ll show the most fragile aspects and some alternatives to the Kelsenian thought. I will work specially in the ideas expressed in the PTL, however, it will be necessary to go beyond Kelsen´s greatest work to achieve a better understanding, also using the works of two different authors, Joseph Raz and Stanley Paulson.

It´s a well-known fact, that the debate about the "ground norm" was one of the richest subjects in Kelsen´s theory. In its most active age, it was both criticized and supported by several authors. The basic norm have two functions, that Kelsen asks about in the start of the chapter 5, he says:

> "If the law as a normative order is conceived as a system of norms that regulates the behavior of men, the question arises: What constitutes the unity of a multitude of norms – why does a certain norm belong to a certain order? And this question is closely tied to the question: Why is a norm valid, what is the reason for its validity?" (1960, p.193)

He answered this question, understanding that the basic norm was made to be the basis of validity for a norm, and would be the foundation of a unit based on a pluralism of norms, solving the questions initially proposed by him. Primarily, I will focus my presentation in the second question, the validity of a norm. The basic norm must immediately act as a standard that provides the law´s understanding, not as a simple act of will, but acts of will responsible for the creation of an objective norm, if it has authority for itself. Its existence, presupposed, not positive, must avoid Law becoming a matter of fact, restricted to the being, and guarantee the effectiveness of it. Nevertheless, it does not, as I will demonstrate, accomplish its objective.

I would like to take some time to acknowledge the kindness and patience of Professor André Coelho, whose work inspired a young group of Law students and gave them perspective not only about the law´s field itself but how rewarding a devoted academic life can be; To all my friends, especially those who went with me to IVR 2013, for not sharing only amazing experiences that week, but also for being victims and roommates of my usual mess; All the members of "Pura Teoria do Direito" study group, we improved not only our presentations together, but our strength to pursue opportunities; My girlfriend Roberta Dinelly whose love and companionship helped me through many obstacles, not just the translation of this paper; God, Who always saves me, my mother, whose love and concern are always there to remind me of deadlines and papers.

2. One defender of purity

In Hans Kelsen´s historical paradigm, The Pure theory of law experienced a conflict between the positive-empiricist theory and the Natural Law Theory. The PTL begins exactly expressing this reality with clarity and enforcing the purpose of purifying the Legal Science, transcending those theories. As Kelsen says at the first chapter of the book:

> "It is called a "pure" theory of law, because it only describes the law and attempts to eliminate from the object of this description everything that is not strictly law: Its aim is to free the science of law from alien elements. This is the methodological basis of the theory
> Such an approach seems a matter of course. Yet, a glance upon the traditional science of law as it developed during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries clearly shows how far removed it is from the postulate of purity; uncritically the science of law has been mixed with elements of psychology, sociology, ethics and political theory. This adulteration is understandable, because the latter disciplines deal with subject matters that are closely connected with law" (1960, p. 1)

Many interpretations ascended from these particular points, most of them created an amount of prejudices and divergent points of view that did not fit in the essence and main goal of the PTL.

The idea of purifying the science can be seen as the result of influence from the Marburg School. Kelsen establishes, in correspondence with Renato Treves, the importance of reading Kant from Hermann Cohen´s point of view, considering her the philosophical foundation of the PTL (2010, p. 204). Cohen uses as basis Kant´s theory of knowledge or cognition and makes a new approach on the original solution. According to Edgar Scott, Cohen disagreed with Kant´s classical interpretation. Hermann Cohen tried to find the purity inside the knowledge considering it as a logical argument. Therefore, the purity shown in the PTL is meaningful to fully understand why Hans Kelsen did not want to be considered a reductionist and strongly denied the engagement between other sciences in several subjects that the Master of Vienna passionately believed to be an exclusivity of the Legal Science.

3. The Jurisprudential Antinomy

Stanley Paulson, however, brings a different enlightenment to the matter when he is analyzing the PTL. According to the aforementioned author, the Theory of Law experienced what he called a "jurisprudential antinomy". This antinomy was characterized by an overlap of two thesis and two deliberations: The morality thesis, always portrayed as a subject-matter of the Natural Law and the separability thesis between Law and morality, usually seen as an argument of empirical positivism. The aforesaid superposition could lead to a state where the plain existence of any other theory would be impossible. Still, Hans Kelsen did not accept either sides. Both the Natural Law and the Empirical positivism had, in his opinion, problems that needed to be urgently solved.

Considering that the sample space had both theories above-mentioned to sustain the paradigm´s passage, Kelsen searched for a way out beyond those possibilities, but there was a missing connection between Law and fact. Just to remind you that we are exhibiting just one focus of the relationship among Law and morality. Traditionally those theories had not debated together that element. Knowing that, we can only assume that there are four theses and not two as we had argued. The two theses which are an outcome of the Law-fact approach are the reductive and normative thesis. The reductive thesis states that Law, ultimately, is explained by factual terms. The normative thesis ponders that there is a difference between Law and fact. The first one was considered as part of the empirical positivism Law and the second was, in Paulson´s words, an implication of some aspects of the Natural Law. In short, theoretically speaking, there are two theories with four options, where the Natural Law would have both theses the normative and the morality, and the empirical positivism would be appreciated by the reductive thesis and the separability one about the dispute among Law and Morality.

Hans Kelsen attempts to give rise to an alternative beyond the elements aforementioned, this specific endeavor is basically the defense of a position that endures the separation between Law and Morality, as well as among Law and factual points, so it makes the basic norm shows itself more necessary than ever. As it was already said, the "ground norm" supports the system´s normativity, segregating it from a simple factual question as well as moving the reductivism away from that matter. Stanley Paulson says that:

> "In other words, Kelsen's answers to questions (ii) and (iv) suggest the hypotheses with which he begins-the normativity thesis without the morality thesis, and the separability thesis without the reductive thesis. But can he make his case? Having precluded an appeal either to the morality thesis or to the reductive thesis, he faces an especially difficult task in defending his alternative."(p. 322)

4. The alternative to solve the antinomy

Kelsen demonstrates a new approach from Kant´s transcendental subject to sustain the basic norm. The Neo-Kantian position focused on Kant´s theory of Knowledge, but did not have an overall uptake from the philosopher's work, so we shall not search for a common ground in these aspects directly in Kant´s theory of Law. The German sage solved the first mathematical antinomy, which was the juxtaposition between the dogmatic rationalism and skeptical empiricism, applying the transcendental analysis and, likewise, Kelsen pursued the solution for the jurisprudential antinomy. However the question argued by the Master of Vienna did not involve the whole theory of Knowledge, but only the law specifically, which is possible, according to his thesis of the legal positivism, as object of cognition and object of the Law science.

Hans Kelsen´s transcendental argument, as Paulson shows, is progressively structured; he tries to reach a conclusive category by using a statement already given. The basis is a well-known assertion about the Law, understood as a normative system, and the main conclusion is the need of a basic norm. This new meaning to Kant´s argument, turning his thought into a regressive and not progressive form, as Paulson endorses, comes from the neokantian authors. However, also according to Stanley Paulson, the transcendental argument adapted to the scope of Law and explained by Hans Kelsen does not sustain itself. One of the reasons for this lack of success is exactly the switch-over to a regressive argument or even the maintenance of the classical progressive position, what makes it not to have enough strength of attraction, leaving the initial arguments too demanding to be accepted, then the basic norm becomes too weak and more dependent on the person and her acceptance than from a logical presupposition. Even the non-regressive version, could work, Paulson says that:

> "Thus, Kelsen would face a problem with either version of the transcendental argument. As we have just seen, the progressive version takes as its point of departure a premiss that is simply too weak to be of any help in meeting the sceptic's challenge, rendering this version of the transcendental argument utterly useless to the legal philosopher. The regressive version is more congenial to the legal philosopher, but it claims too much in its second premiss, as though the only way to support a normativist legal theory were by way of the category of imputation. More precisely, the second premiss claims too much unless it can be shored up by appealing to the progressive version, which brings us full circle, back to the unworkable progressive version. The conclusion is inescapable: neither version of the transcendental argument works for the legal philosopher." (1992, P. 331)

In this point, I close the first part of my presentation and, to put it briefly, it was shown basically how Kelsen considered significant the maintenance of the purity in his theory and then I explained the way that the basic norm theory at first cannot fulfill its function even taking in consideration many of his theoretical presuppositions. Now, in the second part, I will introduce how Joseph Raz proves Kelsen´s theory and how he argues that Kelsenian concept of normativity does not accomplish its role, leading the PTL to a reductionist form according to the kelsenian standards.

5. The reading of Hans Kelsen by Joseph Raz

Joseph Raz, in many academic pappers, debates Kelsen´s work and his main thoughts. In the book The Concept of a Legal System (TCLS) and in the papers "Kelsen´s Theory of the basic norm" and "the purity of the pure theory", Raz does not write about the basic norm, but it is one of the main points of the criticism about the legal systems. Considering the first part of this text, and Paulson's arguments, the basic norm could be embraced as a point of view, because it demands acceptance. However, even offering itself as possible theory for the ones that adopt the concept of the Law as a normative theory, it does not have a solid structure to justify its own attributions.

The Razian understanding of the Kelsen's Theory is different from the initial posture that was shown in this assay, inasmuch as it is a less influenced neokantian analysis and more directed to a global vision of Kelsen´s work, without highlighting the theoretical bases that Kelsen believes when he write the PTL. This fact about his methodology can be both a strongest point of Raz´s argument as much as it represents a weakness.

Raz, during the paper "Kelsen´s theory of the basic norm" and also through the books "Normativity and Norm" and "The authority of Law", criticizes directly the kelsenian normativity concept. However, the arguments now are totally different than those made by Stanley Paulson. Raz divides his arguments on two points, in the first he attacks the first function of the basic norm (unity of the system), after, in the second, he does an analysis about the "validity question", or how he calls, the "normativity question".

6. The unity of the legal system

Joseph Raz understands that two axioms about this function must be true, they are totally independent, but, one failure will expose the impossibility of this first function. The first one is that if a group of norms are on the same chain of validity, they are on the same legal system. He says that: "If this axiom were correct, certain ways of peacefully granting independence to new states would become impossible". (1974, p.98) At this point, Raz did not use his classic example about Canada, but developed only a synthesis about the same argument.

The second axiom is that all the laws of one system belong to one chain of validity. Raz considers that we cannot agree with this axiom too. In his interpretation, we could found the basic norm only when we know the legal system, and we only could know the legal system when we now the basic norm, so we are locked. Joseph Raz add other example after, explaining what could happen if happen a situation that we have two basic norms, one customary and other enacted. He writes:

> There is nothing in the theory to prevent two legal systems from applying to the same territory. Everything depends on the ability to identify the basic norm, but it cannot be identified before the identity of the legal system is known. Therefore, the basic norm cannot solve the problem of identity and unity of legal systems, and Kelsen has no other solution. (1974, p.99)

Joseph Raz works with these arguments In "The concept of the Legal system" (1980). In that book, Raz diminishes the importance of the basic norm in many points; one of them is when he defends its uselessness for explaining the conditions of identity, as we explained above. His argument is the same; he considers that we can only understand the acts of creating norms if we already know how and have already established the legal system Work. For him, these points are clear in the PTL, when Kelsen deliberates about revolutions, but considering this, we must accept that his theory cannot hold an explanation about what is law, or not. Another point is the fact that we cannot explain, by means of the Pure Theory, a situation where a norm of a certain legal system creates the constitution of another legal system, which lacks a different basic norm.

After these criticisms, Joseph Raz passes to the second main function of the basic norm, the guarantee the validity of the legal system.

7. The normativity question

Remembering the point about the must-be-accepted basic norm, Raz believes that is unnecessary to have a basic norm combined with the concept of social normativity, he uses this point to defend his own position, but we shall focus less in his particular matter, and more on Kelsen´s position.

For Joseph Raz, there are two notions of the Law´s normativity, one is called "justified" and the other is mainly social. In the first conception, the normativity is basically justified, whenever it follows objective and universal reasons and, according to the author, they need to be intuitively accepted as a mandatory subject. On the other hand, considering the social normativity, the only pattern of behavior that is essentiality relevant is the one related to rules and not the content of them. As it was expounded in the first section of paper, it is required to go back to the division in the ambit of antinomy, as normally the theorists of Natural Law admit the initial normativity´s conception, the theorist of legal positivism ordinarily receive the second concept.

As it is expressed in the PTL, the point aforementioned coexists with the rest of the theory, which foment several doubts about the certainty or not of this choice. The most substantial of Raz´s brickbats relies on the much discussed point that the Law should not be seen as a normative system as the basic norm could not be obliged to an anarchist. The author uses that particular excerpt from the PTL to express the existence of diverse interpretations to the legal system. However, Kelsen answered this critique assuring that the anarchist´s point of view would never be imbued with legality and could not provide normativity to Law itself. Therefore, Hans Kelsen claimed that the sociological form is not a legal reading.

If Kelsen denies the concept of social normativity, the only remaining aspect is the justified normativity. It may seem nevertheless quite odd and Hans Kelsen himself leaves a trace of uncertainty on it. We can assume, in order to realize Law as a normative system, that the kelsenian basic norm is objective and universal. To justify this, we also must consider that Law can act as an ideology, thereby; it will be seen as a good element for those whom consider it normative.

8. The Legal Science's point of view

In the attempt of escaping from the analysis based on the common sense´s point of view, that was criticized before, Hans Kelsen uses during all his work, the argument from the Legal Science´s point of view. The question argued by Raz is, how is it possible that the scientific point of view could be completely free from values at the same time that Kelsen embraces only the justified normativity? There are many hypotheses to this matter, one of them concerns the point of view of the "hypothetical legal men", however, it leads to another query, because Kelsen presupposed this understanding for those who enforce the Law and accept it as something valid, so there is no difference between a jurist discussing about the Law and those who apply it simply on a daily basis. (Just a reminder, Kelsen differences the application of the law by a person or by a judge, in the matter of interpretation but not in the cognition). Therefore, the positioning of the Legal Science is not just about describing something; it adopts the statement of the "legal men", not in the sense of fairness as the individual character, but in a professional and not necessarily obligatory.

9. Conclusion

It surely became clear, at this point, that the PTL eventually surrenders to the Reductivism, being a matter of fact, depending on a choice of both justice and professional sense for the Legal theory. Raz's arguments change a core point to the understanding of law as a system of norms by Kelsen, initially into something less important, and later into something unnecessary to the Pure Theory, leading us to the conclusion that Hans Kelsen did not sustain his transcendental argument or justify the basic norm, failing in the purpose of providing a successful Pure theory.

However, we could endorse, with Stanley Paulson that the PTL is still extremely important, of course, compared with other normative reductivist theories and no more as a successful purity example.

Fundamental social rights as subjective rights

Cláudia Toledo[1]

Introduction

Since the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, fundamental individual and political rights are considered subjective rights, in contrast to fundamental social rights.

Robert Alexy defines fundamental social rights as rights of the individual before the State, to something that the individual, if had enough means and if there were sufficient offer in market, could also have from particulars: right to health, education, work and housing[2].

A whole social structure or organization is necessary to fulfil these rights. In this article, it is asserted that this organization is a subjective right when it has an immediate importance to the individual, considering his liberty. In order to effectively exercise his juridical liberty, the individual must have the material presuppositions to be able to choose among the allowed options. These presuppositions are the concrete conditions that ensure human dignity, which is the major aim of all fundamental rights. Fundamental social rights grant those conditions.

Once more the matter of the existence of subjective rights arises. Are the fundamental social rights subjective ones? Arguments for and against the positive answer are going to be analyzed, so that fundamental social rights are demonstrated as prima facie subjective rights. They turn to be determined as definitive in the concrete case, after pondering the favorable and opposing principles related to them in specific empirical situation.

I . Definition of Fundamental Social Rights and Subjective Rights

Fundamental rights are the positivation of human rights (which have a moral character) in the national Law. Although Alexy does not follow the traditional division of fundamental rights into individual, political and social ones, this is the structure that will be adopted here due to its majority acceptance in the Legal Theory[3].

Since fundamental individual and political rights were declared, there have never been divergences both in theory of law and in case law that they are subjective rights. On the contrary, the definition of fundamental social rights as subjective rights is quite controversial.

According to the cited definition, Alexy considers fundamental social rights as rights of the individual before the State, to something that the individual, if had enough means and if there were sufficient offer in market, could also have from particulars: right to health, education, work and housing.

Subjective right is a prerogative established by objective law to the legal subject. This prerogative is assured by legal action.[4]

Subjective rights are relational, because they are juridical relations between two or more legal subjects. The structure of fundamental social rights is: A has the right B before the State. The State has, in relation to A, the duty to ensure the necessary organization to comply with the fundamental social right. A duty corresponds to every subjective right. Once the subjective right is relational, then is the duty. Nevertheless, the relational duty implies another non-relational duty: as mentioned, the State has the duty to ensure a certain organization (not only to A specifically). This way, every subjective right implies a non-relational duty, but a non-relational duty, unlike the relational duty, does not imply a subjective right.

[3] According to Alexy's thought, fundamental social rights are "stricto sensu rendering rights" before the State.

[4] This definition of subjective right was formulated by two classic authors, both in Germany and Brazil: Rudolf von Jhering (Der Zweck im Recht) and Clóvis Beviláqua (Teoria Geral do Direito Civil).

II . The Justiciability of Fundamental Social Rights

The question in relation to the fundamental social rights is whether the organization required by them can be demanded as a subjective right, which is the strongest way of protection, since it is justiciable.

The answer depends on the importance that such organization immediately has either (i) to individual, considering his interests and liberty, or (ii) to collectivity, considering collective goods and interests. The arguments used in the first case present a subjective justification and those used in the second case have an objective one.

Objective norms come from an objective justification. Nevertheless, there is also the understanding that not only subjective norms come from a subjective justification – objective norms can also derive from it. This would happen in two cases:

1. If a difference between fundamental rights' interest and fundamental rights themselves is established and organization norms are supposed to ensure only the individual's interests. Objective norms are then sufficient for their assurance;

2. If the organization required by fundamental rights is supposed to be always devoted to the individual, because he is a member of the collectivity. Objective norms would then also be enough.

On the other hand, the two counter-arguments are:

1. In relation to the first statement above, indeed, the importance of the individual's constitutional protection can be so small and/or the effects can be so indirect to individual, that the simple objective protection is enough. Nevertheless, in principle, a subjective right has to be recognized;

According to the second statement, when everybody is affected in the same way, it is not possible to talk about an individual effect which generates a subjective right. However, the thought must be the opposite: it is because everybody is affected, that each individual is affected, situation that keeps the organization as a subjective right.

Alexy ends this matter with the relevant assertion that taking fundamental rights seriously as individual's rights excludes every form of collectivity argumentation.[5] The collectivity argument can not affect the thesis that fundamental rights protect individuals through subjective rights that ensure their liberty.

Liberty is a concept intrinsically related to dignity. The dignity's assurance is the aim of the totality of fundamental rights. Among these, the rights substantially related to human dignity's concept are the fundamental social ones, because only with their exercise the real fruition of the other fundamental rights is possible. This is because fundamental social rights are the first ones responsible for the human being own survival and his real formation as human: right to health, education, work and housing.

Dignity is a semantically open concept, that is, a concept that does not allow an exhaustive definition. There are a lot of subjective rights related to it: life, liberty, equality, physical integrity, privacy and many others[6]. Because of this, Alexy synthesizes the wealth of adjectives and nouns related to the concept of dignity which, although exuberant, do not formulate a definition, due to the randomness of their choice, saying that dignity can be expressed by a joint of concrete conditions, which must be present for its assurance. It is certain that the content of this joint is not unanimous, but it is not completely distinguishable either. There is convergence of many aspects, so that many times their differences are related only to the weight given to some conditions of the same joint or to the degree of the importance given to each element that is different according to the historical-social context.

These material prerequisites for the assurance of human dignity are the object of fundamental social rights. In other words, fundamental social rights act like the basis for the exercise of the individual rights that assemble the concept of dignity.

III . Arguments in favor of and against fundamental social rights as subjective rights

As stated above, these fundamental social rights make feasible the true fruition of fundamental individual rights. And then the question comes again: are fundamental social rights subjective ones? There are arguments for and against their definition as subjective rights. They can be summarized as follows.

The main argument pro is based on liberty and the main one against is the so called formal argument, even though there are also the [6] These rights are mostly fundamental individual ones. This makes clear the close relationship among all fundamental rights, which demand the vision of their indivisibility.

substantial ones.[7]

In relation to liberty, there are two thesis:

1. Juridical liberty, that is, the juridical permission to do or not do something has no value without the factual liberty, i.e., the empirical possibility to choose among allowed alternatives, which presupposes the possession of the necessary material and intellectual goods. In turn, factual liberties are not a matter of all-or-nothing, but a matter of degree;

2. Factual liberty of a huge number of holders is not possible to be implemented by themselves, but depends on State activities. So, State positive actions are required.

The formal argument against the stipulation of fundamental social rights as subjective rights is actually formed by two principles: principle of democracy and principle of separation of powers. According to both, the legislator democratically elected is the one who has the decision-making competence. Legislative and Executive Powers are the ones that have legitimacy to formulate public policies, without any interference of another power, because of the tripartite model.

Substantial arguments against the consideration of fundamental social rights as subjective ones refer to the material principles of juridical liberty of the third party, the other's social rights and the collective interests.

The principle of juridical liberty of the third party states that fundamental social rights would collide with liberty rights, because they are highly expensive, so that the State can only accomplish them with a huge taxation on those who are not demanding them, that is, the property owners, whose liberty would then be affected.

According to the principle of the other's social rights, if everyone demands equal exercise (in the same degree) of fundamental social rights, these rights themselves became unfeasible, because State can not bear the costs of the exercise of fundamental social rights by everybody in the same measure, as high as possible, that is, with the highest patterns of education, health, housing and work.

Finally, the principle of the collective interests considers that there would be a preponderance of the individual's interests – especially if many individuals demand the exercise of fundamental social rights – in detriment of the whole society's interests, of the collective good.

Dealing with the complexity of the situation demands the necessity of pondering the principles for and against the stipulation of fundamental social rights as subjective rights, so that it is possible to formulate

IV . Fundamental Social Rights: prima facie subjective rights

Alexy[8] proposes a conception that takes into account both arguments for and against. Fundamental social rights are prima facie subjective rights. As subjective rights, they are biding and not mere programmatic statements, even though there is no previous determination of which of them are definitive rights. The presentation of fundamental social rights as binding is in German Constitution (Grundgesetzt, art. 1, § 3º)[9]. The biding clause denies exactly their programmatic character, declaring their immediate application.

What is prima facie mandatory is always wider than what is definitively obligatory. The process of determination of a definitive right is done by the restriction clause. Restriction clause is the possible reserve clause, which means that what is due as an individual's subjective right can only be something that can reasonably be demanded from the society. This is especially directed to fundamental social rights, because, even if they are only minimally considered, they have a major financial effect when many individuals need them. However, this situation does not withdraw the effectiveness of these rights, because "the strength of the principle of legislator budgetary competence is not unlimited"[10]. This principle, as any other one, is not absolute. It is clear that the process of pondering the collisions of principles can lead, in different circumstances, to different definitive rights. As known, changing the concrete case, the juridical consequence attributed to it can also change.

The possible reserve clause does not lead to an emptying of the right, but to the necessity of pondering it with other rights[11]. This is an aspect in which every fundamental right is similar, in order to determine which one is definitive in an empirical situation. A fundamental social right is definitive if[12]:

1. The principle of factual liberty demands it urgently;
2. The principle of separation of powers and the principle of democracy, as well as the colliding material principles (especially those related to the juridical liberty of the other) are affected by the constitutional assurance of fundamental social rights in a relatively small measure.

The determination of a definitive right in concrete cases demands justification according to a rational argumentative structure. This is a pondering process and its guiding notion is the pondering rule, according to which "the mayor the non-satisfaction degree of a principle is, the mayor the importance of the other principle must be"[13].

V . Existential Minimum

The case law position both in Germany and Brazil – although the treatment of this matter is more solid in the first country – is that the single a priori definitive fundamental social right, i.e., the only immediately demandable one is the right to the existential minimum[14]. Existential minimum is the core of minimal fundamental social rights oriented by the idea of factual equality, which empirically enables the juridical liberty, ensuring then the respect for human dignity. As a definitive right, the existential minimum demands its immediate compliance by the Public Power. However, its content is not pacific yet. Alexy understands it as compounded by the right to simple housing, fundamental education and a minimum level of medical assistance.[15]

The fact that fundamental social rights many times depend on

[14] The precise detailing of the amount of money that corresponds to the existential minimum and must be paid by the State to the individual, according to each specific factual situation , was done in the long and elaborated decision BVerfGE125, 175 (February 9th, 2010).

[15] Ibid, p. 466. Alexy considers as definitive the right not only to fundamental education and high school, but also to the technical education. This situation does not correspond to Brazilian reality, where only fundamental education is part of the existential minimum, whose content varies according to the cultural, local, economical and historical context where it is applied.

the infraconstitutional regulation does not distort them as prima facie subjective rights and does not bring anything new to the juridical structure, because the assurance of fundamental individual rights, such as the right to come and go safely and freely, e.g., also demands a lot of infra-constitutional rules and ordinances. If they are prima facie subjective rights, they are justiciable. It is not the existence of a right that stems from its justiciability, but it is its justiciability that stems from its existence.

This way, there is no incompetence of the Judiciary Power in case of legislator's omission. As far as the Public Administration in a Democratic Legal State is regulated by the principle of non-obviation of Judiciary jurisdiction, the controllability of the other Powers' actions (or omissions) rests with the Judiciary Power.

The exceptional competence of Judiciary Power can be "a simple ascertainment of an unconstitutionality, passing through the establishment of a term in which a legislation according to Constitution must be done, until the direct judicial determination of what is mandatory due to the Constitution".[16]

This way, Legislative and Executive Powers have original competence to formulate and execute public policies. However, the Judiciary Power is exceptionally competent to determine that those public policies must be carried out, especially when this is defined by the Constitution itself. In case of omission, it is then considered that the competent public bodies are failing to comply with the political-juridical charges they mandatorily have, so they are compromising the effectiveness of fundamental social rights and the Public Power can not prevent the exercise of a subjective right. Only its holder, the legal subject, can choose to exercise it or not, once the right is a beneficial prerogative of him.

So the Judiciary Power is competent to determine the compliance with fundamental social rights in case of abusive behavior of State, such as State inertia, unreasonable procedures or procedures with clear intention of to neutralize the effectiveness of fundamental social rights. This is because neither the legislator's conformation liberty nor the Executive Power actions are absolute. They have a relative character. In this manner, if there is State arbitrariness towards the accomplishment of fundamental social rights, then legitimacy and legality are withdrawn from the discretionary power. After all, the Public Power is subordinated to a legally biding constitutional mandate, which represents a limitation of the political-administrative discretion.

The discretion is in the core of the pondering problem between the material principles of fundamental social rights and the formal principles of democracy and separation of powers. Although the legislator democratically legitimated has the decision-making competence, the public spending with public policies is submitted to the convenience and opportunity judgment of the administrator, but not to his arbitrariness.

Indeed there is political dimension in constitutional jurisdiction, which ultimately controls the subordination of the whole State's actions to Constitution. Constitution is exactly the materialization of the encounter of Politics with Law. The observation and compliance with fundamental rights are precisely the result of this Public Power subordination to constitutional norms.

VI . Concluding Remark

As conclusion, what is left clear in relation to fundamental social rights is that their effectiveness depends on the way the individual is seen by the society to which he belongs: as a legal subject or as an object of the juridical order[17]. The countries, looking for the establishment of democracy – that always happens as a process, typically compounded by a forward and backward movement, increasingly consider individuals as holders of subjective rights and no longer as an object of public interest to be treated by the State's social assistance service, so that public security and social order are ensured. In other words, individuals who are always presented as inconvenient objects. Individuals not endowed with self worth, but seen as "social problem" to be solved. In short, to respect individual's fundamental rights means "to take individual seriously".

In the wake of this clarity, Alexy is incisive in summarizing that "non-justiciable fundamental rights are a lie"[18]. Specifically in relation to fundamental social rights, he states that their justification, their reason of being is to promote to those who were not lucky to be born in a family with reasonable economic situation, the access to similar opportunities and material goods.

Judicial procedure and argumentation:
How much discursive is the legal discourse?

André L. S. Coelho[1]

Abstract: The paper aims to point out the shortcomings of Habermas's approach to the judicial procedure and to propose a reformulation of that approach. With that in view, it explains the notion of tension between facticity and validity as formulated by Habermas in Between Facts and Norms and as applied both to law in general and to the judicial procedure in particular. Next, the paper shows that Habermas's approach is exposed to several objections, has a serious deficit in its choices for the facticity pole, omits the external tension (never confronting the idealization of the judicial procedure with its empirical reality) and is impotent to give an actual diagnosis of time that takes a critical position about the contemporary trends in procedural law. Then, the text proposes a reformulation of Habermas's approach, where the elements that occupy both ends of the tension in the judicial procedure are rearranged, covering the deficit in the facticity pole, and an external dimension to the tension is added, giving space for a dialogue with the criticism of the judicial procedure from the point of view of the social sciences and tools for a diagnosis of time concerning contemporary trends in the judicial procedure.

Key-Words: Habermas – Judicial Procedure – Legal Discourse

1. Introduction

In Between Facts and Norms (BFAN), Habermas gives little consideration on the judicial procedure. The issue makes its first appearance in Chapter V, where it plays the role of a discursive substitute for Dworkin's monological judge Hercules, and comes again for a discrete farewell in Chapter VI, where problems of the separation of powers and the open character of the constitutional project stand out as the main subjects of concern. In both cases, the judicial procedure is depicted as a discourse that must have place within the constraints of a legal order and of factual limitations. This approach is not only insufficient to deal with the vast complexity of the issue, but also idealized and impotent to the point where its critical-theoretical key becomes barely recognizable. The conception of the judicial procedure as involving a tension between correction and consistency in one side and between argumentation and regulation in the other side is too simplistic, narrow, and naïve, in serious need of a reformulation.

The aim of this paper is to point out the shortcomings of Habermas's approach to the judicial procedure and to propose a reformulation of that approach. As both our criticism to Habermas's treatment of the subject and our proposal of reformulation will be grounded on the idea of the tension between facticity and validity (TBFAV) as a critical-theoretical scheme of investigation, we consider necessary to explain the central role of the TBFAV in the structure of BFAN as a whole, then to detail the elements of the TBFAV both in law in general and in the judicial procedure in particular. Next we list and explain the shortcomings of Habermas's approach, in a way that already makes clear what we think a suitable reformulation should bring to the table. After that, we present our proposal of reformulation, where we change the elements of the TBFAV in the judicial procedure both in the internal and the external sides of the tension. In the end, we try to justify our proposal in terms of a critical theory where concepts satisfy at the same time the history of the theory and the potential for a diagnosis of time.

2. Structure of BFAN

BFAN is composed by nine chapters and can be divided in four main parts. In the first part, corresponding to Chapters I and II, Habermas presents the notion of the TBFAV as passing from language to law and formulates the kind of critical-theoretical methodology that he deems appropriate for the study of law and democracy. In the second part, corresponding to Chapters from III to VI, Habermas deals with the internal TBFAV and provides a rational reconstruction of the self-understanding of the modern legal orders, concentrated in the conception of human rights and popular sovereignty and of their relationship from the point of view of a discursive theory. In the third part, corresponding to Chapters VII and VIII, Habermas deals with the external TBFAV and confronts the highly idealized version of the relationship between law and democracy provided in the second part with empirical models of legislation and of the public sphere capable of sustaining the realistic character of those idealizations. Finally, in the fourth part, corresponding to Chapter IX, Habermas provides what he takes to be his diagnosis of time, where he describes two social visions of society (the paradigms of law) that have informed the relation between law and democracy to the moment and perceives the rise of a new paradigm of law, the procedural one, where the co-originality of private and public autonomy would be taken seriously and the struggle for human rights would take the form of a struggle for participation in the self-legislative process.

As we can see, the idea of the TBFAV not only is important for the explanation of that historical-sociological scheme of the four main characteristics of modern law that Habermas names as the "legal form" and plays a very important role in many of the arguments of the second part of the book, but also is an organizing idea for the structure of the book as a whole. For the project, exposed in Chapter II, of explaining the relation between law and democracy from the point of view of a theory that integrates ideas and interests in the social order, instead of separating the normative and the empirical or confronting them as separate reigns, can be fully realized only by a conception of law and democracy that already conceives of both the normative idealization and the empirical reality as integrating ideas and interests. That's why the TBFAV cannot but permeate every level of the argument throughout the whole book.

3. TBFAV in Law

In Chapter I Habermas explains the TBFAV as passing from language to law. In language, the tension arises from the fact that both meanings in the semantic level and validity claims in the pragmatic level are at the same time connected to their contexts of enunciation and committed to idealizations that overcome every possible context. So words and statements on one hand bring idealizations to reality, giving ideas a concrete and particular existence in time and space, but on the other hand they commit reality to idealizations, leaving room for every realization to be criticized in face of the exceeding value it always fails to realize. This dynamics creates a sort of dialectical "push-and-pull" movement between reality and idealization, which Habermas calls a "tension between facticity and validity", that appears even in the German title of the book.

According to Habermas, modern law, inasmuch as lost connection with tradition, needed to be based on discourse and reasons, and that's why the TBFAV that exists in language manifests itself also in law. However, when Habermas formulates the version of the TBFAV that shows in law, he does not indicate elements, as those of language (meanings and validity claims) that are linked to reality and idealization at the same time, but now he presents pairs of concepts in law that have between them the same kind of TBFAV that meanings and validity claims have within them in language.

What these pairs of concepts do have in common with meanings and validity claims is that one of the pairs relates to the equivalent of the semantic level (the level of product, that is, to norms themselves) and the other one with the equivalent of the pragmatic level (the level of process, that is, to the production of norms). At the level of product, the first conceptual pair is freedom and coercion. Habermas recurs to Kant's formula that legal laws must be at the same time laws of freedom and laws of coercion, that is, laws that protect freedom but are allowed to employ coercion for that very protection of freedom. At the level of process, the second conceptual pair is positivity and legitimacy. As the context of modern law is post-traditional and post-metaphysical, the laws must result from fallible and alterable decisions of some men empowered with authority but have to meet the rational demands of subjects that are not willing to obey to just any laws put upon them. Modern law must find out a way to be at the same time humanly and timely produced and rationally acceptable, that is, positive and legitimate. Those are the double axis of the TBFAV in law, namely the tension between freedom and coercion and the tension between positivity and legitimacy. But they do not cover all the aspects of the TBFAV that concern to modern law. There is another aspect.

Both the tension between freedom and coercion and that between positivity and legitimacy emerge in the very idea of the modern law. They do not emerge from the idea of law, because Habermas explicitly says, while talking about the legal form, which comprises as elements the four poles of the two tensions referred above, that it cannot be conceptually (or transcendentally) deduced and results from a social-historical process of societal modernization. But they emerge in the idea of law, because they form part of the self-understanding of modern legal orders. This self-understanding must be confronted with empirical explanations of the functioning of democracy, especially with those that raise doubts about the reality of the classic idealizations in democratic thought. This confrontation between self-understanding and empirical models brings about a second kind of TBFAV, that Habermas calls "external tension" and is the main subject of Chapters VII and VIII.

For the aims of our paper, it doesn't matter how Habermas tries to develop and resolve those tensions, but it does matter the role that said tensions play in the structure of the method and argument of BFAN. It matters because we will, in point 5, insistently compare with that more advanced treatment of the TBFAV the considerably more simplistic and naïve version of it that Habermas applies to the judicial procedure, that we will now present in point 4.

4. TBFAV in the Judicial Procedure

As we said in the Introduction, the judicial procedure makes its first appearance in BFAN in Chapter V, dedicated to the indeterminacy of law and the rationality of jurisdiction. At that point, the judicial process is invoked as the discursive substitute of Dworkin's monological judge Hercules, the dialogical process capable of setting him free from his argumentative solitude and theoretical autism. Habermas's argument goes like this: judges must apply the law respecting the deontological character of the subjective rights and reinterpreting law as a whole in search for the only right answer – Dworkin is right about that; but they must not rely in a contextual substantial liberal morality neither construct, compare and select imaginary interpretive theories about legal rights – Dworkin is wrong about that; instead, they must rely on the discursive character of the judicial procedure and recur to pre-interpretations of rights in the paradigm of law that they belong to – that would be Habermas's reformulation of Dworkin, taking Hercules away and replacing him with the legal discourse in a micro (judicial procedure) and a macro (paradigms of law) level.

The judicial procedure, therefore, places Dworkin's interpretive practice into a discursive frame. The fact that the judicial procedure plays the role of a discursive corrective and counterbalance in Habermas's argument of Chapter V explains why the TBFAV that Habermas applies to the judicial procedure in particular is far less demanding and critical than the one that he applies to law in general. When he says something about the TBFAV in the legal procedure, that is what he says:

In the administration of justice, the tension between the legitimacy and positivity of law is dealt with at the level of content, as a problem of making decisions that are both right and consistent. This same tension, however, takes on new life at the pragmatic level of judicial decision making, inasmuch as ideal demands on the procedure of argumentation must be harmonized with the restrictions imposed by the factual need for regulation (BFAN 234, emphasis in the original).

So, similarly to what happens with law, the judicial procedure presents two internal tensions: at the level of product (that Habermas refers to as the level of content) the tension is between correction and consistency; at the level of process (that Habermas refers to as the pragmatic level), the tension is between argumentation and regulation. Besides, Habermas treats the first tension in the judicial procedure (at the level of product), that is, that between correction and consistency of the final decision, as resulting from the second tension in law (at the level of process), that is, that between positivity and legitimacy. Although Habermas says nothing further, we can suppose that what he meant is that the demand for the law to be rationally acceptable (legitimate) converts into the demand for the judicial decision to be rationally acceptable (correct), while the need of law to be determinate (positive) converts into the need of the judicial decision to be corresponding to the existing law (consistent)[2]. At the level of process, Habermas brings about a new tension, now between argumentation and regulation. The judicial procedure is conceived of as a discourse, not idealized and diffuse, but actually realistic and institutional. Because of that, the judicial procedure must take the form of a regulated discourse, with the regulation at the same time embodying and limiting the ideal conditions of discourse with its temporal, social, and material determinations. That tension ends up being between normatively ideal and empirically possible.

5. Shortcomings of Habermas's Formulation

We said that the role of discursive corrective and counter-balance that the judicial procedure plays in Habermas's argument in Chapter V

[2] There is no explanation of why the level of product of the judicial procedure is not related instead to the level of product of law, that is, to the tension between freedom and coercion; one might think that the judicial decision, in order to be correct, ought to be freedom-protective, that is, right-based, while, in order to be efficacious, ought to be coercive, for a judicial decision is nothing but a norm, one with strict limits of content given by the laws; Habermas, however, gives no account for that relation between the level of product of the law and that one of the judicial procedure neither appears to take seriously the consequences of the fact that the judicial decision is also a norm.

of BFAN explains why the TBFAV applied to the judicial procedure in particular is far less demanding and critical than the one applied to law in general. In the current section of the paper, we will make more clear many of the shortcomings of Habermas's formulation of the tensions typical to the judicial process.

First, Habermas's approach depends on the controversial claim that the judicial process is a discourse. Habermas argues that, although the plaintiff and defendant are invested in pursuing their own interests, they have to formulate their claims and arguments as if they were contributions to the discovery of the right answer and the judge, as an uninterested part, has to consider their speeches only from the point of view of that cognitive value. Apparently, the interaction between plaintiff and defendant is something like a strategic relation that is institutionally constrained to take the form of a communicative relation and that has their contributions taken and evaluated as if that performative cooperation were true.

Well, we now see that, if the judicial procedure is to be taken as a discourse, that means that the conception of discourse employed here is far away from (not to mention at odds to) that cooperative search for the truth with intelligibility, sincerity, freedom, and equality that turned Habermas's discursive ethics worldly known in the 70's. For this discourse that we find here is not only institutionally limited and constrained, but also open to all kinds of manipulation, falsification, coercion, and inequality under its pompous veil of discursivity. But nothing of that appears to be a serious obstacle for the classification of the judicial procedure as a discourse, as long as the parties play their characters and the impartial judge redeem the relation from all its sins by simply and naively taking seriously its make-believe.

The objections against that claim are many and from different kinds. In the judicial procedure, the speakers don't try to convince each other, but a third party, and the decision is not the product of their learning and consensus, but an act of decision and authority taken by the judge. In the judicial procedure, the parties have most of the time formally the same opportunities and terms, but material differences of means and of judicial bias produce serious distortions and inequalities. In the judicial procedure, the real parties, plaintiff and defendant, barely understand the language in which the debate is given and the measures that their counselors take throughout the process. In the judicial procedure, the parties retain evidences or facts that the other cannot prove to exist or be true, they rearrange their testimonies to make them suitable to their interests, they omit, distort, simplify, amplify, seduce, manipulate, mislead, deceive, pretend and give the facts so many faces and cuts to the point where truth ceases to exist, or to be recognizable, or even to matter. Some of those distortions are possible within the law, some of them are possible despite the law, but all them are possible with the knowledge, acquiescence, and connivance of the law. That makes very difficult to defend that the judicial procedure is a discourse.

The second shortcoming of Habermas's formulation is that the TBFAV in the judicial procedure suffers a deficit of facticity. Looking back at the TBFAV in law in general, we see two poles of facticity, that is, coercion and positivity, that represent non-normative, factual features necessary for the certainty and efficacy of the law and solid limitations to the normative claims of freedom and legitimacy. They are factual conditions that are also factual limits, a sort of resistance against the claims of validity from the part of rival claims. But, if we look ahead again at the TBFAV in the judicial procedure, the two new poles of facticity, that is, consistence and regulation, are not non-normative, factual features and do not raise a rival claim. On the one hand, consistence is agreement to the law, which, in modern law, is not a limitation on the correction of the final decision, but is rather a part of what means for a legal decision to be correct. Legal correction demands consistence, for a legal decision would be less (not more) correct without its agreement to the law. Consistence is more of a component of legal correction than a rival claim against it. On the other hand, regulation might be considered a genuine limit on the logic of argumentation, for the argumentation would be more realized if the regulation did not impose limits of time, space, themes, persons, and evidences and the debate could take whatever form it needed to and keep going for as long as it takes. By limiting the factual argumentation, regulation comes as a condition for the judicial procedure to have an institutional realization and to provide the parties with a solution for their controversy. It is not that regulation satisfies any purpose other than understanding itself, but rather that it gives argumentation the necessary conditions and limits for an empirical manifestation. In that sense regulation is not a rival claim, but rather a limit on the normative claim as a factual cooperative condition to make it happen in the world. Being consistence a normative requisite and being regulation a factual cooperative condition, both poles of facticity in the judicial procedure exhibit, comparing to the ones in law, a serious deficit of facticity.

This problem of a deficit of facticity is aggravated by a third problem, which is the lack of an external TBFAV. In law, both the tension between freedom and coercion and the one between positivity and legitimacy are aspects of the internal TBFAV, that in turn is complemented by another tension, that Habermas calls "external": the tension between the self-comprehension of the modern legal orders and the empirical realization of democratic processes. This external tension is crucial for a critical-theoretical approach that seeks to go beyond both a normative philosophy detached from reality and an empirical realism blind to the normative aspects of the social (BFAN, Ch. II). By reconstructing the self-comprehension of modern law, Habermas makes the discourse theory to fill the gaps of the false dichotomies that the tradition deemed insoluble. By providing the self-comprehension of modern law with a believable conception of the empirical functioning of democratic processes, Habermas inbreathes the theory with some plausibility. But that concern is absent from Habermas's treatment of the judicial procedure. There the tensions within the self-comprehension of the modern law are all that he deals with. Apparently, one century of philosophical criticism and empirical denunciation against the idealized conception of the judicial procedure as an impartial and rational decision-making have not sufficed to warn Habermas against the perils of taking the self-comprehension of the judicial procedure to be true without proper evidence. Habermas trusts in the argument of the discursive character of the judicial procedure more than would be advisable or justified for a critical-theoretical approach.

Finally there is a fourth problem with Habermas's formulation of the TBFAV in the judicial procedure, which is its diagnostic deficit. A critical theory is supposed to give a diagnosis of time, spotting trends of domination and potentials of emancipation in a concrete epochal context. Now Habermas's formulation is not a complete critical theory of the judicial procedure, so it seems inappropriate to demand from it diagnostic power. However, in a critical theory the theorist must formulate a concept or treat a phenomenon taking account of its implications for a social diagnosis. That's why we should consider unsatisfactory conceptual choices that, when faced with the social context in question, appear to give no critical standpoint to evaluate its scenario and trends. In the case of the judicial procedure, the major trends of our time are, as far as we see it, the standardization of jurisprudence, the turn to forms of alternative dispute resolution (ADR), and the judicialization of politics (which we will speak about in the next section of the paper), none of which not even begin to be critically analyzed by the tensions between correction and consistence and between argumentation and regulation.

6. Proposal of Reformulation

Considering the above explained shortcomings of Habermas's formulation of the TBFAV, we find necessary to depart from a reformulated version of it. In this section of the paper we will present our proposal of reformulation and show how, in our opinion, it surpasses Habermas's in every one of the indicated shortcomings.

For solving the problems of the naïve assumption of the discursive character and of the facticity deficit, we propose to replace the poles of the TBFAV in the judicial procedure. At the level of the product, instead of a tension between correction and consistence, we propose a tension between legal correction (that includes consistence) and social functionality. With legal correction we mean that the final decision is supposed to be the most rationally acceptable solution for a particular case within the limits of the existing law. It does not insist in the false opposition between correction and consistence, but rather takes consistence as a component of the legal correction. With social functionality we mean the extralegal political, social, and economic consequences of the decision that can be taken in account by the judges and the public as a competing claim against legal correction, that is, as a extralegal reason not to make the most legally correct decision. By conceiving of the social functionality as grounded in extralegal consequential reasons, we provide the judicial procedure with an anti-discursive force and a feature heavier in facticity. With the idea of a tension between legal correction and social functionality we refer to the tension between (a) the decision as a sole result from the elements within the existing law and the case in question and (b) the decision as a means to effect some ends in a particular way rather than other. In a way, this tension mirrors that one in Austin and Searle's speech acts theory between illocutionary meaning and perlocutionary effect, which in Habermas is related to the dichotomy between strategic and performative use of language.

At the level of the process, instead of a tension between argumentation and regulation, we propose a tension between institutional argumentation (that includes regulation) and institutional decisionism. With institutional argumentation we mean the purpose of the judicial procedure to be a cognitive search for the correct answer within the institutional limits of legal regulation. Again, instead of insisting in the opposition between argumentation and regulation, we take regulation as a necessary condition for the sort of argumentation that takes place in institutional contexts. With institutional decisionism we mean the claim of the judicial procedure to be an authoritative exercise of political power to say the last word and put end to a social conflict. By conceiving the institutional decisionism as related to political authority and power, we provide the judicial procedure with an anti-discursive force and a feature heavier in facticity. With the idea of a tension between institutional argumentation and institutional decisionism we refer to the tension, much known in the history of the theory of the judicial procedure, between knowledge and power, cognitio and voluntas, truth and authority, that is, between (a) the judicial procedure as a search for justice and (b) the judicial procedure as an exercise of power. Now the closest relation would be with Habermas's dichotomy between communicative and administrative power (BFAN, Ch. IV), both of which must be recognized to be present in the judicial procedure.

Still in our reformulation, we would add to both internal tensions an external one: between the self-comprehension of the judicial procedure and its empirical realization. Here we would have the proper space and chance to welcome criticisms and denunciations against the idealized conception of the judicial procedure formulated by both the legal realist movement and the social sciences. It would be necessary to respond to such challenges by proposing a believable empirical model of the judicial phenomenon capable of retaining the constitutive force of the idealizations without losing grip of the critical point of view on the subject. We must not dismiss at the outset the critical studies by using something like a trick of words, sustaining that they have not understood correctly the discursive character of the judicial procedure. Instead, we must distinguish which of those studies can be incorporated or translated to a critical-theoretical point of view and which are too dependent on reductionist behaviorism, raw realism, and blatant noncognitivism. Themes such as unequal access to justice, judicial bias, jury manipulation, and the preservation of the judicial status quo cannot be ignored by any serious attempt of critical theory on the subject.

Last, but certainly not least, is the diagnostic power of our reformulation. As we said briefly earlier, there are three contemporary phenomena that we consider to be the major trends concerning the judicial procedure in our time: the standardization of jurisprudence, the turn to forms of alternative dispute resolution (ADR), and the judicialization of politics. Our demand was that the formulation of the TBFAV in the judicial procedure provided at least a critical standpoint to evaluate each of them. Now we will speak of them and of how our reformulation helps to assess them from a critical-theoretical point of view.

The standardization of jurisprudence is a trend, observed in legal systems both in the common law and in the civil law traditions, to submit the judicial decisions of lower courts to standards previously established by higher courts. The aim is to reduce the time spent with repetitive cases and to prevent scenarios where the decision made by the lower court would have no chance of prevailing in the appeal stage given the already solidly established decision standard of the higher courts. That saving-time policy is usually justified by saying that equal cases must have equal decisions and that a late justice is another form of injustice. Translated to the language of rights, those reasons would be formulated as the right, belonging to the parties, to be treated equally and to have their cases decided as soon as possible. A critical theory of the judicial procedure must give tools to evaluate this trend and its alleged reasons.

We consider that the tension between argumentation and decisionism has something to say about that trend. From the angle of argumentation, a legally correct decision must treat parties in equal cases equally, providing, in the ideal scenario, equal responses for their claims. However, the correction of the decision depends on the consideration of the arguments raised by each party in each case. The standardization of decision provides equality of results, but not of opportunity to interfere in the final decisions. The arguments of some parties will be heard, but the arguments of others will simply be assumed as not more relevant than the first ones and will remain unheard. By standardizing the decision for a type of case, the courts freeze the state of discussion in a particular point of the flow, denying the nature of open learning process implicated in the constant retake of the case. At the same time, from the angle of decisionism, solving multiple cases with a single decision-making is valued, with the standardization of decision representing a fantastic means to that end. Although the subject requires further examination, the appearance that we are before a case of celebration of decisionism over argumentation is very bright and transparent.

As for the turn to forms of alternative dispute resolution (ADR), we refer to the welcoming of methods of conflict-solution diverse from the regular jurisdiction, such as arbitration, mediation, conciliation, negotiation etc., in many legal systems in the world. Although these ADR's have many differences among them, they all have in common the preference for a type of solution negotiated and consented by the parties themselves, with or without a third party, instead of by the judge through the mere application of the existing law. The justification for the turn to the ADR's consist in criticisms (functional and normative) to the regular jurisdiction, functional arguments about costs, time, and efficacy, and normative arguments about participation, dialogue, and consent. Not all the arguments listed can be translated to the language of rights. But some of them, if translated, would result in the following claim: citizens, even before being converted in parties in a judicial procedure, have the right to negotiate their interests with each other and to settle their own conflicts in the way they find is best. Put that way, the claim that supports the ADR's sounds not only plainly acceptable, but also an important increment to the discursive and inclusive character of the legal decision-making.

But the scenario changes dramatically its colors as soon as the trend in question is examined from the point of view of our proposed tension between correction and functionality. From the angle of correction, a decision must be the most rationally acceptable solution for a particular case within the limits of the existing law. So the problem an ADR creates is double: on one hand, it disconnects the solution for the case from the existing law, cutting off the link between the decision in a particular case and the democratic will embodied in the laws; on the other hand, it embraces a strategic use of reason and language, for the "dialogue" that it promotes is not a cooperative search for the correct answer, but an exercise of negotiation with the advances and retreats typical of the calibration of interests. In lieu of the most rationally acceptable solution for a particular case within the limits of the existing law, it invites the parties to come to an agreement that is not a consensus, but rather a compromise. From the angle of functionality, the ADR's are not only sustained on extralegal reasons like costs, time, and efficacy, but encourage the very parties to deploy functional, extralegal reasons to come to an agreement about their particular interests. Again, although the subject requires further examination, the conclusion that in this turn towards the ADR's there is a risk of functionalization of law appears to be very likely.

From the three trends in question, the judicialization of the politics is maybe the most tortuous to be dealt with. In the sense that is most relevant for our debate, this phenomenon consists in the search for the judicial procedure to impose on the state the concrete obligation to promote a certain public policy or to realize for the individual in a particular case the abstract right that he or she would have had satisfied only by means of a public policy. The justification of this trend is normally made on the basis that the constitutional lists of rights make promises to the individual citizen which the state is charged to fulfill and that, owing to deficits of political representation, this individual citizen finds less and less in the traditional political channels and institutions efficacious means to make it happen. The judicial power would have the opportunity and the duty to make democracy more democratic by deploying its armed hand to coerce the state to be all its subjects deserve and expect it to be. In the language of rights, citizens cannot have the right to the end without having the right to the means to make it happen, if not through political methods, through judicial ones. Having a right would bring within itself the possibility of judicialization in case of repeated refusal.

Now we think that both the internal tensions in the judicial procedure have some saying about the judicialization of politics. Besides the political problems of violating the separation of powers and of transferring from politics to law the decision on public resources and ends of the community, the judicialization of politics implies, from the angle of correction, the submission of issues linked to the realization of ends to the language of rights and duties and, from the angle of argumentation, the treatment of issues of general interest in a discourse that does not contemplate different voices and competing demands and does not gather neither listen to all the affected subjects. It would be a distortion of the type of discourse employed and a violation of the rule of consulting all the affected. On top of that, the trend to judicialize political debates would be explainable from the angle of functionality and decisionism: what makes the judicial courts appealing for the politically misrepresented citizens is that, by resorting to functional, extralegal reasons, the legal discourse opens up for the wide range of motives in the argumentative spectrum of politics, while, by relying on authoritative decision-making, it gives the individual citizen the kind of power he or she usually feels deprived of in modern mass democracies. So, despite the obvious complexity of the subject matter, our reformulated version of the TBFAV in the judicial procedure gives clear signs of its diagnostic potential regarding this phenomenon in particular.

Certainly, much is still to be done in refining and developing our proposal of reformulation to Habermas's approach to the judicial procedure. From our point of view the TBFAV is a key concept for understanding and evaluating critically the judicial procedure in general and its contemporary trends in particular. But, precisely because of this crucial relevance, it requires a formulation that exempts it from the criticisms that Habermas's is vulnerable to and enables the critical-theoretical thinker to have a relevant saying about some of the major trends of our time.

Law and Music
Human Rights protection and the song "Dom Quixote"

Ariane Shermam Morais Vieira
Rosana Ribeiro Felisberto

Abstract: Just like Don Quixote, fighting windmills for the love for the causes he believed in, even if they were lost, Law also fights for ideals of solidarity and implementation of fundamental rights, which, today, permeate the Brazilian Constitution. Trough the story of the knight-errant, the song "Dom Quixote", from the Brazilian band Engenheiros do Hawaii, portrays its title character as someone outside the social context or the reality that surrounds him, a kind of "fish out of water." Notwithstanding the lost causes he fights for, sometimes the character Don Quixote realizes that the Giants are just windmills. In this context, Don Quixote, the character, can be related to issues and problems faced by the fundamental rights. The situations in which the fundamental rights and their defenders are faced with obstacles and realities that differ from their ideals are not rare, but they persist in the pursuit of their goals, even knowing that the fight, at that particular moment, will not bring an immediate result. The daily fight against the imaginary giant reflects the conservatism and immobility of ideas from institutions and legal institutes present in our juridical order. Some faithful squires still remain by the "juridical Quixote"' side, allowing him to fight legal battles and follow his path in pursuit of his ideals, without completely leaving reality, transforming it (the reality) without losing the soul of a knight.

Key words: Human rights protection. Music.

1. Introduction.

The theme of Human Rights has gained increasing importance nowadays. The international covenants and treaties celebrated to implement and consolidate human rights are increasingly numerous and comprehensive, involving more countries and non-governmental organizations around the world.

Given the attempt to extend and expand Human Rights around the world, some questions arise about its real effectiveness. The claim to universality, despite the dialectical discussion between universalism x relativism, attaches great importance to the issue, bringing out efforts to implement human rights in places and communities that do not recognize them consistently.

The struggle for the realization of human rights, however, cannot enforce arbitrary impositions, because it would be acting against its own essence. Thus, the role of organizations and institutions that defend and expand the application of human rights remain in a constant struggle, often without great possibilities of real change in the factual situation. Still, just like Quixote, hopeful and hungry for achieving his acts of bravery and heroism, these entities face, in a daily basis, the giant windmills that prevent the development of Human Rights.

2. Human Rights.

Boaventura de Sousa Santos (1997), before the emergence of what he calls "emerging paradigm", proposes a new approach of Human Rights, so that they can be implemented in a cosmopolitan project.

According to the aforementioned author, human rights should be viewed from a multicultural conception, within which different cultures are taken into consideration, not just tolerated, so that interculturalism can be built.

Given this perspective, the author lists some assumptions for the implementation of a cosmopolitan vision of Human Rights. Among these assumptions, the author cites the overcoming of relativism X universalism debate: all cultures have notions of what is human dignity, although not all of them deal whit it in terms of human rights; all cultures are incomplete and problematic; all cultures tend to distribute individuals into groups of equal and different.

Continuing his explanation, the author points out that, from the assumptions cited above, one can think of an expansion of human rights and thus on its implementation in more locations. Hence, he proposes the possibility of universal human rights, understood as having a multicultural facet.

Additionally, the internalisation of the idea that human rights are multicultural and that no culture is superior to another, given the existing differences between them, would allow the achievement of a "counter-hegemonic globalization", to the bottom-up, and not vice versa, as we see nowadays .

As can be seen, the considerations made by the Portuguese author reinforce the idea brought by Bobbio (2004), that the great problem of human rights today is not exactly its fundamentals but, mainly, its effectiveness . This would be visible by the fact that human rights are widely accepted by various international covenants and treaties and turned into rules by the constitutions of many states. This acceptance of human rights, however, does not guarantee its implementation.

3. Human Rights' Background and Implementation.

The need to implement and expand human rights led to the creation of international and legal mechanisms, to allow the supervision and promotion of said rights. It is with this objective that international agreements are signed and systems of protection and defense of human rights are created.

Among the international human rights treaties, the following can be highlighted, given their importance: Convention against Torture; Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination; the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Indeed, to implement the rights contained in the covenants and treaties on human rights, protection systems were created, among which we can highlight the International System of Protection of Human Rights, which involves the creation of international courts and the creation of mechanisms for international monitoring on the subject. Regional systems, such as the Inter-American System of Human Rights, and locations for the promotion of human rights were also created.

These systems of protection and defense of human rights also rely on states' responsibility to create internal bodies whose goals are to monitor and promote human rights and to expressly adopt domestically standards that are consistent with international human rights system.

For instance, agencies, observatories and non-governmental organizations play an important role in the defense and promotion of human rights, acting directly to implement them or watching over their implementation, reporting and denouncing disrespect for human rights to the competent authorities, so that they are able to adopt the appropriate measures.

Internally, in Brazil, in addition to the international covenants and treaties celebrated, the Constitution of 1988 expressly establishes, in the third paragraph of its fifth article, that any pacts or treaties signed by the country regarding human rights will be equivalent to the constitutional amendments and, therefore, will not be subjected to revision, being placed above the ordinary law. It should be noted that Brazil also has government agencies and non-governmental organizations working in the defense and promotion of human rights.

The country also develops what is called "Multi-Year National Plan on Human Rights", according to which the guidelines and policies to promote the protection and implementation of human rights are set .

Despite all the positive legal predictions in Brazil, regarding the implementation of human rights, the reality shows that there is still a lot to be done to achieve a satisfactory level of implementation of human rights in the country. The permanent, though often precarious, performance of non-governmental organizations is revealing in this respect. These entities face great obstacles to the implementation of human rights in the country.

4. The song.

The song chosen to illustrate the status of the implementation of human rights in Brazil "Don Quixote", form the Brazilian band Engenheiros do Hawaii.

The song title is the same as the literary work of the writer Miguel de Cervantes. The identical names are not mere coincidence. The musical work portrays a character full of ideals, who lives on a journey seeking to achieve great heroic deeds.

The main character and his actions, however, do not fit the reality of the world around him. The Quixote from the aforementioned song, just like the Quixote created by Cervantes, is a "fish out of water", a "butterfly in the aquarium", a person "who lives battling "giants (windmills)." As the song says:

Muito prazer, meu nome é otário
Vindo de outros tempos mas sempre no horário
Peixe fora d'água, borboletas no aquário
Muito prazer, meu nome é otário
Na ponta dos cascos e fora do páreo
Puro sangue, puxando carroça

Um prazer cada vez mais raro
Aerodinâmica num tanque de guerra,
Vaidades que a terra um dia há de comer.
"Ás» de Espadas fora do baralho
Grandes negócios, pequeno empresário.

Muito prazer me chamam de otário
Por amor às causas perdidas.

Tudo bem, até pode ser
Que os dragões sejam moinhos de vento
Tudo bem, seja o que for Seja por amor às causas perdidas
Por amor às causas perdidas

Tudo bem... Até pode ser
Que os dragões sejam moinhos de vento
Muito prazer... Ao seu dispor
Se for por amor às causas perdidas
Por amor às causas perdidas

(Quixote – Engenheiros do Hawaii)

As can be seen, the constant struggle of the main character puts him in an adverse position, since he fights for the "love of lost causes". The obstacles this character face may not be real, but he still fights them. Heroism, here, has much more to do with picking up fights than with overcoming and defeating all the ordeals that arise.

Likewise, the human rights defenders mentioned in this essay face "windmills", especially when it comes to expanding and making their ideals effective.

5. Human rights protection and final considerations.

The protection of human rights has expanded in recent years. Internationally, treaties and covenants become increasingly important. The number of organs and organizations destined to protect human rights has also grown lately. But despite the increase in defense agencies and dissemination of human rights, its implementation still leaves much to be desired.

Reports on Human Rights observatories constantly point out transgressions and serious disrespect for human rights around the world, frequently mentioning Brazil.

The claim of universality of human rights is also recurrent, but its effectiveness does not reach a significant number of victims to daily transgressions.

Given the considerations above, it becomes clear why the defenders of human rights are compared to the character Don Quixote in this essay. Theses defenders constantly struggle against a number of factors and human rights transgressions, guided by the ideal of defending the vulnerable, without, however, being able to achieve their goals in terms of effective and universal implementation of human rights .

The universalization of human rights seems to remain as an ideal, without practical meaning. Nevertheless, the defenders of human rights continue to fight against the lack of resources and lack of effective mechanisms to implement their objectives.

Indeed, the human rights defenders struggle daily against " windmills ", just like " butterflies in the aquarium", in the search of a world that still needs to commit to the achievement of human rights protection systems outlined in the national and international legislation .

The pursuit of recognition of deficient citizens:
The privileged example of the (lack of) urban mobility

Álvaro Augusto Lauff Machado[1]
Adriano Sant'Ana Pedra[2]

Abstract: A disabled citizen - jettisoned of the social environment not only because of their biological conditions, but especially by a selfish-individualistic posture of Brazilian society - finds, in the current context, an entire normative content that brings the guarantee that its inclusion is a fundamental right, valuing himself/herself, in this test, the guarantees forecasts and expressed of urban mobility as a means of promoting of this recognition. However, the right, while the recognition phase, it is not sufficient to satisfy such guarantees to the person with a disability, should be associated with stage of solidarity, both studied by the theory of recognition of Alex Honneth. Nonetheless, given the poor understanding of the rights this bond is not established, reason why it will be sought to introduce constitutional hermeneutics, philosophical-oriented, as a bridge to set up this link and make the guarantees of the right, under an optical sympathizing, finding ways to be fully implemented and not justifying, with this, the observed deficit of urban mobility measures in Brazil.

1. Introduction

The physical and biological condition of the human being has always been, throughout history, a factor considered for his/her inclusion or exclusion in the society. One who holds some kind of disability suffers from barriers and limitations to exercise his/her citizenship, not there only comprised as political rights, but as a proper means of externalization of his/her human dignity. He/she does not have full access to the work, because it is not believed (neither it´s offered means for it) that he/she is able to do it, nor does he/she have access to a variety of public spaces, by the very absence of ways to its accessibility, among many other negative.

It can be said that it is promoting a jettisoning of the people who do not enjoy their full motor capacity, sensory and mental health and are therefore not recognized by any kind of law, civil and / or political.

It happens that this perception of the disabled as a naturally excluded human being, has been mitigated and tackled in the course, especially in the last century, from which time began to emerge on the international scene (at least) a political-social-economic agenda oriented to the study of inclusive measures that could break the previous paradigm.

This occurs, first, because of the natural medical science advancement that can bring new explanations for the various disability forms and also begin to promote researches diagnosing the public and private deficit in the actions that should be adopted in the benefit of those citizens.

Second, and in a follow up of the new paradigm that forms, it begins to emerge normative forecasts of international law and domestic law which entail the assignment of disabled guarantees, especially the advent of the 1988 Constitution.

Here it is, then, the research scenario: individuals who naturally lived in a context of exclusion now have warranties, formal, of citizenship in which, reflex pathway, should correspond to an entire social performance, public and private, in favor of their inclusion, promoting therefore their recognition as a citizen.

But the normative predictions, even diluted in various "sources of law", by itself, do not bring, automatically, the guarantee of this recognition on citizen behalf, whereas, although the guarantees for the disabled inclusion are established in the programmatic content of the paternal order, they are still not present in the sociopolitical agenda of such theme.

Hence the first discussion about the (in) sufficiency of law such as (second) stage of recognition, and the need for its analysis dialogued with solidarity, the next step, and last, of the struggle for recognition, following the work of Axel Honneth.

This is because, it turns out that the lack of recognition of disabled citizen derives not only, of course, from legal issues, but mainly from a deficit prestacional of the State and of all the society, is, thus in a social conflict that underlies the need that this guy, carrying biological limitations, has to insert himself into everyday life in a society which he can be part, without those same biological limitations exert any harm in his exercise ability of citizenship.

Thus, the analysis of this social conflict goes, because, by the overcoming of mere legal perspective, being fundamental the solidarity and community understanding that should meddle in the interpretation and application of all guarantees provided on disable behalf.

Then, carried out an analysis of the relevance of the association of solidarity to the right for an effective disabled inclusion and overcoming of their recognition deficit as a citizen, we verify that a reading from a model liberal-individualist-normative law and society itself are not sufficient to meet such intent.

There is a need, then, to identify a way which can then establish this link between law and solidarity and that surpasses the understanding of the actual dogmatic normative legal sciences.

By virtue of this, we try to enforce the constitutional hermeneutics, philosophical-oriented, as a vector that can be promoted to an interpretation, understanding and application of the guarantees of disabled citizens by establishing a bridge between the right and solidarity, aiming to a means of overcoming, at least perambulating, the crisis of recognition that it is established.

Framing up, so the question to be tackled: recognizing the deficit of urban mobility and intermittent struggle of disabled citizens seeking for their recognition, despite formal guarantees provided by the law, can a bridge between the right and solidarity be established as stages of this struggle for recognition, from the philosophical hermeneutic-oriented as a means to bring more efficiency to these guarantees?

It is noted, at least in this introduction, that, since then from the hermeneutics it can be promoted a constant (re)questioning from the right front of the other issues that involve their own social, political, economic life, and why not biological, of the human being. And in these cases, where there is a clear deficit of recognition, evident that the entity and objectiveness postures of law do not meet the preferring problem, on the contrary, ignore it.

2. Disability and the deficit policy for urban mobility in Brazil

The deficiency, whether it is physical, sensory or mental, brings to the human being, for natural reasons, limitations that non-carries people would not have. But that, by itself, is not a logical corresponding to say that they cannot (ou can not) also have a regular social life.

Rather, the problem of disability is not in the disabled himself, but in the (not) eyes of the other that, in a indifference posture, lack to check that it can be promoted measures for citizen insertion, although he may not enjoy his full biological capacity .

Thus, before the issue of disability was seen from the biological structure which did not recognize any measure of achievement and the disabled inclusion, eternally hostage to its inability, today the issue of lack of recognition and affirmation of the disabled inability do not get more on the level of medical science, but from the very social understanding about disability. Foucault asserts that

> If, in the 19th century, the biomedical discourse represented a redemption to the body with impediments in front of religious narrative of sin or the divine wrath, today is the biomedical authority that sees contested by the social model of disability. (2004, p.18)

The condition of people with disabilities, in this perspective brings with it a distancing of citizens among themselves, in a clear (conflict) social exclusion process. This takes place from the formation of individuals standardizing model in a true physical standards, aesthetic and intellectual worship. One who avoids this pattern, albeit with minimum levels, suffers from a species of jettisoning which therefore becomes even more evident when this difference is due to a physical disability.

It is the object prestige while thing, leaving to observe himself another, as individuals. The absence of a citizen Community posture among themselves that, within the present liberal-individualist-consumerist model, concentrates all their interests only to the object. Baudrillard (1981, p.15) asserts that

> We live in the time of objects: I mean we exist according to their pace and in line with its permanent succession. Currently we are the ones who see them born, producing themselves and die, whereas in all other previous civilizations the objects, instruments or perennial monuments, were the ones which survived to the human generations.

This reading is done in the foreground, to observe that the exclusionary posture happens whether somewhat natural in this context, promoting a shift away from the disabled, not by biological issues, but, on the contrary, by socioeconomic and cultural issues.

The disability then gain an understanding that reveals, thereafter, that the reduction in its "limitations" involves the need of warranties and a sympathizing reading. It is not the nature that limits citizens with disabilities, but the cult of normalcy that makes this individual, deficient, be conceived as an undesirable body.

Hence there is the assertion that

> What defines a disabled person is not the lack of a member nor the reduced vision or hearing. What characterizes a person with a disability is the difficulty of relating, the difficulty degree to integrate in the society. The difficulty degree for social integration is to define who is or not a disabled. (Araújo, 2012, p. 01)

The disabled exclusion and, especially, the suffering that a disabled citizen might have is, first and foremost, in the absence of accurate recognition, hence the need to be optimized measures that overcome these problems.

That's because, the studies addressed to such questions have always been ignored from the political and especially legal perspective, punctuating Débora Diniz, Livia Barbosa and Wederson Rufino dos Santos (2004, p. 65) that > Inhabit a body with physical, sensory or intellectual impediments are one of many ways of being in the world. Among the narratives about inequality that are expressed in the body, studies that are expressed in the body, disability studies were those that later emerged in the field of social sciences and humanities. [...]

> The normality, understood either as a biomedical expectation functioning pattern of the species, now as a moral precept of pro> ductivity and suitability of social norms, was challenged by the understanding that disability is not only a biomedical concept, but the oppression by the body with variations of operation. Disability therefore translated oppression to the bodies with impediments: the concept of a disabled body or a disabled must be understood in political terms and not more strictly biomedical.

Thus, in political terms, it has to be one of the ways of inclusion and therefore of recognition of this citizen is the promotion of effective measures that pays attention to urban mobility. Through these inclusive policies it will be able to establish the first and indispensable guarantee to disabled citizens: their ability to move and thus independence and autonomy.

This remained evident in a study published by the School of Nursing Journal USP (PAGLIUCA et al, 2012, p. 587) who identified architectural barriers in internal areas of hospitals in sharp injury to the disabled, having concluded that the research is truly committed displacement to disabled people in Sobral public hospitals, CE (cut geographical research), checking for even the simplest forms of accessibility did not exist at the locations, such as ramps and adequate furniture. Random it did not exist such physical impediments, it was concluded that it would be very privileged the integration of disabled people in that environment.

The same conclusion was obtained by researchers in the field of Physiotherapy of Paraíba Federal University (Amaral et al, 2011, p. 1838), which, in a study with 532 people with disabilities, also analyzing the mobility of public hospital spaces, realized the need for expansion of services involving the promotion of urban mobility, as a guarantee of their own health and, in some cases, rehabilitation.

Regarding the relevance of urban mobility as a way of providing guarantees to the disabled, it says that > Ensure the elimination of architectural barriers and duty regulations regarding construction of public parks and public buildings as well as the manufacturing of transportation vehicles is a matter of fundamental importance to people with disabilities, behold adequate access is literally the next step to achieve the other rights. (LENT, 2008, p. 937).

However, despite the urban mobility policies being fundamental and basilar ways for inserting the disabled in a social and community context, there is a huge deficit of service provision, both public and private, in their promotion.

This, in addition to the evidence found in the aforementioned scientific research, is present in a daily reality of Brazilian citizens with disabilities, that suffer limitations since the time they go through the door of their home, go by the sidewalks and streets of the various cities of this country.

There are countless news published[3] in the most varied communication media reflecting the deficit of service provision of urban mobility in Brazil, and therefore the absence of (pre)occupation in solving such issues, whether in public environments, and even in private environments but which have, naturally, spaces for public access and common.

These are cases which occur throughout Brazil with people falling into holes, people with difficulties asserting their right (and duty) to vote, problems to access public transportation system and even physical impediments so that the person can have access to their own residence, especially in residential buildings.

One sees, therefore, that the exclusion of the disabled person is, today, eminently associated with sociopolitical issues, and not on account of its own biological limitation.

One of the ways of facing this question is with the implementation of public policies, which, in the Brazilian reality, are scarce. It is this deficit of service provision which leads to lack of recognition of these citizens. Therefore, "[...] as well as the racial issue, generational or gender, disability is essentially a human rights issue. [...]. "(Diniz, 2007, p. 79).

However, the provision of public policy on urban mobility does not depend solely, on prediction rules; it is not the right, that will solve, only in itself, the problem identified. It is necessary to check other issues that should be associated with the law as a means to promote the recognition of disabled citizen.

3. Disability as social conflict and the search for recognition: The right as a stage of recognition and an analysis of (crisis of) solidarity

Starting from the understanding that the disabled exclusion is given, nowadays, no longer just in virtue of his own biological limitation, but mainly because it does not adjust to the established standards of normality in society, it ends up revealing itself as a form of social conflict that leads to seeking for recognition of these citizens. After all, "the struggle for recognition is at the basis of all social conflicts" (SMITH, 2010, p. 53).

However, on the other hand, it is undeniable that the current historical context honors the maintenance of this conflict, fomenting, inevitably, the exclusion of those who can not be inserted in the current capitalist-individualist perspective. That's because "the social model holds that originally a body with impairments would not be able to exploration and production regime of capitalism" (Barton et al, 1997, p. 43).

Thus, the need for such recognition goes, therefore, through the search for a social integration, and more than that, "the struggle for recognition should then be seen as a pressure, under which permanently new conditions for participation in the public formation will come to light "(SAAVEDRA, 2006, p. 280).

The exercise of citizenship is one of the fundamental ways to the disabled recognition, but this struggle needs that new models are always (re)invented for the participation and enjoyment of this right (citizenship) keep afloat.

However, it is essential to recognize, first of all, that recognition presupposes a complex set of intersubjective relations. The recognition of the individual undergoes by one dimension, first, individual (self), and then advances to the intersubjectivity to be established with other individuals, in other words, with the other.

The individual understands himself so then establish a relationship with the other, seeking his understanding (intersubjectivity), being from that intersubjectivity that will promote recognition, which depends, therefore, of a social integration. Axel Honneth (2011, p. 155) states that > [...] The reproduction of social life takes place under the imperative of mutual recognition because the individuals can only reach an autocorrelation practice when they learn to conceive themselves, from the normative perspective of their partners interaction, as its social recipients.

Honneth (2011, 155/213), in its turn, will establish that there are patterns and stages of recognition within this perspective of intersubjectivity. In response to this, Nelson Moreira Camata (2010, p. 57) states that

> The intersubjective recognition patterns occurs in three stages: (a) firstly, in the sphere of primary relationships, the way of recognition relates to love and friendship, (b) in the second, in the dimension of legal relations, the recognition identifies to the right, and, finally, (c) valuing community, the way of recognition is solidarity.

Thus, this intersubjective relationship, that promotes the recognition occurs since the earliest form of relationship that is love. The parents love with their children, the friendship. However, in this paper, we will overcome such analysis facing up, forward, two subsequent steps as ways of promoting the disable recognition under the optics of public policy for urban mobility.

The right, second stage, is verified as stage and way to promote the recognition from the time they are granted protection guarantees of citizens in their relations under the legal perspective. So

> The way of recognizing the right corresponds to the way of disrespect entitled deprivation of rights (Entrechtung) and in this sphere of recognition the component of personality that is threatened is that of the social integrity. (SAAVEDRA, 2006, p. 283).

The right, then, as a stage of recognition occurs to the extent that there are normative guarantees so that the social actor can postulate and require his recognition. The individual needs to realize, himself, as a holder of rights that enable his participation in public life. This is because, the social sphere is constructed from legal relationships.

In the recognition, from the law, are established bases for social relations (conflicts), to the extent that each individual respect, and is aware of the claims of other individuals can be legitimately exercised and vice versa. It is an environment which exists a tension of intersubjectives claims, which can erupt at any time.

However, the normative prediction for the exercise and the legitimacy of such claims, in the disabled case, are already well established both in international law and domestic law, especially concerning the prestige to the urban mobility as a way of disabled insertion and, finally, their recognition.

The right to the disabled begins from a foundation of the Federative Republic of Brazil: citizenship (art. 1, II Brazilian Federal Constitution). This is because, from then, it is expected that there should be no restriction on political rights of any citizen, which reflex pathway, corresponds to a way of promoting human dignity and assure a life in society.

In the course of Constitution there are several predictions that guarantee rights to the disabled. The art. 7, XXXI prohibits disabled discrimination in the workplace; Art. 23, II provides for the common responsibility of federal agencies to treat health, public assistance, protection and disabled guarantee; Art. 37, VIII provides for the jobs reservation and government jobs for the disabled; Art. 203, VI provides social assistance to the disabled even for their rehabilitation and integration into community life as Art. 208, III foresees the need of specialized education to disabled.

The art. 24, XIX, in its turn, provides on concurrent jurisdiction of the Union, States, Federal District and municipalities to legislate on protection and social disabled integration while the art. 227, § 2 states that the law should avail on way to ensure accessibility to disabled.

There are, in its turn, federal ordinary law (Law No. 10.098/00) which establishes general standards and basic criteria for the promotion of accessibility of persons with disabilities or reduced mobility, which is also predicted in the most varied state and municipal normative vehicles. In the latter case, the very urban master plans of Brazilian municipalities already include urban mobility issues in favor of the disabled.

There is, therefore, in legal dogmatic, constitutional provision and infraconstitucional establishing more than enough ways so that urban mobility policies can be promoted for the disabled. This agenda is also present in discussions of international law, particularly from the International Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and its Optional Protocol thereof, both signed in New York, United States of America on March 30, 2007, which Brazil was a signatory and which was approved in accordance with the constitutional provision (art. 5, § 3 of Brazilian Federal Constitution), giving rise to the Decree No. 6.949/2009.

This international law instrument brings expressly the requirement that States Parties shall adopt all measures to the persons with disabilities their personal mobility with maximum independence as possible.

In other words, the law provides in an incisive way legitimate ways of exigibility of public policies for urban mobility for the disabled, but will that by itself, be revealed in the recognition of this individual? It is stated that not.

As demonstrated in previous topics, the prestationals deficits topic in detriment of the disabled are numerous, having not even a minimal structure in public hospitals to accept such citizens. Thus, the stage of the law, even if it establishes a tension of these intersubjectives claims, is incipient to recognize the disabled.

This is because, in spite of deprivation of disabled rights (Entrechtung), there´s no sufficiency of law, itself, in the solution of this question. This leads to recognize the need to advance to the third stage of recognition so that we can check all its importance in this process of disabled insertion: solidarity.

Giovani Agostini Saavedra (2006, p. 284) states that > [...] The individual is always linked in a complex network of intersubjective relations and consequently it is structurally dependent on the recognition of the other individuals. The experience of disrespect, then, must be such as to provide the motivational basis of the struggle for recognition, because this emotional tension can be overcome only when the social actor is able to return to have a healthy and active participation in society.

It's the citizen´s return to the social participation motivating therefore the struggle for recognition. But the viability of that return, as seen, not enough from the law stage, necessary to establish an attitude of solidarity, breaking with the current context of low understanding of solidarity (solidarism).

The solidarism and understanding that the prestige of urban mobility policies matter in a community posture in favor of the disabled find barriers in the modernity model guided by the capitalism individualist. The solidarism by its turn, goes beyond this duality and, as stated by Bolzan (1996, p 125): "[...] the core of the law is no longer the law individual selfish and becomes predominantly collective - and diffused - where socialization and collectivization has fundamental role".

Axel Honneth (2011, p. 190), in its turn, says in his work that > [...] Only with the decoupling between the individual legal claims and social attributes linked to status arises the principle of universal equality, which henceforth will submit all legal order to postulate of not admitting any more, in principle, exceptions and privileges. Since this requirement refers to the role that the individual holds as citizen, with it the idea of equality assumes the same time the meaning of being member "with equal value" of a collectivity policy: regardless of differences in the disposition of economic degree, fit to every member of society all rights which give equal exercise of their politicians' interests.

Thus, one can then verify that the recognition form of the solidarity part of the "disregard of moral degradation (Etwürdigung) and injury (Beleidigung). [...] The dimension threatened is that the dignity (Würde) "(SAAVEDRA, 2006, p. 283). As a result of that, for the recognition to be established as from this stage should be a mutual acceptance of the personal virtues of the individuals within that intersubjectivity complex.

From this acceptance will be generated acceptance and reliability for the individual recognition as a member of the community. It is a set of social values (and solidary) that within this intersubjective structure promotes, therefore, mutual recognition.

It is the valuation to social and community debate so that the barriers which prevent recognition are exceeded. In a reading about communitarianism and solidarity as a legal category. NABAIS (2012, p. 31) states that "the concept of man which underlies the current constitutions [...] is not a mere isolated or lonely individual, but a solidary person in social terms".

Humans need to realize that living in society requires an understanding of solidarity, breaking with the capitalist, selfish and individualistic model force. The society only becomes free from a high understanding of solidarity, understanding themselves then, the freedom, as a result of a disabled inclusion process and ensuring their citizenship.

The deprivation and the limitations imposed on disabled is what feed the social crisis which, in its turn, is foundational on the struggle for recognition. Thus, despite the innumerable list of normative programs, constitutional and infraconstitutional, in favor of the disabled, is in the experience of their own limitations restriction of these rights is where there is their exclusion.

Axel Honneth (2011, p. 217) says that "[...] the experience of deprivation of rights is measured not only by the degree of universality, but also by the material scope of the rights institutionally guaranteed".

This conflict, however, is established under the individualistic social model that is anchored in an understanding of state and society valued in person, while individual, and not from a community perspective, also humanitarian and collective.

There is, finally, the need to be materialized and effected these "normative intentions" of right, which requires the need for a (high) understanding of solidarism. But how to establish a link between what the right provides and solidarity understanding, with the pursuit and realization of the disabled recognition? The answer, to be worked on in this essay is: from hermeneutics. Hermeneutics is able to draw a bridge between the law and solidarity to the disabled as a way to fight for recognition.

4. The hermeneutics as a bridge between the stage of lae and the stage of solidarity in the struggle for regognition

It has evidenced the deficit of public policies for urban mobility and its impact on the disabled insertion to the right exercise of its warranties as a citizen, which establishes a social conflict that gives rise to their search for recognition.

The pursuit of this recognition, under the optics of the stage of law is incipient, given that, in summary, there are already legal predictions that address, even with exhaustion, the issue of urban mobility as a way of disabled inclusion.

Moreover, from the perspective of the solidarity stage, it is verified that there is a low understanding solidarism, implying a lack of awareness, from a look at the other, but not the other as different and yes the other as member of a society, with respect for differences, as well as within a communitarian context in which may be improved mechanisms described in the normative already established, so that this recognition can be promoted.

Even because, "[...] the notion of law, that produces in the individual the sensation of his own dignity, can be deepen from the idea of other generalized" (Souza, 2000, p. 177).

However, to overcome the deficit of effectiveness of normative forecasts for the disabled and at the same time promote their effectiveness in the context of (high) solidarism understanding, establishing a bridge between the right and solidarity, it is necessary to take advantage of hermeneutics, of philosophical drafted, given the impossibility of promoting such analysis from the known dogmatic-traditionalist model.

The recognition of the disabled, from the urban mobility promotion, needs, therefore, of a hermeneutic analysis for an application with effectiveness of the right, within a perspective of solidarity. It is the approach of the stage of right with the stage of solidarity.

It is the approach of the realities that are being experienced in social life of the right. You see, as previously stated, the disabled exclusion and the absence of an effective of minimum accessibility policies as a social conflict. So

> [...] The refusal to employ the methodology of philosophical and sociological sciences in the law can induce the lawyer to an error, to produce descriptive statements of a reality that only exists in the cold letter of the legal texts, apart from society and its problems. (FRANCE, 2002, p. 191)

The search for ways of enacting and implementing the constitutional norms, particularly for promoting the citizenship (and dignity) goes, therefore, by new basis of constitutional hermeneutics. Thus, changes the constitutional scientific discourse in force to a new model, stating that

> Hence the obligation to propose the discussion of the "crisis of paradigm," delimiting the understanding space of the crisis in the specific sphere of legal phenomenon. The crisis, therefore, under the right sphere, means the exhaustion and the contradiction of the theoretical-practical liberal-individualist paradigm which can no longer provide answers to new emerging problems, thereby favoring different ways that still lack adequate knowledge. (WOLKMER, 2003, p. 2).

It is then necessary to promote the significance of constitutional norms so that they can, then be effectively interpreted, understood and applied to the disabled guarantees. Ernildo Stein (1997, p. 86) states that "[...] access to something will no longer be in a directly and objectifying form; the access to something is by the mediation of the meaning and sense".

There is no access to things without mediation of meaning. This represents, therefore, the need to promote the look for the Constitution an its standards, in casu, the disabled rights, from the lens of constitutional hermeneutics.

It is supposed, starting again from the stages of recognition, to establish an interaction between law and solidarity, and to verify that the problem is not in the absence of standards that provide for urban mobility policies but in the lack of culture and in the (low)understanding of these laws. The law (mobility) exists, but it needs a sympathetic understanding.

Therefore, analyzed under privileged object adopted in this paper, it does state that the constitutional standards which provide guarantees a promotion of urban mobility in favor of the disabled must exit the law level, while pure forecast (recognition that has been already absorbed) and find its application in its most peculiar aspect: enforce life (world of being which interprets), what are interpreted and understands it in the legal texts.

And this process presupposes not only, as it is to say, a dogmatic traditionalist reading of the constitutional standards, but to establish a way of its interpretation, understanding and application, in a single conjunctive process. Gadamer (2005, p. 356), in his work, says

> Anyone who wants to understand one text, always performs a project. As soon as the first direction appears in the text, the interpreter provide guidance on a sense of whole. Naturally the sense is only manifested because who reads the text reads from certain expectations and in particular sense of perspective. The understanding of what is put in the text consists precisely in the elaboration of this previous project, which obviously, has to be constantly revised based on what happens according to its advances in the penetration of sense.

Then, adds to that "the person who wants to understand can´t give himself away beforehand the will of his own previous opinions. [...] Who wants to understand a text must be willing to let this person tell him something " (GADAMER, 2005, p. 358).

The author states in his book that the hermeneutic process was divided into three distinct stages: understanding (subtilitas intelligendi), interpretation (subtilitas explicandi) and application (subtilitas explicandi). There are three moments that make up the achievement of understanding. However, Gadamer will establish, as elucidated Lenio Streck (2011, p. 265), that the hermeneutic process will assume, in fact, that the three acts take place in one (applicatio).

Lenio Streck (2011, 167) provides a cyclic dimension of these moments to say

> Now, there is no interpretation without understanding, without understanding there in no explanation. Except that all this only occurs in a circle (the whole to the part and the part to the whole), so no-universalizing abstract categories which one can make deductions or subsumptions. It is in this space that gives no split between interpret and apply, because there are no concepts (or meaning attribution) "without things".

From the understanding of hermeneutic perspective it will be promoted a new analysis of the constitutional standards that will ensure the effective promotion of the disabled public policies. This is because it not only projects itself over the text with an abstract and generic look, devoid of content, but instead, it extracts from the law its application to the world of life, and from of pre-understandings that exist from this very world. There is a personality in the process that can print on it course all the issues surrounding the disabled problem and, from there, seek an effective exercise of their guarantees, rejecting the model of exclusion.

This expansion of hermeneutics "carries a pretension of universality. [...] We can interpret this universality as a way of creating a discipline that encompasses any and all activities in the field of human interpretation" (STEIN, 2011, p. 12).

With this hermeneutic turn, we overcome the constitutional reading propped up on methods that could confirm the legal certainties (dogmas). With the hermeneutic the interpretation promotes a language as it develops itself. The world is measured from the dimension that it give to the language. Therefore we state that > [...] If beating the alleged of a consciousness philosophy, leads the human condition as a linguistic condition, discursive, hermeneutic will see that our own everyday "reality" and unremovable is permeated of idealities, of idealizing pretensions, constitutive language capacity such as (CARVALHO NETTO, 1999, p. 474).

It is not enough to exist constitutional provision contemplating measures of disabled insertion not even spectacular laws, "lovely" decrees, if it's all just rhetoric, meaningless. It´s needed a critical reading and imbued with its own reality of what it interprets.

For a proper text understanding, one should "understand it according to the pretensions that it presents itself and, we must also understand it every moment, or understand it in every concrete situation in a new and distinct way. Here understand is also to apply "(GADAMER, 2005, p. 408).

From this hermeneutic process, then, you can (should) establish a link between the law and the social reality. The guarantees provided for the disabled must, therefore, enjoy the effectiveness from, notably, a solidarity optical. The interpretation, understanding and application of these standards should be taken under the abstract and generic perspective, but as an effectively promoting recognition of each disabled citizen.

Promoting public policy of urban mobility is not an abstract standard, instead, is a constitutional mechanism to bring to reality a way of insertion of each disabled in to social context. This happens from a sympathetic look of the law and that effectively requires an overcoming of the dogmatic-traditional model for an hermeneutical application.

The stages of recognizing (referring to those worked in this assay) as well as its hermeneutic process should not be individualized, but associated from a cyclical perspective, where all steps occur at once. The law and solidarity happen as their own hermeneutical process, in a single moment. That´s why

> [...] Philosophical hermeneutics leaps ahead of other interpretation forms, to the extent that it recognizes that is done in facticity, in life, in existence, in reality. So, it's asserted that the interpretation is not an autonomous application. [...]
> Fundamental rights must be experienced by the interpreter, ie, must be in the condition of the one who applies. It hence, the problem of "low understanding of fundamental rights", embodied in the largest dimension and still more degrading to society is characterized as "low understanding of the Constitution" (MOREIRA, 2012, p. 170/171).

The disabled fundamental law should, then, be present in the experience of the interpreter. It should, repeat itself, from an interpretative sympathizing action, verify what are it's experienced the disabled condition and then verify the relevance of urban mobility policies.

The right goes out of his locus already established and uses the environment of life, of the world which is constantly interpreted, so that we can promote the guarantees that it establishes.

5. Final considerations

It´s undeniably the public and private deficit of benefits for effecting urban mobility measures in Brazil. The disabled is still part of a process of exclusion, but of social origin and not merely biological. The natural limitations of that citizen, although not representing any kind of impediment to his life in society, even legitimize a life of exclusion.

Architectural barriers found throughout Brazil match the reflection of low solidarity understanding existing in the current national context. This, especially, is considered the validity of a capitalist-individualist egoistic model, in which the human being overrides his values in the objectification of things and the cult of consumption. It ignores, so, the look for the other, even more so when this individual does not have standard patterns of biological normality.

This apparent exclusion process, however, is not in tune with Brazilian legal-constitutional reality, given the existence of numerous constitutional and infra-constitutional normative statements, inclusive rules of international law absorbed by the parental ordering, dealing, specifically of disabled inclusion through urban mobility, as a way of providing dignity.

Hence, then, the necessary search of how to implement and carry out the recognition of that citizen. Starting from the stages analysis established by Axel Honneth, gird up by the last two (law and solidarity), there is the failure of the right to resolve such issues since, as an instance of recognition, presupposes the tension between intersubjective claims. However, given the low understanding of the disabled guarantees, there is a total lack of concern to actualize effective measures to promote urban mobility policies.

On the other hand, the obvious conflict established by the disabled social exclusion, presupposes that valuing a social posture, communitarian, to undertake efforts to assist the other. That's because, promoting disabled recognition, is nothing more than, a way of ensuring the dignity of those own citizens.

However, recognizing the need to bring the efficiency to the law at it's needed and its association with a solidary perspective, emerges, finally, the question as a means to provide such a condition, aiming at the realization of urban mobility measures for the disabled recognition.

The response was established by constitutional hermeneutics, given that, so this way, it was allowed to promoted intensive (re)questioning of the law and, above all, of all the issues that are inherent to it, and have always been denied by dogmatic-traditionalist culture: the social, political problems etc.

It is from a new perspective of the law, especially the constitutional rules, that - experiencing not the reality of originating legislator, but having the interpreter to be part of the reality of it is recipient of the norm, beyond of insert, in the process, also, your own reality - shall form a right to answer and answer the questions that emerges in various social situations as, in casu, the deficit of urban mobility policies.

The law must leave its status, already known, and exercise an effective application in life, in the world of who it interprets, knowing, also, that language is not a tool, but an intrinsic part of this process. Through this new way of applying the law, not limited to the classical subsumption rule, but rather understood as a complex process that integrates the understanding, interpretation and application of a single act, we can promote a bridge between the law effectiveness, out of an sympathizing optical, that meets the disabled citizen guarantees, especially running the established predictions, but unfulfilled, of urban mobility.

The relation between legal pluralism, lack of human rights and crisis of the social State

Natália de Souza Neves[2]

Abstract: This article addresses the relationship between the emergence of legal pluralism and forms of domination that permeate the urban space and the growth of economic and social inequality in the cities. From the crisis of the welfare State, in which the State shall help ensure minimum conditions for survival and structuring of the various groups that make up the cities, these groups start to articulate through structures, forms of power and domination that they own, and manifested, among other ways, through the speech. Given this fact, in addition to state law, other forms of law emerge. It should be noted that the legal plurality, however, cannot be seen under an eminently negative bias, since cities are plural, constituted of several heterogeneous groups that have cultures, knowledge and practices that are her own. Ignore these forms of law and the complexity of the relationships that underlie them constitutes a misconception; Furthermore, it constitutes a removal of the identity and the heterogeneity of groups that make up the social fabric. However, the intention is to address the relationship between the degradation of State services and the inefficiency of the State to guarantee human rights, basic rights for citizens, and the emergence of groups that have forms of domination and structure peculiar to them, approaching or distancing from State law. Some groups legitimize themselves by democratic processes within their community, while other groups were auto-legitimam, despotic and arbitrary through forms of acting, creating

1. A brief overview on the situation of inequality in western capitalist societies

According to extracts of the Human Development Report 2013, from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), considering the current geopolitical developments, emerging issues, as well as the new actors that participate in the panorama of development, all countries stressed their progress in the area of education, health and income, once observed increase in the human development index (HDI) of nation States. None of the countries on which there is 2012 data presented in this document, HDI value lower than that of 2000, which corroborates the information above.

The HDI is a composite measure regarding three aspects: longevity, years of study and average expected years of schooling and per capta GDP (UNDP, 2013). It was created to contrast to GDP (gross domestic product), which is an index used to evaluate the economic growth of the countries. The criticism one can make in relation to GDP is that this reflects > market prices in monetary terms. Those prices quietly register the prevailing economic and purchasing power in the system – but they are silent about the distribution, character or quality of economic growth. GDP also leaves out all activities that are not monetized – household work, subsistence agriculture, unpaid services. And what is more serious, GDP is one-dimensional: it fails to capture the culture, social, political and many other choices that people make. (Haq, 1999, p. 46).

In this perspective, in the quest to produce a measure that could consider developing countries not only in the economic dimension, but also in other dimensions, whether cultural, social, and political the economists Amartya Sen and Mahbub ul Haq developed in 1990 this index, the HDI. This index was used by the plan of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) in 1993, in its annual report.

There was, according to the Human Development Report 2013, an increase of the HDI more incisive in countries with low and medium HDI, highlighting the significant progress of some countries, what was referred to as "Southern rise". Countries, such as Brazil, China, India, Indonesia, Turkey and South Africa, as well as smaller economies, such as Tunisia, Rwanda, Chile, Ghana and Mauritius demonstrated substantial progress. Product specific growth per capita of Brazil, China and India is so surprising that until 2050, it is expected, when it comes to purchasing power, these three countries together are responsible for 40% (forty percent) of the world product (UNDP, 2013).

However, with regard to the northern countries the situation is discrepant. The high levels of unemployment, low economic growth and austerity policies impose harsh conditions of life of the population, which threatens the maintenance of high levels of human development there (UNDP, 2013).

In spite of the rise of the southern countries, it is observed that there has been an increase in inequality in these countries and also among them, considering the so-called developed countries or those in development, which is a limiting factor of poverty reduction. The report also expresses concern that economic growth is guaranteed for southern countries in a sustainable manner, safeguarding the environment, because the environment is the interest of all Nations, especially when you think in terms of water and energy resources.

In terms of social inequality,

> Indeed, one can go further and state that there is a "south" in the North and a "north" in the South. Elites, whether from the North or the South, are increasingly global and connected, and they benefit the most from the enormous wealth generation over the past decade, in part due to accelerating globalization. They are educated at the same universities and share similar lifestyles and perhaps values. (UNDP, 2013, p. 2).

In this tuning fork, it is observed that even though economic growth has prevailed in some countries, this has not been accompanied by the reduction of economic and social inequality, which raises the need to evaluate the development of the States not only based on individual perspective, per capita, but also through other perceptions and dimensions of society.

In Brazil, poverty and unequal access to health, education and other public services has always been a reality within society, according to the Synthesis of Social Indicators - An analysis of the living conditions of the Brazilian population, from the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics[3] (IBGE, 2012). According to this study, in the decades after World War II, despite the great economic growth in Brazil, there was an increase of social inequality. The Decade of 1980, in turn, was characterized by the concentration of income, by the increase of urban violence and the growth of slums, despite the reduction of some indexes, like infant mortality. In the decade of 1990, despite the democratic stabilization and the movement towards the consolidation of democracy in Brazilian society, social inequalities have diminished very little (IBGE, 2012).

Different from the previous decades, the decade of 2000 showed a decrease in the incidence of poverty by income transfer policy and the valorization of the minimum wage (IBGE, 2012). According to the "Synthesis" referred to above, the poorest population increased its share of the total income earned in the country between 2001 and 2011. However, despite this improvement, inequality still permeates the Brazilian reality, requiring important steps so that it can be eliminated or mitigated.

Considering the panorama of inequality in Brazil, it is important to analyze the "collateral damage" experienced by the poorest, exactly in contexts where social inequality prevails.[4]

2. Social inequality and the collateral damage

Although the Human Development Report 2013 of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) highlights the need to examine a country's development considering not only the individual income of the people and access to education, health and other public services, but also the different social dimensions, such as the quality of the environment and the social inequality, it is observed that, in reality, when it evaluates a country's development, what is considered is the average income of its members (Bauman, 2013, p. 9). Thus, little sticks to real inequality levels within these societies, as well as to the real gap between the different strata of which they are composed.

[3] In Portuguese, the translation of the name of this institution is Instituto Brasileiro de Geografia e Estatística (IBGE).

[4] According to Zygmunt Bauman "The term 'colateral (or damage or victim) low' was recently coined in the vocabulary of expeditionary military forces and popularized by newspaper reports concerning the action of these forces to denote unintended, unplanned, 'unforeseen' effects, some would wrongly say - that, nevertheless, are pernicious, painful and harmful." (2013, p. 11, our translation).

> the increase in inequality is often considered a sign of anything besides a financial problem; in the relatively rare cases, in which there is a debate about the dangers that this inequality represents for society as a whole, in general it only happens when there's threat to law and order; hardly ever risks for the fundamental ingredients of the overall well-being of society, such as physical and mental health of the population, the quality of daily life, the sense of political engagement and the strength of links that integrate into society. (Bauman, 2013, p. 9, our translation).

Much has been discussed in the economic and political field on how to increase the average income of the population, the GDP[5] of a country. However, in these discussions, the levels of inequality, as well as the opportunities experienced by people in their lives, related to work, study, among others, are not considered. Little is reflected about the quality of life of people, their state of physical and mental health, as if the income improvement could represent itself the ultimate goal of any person and on any society of the globe.

The vehement defence of economic growth as a factor responsible for the happiness of people in contemporary societies is something that should be questioned. As emphasized by Amartya Sen (2011, p. 306), "there is considerable empirical evidence that, in many parts of the world, even when they become richer, with incomes much higher than before, people do not feel particularly happy."

If happiness is not necessarily achieved by increased wealth, what about the reality of people who, far from being at the top most developed societies, comprise the fringe of these societies?

For some people the ones who don't contribute to society because they do not contribute to its growth, do not belong to any class and would constitute obstacles to their development. In turn, they would occupy the position of "subclass" (Bauman, 2013, p .9-10). This position would be occupied by people who do not contribute with what

[5]GDP is an indicator used to measure the economic activity of a country. It is noteworthy that according to economists, it is important to measure growth, but not development of a country, as this requires the inclusion of other data, such as income distribution, investment in education etc. Available from <http://economia.estadao.com.br/noticias/economia-brasil,entenda-o-que-e-o-pib-e-como-ele-e-calculado,82627,0.htm> . might be expected of them in the social system, in case they belonged to some class. As examples, the homeless and illegal immigrants (Bauman, 2013, p. 10). Those are people devoid of rights and duties, outside the democratic processes, whose contribution and participation in society is minimized and excluded due to their condition.

This subclass is the biggest victim of the "collateral damage" of globalization, an expression used by Zygmunt Bauman and referred in that context to consequential damages and detriments of determined action.[6] As this author mentions, "thinking in terms of collateral damage is tacitly assuming pre-existing unequal rights and opportunities and at the same time accepting a priori the unequal distribution of the costs of the action undertaken [...]" (2013, p. 12, italics added, our translation). At this point, it should be stressed that such presumption cannot be assumed as implied and even less admitted.

The population that occupies the position of subclass, in this perspective, suffers from side effects from the economic and social logic deriving from contemporary societies whose consumerism instilled and absence of perspectives and opportunities for the poorest do stir conflicts and disputes. The collateral damage suffered by the subclasses, as stated by the author, may be a result of both natural disasters and human actions, "[...] although in both cases the damages are declared unintentional and unplanned" (Bauman, 2013, p. 12, our translation).

The complexity of the conflicts that emerge at the heart of societies, mainly at the poorest levels, is notorious (Gustin, 2005, p. 196-197). These pertain to several dimensions, whose reasons do not reside, in turn, only on the economic issue, bypassing issues of ethnic, cultural and religious differences.

It should be noted, however, that these conflicts are enhanced, among other factors, by the economic and social inequality, but also by the cult to consumerism, which reinforces the visible differences between the groups that make up societies. The cities, in its turn, are divided between the "formal cities"[7], on which there is the offer of jobs, public services, even though they are not of good quality, infrastructure; and the outskirts or fringes, in which an environment of violence, absence of [6] See footnote n.º 4.

[7] The term "formal city" is used by the author Erminia Maricato in a paper called "It's the urban question, stupid!" (our translation), published in the book Cidades Rebeldes: passe livre e as manifestações que tomaram as ruas do Brasil. São Paulo: Boitempo: Carta Maior, 2013, p. 19-26.

public policies and urban mobility prevails.

Due to this reality, despite the existence of public policies or actions of groups that try to mitigate these social and economic discrepancies, leading the notions of respect and citizenship to the outskirts and to schools, it becomes a Herculean task to refute values based on exacerbated materialism, in individualism, in what is external, plastic.

The conflicts, in this scenario, are multifaceted, multiforms. Present in all societies, they acquire different dimensions and reasons, among them the struggle for recognition (Honneth, 2003). This is sought by groups that, in addition to being on the fringes of society, constituting subclasses as referenced above, are also disregarded and violated by other issues, historical and/or ideological. Among them, for example, racism, prejudice against women and intolerance against homosexuals, indians and immigrants.

The social vulnerability of the poorest population, victim of collateral damages caused by capitalism, among them the opportunity to make an offence, is patent. It should be noted that the term social vulnerability, in this article, is used to designate the family's ability to react to unexpected events, according to the definition found in the Discussion Paper 1835, from the Institute for Applied Economic Research[8] (IPEA). The presence of infants, children, seniors, and persons with disabilities makes family more vulnerable to resist to these events (IPEA, 2013, apud Sánchez; Bertolozzi, 2007). The absence of a spouse or the presence of a child who does not live with his mother, as a factor influencing negatively the rate of vulnerability of families (IPEA, 2013).

Studies conducted by IPEA (2013) on the index of the vulnerability of families in Brazil demonstrate that, from the responses to demographic census of 2000 and 2010, there was decrease in this index. The data was gathered from family environment. It should be noted, however, that > this reduction of the vulnerability of families occurs unevenly and unequally between the dimensions of analysis and, especially, between the regions of the country, the Federative Units, their cities and, of course, between portions of the municipal territory. (IPEA, 2013, p. 7, our translation).

[8] In Portuguese, the translation of the name of this institution is Instituto de Pesquisa Econômica Aplicada (IPEA).

It should be highlighted that, in relation to social vulnerability, there has been an increase in the indexes that compose this dimension of research. The greater presence of elderly people, the largest number of households with absence of a spouse, as well as the increase of households in which there are persons with disabilities, probably by improvements in the notification of these cases (IPEA, 2013) generated such an effect in the indexes of social vulnerability.

In this sense, the increase of family social vulnerability in the country remains worrying, helping making these families more susceptible to suffer with unexpected events, enabling their dismantling. Thus, we must think how the presence of the State can change and improve the observed situation.

3 The presence of the state as guarantor of public policies

The 2013 Human Development Report from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) demonstrates the need of States to focus their actions with a priority in the people, in order to promote human development and invest in their capabilities. Thus, to invest in the capacity of people, through access to health services, education, and other basic public services "is not appendage of the growth process but an integral part of it." (UNDP, 2013, p. 4). Therefore, a State which performs public policies which are development-oriented through investments in basic services is fundamental to the reduction of social inequality and poverty is an effective reality.

According to the report mentioned above, public investment applied in infrastructure, health and education is a condition sine qua non for the promotion of sustainable human development. Therefore it's essential that equal opportunities are offered, so that everyone can benefit from economic growth. (UNDP, 2013).

In a diametrically opposed way, as the thinking advocated by Washington Consensus, economic growth would occur due to the existence of correct economic basis aligned with the centrality of capital, considering that the other improvements in the economic plan would be consequences of this growth. Such a line of reasoning gives priority to the development of the economy at the expense of improvement of life of the population. To its defenders, the improvement of the quality of life would come after economic development. However, from the perspective of human development, the improvement of life of the least favored population cannot be postponed, further more considering the economical option in the foreground at the expense of the social (UNDP, 2013).

It should be emphasized that the population which lies on the fringes of economic development, because it is more socially vulnerable, is the one that suffers from the "collateral damage" from the capitalist system. It is necessary, therefore, that States adopt an active position in relation to social rights geared to its effectiveness, this posture committed to the achievement of the fundamental rights to the entire population, especially the most needed and deprived of the opportunities that classes with highest income have.

The ineffectiveness and inefficiency of States in enabling the reduction of social inequality and improving the distribution of income for the population has driven the economic order and social conflicts of significant proportions, since > the explosive mixture of growing social inequality and increasing volume of human suffering relegated to the status of "collaterality" (marginality, exteriority, "removability", not to be a legitimate part of the political agenda) has all the signs to become potentially the most disastrous of problems that mankind will be forced to confront, manage and resolve in the current century. (Bauman, 2013, p. 16).

Conflicts arising from economic discrepancies have spread over several countries, such as Irã, Iraque, Afeganistão, Paquistão (Santos, M., 2011, p.152). There are several manifestations of dissatisfaction with unemployment and the economic crisis, in countries of Europe, such as Spain, according to Radio France International (RFI, 2013).

Milton Santos (2011, p. 152, our translation) highlights the numerous manifestations of irredentism also in virtue of the economic framework and new dependence of the underdeveloped countries, whose social deficiency and poverty lead them to a situation of ungovernability. The author also points out the social disorder in Brazil, mentioning the difficulty in maintaining the economic model sustained by the globalization and at the same time to calm the population dissatisfied (Santos, M., 2011, p. 153, our translation).

The public demonstrations in Brazil, which began in June 2013 referring to the public transport ticket costs, but ended up incorporating an agenda of broader claims, such as claims in respect of expenses for the World Cup, represent the dissatisfaction of the population with the social structure in the country. In the opinion of some, these movements are associated with the current condition of the cities. Erminia Maricato (2013, p. 19-20, our translation) adduces as > Cities are the main venue where there's reproduction of the labor force. Not every improvement of living conditions is accessible with better wages or with better income distribution. Good living conditions often depend on urban public policy – transportation, housing, sanitation, education, health, recreation, street lighting, garbage collection, security. Namely, the city does not provide just the place, the support or the floor for this social reproduction. Its features and even the way they are presented make the difference.

Although public policies are carried out aiming at the promotion of human rights in Brazil, they are still insufficient to reach all social levels satisfactorily (Sena; Silva, 2012). In this perspective, the population also requires improvements, organization and better distribution of public and private services and equipment in the cities.

The lack of access to these services is responsible for the outbreak of conflicts of various hues. Not only the world's poorest countries, but also those suffering from the consequences of neoliberal exclusionary economic policies, although poor countries are still the ones who suffer the most "for having accumulated historically huge social segments of poverty and destitution." (Gustin, 2005, p.36, our translation).

The flexibilization of labor relations, unemployment, allied to poor organization of urban space, are issues to be faced by the Government and by society as a whole, which is more complex and stratified.

4 Conflicts in a plural society

Contemporary societies are characterised by a plurality of legal systems, as well as forms of knowledge and power (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 261). They're complex societies, driven by heterogeneity, manifesting through customs, ideologies, religions, knowledge, and legal systems. (Gustin, 2005, p. 25).

This article describes a plurima conception of law, on which this

> Is a body of regularized procedures and normative standards, considered justifiable in a given social group, which contributes to the > creation and prevention of disputes, and to their solution through an argumentative speech, articulated with the threat of force. (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 290, our translation).

According to Boaventura de Sousa Santos (2009) State law tends to consider as legitimate form of manifestation of rights only when it comes to the law edited by the State, regardless of its relationship to other forms of law that permeate society. He stresses that this tendency is greater "as we move from the periphery to the center of the world system." (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 291).

The author, considering the existence of a plurality of legal systems, enumerates six relevant fields, based on structural sets of social relations. They are: the domestic law, the right of production, the Community law, the State or territorial law, the right of return and the systemic right. (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 291)

Domestic law is the set of rules, normative standards and dispute resolution mechanisms that result from, and in, sedimentation of social relations in the household. (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 292). The right of production represents the law, regulatory standards or factory or the company organizing the relationships that get along in this space, through codes of conduct of employees, regulations of the production line, among others (Santos, B.S, 2009, p. 295). Community law, in turn, has as its main characteristic its complexity, since "Can be invoked either by the hegemonic groups or oppressed groups, it can legitimize and reinforce aggressive imperial identities or, on the contrary, subaltern defensive identities." (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 298, our translation). The State law, at its turn, presents itself as the central law in modern societies. The political and legal science liberalism tried to build it as the only way of existing law in society (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 299). Systemic law "is the right form of world space, the set of rules and regulatory standards that organize the centre/periphery hierarchy and the relationships between nation States in the intergovernmental system" (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 300, our translation). The right of return is the law of the market, its customs, the rules governing trade between producers, between producers and traders, among merchants, and also between producers and traders, on the one hand and consumers on the other. (Santos, B.S., 2009, p. 297-298).

It is understandable that the inefficiency of the State to ensure social benefits is also responsible for low and lower insertion of State law in societies as a whole. Social and economic inequality that permeates and constitutes the capitalist societies, and the disbelief of the population in the State while guaranteeing access to basic services makes the rules guide the activities of the groups that make up those societies, but also to govern social relationships of persons in these groups.

People living in the outskirts of urban centres, in the so-called slums, whose organization and everyday law is different from State law, even though they mix and interface, is a clear example of spaces marked by other rules, rules of conduct and relationships. The State law has weaker normative force because it is not able to provide by itself to the population living in these locations, infrastructure, dignified housing, quality urban mobility, among other fundamental human rights. In this scenario, how to ensure predominance of citizenship and mutual respect, peace and solidarity, when violence becomes a form of guarantor power of prestige, of legitimation, of recognition and access to material goods, as for example with violence involving drug trafficking?

It is important to highlight that it is not intended to devalue any of the rights, the State, or non State. Legal plurality is the reflect of a cultural diversity present in contemporary society. Different ways of producing knowledge should be valued, given the wealth of these multiple knowledge and cultures of those social groups and the constitutive relationships that carry them. Thus, inexorably, the ineffectiveness of the State in providing the required services to the population (including services which it undertook) and the weakening of State law and the State itself as an institution responsible for providing the necessary conditions for human development, offering opportunities for the full exercise of individuals ' capacities, of equality of opportunity and fairness.

Conclusion

Despite the economic growth of the countries of the southern cone, nicknamed "Southern rise" by the 2013 UN Development Report, it can be observed that economic and social inequality in these countries still persevere, and even enhances, and that the elites appropriate higher proportion of wealth produced in those countries. Social vulnerability, in Brazil, however, has not yet shown the expected improvements, meaning that social policies, still haven't been able to reach effectively part of the needy population, the "subclasses". Income transfer policy and the valorization of the minimum wage, which presented positive results in Brazil, still can't achieve the greater portion of the population, despite the economic inequality indexes have declined.

The ineffectiveness of the State to support the needy population and cope with the collateral damage of capitalism is patent. This inefficiency leads to the disbelief of the population vis-à-vis the State and the Government, and the State law is no longer legitimate, because it does not guarantee fundamental rights constitutionally guaranteed. In this sense, the pluralism of legal orders multiplies, especially on the outskirts of major urban centres.

In face of this scenario, it becomes imperative that the society and government think about opposing economic and social inequality, so that the State policies also target to subclasses, with the necessary and expected effectiveness, enabling their emancipation, its recognition and its integrity.

Popular participation in the Municipal Housing Council of Belo Horizonte, Minas Gerais, Brazil

Maria Tereza Fonseca Dias[1]

Abstract: The complex housing problems of the metropolis constitute big challenges for orthodox municipal management. This paper explores the goals of policymaker councils in its association to different groups in order to jointly experience the city and take part in building it. Since Brazilian Constitution of 1988, society is expected not only to demand solution to city's problems, but to participate actively in reaching these solutions. This is because this Constitution is founded on the paradigm of democratic rule of law which implies right to housing and social function of property. Social movements for urban reform forced both the inclusion of a chapter on urban policy in the Brazilian Constitution as well as the approval of the City Statute Act, in 2001, which provides the system of democratic management of the city. This management can't be seen only as a guideline for the planning and development of cities, but requires direct participation of citizens and social groups in decision making processes, legitimizing urban planning through democratic participation. Fitting these Special Workshop proposals, this paper aims to investigate the structure and activities of the Municipal Housing Council of Belo Horizonte, from 2012 to 2013, in an attempt to understand their mechanisms of action. The methodology used in the research was the study of statutes concerning the Council; the monitoring of its meetings; documentation of gathered data; questionnaires and interviews with council members. The surveying of empirical data used variables employed in Faria and Ribeiro's (2010) evaluative study concerning the degree of institutionalization, representation and democratization of 123 Councils in 57 Brazilian cities. In the Municipal Housing Council of Belo Horizonte, we also applied those same criteria. The data collected and analyzed so far indicate a deficit of legitimacy in this Council. This is because no frequent meetings were held during this institutionalization period. And those that took place were not extensively disclosed in mass media. As for its composition, the Council is not balanced, with a prevalence of public sector. After 20 years of its creation, it is necessary to reflect on their internal structures, eliminating flaws and mistakes in order to make it an instrument of representation of popular will. These changes are necessary to understand the dynamics of contemporary metropolises and the conflicting interests of its citizens, especially regarding the exercise of the right to adequate housing.

1. Urban issues and housing shortage in Brazil

Brazilian Census Bureau, in 2010, reports indicate that several decades of rapid urban growth in Brazil as a result of rural–urban migration or natural increase in cities. In 1940, 18,8 million people lived in urban areas, representing some 26.3 per cent of the city's total population. In 2010, 138 million people lived in urban areas, representing some 84.5 per cent of the city's total population. (Brasil, 2007) During this period (sixty years), while Brazilian population increased fourfold urban population faced a tenfold growth.

According to João Pinheiro Foundation (Minas Gerais, 2005) and Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics (IBGE; Brasil, 2013) estimate, recent housing shortage is around 5,8 million units, mostly concentrated among those earning less than three minimum wage (90%) and living in urban areas (82%). On this issue, the Ministry of Cities concluded that in the last ten years the increasing population with lack of access to shelter is wider than Brazilian population growth (Brasil, 2004; 2013). In the main cities of Brazil, between 40% and 70% of the urban population is living in illegal settlements, and this process has increasingly taken place also in middle-size and small cities. (Fernandes, 2007, p. 138)

As stated by João Pinheiro Foundation, more than 150 million people in Brazil live in urban areas and more than 4,7 million lives in deficient or precarious housing conditions, including squatter settlements and other informal communities (urban slums). The point is that a large proportion of lower-income people live in poor housing due to inadequate measures in managing urban growth, and that this deficit increases every year (Martine & McGranahan, 2010, p. 35)

In the last decades, investments in residential construction are concentrated among people earning more than five times the minimum wage.

This is possibly exceeded by the number of units with good services and infrastructure standing empty in the center of larger cities as a result of speculative real-estate practices (Rolnik, 2008; Cavenaghi & Alves, 2008).

Many of social and environmental problems affecting Brazil's urban areas stem from lack of attention to the housing needs of the poor. (McGranahan, 2010, p. 33)

Failure at taking a proactive approach to housing needs reflects more than mere apathy about the plight of the poor among Brazil'surban policymakers: it has been part of an explicit and systematic attempt to obstruct settlement by poor people in Brazilian cities. (Martine & McGranahan, 2010, p. 38)

The major challenges of Brazilian housing policy in the coming decades are related to a whole range of urban problems, including transport, shortage of land, environmental pollution, sanitation, education and other issues that impact on urban life.

The purpose of this paper is to explore if civil society and poor people can influence public housing policy in the Municipality of Belo Horizonte in order to change this situation.

2. Urban Policy regulations in Brazil and Democratic management of cities

In the context of Brazil's federal system, the lack of a proper constitutional treatment of urban and territorial jurisdiction issues has controversies and conflicts between federal, federated-state and municipal governments concerning the power to enact urban legislation and implement urban land policies. (Fernandes, 2007, p. 140)

In the 40's, discussions began on the necessity of establishing an urban policy on immigration and industries. The country has a long and varied history of attempted government interventions on spatial distribution in general, and urban policy in particular. Between 1940 and 1980, urban population was virtually excluded from law- and decision-making processes on urban questions at all levels.

The increasing social mobilization in urban areas since 1970 can be seen as an answer to government and policymaker, whom kept legal-political reform in a slow pace throughout the 1980s and 1990s, given the complexity of diverging social, political and economic interests involved. (Martine & McGranahan, 2010, p. 45) Social movements have been fighting for social and urban justice.

The innovative constitutional chapter on urban policy, which resulted in a most significant improvement in conditions for political participation of urban population in law- and decision-making processes, also resulted from a process of intensive social mobilization. The 1988 Constitution contains a more coherent approach to urban development process as a whole, defining the notion of "social function of urban land" as the very condition for the recognition of individual property rights in urban areas. It also improved the conditions of legal, political and financial autonomy of the local state. (Fernandes, 2007, p. 141-142) In 2000, by amendment, the Brazilian Constitution recognizes the social right to housing.

The core of the new democratic approach to urban planning in Brazil is undoubtedly the Statute of the City (Estatuto da Cidade), which regulated two critical articles focused on urban issues approved by the 1988 Federal Constitution (the social function of urban land and squatters' rights) (Martine & McGranahan, 2010, p. 48)

The Statute of the City introduced instruments for democratic approach to urban planning in Brazil like policies councils, urban conferences, public hearings, public consultations, debates, popular amendments, participatory budgeting, among others. That it is a truly participatory and inclusive decision-making process at all levels.

Urban reform requires a fundamental renovation of the overall decision-making process, so that traditional mechanisms of representative democracy and new forms of direct participation are combined. The democratization of access to land and housing depends on the democratization of political process as a whole. (Fernandes, 2007, p. 165)

The construction of urban public policies involves a much more complicated process of state and civil society collaboration and, nowadays, social participation is a requirement of legitimacy of public housing policy. (Chevallier, 2008)

Urban governance requires new strategies for urban management based on new relations between state (especially at local level) and society, renewed intergovernmental relations and the adoption of new forms of partnerships between public and private sectors, within a clearly defined legal-political framework. (Fernandes, 2007, p. 165)

3. Municipal Housing System and Municipal Housing Council of Belo Horizonte (CMH)

Federal Constitution conferred on municipal authorities power for the enactment of local ordinances on land use and development of urban space, in order to guarantee the "full development of the city's social functions" and the "welfare of its inhabitants". (Fernandes, 2007, p. 142)

Based on this statement, the city of Belo Horizonte created the Municipal Housing System and the Municipal Housing Council – a policy council.

Policies councils had been created in Brazil, first of all, in the health area. They are tools for democratic and participatory planning to legitimize public policies. Councils promote active participation and social mobilization, and generates baseline information and indicators that enable citizens to monitor the impact of public sector initiatives and thus improve government efficacy and transparency, irrespective of their political party. (Martine & MacGranahan, 2010, p. 53)

This paper examines the results achieved by the Municipal Housing Council of Belo Horizonte to fulfill demands of civil society and realize that its performance has several flaws.

Unlike major cities like Rio de Janeiro or Sao Paulo, Belo Horizonte was a city planned and built in 1897 to be the political and administrative center of Minas Gerais State. It was built to house the civil servants and it was not planned with local trade or for the establishment of the working population, as this segment was considered temporary. (Guimarães, 1992, p. 1)

The whole history of Belo Horizonte was highlighted by the struggle of the state against hundreds of shacks and "cafuas" that proliferated, at first in the center, and then on the boundaries of the city. The city grew from outside to inside: while land within the original plan of the city was unavailable, people who came to the capital in search of new opportunities, formed slums at its surroundings. Belo Horizonte's planning and construction of did not predict social dynamics that would guide the cities growth and transformation. Especially, this segregation process will lead to the emergence of social movements in defense of housing and slums.

Due to the strength and organization of the shantytowns, the Municipality of Belo Horizonte begins to treat the problem as a social issue and, therefore, should be addressed through public policy and not police power.

Prior to the 1988 Federal Constitution, and in the absence of a national policy, from the struggle of social movements, which aimed urbanization and regularization of slums, Belo Horizonte made a experience Program, named "Pró-Favela", combining physical upgrading and legalization of the illegal settlements in the mid-1980s. (Fernandes & Dolabela, 2010).

After 1988 and from the assumption that public interest is broader than governmental policies, Belo Horizonte restructured its urban policy in a democratic and participatory platform that was intended to allow the direct participation of the population in urban issues in the city.

Urban planning is a most powerful process; if urban participatory tools have long been capitalized by certain economic groups and thus directly contributed to the process of sociospatial segregation, the promotion of urban law reform may substantially contribute towards creating the conditions for more inclusive and fairer cities. (Fernandes, 2007, p. 164)

In 1993 was created the Municipal Public Housing Fund, the first legislative framework for the Municipal Housing System, that have functions of urban planning, housing finance, formulation and implementation of public policies on housing. Its administrative structure is complex because it is composed of diverse public organizations and entities, such as Municipal Public Housing Fund, financing urban policy enforced by the municipality; Urbanization Company of Belo Horizonte (URBEL), responsible for the implementation of urban plans and projects; Municipal Departments, Participatory Budgets and Housing and Municipal Housing Council.

The Municipal Housing Council ("CMH") is the main participatory urban management process of the Municipal Housing System because it allows the participation of civil society and local government in the formulation of municipal housing policy.

CMH was conceived as deliberative council and it is responsible for reviewing, discussing and approving plans, objectives, policies and priorities of the municipal housing policy.

This paper aims to investigate the structure and activities of the Municipal Housing Council of Belo Horizonte, between April 2010 to June 2013, in attempt to understand their mechanisms of action to achieve a democratic approach to adequate housing rights. At this point, the study will comprehend the institutional structure of the Municipal Housing Council (MHC), in order to assess how the structural flaws of the Council hinder or prevent its participatory and democratic approach.

4. Methodology and results

The methodology used in this research was the study of urban law regulation, in particular the legislation about the Council; the monitoring of its meetings and records; data collection documentary; questionnaires and interviews with its advisers (council members). In empirical data collection were used the variables studied by Faria and Ribeiro (2010), who studied 123 Councils in 57 Brazilian cities and evaluated them: the degrees of institutionalization, representation and democratization in decision-making of these councils. In the Municipal Housing Council of Belo Horizonte, we also analyzed those same criteria.

Regarding institutionalization degree criterion, it was found in regulations and internal rules (bylaws) that the Council is well structured and the information about its composition and participation process and decision is easily accessible. The Council was created in 1994; its internal rules (bylaw) dates of 1996. It has two Technical Teams with the purpose to clarify technical and administrative complexities of housing and urban issues and an Executive Secretariat to assist its work. Meetings take place every month. On this last point, the monitoring of 41 meetings and its records showed that meetings not occurred in nine months, mainly between the period of July 2010 to April 2013. It was observed that in between these 10 months, there were only two meetings. This period coincides with municipal elections and the start of the new term of the re-elected mayor.

Regarding democratization degree criterion, we analyzed three indicators: board composition, ie, who are the members (to assess whether it has plural and proportional representation); criteria for defining the agenda of the meetings, and how is disclosed and published the dates of meetings, to promote the participation of civil society that integrates the Council, other social movements, groups and citizens. As for its composition, the Council is not balanced, with a prevalence of public sector. There are 9 civil society representatives and 11 representatives from the public sphere (2 Legislative Branch [city councilman] and 9 Executive Branch [Government]). This composition can generate serious problems of favoring the government's interests over the demands of civil society, biasing the participation process and the discussions results. There were no pre-established criteria to define the agenda of meetings because the agenda is designed by the Secretariat with the aid of the President of the Council and voted at the beginning of each meeting. About disclosure and publicity of the meetings, to the members of the Council they shall be convened by fax, telephone, telegram or letter. To the general public there is no formal means used, ie, meetings are not disclosed in extensive media and it was considered serious democratic deficit identified in decision-making process of this Council. Enacting democratic procedures such as Councils presupposes an organized civil society and an informed and interested citizenry. (Martine & MacGranahan, 2010, p. 51)

Regarding representation degree criterion, were evaluated how is defined which entities can apply for a vacancy on the Council, the number of seats - per sector or social movement - and how members are chosen. The 11 members of the public sector vacancies are indicated by the Government (9) and the Legislative Branch (2). To fill one of the 9 places, each civil society entities should sign up in (URBEL) in order to display and vote for candidates who will be eligible to this vacancy. As to these places, it was identified that the regulation does not establish procedures that will be used to select these members. Nowadays these members are chosen in open plenary voting on the sign up entities.

At the end we conclude that data collected and analyzed until now indicate that there is a deficit of legitimacy of this Council that hinder their participatory and democratic approach. After 20 years of its creation it is necessary to reflect on their internal structures, eliminating flaws and mistakes in order to make it an instrument of representation of popular will. These changes are necessary to understand the dynamics of contemporary metropolises and their conflicts of interest, especially regarding the exercise of the right to adequate housing.

Progress in participatory instruments, like policies councils, and implementing the new democratic approach to urban management was understandably slow and irregular. This slowness was due to the complexities of the issues, lack of practical experience, and the differentiated capacity of social sectors to participate effectively in deciding the affairs of the city.(Martine & MacGranahan, 2010, p. 49)

Urban management in large and heterogeneous cities is extremely complex even in the best circumstances, and is apparently impervious to 'perfect' solutions. What has been achieved should be viewed in more positive terms, at least in some cities: as a contribution to the formation of a more enlightened citizenry, the reduction of clientelistic practices and the provision of an effective voice for the poorer segments of the population. More canal ways be done. (Martine & MacGranahan, 2010, p. 53)

The street carnival of Rio de Janeiro as an exercise of the right to the city

Gustavo Silveira Siqueira
Pedro Henrique Ramos Prado Vasques

Abstract: The present paper intends to discuss how Rio de Janeiro city's carnival, more specifically the carnival parades placed in the streets, which occurs in a great part of the town, can be seen as an exercise of the right to the city. At the same time carnival brings together thousands of people in the streets ("Cordão do Bola Preta" Parade reached in 2013 2.5 million people in the downtown area) it brings waste, disturbs traffic and spreads a kind of "chaos" in the city. But it also brings benefits such as trade increment, expansion of popular culture, and leisure to people. Thereby, discussing carnival made in Rio de Janeiro's streets becomes an essential theme to understand the right of access to the city in Brazil.

The street carnival of Rio de Janeiro is an eminently popular celebration. The party is free and the City Hall forbids the creation of private (i.e., paid) areas or cabins on city streets where carnival happens. So, in theory, anyone can join in the crowd. With the parades sponsored by third parties and others maintained by the own people, street carnival changes the city. During carnival, traffic is replaced and the streets become occupied by people. The noise of vehicles is substituted by songs – mostly – traditional ones. Streets are no longer just a pathway to a place, they become the place itself.

Therefore, even leading the "chaos" along with the music and culture, street carnival experience, as traditional Brazilian popular celebration, becomes clearly a public exercise of the right to the city since the gentrification process is momentarily neutralized – which means everyone can access the city during this period – and the intervention of government should be limited only to facilitate and enable a peaceful coexistence and never to forbid.

Key-words: street carnival, right to the city, territory occupation

Introduction

This paper aims to discuss how the carnival in the city of Rio de Janeiro, more specifically, the carnival street blocks, which occupy considerable area in the city, can be seen as an exercise of the right to the city. At the same time street carnival brings together thousands of people in the streets, it also carries, dirt, noise, tumult, spreading a kind of "chaos" into the urban space. On the other hand, it also brings benefits, greater enjoyment of commerce, the expansion of popular culture, leisure participants etc. Therefore, discuss Rio's carnival becomes essential to understand the right to access the city itself.

Thus, to better present all issues discussed here, we divided this work into three stages. At first, we draw, albeit superficially, an examination of urban planning and the right to the city, pinching this theoretical elements that help us understand the issue just outlined. In the following section, we specifically analyze a key element in the perception of Carnival in Rio de Janeiro, which is the street. Finally, two main understandings of urban planning are counterposed and street carnival is also comparatively analyzed through these two perspectives, highlighting also regulations, organizations and verified behaviors aiming to contextualize these approaches.

Finally, even within the last topic, we present, under the the authors' perspective, the understanding of how the street carnival in the city of Rio de Janeiro can be perceived through urban planning, and also on what details we should being attentive to minimize the chances of it be fully appropriated by enterprising capitalist logic.

1. Urban planning and the right to the city

In the context of the city development, urban planning emerges as an intervention of the government in the territory. This condition occurs at the time of flowering of industrial capitalism, in which the jobs in the primary sector were insufficient to maintain a significant portion of the population in the field. This increasing concentration of population in urban areas has led to several new and complex social demands (e.g., sanitation, housing and mobility).

Although, initially, be identified as a hygienist public policy, urban planning was used as an instrument for expansion and / or creation of new cities. As explained by Santos (2006), it becomes evident that at this moment a new sociability emerged. Which means to perceive new forms of political representation of the urban phenomenon, especially considering the chaos of big cities.

From the scenario that was developed after the consolidation of the capitalist economic system, the conditions of social reproduction in cities would make the conflict between labor and capital to be coated in a territorialized dimension. In other words, the control over urban land and urban infrastructure policies happened to be constituents elements to the "right to the city". Such evidence calls into question the subsequent technicist approach of urban planning - which replaces the first hygienist point of view - and brings out the struggle for social participation in urban policies.

In this context, that the need for popular intervention is perceived by the Government and claimed for its townspeople, the content of the "right to the city" came to include the access to diffuse and social rights. In Brazil, these rights were especially highlighted after the promulgation of the Federal Constitution of 1988, as in the case of the environment, education, health, social care and housing rights.

From the perspective of the need to popular interaction with the formulation and implementation of urban space, the creation of the UN/Habitat Agency proved to be an important tool for the dissemination of new and expanded rights agenda of the residents of the urban cities. For example, the right to housing, whose origin is in the establishment of the United Nations in 1948, would gain a precise sense, as "adequate housing". That concept therefore includes not only the building habitable houses, but also the regularization of the land where the house is built, as well as access to infrastructure necessary for everyday life, networks of energy, sanitation and transport.

Given these transformations, urban planning, once again, goes through a process of reconstruction of its purpose and is no longer associated with a vision that seeks to build new cities or architectural idealized projects displaced from social and economic dynamics in the emergence of "urban issue". However, urban planning cannot renounce to have a vision of the future, if it aims to remain as a guiding instrument of expanding cities.

In this context, two views disputes the meaning of the urban planning: the approach of "social urbanization" and "urban entrepreneurialism". The first is associated with the implementation of a grammar of rights, which implies not only redistributive policies, but also in recognition actions in the urban environment (eg, identification of "favelas" as part of the city), materialized through what we call the right to the city. The second, which is predominantly in the administration of big cities, in particular, the metropolises, such as the city of Rio de Janeiro, which is undergoing intense transformation process socioterritorial supported the project to host megaevents until 2016 (eg, World Day Youth, Olympic Games, FIFA World Cup, etc..).

Despite the pejorative perspective entrepreneurial viewpoint is taking - especially for the most vulnerable residents in the city of Rio de Janeiro - each highlighted urban planning views current illuminates different parts of the complexity associated with urban demands. The social urbanism refers to the need to manage the city in order to make it accessible to its residents, that is, allowing them access to land, urban infrastructure and recognizing them (also) as "belongers" of that urban space. In the other side, planning by projects – ie, the entrepreneurial view - facilitates the mobilization of sufficient financial resources to implement large-scale investments in urban infrastructure.

Done such comments about both urban planning theoretical views, we must also remember that city arrangement also involves different dimensions, such as the regulation of land use and promote to urban development.

The city regulation is represented by laws aimed at controlling the use and expansion process, towards the achievement of the social function of property, currently covered by the interest in the promotion of the right to social and environmentally sustainable cities. In this sense, it is a negative dimension of law, which has the power to prevent uses and appropriations of the territory in favor of maintaining the collective interest.

On the other hand, fostering urban development is associated with the provision of services by the Government, ie, allocating resources to finance the expansion of the city's infrastructure. In a context of extensive growth of urban sprawl – spilling over to other municipalities and creating more complex cities than its former central towns –, public interventions becomes necessary to facilitate the production of public goods, as in the case of roads and sanitation networks. Such heavy investments tend to produce vectors of urban expansion raising the real estate market responses. This relationship between the implementation of public services and the appropriation of urban spaces by the private sector and consequent growth of the city ends up generating more demand for urban infrastructure, which, in turn, raises the need for more investments. The result tends to involve more "financial engineering" to administer a city whose appointments are not just simple local management, but significant portions of the economy of the country.

As the Annual Reports on the State of World Population produced by the UN highlights, it is possible to identify, within the major cities of the globe, a process of concentration of the population in these areas. These large urban places congregates a significant portion of the national GDP, and much of the population of their countries. Accordingly, these cities become economic centers and their rulers take great role in the national scene (Santos, 2012a).

A similar phenomenon, although on a smaller scale, occurs within Brazilian federation. In each of these units of the federation, there is a network consisting of urban cities of different demographic and economic weight, and the most important tend to become agents who articulate the state territory. Managing these cities requires that local authorities take responsibility for the living conditions of its population, but also to ensure that the proper integration of local economies networks, maximizing their financial potential. It is not competing goals, but they should be complementary.

In Brazil, Law No. 10.257/01, known as the "City Statute", regulates arts. 182 and 183 of the Federal Constitution and defines the Comprehensive Plan as the legal instrument through which municipal governments set their goals for urban policy. Such objectives should be subject to the principles of Brazilian Law, emphasizing the "social function of property" and "social function of the city", thereby introducing guidance for municipalities to undertake, among others, with the regularization of urban space.

The Comprehensive Plan is not limited to regulate urban land use, but also includes guidelines for the development of the municipality as a whole. This inclusion of the rural area in this Plan results in a more directly perception of the territorial development issue, which may or may not be restricted to municipal boundaries.

Here we introduce the question of the legal form of land use planning nationwide. According to Article 182 of the 1988 Constitution, the municipality is the federal entity responsible for urban policy. The federal government remains only with the responsibility to establish general standards of urban policy (and did by editing the City Statute) and leaves to the states the responsibility for residual issues (those that are not exclusive to the federal government or municipalities).

It is worth remembering that progress in social rights included in the Constitution, extended the understanding of the most important constituent elements of urban planning, that is, the right to housing, which is now defined as "adequate housing". As previously mentioned, it is not just the building, the housing unit itself, but a regular (legally) house connected with urban infrastructure networks. Therefore, the commitment of municipalities with urban planning progressed far beyond the traditional urban regulation, since it now includes heavy investment in infrastructure networks whose funding is also well beyond the municipal financial autonomy (Santos, 2012B).

Accordingly, the enormous legal advance that National Movement for Urban Reform succeeded with Federal Constitution and with Cities Statute is only part of the challenges of current urban policy. It is still necessary to develop municipality law, as well a better coordination between federal entities to cooperate on solutions for territorial public policies whose impacts go beyond the municipality.

2. The street and its appropriation from the perspective of the right to the city

In the course of the history of urbanism, the street was at various times overlooked or underused, coming to be defined by Le Courbusier (2000) as a masterpiece of civil engineering and no longer a job for navvies. It is possible to highlight meaningful historical moments of relevance that the street was also used as a strategic instrument for control and domination of urban space, such as in the case of urban reforms of Paris conducted by Georges-Eugène Haussmann between 1852 and 1870 which resulted in the creation of wide, large and linear boulevards in order to extinguish the ancient alleyways and winding that prevented Napoleon's armies to pursue and dominate the Parisian area and facilitated the setting up barricades and other forms of resistance during popular revolution of 1848 (Hall, 1995). From a similar perspective, also modeled by a hygienist bias, we can stand out the reforms conducted by Pereira Passos in Rio de Janeiro downtown[1]. Such modifications also aimed at the extinction of colonial alleys to build broad linear pathways that would tie the two ports of the central area (Abreu, 1987).

The street is again to have a prominent position in the study of urban planning only after the 1960s with the production of the work entitled "The death and life of great american cities", by writer and political activist Jane Jacobs Butzner. Her work gained prominence and impact due to its intense fight against urban reforms intended by the chief engineer of New York City, Robert Moses. It is believed that the greatest collaboration of Jacobs, who fought a process of urban renewal in the neighborhood in which he lived, can be identified in her peculiar way of analysis of the urban environment. Under an innovative perspective at the time, Jacobs sought to humanize the process of planning and implementation of urban territory. In other words, she argued that communities themselves should build your social project of the urban environment. In this sense, Jacobs was an opposition to planification excesses that dwindled the potential for development of relations in the construction of the territory (2007).

This opposition from Jacobs can be identified, for example, in the trivial perception of the amount and functionality of the streets and its intersections. While Le Courbusier (2000) understood that the number of streets should be reduced by two-thirds since the crossroads are the enemy of traffic, Jacobs argued exactly the opposite (2007). For the author, the existence of short blocks and therefore more crossings would be essential to prevent the neighborhoods stay isolated, separated and unassisted by the population itself. For her, these long streets would produce an self-isolating effect that would inhibit even the local economy. That is, long and separated paths, according to the author, would prevent the formation of a combination of economic uses of urban space. Thus, Jacobs identifies the street as a fundamental space for generation of diversity. For the author the multiple of uses of that part of the territory would be essential, among others, to integrate its people and to build a network of local eyes responsible for collaborating with the safety of the neighborhood.

Although Jacobs spend a good part of her book defending the role of the streets in the construction of a plural urban space able to meet the needs of its inhabitants, she does not explore exhaustively - but also doesn't want - other potential and possible uses of streets in urban urban interventions in the city, inspired by the reforms made by Georges-Eugène Haussmann in Paris during the XIX century.

environment as in the case of large-scale cultural events, exemplified by street carnival of Rio de Janeiro, the main focus of this work. However, it is possible to extract from the work of Jacobs that the street has characteristics of a potential catalyst for the production (creation or modification) of urban ambiences. Ie, the street, as an essentially public good, comprehensive, accessible and, depending on their primary purpose (to serve as a way of driving townsmen), is able to absorb the appropriation given to it at any given time and, consequently, transform itself. Hence the crucial importance of the street in the construction of the urban environment. While the private environment will remain, at least in theory, restricted, absolute, individualized and immutable, the public space, represented here by the streets, has a mutational capacity, aggregating plural elements capable of producing significant change in the construction of the territory. According to Bauman (2009) public places are the crucial points on which the future of urban life is decided right now.

In order to exemplify, it is possible to illustrate the above statement with some observations about the use of this public space: the street, (i) in their ordinary condition, is the way, a part of the urban infrastructure used to conduct people who share that territory. In this condition, the street is the path, since it is used with that specific purpose by those who seek to transit in the urban environment; However, (ii) when it is adapted for a situation different from ordinary, its condition of being an instrument of urban infrastructure oriented to provide mobility within the city stays in the background. In this extraordinary condition, the street can be - among others - the stage (not only a pathway anymore). It can be used as such by those who seek, for example, to claim rights or celebrating any public festival, as the street carnival city of Rio de Janeiro.

Thus, as shown, public space - well exemplified by the street in this study - shows up as one of the possible tools in the construction of an urban space diverse and inclusive, and consequently, in the exercise of the right to the city. This perspective pluralistic and democratic about urbanism, ie defending the above-mentioned function for the public space, is opposed to a privatist view of the city.

Since the rise of the values propagated under the Renaissance Enlightenment, the ideals of private property and in particular the right to privacy associated with this individual space contributed to the production of the territory and, more specifically, to the way of appropriation of the urban. The appreciation of the intimate private space at the expense of the public square are remarkable features associated with these values.

In this sense, the defense, by some urban planners, of the private environment prevalence at the expense of the diversity experienced in the public space gave rise in several cities in the west side of the globe - including the city of Rio de Janeiro - the construction of large gated communities and almost self-contained apartments, equipped with an extensive range of services and infrastructure to cater to (almost) all private needs of its condominium members, exposing them to the city as little as possible. This neglect of the public environment - which, ultimately, exile the townsman in their closed environment - also means depart this group of individuals, as stated by Bauman (2009), from a potential contact with diversity, distancing them from diversity creativity and its ability to make life more intense, which, in turn, aims to encourage differences to produce a meaningful dialogue. Thus, this reduction in the possibilities of forming a complex social network, developed through contact with strangers (anonymous) which exist in the public space, inhibits social recognition of diversity, which is a fundamental prerequisite for the development of public policy for the recognition .After all, the recognition – to be "discovered" – depends on the interaction with others. This contact occurs largely in the public space, for example, on the street. The escape from the bourgeois private setting is then fundamental to this.

It is in the tension between the instability associated with the 'unknown' that the street itself brings and the security and soundness of the private space that the control and use of the territory is perceived here. To live the street therefore means outbreak the urban in search of its associated attractions. However, the possibility to enjoy this experience is necessarily related with the absence of insecurity. This is because fear - fed by an unsafe urban environment - makes disappear from the streets, as stated by Bauman (2009), spontaneity, flexibility, the ability to surprise and adventure offers. According to the author, the alternative to security is not the beatitude of tranquility, but the curse of boredom. Thus, in a scenario - as the urban - whose contact with "foreign" is constant, being in touch with diversity becomes necessary not only to think about recognition public policies, but also to mitigate the condition of this strange-foreign and make it a neighbor, removing any sense of insecurity provided by them. It is, therefore, by creating this unique network, heavily produced by the way we use and control urban space, which Jacobs (2007) considers it possible to create many inclusive and secure territories, produced from the interests and needs of the social group who inhabits.

All arguments previously developed aims to ballast part of the analysis of a particular mode of appropriation of the street, which is the street carnival of Rio de Janeiro. As it seeks to present in the following, that cultural manifestation has fundamental characteristics that may be used, in cases of an urban entrepreneurialism, to serve the interests of private capital in the construction of a "spectacle city". Or, if appropriated by social urbanism, as a way of building a diverse and inclusive ambience from a participatory perspective toward its own inhabitants.

3. Carnival as a form of appropriation of the street and guarantee the right to the city

As shown throughout this work, the street carnival in Rio - materialized by several street blocks simultaneously organized by the city - is essentially democratic, since, besides being experienced on the street during that period becomes the public stage, its free. However, even owning a precious inclusive potential able to produce diversity, we can not avoid thinking about this issue through the processes of gentrification added to the outcomes identified in the production and appropriation of urban space during carnival festivities in the light of the guidance given by the Government, especially regarding the way in which the event are planned and executed.

We believe it is possible to associate goers of the street blocks and the locations in which they occur in the city with the level of interaction between different social classes in the production of diversity. Despite the eminently democratic condition identified in carnival festivities, there would be a force capable of potentially improve the effects produced by geographical segregation which materializes socioeconomic differences in metropolitan Rio. Thus, it is believed that, at the same time it is possible to identify places where there is high interaction of different social groups during this period, it is also possible to verify that small public space areas are used by smaller groups to project their private space in the street.

Carnival in the city of Rio de Janeiro is not just that the samba schools that parade on cars, costumes, props and sambas. Much of the celebration of Carnival in Rio de Janeiro, happens on the street, in the traditional street blocks. According to information from RioTur (the Tourism Company of Rio de Janeiro Municipality), in 2013, about 5 million people marched in the city within 492 street blocks, during the 5 days of the official party.

Those street blocks - some with almost 100 years of history - are multiple and often themed. They consist of musicians and walk through the city streets playing music and inviting people to join the party. Usually, with authorization from City Hall, the blocks occupy the main streets and avenues of the city of Rio de Janeiro. The city stops to see the blocks pass by.

Admission in the blocks is free. It is just necessary to keep following the block through the city. Unlike other Brazilian cities - such as Salvador, Bahia -, where ropes separate those who pay to stay with some blocks (something like a box on the street) from those who do not pay, in the Carnival of Rio de Janeiro there are no boxes or ropes that divide people. All revelers are forced to share together - if they wish to participate - Carnival. In 2013, when the practice of creating boxes and ropes to segregate people was contemplated, the City Hall has manifested itself through a Decree prohibiting the establishment of any kind of separation between people[2].

[2] Rio de Janeiro's Secretary of Tourism, Antonio Pedro Figueira de Mello, says he does not tolerate the string: "It does not fit with the Rio carnival. Rope is only for the musicians. The street is of the people and we can not allow its commercialization. The space where the blocks parade is public. And the municipality is the one which legislates on this space. " In addition, Rita Fernandes, president of Sebastiana - association which represents 12 blocks - condemned the "Carnival of privileged places": "The block which starts to allot VIP areas with ropes and shirts is not street carnival. May be in another state than ours. (...) It defines as a commercial mold. No matter the musical language, it is the intention. A company that creates a block to sell shits (abadás) is making an appropriation. This entertainment, not Carnival."

(Source: RIOTur)

As it is possible to realize from the brief lucubrations above, the street carnival has significant potential for the use and control of the city. Although this particular form of appropriation of the city occurs for about a month during the year (considering that the blocks start before and continue to occur after the carnival official holiday), the interaction with the public space, the abandonment of the private environment aiming to live the territory and all the uncertainties and expectations that he is able to offer are crucial to build on its inhabitants the feeling of belonging to the city. We believe this particular circumstance, responsible for generating the desires of owning the right to live and enjoy the city, belonging to a territory legitimately democratic and absent of fear, has been one of the key drivers that have shaped and strengthened the manifestations observed in Brazilian streets, especially during June 2013. It can be concluded, therefore, that the results obtained through the claims were potentially on the streets. This targeted use of public space to serve as a stage for popular demands - associated with predominantly urban issues - can be identified as counterparts of the experience lived by revelers during the street carnival in Rio de Janeiro[3]. That's because, though

[3]In the city of Rio de Janeiro is common to see streets closed for car use. It is tradition in both are presented in a seemingly opposite desires, in fact, we believe the two situations fit the singular form, because, according to this understanding, responsible for making their potential hatch, leading revelers/protesters to the streets was the pursuit for the right to the city, which means a democratic, inclusive and diverse urban space, capable to meet the demands of its inhabitants.

Clearly, Rio's carnival, which takes place in the public space by essence, which is the street, can not establish private or social distinctions. The president of Sebastiana[4], criticizes even the commercialization of carnival. If the practice of street carnival is a cultural heritage, it may not be appropriate or privatized.

The culture industry can represent the way in which the artistic and cultural production is organized within capitalist relations of production (Machado, 2009). In this sense, the production becomes a commodity and is now evaluated according to its market price, not for the "intrinsic value it may have as scientific, literary, philosophy, etc.. " (Machado, 2009) Thus, the recipient is just a consumer of the work and no longer a participant, a creator: it is a good to be purchased, but not to be produced by the individual; to be used temporarily, but not to embed itself definitively to formation of the subject (Machado, 2009)

Somehow the carnival of Rio de Janeiro fight against total submission to the cultural industry. However it suffers from the influence of sponsors and from the entire capitalist system that revolves around the party, it can still be measured by intrinsic value. It is still possible to fill spots where the industrial culture does not penetrate or some places where the input of cultural industry does not prevent other people who do not want or can not consume the products sold, take part in the carnival, which is still open and free. It is clear that the consumption of goods creates a differentiation in all events, but it do not lead to a necessary exclusion.

On the other hand, the carnival is still produced by individuals. It is common to see people who have made their own costumes, which create new blocks and which incorporates the parties to the day-to-day, whether as builders, as musicians or mere participants. The fact that is an open and completely free party can be a factor that prevents the total domination by industrial culture.

the city, for example, the closure of some streets on Sundays so that residents possoam use of public space. Unlike other cities, the street is part of the life of the dweller in Rio.

3.1. "Rio is not Salvador"

It was common to see groups in 2010 carnival who wanted to build cabins or "VIP areas" in Rio. A movement called "Rio is not Salvador" which set posters in the city until 2013 made the defense of a carnival with "no ropes, no boxes."

The famous carnival of Salvador, also occurs on the streets of Bahia, however with many divisions. According to Professor Marilia Veloso (2012) are three: (i) the famous people stays in the boxes above the street, (ii) the whites ones who are protected by ropes in the street and (iii) the blacks accompanying the parade in the free area. Veloso names the Salvador carnival as "apartheid" and realizes an "island of white surrounded by a string of black people." Are blacks who hold the strings that make the separation between whites within "cornas" - a sort of VIP area next to the singers.

The photo below makes it possible to realize the separation of the groups in Salvador street carnival. A uniformed group (with so-called "abadás") within the string, protected by another group of employees also uniformed. Beside, the boxes are located.

What can be said is that the most diverse groups of Rio's Carnival want to avoid a separation of people, as it happens in Salvador.

The attempt is to keep the city, which unfortunately is a space of exclusion and differentiation, at least a bit a more plural, colorful and diverse. The fight is for the Carnival of Rio does not turn into something like Salvador's street carnival.

3.2. Street carnival and the urban chaos

The occupying the streets of Rio de Janeiro, Carnival carries problems arising from a large group of people. Already on Friday, (the party officially starts on Saturday and ends on Tuesday) main downtown streets are blocked. Unofficially the party starts traditionally on Friday noon.

Tons of garbage are left throughout the city. The traffic is unworkable in the center and in some neighborhoods. The number of reported thefts increase significantly. A little chaos ensues on the city streets. Noises and cars are replaced by people and music. The streets are occupied by people. Maybe they resume the place that is rightfully theirs. The cars are driven. The sound is different.

This substitution has its costs. But it carries with it the joy and the participation of millions of people. A bit of a culture is forged on the asphalt of the city.

3.3. The clown and the goat

Carnival is a plural celebration. Whether the plurality of persons, either plurality of forms of manifestation. The coexistence often rough and hurried of the day-to-day, for a few moments is replaced by moments of living differently.

The police, present in some blocks, to (theoretically) protect people and guarantee the safety of the event, may possibly also join the party. If the police violence, for example, is a phenomenon that marks life in Brazilian cities, in carnival, even briefly, the relationship between the police that arrests, and the citizen who is arrested or is the victim of a bandit undergoes changes.

(Source: Agência Brasil)

The photo shows the fun of a clown with the police. It is also common to see - as in other Brazilian cities - men dressed as clowns, during the carnival, stopping car traffic "to move the block."

It is not possible to forget that the thefts of small goods such as mobile phones and wallets, multiply in carnival, like any great popular celebration. Was there the police to curb such practices. But in carnival, other possibilities are feasible, and the soldier also ends up turning into a prop.

It is worth to remember that police violence does not disappear from one day to another. The crime increases. But such relationships in a small measure, are softened by the relations in carnival. It is an opening of a gap, a new possibility, that adorns the hearts of men and women.

However Carnival is also politics. It is very common to see protests, banners and posters calling for services or criticizing the actions of the municipality or the state government. The carnival of 2013, for example, was marked by several protests in the neighborhood of Santa Tereza which had traditional trams - one of the leading and most traditional means of transport in the neighborhood - deactivated by the local government. In the midst of music and the dancing clowns, you could see people with banners and t-shirts, remembering the promise, still unfulfilled by the municipality, to reactivate the service.

(Source: Portal R7)

Brazilian and foreign personalities are routinely imitated in carnival. Clowns live with someone dressed as Spiderman, Batman, Superman etc. But people also fantasize up of politicians, presidents, governors, buses collectors, street sweepers, singers. Some with political overtones, to criticize, others just for fun among the people. There is not a right rule in the same way that there are rules.

3.4. The appropriation of street carnival by public managers

Made those remarks, complies to briefly analyze – from the perspective of current urban planning viewpoints presented above, aimed at the redefined role of local government after the 1988 Federal Constitution (Santos, 2006) – how the street carnival in Rio can be appropriate by municipality government and the possible verifiable consequences from the adopted orientation. After that, from the application of the two urban planning currents, we present the management model that has been adopted within Rio de Janeiro in the past few governments and the consequences already verifiable due to the adoption of this guidance.

Through the perspective sustained by urban entrepreneurialism, ie the one that defends the possibility of the Government - with the purpose of financing urban infrastructure works - manage city through potential projects to be executed jointly with the private sector (Compans , 2005), Carnival (either the parade or the street one) is identified as another major event which is designed to fill a menu of activities that, on one hand, can be consumed in the "show-city" and, on the other can serve strictly for funding to be invested in the city itself. This entrepreneurial perspective, whose origin is associated with the end of the Welfare State - when the application of economic austerity measures forced states to reduce investments in urban infrastructure - at least in theory, is meant to serve as an instrument for funding urban equipment which have significantly high cost.

However, the construction of urban space in order to adjust it to the international consumer model - to then fund raise - can produce consequences of the most diverse and negative in the urban environment, especially for the most vulnerable groups. This changes redefines the territory and conducts an intensive process of urban renewal. Among the unwanted effects for the inhabitants of this city is possible to highlight gentrification processes (Smith, 2006) originated of appropriation and exploitation of some spaces in the city which, in turn, ends up going to serve the interests of private capital, on the grounds that such modifications are necessary to finance other urban facilities.

In these cases it is possible to observe even more perverse effect with respect to this production model of urban space, namely, the transformation of the "city to live" into "a town to be consumed", that is, the "show-city". An excessive use of entrepreneurial strategies in urban space can lead thus distortion of the purpose of this proposal, producing an environment that, in fact, serve mainly the interests of those who come there to consume and / or invest, ignoring the needs of those inhabiting that territory.

On the other hand, from the perspective of social urbanism, it is intended that the urban space is produced through the productive mobilization of the territory, ie, through a link between social aspects with the production and generation of value by combating inequality and exclusion through the socioeconomic dynamics (Silveira, 2001). In this case, in addition to provide social inclusion measures, this urban planning viewpoint aims to also consider environmental criteria. Therefore, according to this perspective, it is believed that Carnival would be inserted in this dynamic urban production as a form of integration among different social groups in order to aggregate the inhabitants of the metropolis and produce diversity. This articulation would walk beside inclusive measures to generate income that, in turn, would not be tied to a model of space production whose main thrust would be dictated by private capital.

While this production model intends to become more inclusive, since it foresees the construction of the territory by those who inhabit it, enabling the city, especially urban infrastructure works of great magnitude disregarding the alternative to rely on perspectives of urban entrepreneurialism can become an unreachable goal. Thus, we believe that the combination of both urban planning viewpoints in appropriate measures can result in advances in the production of a diverse and inclusive urban space.

In the case of the city of Rio de Janeiro, since 1993, with the preparation of the Strategic Plan (Compans, 2005), the municipality has adopted an entrepreneurial governance way. Currently, this feature reaches a high degree of institutionalization, with the accomplishment of huge urban projects in order to meet the requirements to hold the mentioned mega-events in the city. In recent years we observed also genuine overhaul of the municipal structure, the redistribution of competencies, development of new standards and policies, establishment of public-private partnerships and the creation of new urban tools (Vainer, 2011). Accordingly, by analyzing this situation through Harvey's (2006, 2011) point of view, these changes in geography and in the municipality structure, may indicate that what is being stimulated in the city is currently the development of the local capacity of capital growth, as do tourism, spectacle and mega-events.

To the "show-city", it is undesirable to give visibility to the social ills and to the urban "disorder": a new aesthetic is imposed, and requires the expulsion of the low-income population to outlying regions of the city, unattractive to capital property. Thus, therefore, are evident risks of incorporating, in urban planning, reified concepts of other cities in the world - as in this case, in which the city of Barcelona was the model to be studied for the purpose of designing urban projects for the city of Rio de Janeiro, - which tend to drive the urban entrepreneurialism to a process of "negotiating urbanism" with objectives more economical than urban (Maricato, 1997).

Specifically about the street carnival in Rio, it is possible to verify that, currently, this was also appropriate by the entrepreneurial perspective. Although the municipality have flagged that would prevent any form of privatization of the blocks - prohibiting the imposition of charges[5] - the street carnival in Rio de Janeiro, is considered one of the more major projects conducted by the City Hall. It happens that, despite the celebrations carry an entrepreneurial dimension, maintaining its essential characteristics - ie, to be conducted in the street and to be free - does not significantly inhibit the effects able to be extracted from the analysis of the street carnival in the perspective of achieving the right to the city.

Conclusions

Although the free street carnival is not an unique feature of the city of Rio de Janeiro, this condition, in this case, it is crucial to realize that this phenomenon is capable to allow those who live it an experience of the urban. Thus, this popular carnival legitimate, albeit short time, a reinterpretation of certain areas of the city (as in the case studied, the street). During the festivities this public space is no longer perceived only as pathway, but the destination itself. This transformation, even if temporary, provides its inhabitants the possibility of these being at the center of a whirlwind of experiences that ultimately concentrate the capability to surprise and offer adventure in urban space.

The perception on the use of the street as purpose (stage), the interaction with public space and the abandonment of private environment are valuable elements to build a belonging feeling in the inhabitants the territory. Thus, the street carnival can be seen as an exercise of the right to the city. So, by thinking about these components we advocate the need to be alert to prevent urban entrepreneurialism not to erupt lawlessly transforming street carnival in a spectacle to be consumed, decharacterizing street carnival from its popular features. Thus, among others, is essential to maintain the current feature of full and unrestricted access to the street festivities for us to perceive them as instruments of exercising access to the city.

The city as a mosaic:
Law, otherness and dialectic perspective

Maria Coeli Simões Pires[1]
Mila Batista Leite Corrêa da Costa[2]

Abstract: The city, especially in a democratic postmodern framework, appears as a shared background where the interaction and sociopolitical, economic, cultural and symbolic relationships occur. Extrapolating the physical scope and the contextual composition, the city presents itself as a crucible of exchange, reactions, functionalization of their componential elements and, above all, the city is consolidated as a baseline of universal access to rights. The urban space therefore hosts the citizenship universalization, and needs to be observed and evaluated by the concept of plurality and diversity that form the town mosaic, always susceptible to changes in process, social actors dialogue, and multiple variables that are drawn by "dialectic of look" about the city. In this line, Law plays critical role – with their regulatory systems – in the dynamics of "networks of meaning" assimilation and in the perception of differences inherent to the complexity of the city. Accordingly, it is necessary to adopt a self-reflective and dialogic methodology able to translate reality – object of juridical regulation – with fidelity. The urban setting requires a systematic set of rules and representations erected not in the portrayal of a society artificially conceived as homogeneous, but in the heterogeneous, plural and pulsating conformation of social and symbolic manifestations immersed in urban space. The city as a locus of interaction and behavioral/discursive molding therefore allows degrees of learning accumulation to individual and collective formulation of social practices, constituting itself as a composition field of argumentative and symbolic forces related to many actors. All imbued with the need to build consensus, but guided by diversity and plurality that characterize the composition of a collective space regimented from individualities – sustained in everyday life of ordinary men, disseminated characters, innumerable walkers, according to Michel de Certau. The adherence of the analysis of urban space to the "Anthropological Blues" assumptions in accordance with Roberto daMatta's thesis and the Habermasian theoretical model extends the perception of discursiveness and communicative flows around its object. The paper seeks to analyze the city – as theoretical and qualitative research – using an anthropological perspective, the Habermasian discursive support and Pierre Bourdieu's sociology, conceiving the urban space as a "field", a space where actors have specific positions on referrals of symbolic dynamics. An interpretation of the city methodologically concerted requires an architecture of concepts and practices endowed with the plasticity able to provide the juridical redefinition of science as an instrument of intervention in reality.

1 Introduction

Uma cidade é imperativo
a um tempo humano e desumano.
Palácios presídios asfalto cavernas elevados e subterrâneos teia de virtudes e crimes.
Uma cidade é sinfonia
com ásperas dissonâncias.
É um ser total de osso e carne, tem nervos, músculos e sangue:
o sangue de seus habitantes os nervos de seus habitantes a própria força e fraqueza.
[...]
A expressão de uma cidade é múltipla.
A beleza de uma cidade é instável.
Uma cidade se assemelha às outras
Porém, se a amamos, é única.

Postmodernism[4] is characterized by the remodeling of dominant scientific paradigm – traditionally guided by a rationality closed on its own epistemological limits.[5] In this framework, new foundations to support the theory and the scientific practice are structured from the displacement of the Newtonian-cartesian paradigm, erected over causal relations and based on the maintenance of an orthodox methodological framework composed of pre-established formulas and assumptions, without accurate translation of reality.

In the midst of the postmodern debate, therefore, highlights the redefinition of scientific method and the redrawing of legal science itself, through understanding the "hypercomplexity of everyday life"[6] and the conformation of a new Law, in turn directed to the replacement of the notion of "stability" for the "suitability", due to their inability to satisfactorily respond by itself "to the demands of pluralism regulation, justification and understanding of social reality in all its density, extent and depth [...]".[7]

The city, in this scope, object of analysis of this work, needs to be understood, in a scientific conception, as a locus for construction of social plot, permeated by the symbolic interactionism's layouts – using Goffmanian[8] reading – and by the behavioral and discursive molding that allows degrees of learning accumulation for individual and collective formulation of social practices.

The urban space, analyzed by postmodern democratic bias, is constituted as a composition field of argumentative and symbolic forces of various actors and as a shared backgrounds where the sociopolitical, economic, cultural and symbolic relationships happen.

The article defined as its central object the treatment of the city in a perspective that goes beyond the physical and contextual composition scope, presenting itself as a crucible of exchange, reactions, functionalization of their componential elements and, above all, the city is consolidated as a baseline of universal access to rights.

The role played by Law in this way – permeated by their normative systems – is critical in the dynamics of assimilation of networks of meaning and of differences inherent to the complexity of the city, necessitating the adoption of a self-reflexive and dialogical methodology capable of translating with fidelity the reality object of juridical regulation.

The urban setting requires a systematic set of rules and representations erected not in the portrayal of a society artificially conceived as homogeneous, but in the heterogeneous, plural and pulsating conformation of social and symbolic manifestations immersed in urban space.

2. Urban Space: A Juridical-Dialogical Look

> Caminha-se por vários dias entre árvores e pedras. Raramente o olhar se fixa numa coisa, e, quando isso acontece, ela é reconhecida pelo símbolo de outra coisa: a pegada na areia indica a passagem de um tigre; o pântano anuncia uma veia de água; a flor do hibisco, o fim do inverno. O resto é mudo e intercambiável – árvores e pedras são apenas aquilo que são (Ítalo Calvino).[9]

The city, especially in a democratic context, appears as a locus where the interaction and locking of sociopolitical, economic and cultural relations occur. Extrapolating the physical scope, the city presents itself as a space of material and symbolic exchanges, dialogic interaction and, especially, access to rights.

The urban space, in this way, needs to be observed and evaluated using as baseline the changes in process, the dialogue of the social actors and the multiple variables that are drawn by the dialectic of the looks on the space, analyzed from the perspective of the transversality of functional-democratic treatment given to cities and to the use of land, permeated by the debate about the main collective rights related to urban order.[10]

[10] To Edésio Fernandes, this collective right includes "the right to urban planning, social housing rights, right to environmental protection, right to capture the urban capital gains

The contour lines of the city in Pierre Bourdieu's sociology can be understood as a "field" – the place occupied by actors in the dynamics of symbolic referrals – with cutouts of urban reality. In the "field", the "habitus" influences the interpretation of the urban space and its results and, therefore, the Law plays with their regulatory systems a fundamental role in the dynamics of assimilation of diversity and differences inherent to complexity of "urban".[11]

The "habitus", defined by Bourdieu as a list of behaviors that shape the everyday social relations, causes inclination for dynamic learning, responsible for interpreting reality and allocation of the actors in the processes of social composition. The "habitus" and social dynamics are present in the construction of urban space and should tune the discourses of Law and Public Administration with the assimilation of networks of meaning, so that the city – with its collective facilities – effectively turn itself into a locus of citizenship and a "field" of democratic regimentation, given its social function, constitutionally established.

3 The city and the law: vocation and anthropological bluesS

> Entre esses direitos em formação figura o direito à cidade (não à cidade arcaica, mas à vida urbana, à centralidade renovada, aos locais de encontro e de trocas, aos ritmos de vida e empregos do tempo que permitem o uso pleno e inteiro desses momentos e locais, etc.) (Henri Lefebvre).[12]

The postmodern model of rationality imposes the need for revising methods and epistemological bases – by overcoming addictions of language and behavior[13] – so that the juridical regulation become able to promote the anthropophagic assimilation of elements from constitution-

> The ecological transmodernity paradigm [...] implies the proposal of transformation of an entire model of culture, another conception of the political, of economic, of Law, of subjectivity and of desire, of word, of production of knowledge (science and epistemology), of aesthetics, of health, etc (own translation).[15]

In the analysis of cities, a new paradigm for Urban Law, therefore, requires management aiming constitutional effectiveness, use of a democratic and dialogic rationality, rescue of the "waratian" subjectivity and fundamental rights' concreteness; needs to encompass instruments to ensure the right to good administration and to inclusive management to civilizing spaces, leaving the simulacrum[16] of empty speeches to build an architecture of concepts and practices for sustainable development, based on social function of the city, on transparency, democratic participation and shared responsibilities.[17]

to the instruments of urban and regional planning,[18] guided to a conception of governance committed with the diffusion of access to rights. The realization of the social functions of the city and guarantees of welfare was ensured by Brazilian Constitution, on art. 182, and regulated by the City Statute – Law nº. 10,257, of June 10, 2001.[19]

The concept of the social function of property was invigorated by the new legislative treatment; and new mechanisms of popular participation were conceived, the basis for the design of a democratic urban planning distant from technocratic practices that characterized the exception period. The City Statute was created – in this social and democratic setting – to establish general guidelines and tools for urban management, defining that "urban policy aims to order the full development of the social functions of the city"[20] by "ensuring the right to sustainable cities, understood as the right to urban land, housing, environmental sanitation, urban infrastructure, transportation and public services, work and leisure for present and future generations".[21]

planning and management of urban space, are important components of an advanced legal-urban framework for achieving the full access to urban facilities, as mentioned in the State of Minas Gerais' Constitutition,[22] and a "new urbanism , of the healthy cities".[23] Consequently, the city juridically concerted, designed over the mentioned regulatory requirements, depends on proactive behavior of Public Administration and Law itself, in order to enable strategies of insertion and intervention in "urban", supported on "the perspective of collective and democratic building of a shared management between government, societal and private sector actors".[24]

The new regulatory framework, as a means of enforcing rights, plays a key role in the urban design process because it has the power to break with perverse links between planning, rigid management and one-dimensional urban development. The postmodern urban regulations must assume a systematic set of representations and norms erected not in the portrayal of a society artificially conceived as homogeneous, but in the heterogeneous, plural and pulsating conformation of social and symbolic manifestations that compose the space: "[...] people are equal before the law but they have different needs, capacities and desires".[25]

In addition, it is urgent the incorporation, especially by urban juridical methodology, of what is most extraordinary, more human and less uneventful in the city analysis: the look of otherness – "Anthropological Blues" – that recognize the other beyond the rigid antagonism I/other, civilized/barbarian, questioning the intellectual space of Law and incorporating "in the own field of official routines [...] those extraordinary ways, always ready to emerge in every human relationship [...]".[26]

The guarantee of the right to the city by juridical and methodological otherness empties the proposal of "company-town",[28] commodified, guided by managerial or operational logic, marking the need for consolidation of basic rights starting from consolidated scopes of property functionalized, social-environmental sustainability of the urban space and systematic and principled interpretation of new legal frameworks.

4. Conclusion

Urban space hosts the universalization of citizenship and it needs to be observed and evaluated by the nuances of plurality and diversity that compose the mosaic of the city – mixed of subjectivity – always susceptible to the changes in process, to the dialogue of the social actors and to the multiple variables that are drawn by the dialectic of looks over the city.

The regulation of the city is usually dictated by arrogance. It is necessary to respect the languages; and to read between the lines of a pluralistic order. The pragmatic challenge is to overcome the traditional technicist normative model to achieve a democratic planning, management and control of the city: a reading constitutionally proper of all normative basis needs to endorse solutions that communicate with the multiple dimensions of urban system and public policy.

The logic of production and consumption in the cities and the space and urban infrastructure's commodification, marked especially by center-periphery segregation, need to be rethought and receive new meanings in the light of a multidimensional perspective and the "Anthropological blues". plan, will be built from the dialectic of the look; the one that sees, not blind, as in Plato's conception.

The city and urban, in a postmodern conception , therefore, must be understood within the scope of economic, social, political and cultural global processes that reshape urban space – and influence the times, spaces, reinterpretations of social relations and transformations of everyday life. The city became, at the same time, the place and the means, theater and arena of these complex interactions.

Public participation and recognition:
An analysis of Vila Viva program[1]

Thaís Lopes Santana Isaías[3]

Abstract: This paper presents partial results of a research carried on within the research project Cidade e Alteridade (City and Otherness) concerning the impacts and effects of a slum urbanization program in the city of Belo Horizonte: a public policy called Vila Viva (living village). The program is undertaken by Urbel, the urbanization company of the city of Belo Horizonte, and focus on problems like infrastructure; housing and land regularization on large scale, affecting directly 193.000 slum dwellers. We describe the flaws on the participatory model used by Urbel, attempting to explain why they have occurred, focusing on the local conditions and suggesting the model's inability to cope with the residents' needs. We also problematize the resettlement model available for the evictees and suggest that it cannot recognize the variety of ways of living demanded by the residents' plurality, thereby imposing a way of living in a top-down approach.

Keywords: slums urbanization, "Vila Viva", participation, recognition and right to the city.

Introduction

During the last two years, a group of researchers from different areas (namely law, sociology, anthropology and social communication) has gathered on the project "Cidade e Alteridade: convivência multicultural e justiça urbana" (City and Otherness: multicultural coexistence and urban justice). The project encompasses a variety of themes concerning urban development, from the precarious situation of slums and outskirts to the necessity of more democratic and effective tools for urban planning, from the access to rights that groups from different cultural or ethnic backgrounds (should) have, especially the right to the city (Lefebvre, 2001), to the interaction between the urban and the rural areas (a dichotomy that is also questioned by the project).

This paper presents partial results of a research carried on within this bigger project (Cidade e Alteridade) concerning the impacts and effects of a slum urbanization program in the city of Belo Horizonte: a public policy called Vila Viva (living village). The program is undertaken by Urbel, the urbanization company of the city of Belo Horizonte, and focus on problems like infrastructure; housing and land regularization on large scale, affecting directly 193.000 slum dwellers[4].

Some objectives of this research were to investigate what dwellers understand as adequate housing, the participatory processes during the program's conceptualization, the elaboration of the "Plano Global Específico" (PGE) – "Specific Global Plan" – and implementation, as well as the community acceptance of the urbanization model brought by the municipality.

Our choice was for qualitative data, since the study objectives would hardly be achieved by quantitative methods. In order to be able to capture the perceptions of the dwellers on the analyzed questions, it was necessary to have deeper and more direct contact to them, without the limitations of data collection through surveys or closed-ended questions, for example. We have also sought to compare these perceptions to the institutionalized discourses about the Vila Viva, both through the material made public by the municipality on its website and by interviewing employees who are responsible for accompanying the design and implementation of the projects. Data was collected through in-depth interviews with semi-structured scripts. Given the scope of the research, the methodological option was to work with a non-probabilistic sample, collecting testimonies of people who would be regarded as typical representatives of their sample group.

This paper describes the flaws on the participatory model used by Urbel, attempting to explain why they have occurred, laying the focus on the local conditions and suggesting the model's inability to cope with residents' needs. We also problematize the resettlement model available for the evictees and suggest that it cannot recognize the variety of ways of living demanded by the residents' plurality, thereby imposing a way of living in a top-down approach.

General features of the Vila Viva policy

Vila Viva is defined institutionally as a multidimensional and intersectional public policy aiming to promote a sustainable land regularization process in the slums, which encompasses legal interventions (land regularization itself), urban reform (sanitation, removing families from hazardous areas, widening and paving streets, etc.), social policies (towards education, health, transport, security, leisure, culture, labor) and environmental interventions. Vila Viva proclaims itself as a participatory policy - this is one of its key legitimation claims - and is based on the implementation of a previous plan, said to have been elaborated together with the dwellers affected by the intervention, the so-called "Plano Global Específico" (PGE) - Specific Global Plan.

Two case studies were carried on in order to investigate the impacts and effects of the Vila Viva program: one at Aglomerado da Serra, one of the biggest slums of Belo Horizonte, where the first stage of the intervention finished in 2005; and one at Vilas São Tomás and Aeroporto, where the intervention is currently taking place.

Although such a policy represents a major change on the standard budget historically addressed by the government to squatter settlements, it also presents a set of contradictions and deleterious effects. The intervention in Aglomerado da Serra together with the one in Vilas São Tomás and Aeroporto had a high number of evictions: around 3,800 families, according to Urbel. Even though a portion of these families has been resettled in apartment buildings close to the original area (not rarely inappropriate to the sizes of families and their lifestyles), a large proportion of families has been indemnified by Urbel. Among these families, many had to move to remote areas due to the low indemnities offered, insufficient for relocation within their original settlement. Thus, several people were unable to stay in their original places, moving to other informal settlements, usually more precarious than the ones where they lived before, reinforcing the cycle of illegality and deepening exclusion.

Improving accessibility and mobility has been one of the priorities of the program: most slums have grown spontaneously, highly dense and with access granted through narrow alleys. Opening streets, avenues and roads has been the main cause of evictions, since the density does not allow changes in infrastructure without reconfiguring the region's population. However, those decisions upon priorities have not taken into consideration the communities' demands. The choices were made so as to adapt the territory configuration to the urban tissue (large avenues, apartment buildings, etc.). Therefore it remains ignored that the urban grid is different for a reason: it holds diverse lifestyles and varied living cultures.

From the lack of recognitions to its consequences towards participation

Boaventura de Sousa Santos conceptualize the abyssal thinking as the thinking that creates the segregation in a way that assures that everything produced "on the other side of the line" remains as invisible and nonexistent to those of the "legitimate side of the line", as "not existing in any relevant or comprehensive way of being" (Santos, 2007: 45). Thus, the space produced in a slum, as well as the lifestyles, are disregarded as legitimate or as containing a proper logic that should be understood and respected. Produced "on the other side of the line", those spaces lack meaning and recognition. During a process of reform, therefore, people living there must accept an imposed model, the one produced "within the line", therefore legitimate. This understating of how the State and a considerable part of society see the slums, as indecipherable spaces, also shed some light on the logic of exclusion reproduced on the (supposedly) participatory spaces.

According to the official discourse of the municipality of Belo Horizonte, one of the key features of Vila Viva is its participatory character. In the institutional website of the program we can read: "The plan is a profound study of the reality of the villages and slums of Belo Horizonte, with direct participation of the community."[5] Considering the content of the interviews, as well as the observations during the public hearings the research team has joined, though, the advertised participatory character of this public policy cannot be assumed without further questions, as the following excerpts of interviews illustrate:

> A - "Female dweller: Look, I've walked twice... it were twice.. I... when they would announce, talk, warn, I'd go, I went there twice or thrice, at the hangar, twice at the hangar... when it was too far, I had no way to go...
> Interviewer: But for what were these meetings, what have they said?
>
> Female dweller: Ah, they were bullshitting, sometimes we could not decipher it to the ones who were not there, right?
>
> Interviewer: Couldn't you understand it?
> Female dweller: No… no. I have no literacy. We, who have no schooling, there are many things that we hear but don't understand well, right?"[6]

The cited dweller calls attention to a very practical aspect regarding the organization of the hearings. She mentions that, depending on the place where the hearings would happen ("the hangar"), she would attend or not. The importance of accessibility to the meeting place is broadly known. If the chosen place is in a central area of the community or if it is in its outskirts and, in this case, whether there are transport facilities (like a bus), if people have to pay for the trip or not, will influence the attendance.

Also the time and length of the meetings, as well as when they were communicated (one week, one day or some hours before the event) play a role. Most of the adult population works during the day, which would qualify a meeting in the middle of the day at least as demobilizing, since a great part of the interested public could not take part on it. For the same reason, meetings of unlimited length could discourage participation - the working population would still have to wake up early and make its way to work the next day, not to mention the situation of women, who are still usually responsible for housework, taking care of children and cooking meals. This emphasizes the importance of a well-organized and previously publicized schedule. If the hearings would take place in a regular basis (always on the same day of the week, at the same time, Tuesdays at 18:00, for example), it would be easier for the interested ones to organize themselves in order to attend. But among the interviewed dwellers there were reports of last minute communications about hearings that would happen, as well as of no previous information at all, as shown in this excerpt:

> B- Interviewer: And do you remember how far in advance they'd inform [about the hearings]? Would it be on the same day, a week before...
> Female dweller: that they used to inform us?
>
> Interviewer: Yes, that a hearing would take place...
> Female dweller: ah, girl, they used to inform us on the same day of the hearing, on the day of the hearing they would tell that there would happen a hearing… sometimes my neighbor would come and tell me and I couldn't even go… many times I didn't go because I couldn't go. Because they'd inform you just in the last minute, you're cooking dinner, and have a husband, you can't just… because that's how I am, I never liked… to give people reason to talk, to argue with husband, because I leave the food ready, you know, then when they'd tell only on the last minute I never could manage to go… sometimes, when they'd tell, If I could go, I'd go, you know… so there are many things that I don't have any idea about there, I don't know… because I hardly ever would go to these hearings, I could count five or six.[7]

Some relevant aspects to be taken into consideration are, thus, the frequency, time and length of the meetings (a well organized schedule), as well as their regularity, previous disclosure of the schedule and accessibility to the places where the hearings will happen - all amounting to the responsibility of the public power to invest in the participatory process itself if they do consider participation important as they constantly state.

The interview excerpt A, above mentioned, also refers to the lack of understanding about the content of the meetings, and this was not an isolated case. Similar references pervaded the answers of many other interviewees. These points to a first reason to doubt there was effective participation possibility during the elaboration of the PGE and implementation of the policy. It is questionable if someone who does not understand the changes proposed in a plan could in any case choose consciously among pre-established possibilities, let alone opine and/or influence the ongoing discussion.

It was also not rare that the dweller who admitted not to grasp the whole questions presented during the hearings would justify himself/herself alleging his/her inability to read or the fact that they did not go to school, as mentioned openly in the passage A above: "we, who have no schooling, there are many things that we hear but don't understand well, right?"

Firstly, one must remember that in spite of recent developments in Brazilian education, the number of illiterate citizens is still high, especially among adults: around 8,6% of the population above 15 years old according to IBGE[8] last data, publicized in 2012, which means that in a total of 195.243.000 inhabitants, 16.790.898 cannot write or read. The number is even more significant if we consider also the functional illiteracy, which amounts to 10,5% on the same period, adding circa 20.500.500 inhabitants to the sum. (Brasil, Ministério do Planejamento e Gestão, 2012: 110-114).

On her extensive research with migrants from rural areas living in a precarious neighborhood in the outskirts of Brasília, the capital of Brazil, Bortoni-Ricardo (1984, 2011) has registered difficulties on verbal communication between interviewers (students of a local university) and interviewees (dwellers of this low-income community). As Bortoni-Ricardo emphasizes, the low-income workers living in the big-cities' outskirts and slums often coincides with rural migrants forced to leave the countryside and look for better living conditions in the cities:

> "The stratification criterion [of the research] therefore overlaps partially with the one of rural or urban antecedents in explaining linguistic variation, for the biggest part of the lowest social strata > is formed by the peasantry and rural migrants. In other words, the distribution of several linguistic variables is explained both by the social classes and by the rural/urban origin (Bortoni-Ricardo, 2011: 21)."

One of the reasons for these verbal communication difficulties – and for the lack of understanding at the public hearings, in our case – could be related to the absence of perception about linguistic variations: the monolingualism, recognized as an impressive characteristic in a large territorial extension country as Brazil, is often confused with linguistic homogeneity. In other words, the phenomenon of linguistic variation within a living language is almost completely ignored by Brazilians (Bortoni-Ricardo, 1984: 29). The pervading idea in Brazilian culture is that there is one correct Portuguese (the variations closer to the normative grammar, to which one accedes only through formal education). The variations spoken in rural areas or by people with low or no literacy (visible from the first contact) are stigmatized and considered "wrong"[9].

Among the features pointed out by Bortoni-Ricardo's research we could list: the way some words are pronounced (pronunciation variety), which should not be underestimated; lexical impediments, such as the use of words belonging to more formal registers of the language, with which the dwellers were unfamiliar; certain grammatical variances; but, specially, the lexical differences: "Most of the problematic occurrences in the corpus, however, is related to the comprehension of lexical items. Many times the interviewer used certain word characteristic of a more formal register of the language and unknown to the informant" (Bortoni-Ricardo, 1984: 21). But it is also important to note that the awareness of the subjects about these differences was essential to improve the quality of communication, for, granted this awareness, he/she could make an effort to converge on the language of his/her addressee.

Some could object that the analogy with the cited research is not valid in the present case for the difference between the corpora, in Bortoni-Ricado's study an "artificial" situation (structured interviews between specific subjects) and in this study the perceptions of the dwellers about real public hearings (with an undefined number of citizens in the position of hearers). About the difference between the situations, as the author points out:

[9]For more on linguistic prejudgmice see BAGNO, Marcos. Preconceito Linguístico: o que é, como se faz [Linguistic prejudgement: what it is, how it is done]. 52. Ed. São Paulo: Edições Loyola, 2009.

> Speech events very similar to the sociolinguistic interview take place quite often in the daily life of the interviewed migrants, as, for example, in a medical appointment, in registering at the secretariat of social services or in agencies of the Ministry of Labor or of the Social Welfare, while proceeding the school registration of their kids, in a police or court interrogation, etc. [...] The difficulty some informants have shown in maintaining a fluent and effective communication with the researchers should not be seen, therefore, as isolated phenomena, but as samples of a routine problem. (Bortoni-Ricardo, 1984: 11)

Considering the different number of subjects involved in each case, the public hearing would be a situation of higher likelihood of misunderstandings, since the audience usually don't even have the chance to express if they understand what is being discussed or not[10], and the back channels – roughly, the reactions of the addressee, visible in direct dialogue, which allow us, to some extension, to check if he/she is still with us or not – are almost absent or too hard to notice. Which makes it even more important that the ones presenting the PGE or the topics to be discussed – usually people who work for the municipality – converge their language to match this audience.

The interview also differs from spontaneous conversations in the power asymmetry between interviewer (who introduce the discussion themes, controls to some extension the time and the turn-take shifts along the conversation) and interviewee (who is expected to attain to the themes addressed him). But the asymmetry would be even more significant in a public hearing than in a dialogue between two subjects. When we think about the structuring of the meeting – who has the right to speak, for how long and according to which rules; who are the ones who can define and influence the discussion agenda, if the affected ones can bring new points to the discussion or only comment on the ones brought by the municipality – we must remember that who detains the control of how a public hearing is structured is undeniably in a position of power (Van Dijk, 2003). Besides that, the municipality employees, who usually had access to higher education (basic schooling is often already out of some dweller's reality) and who represent the "voice of the municipality" also speak from a privileged position – an inequality of status in Fraser's terminology (2005).

[10]And even if they did so, it is unlikely that they would. Bortoni-Ricardo highlights the linguistic insecurity common among speakers of stigmatized variations of Portuguese (1984: 16-17), as well as Goffman (1981: 26) mentions that when something is not understood, the hearer can convey signals of understanding in order not to admit, among other possibilities, that "[...] one is insufficiently knowledgeable to understand the speaker's utterance [...]".

About the lack of understanding of the content of the hearings mentioned by the cited dweller, it is also important to observe that during these meetings many questions were previously put out of discussion as "technical matters" without any additional explanation. The municipality employees in direct contact with the dwellers not always had the attention to explain the meanings of the technical jargon they often recurred to during the public meetings. This shows not only the unfitness of those workers to deal with the public (the dwellers), but also the underlying idea, common to more traditional democratic theories, that the complexity of modern societies demands the citizens to delegate some discussions and their decisions to the specialists (Avritzer and Santos, 2003: 42), a technocratic view that has been increasingly challenged.

> C - Male dweller: "We have actually never decided what would be done... Always the Urbel (Urbanization Company of Belo Horizonte) would arrive with everything set and present to us. (…)
> "About accepting our suggestions, they have never accepted. It was all about their proposals and what they would do. And their proposal was that they would indemnify your house and expropriate you, but they would not hear who wanted to vindicate (…)".[11]

All the factors mentioned above play an important role concerning participation and, thus, social justice. According to Fraser, "Overcoming injustice means dismantling institutionalized obstacles that prevent some people from participating on a par with others, as full partners in social interaction" (2005: 73).

Such obstacles refer not only to provide better conditions for the involved ones to take part in the discussion, which involves the economical field of redistribution and the cultural field of recognition (Fraser, 2005), but also to invest on the participatory process itself, namely, training the employees of the municipality who deal directly with the dwellers at the public hearings to make an effort to improve the quality of interaction and assure understanding on both ways, besides the already cited aspects (scheduling, accessibility). They define ultimately who will speak; when; about what; and this, as stated above, conveys them a great power (Van Dijk, 2003). An important discussion when we think about direct participation experiences would be, therefore, the democratization of the discussion of the participation rules themselves[12].

Still according Nancy Fraser, it is not only the lack of recognition and redistribution that impacts on the participation in public policies as Vila Viva, but also the lack of representation (Fraser, 2005), the third component of her three-dimensional justice theory. The dimension of representation encompasses the political aspect:

> At another level, which pertains to the decision-rule aspect, representation concerns the procedures that structure public processes of contestation. Here, what is at issue are the terms on which those included in the political community air their claims and adjudicate their disputes (Fraser, 2005: 75).

Fraser maintains that the public policy has a previous phase, that she calls "political dimension", when the decisions about the procedure and structure of the participatory process are made. She establishes a connection between the representation and the two other components of justice (recognition and redistribution), related to the cultural and economic dimensions, respectively. She adds that the "political dimension" determines the scenario where the discussions and deliberations about economic and cultural aspects will take place, defining, therefore, how they will be treated during the execution of a public policy.

> The political in this sense furnishes the stage on which struggles over distribution and recognition are played out. Establishing criteria of social belonging, and thus determining who counts as a member, the political dimension of justice specifies the reach of those other dimensions: it tells us who is included in, and who excluded from, the circle of those entitled to a just distribution and reciprocal recognition. Establishing decision rules, the political dimension likewise sets the procedures for staging and resolving contests in both the economic and the cultural dimensions: it tells us not only who can make claims for redistribution and recogni> tion, but also how such claims are to be mooted and adjudicated (Fraser, 2005: 75).

[12] This can be illustrated by what happened during the "popular horizontal assemblies" that happened in Belo Horizonte in June/July 2013 along the demonstrations that took place in the city. At the beginning of each assembly, the present people would decide how interventions should be made (usually, through a subscription list) and how long each participant could talk.

Herewith we aimed at problematizing the way representation actually came to be in Vila Viva, highlighting that, unfortunately, the public power (municipality) ended up excluding the affected ones from what would correspond to the political phase of the policy. The dwellers could not take part on the decision-making about the previous questions on the procedural aspects that would define the material dimension. Thus, the structure of participation was limited since its conception, based on the exclusion of many people who should have been regarded as legitimate to present demands for justice, express claims and interfere in the content of the program. If the policy was excluding since this first moment, it is hard to imagine a scenario in which exclusion would not be maintained along subsequent stages.

The municipality of Belo Horizonte, to be more precise, the Urbel, has failed in its official proposal of parity, mostly due to the lack of inclusion of the dwellers in all steps of the Vila Viva. There should have been investments towards effective participation from the very beginning of the process within which the political space of representation is encompassed. When the public power monopolizes the activity of establishing this framework, denying voice to those potentially affected by the policy, it obstructs the creation of democratic arenas where these voices could express themselves and be heard. If this is not granted, the program will result in misrepresentation.

From misrepresentation to the disregard of the inherent plurality of urban slums

The result of these actions pervaded by lack of representation, recognition and bad redistribution is a programs in mismatch with characteristics and aspirations of favelas' dwellers. An example of Vila Viva that reinforced this affirmation is the construction and resettlement of favela´s dwellers in flats, vertical buildings that are not in accordance with the traditional way of life typical of these territorialities. Houses with backyards, vegetable gardens and animals are an integral part of the everyday life of many of these dwellers. These practices were abruptly discontinued when they were transferred to the little apartments. References to the negative impact of the resettlement on the dwellers' way of life and everyday practices were recurrent on the interviews:

> D – I think it is more comfortable [to live in a house], it is calmer, I don't know, you have your little backyard, small areas, you can make a barbecue whenever you want, you know, you can receive friends anytime you want to, without disturbing your neighbors, you know. I think it is much more expedite. If you want to build up, for example, you can. In a flat, how are you going to build up?13

> E – ahh... I like to have space, boy, I need a lot of space… I like, I think everybody is so, right, everybody likes places with plenty of space, a place where you can breath. When we get older, we like a place where we can go out, get some air, ne, having a backyard to sit down…"14

> F – Oh no, God keep me safe from these little flats. I do not accept that, my goodness... Our Family is too big, it doesn't fit in a flat, no.15

> E – There was... there was a mango tree, at the hot season we would stay beneath the mango trees, breathing that air... a lot of people would go to our house in order to stay with us… and in an flat, no… in a flat I'll live locked, ne. If you're in there, you have to lock it, you can't go out. As long as I can take, it's okay, ne, but when I can't take it any longer… on a bed, locked…[16]

> H- You just had to see my backyard full of acerola. There was acerola, there were lemon trees, there were mango trees, cajá-manga trees, pitanga, guava, plum, there was everything there. My backyard was like an orchard. Now my kids don't let me go there. They don't wanna let me go because they say I cry too much when I go there. My kids don't like when I go there, no they don't. After they [Urbel] have demolished my house they [the kids] don't like when I go there, no. "Are you going there to cry? That's nonsense…" Yes, my boy, that's how it is.17

This illustrates the referred lack of consideration about the differences. What we question at this stage is the disregard of specific characteristics of the communities that are affected by the urbanization programs of villages and slums. What happens in Vila Viva is that a model of urbanization is imposed. The municipal bureaucracy conceptualizes this model beforehand, without the participation of dwellers. They are also prevented from participating due to barriers related to the inequality itself, as mentioned above. But besides that, the so called "decision-making spaces" are only informative, not deliberative, as one can see in the excerpt C above, as well as in the speech of the employees of the municipality while explaining the researchers how the participatory process was conceived:

> I- Social agent of Urbel: I remember that when we would start the construction there, we had to, even as an obligation due to the founding, we had to reinstall the reference groups, we had the participation of about thirty [dwellers]. And along the execution of the construction we then made another model of participation. In the case of Serra we made a new model of participation there. We aggregated a process of direct participation of the community to the reference group, because, we started to go there, to affect the community in a more direct way, those dwellers in the construction's stretches, where we made numerous assemblies with them in order to prepare them to the process.
> Interviewer: directly
> Social agent of Urbel: directly in the community, in big assemblies that we made within the six villages to inform, clarify, orient, ne, solving doubts, giving information, making a political discussion about the project… so[18]

All the verbs used by the informant to describe the hearings, except the last, converge to this explanatory character of the assemblies, not to the possibility of deliberation. Taking this excerpt together with the ones cited above into account, no doubts are left about the solely informative function of the hearings (and even that was not done properly, as already described), with the creation of spaces that didn't allow effective participation, with actual possibility of discussion and creation of alternatives to the ideas presented top-down by the municipality.

The imposition of a hegemonic concept of urban life or of what is considered urban is evident. This ideal, seen as superior by the hegemonic groups, delegitimizes the spontaneous ways of creation and organization of the villages and slums. While the Government tries to standardize the urban spaces based on the predominant model, not only it fails to recognize and respect the intrinsic diversity of the city, it keeps these territorialities invisible.

Here it is important to resume Boaventura de Souza Santos's conceptualization of the "abyssal thinking". Modernity and its institutions, including the State, have produced a blindness scale that prevents people from seeing and recognizing territorial spaces that are dissonant from the homogenizing cartography of the National State (Santos, 2010, 2011). Invisibilization, subordination and ridicule are the basis of modern western states (Santos, 2008), which overlook alternative insurgent modernities. A clear separation is established between "us and them", and this is decisive to determine the way these territorialities and their inhabitants will be treated: without consideration and recognition.

While the dwellers are actually kept out of the decision-making process, the construction of a project that recognizes their expectations, differences and needs is impossible. There is no reason to talk neither about promoting improvements in the quality of life of dwellers nor in the accomplishment of the right to the city without recognizing what they consider as improvement, as quality of life and their perceptions about the urban space.

In the case of Vila Viva Program, many families are being evicted from their homes, from the place where they lived and formed social and emotional bonds along their lifetime. In exchange, they must move in apartments, the formal city model, or leave to even more isolated and precarious outskirts of the city, reinforcing poverty, exclusion and marginality.

Among the most recurrent complains about the new "vertical" lifestyle, are the impossibility of expanding the apartments, the inaccessibility to the second, third and fourth floors (for people with disabilities) and the lack of external areas to grow gardens, vegetable gardens and breed animals. At Vila São Tomás, for example, many workers are carters. A proposal based in vertical constructions neither allows horses breeding, nor the direct contact between the worker and his animal. Thus, the implemented urban policy, while disregarding local lifestyles, ends up eliminating these ways of living from the city.

As Lefebvre points out, the right to the city goes beyond the right to access basic services and urban facilities, encompassing the right to live in the city and to fully enjoy it (Lefebvre, 2001). It embraces the right to take part in the decision-making processes that define how the urban spaces are to be occupied and transformed. Furthermore it comprises the perception of the city as conveying use value, not only exchange value. The city should be experienced as a common, not a private place, which implies its configuration and reconfiguration embracing its characteristic diversity, and not through the imposition of the ideals of life of one group upon others.

The city as conformed now, obeying strict social, political and economical rules, which is reinforced by urban policies like Vila viva, has lost its essence. Public space has become scarce and the various forms of doing politics were restrained. Cities have lost their quality of being enjoyed by the collectivity in order to serve market purposes, illustrating once again what has happened centuries ago with the emergence of the Modern National State.

This deeply engraved idea of nation presupposes the standardization and systematic denial of diversity (Magalhães, 2012: 119). The motto of the National State has been the standardization of people, equalizing the less different and excluding the most different individuals and groups. The urbanization process, structured from this same logic, is no exception to the rule.

With Lefebvre, we claim that the city, as a unique meeting space of completely diverse peoples, should be the scenario where plurality can be celebrated, where these diverse social groups create and redefine the space in which they live and build their own social, cultural and economical settings. However, what we could verify is that the urbanization process through policies like the Vila Viva has been conducted in an undemocratic way, overlooking diversity and imposing a single way of living and being within the urban environment.

Preliminary conclusions: the denial of plurality in the city through urbanization policies

The Vila Viva Program is not implemented in a random way. On the contrary, it follows a strict ideal of city, which serves certain interests and objectives. Based on the collected data we are convinced that both during the elaboration and execution of the program the priority was not to listen to the aspirations of the directly affected towards their territory in a genuine participatory process. The dwellers plainly received a pre-conceived project and watched their lives and their surroundings be changed, still being pushed to adapt to these changes.

We maintain that the housing policy carried on by the current administration of the municipality of Belo Horizonte diverges from the principles embraced by Lefebvre's conceptualization of the right to the city. As demonstrated above, the Vila Viva Program, while giving priority to structural interventions such as the construction of large avenues and apartments, without listening to the demands and priorities of affected groups, implements a hegemonic model of city. The peculiar ways of conceiving and occupying the traditional favela spaces are disregarded and the history of the dwellers themselves is not respected. Thus, standardized spaces are created in the city, denying the possibility of diversity and emergence of the richness of otherness.

Based on the results, we suggest that the Vila Viva Program, in spite of its noble aims (such as implementing the right to the city, sanitation, housing and land regularization) has not accomplished the purposes it claims to pursue, lacking legitimacy among a considerable number of the affected dwellers.

Based on the field research conducted with intense dialogue with the local communities at Aglomerado da Serra and Vila São Tomás, the research team of Cidade e Alteridade concluded that many of those affected by the program reject the municipality's proposal for resettlement housing. As we understand it, this rejection is based on the standardization model of urbanization proposed, a model still founded in modern ideals of universalization, in a centralized and uniform way, as if the city could be planned and structured independently of the people who inhabit it. As explained by Lefebvre (2008: 39), city planners "do not realize [...] that every space is a product, and [...] that this product does not result from conceptual thinking [but] from the relations of production belonging to an acting group".

Lusophone jurisprudence in Iberoamerican Legal Philosophy

Paulo Ferreira da Cunha[1]

Abstract: Several authors in the field of pure Philosophy have argued the existence of a Luso-Brazilian philosophy. There is even a Luso-Brazilian Institute of Philosophy (Instituto de Filosofia Luso-Brasileira) that develops in alternate years, among other activities and publications, the colloquium Tobias Barreto in Portugal, and the colloquium Antero de Quental in Brazil.

The central idea of our intervention is to apply the same paradigm of inter-national philosophies (based on common language, and lasting dialogue at the cultural heritage level), to the philosophy of law, especially the non-academic one (the academic seems to be more cosmopolitan). Is there a Legal Luso-Brazilian philosophy? And what may be its place in the context of a Latin American legal philosophy?

Some of our previous works, already approached the question, such as our books Temas e Perfis da Filosofia do Direito Luso-Brasileira, Lisboa, Imprensa Nacional-Casa da Moeda, 2000 and Pensamento Jurídico Luso-Brasileiro, Lisboa, Imprensa Nacional – Casa da Moeda, 2006 and the more recent article: Do Jusracionalismo Luso-Brasileiro e da Unidade Essencial do Jusnaturalismo – Reflexão Problemática Filosófico-Histórica, in "Collatio", n.o 12, September-December 2012, pp. 17-30, electronic version: http://www.hottopos.com/collat12/17-30FC.pdf.

So far, the research allows us to conclude that there is a large universe of studies waiting for new scholars.

Key words: Old Iberian Liberties, National Philosophies, Iberoamerican Jurisprudence

[1]PhD Univ. Paris II, Univ. Coimbra, PostDoc University São Paulo (USP). Full Professor, Oporto University, Portugal.Interdisciplinary Juridical Institute, Director.

I. The Old Iberian Liberties

In Iberia (or Hispania), a peninsula which later would expand and give birth to the Iberoamerican (Hispanoamerican) world (and other social and sociological and cultural fruits of other diasporas and new communities), we may very clearly see a strong feeling of honor and personal dignity.

The Portuguese poet and former lawyer Teixeira de Pascoaes, friend and comrade of letters with Miguel de Unamuno and other Spanish writers, called our attention to the fact that, while in Northern Europe countries still made human sacrifices to pagan gods, we already imposed our kings a contractual form: *rex eris si recte facies, si non facies non er*is. And it was not a mere rhetorical formula: it happened that bad kings were deposed and replaced. In Portugal in the XIIIth and XVIIth centuries that concretely happened: kings Sancho II and Afonso VI were deposed, just to give two main examples.

This Idea of honor and dignity (capable, in its negative side, of moments of arrogance and even hubris – that are already part of History) are the principium sapientiae of a Law really worthy of that name. Eventually with some anachronism or "chronocentrism", we would say these traits maybe seem too modern, or avant-la-lettre. In fact, we use to consider those ideas as contemporary or at least modern. But it depends on the style and colours they show... Not always these concepts are very rigourous in the current textbooks and alike. If the old constitutionalism, pre-modern one, is present in those academic books, that fact is that for many years it was almost absent or in the shadows. And the coexistence of Lassalle's historical-universal concept of constitution with some hidden or shadow prejudices against old and material constitutions seemed not to bother anyone.

Let's put some questions to these paradigms. How came into life this specific legal culture, which will even cross the oceans?

Surely it was built from many different materials: Roman law, of course, Christianity (the idea of equality, as it is nowadays remembered for instance by Luc Ferry, is difficult to conceive in cultures long deprived of the Christian legacy or alien to it), and also Visigothic legacy... But a deeper study of how and why this vision of Law was born still seems to await the interest of researchers.

And what is the style proper to the common law of the peoples of the Iberian Peninsula? May we dare to ask that?

We seem to have a constant concern for the practical protection of the rights of every man. This way of seeing people and protecting them is older than the other forms of protection: English, American, French, the other ways of protection, as the constitutional revolutions of modernity put it, and the most epic subsequently recorded by History.

The old Iberian freedoms symbolized by the councils of Toledo, and the major figure of Isidore of Seville, symbolize the seed of humanistic concern with the legal person and his or her rights, freedoms and guarantees. The old Iberian freedoms have not, admittedly, the magnitude or even the rhetorical paradigm shift key. As it is well known, this anthropological revolution in the Western World was wrought by the Kantian sapere aude motto, and is commonly expressed by the sacred ternary Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, with which the French Revolution and its daughters would convert the world and built the Modern Liberal Democratic State. And, of course, the Social State, too.

But the Iberian liberties are a significant form of protection of Person, and above all have a concrete sense: practical, and effective. The bureaucratic systems that the world entangled makes this old one (in a sense) contemporary, as a window and an example of another way of protection. Some excess of legal mechanisms make constitutional, civil and human rights and principles (the main juridical forms we have today) almost dead letter. But let's not to confuse abstract bureaucracy with constitutional remedies, that are effective instruments of freedom and constitutionality.

II. The Problem of National Philosophies

From the ancestral practice of respect for the person, care for the dignity of the person, we can move on to the specific philosophical relationship with law.

There are obviously critical positions to the existence of national philosophies. But the problem has also been solved in many cases positively, in all areas where people speak Portuguese and Spanish.

There are, of course, different philosophies in different countries: some are totally foreign (the name in Portuguese to an intellectual who denies his ou her roots to became a foreign influenced person is "estrangeirado", and it has often – but not always – a pejorative connotation), but some other are the philosophies of those countries (and of continents and of cultural communities, as the Lusophone or Iberoamerican).

At least, if there are possibilities for the design of those philosophies as nationally or culturally based, so they exist. This Cogito is valid, because they are, by nature, mental constructs. The opposite idea states that philosophy is by definition universal, so it would be impossible to have national or cultural particular philosophies. But what is curious to observe is that, in general, the same who reserve philosophy for universal purpose don't seem to be disturbed with "things" such as Indian philosophy, or Chinese philosophy... Even Ancient Greek philosophy doesn't seem to be a wrong qualification for them. Would it be a precaution against nationalisms? And specifically Western and (of course) contemporary ones? Vain precaution...so it seems.

III. In the quest of specificities

Let's try to approach our subject step by step. What would be specific of the Portuguese philosophy, the one we have more obligation to know, among all these?

It is not easy to answer... Because what seems to be peculiar, could also be vindicated by other countries, probably.

The traditional sense and genuine legal philosophy in Portugal is a constant concern for Justice and Human, which runs through its entire history, with no real interregnum. This coherence can be detected even during a long time, in Middle Ages as in the Modern times. And this seems to be a point to invalidate the theory that advocates a sharp and radical distinction "classic / modern" (especially in the field of Law Natural). So, even very late (even during the Enlightenment period) the law was commonly identified, in line with classical realism, as the suum cuique tribuere.

If ideas may not be enough, or may be considered vague, what about blood? Could we consider that the philosophy of a country or of a culture is the one of the people who was born there, that is to say, the one concieved by native citizens? Of course this is a non philosophical criterium.

In many respects, and especially given the mobility and interpenetration of cultures in Europe, crossed by migrations of diverse order, this is not even a practical way of defining legal cultures or legal philosophies.

Baruch of Spinoza (or Bento de Espinosa...) is casually natural from Netherlands (but it seems that he thought in Portuguese). Shall we consider him a Dutch philosopher by ius soli or a Portuguese (or a Jew) philosopher by the ius sanguinis? This seem so irrelevant as the quarrel about Colombo's nationality. He was an European, one of the first Europeans. And so was Spinoza... or Espinosa.

But sometimes some country wants the adoption of heroes or philosophers... There are, for example, a mythological and fanciful version on the Lusitanity of Aristotle (he would be born in Lusitania, and then went to Greece: how convenient to Portuguese pride!). This is indicative of the attachment of the Portuguese to the Stagirit. But also it means that this is, at least in some periods and for certain minds, such an important question that it may be falsified, in myth.

In fact, we have not only the ius soli or ius sanguinis criteria to establish the nationality of a culture. It has been discussed, for example, about the cradle of the first juridical philosophical thinker uncontroverted Portuguese, D. Álvaro Pais (1275/80-1353): was he born in Portugal or in Galicia, in Spain? And, without wishing to claim any portugality, even spiritual, it is known that the master of the second scholastic Francisco Suárez (1548-1619), Doctor Eximius, being Grenadian, had his PhD in Évora, Portugal, taught in Coimbra and died and is buried in Lisbon, in the Church of San Roque. By these examples, Portugal seems fertile in philosophers of law not born in its territory. But they are just two cases.

Breaking the placid traditional line, however, the Renaissance period gave way to another kind of preferences or anxieties, at least in their formulation and explicit style. And after that scientists and technocrats took the fortress of Law. But the decline of the essential concern of legal philosophy and even of its university studies does not mean death. In the shadow and silence, and even resistance, there has always been researchers and thinkers faithful to the tradition of reflexive law.

Legal philosophy, cultivated among us in a non-academic way ('implicit' in the terminology of Miguel Reale) very early (at least since the fourteenth century), was officially introduced in Portugal in its rationalist formula by Pombal's reform of the University (1772), then assuming the name "Natural Law (which, as is well known, in Spain still remained for a couple of centuries). Even in the late nineteenth century, the philosophy of law had between us host among pure philosophers, and was taught at the High Schools, in the discipline of Philosophy. Cunha Seixas, pioneering Portuguese philosophy, who served until his death as a lawyer, did not disdain to write legal philosophical pages for the purpose of teaching in high schools and normal schools. The second half of the nineteenth century assists in Portugal to a major outbreak: it is the time of positivism and scientism.

In the early twentieth century, however, positivists had succeeded in imposing on curriculum reform, in 1901. It produced a change of name and content in the chair of the first year of law school: it became Sociology General and Philosophy of Law. And integrated into a whole plan that was to precede the study of the positive law of sociological Prolegomena. Not a bad idea, if it was not largely ideological in the sense of propaganda...

The positivist reform plan for law studies, which followed the establishment of the First Portuguese Republic in 1910 (very inspired on the previous Brazilian one), abolished the Philosophy of Law, and soon after created the second Lisbon Law Faculty, a leading school whose name printed on the philosophical conception of its creators: Faculty of Social Studies and Law. Obviously the new institution appeared devoid of legal philosophy. The rallying cry of turning back to the roots emerge from the student of the Faculty of Law of Coimbra (later to become one of the most solid and reputable historians of law), Paul Merea, still in 1910, through a conference, and later two articles (the latter returning to the initial conference, and published in 1913). But it would take more than twenty years that seed bear fruit. Restored in 1936-1937, with Cabral Moncada, companion of studies of Merea, although primarily only experimentally, the discipline has counted worthy successors to the legacy of these masters, although it has been subject to further vicissitudes, never finished because of the anti-philosophical prejudice, nowadays enhanced by prevailing climate of technological cretinism (as the French social scientist Jean Duvignaud puts it).

IV. Non Juridical Jurisprudence

But more interesting than the official Jurisprudence is the reflection on Law by people who are not professional jurists. Poets (like Teixeira de Pascoaes or even Fernando Pessoa), fiction writers (Raul Brandão), essayists (Orlando Vitoriano, Afonso Botelho, Dalila Pereira da Costa) pure philosophers (Sampaio Bruno, Leonardo Coimbra), heterodox thinkers (Agostinho da Silva), etc., although this categories are not frozen (some of them cultivated many literary genres).

It should be noted that one of the appealing and attractive characteristics of Portuguese Philosophy is its "orality" and even a certain amount of memorialism. There is a patent alive dialogue with the reader, which is made of direct questioning, storytelling that assumes the art of saying what you mean, so often very beautifully (and that Leonardo Coimbra was a master on this: even a master of oral suspense...) but accurate. No fatuous blisters and particularly uncomplicated and purposeful verbal intellectualism.

The ideas of these authors about law, justice, etc. are normally original, and they do not sacrifice to the academic idols. Although the autodidactism sometimes weakens their arguments in the context of an academic debate, of course (one might be tempted to argue that the author didn't study law...). There are a certain esoteric aura in some writings, even more philosophical-political ones (such as in Dalila Pereira da Costa and Sampaio Bruno). New authors of this school, like Braz Teixeira, seem to make a bridge between the non academic and the academic fields. The last idea is the construction of a theory of juridical rationality, opposed to a simple methodology of law...

V. Brazilian Memoirs

The evolution of the Brazilian legal philosophy has had some parallels with the Portuguese one, at some point to be considered 'one of the virtualities of Portuguese philosophy who found a suitable opportunity and ran its course. Eventually this is an ethnocentric statement. And other theoretical solutions could be found...

Let's just recall that, at the level of the aforementioned legal philosophy, the fact that the Jesuits have strongly influenced the colonization period. And they generally marked an essentially Thomistic philosophy, which had repercussions on the traditional Brazilian Philosophy of Law. However, now we have in Brazil as many schools of thought as it would be imaginable, or even more. The creativity is a rule, there, and the intellectual prejudice is almost absent...

Academically, legal philosophy was introduced when creating legal courses in Brazil (São Paulo and Olinda, the latter then transferred to Recife), by the Law of August 11, 1827 (five years after the establishment of the empire) through a chair of third year, Natural Law. But it seems that in São Paulo a interdisciplinary chair opened the classes, mixing Philosophy of law (represented by Natural Law) and Public Law, mainly Constitutional. The professor was a Portuguese, the Judge Avelar Brotero, brother of the Portuguese Professor of Botanics, that poses to history in Coimbra's botanic Garden. We may see Brotero with Christ cross in a large full body portrait in a main corridor of São Paulo's Faculty of Law.

However, also in Brazil the positivist wave grew during the nineteenth century in reaction to the 'scholastic' tradition, then having represented major role in the Faculty of Law of São Paulo and the one of Recife, whose leader was Tobias Barreto, in the decade 1870, although Tobias was against August Comte's ideas: actually, essentially influenced by Germanic literature. Rui Barbosa, intellectual and tribune which is still a myth, proposed replacing the chair of the Natural Law by Sociology.

And the Brazilian Republic (November 15, 1889), which adopted the Comtean slogan "order and progress", embracing the globe, while quenching chairs of Ecclesiastical Law, replaced coherently Natural Law by History and Philosophy of Law. This chair, however, does not usually constitute more than a precursor (little known, though) of the identification of legal philosophy and legal theory or methodology in formulations similar to those we now know well.

Advocates of legal philosophy in the classic way still existed, of course, like João Mendes Júnior and Soriano Sousa. Although already in 1905 an introduction to law, under the title The Truth as Rule Actions, had decisively attacked the already prevailing positivism, only since the 40s, and perhaps especially up in the aftermath of World War II, overcoming positivism at the philosophical level, will be consummated in Brazil.

The permanence of Thomistic thought in Brazil appears to us differently evaluated by the authors. If, for Nelson Saldanha, "his action produced a continuous line that was not interrupted ever leaving their mark on the social and political theory, as well as in the field of law", according to Miguel Reale, even overcoming of positivism, at the beginning in 1940, was made "without going back to the Natural Law of Thomist inspiration ». However, this author finishes significantly its glimpse of Brazilian legal philosophy of the last hundred years with a reference to this current, noting that "it deserves to be remembered significant inspiration of Thomistic studies' that highlights Tristan Athayde (pseudonym of Alceu Amoroso Lima), Edgar Godoi Leonardo da Mata Machado and Van Acker.

Nowadays, in addition, of course, we see the traditional flow and attractiveness of new analytical and neopositivists (the kelsenianism has a certain role too), plus the new wave of "alternative law", postmodern law, legal culturalism, neoconstitutionalism, pluralism, etc.. And even more specifically the legal tridimensionalism, current or confluence of currents that most associate with the image Brazil Jurisprudence.

But to what extent this last identification is not due to the enormous international prestige Miguel Reale?

VI. What is really in common?

We have to make a reflective pause: how can we say that the specific feature of a Lusophone Jurisprudence is either something politically and culturally common, or parallel pathways after the independence of Brazil? How to identify the Lusophone Jurisprudence? Only with a more European version, or a tropical readapted-Aristotelianism Thomism on law matters? These items seem really scarce and poorly differentiated while national or cultural legal philosophy. That traditional way is not the way...

In our various previous studies on these questions, we followed the trail of a possible specific Portuguese thinking in multiple authors, particularly between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. This is not the place to present the findings on each of them. In fact, the most salient elements in non academics (university professors also studied law, but in general seemed to prevail in cosmopolitan eclecticism, or adherence to a foreign idea more or less fashionable or subjective) were not Aristotelianism or Thomism, essentially, but more or less original (sometimes apt to provoke some estrangement between the lawyers, as is the case, among several possible, of the nomenclature used by Delfim Santos and Álvaro Ribeiro). In general, these authors were worrying about what we would call Justice, equity and the like.

But the question, in view of the actual data, is quite strong, and distressing.

The most important doubt is this one: is it fair, and scientifically suitable, acceptable, that someone (certainly acting with the best intentions, we may admit) may make a choice among the different manifestations of juridical philosophy in one country or group of countries, and using his or her own perspective (a subjective one), show subsequently the world a face of that country or culture in what concerns Jurisprudence that may not be shared by many people... in the limit, all the others? Is it fair to make that choice?

Again, the Portuguese evolution may be an illustrative and eloquent example.

We think not to be too far from the reality if we say that before the work of António Braz Teixeira (correspondent member of the Brazilian Academy of Letters), only a certain kind of works seemed to be admitted as being part of Portuguese philosophy. It seemed that it was a movement, a school, with a certain programmatic and even ideological aim. However, after the studies of this thinker, a contemporary one, it seems that Portuguese philosophy changed: now, it is generally conceived as all the speculative thought exposed in Portuguese, in principle made by Portuguese citizens... Because it cannot be Portuguese philosophy some philosophical works in Portuguese language but by other nationals from other countries... And there are many African countries with Portuguese as official language, apart from the case of Brasil, East Timor and other parts of the world where it is not official language but it is spoken, like Macao, in China (at least partially) or Galicia, in Spain, acording to some observers...

But even this new vision, more wide, more open, seems to bring us some problems.

First, authors like Silvestre Pinheiro Ferreira, Portuguese by language and nationality, but also very close to Brazil (where he lived and ruled as a Portuguese minister of king John the VIth, from 1810 to 1821), wrote sometimes in French, and published books in France. Why should the French works of Portuguese (or Brazilian or others...whose mother Language is Portuguese) be aside Portuguese philosophy? This specific text itself, should it be put away from it, because it is in English? Does the vehicule, the language itself, although nicely emphasised always as "house of being" (Heidegger), is the mean more important than the message, the spirit of a national or cultural philosophy? Or may we suspect that the obstination in the language hides a certain vagueness of the substance? Terrible temptation, this last thought.

Secondly, Portuguese language is shared by many countries, as we know. If language is the most important, how can we distinguish a Portuguese philosophy from a Brazilian, an Angolan or a Timorease one? It seems that language is not enough. This leads us to a more complex question: would we prefer a multilinguistic paradigm, for example the bilinguistic one of Hisponamerican Jusrisprudence? Here the criterium would be a cultural one, although Portuguese and Castillan are two very similar languages. The main question, here, seems to be: either to build a step on a Lusohone Jurisprudence with a peculiar being, and then integrate it in a higher and wider Hispanoamerican Jurisprudence, or to connect directly all the different national philosophies or even atomistic philosophers or philosophic movements in a large net. Not a national one, even nor a linguistic first step. We may discuss the pertinence of this in philosophical, cultural, sociological and even geopolitical terms.

Thirdly, it is quite easy to put into Portuguese (or in Castillian... or in many other languages) with more or less skills and pains, a fully imported philosophy. A Portuguese mental translation of a foreign philosophy (and eventually very strange to the ways of Lusophone people: for example, a cold, purely rationalistic one, if we admit that our peoples are more sentimental, etc.) is of course possible. The question is: would it still be Portuguese, Brazilian, Angolan, etc... Lusophone philosophy?

Our personal answer is negative. But we must go further. We think that it is not profitable to think on a national or civilizational philosophy if it has nothing more than the linguistic common topic. It has to have some peculiar common soul, spirit, idea. The linguistic criterium is not enough at all.

It is possible that a Portuguese, a Mexican, a Brazilian, a Mozambican, a Chilean... write in English, in German or in Chinese. Of course they have to adapt to certain more or less peculiar aspects of the language they must use. But the container doesn't completely change the contained. And let's always remember that Spinoza, even Spinoza itself seemed to have thought in a language different from the languages he used to write. This is very important. One think is to think directly in one language, another one is to translate our own thoughts to another language. And even when the thinker thinks immediately in another language, the background of his or her mother language may be is still there. An hypothesis to the neurolinguists, at least.

We may use another language, but if we are faithful to our cultural roots, they still create their own civilizational centred philosophies.

Finally, if it is true that there are many similarities between some Portuguese and Brazilian philosophical authors, the constitution of a Luso-Brazilian jurisprudence still awaits for its theorists. And even more complicated seems to be a general Hispanoamericam Jurisprudence. Although this empire where the sun shines forever was maybe a version of the Vth Empire in the prophetic philosophy of Agostinho da Silva.

This general common jurisprudence risks to be very vague. But we are of course open to the possibility... Maybe it would be more cautious if we build first our national philosophies (the return to sovereignty seems to regain adepts in a world of impious globalisation), discovering its main features. After that, the next step would be to look for the family ties – first the Lusophone and then the Hispanoamerican.

But never forgetting that some national philosophies may have other connections. For example, the Portuguese one with the Mediterranean thinking, the South European thinking.

In this case, it is not a question of language only. Of course there is Latinity. But Latinity is only a part of the legacy of the old mare nostrum of the Roman Empire... Even other bounds are possible. Let's never forget that an agent of the French Convention said Portuguese would be, at the time, French, if they could not be Portuguese. Or let's remember that the best Portuguese elite of all times was from English-Portuguese birth: the sons of the Portuguese John the first and the British D. Filipa, from the house of Lancaster. And that "High Generation" was the seed of Discoveries... Many possibilities are possible, in what concerns social and cultural and sentimental affinities. But what we must have in mind in this context are the philosophical affinities.

Even without the American scene, Portuguese and Spanish thinkers should increase their dialogue, and go further not only in the archeology of freedoms, but also in the analysis of the thoughts.

We are nowadays, in all our countries, too fascinated with what comes from the main poles of the jurisprudence production, Germany and the Anglo-Saxon world. They are excellent, in their ways. But there is more, Horatio... Portuguese and Spanish and other languages thinkers have also thinkers. They may be original, and not only comments on those other ones, with more media reverence and best-sellers.

I am not purposing to make a new Tordesillas treaty, by which we Portuguese speakers and Castillan speakers would share the world. But I am certainly suggesting that we may think how to preserve our intellectual and even educational and editing traditions, in a world more and more formatted one way. And the intellectual globalisation is not at all ours, nor even flexible to our way of being and of thinking.

The fact we were supposed to be in Brazil speaking English among us is a very concrete illustration of what is happening to our civilization. A danger already propheticised some decades ago by the Brazilian sociologist Gilberto Freyre.

On how law is not like chess:
Dworkin and the theory of conceptual types

Ronaldo Porto Macedo Junior[1]

Abstract: The present article aims to show how the contemporary theoretical legal debate became a methodological debate and how Ronald Dworkin's thinking holds a central position in this debate. Dworkin arguments that law is an interpretive concept, it requires the establishment of an interpretive attitude towards its object. Thereafter, the analogy between chess and law is misleading and inappropriate, precisely for its inability to capture the interpretive dimension of law. As an alternative, Dworkin offers a different analogy, with the interpretive practice of courtesy. With a few changes from how Dworkin presents it, the author describes an argument to help illustrate how interpretive activity for "interpretive concepts" takes place.

The development of the interpretive theory of law as formulated by Dworkin, leads to a refutation of countless conventionalist theories of meaning and introduces a theory of controversy. He understands that conventionalism and the semantic sting are two core elements of the methodological failure that legal positivism represents. Law is an argumentative practice, its meaning as a normative practice depends on the conditions of truth of the argumentative practices that constitute it, it is impossible to engage in such a practice with archimedean viewpoints external to the interpretation itself. External skepticism towards interpretation is unrealistic in face of the inevitability of the interpretive engagement. The interpretive practice is established through three stages of interpretation: the pre-interpretive, the interpretive and finally the post interpretive or reforming stage. All of them with purpose of unveiling the meaning of the point of law's interpretive practice.

Dworkin answer his critics masterfully while incorporating central questions of contemporary philosophy in his theory and by doing, sets a paradigm for and illustrates the theoretical-philosophical problems that have been center-stage in recent years.

I. The contemporary methodological debate

It has become commonplace to acknowledge that the contemporary agenda of debate on legal theory has taken on a markedly methodological nature in recent decades, particularly in the Anglo-Saxon legal intellectual arena. Although this methodological trait fed by post-linguistic turn philosophy of language was already present in the work by H. L. A. Hart, I believe it gained new momentum and direction with the publication of the studies of law philosopher Ronald Dworkin. Dworkin radicalized and deepened some of these methodological topics and took on a leading role in the creation of the legal theoretical agenda of recent decades. The centrality of his work is due not only to its pioneering and the strength of his criticism, but also to the fact that it can be seen as a response to almost every new viewpoint and to many of the methodological subjects that have gained preeminence, even though it is not limited to this. In this sense, Dworkin's work not only makes a significant contribution to the construction of today's legal-theoretical agenda and casts the author as one of the most original thinkers therein, but also sets a paradigm for and illustrates the theoretical-philosophical problems that have been center-stage in recent years.

The Dworkian argument that law is an interpretive concept amounts to one of the great and innovative contributions the American philosopher has introduced into the legal-methodological. The view of interpretation he develops, however, is not to be confused with the hermeneutical approach of Max Weber and Herbert Hart.

One of the hermeneutical approach's distinctive traits is the importance it assigns to the issue of the meaning of action. Weber, for example, analyzes this issue by using chess as a preferred illustration. In fact, the analogy between law and chess has fascinated many legal theorists, and methodological positivists in particular. Despite the similarities between Weber's analysis and Hart's criticism of his predecessors, there are some differences between them that justify the comparison made in this paper. They concern how both define the meanings of the internal and external meaning of rules-regulated action and of intentionality. The Hartian theory of law is seated on an innovative analysis of the concept of rule and provides new methodological fundamentals for legal positivism. Notwithstanding, it retains from classic positivism a commitment to some of its basic arguments, particularly in concern with the thesis of the separability of law and morality, and with the descriptive nature of the theory of law. Ronald Dworkin harshly criticizes Hart's methodological compromise.

Several dimensions of the methodological debate Dworkin's work caused are dispersed across the various stages of the famed Hart–Dworkin debate, which has occupied countless legal theorists in recent decades. I believe that the central themes of the debate are still poorly understood. I believe that the debate established by theses authors, as well as its connection with the contemporary legal theoretical agenda is central for understanding the classic questions concerning the connection between law and morals, the descriptive or normative nature of legal theory and the role of intentionality in interpretative practices of interpretive concepts. Dworkin argues that the analogy between chess and law is misleading and inappropriate, precisely for its inability to capture the interpretive dimension of law. For this reason, he proposes the social practice of courtesy as a better model for understanding law. This shift, which I refer to as "From chess to courtesy," lies seated on a deep conceptual and methodological change that separates Dworkin from Hart and many of his predecessors.

Ronald Dworkin builds an interpretive theory of law. To this end, he deepens a conception of interpretation other than Hart's hermeneutical understanding, although the latter may be seen as a starting point for the former. The distinctive trait of the Dworkian concept of interpretation is how, on analyzing interpretive practices such as "courtesy", the theorist poses new and mighty challenges for his contemporaries. For Dworkin, interpretation as a creative and reconstructive endeavor, rather than "conversational" interpretation, or one intended to merely identify the agents' subjective intent, is the best means to understanding the nature of law.

For Dworkin, the correct understanding of grammar in our use of the conceptual language is a vital endeavor to both prevent philosophical misunderstandings and to view the genealogy of such misunderstandings. On the other hand, the distinctions are relevant in practice insofar as they affect how we practice law – in particular, how we interpret it in our everyday practices.

II. Dworkin and the theory of interpretation

> A main cause of philosophical disease - a one-sided diet: one nourishes one's thinking with only one kind of example. (Ludwig Wittgenstein)[2]

Dworkin understands that conventionalism and the semantic sting are two core elements of the methodological failure legal positivism represents. In his opinion, the challenge of the theory of controversy undermined the assumption of the purely descriptive, non-evaluative, intent of positivist theory of law, even in its Hartian-inspired hermeneutical version.

This central point in his criticism does not, however, completely deplete his methodological objection to positivism[3]. Dworkin offers a broader methodological challenge for several contemporary legal theories, besides legal positivism (such as realism, naturalism, pragmatism and some versions of moral and political skepticism), calling their approaches "Archimedean". As Stephen Guest notes, "You are an Archimedean skeptic if you believe that propositions cannot be true because nothing in the world – a fulcrum – arises due to the fact that the propositions can be shown to be true."[4]. It is based on this concept that Dworkin challenges all unengaged forms with non-evaluative and methodologically detached aspirations found in countless variants of these approaches. For him, it is a methodological error to intend to stand above the substantive and evaluative battlefield, above judgments of moral correctness.

Dworkin's criticism of Archimedeanism is grounded on two interconnected observations. The first states that certain social practices, to include law, are argumentative social practices. This is, for Dworkin, the distinctive trait of law relative to other social practices ("[…] the central and pervasive aspect of legal practice […]"[5]). The second observation concerts the dual – internal and external – dimension through which law can be seen. For him:

> Of course, law is a social phenomenon. But its complexity, function, and consequence all depend on one special feature of its structure. Legal practice, unlike many other social phenomena, is argumentative. Every actor in the practice understands that what it permits or requires depends on the truth of certain propositions > that are given sense only by and within the practice; the practice consists in large part in deploying and arguing about these propositions. People who have law make and debate claims about what law permits or forbids that would be impossible—because senseless—without law and a good part of what their law reveals about them cannot be discovered except by noticing how they ground and defend these claims. This crucial argumentative aspect of legal practice can be studied in two ways or from two points of view. One is the external point of view of the sociologist or historian, who asks why certain patterns of legal argument develop in some periods or circumstances rather than others, for example. The other is the internal point of view of those who make the claims.[6]

This internal view of those who make the claims in a complex and argumentative practice (as opposed to other non-argumentative social practices, such as a game of chess) demands a new standard for analog comparison. This is our next topic.

1. From chess to courtesy: a new model for law

At this point, it is worthwhile to return to two non-legal examples to clarify the dimension and meaning of Dworkin's statement. One example concerns chess. The game, as seen by Ross, Kelsen, Weber and Hart, involves a normative dimension. This means that, in order to understand the behavior of a chess player, we must understand that his actions are driven by the rules of the game of chess. For the very same reason, we may only say that an individual makes a chess play, or "plays chess", if the individual takes the rules of the game into account. Clearly, the player may be right or wrong, he may or may not correctly follow the game rules. To make a mistake in the game, however, does not mean not playing chess, unless, of course, the mistake itself is evidence that the game rules are not being taken into consideration at all. Let us now say that a cat walking on a chessboard should move a pawn from e2 to e4. It would be incorrect to say that the cat is playing chess. The animal's involuntary move is not regarded as a chess play, even if the move ("by chance") happens to be in accordance with the game's rules. The reason for this lies precisely in the fact that the animal does not take the normativity of the social practice in to consideration. After all, cats do not play chess.

Still on the same case, we might say that one is playing chess when one has mastered the technique of making moves according to the rules of the game as one has learned them (from lessons, observation, repetition, etc.). Knowing how to play is crucial to recognizing the social practice of the game. It is worth pointing out that a player may know how to play without ever having read a book on chess theory or even knowing the theory of the game at hand.

Unlike authors such as Kelsen, Hart, Weber and Ross[7], Dworkin never argued that the analogy between law and chess was particularly useful or enlightening for the theory of law. This relates in part to the fact that, even in his earliest criticism of the positivist model, Dworkin rejected the description of "law as a rules model". The main reason, however, lies in the fact that although chess is a social practice, it does not usually,

[7] Another exclusivist positivist might be added to the group: MARMOR, Andrei, 2006a. Also available at: MARMOR, Andrei. How law is like chess. USC Law Legal Studies Paper No. 06-7. Apr. 2006b. Available at: <http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=897313>. Viewed on: Sep. 7th, 2012. In this intriguing essay, Marmor – after defending a complex conventionalist theory of the rules of the legal game that involves deep conventions and surface conventions – writes: "As Hart himself seems to have suggested, the rules of recognition are very much like the rules of chess: they constitute ways of creating law and recognizing it as such. Once again, it is not my purpose to deny that the rules of recognition solve various coordination problems. They do that as well. It would be a serious distortion, however, to miss their constitutive function. The rules that determine how law is created, modified, and recognized as law, also partly constitute what the law in the relevant community is. They define the rules of the game, thus constituting what the game is. […] Let me sum up: the conventional foundation of law consists of two layers. There are deep conventions that determine what law is, and those deep conventions are instantiated by the surface conventions of recognition that are specific to particular legal systems. The concept of law is constituted by both layers of conventions. Our concept of law partly depends on the deep conventions that determine what we take law and legal institutions to consist in, and partly on the specific institutions we have, those that are determined by the rules of recognition. Basically, this is just like chess. Without the rules of chess, we would not have a concept of chess. But we can only have such a concept, because we already possess the deeper concept of playing competitive games, of which chess is just one instance. Both are profoundly conventional, and in this general insight, I think that Hart was quite right.", my italics.

at least in its pivotal cases, involve dispute on the interpretive concepts. Quite the opposite, in fact: it is almost natural and intuitive to consider the game based exclusively on its conventionally accepted rules or even rules set by and act of will from the agents.

In a 1965 paper on the thinking of Lon Fuller, Dworkin provides clues to the limitations involved in the analogy between chess and law by stating that:

> "An important qualification is now in order. So far I have been assuming that the standards locked in the concept of law are crisp, precise rules, the limits of their authority clear-cut and evident, and I have discussed their logic and their force on that assumption. But, of course, this is a false picture: these standards are matters of degree over some range of their application, are to some extent controversial, and are continually redefined in small and imprecise ways by the operations of institution and language which they regulate. In this way they are quite unlike the relatively precise and unmalleable rules of ordinary games. This qualification makes it more difficult, but also more important, to appreciate their special role in legal argument and reasoning. If the concept of law were as clear and uncontroversial as, for example, the concept of a move in chess or a play in bridge, we would not expect by analyzing it to improve our understanding of, or influence on, legal argument, because anything in the concept pertinent to that process would already be obvious to all its participants. There would then be point to the criticism that analysis of legal concepts cannot yield legal arguments, for appeals to the concept of law would be too obvious or too trivial to count as such. Controversies over the meaning of law are significant only because the strands making up the concept of law are difficult to isolate and require judgment to apply." [8]

In reality, unlike other practices such as law, chess does not involve and interpretive question in association with evaluative evaluations (not understood from a conventional evaluative angle[9]). For this reason, Dworkin's analogy involves an interpretive social practice: courtesy[10]. The analogy with chess reveals a different logical grammar than the one used in the game of courtesy. For this reason, it must give way to a new analogy. Dworkin abandons chess[11].

proper moral dimension. Commenting on the text of Lon Fuller on the inner morality of law (The Morality of Law New Haven, USA: Yale University Press, 1964. Revised Edition, 1972), notes that: "The canons of morality, of course, are criterial standards; they are addressed to those who make moral judgments or arguments and govern their success or failure. Like the canons of law, they may also be pertinent to the question of whether someone has behaved morally or immorally. If I harm you in some way, claiming myself justified because you broke some alleged moral rule which I invoke, then the fact that this 'rule' is self-contradictory or impossible to observe might count as a step in showing that what I had done was morally improper. But a failure to comply with the canons of morality is not, as such and for that reason, a moral fault [...]". Ao não realizar essa distinção e se valer de um conceito meramente criterial de moralidade, Lon Fuller incorreria num erro categorial que em textos posteriores Dworkin (especialmente DWORKIN, Ronald, 2006b) enfatizará: "If so, he is guilty of two confusions. First, and less important, he confuses related but not identical legal and moral standards. Second, and more important, he confuses criterial standards directed at determining whether some act has succeeded in producing a moral criticism, or a moral argument, with standards stipulating whether some act is moral or immoral, praiseworthy or blameworthy in character. If he is to establish his claim that compliance with the canons constitutes moral behavior, he must show his canons of law to be moral standards of the latter sort, instead of or as well as the former sort." [11] GUEST, Stephen, 2010, p. 67. He also observes a similar point when he asserts: "The fastest way to the interpretive concepts is through the idea of something 'having an intentionality' (point). Note that we can describe a practice without making any statement about the meaning or purpose of the practice. Thus, a purely descriptive report of chess game can take various forms, for example, in its simplest form, "pushing pieces on a board of wood" or, in a more refined one 'move pieces of wood in accordance with a set specific rules. A description like this tells us that this is chess, instead of saying that is, let's say, checkers, but fails to describe what many of us might consider some of the vital features of the game. We were short of a 'true' description here? Is anything else necessary? What additional ingredients would be required to make the description of the 'chess game' an adequate or 'true' description? What would make people happy? If I provide the details of the rules and then say that the sense of the game was to win, many people would agree. But I could, as many people do, go ahead and

One of the Dworkin's favorite language games to use as an analogy for law involves courtesy practices. With a few changes from how Dworkin himself presents it[12], the argument might be described as follows. Let us imagine a social normative practice involving an interpretive concept. Say that Francisco, a handsome young man, tells his friend Roberto that he invited a young lady to dinner the previous night and that each paid for his or her half of the bill. Roberto then criticizes Francisco, saying that he was extremely discourteous towards the young lady, since men are expected to pay the bill when they invite women out to dinner. Francisco disagrees with Roberto and says he was not discourteous at all, as his income is not greater than the young lady's and that he saw no reason for uneven treatment simply because she is a woman. He even argues that, in the past, he willingly paid a friend's bill because the friend in question was in financial trouble. However, he says, that was not the case in the dinner with the young lady.

Let us assume that the disagreement between the two is sincere and authentic and that, therefore, they were not just "shooting the breeze", or taunting one another for fun or to pass the time. They re-say that it is an intellectual game, which requires only intellectual strategies, no strategy how to make an opponent lose by disturbing him with the use of a false beard, for example. Or I could say that point of chess is the development of intellectual skills of the players and that victory was only incidental to that purpose. I could, in other words, offer many descriptions of the 'real' point of chess. Dworkin does not analyze the idea of in-depth description. For him, I think, it refers to a level of description that incurs relatively little controversy. He provides an example of a social practice of courtesy, to bow before a superior. " ":" GUEST, Stephen, 2010, p. 31-32, highlighted by me. It is noteworthy, however, that the assignment of an evaluative "point" to chess game somehow removes this practice of our clearest mental picture about it, since we usually imagine this game as an agreement between players without associating an evaluative "point". MARMOR, Andrei, 2006a, seeks to identify deep conventions presupposed in this practice. However, even if they only report the values (playing a good game) as conventional criteria of moral evaluation and not as moral evaluations per se.

[12] Dworkin, Ronald, 1986, p. 46-49, 68 et seq. In Dworkin, Ronald, 2005a and 1985, Dworkin examines another situation (language game) involving a debate about the objectivity of an aesthetic judgment on a novel by Agatha Christie. I explored a similar example concerning a dispute between friends about the aesthetic qualities of "action movies" Rambo IV and Clockwork Orange in MACEDO JUNIOR, Ronaldo Porto. Just like taking Ronald Dworkin seriously or how to fotograph a hedgehog in motion. In: GUEST, Stephen. Ronald Dworkin. Translation of Carlos Borges. Technical review of Rafael Rabelo Mafei Queiroz. ally had a disagreement "on the level of ideas" or concepts about the courteous or discourteous nature of Francisco's behavior the previous evening. We can imagine that the arguments provided by the young men could multiply and become more sophisticated. Let us imagine that Roberto counters by presenting a concept of "courtesy towards women" as follows: "being courteous towards a young lady means prioritizing her and offering her presents or favors." As paradigmatic examples to support the concept, he mentions the easily observed practice of men allowing women to step out first from, holding the car door open for them, not allowing them to carry suitcases and heavy parcels, offering them flowers and candy before a date, etc. With these examples, Roberto attempts to show that his view is appropriate and well suited to the social facts that he used as reference. Without denying the paradigms, Francisco replies that courtesy towards women involves expressing consideration of and respect to their dignity, a concept that also implies respect for the value of equality. He offers new paradigms in support of his ideas, listing situations where unbounded prioritization could seem offensive and undignified, as it might be symbolically construed as a representation of female inferiority. To illustrate, he mentions professional women who are offended by and deem it discourteous that they are never allowed or asked to carry heavy luggage, or to fully return acts of kindness when in the presence of men. Finally, he argues that his rival conception of "courtesy towards women" is superior to Roberto's, as it is more comprehensive and consistent (or coherent). The paradigm cases the two suggest are a proper fit for their respective conceptions. Roberto's conception, however, does not fit the paradigms Francisco lists. In fact, it challenges them, as unbounded prioritization and non-reciprocity would be recognized, at least in many paradigm cases, as examples not of courtesy, but rather of the lack thereof.

What is the meaning of this argumentative practice? Roberto argues that Francisco breached a rule of courtesy. Francisco understands the meaning of his friend's argument and chastisement, but disagrees. The suggested example is not a false dispute where two people disagree because they are speaking of different things. Quite the opposite, the dispute is sincere because each completely understands what the other means to say. However, they disagree as to the best way to understand the concept of courtesy.

Analysis of this example reveals the argumentative dimension of this practice. The central question that drives the two friends' argumentative social practice assumes the following question: what condition of truth would cause Roberto's proposition – "Francisco was discourteous" – to be true or false? Admitting the absence of a condition of truth, that is, that there is no criterion capable of assigning a truth value to the proposition, it would be difficult to understand even the behavior of the two. Of course, they might hypothetically be simply "simulating disagreement" as a means to pass time, to play at insincere taunts, or just to annoy one another. However, as I noted earlier, this is not the case at hand, this is not the hypothetical case we are building. In the suggested example, Roberto and Francisco argue about the best conception of the concept of courtesy[13].

In this case, what correctness criterion might signal that one conception is superior to the other? What might make Roberto's proposition true or false? Another point must be stressed here. Of course the two friends are not arguing over the best conception of the concept of courtesy based on a merely stipulative definition. Had it been stipulated that being courteous towards women always implies paying their bills, then there would be no dispute to settle. Roberto would be right by definition or by stipulation. In this context, the concept at hand is not criterial, but interpretive, as we will see ahead. In the case at hand, the dispute emerges precisely because the rule that determines the concept of courtesy is a social rule, that is, a rule that is intersubjectively constituted.

Their dispute is about the concept of courtesy as socially and normatively understood. In this case, the best conception of courtesy is the one that best interprets a real social normative practice, that maintains a certain fit with a set of socially shared practices serving as a metric or paradigm. But how to determine which concept of courtesy best meets the (socially admitted) requirements of what amounts to the "best conception"? The important thing now is not to go to greater depths into Dworkin's answer to the question. Certainly, this is not a conventional compromise, as the very criteria for what amounts to "the best interpretation" also involve an interpretive question. What is important is to realize that the criterion is argumentatively built, by means of reflection and methodologically regulated construction (assuming, for example, consistency, non-contradiction among arguments, clarity, leanness, simplicity, etc.) of the best arguments[14]. The arguments of Roberto and Francisco, therefore, will be better the more they meet the requirements of what makes a good argument, that is, the dimensions of fit and of the acknowledgement of the criterion's evaluative appeal. After all, "[…] a plausible interpretation of practice [...] must also undergo a test on two dimensions: it must fit the practice and prove its value or its purpose."[15]. Simply put, in the arrangement proposed earlier, Francisco would have offered a more satisfactory conception of "courtesy towards women," as it was more comprehensive and consistent with its paradigmatic practices.

[13] The distinction between concepts and conceptions became common in contemporary philosophical discourse, especially in moral debates. It is widely used by authors such as Hart (Hart, HLA, 1994a), Rawls (RAWLS, John, 1971) and Dworkin (Dworkin, Ronald A Special Supplement: The Jurisprudence of Richard Nixon, May 4, 1972, The New York Review of Books) and was originally highlighted by Gallie, W. B. Essentially contested concepts. Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society, New Series, Hoboken, vol. 56, p.167-198, 1956b.

The trait that sets the social practice or courtesy apart from the social practice of chess is that the former includes an evaluative-reflective practice on a certain value from the part of the agents (that is, the courtesy value), which is absent in the case of chess. In chess, the rules are made up of shared public standards, or social rules, to use the terminology of H. L. A. Hart. In the case of courtesy, the shared behavior standards are relevant, necessary, conditions, but not sufficient to correctly describe the grammar of the activity. For the Hartian understanding of chess, it would be sufficient to record what the players understood by the rules to which they were subject to be. The example of chess is perfectly appropriate to the understanding of how a criterial concept works, but is inappropriate to describe the functioning of an interpretive concept. Gerald [14]. DWORKIN, Ronald, 1986, p. 53: "But we should notice in passing how the constructive account might be elaborated to fit the other two contexts of interpretation I mentioned, and thus show a deep connection among all forms of interpretation. Understanding another person's conversation requires using devices and presumptions, like the so-called principle of charity, that have the effect in normal circumstances of making of what he says the best performance of communication it can be. And the interpretation of data in science makes heavy use of standards of theory construction like simplicity and elegance and verifiability that reflect contestable and changing assumptions about paradigms of explanation, that is, about what features make one form of explanation superior to another. The constructive account of creative interpretation, therefore, could perhaps provide a more general account of interpretation in all its forms. We would then say that all interpretation strives to make an object the best it can be, as an instance of some assumed enterprise, and that interpretation takes different forms in different contexts only because different enterprises engage different standards of value or success." The theoretical framework used by Dworkin are the works of Thomas Kuhn, specially KUHN, T. The structure of scientific revolutions. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1962.

Postema points out that Hart does not in fact explicitly exclude the reflective dimension. However, he does not assign to it any relevant meaning in his hermeneutical understanding of social practice[16]. This one of the reasons why he does not believe that comparing law with a game of chess is in any way inappropriate, as the comparison does not miss anything essential, contrary to what Dworkin claims. It is symptomatic that, in The Concept of Law, Hart always uses criterial concepts for examples, such as baldness, the summit of a mountain, and the concept of the Paris meter standard[17], instead of examples involving interpretive concepts.

In an argumentative practice such as the one illustrated by Francisco and Roberto's discussion of courtesy, the propositions of the arguing agents depend on the truth of propositions that only have meaning within that same practice[18]. An argumentative practice's distinctive trait is precisely the fact that it assumes the presence of arguments about the practices themselves. However, it is not simply the act of being courteous (in that case, to pay the young lady's bill or not) and the paradigmatic cases of courtesy – from which come the rules that give the participants reasons to act – that must be considered in an argumentative practice. Even the very action of arguing and challenging arguments about and evaluations of courtesy itself is part of the "courtesy game". An argumentative self-reflection exists here. The argumentation practices involved in the practices of courtesy only gain sense within the argumentative practices themselves, justifying and challenging meaning and conceptions of courtesy. Finally, the arguments about courtesy themselves are also parameters to determine what the best conception of courtesy is.

Gerald Postema accurately points out that

> […] No theoretical account of this kind of social practice can hope to be adequate to the phenomena unless it addresses fundamental questions that arise within this discursive activity of offering and assessing reasons. Such a theory cannot stand outside this practice without losing a grip on what is essential to the practice. An ex> ternal theory of the practice would be a theory of a quite different object, just as a purely physical theory of football articulated in terms of velocity, mass, etc. would have a different object than an account of its strategies would have. In particular, no theory that contented itself with reporting what participants took its rules to mean would be adequate.[19]

Therefore, for Dworkin, understanding an argumentative practice about an interpretive concepts involves understanding the meaning that agents lend to the values and arguments involved in these practices and, as a result, understanding the "internal" (pre-practice) interpretation done by the agents. When Francisco and Roberto discuss whether the behavior of the former did or did not breach a rule of courtesy, they do not report to the meaning they, personally, want to lend to courtesy, but to the meaning of courtesy in a certain shared social context in which they hold the discussion, which, finally, is embedded and referred to in a certain shared form of life[20].

Finally, for Dworkin, a philosophical theory of an argumentative practice will have many central aspects in common with that of a concrete practice. It will, however, be more abstract, as it includes an act of interpretation and theorization of the practice itself. It is worth noting that the practice will be normative (because it is governed by rules) and so will the theoretical activity itself. This is because, on the one hand, the construction of the best argument, the best justification and the best conception are also governed by rules (concerning what amounts to the best argument). On the other hand, it is also normative because it acts on the practices' normative criteria and, therefore, to a certain extent, regulates these criteria as well. In this sense, it involves a certain degree of self-reference or circularity[21]. The circularity, however, is not tautological, but interpretive.

[21] There is an inevitable hermeneutic circularity on Dworkin's thought, insofar as in an interpretative activity about an interpretative concept, we cannot lie completely outside the hermeneutic game. There isn't an exterior to the interpretation, an outsider's look, an Archimedean's point of view that allows us to describe from the outside of and interpretive enterprise carried on in these situations. That does not exclude, as seen in former chapters, the possibility of a hermeneutics' sense of action is exterior to the practice, as it was conducted by Weber. This path, however, does not lend itself to the interpretation of interpretative concepts, governed by a distinct "logical grammar". Cfr. DWORKIN, Ronald, 2011a, p. 123 et seq.; DWORKIN, Ronald, 1986, p. 53 et seq.; GUEST, Stephen. 2010, p. 29 et seq. On hermeneutic circularity, compare : "In any case, we can enquire the consequences that sciences' of the spirit's hermeneutics will suffer from the fact that Heidegger derives fundamentally the circular structure of comprehension from the temporality of presence. Those consequences do not need to be such, as if it applies a new theory to praxis and this last one is exerted in the end, in a different manner, in accordance with its art. They could also consist that the self comprehension constantly exerted has been corrected and depurated art of comprehension. That is why we will turn ourselves back into Heidegger's description about the hermeneutical circle, with the purpose of turning our own purpose into something fecundated the new and fundamental meaning that the circular structure gains here. Heidegger writes: 'The circle must not be degraded to a vicious circle, even if it is a tolerated one. Inside of it veils a positive possibility from a more original knowledge that, obviously, will only be comprehended from [271] an adequate manner, when the interpretation comprehends that its first, constant and last task remains being not receiving beforehand, by one 'happy idea' or by popular concepts, nor the previous position, nor the previous vision, nor the previous conception (Vorhabe, Vorsicht, Vorbegriff), but to assure a scientific theme in the elaboration of these concepts from the thing, itself (Heidegger, Ser e Tempo, vol. I, Petrópolis, Vozes, 1989, p. 210)." GADAMER, Hans-Georg. Truth and method. Traslation from Flávio Paulo Meurer. 4. ed. Petrópolis: Vozes, 2002. v. 1. p. 400. On the theoretical-juridical field this vision holds certain resemblance with the thoughts of Ernest Weinrib, who also recognizes certain circularity in the hermeneutical thought that goes "[…] from the law's content to the juridical immediate comprehension of this content, to an implied form in this comprehension, to the explicit elucidation of that form, to the test of the content's adequation to its form now explicit." 2 Law as an interpretive practice

For Dworkin, law is an interpretive practice because its meaning as a normative social practice depends on the conditions of truth of the argumentative practices that constitute it. It is not a system or rules tout court. It involves a complex web of practical articulations of authority, legitimization and argumentation. Argumentative practices, which are so typical of the daily working lives of lawyers, illustrate how the concept of law is controversial and subject to dispute, as is "the concept of courtesy towards women." Furthermore, the concept only makes sense if one can assume a value of truth for the sentences that enunciate it; otherwise, they would be no more than empty rhetoric. Roberto and Francisco disagree because each one believes himself to be right. Otherwise, they would not be actually disagreeing, but playing at disagreement. Likewise, in most cases (and certainly in their focal meaning), court arguments are arguments that must be taken seriously. This means that lawyers, the "players of the argumentative-legal game," acknowledge the meaning and possibility of a truth value for their arguments before the courts. The attitude is more typically and ideally perceived in the judge, as he or she, due to institutional neutrality and assumed absence of a material interest in the claim, more clearly acts according to his or her legal conviction[22]. Therefore, if some legal cynicism may be more commonplace in the "results-oriented" or "mercenary" practice of attorneys, the attitude is probably less frequent among judges. But even among results-oriented attorneys, moral cynicism, the offer of arguments without conviction, is recognized as normatively disputable, or "degenerate", indicating that the ideal of argumentative correctness for such professionals must also abide by a criterion of moral correctness.

It is worth emphasizing that this final point articulates with a second characteristic of the argumentative practice that, according to Dworkin, eludes the Archimedean views of rival theories. For him, legal practices occur within and impact a context. This contextual impact is measured and evaluated in moral terms. For this reason, the concept of [22] Stephen Guest enlights the conviction's concept rol in Dworkin's interpretativist model: If you cannot not believe in something, repeatedly and fully, you must believe in it. Not […] because your beliefs argument on its own truth, but because you cannot find any other argument that is a decisive refutation of a creed that it isn't even capable of harming. In the beginning and in the end, there is the conviction." GUEST, Stephen, 1997, p. 27 e 169, Cfr. Also DWORKIN, Ronald, 2011a, p. 68-70 e 153-154.

law is a political concept[23]. It is important to stress that what makes it political is the presence of a point in reference to a claim for moral legitimacy. This is not about acknowledgment of its political nature simply because it involves an influence from the interests articulated in the form of power[24] or because they report to a public differentiation between friends and enemies[25], bur rather a demand for moral legitimacy of the exercise of power itself. In Dworkin's words, "law is a political endeavor whose general point, if indeed it has a point, is to coordinate social and individual effort, or to resolve social and individual disputes, or to ensure justice between citizens and between them and their government, or any combination of the above."[26]

According to Dworkin, "The concept of law works in our legal culture as a contested concept [27], [...] because it provides a focus for disagreement on a certain range of issues, not a repository for what has already been agreed."[28]. Furthermore, "[…] it is a political concept because of the manner according to which it is contested. It acquires meaning from the use that is made of it: from the contexts of the debates on what law is and from what turns on which view is accepted."[29]. The argumentative and discursive nature of law, together with the fact that disputes and controversies are created within it about the best way to conceptualize concepts, lends law an essentially interpretive nature. In other words, the logical grammar of the legal game, in addition to involving a normative social practice, also implies that it is interpretive and not merely conventional.

One of the criticisms leveled against Dworkin's theory of controversy (based on the notion of contested concepts) was articulated by theorists like Leslie Green[30], who understood that the point of law was not moral in nature and merely involved eliminating controversy to ensure peace. This school of thought, which dates back to Thomas Hobbes, Hume and Bentham, understood that the purpose of law was to ensure peace by means of the certainty law provides[31]. For Dworkin, the explanation is not satisfactory because it is unable to explicitly explain legal practices and their assumed points. For him, law is the forum of principle[32], that is, the space for moral-political debate about the topics a community holds relevant. The point of the exercise of political power is driven by the objective of political justice. Note that this is not simply desirable, an ideal and abstract should be, but an intentional characteristic embedded in real legal practices. Clearly, this may mean to some that, being a contested concept, legal and political action is not intentionally driven by the concept of justice or by a specific concept of justice. This clearly may occur and frequently does. However, even if disagreement does arise between conceptions of justice that provide the telos, or purpose, of legal practices, this is not to say that the point does not exist. The common situation in contested legal practices is similar to the debate between Francisco and Roberto, where both agree that courtesy is essential at friendly dinners and represents an important aspect of social practice, but disagree as to what conception of courtesy provides the best interpretation of the concept of courtesy.

3. Interpretation according to Dworkin: the point of practices and the grammars of concepts

As we attempted to show, Dworkin's methodological criticism of legal thinking in the final decades of the 20th century revolved around the Archimedeanism assumed in the descriptivist approach, an approach conceived "from nowhere" that he assigns to his rival theorists and to positivists in particular. The semantic sting was one of his expressions and the emphasis given to his theory of controversy was one of Dworkin's main arguments in criticizing his rivals. The frame of "Dworkian agenda" would not be complete, however, without presenting the positive theory he proposed on how to overcome the problems Dworkin sees in the theories he criticizes. His response to the defects present in semantic theories was crystallized in his interpretive theory of law.

As pointed out earlier, Dworkin starts to build his interpretive theory of law in essays published in-between the books Taking Rights Seriously (1977) and Law's Empire (1986) and later collected in A Matter of Principle (1985). In Law's Empire, Dworkin recaps his arguments on objectivity and interpretation and develops them more systematically in a positive formulation of law as integrity. For the purposes of this paper, I am interested in more directly showing the discussion of the assumptions of his theoretical construction, his methodological response, rather than his specific, substantive, answers to topics of a moral, legal and political nature[33]. Despite their enormous relevance and the interest they attract, I will focus mainly on the methodological agenda they raise.

Ronald Dworkin says in How Law is Like Literature[34] (one of the short texts that, in my opinion, best describe his theoretical project) that legal interpretation can be understood as a particular case of the interpretive endeavor in general. It is very similar to literary interpretation, since in both cases the interpreter drives his or her actions in search of a point contained in the endeavor to be interpreted, be it literature or law. Dworkin writes in his essay that "[…] constructive interpretation is a matter of imposing purpose on an object or practice in order to make of it the best possible example of the form or genre to which it is taken to belong. [...] A participant interpreting a social practice […] proposes value for the practice by describing some scheme of interests or goals or principles the practice can be taken to serve or express or exemplify."[35].

The excerpt enables realizing that, for Dworkin, legal (and literary) interpretation requires the establishment of an interpretive attitude[36], which, as he rather emphatically notes, is a matter of imposing a purpose on an object or practice, a notion admittedly borrowed from Hans-Georg Gadamer[37]. This is obviously not about arbitrarily and subjectively selecting and imposing a purpose foreign to the nature of the practice being interpreted. Dworkin is referring to the required engagement of the interpreter with the constructive job of discovering[38], finding, describing and assigning a point to practice.

There is a second important aspect to this engagement that concerns the fact that interpreters "[…] characteristically understand that their practice must serve a constituent value of practice that each on assigns to the standard this value establishes (and not merely their understanding thereof)."[39] This engagement is therefore based on two as-

[39] According to Stavropoulos, "The first is the assumption that the practice of courtesy does not merely exist but has value, that it serves some interest or purpose or enforces some principle — in short, that it has some point — that can be stated independently of just describing the rules that make up the practice. The second is the further assumption that the requirements of courtesy — the behavior it calls for or the judgments it warsumptions. "[…] The first is the assumption that the practice of courtesy does not simply exist but has value, that it servos some interest or purpose or enforces some principle—in short, that it has some point that can be stated independently of just describing the rules that make up the practice."[40].

Secondly, the requirements of the practice being interpreted (for example, the practice of courtesy towards women, as mentioned earlier), the behavior it demands or the judgment it supports, "[…] are not necessarily or exclusively what they have always been taken to be but are instead sensitive to its point, so that the strict rules must be understood or applied or extended or modified or qualified or limited by that point"[41]. The remark can be made more concrete by returning to the previous example of courtesy towards women[42]. Firstly, it is easy to see that for both Roberto and Francisco courtesy is a value, a positive value. The statement that Francisco was discourteous therefore takes on the nature of chastisement in the imaginary dialogue. Furthermore, there is a point to courtesy. This point is essential to its correct conceptualization. Mere observation of the conventional rules of courtesy is a useful and important descriptive effort, but not sufficient to properly understand what courtesy is. The more controversial the case, the truer this is. The very non-existence of such a specific rule about Francisco's courtesy-related obligation of always paying the bill when he goes out with a young lady are evidence of a point that provides the parameters for the proper determination of the meaning and extent of the rule.

Secondly, the example shows that the meaning of courtesy towards women does not purely and simply mean what it meant in the past. The limits and meaning of courtesy towards women are importantly rants — are not necessarily or exclusively what they have always been taken to be but are instead sensitive to its point, so that the strict rules must be understood or applied or modified or qualified or limited by that point. Dworkin's two components capture two independent conditions, both of which must be satisfied. It is not enough that the practice be thought to serve some value (which would satisfy the first condition); further, the value must be taken to be constitutive of the practice, which is what the second condition amounts to. Together, the conditions have important consequences in respect of the practice's character." STAVROPOULOS, Nicos, 2003.

changed in a world grown morally less sexist and more egalitarian from the angle of gender relations. The point of courtesy therefore plays a crucial role in determining its current normative meaning.[43] This is the means by which one can understand the meaning of courtesy in its best light. This second element adds a critical and reflective dimension to meaning itself. The history of the practice constitutes the practice; but its criticism, which now becomes part of its history as well, transcends the past reference. The conceptual reconstruction of practice integrates the very metric used to evaluate and identify the practice[44].

Dworkin emphasizes that these two aspects of interpretation are independent and that not every social practice is interpretive in the strict sense he assigns to the concept. For him,

> The two components of the interpretive attitude are independent of one another; we can take up the first component of the attitude toward some institution without also taking up the second. We do that in the case of games and contests. We appeal to the point of these practices in arguing about how their rules should be changed, but not (except in very limited cases) about what their rules now are; that is fixed by history and convention. Interpretation therefore plays only an external role in games and contests. It is crucial to my story about courtesy, however, that the citizens of courtesy adopt the second component of the attitude as well as the first; for them interpretation decides not only why courtesy exists but also what, properly understood, it now requires. Value and content have become entangled.[45]

This excerpt clearly indicates the strict meaning of interpretation (which Dworkin will thereafter refer to as "interpretive" instead of "interpretative") that he finds in some practices – but not in others such as games and contests – that are similar to legal practices. The grammar of legal practices is not well described, as I noted earlier, by its mere comparison with the grammar of games like chess. In its grammatical structure, the game of law looks a lot more like the game of courtesy than chess. As Wittgenstein warned, to prevent the philosophical disease, we must avoid a one-sided diet whereby we nourish thinking with a single kind of example[46]. Dworkin proposes a dietary change.

In the interpretive-reflective game of law and courtesy, the value of the practice at hand becomes somewhat independent from conventionally accepted rules. Rules become conditioned on and sensitive to values themselves and their evaluative interpretation. In this way, interpreters may recognize that certain conventional and widely accepted practices may be wrong from the angle of the values that provide their basic point. Recognizing the criterion by means of which a practice must be evaluated is not o be confused with conventional practices pure and simple, nor do they merely translate dominant practices. Such shared practices provide a reference. However, understanding their point and identifying the best coherence[47] for certain practices and conceptualizations will depend on a more complex and reconstructive analysis. As Postema put it:

> The practice does not always make perfect and to assume that a practice serves a worthy value is not to assume that all currently accepted or historically enshrined aspects of the practice do so. A deeper understanding of the complex value or point served by the practice may lead participants to revise their understandings of what that practice requires or authorizes. And since interpretation is an integral part of the practice, this deeper understanding of the practice will alter their actions and potentially the practice itself.[48]

According to Dworkin, "[…] Interpretation folds back into the practice, altering its shape, and the new shape encourages further reinterpret at ion, so the practice changes dramatically, though each step in the progress is interpretive of what the last achieved."[49]. At this point, a return to the example of courtesy might lead to new conclusions. We could argue, for example, that even if Roberto were able to find repeated practices (and even a majority of them, in the context of the discussion) based on an etiquette of courtesy driven by traditional courteous behavior (such as listing the restaurants where men usually pay the bill, counting the number of times men yield to women at the elevator door, etc.), Francisco might still be correct in his interpretation of courtesy that would forever release him from paying the entire bill when he went out to dinner with a young lady. This might be case, for example, were he able to find arguments applicable to a significant portion of paradigmatic courteous behaviors that, consistently with the point of the practice, provided the best interpretation for it.

I earlier proposed that Francisco might argue that courteous treatment assumes treating women with dignity and equality and, that, as a result, automatic preferred treatment is often discourteous. This might be the case were he to invite a militant feminist to dinner who might understand the act of sharing the tab as symbolically offensive. Even if Roberto never accepted this argument and the dispute never saw a consensus, it would be accurate to state, under the circumstances, that Francisco was right and his critic was wrong. The criterion for correctness, from this angle, does not depend on consensus or certainty, but on the presence of better supporting arguments[50].

Obviously, the criterion for the correctness and truth of his argu-

[50] This point is important because it usually causes a lot of confusion. One thing is to affirm that there is no right answer to some question. Another one, distinct, is to affirm that we are not sure what the right answer is. Therefore, for example, we cannot be sure whether the 'Big Bang' occurred over eight billion years ago. However, even if it is slightly likely that we come to the certainty about such fact, we do not doubt the existence of a right answer to that matter. There are cases, nevertheless, in which we doubt the very existence of a correct answer, and not only about our certainty about what it consists in. Hart believed he had indicated, with his renowned example about not parking a vehicle in the park, such a situation. For Hart there is not a correct answer on considering or not a toy scooter a vehicle, since the rule that enunciates the prohibition is formulated through a language that possesses an open texture and, therefore, undetermined. In such case what we have is not the uncertainty or the doubt about the right answer, but the conviction that it does not exist. It is oblivious that a theory on truth that understands that correction is a synonym of certainty would not make such a distinction. However, our use of the language in general and in moral language suggests that this is a relevant distinction. About this point see WITTGENSTEIN, Ludwig. On certainty (Uber Gewissheit). Edited by G. E. M. Anscombe and G. H. von Wright. Translation by Denis Paul and G. E. M. Anscombe. New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1972.

ments would itself depend on other interpretive assumptions and unavoidably open to challenge. According to Francisco's argument, his justification would depend on the equally challengeable concepts of equality and dignity. In this sense, an interpretation's evaluation criterion has no outer aspect. The interpretation's challengeability or defeasibility, however, implies neither the absence of a correctness criterion, nor preference for one interpretation over others. Reconstructive interpretation must address any skeptic objections. Challengeability always leaves room for a consensual or even hegemonic interpretation to be challenged. The form of the challenge, however, as Dworkin will point out, must come from an interpretive viewpoint. Only a new (interpretive) interpretation may effectively challenge another interpretation. There is no room for an outside challenge, one from without the interpretive-argumentative game itself. The interpretive game does not admit Archimedean viewpoints external to the interpretation itself. One interpretation will only be superior to or better than another if, and only if, according to the rules of interpretive reconstruction, it better meets the requirements for what the best argument is. Note that the "concept of best argument" is also interpretive. The search for an evaluation criterion outside the interpretive game would be remindful of the imaginary hypothesis Wittgenstein described, where the reader of a newspaper doubted what he had just read and bought a second copy to verify the information[51]. In this sense, [51] This episode is remembered by Dworkin himself in Justice for Hedghogs, 2011a, p. 37-38, where he explores again the question about the possibility of an external justitication for a moral interpretation. "When are we justified in supposing a moral judgment true? My answer: when we are justified in thinking that our arguments for holding it true are adequate arguments. That is, we have exactly the reasons for thinking we are right in our convictions that we have for thinking our convictions right. This may seem unhelpful, because it supplies no in de pen dent verification. You might be reminded of Wittgenstein's newspaper reader who doubted what he read and so bought another copy to check. However, he did not act responsibly, and we can. We can ask whether we have thought about the moral issues in the right way. What way is that? I offer an answer in Chapter 6. But I emphasize there, again, that a theory of moral responsibility is itself a moral theory: it is part of the same overall moral theory as the opinions whose responsibility it is meant to check. Is it reasoning in a circle to answer the question of reasons in that way? Yes, but no more circular than the reliance we place on part of our science to compose a theory of scientific method to check our science. These answers to the two ancient questions will strike many readers as disappointing. I believe there are two reasons for this attitude, one a mistake and the other an encouragement. First the mistake: my answers disappoint because the ancient questions seem to expect a different kind of answer. They expect answers that step outside morality to find a nonmoral ac-

if an interpretation lacks an outer side, an external point of view capable of evaluating it, then its (interpretive) rejection will lack it as well. For Dworkin, external skepticism towards interpretations is impossible. The only viable and possible form of skepticism is the one represented by internal skepticism, that is, by the kind of skepticism that argumentatively attempts to show the inexistence of a better argument of criterion for the interpretive correctness of a certain practice[52].

Back once again to the dialogue on courtesy, we might argue that the only way for Roberto to show that Francisco's interpretation of courtesy is wrong would be by argumentatively deconstructing it. It would not be possible to argue, ex-ante, that a correct or superior interpretation does not exist. Such an endeavor, then, would be inevitably interpretive in and of itself. What would be impossible is to argue ex ante, from without, without engaging in the interpretive task, that no criteria exist to determine that a better interpretation exists. Insofar as interpretation assumes identifying the point and value of the principle or interest involved in the practice, interpretation becomes an unavoidable path. When we think about interpretive concepts such as courtesy, law, or the arts, we are bound to play the interpretive game. The Archimedean game is impossible. Trying to play the Archimedean game with inter-count of moral truth and moral responsibility. But that expectation is confused: it rests on a failure to grasp the in dependence of morality and other dimensions of value. Any theory about what makes a moral conviction true or what are good reasons for accepting it must be itself a moral theory and therefore must include a moral premise or presupposition. Philosophers have long demanded a moral theory that is not a moral theory. But if we want a genuine moral ontology or epistemology, we must construct it from within morality. Do you want something more? I hope to show you that you do not even know what more you could want. I hope you will come to find these initial answers not disappointing but illuminating. The second, more encouraging, explanation for your dissatisfaction is that my answers are too abstract and compressed: they point to but do not provide the further moral theory we need. The suggestion that a scientific proposition is true if it matches reality is actually as circular and opaque as my two answers. It seems more helpful because we offer it against the background of a huge and impressive science that gives the idea of matching reality substantial content: we think we know how to decide whether a piece of chemistry does that trick. We need the same structure and complexity for a moral ontology or a moral epistemology: we need much more than the bare claim that morality is made true by adequate argument. We need a further theory about the structure of adequate arguments. We need not just the idea of moral responsibility but some account of what that is."

pretive objects means to play a different game and not to talk about the same thing or interpret the same object. It is comparable to providing a sociological description when asked about the morality of a behavior. It would be similar to translating the question "was slavery considered morally correct in Greece in the 5th century b. C.?" as "was slavery morally correct in the 5th century b. C.?" The former question concerns the conventional morality (a fact) of the times. The latter concerns a value or non-value assigned to the practice of enslavement. It would be like saying that we were obligated to do something when we mean that we had an obligation to do something.

A new clarification may avoid confusion surrounding this argument. Clearly, up to a certain point, there may be an "external" sociological interpretation. Max Weber's comprehensive sociology, based on the assumption that values are irrational preferences and, therefore, mere rationally irreducible positive expressions of will[53], may yield an enlightening and useful analysis of many social practices. In general, much of the theoretical production of anthropologists and sociologists shares this dimension. It is also important to clarify that not all practices regulated by social rules have the strict interpretive dimension we find in courtesy, as they do not involve interpretive concepts. In these cases, in the absence of the dimension of value and principle, the kind of interpretation involved might dispense with the "circular" inner dimension I have described earlier. A hermeneutical sociological analysis (such as Weber's) might involve considering the "inner" meaning of the action in a detached manner not committed to the described "interpretive game".

In this sense, the Dworkian interpretation is not properly a rival of the classic sociological interpretation, as many critics – and Frederick Schauer[54] in particular – appear to suggest, but rather a philosophical approach to certain interpretive practices of a reflective, normative and evaluative nature, such as law. Classic sociological analyses may be highly relevant to the determination of the interpretive materials involved in legal practices. Their approach, however, is incomplete and limited to a part, or a moment, of the interpretive activity needed for an appropriate description of what law is. Dworkin does not intend - contrary to as Hart argues in the postscript to The Concept of Law[55] - to engage in a project separate from the Hartian law description project. He understands, however, that the appropriate description of law, given its unique characteristics compared to other, normative, social practices such as chess, demands a philosophical and reconstructive approach to the concepts and values that make up its evaluative point[56]. Games like chess form a subset of social normative practices that do not involve a reflective interpretive activity of and within the practice. As Postema summarizes:

[55] HART, H. L. A., 1994b, p. 301-302 (Postcript): "The legal theory conceived this way as if it is at the same time descriptive and general, constitutes an enterprise radically different from Dworkin's concept of juridical theory (or 'General Theory of Law', how he often designs it), conceived, partly, as an evaluation and justification's theory and as 'directed to a concrete juridical culture', which is usually the theorist's own culture and, in Dworkin's case, Anglo-American's law. The central task of juridical theory this way conceived is designed by Dworkin as 'interpretative' and it is, partly, evaluative, since it consists in the identification of principles that simultaneously 'adjust' better to the law established and to the juridical practices of a juridical system, or that show themselves in coherence whit them and also give the best moral justification to the same, showing, this way, the law 'in its best enlightment'. Footnotes were suppressed, highlighted by me. See the passage already quoted in this chapter DWORKIN, Ronald, 1986, p. 47-48.

[56] DWORKIN, Ronald, 1986, p. 47-48: "Everyone develops a complex 'interpretive' attitude toward the rules of courtesy, an attitude that has two components. The first is the assumption that the practice of courtesy does not simply exist but has value, that it serves some interest or purpose or enforces some principle — in short, that it has some point that can be stated independently of just describing the rules that make up the practice. The second is the further assumption that the requirements of courtesy — the behavior it calls for or judgments it warrants — are not necessarily or exclusively what they have always been taken to be but are instead sensitive to its point, so that the strict rules must be understood or applied or extended or modified or qualified or limited by that point. Once this interpretive attitude takes hold, the institution of courtesy ceases to be mechanical; it is no longer unstudied deference to a runic order. People now try to impose meaning on the institution — to see it in its best light — and then to restructure it in the light of that meaning." DWORKIN, Ronald, 1999, p. 57-58.

> It follows that the case for the appropriateness of constructive interpretation for understanding a given practice must follow a precise protocol. It must be shown that an apparent regularity is not merely a matter of habitual behavior, but normative, and not merely normative, but reflective, and not merely reflective but internally critical in a way that supports the interpretive attitude. Clearly, to show that constructive interpretation is indicated for a given social practice is already to engage in interpretation – and that interpretation may be contested. Dworkin would surely not deny this. [57]

According to some critics, the negative consequence of this interpretive conception of law is that it disregards the institutional dimension. For positivists in general, law is a social practice based on the institution of an authority, be it as the sovereign power constituted by regular obedience (Austin), be it as the recognition of exclusionary reasons to obey (Raz). For them, this essentially institutional dimension of law made the analogy with chess far more convincing. For positivists, although the normativity of law is partially reflective, normative interpretation and arguments are deemed external to the practices that constitute law. They are, at the most, "[…] investigations that explore the grounds to support or amend the rules, but do not offer considerations in favor of conclusions about that the rules of the practice currently are"[58]. As a result, some positivists have accused Dworkin of offering an unacceptable argument, since its explanation would require them to accept something they deny, that is, that internal normative reflections exist in the game of law. Andrei Marmor represents this kind of criticism when he argues that Dworkin, on formulating his criticism of positivists, relies on an interpretive assumption they do not accept. In this sense, the Dworkian critique begs is inappropriate (question begging), as it does not offer an argument opposite the positivist perspective, but assumes the thesis it aims to prove[59].

This might lead to the conclusion that the struggle between positivists and non-positivists, such as Dworkin, would not be appropriately comparable, insofar as they emerge from different starting points. The two offer different constructions that are, to a certain extent, irreconcilable, as their starting points cannot be directly confronted or challenged. The Dworkian response to this is surprising and ingenious. Although it may appear purely rhetorical at a first glance, it does not seem to counter even the dominant attitude between the contemporary advocates of positivism and Dworkin himself. The central issue to be answered, Dworkin says, is this: which of the two interpretive approaches (external or internal) is more illuminating for legal practice? The answer to this question, again, can only be interpretive. On the one hand, it depends on the existence of better interpretive criteria capable of showing its fit with the reality one wants explained. Ultimately, the existence of a best-fitting approach depends on the integrity and fit of the theory as a whole, that is, of its ability to answer a series of philosophical challenges in an articulate, coherent and integrated manner. In a very particular way, the best approach should be judged based on its ability to provide satisfactory answers to central questions of contemporary philosophy, such as the possibility of objectivity in morals, the normative criteria for the construction of a theory of justice, etc.

Dworkin offers a more concrete answer in his rejection of the analogy of chess to explain law. In Law's Empire he argues that a more comprehensive observation of law allows identifying court decision patterns over a longer period of time[60]. Such an observation would allow spotting changes in legal rationality patterns that cannot be explained based on a conventionalist assumption. The best understanding we can achieve of those implies identifying the internal criticism movement that affected them[61]. A correct interpretation of the history of law itself and the changes its rationality underwent showcases the internal nature of the normative criticism of law. In other words, the conventionalist explanation fails because it does not fit well with a correct interpretation of the history itself of legal practices. An appropriate interpretation of legal interpretive materials over a longer period of time would show this inadequacy. This is an important dimension of Dworkin's interpretive theory for the history of law.

Postema summarizes this point for Dworkin as follows:

[60] DWORKIN, Ronald, 1986, p. 136-138.

[61] In a very similar sence, at least in this aspect, are the thoughts of François Ewald (See Létat Providence. Paris: Grasset, 1986) in his reconstruction archeological-genealogical of law's rationality of civil responsability law in french law and the formation of social law.

> Lawyers, judges, and legal academics did not merely challenge the conventional, accepted ground-rules; they challenged the underlying "orthodoxies of common conviction" in which the more superficial agreement on the rules was rooted. However, these arguments "would have been powerless, even silly," Dworkin maintained, "if everyone thought that the practices they challenged needed no support beyond convention or that these practices constituted the game of law in the way the rules of chess constitute that game" (Law´s Empire, p. 137). Over its history, the substance of the practice of American law, for example, has changed in profound ways, but much of this was driven by internal argument, challenge, and adjustments to them. Over its history, judges in the American legal system, for example, treated the techniques they use for interpreting statutes and measuring precedents—even those no one challenges—not simply as tools handed down by the traditions of their ancient craft but as principles they assume can be justified in some deeper political theory, and when they come to doubt this, for whatever reason, they construct theories that seem to them better. (Ibid., p. 139) Dworkin, then, rested his case for the strongly interpretive approach to legal practice on an interpretation of its history. [62]

4 Stages of interpretation

Finally, it is important to point out that Dworkin attempts to show how the stages of constructive interpretation are established. Although their purpose is chiefly heuristic ad didactic, they help understand the structure of the interpretive process. Each stage has a distinctive requirement for the level of consensus needed for interpretation. As shown earlier, during the analysis of a given social practice, such as courtesy, law or art, there must be a pre-interpretive stage that identifies the rules and standards or paradigms deemed to provide the experiential content of the practice[63]. In the case of courtesy, this stage involves gathering the interpretive material made up of common practices, paradigms, examples, illustrations of courtesy as portrayed in literature, film, etc. In the case of the determination of a film's aesthetic qualities, the stage involves identifying a consensually recognized repertoire as exemplary cases of "film", "action film", "good action film," etc. These materials allow identification of the paradigms of the practices at hand – for example, the film "2001: a space odyssey" as a paradigm for a "good science fiction film."

It is worth stressing that, in a sense, this "pre-interpretive" stage already involves some degree of interpretation. Dworkin clarifies: "I write 'pre-interpretive' in quotes because, even at this stage, some kind of interpretation is needed. Social rules lack identifying labels."[64] This early phase involves a more intense sharing of the materials. As Dworkin writes, "But there must be a high degree of consensus – perhaps an interpretive community may be usefully defined as needing consensus at this stage – if one expects the interpretive attitude to be fruitful and one can, therefore, abstract from this stage in ones analysis, assuming that the classifications it offers are treated as a given in everyday reflection and argumentation."[65]

After this early stage comes an "interpretive stage" in which the interpreter relies on a general justification for the main elements of the practice identified in the "pre-interpretive" stage. This will amount to an argument about the reasons why, if at all, it is worth searching for a practice with this general form[66]. This interpretive moment now takes on an argumentative dimension. In this sense, "[…] The justification need not fit every 7 aspect or feature of the standing practice, but it must fit enough for the interpreter to be able to see himself as interpreting that practice, not inventing a new one." The important point to emphasize is, as noted earlier, that at this stage judgments are made about the fit and justification (or evaluative appeals) that form the heart of the interpretive conception.

Finally, Dworkin indicates a post-interpretive, or reforming, stage at which the interpreter "[…] adjusts his sense of what the practice "really" requires so as better to serve the justification he accepts at the interpretive stage."[67] He offers an example: "An interpreter of courtesy, for example, may come to think that a consistent enforcement of the best justification of that practice would require people to lip their caps to soldiers returning from a crucial war as well as to nobles.[68]". At this point, however, some challengeable possibilities can be found: "Or that it calls for a new exception to an established pattern of deference: making returning soldiers exempt from displays of courtesy, for example. Or perhaps even that an entire rule stipulating deference to an entire group or class or persons must be seen as a mistake in the light of that justification"[69].

Of course, in real society, the stages would be less evident and stark. Notwithstanding, one might establish a similar analysis of its practices. How might we recognize these criteria for a given society's rules? Dworkin's response is clearly Wittgensteinian[70]: "People's interpretive judgments would be more a matter of seeing at once the dimensions of their practice a purpose or aim in that practice, and the post-interpretive consequence of that purpose."[71]. This is how agents "pick up the rule". "And this seeing would ordinarily be no more insightful than just falling in with an interpretation then popular in some group whose point of view the interpreter takes up more or less automatically."[72] In other words, there are no "ultimate grounds" for this recognition. It is the sharing itself of a form of life that will enable the members of a community of meaning to "see" how the criterion exists and works.

[70] Let's compare it with the meaning by which this rule is recognized. WITTGENSTEIN, Ludwig, 2009, § 197: "'It's as if we could grasp the whole use of a word in a flash.'— And that is just what we say we do. That is to say: we sometimes describe what we do in these words. But there is nothing astonishing, nothing queer, about what happens. It becomes queer when we are led to think that the future development must in some way already be present in the act of grasping the use and yet isn't present.—For we say that there isn't any doubt that we understand the word, and on the other hand its meaning lies in its use. There is no doubt that I now want to play chess, but chess is the game it is in virtue of all its rules (and so on). Don't I know, then, which game I want to play until I have played it? or are all the rules contained in my act of intending? Is it experience that tells me that this sort of game is the usual consequence of such an act of intending? so is it impossible for me to be certain what I am intending to do? And if that is nonsense—what kind of super-strong connexion exists between the act of intending and the thing intended?——Where is the connexion effected between the sense of the expression 'Let's play a game of chess' and all the rules of the game?—Well, in the list of rules of the game, in the teaching of it, in the day-to-day practice of playing.". Ver também, da mesma obra, § 138: "But can't the meaning of a word that I understand fit the sense of a sentence that I understand? Or the meaning of one word fit the meaning of another? — Of course, if the meaning is the use we make of the word, it makes no sense to speak of such 'fitting.' But we understand the meaning of a word when we hear or say it; we grasp it in a flash, and what we grasp in this way is surely something different from the 'use' which is extended in time!"

This, however, will not avoid controversy. After all, people may not see exactly the same things, or may interpret things in different ways. Disagreement, therefore, may arise either in the recognition of the paradigmatic practice and the rule or, even more so, when arguing about the best justification of the latter. What then, is the level of sharing or consensus needed to enable such an interpretation? Dworkin's answer is once again inspired in the Wittgensteinian concept of form of life. The excerpt below sums up his thinking rather well:

> We can now look back through our analytical account to compose an inventory of the kind of convictions or beliefs or assumptions someone needs to interpret something. He needs assumptions or convictions about what counts as part of the practice in order to define the raw data of his interpretation at the pre-interpretive stage; the interpretive attitude cannot survive unless members of the same interpretive community share at least roughly the same assumptions about this. He also needs convictions; about how far the justification he proposes at the interpretive stage must fit the standing features of the practice to count as an interpretation of it rather than the invention of something new.[73]

In this excerpt, Dworkin clearly shows how and why convictions are part of the interpretive attitude. They are constituents of the inevitable human and intersubjective point of view such an attitude involves and assumes. There is no room for a "view from nowhere." As Dworkin likes to insist: "The interpretive situation is not an Archimedean point, nor is that suggested in the idea that interpretation aims to make what is interpreted the best it can seem. Once again I appeal to Gadamer, whose account of interpretation as recognizing, while struggling against, the constraints of history strikes the right note."[74].

In order to survive, an interpretation must fit the form of life of the community in which it is presented. It would be appropriate, however, to ask how to measure the fit of an interpretation. How to tell when a good interpretation better fits the reality it attempts to describe? Dworkin once again explains using the example of courtesy: "Can the best justification of the practices of courtesy, which almost everyone else takes to be mainly about showing deference to social superiors, really be one that would require, at the reforming stage, no distinctions of social rank?". He proceeds: "Would this be too radical a reform, too ill-filling a justification to count as an interpretation at all? Once again, there cannot be too great a disparity in different peoples convictions about fit; but only history can teach us how much difference is too much."[75].

The excerpt clearly shows that there is an external, transcendental criterion from without the social practice that may serve as a metric for fit. But how and why will history teach us? Through the confrontation of interpretive practices and the production of "interpretive materials" that will enable us to justify the best interpretation possible of them. In other words, there is no outer side of the interpretive process[76].

Finally, it is important to once more emphasize the active role of convictions on the values that govern the social actions being interpreted. Therefore, insisting on the previous example:

> He will need more substantive convictions about which kinds of justification really would show the practice in the best light, judgments about whether social ranks are desirable or deplorable, for example. These substantive convictions must be independent of the convictions about fit just described, otherwise the latter could not constrain the former, and he could not, after all, distinguish interpretation from invention. But they need not be so much shared within his community, for the interpretive attitude to flourish, as his sense of pre interpretive boundaries or even his convictions about the required degree of fit.[77]

Substantive convictions, therefore, establish a requirement of sharing (or consensus) other than that required in the "pre-interpretive" phase. This is because the field of controversy on the various conceptions of a single concept is vast and unavoidable. Many will claim that the meaning of practice is the one lent by the agent's personal intent. One might, therefore, ask: if the courteous meaning of an action is given by the conviction of the agents, how to avoid subjective interpretation? If Francisco's courtesy depends on his own conviction as much as Roberto's depends on his, how to assign a value of truth to the proposition that the former was discourteous? In order to answer this question one must first clarify the relationship between the point of social practices and how it connects with the forms of life in the community in which they acquire sense.

5 Practical intent and forms of life

One of the recurring questions in interpretive discussions concerns the meaning of the point. In the domain of artistic interpretation, a consolidated debate exists on the topic. We might ask, as Dworkin himself did, whether artistic interpretation inevitably consists in uncovering an author's intentions. We might also ask whether uncovering an author's intentions is a factual process independent from the values of the interpreter himself.

Dworkin answers that artistic interpretation is not simply about recovering an author's intention: "[…] if by "intention" we mean a conscious state of mind and do not lend the statement the meaning that artistic interpretation always attempts to identify a specific conscious thought that coordinated the entire orchestration in the author's mind when he said, wrote, or created his work."[78] Artistic intention is far more complex. This is due to the fact that, in artistic interpretation, the notion of the author's intention, when it becomes a method or style of interpretation, itself implies the interpreter's artistic convictions[79]. Furthermore,

[79] DWORKIN, Ronald, 1999, p. 70; DWORKIN, Ronald, 1986, p. 57. To Dworkin, "The work of art presents themselves to us as holders – or at least they intend – of a specific value that we call aestethic: this way of presentation is part of the idea of artistic tradition." DWORKIN, Ronald, 1999, p. 72-73. The way of seeing the debate among critics explains why some periods of literary activity are more associated than others with the artistic intention: its intellectual culture entails art's value more firmly to the process of artistic creation. Cavell observes that "[…] in modern art, the problem of author's intention […] has taken a more visible role, in our acceptance of their work, than in previous periods […]'and that '[…] the poetry practice is transformed in the XIX and XX century in such a way that the questioning the intention […] are imposed to the reader by the poem." CAVELL, Stanley. Must we mean what we say? Nova York: Scribner, 1969. p. 228-229. Therefore, our dominant style of interpretation has settled down in the author's intention, and the discussions, inside that style, about what it is, more precisely, the artistic intention reveal doubts and divergences more refined about the nature of the creative genius, about the conscientious and unconscientious and about what is instinctive in even within the tradition of artistic interpretation, the theory according to which the best way to interpret art is through the artist's personal intentions is subject to challenge[80]. Besides, this would prevent artistic interpretation from being neutral and objective, as the interpreter would have to explore someone else's motives and purposes. Finally, this does not appear to be the way in which we use language when we speak of artistic interpretations. After all, "[…] it is characteristic of such practices that an interpretive statement is not just a statement about what other interpreters think."[81] The question stands, therefore.

How could this form of interpretation ever hope to uncover something like an author's intention, be it in the arts or in any other form of social activity, without implying either the impossibility of objective interpretation or pure subjectivism? Dworkin counters the challenge as follows: "Two possibilities exist. One might say that interpreting a social practice means to uncover the purposes or intentions of the other participants in the practice, such as the citizens of the hypothetical community, for example."[82] In this case, the intention would refer to each intention taken individually. But another possibility exists: "Or that it means to uncover the purposes of the society that houses this practice, conceived as having some mental form of life or group awareness."[83] The former alternative seems more appealing, as it does not involve somewhat mysterious concepts like "mental form of life or group awareness". But the alternative is not viable for the reasons provided in the foregoing paragraph. The latter alternative, then, must be chosen. A preliminary distinction must be made, however. "A social practice creates and assumes a crucial distinction between interpreting the acts and thoughts of individual participants, in that sense, and interpreting the practice itself, that is, interpreting what they do collectively."[84]. In this respect, Dworkin resumes the social meaning of the rules that create patterns for the evaluation of behaviors and values. As Wittgenstein, Winch and Hart argued before him, rules are social.

its composition and expression. In the artistic interpretation, the interpret must "[…] firstly remember a crucial observation of Gadamer, that the interpretation must put in practice an intention." DWORKIN, Ronald, 1999, p. 67; DWORKIN, Ronald, 1986, p. 56, highlighted by me.

Dworkin ponders that "[…] this distinction would be of no practical importance if the participants in a practice always agreed on how to best interpret it. But they do not, at least on details, when the interpretive attitude is lively."[85] At this point we return to the different levels of consensus that must be found at the various stages of the interpretive process as seen in the previous topic. This, however, is far from meaning that a basic, background, consensus need not be present among the participants, who > […] must, to be sure, agree about a great deal in order to share a social practice. They must share a vocabulary: they must have in mind much the same thing when they mention hats or requirements They must understand the world in sufficiently similar ways and have interests and convictions sufficiently similar to recognize the sense in each other's claims, to treat these as claims rather than just noises. That means not just using the same dictionary, but sharing what Wittgenstein called a form of life sufficiently concrete so in at the one can recognize sense and purpose to what the other say a and does see what sort of beliefs and motives would make sense of his diction, gesture, tone, and so forth. They must all speak the same language'' in both senses of that phrase. But this similarity of interests and convictions need hold only to a point: it must be sufficiently dense to permit genuine disagreement, but not so dense that disagreement cannot break out.[86]

In short, for the interpretation process to occur and in order recognize "intentions" that do not merely translate subjective purposes, the interpreters must share a single form of life. This sharing is at the same time, and almost paradoxically, what enables and ensures disagreement[87]. Returning to the argument of the previous item, one may claim, as Dworkin did:

> So each of the participants in a social practice must distinguish between trying to decide what other members of his community think the practice requires and trying to decide, for himself, what > it really requires. Since these are different questions, the interpretive methods he uses to answer the latter question cannot be the methods of conversational interpretation, addressed to individuals one by one, that he would use to answer the former. A social scientist who offers to interpret the practice must make the same distinction.[88]

Finally, it is worth pointing out another contrast between Dworkin's position and Max Weber's hermeneutics. For the former, merely reporting the opinions and values of a community and how these beliefs affect their behavior might amount to a kind of hermeneutical sociological "explanation",

> But that would not constitute an interpretation of the practice itself; if he undertakes that different project he must give up methodological individualism and use the methods his subjects use in forming their own opinions about what courtesy really requires. He must, that join the practice he proposes to understand; his conclusions are then not neutral reports about what the citizens of courtesy think but claims about courtesy competitive with theirs.[89]

In other words, sociology does not perform the same kind of interpretation required in the contexts of creative, artistic or social interpretation. This also means that because sociological interpretation lies seated on a conversational interpretation model, is inappropriate to interpret law from the angle of the theory of law. For Dworkin, > […]Conversational interpretation is inappropriate because the practice being interpreted sets the conditions of interpretation: courtesy insists that interpreting courtesy is not just a matter of discovering what any particular person thinks about it. So even if we assume that the community is a distinct person with opinions and convictions of its own, a group consciousness of some sort that assumption only adds to the story a further person whose opinions an interpreter must judge and contest, not simply discover and report. He must still distinguish, that is, between the opinion the group consciousness has about what courtesy requires, which he thinks he can discover by reflecting on its distinct motives and purposes, and what he, the interpreter, thinks courtesy really re> quires. He still needs a kind of interpretive method he can use to test that entity's judgment once discovered, and this method cannot be a matter of conversation with that entity or anything else.[90]

Starting in the 1990s, Dworkin attempts to clarify the scopes and domains of these different ways of interpreting law, by introducing new conceptual distinctions to help explain the meaning of a sociological, jurisprudential and doctrinal understanding of law (that is, relative to the truth value of legal propositions). Analyzing it, however, would excessively expand this paper's scope and ambition.

III. Conclusion

[90] DWORKIN, Ronald, 1985, p. 64-65. translated and highlighted by me; DWORKIN, Ronald, 1999, p. 79-80. Dworkin plunges into this quention in a long footnote (nº 14) enlightening how he reaches to such conclusions. "Habermas observes that social science differs from natural science for just that reason. He argues that even when we discard the Newtonian view of natural science as the explanation of the theory-neutral phenomena, in favor of the modern view that a scientist's theory will determine what he takes the data to be, an important difference nevertheless remains between natural and social science. Social scientists find their data already pre interpreted. They must understand behavior the way it is already understood by the people whose behavior it is; a social scientist must be at least a 'virtual' participant in the practices he means to describe, lie must, that is, stand ready to judge an well as report the claims his subjects make, because unless he can judge them he cannot understand them, (See Jürgen Habermas, I The Theory of Communicative Action [T. McCarthy trans. Boston, 1984 at 102-11) I argue, in the text, that a social scientist attempting to understand an argumentative social practice like the practice of courtesy (or, as I shall claim, law) must therefore participate in the spirit of its ordinary participants, even when his participation is only 'virtual'. Since they do not mean to be interpreting each other in the conversational way when they offer their views of what courtesy really requires, neither can he when he offers his views. His interpretation of courtesy must contest theirs and must therefore be constructive interpretation rather than conversational interpretation." DWORKIN, Ronald, 1985, p. 422, highlighted by me. DWORKIN, Ronald, 1999, p. 78. Dworkin atributes this same orientation in the direction of a constructive interpretation of history per se, in opposition to the conversional interpretation also to Habermas. Against the Dilthey's historical Archimedianism, "Habermas makes makes the crucial observation (which points in the direction of constructive rather than conversational interpretation) that interpretation supposes that the author could learn from the interpreter." DWORKIN, Ronald, 1985, p. 420; DWORKIN, Ronald, 1999, p. 63.

Chess is a game that develops the chess-playing intelligence.
(Millôr Fernandes) [91]

This paper attempts to show how the contemporary theoretical legal debate became a "methodological debate" and how Ronald Dworkin's thinking holds a central or noteworthy position in this debate. The methodological nature is expressed in several ways. It manifests itself by means of the incorporation of a series of contemporary philosophical questions regarding the concepts of objectiveness, certainty and truth.

The 1985 publication of Dworkin's Law's Empire was a new milestone for this agenda. In the book, Dworkin develops some of the ideas introduced in several previous essays, the principal among which were republished in the book A Matter of Principle. In it, Dworkin introduces his interpretive theory of law. To do so, he develops a detailed analysis of the concept of interpretation that is its cornerstone.

For Dworkin, there are many kinds of social action. Some social actions are driven by conventional interests or objectives. Others, however, are driven by values and demand interpretation from agents. The interpretation of values requires interpreters to recognize a distinctive kind of point. Dworkin's favorite example to illustrate the idea resorts to the analysis of literary interpretation. In this kind of interpretive practice, which is commonplace among literary critics, interpreters oppose interpretations that assume some kind of aesthetic hypothesis. Similarly, Dworkin argues that law requires a evaluative interpretive type of practice and this, in turn, requires interpreters to formulate, even if provisionally, a political and justice hypothesis. This is why Dworkin abandons the chess metaphor. Chess is a social practice that does not involve the existence of a evaluative point. Law has grammatical characteristics that are essentially different from those of chess, and to insist in the comparisons would involve insisting in a philosophical mistake.

An important corollary of the development of the interpretive theory of law as formulated by Dworkin, as well as of the concept of interpretation he uses, consists of the refutation of countless conventionalist theories of meaning and the introduction of a theory of controversy, which appears to be essential to an accurate and appropriate understanding of the legal phenomenon. For Dworkin, when two interpreters become involved in an interpretive dispute about evaluative concepts (later renamed interpretive concepts), they must share some identification practices and paradigms to enable identification of the values involved. This sharing, however, is frequently not enough to establish a convention to eliminate dispute about the best way to interpret the meaning of a certain value. The interpretive endeavor therefore involves a second moment at which rivaling conceptions of a single concept may compete in an effort to provide the best interpretation. That one that shows the best fit and that best recognizes the evaluative appeal in question must be recognized as the best (correct) conception of the concept. Clearly, the best interpretation does not depend solely on the existence of a social convention that recognizes it as such, even if it does require some manner of shared practices and a common "form of life". What it demands is the existence of better supporting arguments or justifications (better fit and attention to the evaluative appeal) and that they may be reconstructed by means of the shared practices that provided their reference at an initial interpretive moment. The analysis of the concept of courtesy attempted to illustrate how the interpretive activity for "interpretive concepts" takes place".

Compatibility of the moral foundation of Law in Kant with the theory of reflective judgment and the Kantian theory of revolution

Maria Lucia de Paula Oliveira

Abstract: The Arendtian interpretation of the political philosophy of Kant considers the aesthetic theory of judgment, as formulated by the Philosopher in the Critique of the Power of Judgment, as the true basis for his political philosophy. For her, the Kantian theory of law is incompatible with the political philosophy founded on the theory of reflexive judgment. Considering the Kantian system as a whole, it is possible (and indispensable) to combine the theory of law (that presents the Universal Principle of Right as one of the more important concepts) with the aesthetical theory of judgment, in its political dimension, as presented in Arendt´s thought. The Kantian theory of revolution illustrates very well the political dimension of an aesthetic judgment. The paradoxical relationship between Kant and the French Revolution elucidates how it is possible to identify an ethical dimension in the revolutionary process.

Keywords: Immanuel Kant. Judgment. Revolution.

One of the striking features of Kantian philosophy is his systematic concern. Thus, since the great issues of Kantian philosophy reflect his critical effort, it's natural to expect that it gives undeniable attention to justice and aesthetic issues as relevant parts of his philosophical system. As long as the judgment of justice is a practical judgment, inserting the system of law in the core of Kant's pure practical philosophical system, the aesthetic judgment will stem from a faculty called power of judgment, which has a special status in Kant's philosophy. They constitute different aspects of the criticism (critique) of reason, making it impossible to mix up these two very different kinds of judgment. Nevertheless, in Kant's political philosophy it's possible to approximate aesthetics to law. Inside Kant's theory of Revolution, we can find a privileged "locus" to make us understand that proximity.

Kant´s effort to ground the rights on reason - undertaken in the Doctrine of Right - drives him to see natural law as a compound of "immutable principles" that should guide positive legislation. As a matter of fact, Kant´s legal philosophy does not have a retrospective scope, but a prospective one: Kantian Rational Right does not intend to explain society´s historical origins, but starts off from its reality and its necessity to talk about a legal order according to reason[1]. That legal order, though, does not aim to substitute virtue or to fight for the metamorphoses of the human condition, with the regeneration of human finiteness[2]. From then on the enunciation of a rational and universal principle, the Doctrine of Right starts presenting a system of law that ends up in the public rights, which supposes not only stable legal relations among people, but also a public power that can keep these relationships granted. A private right is the right of a natural state - peremptory right - which can only be granted by an established State. For Kant, in opposition to what happened in other modern systems of natural law, a private right is a right of the state of nature. Therefore, private law comes before political societies. The state of nature is not an anti-social or a-social state; but a State where the public authority grantor of rights does not exist.

Therefore, the right to owning property and individual rights overlay the very right to create a civil State - which supposes everyone's freedom is united in accordance with an universal law; whereas the postulation of the practical pure reason is that everybody has the power of having as an object external to his or her free choice as their own. There is, thus, a foundation for coercive state power which precedes the different kinds of freedom granted by the state, consistent with the universal principle of right. As the different kinds of freedom must coexist, according to the universal law, in a fair State where peremptory possessions reign, nobody then - explains Kant - would be obliged to recognize propriety, if that which is his or hers is not recognized by the others.

The formation of a civil State means the emergence of public law and of a private right granted by the State. Legal obligations do not change when moving from the rights of natural State to the civil State. But Kant explains that public law brings within it, the means to enable the coexistence of different kinds of freedom regulated by private law.

The state of nature is an insecure state, overcome with the emergence of the civil union. In that state of Nature there are already human associations, as the family or the human association established by contract, for example. The rights of the state of nature will remain after the organization of a political order.

In the state of nature, though, there is an unlimited external freedom. So, this state is potentially violent, since nobody is safe from their own violence. Kant comes thus to the conclusion that the first principle man should decree is that it is a duty to leave the state of nature, submitting ourselves to an external limitation - agreed on by all - where that which is mine or yours is established by law. That state of nature, though, is not (rather than what happened with Hobbes) a state of violence or injustice; but a state devoid of justice "in which, when rights are in dispute (ius controversum), there would be no judge competent to render a verdict having rightful force…"[3]

That social contract which founds the political order is different from other kinds of contract:

> The union of many for some (common) end (that all of them have) is to be found in any social contract; but that union which is in itself an end (that each ought to have) and which is therefore the unconditional and first duty in any external relation of people in general, who cannot help mutually affecting one another, is to be found in a society only insofar as if it is in the civil condition, that is, constitutes a commonwealth. 4

The reason to constitute the State is an obligation and "the supreme formal condition" of all legal obligations that, besides disposing that which belongs to every one in particular, it also ensures that, which belongs everyone, against the intervention of others. The original contract is "a rational idea" which, actually, has a practical reality: "... namely to bind every legislator to give this laws in such a way that they could have arisen from the united will of the people..."[5]. The legal state is formed by establishing a relation of citizen subordination to the powers of the city, where there would be a contract where "everyone (omnes et singuli) within a people gives up his external freedom in order to take it up again as a member of a commonwealth, that is, of a people considered as a state (universi).".[6]

In the Idea for a Universal History with a Cosmopolitan Aim, Kant defends man´s natural disposition to entirely develop itself, not as an individual person, but as a species, with the use of reason. He also states that it is the unsociable sociability of men - a tendency to come into Society, but attached to a great disposition to isolate himself and to want to manipulate everything in his own way, is what awakes all human strengths. It is by means of this antagonism that man gives his first step from brutality to culture, reminds the philosopher: "…thus all talents come bit by bit to be developed, taste is formed, and even, through progress in enlightenment, a beginning is made toward the foundation of a mode of thought which can with time transform the rude natural predisposition to make moral distinctions into determinate practical principles..."[7] That´s why, Kant concludes, the biggest problem of human kind would be an attainment of a civil society which grants the rights, allowing natural dispositions to flourish.

The command of reason that makes man leave off his unsociable sociability - pertinent to the state of nature - does not, indeed, take man´s society to a political order of any kind; but to a constitutional order able to permit reason, through law, to pile up all forms of legislation inherited from: tradition, customs and the power of prejudice. Two years later, in Perpetual Peace these principles are fully repeated in the enunciation of the basic values of a republican Constitution. The principles which will rule over this "civil state" are: "1) The freedom of every member of the society as a human being. 2) His equality with every other as a subject. 3)The independence of every member of a commonwealth as a citizen."[8] The kantian republican State rules itself by two important principles: the principle of the separation of powers and the principle of popular sovereignty, combined with political representation.

Civil and political freedom supposes that nobody can be constrained to be happy in their own way, "but each one is allowed to search for happiness the way they feel like, under the condition it does not harm the freedom of the others (that is, the rights of others) to look forward to a similar goal, that can coexist with each one´s liberty, according to the possible Universal Law". It is not the State - says the philosopher - that should decide how citizens shall be happy. Kant criticizes that what would be called the "paternal government", as the worst form of despotism - opposite to the "patriotic government", in which the rights of the State is preserved by means of common welfare laws: civil liberty and political liberty are linked in such a way (because it is with the citizens participation in the elaboration of the Political Will), that we can avoid a despotic State - the one which does not preserve the individual spheres, imposing on them its own conception of common welfare. Civil equality is reflected in the equality among citizens, which is incompatible with privileges of birth or slavery. Such equality is not, indeed, translated into a total egalitarianism, because "every member of a commonwealth must be allowed to attain any level of rank within it (that can belong to a subject) to which his talent, his industry and his luck can take him..."[9] Concerning civil independence, Kant states that the citizen should not keep a relationship of dependence that would stop him from participating - independently from others' will - in the life of the community. The passive citizens have a right in the civil state, though: "...whatever sort of positive laws the citizens might vote for, these laws must still not be contrary to the natural laws of freedom and of the equality of everyone in the people corresponding to this freedom, namely that everyone can work his way up from this passive condition to an active one."[10]

There would be a principle of the practical reason that could dictate we´d rather obey the actual legislative power (Kant reinforces the theory of the tripartite separation of powers into legislative, executive and judicial), no matter the origins. In a gesture that provokes a lot of surprise, the philosopher condemns the rights of resistance. To him, subjects (vassals) would not have any power to resist the sovereign: "Moreover, even if the organ of the sovereign, the ruler, proceeds contrary to law, for example, if he goes against the law of equality in assigning the burdens of the state in matters of taxation, recruiting and so forth, subjects may indeed oppose the injustice by complaints (gravamina) but not by resistance."[11] The justification for the inexistence of Peoples´ power to resist to the power of the State would assent, at first, in the fact that the legal state is only possible by submission to a universal legislative will, and it cannot contemplate in itself the disposition to legitimate a self disobedience. Therefore, both the rebellion and the revolution are in contradiction with the principle of right. Nevertheless, says Kant, after the success of revolution, by establishing a new constitution, people must submit themselves to a new order of things as good citizens. There is something else, though, that would determine the impossibility of the existence of the right to resist, since rebellions or revolutions have to be done in secret and would oppose to the public use of reason, which believes that right of free speech is a great instrument not only for the progress of knowledge, but also to make the development of human organizations possible.

Leonel Ribeiro dos Santos[12] reminds us of a fact already observed by many well reputed interpreters: Kant´s conception of moral law would have been inspired by Rousseau´s theory of the General Will. The underlying basic conception would be the idea of the subject [individual person] as the author and the subject [vassal] of the law, which would grant autonomy and liberty, because submission to law is only that which is self-imposed. To Kant, the autonomy of moral acting is grounded in the conformity of the action or of its maxim to the moral law. Freedom must be thought in reference to moral law, in the formula of the Universal Principle of Right ("Any action is right if it can coexist with everyone´s freedom in accordance with a universal law, or if on its maxim the freedom of choice of each can coexist with everyone´s freedom in accordance with a universal law"[13]). "The kingdom of ends" is a kantian notion of (at first sight, unsuspected) important political connotation. (The philosopher explains that "kingdom" is the systematic connection of various rational beings through (by the means of) common laws; reason why "if we abstract from the personal differences of rational beings as well as from all the content of their private ends shall be able to think of a whole of all ends in systematic connection..."[14]). The possibility of the "kingdom of ends" is what allows the autonomy of the maxim and its harmony with a universal legislation, granting an organic view of the moral world. To Kant, the State which would correspond to that "kingdom of ends" would be one in which people would submit themselves to the laws given by the People themselves. Furthermore,

Kant would have seen in the French Revolution, exactly a "historical sign"[15] of the political achievement of the ideal of a "kingdom of ends". Concerning it, there is an important consideration made by Kant in the notes of the Critique of the Power of Judgment:

One can, conversely, illuminate a certain association, thought on that is encountered more in the idea that in reality, by means of an analogy with the immediate ends of nature that have been mentioned. Thus, in the case of a recently undertaken fundamental transformation of a great people into a state, the word organization has frequently been quite appropriately used for the institution of the magistracies, etc., and even of the entire body politic. For in such a whole each member should certainly be not merely a means but also a end, and, insofar as it contributes to the possibility of the whole, its position and function should also be determined by the idea of a whole. [16]

From what has been exposed, it would be possible to identify the homology between the logics of Politics and the logics of morality, that might be clearer with an attention to the rationality of political judgment and of political community, which could get clearer also with an investigation of the political meaning of Kant´s aesthetics. In Kant´s Philosophy, reason establishes a community - be it from a theoretical, from a practical or from an aesthetic viewpoint. Kant opposes isolation and selfishness with a plurality and a sense of community indispensable to sanity of reason. As Leonel Ribeiro dos Santos reminds us, in many of Kant´s thoughts, we find the question, many times implicitly put: why do we have the tendency to communicate to others our thoughts?[17] Would there be a drive for communication to guide our understanding, which would be indispensable to it: reason should be shared, my judgments should be appreciated by others, there must be a reciprocity in the use of reason, that because - Kant says – that usage is not only a right of each one´s, but a duty in relation to the community of men, "colleagues in the great counseling of human reason" – in Kant´s words[18]. It is clear here that the "universal validity" searched for by his philosophy, beyond its transcendental dimension, has an undeniable political meaning. It might be in the aesthetic judgment that the community feature of Kant´s reason would be more evident. In a first appreciation, that cannot be confirmed, the aesthetic judgment, for its singularity, could seem the one mostly against an universality.

With the Critique of the Power of Judgment, the power of judgment becomes an object of central preoccupation for Kant, and so it does the imagination, which turns out to be not only reproducer, but also producer. That imagination produces concepts, out of which it is not possible to have any knowledge. There is then an activity "with concepts", but which does not produce knowledge: it is the aesthetic judgment. Kant himself reminds us that there where reflective judgment (in which I come from the singular to reach the universal; opposite to the determinate judgment, in which the particular is a derivation of the universal) can be apprehended in the best model way as possible is exactly in the pure aesthetic judgment. The singularity of the judgment of taste is tied to its own nature of reflective judgment. Furthermore, it is indispensable to the pure judgment of taste not to be interested in the existence of the object, be that interest focusing knowledge or morality, or even the utility of the object. The lack of interest of the judgment of taste does not mean indifference or a contempt of what is being judged, but that to aesthetics judgment it is demanded a distance kept from the subject in relation to the object being judged: something is not judged beautiful or sublime, if we are worried with its utility or with its measures or with its moral correctness.

Nevertheless, Kant says that the one who judges something beautiful or sublime, place an intention of universality that is almost a plea. Even though it is an unalienable expression of a judgment of a subject, in its empirical singularity, such a judgment always pleases universally and that´s why, just because of it, there could be the pure judgment of taste. The judgment of taste supposes a kind of communicability, searching for accordance with the other subjects; an accordance which does not ground itself in any concept. The aesthetic subject is totally emancipated from any determinate concepts. In reference to the Gadamer reading, we could say "In the aesthetic plan, an attempt would have been made for the possibility of an autonomous and creative existence of its own destiny, a task that the philosophy of history and politics would further herd with his project."[19] Art would be, in its symbolism, an attempt to experience liberty and on the other hand, a prime experience of a new portrait of liberty: the liberty without obligation determined by law, since in aesthetic judgment that which is relevant is the free and harmonious play between faculties (imagination and understanding). The universal consent in the judgment of taste will only come spontaneously. The sensus communis, seen like a community sense, has a groundwork which is transcendental; not simply empirical. The enlarged thought - this capacity to place oneself in all possible viewpoints to appreciate a specific question, is not exclusive to the Theory of Taste, but it turns out to be an especially important field to Kant because we would not have objective principles which we could trust, taking into consideration its own singularity of judgment. We might not be speaking improperly to the light of the Kantian system, when stating that in the political judgment the subject should also, in some way, put itself in all viewpoints possible, such as to abstract from its personal and subjective conditions. Moreover, so it is driven by a community feeling. Being so, there would not be any heresy in the proximity between Political rationality and aesthetics done by Arendt in her reading of the Critique of the Power of Judgment. But, if it is this way, it gets crucial importance in the context of Kantian thought his philosophy of law, introduced later with the Doctrine of Right - first part of The Metaphysics of Morals.

By means of reason´s astuteness and of a pedagogical sense, a "Revolution of Reason" would happen, but without the need of the use of violence, to establish the new way of doing philosophy or knowledge, as well as a new way of moral and political existence, related to the conditions of human-beings as rational and finite (in the contingence of the experience of the world). The political program of Aufklärung would get new expression in the general context of Kantian philosophy and in its consequences to the theory of the power of judgment. First, such a program would comprise the intellectual emancipation of humanity through the exercise of free thought. But the condition to fulfill such an emancipation would be the exact political power and institutionalization which provides for the free circulation of ideas, because as Kant had already made clear in the What is the Enlightenment?, the simple freedom of thinking would not reach the public use, without that condition. The search for such an emancipation and the change in the organizations, though, demands a reform looking ahead of the establishment of a Republican State. The State reformed in those models would preserve the freedom of thought, and also granting it the possibility to go against it. In The Conflict of the Faculties, Kant previews that the faculty of philosophy - as the granter of the search for the truth - would have to be free and not submitted to legislation of the government. A criticism of the government itself must be allowed as well as to ongoing public affairs[20].

On the other hand, that reforming attitude would put in evidence the polemic Kantian position in relation to the French Revolution. Actually, according to the existing biographical reports, Kant used to have a special interest into the happenings of the Revolution. Indeed, philosophers contemporary to Kant, like Fichte and H. Heine, made the association between the ideas spread in Prussia by the works of Kant and the ideas underpinning the French revolutionary process. Viriato Soromenho-Marques reasonably highlights that the interest and the affinity of the existing ideas do not reflect themselves, though, in a clearer statement in the work of Kant on the French Revolution, which may only be clearly explained by the political censorship imposed to Kant after publishing The Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone.[21] A first reference to the Kantian work on French Revolution is exactly that in the notes of the Critique of the Power of Judgment quoted some paragraphs above, in which the philosopher uses the organic model to describe the State in which a vassal is a citizen. It evidently means a pleasant remark of what was going on in France. In a second moment – coincidently the time when Robespierre had access to the power – we find Kant not so much in favor of the historical facts that had occurred. In the Doctrine of Rights, the philosopher is emphatic:

> Of all the atrocities involved in overthrowing a state by rebellion, the assassination of the monarch is not itself the worst, for we can still think of the people as doing it from fear that if he remained alive could marshal his forces and inflict on them the punishment they deserve, so that their killing him would not be an enactment of punitive justice but merely a dictate of self-preservation. It is the formal execution of the monarch that strikes horror in a soul filled with the ideal of human rights, a horror that on feels repeatedly as soon as and as often as one thinks of such scenes as the fate of Charles I or Louis XVI. But how are we to explain this feeling, with is not aesthetic feeling (sympathy, an effect of imagination by which we put ourselves in the place of the sufferer) but moral feeling resulting from the complete overturning of all concepts of right?22

[22] KANT, I. "The Metaphysicas of Morals", in Practical Philosophy, 6:320.

Such a quote is paradoxical: from one side, excludes any sympathy he could ever feel towards a formal execution of a monarch; conversely, a feeling of moral hue – kind of unexplainable to Kant himself – would come out provoked by some harm to the principles of Law underlying such an act (a formal execution of a monarch would be offensive to the necessity of a principle of Political order, as an imperative of reason, translated into a principle of right). In any case, Kant shows us the conviviality of two forms of judgment: the aesthetic and the moral one. Viewed from one angle in The Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone, Kant, in a certain point, forgives the people for the first excesses made in the name of freedom:

> I grant that I cannot really reconcile myself to the following expressions made use of even by clever men: "A certain people (engaged in a struggle for civil freedom) is not yet ripe for freedom"; "The bondmen of a landed proprietor are not yet ready for freedom"; and hence, likewise; "Mankind in general is not yet ripe for freedom of belief." For according to such a presupposition, freedom will never arrive, since we cannot ripen to this freedom if we are not first of all placed therein (we must be free in order to be able to make purposive use of our powers in freedom). The first attempts will indeed be crude and usually will be attended by a more painful and more dangerous state than that in which we are still under the orders and also the care of others; yet we never ripen with respect to reason except through our own efforts (which we can make only when we are free).23

It is right that, as already stressed here, Kant had to keep himself in the limits of the political viewpoint of what would be admitted and not censured by Prussian government. It seems, though, that the double treatment to the question by the philosopher does not come only from a strategy to get away with the censorship. Actually, Kant´s attitude in relation to French Revolution is really double under the moral viewpoint, any revolution would be prohibited, since it would risk dissolution of the State, which in turn would offend the principle of Law. Kant, in the Doctrine of Right, does not even admit the right of resistance. In his conception, for a State to have the right of resistance, it should have a public law that could predict it, and such a prediction would be contradictory, for it would be the people giving themselves the power to disobey the laws established by the sovereign (that would represent people´s own will. Moreover, any rebellion or revolution would not encompass the principle of publicity, being probably planned in secret, which would not be in accordance to the "political moral" attitude, argued by the philosopher. On the other hand, since he does not have the least sympathy towards the executed monarch, he was undeniably excited about the Revolution.[24] Kant states something along this line in The Conflict of the Faculties:

> This revolution, I state, comes across, though, the animus of all the spectators (who are not found entangled in that game), with a participation according to the desire, in the frontier of the enthusiasm, which manifestation was, indeed, linked to danger that, as consequence, cannot have any other reason, unless the moral disposition to human kind.25

Kant certainly values the sublime as a symbolic representation of the good, that because the feeling of sublime in nature could not be thought without connection with a thought disposition similar to the moral disposition. As Paul Guyer explains, we could say that beauty and sublimity symbolize different aspects of human autonomy. The freedom of imagination in the experience of the beautiful would represent our potentiality to be free from the determinism of the impulses and inclinations, whereas the most painful experience of the sublime would remind us that we only reach our potential of liberty by means of a thorough submission to our most human inclinations to the principle of the pure practical reason.[26] There is a direct influence of the Aesthetics experience on our affections and inclinations, with an evident symbolic meaning and also of moral knowledge, even if it cannot and should not be translated into a reduction and a confusion of the beautiful or of the sublime to the good and vice-versa.

Thereof, Kant states that the enthusiasm (the idea of good with an affection) is interesting because "enthusiasm is aesthetically sublime, because it is a stretching of the powers through ideas, with give the mind a momentum that acts far more powerfully and persistently than the impetus given by sensory representations", not confusing it with a simple affection which is blind.[27] But, says Kant, it is sublime the animus which follows emphatically his immutable principles, having by his side only the complacence of pure reason. This mentality is called noble, producing not only astonishment, but also admiration, because it does not cease with the novelty. It does not mean to admit the feeling of sublime as relevant, to preview, then, an emotionalism or sentimentalism. Many times, the strength of something is in its contention and subtleness: enthusiasm is productive, but not an exaltation, or an unstill passion. Simplicity is "as if a style of nature and of morality in the sublime". About the moral law Kant says that "... It is utterly mistaken to worry that if were deprived of everything that the senses can recommend it would them bring with it nothing but cold, lifeless approval and no moving force or emotion"[28]. It is not allowed to run the risk of exaltation, that is "a delusion of being able to see something beyond all bounds of sensibility", "rave with reason":

> In enthusiasm, as an affect, the imagination is unreined, in visionary rupture, as a deep-rooted, oppressive passion, it is unruled. The former is a passing accident, which occasionally affects the most healthy understandings, the latter is a disease that destroys it. 29

The enthusiasm of those who watch French Revolution (that, even if episodic, it is not incompatible with a "healthier understanding") are signs of morality. The spectator of this "moment of our time that tries out the tendency of morality towards human kind", thinks about it without a goal and takes part in its approbation, in an enthusiastic way. That enthusiasm, defined as participation in the good with passion should not be fully approved, exactly because it is an affect. But, from the viewpoint of Anthropology, says the German philosopher, it has its role, since the "... real enthusiasm always refers to a sole idea and, evidently, purely moral; the concept of law, for example, and cannot engraft on its own interest."[30] Kant, indeed, consistent with such an understanding, states in the Doctrine of Right that, despite the inexistence of the fight of rebellion, if a revolution is well done and thereafter comes a new government, it is to this one that the people must obey. It follows that a political action thereafter a reflective judgment would bring the future possibility of a moral legal order and more in accordance with the principles of morality and of law. Political change (which is not reduced to a political reform of minimal proportions) evokes a reflective judgment (expressed many times by an aesthetic judgment of admiration), by the unpredictably and by the radicalism of the experiences there implied. The good political change inexorably means the establishment of a legal and Political Order which is fairer.

A new rhetoric for a new justice and democratic order[1]

Marco Antônio Sousa Alves[2]

Abstract: The democratic experience is closely related to the practice of argumentation. There is no democracy without exchanging views and search by persuasion or convincing. Democratic practice has, therefore, a clear rhetorical dimension, understood as the pursuit of agreement or consent of a certain audience. In other words, we should not talk about democracy when decisions and political choices necessarily emanate from an evident premise or simply reflect the will of an authority. A democratic order is quite different from an order of reason, of God, or of Nature, on the one hand, and from mere imposition of the will of the sovereign, on the other hand. The relationship between politics and rhetoric is an old topic in political philosophy, as we see in the Platonic condemnation of democracy, seen as the realm of sophistical opinions. However, based on the Aristotelian reflection on practical reasoning, new studies have tried to rehabilitate rhetoric and its importance for a new political and legal order, especially since the middle of the last century. It is in these terms that Chaïm Perelman's new rhetoric must be understood. The new rhetorical perspective aims at situating properly the very rationality of the democratic order. In this sense, democracy can be approximated to the realm of reasonable argument that lies between two opposite extremes: on one side, the realm of rationality and logical necessity, on the other, the realm of irrationality and arbitrary will. I present here the broad outline of Perelman's new rhetoric (and its wide conception of rationality) in order to sketch, in what follows, some ideas about a new justice and democratic order. Among other things, I aim at highlighting Perelman's defense of open, tolerant and humble dialogue, which is sensitive to differences of perspective and always capable of self-criticism. The domains of law, moral and political argumentation require from the philosopher a kind of modesty: the future does not belong to the philosopher, and her mind must remain open to unpredictable experiences. The rule of law requires an open and inclusive discursive practice, a large and unending dialogue that can only occur when there is freedom of agreement and exclusion of the use of violence.

The democratic experience is closely related to the practice of argumentation. There is no democracy without exchanging views and search by persuasion or convincing. Democratic practice has, therefore, a clear rhetorical dimension, understood as the pursuit of agreement or consent of a certain audience. In other words, we should not talk about democracy when legal decisions and political choices necessarily follow from an evident premise or simply reflect the will of an authority. A democratic order is quite different from an order of Reason, of God, or of Nature, on the one hand, and from mere imposition of the will of the sovereign, on the other hand.

My aim here is to defend the new rhetoric proposed by Perelman as a sound ground for democratic experience in law. Democracy works through discursive exchanges and beyond that it has its own grounding in argumentative practices and their capacity to justify rationally or reasonably our legal decisions or political choices. Therefore, I would like to introduce the new rhetoric as a basis for a renewed conception of rationality in harmony with the aspirations of democracy.

Surely, this is not a new undertaking. In fact, the relationship between politics and rhetoric is an old topic in political philosophy, as we can see in the Platonic condemnation of democracy, seen as the realm of sophistical opinions. Traditionally, philosophers, following this Platonic heritage, tried to move politics away from the noise of the rhetoric and its misleading doxa. In general, it was believed that the foundation of politics should be more consistent than mere opinions, namely something based on Truth, Reason and sometimes in God. Political choices, therefore, should not be delivered to the mass of ignorant and their interested power struggles. The wise, or the great enlightened leader, would be more reliable to take appropriate political decisions than the crowd rhetorically manipulated by politicians/sophists without any ethical commitment or concern for the truth.

However, based on the Aristotelian reflection on practical reasoning, a different path is opened. Many, at different times, followed this direction. Although Aristotle condemned democracy in his political reflections, seen as a degenerate counterpart of polity, it is possible to justify a democratic political practice if we carry forward some of their considerations on dialectical or rhetorical reasoning, typical of the ethical and political argumentation. Throughout the Aristotelian theory, science, wisdom, art, dialectic and rhetoric are a series of forms of rationality, endowed with different degrees of accuracy and precision, but all characterized by arguing. Analytics, Topics, Sophistical Refutations, Rhetoric and Poetics should be seen as a whole, as a theory of argumentation in the most general sense, in other words, a true doctrine of the logoi or the different ways of reasoning. Aristotle held that it is proper to man to seek precision just as the nature of the subject admits. Complementing the demonstration or analytical reasoning, Aristotle introduces the dialectical rationality, seated in the practice of dialogue or the art of reasoning through questions and answers.

Especially in the mid-twentieth century, new studies have tried to rehabilitate rhetoric and its importance for a new political and legal order. It is in these terms that the new rhetoric proposed by Perelman and Olbrechts-Tyteca in 1958 in their Treatise on Argumentation (Traité de l'Argumentation) must be understood as the result of various efforts of bringing back rhetorics from the marginal status it acquired due to its negative connotations of political lies and of all sorts of manipulation and deception. The new rhetoric seeks to rehabilitate the old rhetoric, without, however, being equal to it, which explains the use of the adjective 'new'. The rhetoric of the ancients was, above all, the art of public speaking in order to achieve some desired effect. It tended to take the form of a recipe, of practical exercises to develop oratorical skills. The New Rhetoric basically inherits the notion of audience from the old rhetoric, but it expands and moves it away from mere oratory, focusing on the logical aspect and emphasizing the argumentative exchange. According to Perelman, the domain of the new rhetoric is "the study of critical thought, reasonable choice, and justified behavior. It applies whenever action is linked to rationality".[3]

The thought of Perelman stresses the field of opinions, which is

fallible and situated. On that matter, Perelman intends to expand the domain of rationality and remove, for example, our legal decisions or moral choices from the reign of irrationality. According to Perelman: "If a narrow conception of proof and logic leads to a limited conception of reason, the extension of the notion of proof and the logic enrichment resulting from it should provoke a reaction, in turn, on the way that our faculty of reasoning is conceived".[4]

The reason, for Perelman, does not exist as something in the world, like an innate human faculty. The predicate 'rational' is assigned to every reasonable justified behavior. Thus, on the other hand, any behavior merely mechanical or unjustifiable is said irrational or unreasonable. It follows from this that only a justified behavior can be said rational and the attribution of rationality to men occurs only indirectly. In other words, the rational being is the one who acts rationally, that is, the one whose behavior is justified. Therefore, it is said 'irrational' the one who does not offer reasons for ones actions or that, being unable to justify ones opinions, defends them in a dogmatic way. So, the rationality of a statement or expression depends on the reliability it embodies. Perelman emphasizes the procedural aspect, the possibility of justification and critical thinking involved in a rhetorical or dialectical conception of reason. As Perelman stresses: "What is reason? It is defined, in my opinion, by recourse to universal audience".[5]

The new rhetorical perspective allows situating properly the very rationality of democratic experience. Democracy can be approximated to the realm of reasonable argument that lies between two opposite extremes: on the one side, the realm of rationality and logical necessity, on the other, the realm of irrationality and arbitrary will. Adopting the broad outline of Perelman's new rhetoric (and its wide conception of rationality), I would like to sketch, in what follows, some ideas about a new justice and democratic order.

From the 1960's onwards, Perelman developed a consistent study on moral and legal argumentation, which consisted in the application of the new rhetoric to the realm of practical reasoning. The result of this work unfortunately received a less systematic form, published in several small articles. Large part of this material was included in the posthumous work entitled Ethics and Law (Éthique et Droit) and, also, in the notes originally published by Perelman in 1979 under the title of Legal Logic (Logique Juridique).

When Perelman analyses the specificity of legal reasoning, he clearly understands the importance to consider a double requirement: on the one side, the protection of legal security, on the other, the need for social effectiveness and relevance. According to Perelman's conception of rationality, the new rhetoric indicates a via media for legal reasoning, avoiding both decisionism and legalism. This field is neither rational nor irrational; it does not deliver decisions according to the will of judges, nor does it follow necessarily from a logical argument. Perelman locates the field of legal argumentation in an intermediate space between legalistic determinism and arbitrary decisionism. For a decisionist, legal decisions stem from pure acts of will, lacking any rational justification. For a legalist, on the other hand, legal decisions are the result of mere applications of general rules proceeding from a legitimate authority. In other words, the decision follows syllogistically from the laws. In none of these cases, there is space for argumentation, for exchange of different opinions and reasonable justification.

In an article entitled "The Pure Theory of Law and the Argumentation", originally published in 1964 and later included in the book Ethics and Law, Perelman criticizes Kelsen, considering that his biggest mistake lies in his disbelief regarding practical reasoning. Kelsen had correctly perceived the impossibility of a demonstrative proof in the field of norms and values, nevertheless he derived from it some wrong implications. In short, Kelsen stressed the arbitrariness of legal decisions and upheld a dangerous decisionistic posture. According to Perelman, the pure theory of law derived from a limited theory of knowledge that accepts only demonstrative or empirical proofs, putting aside and totally disregarding the role of argumentation. Taking the opposite direction, the new rhetoric advocates the enlargement of the rational domain in order to allow justified choices and reasonable decisions in practical reasoning, going much beyond the narrow field of formal or demonstrative logic. According to Perelman: "If a legal theory assumes positions, such positions should not be taken as irrational when they can be justified in a reasonable way, through an argumentation whose soundness and relevance we accept".[6]

It is clear that the reasonable does not lead to a single solution, as an objective and precise method. Nevertheless, the quest for reasonableness serves as a restriction on the freedom of judging, preventing the mere arbitrariness. In this sense, Perelman said that "the unacceptable and the unreasonable are limits for any formalism in law".[7] Only a wide argumentative practice, opened to the demands of society and to institutional requirements, can lead to a convincing legal decision. According to Perelman: "It is the dialectics between Legislative and Judiciary, between Doctrine and Authority, between Power and Public opinion, that produces the real life of Law and allows combining stability and change".[8]

Legal argumentation should not be limited to the legal text, nor shall it rely solely on the judge's sense of justice. Instead, law must be seen as a flexible tool, which is able to be adapted to social values and expectations, conciliating them with the established institutions and the legal order. Law is condemned to be an experience which is endlessly updated, which seeks appropriate decisions to the circumstances. In sum, Perelman emphasizes the need of reaching acceptable solutions to social conflicts, by means of arguments based on common sense, equity and public interest. However, the social appeasement or pacification can only be restored if the decision is accompanied by sufficiently convincing and sound argumentation. This, in short, should be the effort of the legal doctrine and jurisprudence.

Finally, I would like to turn my attention to the problem of political choices and democratic order. Perelman sustains a philosophical concept that is fundamentally compatible with the defense of democracy and the Rule of Law. In an article entitled First philosophies and regressive philosophy, originally published in 1949, Perelman emphatically defends an open philosophy, characterized by tolerance, sensitivity to different perspectives, and capacity for self-criticism. A regressive philosophy is an argumentative undertaking, part of an endless dialogue, in which nothing is out of question. In a certain way, it provides the philosophical basis of democratic experience, which is always imperfect but perfectible.

Unfortunately, Perelman did not lead his studies in this direction, unlike, for intance, Habermas' development of discourse ethics, deliberative democracy, and the discourse theory of law. Despite these limitations, the new rhetoric and the study of legal reasoning carried out by Perelman are important and consistent grounds upon which one can analyze our moral, legal and political argumentative practices.

In conclusion, the domains of law, moral and political argumentation require from the philosopher a kind of modesty: the future does not belong to the philosopher, and her mind must remain open to unpredictable experiences. The rule of law requires an open and inclusive discursive practice, a large and unending dialogue that can only occur when there is freedom of agreement and exclusion of the use of violence.

The myth of constitutional neutrality Adjudication and democracy

Cássio Corrêa Benjamin[1]
Tiago Lopes Coelho[2]

Abstract: The constitutional adjudication keeps being a central problem for democracy. There are several discussions surrounding this theme. Among them, problems related to its necessity, who is expected to accomplish such task, the way it could be carried out, the competency of a court of law and its nature. Such matters remains a theoretical and practical challenge to democracy. As for the analysis of questions about the constitutional adjudication, we will resume some aspects of the Hans Kelsen's critique of Carl Schmitt concerned with the theme of the guardian of Constitution. The elements of this discussion, which could already be recognized as classical ones, remain present. We will resume some points from that debate, mainly that one related to neutrality of those who exercises the control of constitutionality. This is a crucial question that can be considered as a polemic axis between Schmitt and Kelsen and this will also reflect the attempts to determine the limits between legislation and jurisdiction.

Keywords: constitutional adjudication, democracy, neutrality

We intend to discuss the meaning of the idea of neutrality by resuming the Kelsen's critique of Schmitt about the "Guardian of the Constitution". Although both authors have divergences in relation to "character" or "status" of the "guardian" figure, that is, if it is under the ambit of a political or judicial matter, its alleged neutrality seems evident and necessary. This neutrality is necessary due to alleged asymmetry of this place. Therefore, even the high level of discordance between the two authors about central points, there is a consensus over one aspect: the search for one neutral point in the "Guardian of the Constitution". The place of this "guardian" puts aside this way and, thereby, an asymmetry is created.

Our aim is to show how fragile such neutrality is, which means to explain the alleged aspect of this neutrality. We want to show how this neutrality, that is, how this asymmetry is an attempt to hide the contingency and arbitrariness of this place. Whatever either Schmitt´s way, the search for a neutral political ground, or Kelsen´s one, the search for a neutral judicial place, what they try to present as evident is the neutrality of this one. We will comment Kelsen´s work because he is an author who clearly stands his ground on immanence[3].

It is typical of Kelsen to start his text by drawing attention to where he intends to place the "Guardian of the Constitution". Firstly, he emphasizes that the principle of the maxim legality is at stake the ways to get guaranties from the Constitution. Surprisingly, he states that there is only one point of "primary obviousness" which has not been discussed. If an institution must be set up to control the constitutionality of certain state acts (specially, parliament and government), that is, that verifies its conformity to Constitution, so such control must not be handed by the bodies which will be under control namely parliament and government. For Kelsen, "the political function of the Constitution is to lay down judicial limits to the exercise of power" (KELSEN, 2003, p.240). The guarantee of the Constitution is the certainty that such limits will not be broken through. According to Kelsen, it should be evident that none organ which exercises power is competent to control it. He reminds the reader of a principle which would broadly be accepted: nobody can be its own judge.

It is remarkable how Kelsen starts this discussion by presupposing a jurisdictional function to the alleged court. This just means that Kelsen considers as truth what should be discussed. The debate had already finished before it started. As he estates, it concerns to establish the judicial limits to power[4]. Kelsen tends to believe that this organ would not be competent to judge. Actually, it is typical of thinking about this power that cannot have power. It comes out, right in the beginning of the text, the Kelsen's struggle to situate all that discussion as a judicial problem (nobody can be its own judge). It comes out, summarizing, quite explicitly, the attempt to construct a political neutrality in this place, exactly for being a judicial space[5].

[3]We will analyse the Kelsen's answer, "Who should be the Guardian of Constitution" to Schmitt's book "The Guardian of Constitution", which was published in 1931. This Schmitt's book is a enlargement of a previous article about the same theme. The article also had as a title "The Guardian of the Constitution" (Der Hüter der Verfassung). It was published in 1929 in the journal Archiv des öffentlichen Rechts, Neue Folge, XVI, p.161-237.

It is not by chance that Kelsen start to criticize the monarchical principle of the constitutional theory from the XIX Century, according to it a monarch is the natural guardian of the Constitution. This is nothing more than ideology, for a monarch was the main interested one in breaking the judicial limits. It must be emphasized again that Kelsen gives an aspect of neutrality to the place of constitutionality control. When Kelsen criticizes the monarchical principle according to which the natural Guardian of the Constitution is a monarch, he criticizes the idea in which a monarch is a neutral point, but he does not criticize the idea of the possibility of a neutral place.

Conversely Schmitt, Kelsen defines what he understands about constitutional jurisdiction and touches on the problem in defining to which place such jurisdiction must be attributed. Constitutional jurisdiction is the exercise of the guarantee of the Constitution (KELSEN, 2003, p.240)[6]. Attributing such function to an independent court is transforming it into > "a central constitutional court; in the case of a litigious suit, for instance, it may decide about the constitutionality of the parliament (specially laws) or government (specially acts) which were once refuted, by annulling such actions in case of its unconstitutionality and occasionally by judging the responsibility of certain organs

[4]A better description of the "functions" of Constitution would be this one: the judicial function of Constitution is to establish judicial limits to the political power and, therefore, to legitimate the politics. The political function of Constitution is to effect the legal possibilities presents in the Constitution and, therefore, to legitimate the law.

[5] Kelsen is a very subtle author. He never states that a Constitutional Court does not have some political matter. It does not deal with a naive positivism here, as it is described many times. But he states that even having an undeniable political aspect, such Court still carries out a clearly judicial function, as we will see.

[6]This is the background of all question, viz, related to a guarantee of Constitution and not to a creation of Constitution. Anyway, Kelsen recognizes an unavoidable moment of creation in the act of interpretation, as we will see.

under accusation" (KELSEN, 2003, p.248).

Anyway it is relevant how Kelsen sees the question as a jurisdiction's problem and again, by structuring the problem, he already solves it. By the way, under rare exceptions, this is the general tone of the text. Its importance, as we are trying to show goes beyond a Schmitt's critic. The debate between these two authors gets relevancy and contemporaneity in so far as they deal with the central question in the discussion about the meaning and the possibility of approach constitutionality control, besides they try to situate its place.

In order to oppose to Schmitt´s vision of which a court that held the constitutionality control does not have a judicial function, this is the centre of the debate here, Kelsen estates to be a secondary question " if such organ is supposed to be a court and if its function really constitutional" (KELSEN, 2003, p.248). This would not affect a decision to confide

> "the alleged function to a collective organ whose elected members hold their total independence, some independence in relation to government and parliament named judicial, for in the modern Constitutions usually are conceded to courts (that is, not only these ones)" (KELSEN, 2003, p.248).

We may notice again that Kelsen delineates the problem under a judicial way. Whether the members in a court must be independent in relation to government and parliament, therefore, it is a judicial place. Kelsen tries to read all the aspects of these questions by drifting them into the judicial space and signalising a judicial activity.

It is typical the approach of this question for the critic to Schmitt's book. Schmitt's purpose may be "to show that the decision about constitutionality of laws and the annulment of unconstitutional laws by a organ of independent men, under litigious process, is not constitutional" (KELSEN, 2003, p.250). What is important here is the given description. What we want to emphasize is why Kelsen believes that this activity deals with a decision about the constitutionality or not of laws and their annulment, if that was the case. Why not to describe such activity as a decision about validity or non-validity of laws, not for an alleged comparison with the Constitution, therefore, not for having been based on an alleged unconstitutionality, but exactly by a decision that creates the Constitution by stating what it is based on the discussion in such "organ of independent men"? This is named legislation. If the description of the process was this one, like we believe in this regard, neither Kelsen´s vision nor Schmitt's one would be proper to understand what really occurs.

One of the most revealing moment of this debate comes out when the discussion about the relation between law and politics or, even more exactly, about the relation between judicial function and political function. To Kelsen, Schmitt begins from > "wrong presupposition of which among judicial functions and political ones exist an essential contradiction and that specifically a decision about constitutionality of laws and the annulment of unconstitutional laws are political acts where it is supposed that such activity is not judicial any more" (KELSEN, 2003, p.250).

This is a central theme, that is, a separation between law and politics and it keeps constantly litigious in this debate.

Kelsen believes that Schmitt´s position is that politics refers to an exercise of power and right in contraposition to a pure exercise of right. But this is not the truth for Kelsen "because it presupposed that the exercise of power is closed inside the legislative process" (KELSEN, 2003, p.251). Kelsen starts a description of right by involving a strong political element. The surprising point in this description is the dissolution, by Kelsen's part, of a clear line that divided right and politics, which shows a great perspicacity. For him, there is a decisive element in the whole judicial sentence, therefore, an exercise of power. The question, maybe the main one of the whole discussion, is where to draw a line that separates legislation and jurisdiction. The mistake, for Kelsen, of stating that only the legislation may be political is linked directly to another one that states that "just the legislation is a productive creation of right and jurisdiction, however, a mere reproductive application" (KELSEN, 2003, p.251). This is, then, the central point of the question. It is not the first time that Kelsen touches this subject and it is interesting to notice how he presents an acuity about the creative character of jurisdiction that differs from the traditional vision about his work. What Kelsen emphasizes is, therefore, the creative and productive role of jurisdiction. Again, we can state that practically the whole base of argumentation against Schmitt is based on such idea. What will keep on with the discussion up to the end of the text is the development of several aspects of this point.

As the judge has authorization to assess different interests and decide for one of them, Kelsen states that this reveals the political character of the judicial function. It is possible to notice that Kelsen names as political, in this point, such possibility of creation, of innovation over something not given yet. Law provides a parameter[7], but a judge has some certain right to decide. It is this certain space of freedom that Kelsen names political aspect of right. It is not by chance that Kelsen refers to the notion of "decision", which is central in Schmitt. This is not the place to make some appreciation about what Kelsen supposes to be the correct meaning of its use in Schmitt. But it must be emphasized something very relevant to this discussion. Schmitt really gives to decision a central role in his thought. Although it is not easy to establish a unique structure about the idea of decision in all his works, it is not difficult to realize the accuracy of designating a great phase of his thought like decisionistic[8]. And it is not difficult to realize either how this capacity of decision, in Schmitt, expresses what is really political and it links, in the concrete case of analysis of Weimar situation, to the President of Reich. Thereby, the decision specifically judicial for Schmitt is not the best place for decisionism. Schmitt has, indeed, a quite static vision of judicial decision in his decisionistic phase. Kelsen is right by noticing this fact in the discussion about the Guardian of the Constitution and how this appears in the attempt to establish a limit between jurisdiction and legislation. Kelsen is also right by noticing that the choice of the President as a Guardian of the Constitution reflects directly to this question.

The way that Kelsen gives to this limit is described as a matter of quantity: "there is just a quantitative difference, not qualitative, between the political character of legislation and the jurisdiction one" (KELSEN, 2003, p.251). For Kelsen, the amount is the one that solves the enigma of relation between law and politics. It is surprising that the following passage is thought as a traditional vision of Kelsen. In a discussion about international law, the qualitative difference between right and politics seems clearly:

> "every judicial conflict is indeed a conflict of interests or power and, therefore, every judicial controversy is a political one and every conflict of interests, about power or politics may be decided as a judicial controversy as long as it is incorporated by the question about if the pretension which a State aims in relation to another one which refuses to satisfy it – the conflict consists in it – is based on the international law or not" (KELSEN, 2003, p.252).

[7] A "frame", which is the term he uses in his Pure Theory of Right.

[8] See mainly his Political Theology: four chapters on the concept of sovereignty.

Kelsen recognizes that a judicial conflict is a conflict of interests or power. But he steps forwards and designates it as political. We are not interested in inspecting how far he is from a correct Schmitt's interpretation. What matters is that Kelsen realizes a constitutive element of conflict in the whole judicial question. The problem of the impossibility of solution conflict in the judicial way, therefore, does not due to its political character, but to the refusal to accept the solution, in this regard, for a decision based on international law.

Kelsen states that "a conflict is not 'non-arbitrable' or political because, due to its nature, it cannot be a judicial conflict and, therefore, be judged by a court, but indeed because one of the parts or both do not intend to allow that it is solved by an objective organ" (KELSEN, 2003, p.252). Kelsen links political and non-arbitrable to the fact that a conflict may not be submitted to a third organ which is able to judge it, due to unwilling parts. The idea is that it is possible to establish a judicial court as long as its competence is accepted to judge the conflict. Again, there would not be an absolute contraposition between politics and jurisdiction, therefore, political questions could be a jurisdiction object.

Kelsen concludes that it is possible to recognize the political character in a constitutional court and even recognize that it exists in a high degree than other courts. According to Kelsen, "never have the institution defenders of a constitutional court ignored or denied the eminently political meaning of the sentences" (KELSEN, 2003, p.253). In any case, this does not prevent from recognizing that it refers indeed to a court and its function is a judicial one.

Kelsen draws attention to the fact that there is always creation by applying the law. Applying the law is to interpret it, what necessarily implies an act of creation. That´s the reason why "judicial functions" and "political functions" are not completely opposed, but they can be spotted at the extreme of same axis. Thus, the decision about the constitutionality of law and its possible annulment are both a political act and a judicial one. Consequently, a court with such function could be understood as a judicial court with an evident political role and bigger than any other one. Linked to it, Kelsen also criticizes a hard separation between legislation and jurisdiction. By considering that every jurisdiction has an evident creative role, so the jurisdiction is a continuation of legislation. In his words, there is "productive creation of law" both in the legislation and in the jurisdiction. The last one would not be only "mere reproductive application". As he estates, the difference between the political character of legislation and jurisdiction is only quantitative. There is not an absolute qualitative difference. From it, Kelsen concludes that every judicial conflict is a conflict of power and interests and, therefore, every political conflict is a judicial conflict, Kelsen defends, thus, the existence of a constitutional court whose function is to control the constitutionality of law and administrative acts, it is, then, a judicial court with an evident judicial function. This is the main axis from which he criticises Schmitt.

It also realizes that he, indeed, defines what is judicial by the criterion of independence of this organ in relation to other powers. Whether the members of such court must be independent in relation to government and parliament, he would be then a judicial place. Kelsen tries to read all the aspects of this question as pointing out the judicial ambit and signalizing a judicial activity. What should be remembered is that we could have an independent organ, but not necessarily with judicial function. Why not considering an independent organ as having legislative activity? This formal aspect of Kelsen definition for what is "judicial" has as consequence involve any organ that exists by the side of other powers and that it were independent. In fact, it is not by chance that such definition ends up diluting the separation between legislation and jurisdiction. Therefore, as opposed to Kelsen´s statement it is essential the determination of the function of organ that lies such position. It is necessary the distinctiveness and, thus, a criterion that separates the legislative and judicial functions.

Although he is very sensitive to political question, Kelsen is able to state that "the fundamental advantage of a constitutional court is, since the beginning, that it not takes part in the exercise of power, and it does not put contrarily to parliament or to government" (KELSEN, 2003, p.276). It is impossible to find a greater idealization of this court: the power that has not power. Or even when Kelsen compares the independence that Schmitt believes the Head of Estate has, due to elections, with that one of a carrier judge. Whether Schmitt insists on seeing a neutrality fictional in a decisionist-arbitrary President of Reich, Kelsen, on his turn, insists on seeing a neutrality fictional in a bureaucratic-judge. In his words, it is evident "the fact that the judge urges to neutrality because of his professional ethics" (KELSEN, 2003, p.284). At this point, it realises the maximum idealization again, since the place of a Constitutional Court is a political one par excellence, for it is the point of the beginning. Any bureaucratic-judge who takes up this place will act necessarily without neutrality, because neutrality is impossible here. The bureaucratic-judge will be urged to politics and not to neutrality. The outcome will not be, therefore, a neutral judge, but a bureaucratic one acting politically, pretending to be neutral and technical. Therefore, the one who really decides and, at the same time, takes the decision in alleged technical parameters. That was, including, one of the greatest threatens to democracy according to Max Weber[9].

There is, therefore, a clear activity of legislation here. A court, in this place, acts as a co-legislator or a secondary legislator or even as "negative legislator", as Kelsen intends. No matter the appellation, since it always shows a clearly legislative activity here. This means that there is effectively a division of power. It does not deal with "a power without power". There is no reason to treat this question as judicial one. The correct understanding of the problem just starts when the judicial approach is left.

This is exactly what Kelsen denies by stating that "the question must not be put like a conceptual problem of jurisdiction, but as a problem about the best configuration of this function, being necessary to separate both problems" (KELSEN, 2003, p.262). Kelsen´s solution is "to restrict the power of courts and then the political content of its function" is "to limit as much as possible the border of arbitrariness that the laws allow to the utilization that power" (KELSEN, 2003, p.262). Kelsen´s solution is, thus, to demand a greater clarity of the terms, something that he himself has already criticized in his Pure Theory of Law[10]. Kelsen clearly describes the central problem about Constitutional Court: "there is some danger in a transference of power – no foreseen by Constitution and highly inconvenient – from Parliament to an outside organ" (KELSEN, 2003, p.263), and he completes the phrase citing himself, "which can become the exponent of political forces totally different from those ones that express themselves in the Parliament" (KELSEN, 2003, p.263). We may criticise Kelsen in several aspects, except that he did not have absolute clarity about what was really at stake.

What Kelsen has realized, and describes as "danger" and something "inconvenient", is nothing more than the only possible function for a Constitutional Court, the only possibility of understanding about what really occurs, i.e., the transference of some power to an external parliament organ. In this sense, a "court" with such function, like we intend to show, is not "constitutional", but a court of countermajoritarian legislative decision. That is the secret around this discussion, falsely put as "Constitutional Court" or "constitutional jurisdiction".

[9]See his The Profession and Vocation of Politics, p.330-331.

[10] See the chapter VIII, The Interpretation.

It is not by chance that Kelsen suggests that a Constitutional Court acts like a "negative legislator" (KELSEN, 2003, p.263). Again, despite negative, it deals with a legislator. This is the core of the question. Because of this, the problem is not a judicial one, but a legislative one. Because of this, it does not deal with the problem of a "Constitution Guardian", for who takes up the place from the beginning cannot judge something, but stating from which parameter will be judged. Who takes up the place from the beginning cannot "keep" the Constitution, but it must say what the Constitution is first of all. Dealing with the problem as it was a judicial one is avoiding the question from the beginning and creating the myth of neutrality.

When the illusion of a Constitutional Court is left is clear the question of legitimacy. It does not deal with understanding the legitimacy of a court that, for being exactly a Constitutional Court, has the power of verifying the constitutionality of voted laws by Parliament. Now it deals with the question of how coming up with the function of a court that plays like a "negative legislator", its "legitimacy" is guaranteed by situating in the judicial ambit. This court would guarantee the correction of laws in relation to Constitution. This is what Kelsen defends. However, whether this sort of court can just be legislative, which is its legitimacy in a democracy? Which is its legitimacy since it remained for it just a legislative role, therefore, redundant in relation to parliament, when it is not in clear opposition and rivalry with it?

The only possibility of legitimation of a court in a democracy is the role of an organ that decides in a countermajoritarian legislative way. The legitimacy of such court just can stand on the role of minority defenders. The existence of such court in a democracy account for, therefore, an organ able to take a countermajoritarian decision, which would differ with the decision that comes from parliament. This is the classical problem of searching for an institution that represents the minorities in a parliament and guarantees their expression. Obviously it deal with a vision of democracy like that political form that guarantees the possibility of expression in the more several interests and values of groups that belong such form. It deals with a vision of democracy worried about the diversity, a vision of democracy that sees diversity as a value. Regardless, the question about the reason of a court having as members career judges remains: Why should they be exactly judges and how should the members of a court be chosen?

Kelsen touches the problem of democracy when he discuss Schimitt´s critics about Constitutional Court, since it would be contrary to democratic principle. Kelsen realizes that what Schmitt understands as "democratic" is a "parliamentary plebiscitary democracy in the XX Century" (KELSEN, 2003, p.291). Moreover, Kelsen states that "the democratic character of a constitutional court, not different from that one of a head of State, would only dependent on the way of its appointment and its judicial position" (KELSEN, 2003, p.291). He identifies, therefore, through the way of nomination, the criterion of democratic characterization in such court, beyond its judicial position. Because of this, he concludes that: "in case of giving a democratic configuration to it, nothing avoid us to elect it by people, like a head of Estate, and to give to its members as little as to a head of estate the position of career staff" (KELSEN, 2003, p.291). He even admits the possibility of members from such court are elected by people or by parliament, similar to the case of the austrian Constitutional Court. It was also clear that the way of appointment affects directly the character of a court member. He knows that if they were voted either by people or by Parliament, there would not be what Schmitt ironically denominates "aristocracy of toga". Because of all that, it realizes that Kelsen was completely conscious about the specific problem of democratic character of such court.

It draws attention the fact that Kelsen, soon after considering the possibility of a popular election of the members for a constitutional court, states that "even if the question remains about such way of creating and qualifying the organ would be more convenient considering its function" (KELSEN, 2003, p.291). But that´s exact the question! What is the function of this court? If the function is specifically a judicial one, the prevention of Kelsen really corresponds. Nonetheless, if the function of this court is not a judicial one, but legislative, the problem reappear with great clarity and as a central question. As we have said, if the function of this court is considered not only legislative, but also countermajoritarian (otherwise, why such rivalry with the parliament?), what would not make sense were an election of the members of such organ by people. If this is evident, what remains as a problem would be the most proper way, for a court that decides in a countermajoritarian way by choosing its members.

As we stated in the beginning, this text by Kelsen is a set of arguments, not always united, about Schmitt´s text. There are many observations about several aspects of the questions of the Guardian of the Constitution. We have not been interested in all the discussion raised by Kelsen. We wanted to emphasize only one of the questions axis. This point is exactly the determination of the function of an organ that occupies the place described by Kelsen and Schmitt as the one for the Guardian of the Constitution. We tried to show how an activity of such organ, which declares and suspends certain laws as "unconstitutional" ones, has consequently a result that is clearly legislative. In fact, it deals with determining which law exists and which one is valid. Even it deals with a "negative" legislation, like Kelsen noticed, even so it is indeed a legislation. We also show how Kelsen, from the first line up to the last one, tries to deny any non-judicial character that intends for the activity of this organ. What pushes him, therefore, to see a court as a Constitutional Court. The result is a virtually complete misunderstanding of the referred question here. "Virtually complete" one because it deal with Kelsen. He clearly realizes the problems of his argument and expresses it in the statement of continuity between law and politics or between legislation and jurisdiction. That is the reason for the enlightening expression "negative legislator" to this organ.

Kelsen wants to criticize Schmitt´s position that makes the president of the Reich as the Guardian of the Constitution. What Kelsen accomplishes is to describe the organ that, in fact, annuls laws by declaring them unconstitutional, like a Constitutional Court. Although there is a clear legislative activity, he insists, since the beginning, to see some essentially judicial character in its function. Because of this, the idea of neutrality for Kelsen deals with a court that "understands" the Constitution and then it can "judge" the adequacy of the general law to the Constitution. Its neutrality lies in the fact that it is able to judge because it is, in relation to Constitution, above other powers. So, Kelsen´s insistence on stating that this power does not have power.

What we have intended to show was how the idea of neutrality associated with that place is fragile. This only can occur by the characterization of the activity of such organ as judicial. When it comes to the conclusion that this activity is essentially legislative, the neutrality disappears. This organ carries out, then, a legislative activity, for it occupies the place of the determination of the existence of laws. Therefore, it is not a neutral place. Approaching neutrality here, like Kelsen does and in a different way, Schmitt as well, it is just to create a myth. The place of the determination of the existence of laws is the place of the beginning. The place of which is judicial, the place of a judicial activity, must always be a secondary moment concerning with legislation. But if it is legislative, it cannot be neutral. It is the myth of neutrality which allows the mistake of designating such debate as "the Guardian of Constitution" and describes such organ as a "Constitutional Court" that, therefore, makes the "control of constitutionality". What such organ makes, in fact, is to legislate, even negatively. Since it is constituted by a small group, the result is a legislative countermajoritarian activity. The place of such organ in a democracy considered as some legislative space is still to be established. Moreover, it deals with a sui generis legislative activity, for it is ruled by judicial arguments and accomplished, in general, by judges in charge, under strong political pressure. This is what drives several authors to treat such organ as running judicially. This is the mistake that stimulates the myth of neutrality. Leaving such myth allows us to start a discussion about its real role and its place in a democracy.

Judgment and justice: an Arendtian vision

Christina Miranda Ribas

Abstract: Starting with Hannah Arendt's account of the main legal problems of Adolf Eichmann's trial in Jerusalem, the question of justice is discussed on the basis of the tension between the human capacity of judging and the evidence of destruction of the traditional patterns of judgment caused by totalitarianism that points to the relationship between thinking and judging, we try to ponder on the question of justice in view of contemporary conditions, in an attempt to understand it under the theoretical perspective of Hannah Arendt, guided by the Arendtian conception of understanding as a producer of meaning - rooted in the life process - which allows for the reconciliation with human reasons and passions.

Keywords : Hannah Arendt, Justice, Judgment

1. It might be possible to say about justice what Arendt says about freedom: to raise the question "what is justice" seems to be "a hopeless enterprise. It is as though age-old contradictions and antinomies were lying in wait to force the mind into dilemmas of logical impossibility..." (ARENDT, 1993, p. 143).

Such a question can only be asked when traditional answers are no longer valid. According to Arendt, the traditional categories of thought have been gradually losing ground in experience; thought, detached from experience, has either been limited to repeating old truths, or has become deprived of meaning, which "…so sadly evaporated from the very key words of political language – such as freedom and justice, authority and reason, responsibility and virtue, power and glory – leaving behind empty shells with which to settle almost all accounts, regardless of their underlying phenomenal reality" (ARENDT, 1993, p.15).

Hannah Arendt asked many questions during her lifetime. She focused on fundamental political issues, such as freedom, authority, power, totalitarianism, violence and revolution. She explored the existential conditions of human life and the mysterious universe of the life of the mind, but she never tackled, not even superficially, the question of justice. Nevertheless, I think that a reflection on justice, within the domains of her thought, is possible and relevant. We can thus follow the pathways of her mind, and go through the doors her thought opens up for us.

Arendt thinks that the appearance of totalitarianism tore apart the already fragile tissue of Occidental thinking (ARENDT, 1993, p. 14), and she considers Eichmann's trial a sort of dramatic testimony of this rupture. In fact, not even totalitarian domination can be understood by means of the categories of conventional political thinking, nor can its crimes be judged "by traditional moral standards or punished within the legal framework of our civilization…" (p. 54).

I decided to focus on the theme of justice as it is presented in Arendt's account of Eichmann's trial, which, in her opinion, treats "… with nothing but the extent to which the court in Jerusalem succeeded in fulfilling the demands of justice". (ARENDT, 1994, p. 298).

2. Fifty years ago, the New Yorker published a series of reports written by Hannah Arendt about the trial of the SS troops Lieutenant Colonel Adolf Eichmann, arrested in Argentina in the beginning of the sixties and sentenced in Jerusalem for war crimes, crimes against humanity and crimes against the Jewish people, considered co-responsible for the Holocaust. Those reports originated the book Eichmann in Jerusalem: a report on the banality of evil, a work that has generated, since then, much controversy.

From a legal point of view, Eichmann's trial brought up several questions, such as , the problem of judging a new crime, genocide. Arendt insisted on the originality of genocide, trying to distinguish it from legal discrimination, from large scale expulsion and from the massacre of whole peoples, which were not without precedent, on the contrary. (ARENDT, 1994, p. 267-8). But that kind of administrative massacre was something never seen before, a crime perpetrated within and through the bureaucratic state machine. Recognizing the newness of genocide was a problem and, from a legal point of view, a problem of great magnitude, because it meant violating the principle nullum crime, nulla poena sine lege praevia, which is central to the Modern State.

The Court of Jerusalem faced this deadlock situation, that had already shown up at the Nuremberg Trials. Both the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide and the Israelite Law of 1950, which were related to the punishment of the Nazis and their collaborators and were the basis for Eichmann's accusation, were posterior to his acts. From this point of view, neither Eichmann nor any other Nazi criminal could have been judged.

In order to overcome this problem, the Court in Jerusalem treated genocide as if it were no more than homicide in a large scale, a reasonably satisfactory solution in the legal perspective. Arendt, however, insists on saying that genocide and homicide are different crimes. Genocide is, in her opinion, a crime against humanity, "…an attack upon human diversity as such, that is, upon a characteristic of the 'human status' without which the very words 'mankind' or 'humanity' would be devoid of meaning". (ARENDT, 1994, p. 268-269).

Thus, the Court in Jerusalem failed, not being able to give a valid definition to the crime of genocide, when seen as an attack against the plurality and the diversity proper to human condition. Arendt attributed this failure to the fact that the judges had refused to act outside the established legal frameworks, never facing the challenge of the unprecedented. While holding on to a shredded tradition, they ended up by disclosing the incapability of the theory of Law to give a solution to the problems Eichmann's judgment had evinced.

Judging Eichmann also demanded to confront a paradoxical "legal crime", a crime, as Ferraz Jr emphasizes, "committed within the boundaries of lawfulness of a sovereign state that is recognized by others states.". (FERRAZ JUNIOR, 1983, p. 10). The Nuremberg Laws of 1935, that legalized the discrimination of the Jewish minority as practiced since the beginning of the Nazi period, were generally recognized as part of the German Law, even on an international level, although they violated constitutionally guaranteed liberties and rights. Later on, the order from Hitler to exterminate the Jews was treated not as an order, but as a law, having been preceded by a series of measures, among which the most serious one, according to Arendt, was the one that made Jews stateless. Those measures became the foundation for the ones implanted in other countries to which the Final Solution was extended; the stateless persons were almost always the first ones to be slaughtered.

The words of the Führer became the law of the land in Germany, a fact attested by several jurists. This character of legality of the judicial order in Nazi Germany was mentioned by Eichmann during the trial. Hannah Arendt highlights the fact that Eichmann stated he had fulfilled his duty, not only by obeying orders, but also by obeying the law. Eichmann unsuccessfully tried to explain, she says, that during the Third Reich, "the Führer's words had the force of law." (p. 148).

To Hannah Arendt, the Court, by disregarding Eichmann's insistence to define himself as a law-abiding citizen, failed to understand this fundamental characteristic of the genocide it judged, a sort of crime that could only be committed "under a criminal law and by a criminal state" (p. 262).

The difficulties the judges faced might be attributed to the fact that they were "too conscious of the very foundations of their professions" (ARENDT, 1994, p. 26). They were utterly convinced that they should not act as legislators and, consequently, were unprepared to judge in the absence of the general rule to which the concrete case should be subsumed.

Hence, the dilemma of the judges in Jerusalem: Eichmann had committed a crime that did not exist as such. That is the fundamental question that Hannah Arendt's account of the Eichmann trial highlights, which, to her, appears in terms of an inadequacy of the legal system to judge this type of "legal crime". That is why Eichmann's case caused an enormous perplexity, which ultimately presented a dilemmatic nature. Admitting such inadequacy would mean the explicit rupture with the very assumptions of the dominating Theory of Law in the contemporary world. Denying it, in an attempt to make use of the established conceptual framework, would lead to a paradoxical result.

To Arendt, it was not too difficult to notice, in the post-war trials, that "... the judges in all these trials really passed judgment solely on the basis of monstrous deeds. In other words, they judged freely, as it were, and did not really lean on the standards and legal precedents with which they more or less convincingly sought to justify their decisions" (p. 294).

As a consequence, established legal principles were put aside, because their application would offend "the most elementary sense of justice" (p. 290). Framing the question in these terms leads to a rethinking of the problem. It is not only a question of judging without the help of the specific general rule. A demand for justice appears on the horizon, with all the enormous perplexities that accompany it. And it is brought by Hannah Arendt, to whom "... the purpose of a trial is to render justice, and nothing else..." (p. 253).

3. In Arendt's thought, the problem of justice will be directed to the subject that judges and to the faculty of judging. To her, "justice is (...) a matter of judgment" (p. 296). Eichmann's trial imposed on the judges the task of judging without subsuming the case to pre-established rules; it was a trial that demanded the exercise of the faculty of judging the way Arendt conceived it, based on the Kantian aesthetic reflective judgment. Judgment, to Arendt, is one of the three specific faculties of contemplative life, side by side with thinking and will. It is a mysterious gift, "the mysterious endowment of the mind by which the general, always a mental construction, and the particular, always given to sense experience, are brought together..." (ARENDT, 1978, p. 69). Curiously, judgment remained somewhat mysterious in her thought, since the third part of the work on contemplative life - which would precisely deal with the faculty of judging - was never written. The trilogy was time oriented. Whereas thinking moves about in the ever elusive present, and will turns to the future, judgment is the faculty of the human spirit that deals with the past.

Arendt's central idea is that "judgments are not arrived at by either deduction or induction; in short, they have nothing in common with logical operations." (ARENDT, 1978, p. 215). Judgment is a kind of talent that enables human beings to deal with the particulars that appear in the world, in opposition to thought, whose basic tendency is generalization. Only that which appears can be apprehended by human senses and acquire some internal coherence, which gives it meaning. Therefore, despite the fact that thought derives from experience, the latter only acquires meaning and sense when it is thought (ARENDT, 1978, p. 87). To Arendt, plurality is one of the basic existential conditions of human life on earth; human beings reveal themselves through action and discourse, which create a web of relations, making up the stage that is perceived as it appears to them. That which appears to a human being is that which he/she can judge, but as he/she is not alone in the world, what appears to him/her has its reality guaranteed by the fact that it appears, although from other points of view, also to the others. In politics, being and appearance coincide. (ARENDT, 1990, p. 98; ARENDT, 1958, p. 199).

One learns to judge by experience; judgment is liberated by the enlarged mentality and the more perspectives it takes into account the more valid it will be. Its criterion is communicability: judgment appeals to the common sense existing in every human being. In order to judge without the support of the general rule, one is expected to think for him/herself and, at the same time, put him/herself in other people's place, taking into account their points of view - not the real, but the possible ones. Hence, the requirement of impartial judgment on the part of the spectator, that is, the withdrawal of immediate interests, which allows for an overview of the whole scene. Although not part of the spectacle, the spectator is involved with other spectators that have to be taken into account. "Spectators exist only in the plural" (ARENDT, 1982, p. 63), living in a world of universal interdependence. Judgment is in everyone's reach (ARENDT, 1982, p. 28) and manifests itself in terms of common sense, a sense "that fits us into a community" (ARENDT, 1982, p. 70). The specific validity of judgment lies in the potential agreement of the others with whom the judicatory ego communicates in advance. Judgment relies on common sense and unveils to us a world as a common world. The faculty of judging is the most political of the faculties of the human mind (ARENDT, 1993, p.220-1).

It is because the world is common to all of us - although it appears to each one of us from our own perspective - that we can affirm its reality (ARENDT, 1978, p. 50). Hence the political importance of the common sense, as man's proper sense to deal with reality, a sixth sense that, as it guarantees "that it is the same object that I see, touch, taste, smell and hear". (ARENDT, 1978, p. 50), adjusts our five senses and the data they perceive to a common world. What guarantees the reality of a world of appearances is intersubjectivity (lo. cit.)

So, judgment is "one of the fundamental abilities of man as a political being insofar as it enables him to orient himself in the public realm" (ARENDT, 1993, p. 221). To Arendt, "wherever people judge the things of the world that are common to them, there is more implied in their judgments than these things. By his manner of judging, the person discloses to an extent also himself..." (ARENDT, 1993, p. 223). By judging, I share the world and, at the same time, even if involuntarily reveal my own identity.

Although it cannot resort to general rules, judgment can rely on examples. The example is a particular "...that in its very particularity reveals the generality that otherwise could not be defined". (ARENDT, 1982, p. 77). The particular that is transformed into an example appears in experience. Choosing the example correctly is a gift, "a peculiar talent which can be practiced only and cannot be taught" (Kant apud ARENDT, 1978, p. 215). This Kantian idea of the example as a support to judgment, which Hannah Arendt revisits, may allow us to understand why she lamented that Eichmann's trial could not become a valid precedent (ARENDT, 1994, p. 272-3). Although it could not be taken as a general rule, the trial might have acquired an exemplary validity, becoming a support for future judgments. This, however, did not happen.

Eichmann's case has shown that, in law, one is always involved with the question of justice, "… as distinguished from the concern with certain procedures which, important in its (their?) own right, can never be permitted to overrule justice, the law's chief concern..." (ARENDT, 1994, p. 260). In a threshold situation it was not possible to deny it as a question or to bury it under the meanderings of technical discussions. To Arendt, the Court failed and "never rose to the challenge of (the?) unprecedented" (ARENDT, 1994, p. 263), refusing to look for new answers for the new problems it faced, using sanctioned procedures to preserve the illusion that the novel could be judged in accordance to the current categories of legal thinking (p. 135). Finally, it did not admit that it is necessary to do justice even when the law leaves us unprotected. (when the law forsakes us).

It seems to be clear why Arendt could state that justice was done in Jerusalem (ARENDT, 1978a, p. 261), while vehemently disapproving the sentence, for it prevented the justice of what had been done from emerging to be seen by all. More than just being done, justice must manifest itself in the world (p. 277). That is why Eichmann's trial left much to be desired; the question of justice did not get a response that could be displayed to the eyes of all and become meaningful for the world we all share.

Judgment is not, thus, a mere expression of the judge's idiosyncrasy and interests or of the interests of the class or group which he/she belongs to or represents. The validity of the judgment demands impartiality, which is provided by the enlarged mentality, in Kantian terms, and by the position of spectator, whose existential condition is detachment. The faculty of judgment is, to Arendt, the opposite of the subjective and emotional value judgment, which is valid only for the one who judges. It is also the opposite of those conceptions that, due to the impossibility of neutrality, are likely to assert that the judge must acknowledge his/her position in the world and judge from its perspective. Such conceptions, that appear in the legal theory under varied guises, state that, as decisions always - and inevitably - reflect values or ideologies, the judge must be part of the spectacle. To Arendt, however, although one cannot demand that the interest be uninterested (OV 78), one can demand that the judgment be impartial. Thinking and judging, as activities of the spirit, demand a peculiar quietness, "the withdrawal from involvement and from the partiality of immediate interests that in one way or another make me part of the real world..." (ARENDT, 1978, p. 92). When I think, I am two-in-one; when I judge, this dialogue amplifies itself and takes into account all the others.

Dealing with the question of justice demands the effort of "thinking without a bannister": in human affairs there are no universals. Justice may appear in the world, liberated by the faculty of judging; it belongs to the political sphere, where only particular statements have relevance. "Justice (...) is a matter of judgment..." (ARENDT, 1994, p. 296). By judging, not only do we share the world (ARENDT, 1993, p. 276), but also become responsible for it.

Citizenship and cordiality
Notes on the relationship between justice and friendship

Maria Cecília Pedreira de Almeida[1]

Abstract: It has become a cliché to say that Brazilians do not fully exercise their citizenship. The problems are well known: the difficulty of putting basic civil rights into practice, as well as violations or even simple ignorance of these rights. Within this framework, there remains the additional difficulty of access to justice, with a judiciary often oblivious to the social reality which cries out for its intervention. The unique history of the construction of citizenship in Brazil may be an important factor not only for research, but for helping to overcome these difficulties. To this end it may be useful to investigate an emblematic feature of Brazilian culture: cordiality, which, according to Sérgio Buarque de Holanda, characterizes the Brazilian people. This notion, which in general evokes benevolence and kindness, carries with it a pernicious component, which hinders the clear separation of public and private and maintains an affectivity that pervades social relations. Furthermore, it is interesting to note that cordiality differs from yet resembles true friendship, philia, which according to Aristotle, is essential to political society, "the greatest good of states." If it is true as Aristotle maintains that in every community there is some form of justice and friendship, then cordiality, this significant feature of Brazilian society, offers a rich topic of investigation, with regard to both its virtues and its harmful consequences for politics and law.

Keywords: citizenship; justice; friendship.

A lot of historians, sociologists and lawyers investigate the gap between state and citizen, why it goes often beyond mere negligence, and the fact that the state even threatens and violates certain rights of citizens. The examples are many. The lack of certain essential services such as health and education, poor living conditions, bad public transport, continuing insecurity and the constant violation of human rights by the State, perpetrated mainly against the poor population, leaves no doubt that despite all the legislation that provides for and protects all the people, the respect for these laws is still far from being a reality.

The unique history of the construction of citizenship in Brazil may be an important factor not only for research, but for helping to overcome these difficulties. To this end it may be useful to investigate an emblematic feature of Brazilian culture: cordiality, which, according to Sérgio Buarque de Holanda, characterizes the Brazilian people. This notion, which in general evokes benevolence and kindness, carries with it a pernicious component, which hinders the clear separation of public and private and maintains an affectivity that pervades social relations. Furthermore, it is interesting to note that cordiality differs from yet resembles true friendship, philia, which according to Aristotle, is essential to political society, "the greatest good of states". If it is true as Aristotle maintains that in every community there is some form of justice and friendship, then cordiality, this significant feature of Brazilian society, offers a rich topic of investigation, with regard to both its virtues and its harmful consequences for politics and law. The construction of citizenship in Brazil, this passive citizenship, is marked by cordiality. I will argue that this feature is harmful to democracy in so far as it moves away from the ideal of political friendship, politiképhilia, because it confuses the spheres of public and private and dramatically hinders effective political action. But I also will argue that cordiality has some features that can help us to think about some contemporary political problems, especially that of the citizenship on Brazil.

In general, much is written and said about what the state can or should do. In a democratic state, political power is governed by the law. It's the law that determines the action and omission of the State, as well as its reach. Brazil has a Constitution, which has the epithet "The Citizen Constitution", to remember that it was designed to serve the interests of the people. However, despite the plenitude of political rights, some uncertainty regarding the fulfillment of our democracy remains. For it is clear that, despite having formal democracy, institutions that should be democratic, as the National Congress, parties, trade unions and the judiciary do not work satisfactorily and that Brazilian democracy exists in form but not in practice.

Of course there are several reasons for these problems. My intention here is to discuss only one point that is not so much discussed: the historical formation of citizenship in Brazil and the relationship with the concept of "cordiality", coined by Sérgio Buarque de Holanda, in the famous book Roots of Brazil(Raízes do Brasil)[2]. The author is well known for making a pessimistic interpretation about the cordiality and its consequences. This paper will try to do the opposite: to show that the cordiality can be approached and compared to another concept familiar to the political philosophy: the friendship, as proposed by Aristotle.

Sérgio Buarque de Holanda, in his seminal work, asserts that there is a lack of objectivity and impartiality in national institutions, since the end of colonization period. Even before the Empire time it is possible to see throughout history the predominance of particular wills interfering in political life. This is reflected in the public service and the holders of public positions of responsibility, who do not understand the fundamental distinction between public and private. This misunderstanding creates the "patrimonial servant", for which the management of public policy is just a way to achieve his particular interest. The frequent imposition of particular wills on the collective will is explained by the author on the strength of certain "circles closed and inaccessible to an impersonal relation."[3] The most important of these circles was undoubtedly the family. It is possible to establish contacts arising from blood ties, but also from the heart, and it provides the model for all social compositions, according to the author. It is this model that focuses on the domestic, private, and intimate, which the historian relates to the appearance of cordiality, said by some the "Brazilian contribution to civilization."[4]

Cordiality should not be confused with kindness, politeness or civility. Derived from the Latin word color, cordis, it indicates in a broad sense all that is related to the heart, to the soul, the intelligence or sensitivity. Therefore it refers to the sphere of the private realm, to the domain of sentiments. It is the hospitality, generosity, spontaneity of gestures that demonstrate affection and consideration, the predominant influence of rural and patriarchal over the urban citizen. To explain the concept of cordiality, borrowed from Ribeiro Couto, Sérgio Buarque insists that it resembles to good manners or politeness, but just the opposite. For politeness requires rituals and formulas that organize society and also defends individuals against it, as it preserves their sensitivity and emotions. This virtue of appearances, as some call it, can disguise hypocrisy and enmity, but it never ceases to be a trace of civilization.

Regarding cordiality just the opposite occurs: the Brazilian has some difficulty in meeting the social rituals that are not rigidly formal and personal or emotional, because it cannot distinguish or rationalize these spaces, the public and the private. In other words, the public is seen as an extension of the private, as the state is regarded as an extension of the family. More than one kind of individual, the cordiality is present in a larger or lesser extent, in all social actors in Brazil.

The cordial man needs and likes the social life, because he feels awe or fear "to live with himself."[5]Unlike the polished man, he does not seek to distance himself from society, but increasingly approaches towards it. The social sphere is what matters most, because the cordiality "is rather a living on others."[6] There is an unwillingness to express a prolonged reverence to a superior, because it would exclude the possibility of a more convivial and familial relationship. According Sérgio Buarque, for Brazilians reverence, which means respect for other people, implies "desire to establish intimacy".[7]The author gives convincing examples of cordiality, first in the field of linguistics and then in the observation of customs. He draws attention to our penchant to use diminutives: the suffix "inho" serves to familiarize ourselves more with people, make them more accessible to the senses and also bring them closer to the heart. Then he notes that the Brazilians are among the few people who omit the name of the family in social treatment: the Americans and Europeans call each other by surname; but in Brazil the rule is the first name, similar to the treatment of family member. For the author, this may be related to the desire to "abolish certain psychological barriers because there are different families and they are independent of each other."[8]

In this context, forms of social interaction are dictated by an ethic of emotional background. Cordiality would be a natural attitude to human groups who accept the discipline of "sympathy" or "concord", and seek to support all relationships in three species of communities: the community of blood, in which the proximity is through kinship; the neighborhood, in which the proximity is given by the place; or the relationship of friendship, in which the approach is through the spirit.

However, the assessment of the author about the cordiality is not positive: "this aptitude for the social is far from being a considerable factor of a collective order."[9] The problem would lie precisely in the attachment to personality, feature present in domestic sphere. More importantly, such a fact would once more overlap on the collective will, which would result in a general indifference to the law every time this law went against emotional inclinations.

I do not ignore that the concept developed by Sérgio Buarque de Holanda may suffer severe criticisms, as indeed it suffered. However, it is indisputable that the problems faced in the exercise of citizenship may be linked, in part, to this neglect of public life. The supremacy of the private interests of a ruling class and the distance from the will of the "cordial mass", the denial of authority and the revulsion to hierarchies can be at the origins of the current disenchantment of politics. This explains why most of the reform movements in Brazil starts from the "top-down"[10]: they almost always came from a landed aristocracy or an intellectual elite and most of the population received the changes with indifference, stunned, astonished, without an utter comprehension of what was happening. All these factors make the author note that "democracy in Brazil has always been an unfortunate misunderstanding."[11]

The historian José Murilo de Carvalho somehow complements this analysis by stating that, opposite to what happened in England, where the evolution of citizenship rights was slow, gradual, and rather conquered by society, in Brazil, such rights were set differently and not with an active struggle of the population. They were seen as a concession, a benefit from the established power. In England, the rights emerged in sequence: first the civil rights, which are included equality before the law, freedom and property. Then political rights, such as the right to vote, to organize parties, to express and make claims of political nature, and finally, social rights, that only came about in the twentieth century. In this context, José Murilo glimpsed the "solidity of democratic sentiment and greater completeness of citizenship in the countries of Western Europe and the United States. Citizenship was a slow construction from the population itself, an experience: it became a solid collective value for which they thought it was worth living, fighting and even dying".[12]

In Brazil, the process was quite different. The first Brazilian Constitution, the Imperial Constitution of 1824, granted, at once, most of the civil and political rights such as appeared in the liberal constitutions of several countries of the time. There were no demands or fights. Significantly, it is quite probable that Brazil is one of the few countries in the world in which the institution of social rights was made during a period of dictatorship, with the 1945 Constitution. Even if we leave these facts aside, the fact is that the formal institution of important rights, considered sacred, taken directly from the French Constitution of 1792 and the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789, was born as a dead letter. It is enough to remember that the first Brazilian Constitution stated the "The inviolability of Civil Rights, Politicians and Citizens Brazilians, which is based on freedom, personal safety, and property", and yet, the prohibition of torture or cruel penalties. Here is the article:

> Article 179. The inviolability of Civil Rights, Politicians and Citizens Brazilians, which is based on freedom, personal safety, and property is guaranteed by the Constitution of the Empire, in the following manner.
> I. No citizen shall be obliged to do or refrain from doing anything, except by virtue of the Law.
> XIX. Already are abolished flogging, torture, branding iron hot, and all the more cruel penalties.
> [XXI. The jails will be safe, clean, well ventilated, with several houses for separation of defendants according to the circumstances and the nature of their crimes.

Despite all these rights and guarantees, it is very well known that until 1888 slavery still existed in Brazil, followed by all kinds of punishment. Torture was not a prerogative of slaves. Free population also suffered corporal punishment, as well as much of members of the army and navy[14], unfortunately facts still seen nowadays. The education system was not universal until few years ago and its quality is one of the poorest in the world.

In this sense, it is possible to argue that the singular history of the constitution of citizenship in Brazil may be seen as marked by cordiality: in one hand it interdicts the people to propose and to perform real changes through the law; on the other, it withdraws the conscience to demand the fulfillment of the law. The cordiality also has a significant effect because it produces the oblivion of the transforming political dimension of the vote. It happens to be simple demonstration of personal loyalty and for a long time it has not passed of consideration on account of some benefit - like a basic-needs groceries packages, a sum of money or even more prosaic things. The vote is no more than a personal relationship between the voter and the candidate, a private relationship, in the extent of it is up to each voter to forget the irresponsible or wrongdoings of the chosen representative - what happens most of the time - as if it was a relationship of friendship, in which a friend just "forgets" or "forgives" what one else did, without major consequences. This, of course, further weakens the democratic mechanisms for demonstrating the lack of representation of the interests of the people and flows into a deep disenchantment with institutional policy.[15]

There is no doubt that cordiality is an emblematic feature of Brazilian culture and it helps to understand the cause of a lot of problems that lies in the political sphere. However, a deeper analysis of its philosophical status may be helpful to behold that it can also be a feature that contributes to the appreciation of the public realm. And it can be done if we think and approach cordiality to other notions that are equally meaningful to the political philosophy: that of politeness and that of friendship, as a political virtue. Sérgio Buarque de Holanda maintains a critic and pessimistic view towards cordiality. First, there is one opposition to politeness, which the author stresses as a negative point, because in some sense it also opposes to civility. But one can hold that if politeness accompanies humanism, and therefore it can save society of the wildest forms of behavior, it is also a varnish used to cover something. Politeness is also secret;it is contempt for truth and the shelter of hypocrisy.[16]

It is possible to see another dichotomy, one more among the many present in Roots of Brazil, this time between sociability and spontaneity, or between hypocrisy and authenticity, or yet between bad and good education. Admittedly politeness puts up barriers: it makes friendly relations not the place for spontaneity and diminishes the risk of indelicacy.[17]Although it is indispensable as a code of conduct, politeness is not sufficient to think of a way of conceiving the public sphere. We can always put the question if the praise of politeness as a virtue do not imply the renunciation of the greatest impoliteness, that is, to contest or reverse the established order. If cordiality is not an ideal, it seems that the mere politeness isn't either. In fact, if cordiality implies a "living on others", and the refusal of the hierarchy, it approaches of another relevant concept to political philosophy, friendship.

Friendship in the polis is an old topic. Concept known of the Greeks, they understood the philia, friendship, in a broader sense than it is understood today. The philia included any kind of affinity or emotional bond between all human beings: it exists in everyday relations and extends to relatives, acquaintances and fellow citizens.[18]

Philia is a broad term which covers different affections. The affection between friends is not the same as between parent and child, for example. However, they are all different kinds of bonding. The Greek philia is not only love, eros, or a kind of passion. The word philia can cover all the ties of affection, from the erotic to the family, including political allegiances, humanitarian sympathies and even love for inanimate things. But most of the time it means friendship. This translation is consecrated, and Aristotle and all the classic authors who followed him acknowledge that friendship between virtuous individuals is the accomplishment of that virtue at its highest level.[19]

Aristotle devotes in the two Ethics considerable space to this virtue, which is only possible between equals. For him, friends are "the greatest of external goods."[20] Because is something so important, friendship is essential to happiness: "the supremely happy man will need friends."[21]

In the Aristotelian classification, there are at least three kinds of friendship: friendship for utility, that is, when there is some interest involved in the relation; friendship for pleasure, which takes place when it offers some sort of pleasure to a party; and finally, friendship for benevolence, that is the most perfect form of friendship between men who are good and alike in virtue: "perfect friendship is the friendship of men who are good, and alike in virtue; for these wish well alike to each other qua good, and they are good themselves"[22].

Aristotle maintains that friendship is a "state of character"[23] but essential to political society, because it establishes the bonds that are necessary for every association. It is important yet because it involves some kind of equality. There must be is some kind of similarity which is the starting point for any friendship, even those based on utility. These are less truthful and less permanent, for as they are based on the exchange of interests between parties. But friendship is also a political virtue, essential to the community for it expels faction and approaches to other supreme virtue, justice.[24]

But more than friendship between individuals, we are here interested in political friendship. The politikephilia term "civic friendship" or "political friendship", occurs repeatedly in Ethics Eudemus[25], more rarely in Nicomachean Ethics and occurs only once in the Politics[26]. Political friendship is the bond between citizens (polítai), a particular kind of friendship between comrades, also called hetairiképhilia, the "affection of comrades"[27], compared to philia, between brothers. According to Suzanne Stern-Gillet, the concept of political or civic friendship (philiapolitike) was used to describe the bond that connected all those who took part in affairs of the state and were are united in their loyalty to a party.[28]

Friendship plays an important role in ethical and political reflection. For Aristotle, there is a connection between friendship and justice, as he says in the Nicomachean Ethics: "When men are friends they do not need justice, while the men who are just also need the friendship; and it is considered that the truest form of justice is a kind of friendship."[29] He adds further that friendship also "seems to hold states together"[30]and declares "friendship as the greatest of goods for city-states."[31]

There are, therefore, moral and political benefits that come from virtuous friendship between men and between citizens. Perfect Friendship would be the highest level of political relations, even making justice unnecessary. This must explain why they are so rare. Real friendship among neighbors or comrades is exceptionally rare, and also is political friendship. This is because it demands a high degree of unanimity, concord or harmony between the parties involved.[32]

Concord is a state of harmony between those whose purposes and desires are for the same objects[33]. Now if philia occurs between similar individuals that seek for the same objects (homonoia), there wouldn't be reason for disputes in a so perfect world. That is why Aristotle says that in tyrannies friendship and justice "hardly exist", but in democracy "they exist more fully"[34]. Therefore the philosopher emphasizes the moral and political benefits of civic friendship: if we have friends, there's no need for justice.

Concord, harmony, equality. It is around these ideals that the notion of political friendship is built. It is also around these ideals that the notion of cordiality is built. It is clear that there are a difference in the extension of these concepts: friendship, according to Aristotle, presupposes a homogeneous political body, similar to itself, with a calling for unity. Cordiality doesn't go that far. However, although on different levels, we can say that the refusal of hierarchy points out to an attempt to equalize those who are different. The central difference between the two concepts is that the highest level of friendship is on public sphere. On the other hand, cordiality presupposes the private world and rejects its separation with the collective life.

Moreover, "it in the nature of friendship the coexistence and the search of their own benefit and the benefit of another."[35] In other words, people become friends seeking for a common good. Friendship, community and justice are interrelated, integrate and complement themselves. Concord presupposes this association which there is a coincidence of aims and objects. It is possible to think, in some measure, that therein lies the problem with cordiality. From this one feature of the difficult construction of the notion of citizenship in Brazil it is possible to see that, somehow, there is not a clear coincidence of purposes, and the notion of common good itself is misunderstood. José Murilo de Carvalho draws attention to the lack of "the existence of a national identity, beyond the subjective rights, which is an indispensable ingredient of citizenship."[36] The distance between state and the citizen is so overwhelming that make it difficult to think or do an approach among them, and even less to conceive the coincidence of their purposes. As an example, it is worth to think about the recruitment of members or soldiers for the army in the late nineteenth century. The recruitment of officers in Brazil has changed throughout the last century, being close to a process of democratization, but the soldiers continued to be recruited among the "unemployed, bumps, criminals and rural workers who did not have the protection of land owners. The public sentiment was the general revulsion, if not fear, for military service. People ran to get hide in the bushes and forests when any news of the presence of recruiters. Most of the soldiers were obliged to do the military service, otherwise they were arrested. A decree of 1835 ordered exactly this: if there are no volunteers, conscription would be done and the recruit would be conducted arrested and kept safely until to conform to the situation."[37]

This state of things, since Empire did not change substantially. Just remember that for a major part of the underprivileged population, the only face of the State is the police, which always present itself in a violent manner, and in most cases, acting in a unfair way. In this sense, we cannot speak on common goals or common purposes, we cannot even think about a intimate and close relationship. Here the cordiality has no place.

I tried to argue that cordiality develops a paradoxical relationship with the concept of friendship: the first binds itself only to the private world, to the intimate and personal relations; the latter can be the highest virtue in a association, it is a political quality linked to the public sphere. Cordiality approaches of friendship in the extent that it welcomes and accepts, as one does to a family member or a real friend. In this sense, the essence of friendship consists in the discourse and dialogue among citizens who share a common world, within an association with common interests. Cordiality works at the opposite way: it also implies a dialogue, but it will occur in the private sphere. This is why it has been seen as a problem to the construction of citizenship and the development process of democracy in Brazil.

At the same time that separates the public and the private,cordiality also desperately seeks to unite them; when there are differences, it seeks to approximate and make it equal: this is also the essence of friendship. It is also worth noting a willingness and an openness to the new, to the different, something meaningful and important for democracy.[38]Thus, perhaps more than a negative feature, the Brazilian cordiality can be used to think about new forms of conceiving politics: it is not about transpose the Brazilian reality to the ideal of the Greek*polis* as conceived by Aristotle. However, the sense of community, the hospitality, appreciation for autonomy and independence, the importance that it gives to equality, they are all relevant attributes to the political framework.

Blood for peace:
A case of study of law and violence

Karla Pinhel Ribeiro[1]

Abstract: The work seeks to share an experience of legal intervention in urban conflict experienced by the author as a lawyer in June 2010 in Brasilia, Distrito Federal. In Esplanada dos Ministerios, there was an Indian camp for more than six months in order to protest and claim rights on the grounds of a presidential decree in December 2009 that abolished many regional governments and indigenous posts in Brazil, leaving indigenous people from all around the country without schools, no clinics and no job because many were also FUNAI officials. The attempts of withdrawal these Indian by government were true war operations. Yet listed, besides the indigenous mobilization in Congress and persecution of the Federal Police, Civil Police, Military Police, National Force, and other federal courts. It's a bit of history of the Revolutionary Indigenous Camp and its important episodes we want to tell, so it becomes increasingly known this mark in Brazilian indigenous history. The case of study on display reasoning fits with my doctoral research in philosophy entitled "Law and Violence in Hannah Arendt and Walter Benjamin," where I analyze the theoretical positions of these authors, comparing the similarities and differences in their conceptions. So Hannah Arendt tends to distinguish the concepts of law and violence, while for Walter Benjamin, law and violence tend to identify.

Keywords: law, violence, indigenous people

The paper "Blood for peace: a case of study of law and violence" has this name because of the title of an article published in a newspaper of Brazil, Correio Brasiliense and republished and other media press and social networks.

The issue I am bringing with this text for discussion is the case of the rights of indigenous people, not only in Brazil but also place of international relations, their inclusion and exclusion in an exception relation like Giorgio Agamben understanding of Homo sacer: men with rights, it is not a crime kill them.

Disposition

The disposition of the rights of indigenous people in Brazilian legislation, are in Constitution of 1988, Chapter VIII, Articles 231 and 232. Toward the international affairs, we have, for example, the Convention 169 of the International Work Organization.

Here an adaptation of the new with resume of the case:

"The menarche - first menstrual flow – of an indian of 12 years was the argument used by Karla Pinhel lawyer who defends the 300 Indians camped on the Esplanade of Ministries since January, to prevent the removal of the protesters from 22 ethnic groups and request removal of about 600 men of the Federal Police and Military and Special Operations Police (BOPE). Sensitive to tradition, which provides insulation girl for seven days in his oca, federal judge substitute at the 6 th District Federal Maria Cecilia Rocha overturned an injunction issued by itself, and granted an injunction for the group to remain in central Brasilia without police monitoring.

The indians, who set up camp on January 2, require the repeal of Presidential Decree 7.056/09, which restructures the National Indian Foundation (FUNAI). The decree, signed by President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, extinguishes 40 regional administrations, 337 poles and replacing old servers indigenous foundation. In total, the group said at least 15 administrations will be closed or restructured in several states. Among them, Paraíba, Pernambuco e Tocantins. Indigenous people are also asking for the left of the president of Funai, Márcio Meira. 800 more Indians, according to the protesters, are on their way to the Esplanade of Ministries to strengthen the demonstration.

The first period of the small Marcia Regina Santana, 12, was seen on Saturday for their families. According to the tradition of their ethnicity (Guajajara), the girl begins to menstruate should be hidden for a week. 'At this stage, she can only be fed on rice and fish and can not see anyone. Early Sunday morning, she will participate in a ritual that marks his passage from childhood to a more advanced stage (adult)', the father explained, Edvan Bento da Silva, 28 years. The ceremony which Marcia should be the protagonist will include a small race, from one end to another of the Esplanade (the Ministry of Justice to the Health) and a bath with herbs. Upon completion, the girl must adhere to the state of Maranhão, where your group lives.

Sacred

By tradition of the Guajajaras, where the girl of his group expresses menarche becomes sacred. Based on Articles 231 and 232 of the Constitution under which recognize customs, languages, beliefs and traditions indigenous, attorney Karla asked the federal judge Maria Cecilia revoke the injunction. The legal instrument ordered that the Indians should maintain a minimum distance of 1km and could not prevent the operation of the activities of the Ministry of Justice. Karla Pinhel, who claims to work voluntarily for the Indians, was informed by Correio Braziliense, by phone, of the judge's decision. 'I am still not knowing. Just left there (6 th DF). There was a lot of pressure from the Federal Police, which had members in the office of the judge, for them vacate the Esplanade.

The anthropologist João Pacheco de Oliveira, of the National Museum of the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro (UFRJ), was surprised by the decision of the federal judge. 'She had great sensitivity. Overall, menarche is an important moment of sex reaffirmation of the Indians. Even outside of your home, the girl has the right to a traditional initiation ritual. If she does not comply, it may be an offense to the gods', Pacheco said.

Failed negotiation

Celebrated with dancing and fireworks, the decision of the 6th District Federal Court, which established the temporary maintenance of indigenous protesters on the Esplanade, was preceded by tense moments. Since early yesterday morning, about 600 federal police and military, including men of the Special Operations Police (BOPE) and cavalry, were preparing to, at any time, fulfill the first court decision to remove the local Indians. They knelt and asked the police would shoot. The police arrived at the shooting position, but declined.

The proposal of the representative of the Ministry of Justice Ana Patricia Nogueira was that the Indians would be received by the Minister Luiz Paulo Barreto, but at the same time of the meeting, should vacate the Esplanade and camping in the Mane Garrincha Stadium. 'To get rid of us, even offered daily in five-star hotel here in Brasilia. We do not need that. We want the repeal of Presidential Decree 7.056/09 and Márcio Meira left of the President of FUNAI, said Lucia Munduruku, who came from the city of Jatoba (PE) for the occupation in Brasilia. - If they do not meet, do we interdict major highways and dams threatened.

Besides Indians, servants of the National Indian Foundation (FUNAI), reportedly interested in recover their fees and functional apartments in Brasilia, also supported the 22 ethnic groups camped on the lawn of the central Esplanade. Using a headdress, Senator Eduardo Suplicy (PT-SP) tried to negotiate with the police officers who participated in the operation of removal of the Indians, but was unsuccessful."

Using a virtual platform in the teaching of Law

Cristiane Silva Kaitel[1]

Abstract: This paper deals with the challenges imposed by the Teaching of Law contemporarily and points to its improvement through the use of new instruments of education, typical for the digital era. Due to the impossibility of neglecting the breakthroughs of technology in the 21st century, the proposal consists in taking advantage of these resources as allies to the transmission of legal knowledge. This proposal has been executed by the research group Observatório para a Qualidade da Lei (a research group linked to the Postgraduate Departament of the Law School in the Federal University of Minas Gerais), through the Legistics Ning Platform, which has been used as a tool in the subject of Legistics, in the Law Major of the Federal University of Minas Gerais. Legistic.ning.br is a social net created to enhance the debate on the elaboration of Law and Legislation, and brings together academics of law, members of technical bodies in various legislative houses throughout the country, as well as Executive members, Parliament members and regular citizens interested in the dialogue over the quality of law. Because it is an interactive tool, it promotes autonomy of the individuals, as they may upload, initiate and choose the content to be discussed; it promotes a collaborative attitude and enhances critical thinking. Besides, it keeps scholars and professionals of law tuned to the most recent events providing them with constant updating and the possibility of assessing the acquired knowledge in real life. The Legistics Platform is a pedagogical innovation that goes along with the evolution of our time, and enjoys what technology has to offer, in order to promote an empowering and inclusive learning environment.

Key words: Web 2.0 NING Platform; Legistics; Teaching of Law.

1 Introduction

Observatório para a Qualidade da Lei (Observatory for the Quality of Law) is a research group linked to the Postgraduate Department of the Law School in the Federal University of Minas Gerais), created and coordinated by Prof. Dr. Fabiana de Menezes Soares, under the theoretical milestone of Legistics (or the Theory of Legislation or Legisprudence).

This research project aims to investigate the phenomenon of legislative elaboration, from legislative evaluation and planning (legitimacy building), decision support systems, the use of information technology, to the linguistic, communicative and discursive aspects of normative acts.

The study of legislation with the aim of bringing rationality into the theory and method of law creation, interpretation and application may be dated back to the XIX Century, with the studies of Jeremy Bentham, although it has gained weight in the second half of the XX Century with Peter Noll, and after him with the growing interest of European scholars such as Luc Wintgens, Luzius Mader, Jean-Daniel Delley, Ulrich Karpen, Alexander Flückiger, among others. It is a multidisciplinary field of research, therefore with a widespread reach and application.

2 Methodology

This work was conducted in the subject of Legistics, taught to undergraduate students in the Law Major of the Federal University of Minas Gerais, in a teaching practice internship.

Using the theoretical milestone of Phillipe Perrenoud on the competencies to be developed through the teaching-learning process and of Miracy Gustin on the Pedagogy of Emancipation, the aim was to come up with a practice of teaching-learning which would enhance the competencies to be developed in courses of Law, as well as take advantage of technological tools.

The teaching plan to the subject of Legistics was suited to have a theoretical part and a practical one, and thought out to motivate the students to take action and actively take part in the teaching-learning process.

This was enabled by the use of legistica.ning.com, a social network, created to enhance the debate on the elaboration of Law and Legislation. The network has over 600 (six hundred) members, including academics of law, members of technical bodies in various legislative houses throughout the country, as well as Executive members, Parliament members and regular citizens interested in the dialogue over the quality of law.

3 A pedagogical perspective and the role of the teaching institutions and its actors

According to Antônio Augusto Cançado Trindade (2006) the XX century is the century of humanization in Law. There is a permanent struggle for the elevation of the human being, the mission of believing in education and in justice, in the need to transmit the emancipating knowledge and the practice of true values to the new generation is reaffirmed (...) (TRINDADE, 2006, p.ix).

According to Boaventura de Sousa Santos (2011), we are going through a paradigmatic transition period, in which we discuss, mainly, the role of universities and other teaching institutions. Boaventura presents us with many important questions, as the tendency to understand knowledge as merchandise, the dilemma between greed and solidarity in the educational business, the problem of standardization, which kills diversity and innovation, and the relationship between the university, the State, the market and the civil society.

Along these lines, what should be the role of the teaching institutions in this context, but that would offer us the opportunity of change?

The teaching institutions should rethink their mission and their role, in order to commit themselves with autonomy, academic freedom and the social efficacy in their actions, making the humanistic ideal from this century a reality. In a century of innovation, the institutions must leave the archaic, boring, non-critical, repetitional, massifying teaching methods behind, to commit to an emancipating, creative method, so to offer courses of excellence, by conjugating teaching, research and extension, in order to provide their alumni with tools to act in a multiple, interconnected society, with effectiveness.

The only way to make this change happen is to adopt a pedagogical, emancipating, inclusive, participative and creative approach (GUSTIN, 2010).

According to Gaston Bachelard (BARBOSA, 2004) knowledge is the result of active work, in which there is a building rationalism because of a teacher-student dialogue, a dialectics in which there is constant trade of positions between the teacher and the student. We cannot talk about stationed teaching and learning, but in "learning of learning" (CAPELLA, 2011) or a teaching-learning process. This very approach presupposes a change in relation to the role of the teacher and of the student. The competencies, the skills and the knowledge to be develop by both actors are different from those applied in the traditional approach.

According to Phillipe Perrenoud (2000) a competence is a "capability to mobilize several cognitive resources to deal with a type of situation"[2] – our translation (PERRENOUD, 2000, p.15).

According to Lima (2010) the competencies suggested by Perrenoud that should be developed by the institutions on the teaching of law are: 1) To face the duties and the ethical dilemmas of one's profession; 2) to motivate the students to be active in their learning process and in their work; 3) to conceive and evolve the differentiation device; 4) to work in groups or in pairs, not individually; 5) to use new technology; and 6) to administer his/her own ongoing education.

This development is reached by innovative, inclusive and creative tools of teaching-learning, as will be seen in the following section.

4 The Ning Platform as a technological tool for an emancipatory, inclusive, participative and creative teaching of law

The Ning Platform is a social network, on a 2.0 web platform. The usage of the platform is simple, the student has to sign in and he/she would be able to enjoy all the tools of interaction available. The platform offers the possibility of creating groups (such as the group of students from the subject of Legistics), uploading and downloading videos and audio media, writing in blogs and in the forum, access to a library (with documents, articles, chapters of books, dissertations and thesis, videos and links for interviews and documentaries), and chats where he/she can interact freely.

Among the positive aspects of using the Ning platform 2.0 in the teaching of law we highlight:

It is very interactive, easy to use, inviting, collaborative, updated, inclusive, easy to access, enables creativity, enables critical discussions,

[2] "capacidade de mobilizar diversos recursos cognitivos para enfrentar um tipo de situações" – original text and enables access to good information.

Among the negative aspects of using the Ning platform 2.0 in the teaching of law we list:

There is a possible difficulty if the student doesn't have internet access at home, the moderator does have to keep close track to guarantee that the interaction suits to the teaching-learning purpose.

Concerning the competencies brought by Perrenoud, we find that the following are enhanced by the usage of the platform 2.0 in the teaching-learning environment:

1) To face the duties and the ethical dilemmas of one's profession – legistica.ning has been a channel of providing updated information, of fast access to videos and debates involving members all over Brasil about national and international events. Due to that, it enables the members to deal with the real world and brings the theory closer to practice;

2) To motivate the students to be active in their learning process and in their work – Because the platform offers a big variety of tools and welcomes the members to post and interact using the technology, it is perceived as a learning and research tool adapted to the XXI Century. It breaks the stiffness of traditional law teaching, which is in itself motivating for students;

3) To conceive and evolve the differentiation device – Each member has an individual page which he/she can arrange as he/she pleases. The platform offers creative and pedagogical functions and can be linked to other social networks (such as Facebook, Youtube and others). Due to these features legistica.ning helps the empowerment of its members, respecting their individuality;

4) To work in groups or in pairs, not individually – the working plan conceived for the subject of Legistics foresees that the students work in groups of four, according to the principles of the Pedagogy of Emancipation proposed by Gustin. The research showed that it is optimal to work in groups using the platform web 2.0, since the interaction gets more active and fast, each group was responsible for feeding the network each week with any of the tools provided by it. The students interact, collaborate and active exercise their critical thinking;

5) To use new technology – the proposed tool itself is an example of new technology applied to the teaching-learning process;

6) To administer his/her own ongoing education – on the legistica.ning teacher and students are both actors on the teaching-learning process. The teacher doesn't play a dominant role there, the process of producing and sharing knowledge is administered by all of the people involved, with freedom.

In order to assess if these competencies were in fact developed, we establish a dialogue with the students, through which they give us their feedback in a self-assessment questionnaire and post it in the subject group inside the Ning Platform.

5 Conclusions

We reach the conclusion that the use of a virtual platform, a ning web 2.0 platform, namely legistica.ning.com, is very effective in developing various competencies needed in the teaching of law. It is an information, communication and interaction environment which breaks the barriers of time and place, because it connects not only the students in a classroom but also a wide number of other citizens, who may be anywhere in the world, discussing and actively exercising their citizenship, participating in the teaching-learning activity.

The acceptable limits of public intervention in private activity

Luiz Flávio Paína Resende Alves[1]
Paulo Antônio Machado da Silva Filho[2]
Ticiane Moraes Franco[3]
Virgínia Afonso de Oliveira Morais da Rocha[4]

Abstract: Nowadays, the necessary protection to the individual freedom, including the free transit and acting has been debated. On the other hand, the regulation of this right by the state, imposing or banning duties and conducts, considering the historical, economic and social aspects of post modernity, is strongly increasing the presence of the State as a regulator of private relations. The prerogative granted to the State as an interventor in private affairs finds shelter in the axiom of dignity of the human person. However, any state intervention, though aimed at protecting the individual, must submit the State to the limits and conditions imposed by the fundamental principles, precisely because the rule, in a general sense, is sometimes insufficient to humanize the law and may compromise the democratic rule of the law.

Thus, state intervention in private affairs should recognize basic fundamentals grounded in the principle of human dignity and human values, such as personal freedom and resolutive autonomy.

In this pillar, state paternalism has an important role intervening in civil and contractual relationships, with the objective of balancing distortions originated by macroeconomic issues or facts intrinsic to trading, such as fraud, injury and simulation.

Therefore, regulation of private space through regulatory actions of the state must have a limit, so as to balance the state action and restrain the excesses that may compromise the democratic rule of the law, analyzing case by case, limiting the scope of discretion by observing its necessary and vital existence and aiming at generating a greater advantage of social regulation.

In this sense, this work encompasses a practical assessment of the state´s intrusion on private autonomy, seeking to ascertain the acceptable limits of public intervention in private activity. This leads to the determination of the necessary intensity of the intervention and its adjustment to the purposes and objectives pursued by the Constitution, considering that, since the establishment of the Democratic State of Law, any form of state manifestation cannot distance itself from the common good and social justice.

1. Introduction

With the bourgeois revolutions of the 16th and 17th centuries came the downfall of monarchical absolutism and the advent of liberalism as the dominant ideology, marked by liberty and the ideal of State non-intervention as well as the imposition of legal limits to its actions. Liberalism was marked by the protection of private property, of freedom of commerce, and of industry: "laisser faire, laisse passer, laisser contracter" (GHESTIN, 1993, p. 28-29).

It can be said, in brief summary, that liberalism divided into three major economic models: The Liberal State, the Social State, and the Constitutional State. The first, characteristically extremist in its complete absence of State intervention, based on the literal regency of the law, proved unjust as it allows for life under subhuman conditions. It also inhibits that the disadvantaged achieve equal conditions in obtaining property.

Thus came the passage from the Liberal State to the Social State, and along with it the necessity to create a more equitable society in which material equality would be reached through the provision and implementation of social, economic and cultural rights, in order to assure orderly and peaceful coexistence.

The guarantee of equality would be achieved through, among other factors, intervention of the State into private affairs, with the clear objective of establishing a legal balance in the face of an unquestionable real social imbalance. As a result, there was a corresponding growth in State regulation.

Both the period of the Industrial Revolution and the period post World War II fostered the creation of the Welfare State[5], generating government benefits for citizens through policies of full employment as well as large investments in health, education, and social security, particularly in Europe, the United States, and Japan.

The welfare state also proved to be inefficient, as it considerably increased public spending, above all in relation to social security.

In developing countries the "Neo-Liberal" model was imposed as a condition for the receipt of loans from the World Bank. While this generated great economic development, it also exacted a high price in relation to unemployment, the growth of black markets, and reductions in social guarantees.

The social and economic transformations undergone by the world economy have had a direct impact on the manner in which the State relates to economic agents and economic activities, leading to the establishment of protections in the form of laws protecting political and civil liberties as well as human rights, in the context of solidarity rights. That is, rights which are considered supra-individual (third generation rights).

In this context, given that the State speaks to equilibrium and the plurality of economic and social interests, the Democratic Rule of Law model appears. It breaks with the traditional notion of the separation of the public and private sectors in search of socially desirable objectives and the coordination of private affairs. It imposes a "publification" of private interests and a privatization of public interests. In the first we observe an ever-growing interference of the Law in private affairs. In the second, we observe the invasion of transactional instruments into the public sphere (breaking with logic of the Sovereign State) as more participative and consensual administrative tools are sought.

It cannot be ignored that these transformations have been influenced by globalization, technological evolution, and economic liberalization, which have changed the role of the State. These modifications have become necessary in the role once performed by the State in the economic life of nations.

In a more modern context, it can be seen that globalization leads to a narrowing of space-time within social, economic, and political structures as a whole, supported by a complex network of communications (FERNANDES, 2001, p.41-42), where events occurring in one part of the world have effects in another. HELD (1995, p.20-21), characterizes globalization as "action at a distance".

Thus, in the face of these social transformations, effects of globalization, and new forms of organization of the State, regulatory intervention has grown. (In this article we will touch upon the three notions of the term regulation). The objective of this type of regulation is the economic direction of markets by the State to achieve socially desirable outcomes – distributive and social justice- through impositions on conduct of private economic activity.

Thus, one of the questions related to social justice is the definition of a collective concept which allows for the distribution of resources in the face of scarcity or the presence of externalities[6]. Thus:

> On this view, the State is justified in adopting policies designed to redistribute private resources in accordance with some collectively or communally determined concept of distributive justice, and there may be a role for contract law or contract regulation in furthering this objective by attempting to redistribute or constrain the gains from trade. (TREBILCOCK, 1997, p. 20-21)

It happens that under the pretext of protection of fair distribution and social justice, the risks is borne of establishing paternalistic behaviors which transcend the interests of society or may surpass the objectives of what may be desirable.

The present article touches upon the limits of State intervention into economic activity, in terms of structural principles and legal-administrative relations, which would limit the technical discretion of the regulator, define the limits of the exercise of regulation in general, and also speak to the parameters to control the power of the State.

The theme currently sparks much interest, keeping in sight the excesses committed by states in the regulation of economic activity, These excesses many times violate the structural and legal principles inherent in legal-administrative relations. Notable among these are legality, legal certainty, confidence in the exercise of regulation, legal prohibition, as well as proportionality in the exercise of regulation.

[6] In the case of externalities, the values of autonomy produce a set of implications as to the interests and wellbeing of others. (TREBILCOCK, 1997, p. 243)

The goal is to establish equilibrium between the excesses of intervention and insufficient market protections, which are intimately associated with good administration, and should seek to maximize the interests of diverse actors within society.

2. A brief notion on the concept of state regulation and intervention in the economy - The importance to the current discussion

A primary definition is necessary which should describe what is meant by State regulation and intervention. According to the Brazilian author Clarisse Sampaio Silva, an explanation of the activity of regulation is as follows:

> A specific form of intervention in the economic order, such that the State does not directly assume the exercise of economic activities, but acting as an external agent uses normative and administrative measures, as well as informative and consensual techniques, to affect the behavior of economic agents in an effort to assure market stability, guarantee free competition, and defend other interests as guaranteed under the Constitutional legal order which might be affected by the free and unbridled development of a given activity.. (SILVA, 2005, p. 20)

I any case, the aforementioned author, citing Vital Moreira (apud SILVA, 2005, p. 20-21) further clarifies, explaining that there are at least three meanings given to the term regulation:

> a) regulation extending to all forms of State intervention into the economy, independent of the measures and goals; b) economic intervention through other means in which there is no direct participation in an activity, but in which there is conditioning, coordination and discipline placed upon a private economic activity; c) solely the normative regulation of an economic activity.

For the topic under consideration, the notion of regulation stems from the capacity of the State to intervene in public-private as well as private-private relations in order to avoid Market distortions through its ostensible powers to determine behaviors which assure that individual rights do not overarch the rights of all. Aragão (2002, p. 37), defines this as the "set of legislative, administrative and conventional, abstract and concrete, through which the State may in a manner restrictive of private freedoms or merely inductive, determine, control, or influence the behavior of economic agents, to prevent them from damaging social interests as defined by the Constitution, and orienting them in socially desirable directions".

Beyond the function of guaranteeing fairness in distribution and "socially desirable" objectives (ARAGÃO, 2002, p. 37), another function of regulation is to "actively guarantee the basic conditions of competition" (SALOMÃO FILHO, 2008, p. 53), thereby seeking positive market results, the welfare of the consumer, and the protection of social interests. Thus, regulation is necessary as an instrument in the promotion of competition in markets with less than perfect conditions for such, which demand the need for controls to demand or incentives to supply, or in those markets in which structural conditions impede the formation of competition or in which it is unviable (SALOMÃO FILHO, 2008, p. 53). These justify the need to implement mechanisms of behavioral control on enterprises and limit the degree of freedom normally associated with restrictions over economic actors.

Regulation, in this sense, is based upon the economic process, and promotes the achievement of public interests that the market on its would not. Calixto Salomão Filho (2002, p. 45) points out that regulation may be divided along two lines: (a) the school of public interest, according to which social control over an economic activity seeks to promote the public good, and (b) the neoclassical school, which through the absence of preoccupation with the public good eschews market controls and permits markets to self-regulate. What is understood by self-regulation is the free exercise of an economic activity by the actors in a determined market without external interference except as relates to antitrust legislation to control and repress anti-competitive structures and behaviors.

In this context, viewing regulation as the establishment of procedures for economic activity, regulation should encourage enterprise to meet the predetermined objectives of the regulator, especially in those economic sectors which tend to strong verticalization, which demonstrate market failures, and in particular those requiring investments in infrastructure. These constitute barriers to entry, and therefore justify regulation in order to avoid the damaging effects of monopolization or the absence of proper conditions for effective competition.

Thus, State interference may occur by means of public policies, or through the creation of incentives for economic agents to participate in the development of the market, the coordination of factors of production, by guarantee of a system of competition, all designed to achieve efficiency in allocation and decrease the probability of excessive abuse of power over the market, realized through the capacities: normative and sanction.

Finally, regulatory intervention concerns itself not only with the values of autonomy, but also with the values of well-being and distributive justice.

It is the case that the administrative regulation of a particular market, although highly technical, must not delink itself from the legal principles which endorse such administrative activity. This is because the relationships developed within the administration, and from which derive the obligations either to perform, not to perform, or to bear an onus, are safeguarded and are subject to the principles of law in general.

It cannot be ignored that in addition to the economic justifications for regulatory intervention into markets, individual autonomy is seen as a fundamental social virtue. Michael J. Trebilcock affirms that autonomy is itself a good, and as such should be respected:

> Autonomy is a good itself, and autonomous choices should be respected because they are the legitimate exercise of the right of self-government or self-determination, regardless of what outside observers may fell about the individual or social virtues of those choices. (TREBILCOCK, 1997, p. 08)

The values of well-being and distributive justice, in this case, run contrary to other values, among them private autonomy and to a certain extent, self-determination.

3. Structural principles of legal/administrative relations under democratic rule of law

This being said, the limits and intensity of action of State regulators over economic agents is directly related to the social and economic situation of each country, and should thus be linked to specific legislation. It is not the objective of this article to have a broad debate on the limits of regulation. The purpose is to deal with regulation as an administrative function of the state, which subjects it therefore to all of the principles inherent and applicable in general to Public Administration.

As such, it is a prerogative bestowed on the State to direct economic activity or even the market which establish incentives to growth of the country, for reasons of both economic and social development. On the other hand, structural legal principles, in addition to free will, should be safeguarded in the context of a free, just, dignified and unified society.

Public Administration should in general be subject to legal principles, as a way to satisfy both social interests and collective necessities, but should also concretely limit the space for discretion and act in favor of the pursuit of the common good.

But that is not all. The promotion of dignity – the primary virtue of the fundamental set of rights in a society – cannot even remotely be detached from the economic provisions contained in the law, which together with other legal provisions, sustain State intervention into the economic life of the country. In this context, free enterprise is emphasized.

Below is a brief summary of each of the principles which are applicable to the regulatory action of the State, and which should serve to limit its discretionary power in regulation. These principles should guarantee fundamental rights under Democratic Rule of Law, aiming to achieve greater societal advantage from regulation, which is both necessary and indispensable.

3.1 Principle of Legality

The link between administration and legality, as relates to the law seen as a limit to State intervention into the sphere of individual liberties, even though the power to police, may not be spoken of as separate from the law. Regulation, even when admitting a certain margin for discretion and autonomy, should not permit administrative action contra legem.

3.2 Principle of reasonableness and proportionality

One of the parameters to limit the regulatory intervention of the state is the subjection of such intervention to the proposals pursued by Public Sector policy, with its legal parameters, which should in turn be subject broad examination in the light of reason and legal trustworthiness both administratively and legally.

The exercise of reason and of proportion have as a guideline the principle of proportionality (in the broadest sense), and of the creation of doctrine. But they impose, in a practical sense the prohibition of excess as an instrument of State control. As Canotilho stated (1999, p. 263) "German doctrine raises the prohibition of excess (Übermassverbot) to a Constitutional principle, and begins the control of governmental acts from the point of view of the principle of proportionality". This principle can be translated as curbing the abusive exercise of public authority prohibition of excess is, according to Canotilho (1999, p. 267) "to avoid placing coercive acts or burdens of excessive nature upon the sphere of the individual".

3.3 Principle of reciprocal trust and barring contradictory behavior

The reliance placed in State actions is to protect the legal order and provide for social Peace, and breaking with these precepts undermines societal expectations as well as challenging legal relations. Thus the principle of trust should prevail between the State and those subject to regulation. This is due exactly to the fact that statutes, in a general sense, are sometimes insufficient to humanize the Law, and are likely to undermine the very Rule of Law. The doctrine of the Brazilian author Almiro do Couto Silva (2004, p. 274) quite clarifies the issue:

> Currently, in comparative law, the doctrine admits two distinct principles which have a close correlation. The authors thus speak to the principle of legal certainty as relates to the objective aspect of stability in legal relations, and to the protection of reliance when alluding to the subjective aspects. This last principle (a) imposes limitations upon the State to alter its behavior and to modify actions which produce benefits for recipients, even when ilegal, or (b) imposes on it patrimonial consequences for these changes, always in benefit of the trust generated among the beneficiaries, those affected, or in society in general that the actions were legitimate, and that the actions could reasonably be expected to be upheld.

3.4 Free enterprise

Free enterprise evokes an idea of the market, and liberty in the factors of production. Additionally, it evokes idea of the exercise of an economic activity. As relates to freedom of initiative, asserts Amaral Neto (1996, p.229):

> Economic free enterprise is a quid plurir. Collective activity of the t is not reducible to the sum of other freedoms, and does not end in the exercise of the right to property or contract rights. One may, through the use recognized legal principles of the person as an individual or as an enterprise, assert the collective activity of the company in accordance with the corporate model chosen

As such, the principle economic free enterprise represents the capitalist mode of production, sharing the idea of freedom of the individual to pursue personal enterprise freely. This principle arose through Turgot's edict of February 9th, 1776, which was subsequently inserted into the Decreto d´Allarde, of 1791. Article 7 of the same stated that, as of April 1st of that year, any person would be free to engage in any business or exercise he pleased, being only under obligation to pay the necessary and demanded fees, and being subject to policy powers.

It appears, thus, that even at its origin the principle was not applied without restrictions.

> The view of a completely absent State, that of liberalism in relation to free economic enterprise, is the pure expression of an ideal type. When measured against policy, it was already at this stage when this principle was intended to ensure defense of economic actors against the State and against corporations imposed upon them (GRAU, 2003,p. 183).

Thus, some degree of interference into lawful activity is permitted. However, it cannot surpass what is necessary for the public interest involved. Restrictions to free enterprise must be justified, as they impose excessive and disproportionate restrictions in relation to the interest being protected. These limitations are to be found in the legislation of each country.

A post-modern society recognizes the freedoms of economic agents as being bound to the legal restrictions allowed in each jurisdiction. Considering that the market is becoming more productive and active, dialectics between freedom and abuse are coming to the fore. It is an attribute of the law to protect the first and to guard against the second (PETTER, 2005, p.163-164)

3.5 Summary of conclusions reached through the principles herein considered

In summary, from this viewpoint, the principles mentioned here form parameters for the limitation of excesses in regulation, once they impose limits on administrative actions, determine the intensity of State intervention, and the suitability of regulations in accordance with the objectives of Public Sector policy. We are lead to reflect, given the discretionary nature of administrative acts, on the legitimacy of the means used in public administration to achieve the objective of public sector policy (under the exercise of reason and proportion), as under a Democratic Rule of Law, State manifestation cannot distance itself from the common good and social justice.

Respect for these principles has elevated value in the control of administrative acts, as well as the legal trustworthiness of Administration. They diminish regulatory discretion and avoid the excessive use of paternalistic measures, and so provide enhanced value to the regulations.

Conclusions

As seen, the current reality generated by societal transformations, the effects of globalization, and new forms of governmental organization impose new (although not recent) types of State interventions into the economy aimed towards the achievement of socially desirable goals – social justice and fair distribution – through the impositions on the conduct of private economic activity. Economic agents, especially companies, have come under steady intervention of the State. Plurality of interests is the trademark of the society today.

In this context, regulation as exercised by the State is not limited to the mere correction of the problems monopoly, market failures or externalities, but also to induce socially and economically desirable behaviors. Paternalistic measures are advancing in society, justified under the rubric of social welfare. Individual autonomy as a fundamental social virtue has come to be seen as contrasting with other values.

Thus, it is necessary to find a balance that leads to the harmonious coexistence between public and private interests, in the context of the legal directives and structural principles of legal/administrative relations. This must be done, however, without removing from the regulator its autonomy in the performance of its statutorily duties.

In this article we have sought to demonstrate that regulatory action of the State should be respected, keeping in sight that its necessary and indispensable activity must occur independently and autonomously, though exercised in a manner which respects the rights and fundamental guarantees of society in a Democratic State of Law, to generate a greater social benefit of the regulation. Given this interpretation, the administrative principles discussed here are a few examples to be used in curbing the excesses of modern regulatory activity when it imposes excessively paternalistic measures.

The tax as an inducing instrument of individuals behaviors

Abstract: A discussion regarding extra-fiscal tax rules, and conflict between interventionist state, and liberal state in the private sphere. The debate to be waged in the group, which is being submitted the article (here presented in abstract form) corresponds to the conflict between state action, as an intervenor in the private sphere of the individual, and, the right of freedom of actions. Thus, on one side is the liberal state where the individual is given greater freedom in their actions, and on the other hand, is the face of the state intervening, that through legal standards, influence individuals in their making decisions on matters that, in principle, would be in the private sphere.

The specific analysis of the paper will stick to tax rules, especially those that concern extra-fiscal taxation, as a phenomenon in which the state uses tax rules seeking to intervene in the behavior of taxpayers. Such rules, that character is clearly extra-fiscal, are also known as inductive tax rules, dodging from the general objective, because they have the revenue collection as "secondary function", and as a "primary function" the induction of behaviors.

Entering into an analysis of individual cases will be examined those tax rules which aim to prevent the consumption of products (such as cigarettes and liquor) through increasing the tax rate on consumption. Likewise, the analysis of the principle of selectivity that deals with the exemption / encumbrance of essential products / luxury, such as basic food / caviar. Another area of analysis would be the induction of behavior through taxation on property of individuals as a way to the property meets their social function. In this situation will be presented the comparison between the individual's right to use their property in the way to better achieve their purposes, contrasting with the imposition of a higher tax burden in order to the individual achieve a social function that your property should have. The analysis of the social function of property as a way of state intervention in the sphere of private rights of the individual, particularly in the face of its assets will also be presented.

The article, in the end, would try to seek a justification and a limit to the state intervention, through extra-fiscal tax rules, and the individual's right to act and exercise their rights on their actions, and about his patrimony, in a way that best suits him, without having to stick, and worry about the state imposition, by imposing tax, which could come to influence their planning.

1. Introduction

From the fourteenth century began the process of decline of feudalism, to the extent that the emergence of a strong central entity that could bring order in the chaos that had settled in feuds because of the absence of political organization proved necessary.

Thus kings, financed by the rising bourgeoisie, invested in and organized armies for the emergence of national states of the fifteenth century, with regulations for industries, national languages and even national churches.

The maintenance of armies was funded by taxes nationally unified, collected by a specialized administrative apparatus, which, on behalf of the central government, was responsible for organizing public finance institution.

However, insofar as the political and economic power of kings grew stronger, the administration became abusive without compliance with juridical limits. Thus, the absolute monarch was able to submit the property and lives of citizens to their will.

These factors culminated in the bourgeois revolutions of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the monarchical absolutism collapsed and liberalism has established itself as the dominant ideology, marked by the maximization of freedom and embodied the ideal of no government intervention and the imposition of juridical limits to its action. Here below the reporting of Palmeira, citing Max Weber:

> (...) Thus, liberalism touts the stability of legal guarantees that the state offers favorable conditions for the development of the market economy. Rationalize the law, then, means consecrating the neutrality of the State in the name of a supposed spontaneous order of social dynamics. In this case, it counts on the stability, security and objectivity in the functioning of the legal system, national character and in first predictable laws of administration. Otherwise, absent the guarantee is indispensable to industrial exploitation based on large capital prediction. (free translation)

Liberalism has been divided into three major economic models: the liberal state of law, the social state of law and the constitutional state of law. The first, characteristic of extremist total absence of "State intervention" and, based on a literal interpretation of the law, proved unjust, insofar as allows life in subhuman conditions, and does not enable the disadvantaged to achieve equal conditions for property.

This situation led to the creation of social movements that demanded changes in the role played by the state, with more attention to the needy.

Thus, the passage of the liberal state to welfare state resulted from the need to create a more equitable society in which substantive equality would be achieved through the provision and implementation of social, economic and cultural rights.

Ensuring equality occur through state intervention in private affairs, with the clear objective of establishing a legal balance before an unquestionable factual imbalance.

In Brazil, the constitutionalisation of social rights was with the promulgation of the 1934 Constitution, which aimed to guarantee citizens a dignified existence and ensured greater regulation of labor relations, similar to the Mexican Constitution of 1917.

The industrial revolution and the time lived after the 2nd World War led to the creation of the welfare state, enabling the generation of state benefits to its citizens through a policy of full employment and major investments in health, education and welfare social, mainly in Europe, USA and Japan.

The welfare state was also inefficient, in a way that it greatly increased public spending, particularly in relation to social security.

In developing countries the "neo-liberal" model remained imposed as a condition for loans granted by the World Bank, which generated significant economic development, but , in contrast, paid a high price due to the increase in unemployment , the swelling of informal market and the reduction of social guarantees .

With the advent of the Constitution of 1988, Brazil adopted the Democratic Law State, where beyond mere obedience to the law, there must be a submission to the popular will and purposes proposed by citizens.

Indeed, state intervention in the economy became necessary, but only as a measure of exception. In this sense, the lecture of Peluso:

> The term 'intervention', therefore, translates more properly a liberal concept, in which case the state would be doing this against that ideology, which would only be admitted as 'exception'. Do not act economically would be the 'rule' of free competition. Act would 'intervene' against the rule. (free translation)

Nevertheless, besides characterizing as an exceptional measure, the interventionist action must submit to boundaries of principles of the Constitution, behold, as already said Streck, "the Democratic State of Law Rule has as a goal to promote the transformation of society by adopting constitutional principles that should guide state action" (free translation).

2. The taxation versus the extrafiscality

With the adoption of a democratic state as a political/economic model, the constitutional legislator from 1988 proved unhappy with the economic and social order that he had found. This new reality was reflected in the express provision of the goals of the Brazilian Republic, printed on Article 3, as the guarantee of "national development", the construction of a "free society, justice and solidarity", where eradicate "poverty and marginalization" and reduce "social and regional inequalities", promoting, finally, " the good of all".

The permissive of economic regulation, turn left inserted in Article 174 of the Brazilian Constitution, allowing the interventionist role of the state through the tax law.

It is the indirect intervention by induction, consisting of state-sponsored incitement to adopt that particular market behaviour consistent with the goals of state economic policy. One of the main instruments of this form of intervention are called extrafiscal taxes.

Thus, taxation is able to induce or repress behaviours, provide distortions between taxpayers and ensure the enforcement of fundamental rights. So for, through the taxation, the State is compelled to tax in order to meet up the necessary resources to fund their constitutionally established purposes, and by extrafiscality taxation, the goal of collect revenue is put away due to the goal to promote social and economic policies.

In this sense, we see the position of Machado:

> Taxes, such as taxes generally, lend themselves as instruments for mobilizing the necessary financial resources to fund public expenditure. This is its essential purpose, but taxes may have also said extrafiscal a function, which consists of state intervention that, with them, induces is practiced or not practiced is determined activity. (free translation)

In this area, complements Machado:

> It is said that a tax is a revenue tax, or who have tax purposes when it is used especially for mobilizing financial resources. And that is extrafiscal, or has extrafiscal purpose when used for any other purpose, that is, when its purpose is otherwise, than collection revenue. Tax, or fund raising, is undergoing fully to the limitations of the power to tax. In the other hand, the extrafiscal taxes, or regulatory taxes, constitute exceptions with regard to these limitations, or some of them. For this reason they were predicted at the Federal Constitution expressly rules establishing exceptions with respect to certain delimiters principles of taxing power (free translation).

Indeed, one of the criteria for the identification of interventional standard is no direct link between the management of its quantitative aspect, which means, the tax base and the tax rate and the taxpayer's ability to pay that particular tax.

However, this criterion proves flawed, in that the rules of extrafiscal character can also relate with the taxpayer's ability to pay, whether on purpose or not. Thus was created the need for a pragmatic approach, taking as its premise the finalistic and teleological character of the standard, which will be examined in accordance with the case.

3. The limits of state intervention

The State intervention in private affairs, by applying tax rules with extrafiscal character, imposes stimulations that induce an individual to adopt certain conduct to the detriment of another.

This intervention is also called legal paternalism, which conceptualizes how the editing rules that aim to satisfy the best interest of the individual, requiring him or her abridging certain behaviours.

The legal paternalism is most striking in private relationships in which notes the existence of the theoretically weaker party in contractual relations. This is the case of the workers, labor relations, and consumer contracts involving consumerist relationship.

In these situations, we start from the assumption that the hyposufficient part presents a cognitive deficit regarding the lack of information about a particular product or service (consumer) or shows obliged to accept unfavorable conditions for subsistence (worker).

In the field of taxation, we can mention the inducing tax rules that increase in a extreme way the value of taxes on marketing of luxury items such as drinks and cigarettes. The application of the tax rule with extremely high rates, and, which, in the principle, could be regarded as confiscatory, are actually a form of the State inhibiting the consumption of such products by individuals in an attempt to influence their behaviour in choosing consumer goods. Therefore, in order of a extrafiscal function from this tax rule, there would not be, for example, a way to raise a questioning about a possible confiscatory character of such standard, since it would be faced with an intention of the legislature more involved with the induction of behaviour than necessarily a high imposition of taxes.

Schoueri points levels of incidence of tax rule that rise according to the degree of need for the state to induce the taxpayer behaviour in every situation . In this sense it has the undesired behaviour, the substitute behaviour and deviant behaviour. In summary, the tax should become more heavily unwanted behaviour towards the desired one.

However, although the use of taxes as instruments of intervention is salutary, to what extent could the State influence/induce individuals through such tax rules is a matter of tax policy. It could be questioned, for example, the extent to which the State may exercise its authority over the individual, depriving him of purchase/consume certain goods through a extreme high tax levy. After all, by raising, for example, the price of a pack of cigarettes at $ 10.00 (ten dollar) to $50.00 (fifty dollars), the State would not, somehow limiting the right the individual to acquire certain property?

The search for the general welfare could be an answer, insofar that with a value of 700% more expensive, cigarette consumption would decrease, which resonate in a more healthy condition for the individual consuming it, besides the decrease of environments infested by cigarette smoke or even lower rates of diseases caused by overuse and, in some cases, treated by the public health system.

We found it in this type of intervention, the State seeking benefits for society as a whole, but also for the individual himself directly affected by tax law.

Another point worth mentioning concerns the way the tax law shall be considered when there is an inducer function in order to lead an intervention by the State in the decisions of individuals. In this sense Schoueri points out that:

> When you highlight a function of the tax law, in case, the inducer function, what is done is a new offshoot of the primary standard. Shall be taken - a first primary standard, which will be present in the induction itself, by the legislature, which, from a legal standpoint, is nothing more than an order for the taxpayer to adopt certain behaviour. Not making behaviour, arises a tax liability, the taxpayer will put in more costly situation than that in which if adopted would range prescribed by the legislature behaviour. Finally, do not alter the secondary standard, since the failure of the tax liability, the penalty will arise a sanction provided by the State (free translation).

In this sense, Schoueri presents the example of real state tax (IPTU) and the authority of the municipalities. The 1988 Federal Constitution, in Article 182 makes clear the possibility that the tax impact of property tax could be increased through progressive tax rates, if the property in question does not attending a social function, which would be predicted in an ordinary law known as "Plano Diretor". In this sense, the primary tax rule will present two different situations. The first situation, the individual owner of the property would have attended the social function wanted by the State (in this case the municipality). In this situation, the tax assessment corresponding to the IPTU would be levied with a lower rate, as an incentive to the individual owner (the taxpayer) meet the determinations contained in the ordinary law of the Municipality. On the other hand, the second situation described in the tax rule would be one in which the taxpayer would not have attended the social function, and therefore the tax levied would be increased as a way to induce him to achieve the function social.

Therefore, from the moment the State act in an interventional way, trying to achieve the welfare of the community, the tax rule that carries the purpose of inducing desired behaviour, no longer has the fiscal neutrality. In this sense Schoueri, citing Moncada, argues that:

> Beyond mere correction of market mechanisms, arises in interventionist State, to a different standard paper, in relation to which it was secured in the liberal state: it "now assumes an economic and social content losing value neutrality that characterized the liberal moment. (...) When running values, the State operates constitutively in economic and social spheres, shaping it according to axiological load assumed. (...) The State thus becomes permeable to socioeconomic content that alter his understanding; of guarantee limits of power and respect for individual liberty a legislative program achievements becomes. The concept of State of law is of a positive nature, in moving to incorporate a state action is not only the subsidiary, but to confirm a socioeconomic model" (free translation).

Indeed, the economic intervention is legitimate and necessary to the implementation of public policies, as well as to intervene in individual behaviour, having as main objective the social welfare.

As a rule, there are no objective limits to the exercise of paternalistic State through intervention by tax rules. The Legislative Power is free to exercise their legislating within the limits of formal legality activity, as well as attention to the constitutional power to tax, predicted in Article 150 of the 1988 Constitution.

To the Executive Power was given the opportunity to manage the rates of customs taxes, and the financial transactions taxes.

Thus, before the voluntary and necessary absence of objective criteria for State intervention by tax regulations, it is questionable which limit the discretion of the Tax Authorities to exercise paternalism, in particular.

The answer to this question is certainly permeated between the principles that guide the activity of public administration, as discussed below.

4. The tax policy and the principles of administrative law

According to Mello the principle of the supremacy of the public interest over private proclaims the superiority of collective interest. It is the assumption of stable social order in which each and every one can feel secured and guarded.

Thus, the state may be in a position of superiority in relation to the individual, by focusing taxes on daily facts, for reasons which form the very basis of taxation: a) the need for revenue for maintenance of the State and, b) the achievement of state organizations, which mix with the effectiveness of fundamental rights.

Thus, the State acts, based on the principle mentioned, searching through taxation to induce certain behaviours to individuals. Induction often justified by economic policies being provided to the State, through the Executive Power modifying certain tax levies through changes in tax rates. This is done by editing decrees and through the policy adopted by the Government, at its own discretion, targeting particular outcome in the economy.

In these cases, to escape the rule of legality, the principles of motivation and morality become even more evident, in the extent that protect the legal certainty of the individual, being essential for the discretionary acts from the Public Administration are motivated by legitimate, moral and ethical reasons (the economic policy of the state).

Such values are revealed even stronger in a democratic State, in which sound louder the ideals of justice, equality and fraternity, where there is no way to conceive the Law dissociated from its ethical foundation. In this sense, Alves Junior:

> The Democratic State of Law requires the rapprochement of ethics to politics, from the moral law, making it legal rules were before cloistered within the limits of the moral field, the interest of political and economic model (free translation).

According to Carvalho Filho:

> the principle of morality requires that the public administrator does not dispense ethical precepts that must be present in their conduct. Should not only ascertain the criteria of convenience, opportunity and justice in their actions, but also to distinguish what is honest than is dishonest. We add that such conduct must exist > not only in relations between the Administration and administered in general, but also internally, which means, the relationship between the administration and the public officials who comprise.

Thus, the morality of the Public Administration requires that the purpose of the administrative actions align with the purposes of the public interest, and observes the ethical limits even if the action is directed to the public interest.

It is noteworthy the economic regulatory taxes, which were covered by no need for compliance with the principle of legality, allowing the management of rates by editing simple executive orders.

In this sense, the Legislator insert at the Constitution of 1988 the possibility of mitigation of that principle of legality, by admitting that the Executive Power establish the tax rates of customs taxes, industrialized products tax (IPI) and the financial transaction taxes (IOF).

Indeed, it does not appear moral that the Executive Power – in front of a mere failure to provide cash – uses the constitutional rule to enlarge their financial resources, without prior examination of the Legislative Power. Important to note that managing tax rates without the need for law must necessarily have a regulatory purpose, not being ethical and moral that the Public Administrator uses these taxes for purely revenue purposes.

The arbitrary use of regulatory taxes, besides being immoral, shakes confidence between citizens and Public Administration, because may surprise individuals in their financial planning.

Regarding the principle of trust, we can infer the same through the principle of legal certainty in tax matters, like one connect to another, and both applicable to the taxes classified as regulatory ones.

Legal certainty, and as a result the confidence that the taxpayer may have is due to the legal system itself, which has as purpose to assure citizens the application of legal standards, strengthened in tax law through the principle of tax law.

Therefore, tax incentives and tax benefits earned through exemptions, amnesties, remissions and etc. existing in principle to regulate certain sector of the market, may not be revoked retroactively to cause the tax levy to those taxpayers who relied on such benefits from the State, and finished planning their activities due to the lower tax burden so far guaranteed.

Indeed, the act of State intervention in private relationships for tax measures must also meet the reasonableness and proportionality, as a criterion for prudence of different treatments, being the Tax Authorities responsible to prove that economic intervention is appropriate and proportionate in view of the measure itself, that will suit the purposes of the economic order.

The principle of proportionality, together with the reasonableness will define the limits to state action through the tax levy. In this regard an analysis of rational motivation will be made, relationship between the finality and the ways to achieve, and, especially, prudence of the State actions.

Judging the constitutionality of Municipal Law from Santos, former Minister of the Supreme Court, Orosimbo Nonato, understood excessive increasing of the tax on toilet cabins. According to the Rapporteur, the power to tax can not get to the unbridled power to destroy, since that can only be exercised within the limits that make it compatible with the freedom of labor, trade and industry and the right to property. It is a power, in short, which the exercise should not go up to abuse, excess, deviation and applies even here, the fruitful doctrine of abuse of power.

The principle of proportionality is given, in the solution of a particular case, the verification of three essential elements: the adequacy of the means used by the legislature in achieving the intended purpose, the need for the use of those means; reasonable and effective measure (proportionality in the strict sense) , measured from the balance between the meaning of the intervention to the objectives pursued and achieved.

Proportionality in the strict sense, the induction tax rule undergoes principle prohibiting the exaggeration under review its necessity, which means, that the same result could not be achieved as efficiently by means of a measure that affects less citizens. Making it necessary to assess the relative effect of the standard with its purpose.

Thus, it will be necessary to consider the importance of the substitute behaviour (the one desired by the legislature) and the other one (the behaviour not desired by the State), taking into account mainly the factual possibility of these alternatives and their costs.

In this sense, it is suggested to compare the situation that would have if the State had taken a direct and individual interventional measure. It is from this comparison that will be extract the question if the inducing tax rule, at the concrete circumstances: (i) is compatible with the purpose (ii) is still the most neutral measure (quantitative reasonableness), considering also the goal of influencing the little as possible on free competition.

The principle of proportionality confirm that "would only be allowed to grant exemptions to new industries where the earnings of capital employed in the industrial investment are random and uncertain" since "if the taxpayer receives reasonable profits for its industrial activity, does not justify exemptions under the label of the new protection industry".

In the environmental field, the rule that discourages a polluting activity should have its constitutionality examined from the condition that other equally polluting activities are also affected, otherwise just turn away customers to other polluting activity, including details on the first without any reasonableness.

Another field using the induction rule is tax progressivity of taxes for so-called "non personal taxes". The structural progressivity was contemplated by the Constitution legislator at the real state tax (IPTU), which enable to the Tax Administration demands to the taxpayer follow a directive from the appropriate use of the property under a "penalty" to levy a higher tax, which is progressive over time. Also in relation to the tax on rural land (ITR) there is a tax rule that allows for the fixing of rates in order to discourage the retention of unproductive properties.

The selectivity, in other hand, applies in the present constitutional system leads to the application of tax rules for the tax on industrialized products (IPI), and for tax on goods and services (ICMS), and is mandatory for the first one and optional for the second one.

The Constitution of 1988 does not specify what should be considered essential. The understanding is that the tax falls on the property in the inverse ratio of their need for popular consumption and in direct proportion to their superfluity, according to doctrine.

In this sense, the question arises: can the ordinary legislator introduce inducing tax rules, and then adopting the tax rates for that not to graduate according to the parameter of the need? We believe that is not possible. The answer, however, is subjective and may be obtained in accordance with the governing principles presented above.

5. Conclusion

Brazilian Economic Order based on the principle of free initiative, ensuring that all the free exercise of any economic activity, regardless of authorization of public agencies, except in cases provided by law. Hence, therefore, it is essential to distinguish the cases of legal and illegal activities. If illegal, there is no way the legislator can admit this kind of activities. If the activities are legal, on the other hand, there is no way the tax legislator prevent its exercise. Certain is that the legislator, pondering constitutional principles, may seek to restrict the exercise of certain activities when public policy interests indicate the inconvenience of their uncontrolled use.

It must distinguish the legal rule that the State uses as a legal instrument to prevent or discourage directly an act or fact that the law prohibits the extrafiscal tax that is prohibitive, when there would be a predetermined duty by a legal rule that State uses as a legal instrument to prevent or discourage, indirectly, an act or fact that the legal order permit. So, for environmental reasons, as an example, may be intended to reduce the number of cars in circulation, or the number of established industries in a certain region. Also, shall be taken, in this case, the possibility of inducing use of tax regulations, which may even be higher than normal.

That means that the tax burden can not be so high to preventing economic activity not prohibited by law. It is import to inspect, always, if it is the removal of part of the heritage of the particular, through taxation is in accordance with the principle of ownership. Here goes the following rule: if the economic order would not tolerate the State, through direct act, limit or reduce the scope of private property through direct intervention, either you can do it by inducing tax rules. On the other hand, it is possible to see how totally appropriate is the use of inducing tax rules of economic behaviours for which the State seeks from the individuals a more appropriate behaviour for society as a whole, provided that such indirect imposition of reasonable behaviours.

The intervenue of public law in private law: Brazilian reality

Juliana Falci Sousa Rocha Cunha[1]

Abstract: The boundaries between public and private law are becoming less and less clear, increasing the state control over the private activity. At the beginning, this study will focus on the fundamental differences between these two branches of law. Furthermore, it will be discussed some situations of Brazilian legal reality, which lead to the interpenetration between these branches, reducing the boundaries; but that should be carefully analysed in order to avoid injustice in the private and public spheres. Previously the rules of private law were marked by individual's autonomy, being free to make choices in private and business life. Meanwhile, the rules of public law were founded on the sovereignty of public interest over private one, restricting the Government relationship between not only citizens but also other States. There was a clear division between these two branches of law, what no longer exists. Currently the division between these branches is imperceptible.

There are many cases of public interference over private sphere in Brazilian's legislation and case law. The social function of property has imposed duties on the owners such as condemnation and recording properties. The contracts also follow this same way, in other words, they have to find their social functions over the parties' legal affairs. Even affection between people is no longer considered a feeling, but has become an obligation imposed by the state, under penalty of condemnation for affective abandon. And the inalienability clause imposed by the testator: being restricted to the legal situations admitted, wouldn't be excessive the state intervention in the private sphere? At the end this study will briefly analyse the limit of intervention between the public and private laws in the Brazilian reality.

1. Introduction

The public and private law have been linked in such a way that the boundary between them is becoming less apparent, leading the increasing state control to the private one.

Therefore, to a better study of this growing link between the two branches of law, it is essential not only the concept, but also the difference between public and private law.

It is also relevant to analyse examples of public law interference, which can be found in Brazilian's laws and case law, such as contracts: sometimes the business interests fail due to the social contract functions.

In this way, this study intends to talk about the limits of the public intervention in the private law, particularly in Brazil.

2. Historic

The difference between the public and he private law is ancient, having been started with "Corpus Juris Civilis", the Roman Law. REALE (2009) states that:

> The first division that could be found in the history of the Science of Law was the one made by the Romans, between the public and the private law. Following the criterion of private or public interface "utility": the first would be related to the State ("publicum jus et quod ad statum rei romanae spectat"), while the second would be related to the interest of each one ("privatum, quod ad singulorum utilitatem spectat").

The Ulpiano's "Digest" says that "publicum jus est quod ad statum rei romanae spectat, privatum, quod ad singulorum utilitatem". It means that the public law is related to the state of the roman things, while the private one is connected in some ways to the utility of private men.

In medieval times the public law was part of the private law. The land owner, for instance, had sovereign power not only over his "feud" but also over its inhabitants, imposing rules, charging taxes and having political power and social standing.

Some discussions about the distinction between the State and the civil society emerged in the 18th century, what brought about the coming back to the ancient difference between the public and the private law. According to FACCHINI NETO (2010), we can remark a division between the law which deals with the private interests and the one which looks after the State, not only in its structure but also in its operation.

The French Revolution (1789-1799) with the Declaration of Man and Citizen's Rights recognised the rights of citizens against the State. At that time, GOEDERT and PINHEIRO (2012) stated:

> [...] the private law reflects on the ideology of the bourgeoisie, showing the needs of the social and economic class who gain power, passing through codes endowed with material primacy over the Constitution – which holds a secondary place - to totally regulate the society exclusively based on the bourgeois ideologies and wishes.

Thus, according to GOEDERT and PINHEIRO (2012), these constitutions showed "the division of powers" as an expression of internal limit to the State power and the recognition of the fundamental rights" because these rights limit the power of the state.

During the Liberal State there was a great effort to establish the limits between the public and the private law. The public law was related to the representative government, which guided the interests of the society through the State, while the private law focused on human being, emerging from the individual's contractual autonomy. So, with the empire of this autonomy, it was only allowed to the State to pacify the citizens, so that they could act according to their own will.

At the end of of this period, even with the prevalence of the private law over the public one, the State began to have more opportunities acquiring the power that was before from the citizens, what developed the Welfare State.

In the Welfare State, there was a large State intervention in the society, which resulted in the development of the State. At this moment, there was a huge tendency that led to confusion between the private and the public law. Although, the Welfare State went on until the arrival of the Democratic State of Law.

Nowadays there is a distinction between the public and the private law, but it is been increasingly reduced. According to GOEDERT and PINHEIRO (2012), there is a "movement towards decoding the private law ".

3. Concept: the public law and the private law

It is important to study what some doctrines state about the concept of the private and the public law.

According to DINIZ (2013), Saviny says that the public and the private law differ one from the other according to the aim of the law. The author affirms that:

> While in the public law the collective displays itself as an end and the individual remains in the background, in the private law each person, considered individually, is the goal of this branch of the law and the legal relationship only is a way to come into existence and private conditions.

In DINIZ's (2013) opinion, on the one hand the public law would be responsible for establishing the rules that guide "the relationship in which the subject is the State, safeguarding the general interests and aiming to achieve the social objective facing its members and other States". On the other hand, the private law would be in charge of the legal relationships among persons.

GAGLIANO (2013) explains that the public law would be related to the political society, its organisation, services and repression of delicts. But, there are also the Constitutional Law, the Administrative Law, the Criminal Law, the Procedural Law, the International Law and the Environmental Law. Meanwhile, the private law includes the Civil Law, the Commerce and Trade Law, the Consumer Law and the Labour Law as well.

MELO (2008) says about the public and private law:

> [...] there is no doubt that all clauses that are destinated to life, structure and operation of the State are Public Law [...], the relationship among several States [...], the administration of justice in the interest of people [...] because this is still the function of the State sovereignty. The clauses related to the person, to his family and also to the development of his patrimony belongs to the Private Law.

Finally the Public Law is interested in safeguarding all of the society. Meanwhile, the Private Law is in charge of the person's interests.

4. Difference: the public law and the private law

In the past, we studied a lot the distinction between the public and the private law. According to REIS (1998) the ancient thinkers of the dichotomy of the public and the private law showed different criteria: "Hollinger, in 1904, presented 114 criteria, Roubier [...] 17 [...], Pontes de Miranda more than 20, Mota Machado 9."

So that among many criteria studied, this brief study will talk about some of them such as "the addressee of the regulation" and "the protected interest".

Firstly, it can be analysed from the norm's addressee. If the State: Public Law; If a person: Private Law.

It is also possible to think about the subject of the regulation. If it is an "organisational law," like REIS (1998) said, it is a Public Law. Otherwise, if it is an " attributable law", it will be considered a Private Law.

According to BOBBIO (2007), the dichotomy between the public and the private is based on the equality and inequality:

> As the Law is a proceeding of social relations, the first great distinction between the public / the private dichotomy is: between equal and unequal. The State, or any other organised society in the public sphere, even if total or partial, is characterised by the subordination of the relationship between the citizen and the government, which is unequal; the natural society as described by jusnaturalists or market society according to the classical economists taken to a private sphere as opposed to the public one, is characterised by the relationship between equals [...].

In SARMENTO's (2010) opinion, the "interest" could also be analysed:

> […] the public law would correspond to the topics which have a preponderance of public interests, while the Private Law was responsible for the issues of discipline that would be related more directly to individuals, leaving the interests of the collectivity to be studied later.

As stated before, we can understand that the relationship between the private law's are done in the private sphere, without the interference of the power of the State, while the relationship of the public law regarding the public scope is guided by the interference of the state power of the State considering the achievement of the community objective.

REIS (1998) also says about the "main interest" of the law:

> […] the regulation is inside the Public Law when not only directly and immediately protects a public interest but also indirectly and mediately protects a particular interest. When the regulation is a Private Law, it depends on the intensity or density of the main interest.

REALE (2009) declares that there are "two complementary ways of making difference between" the Private and the Public law. Firstly, it should be checked the legal relationship content: "when it is aimed immediately and directly to the public interest, the law is public"; "when it is aimed mediately and indirectly to the private interest, the law is private". Secondly, it should be analysed the form of the legal relationship: "it is usually considered private law if the connection is coordinated, public law if it is subordinated".

According to CARMO (2010), it's possible to assert that the present dichotomy of the Brazilian Public Law and Private Law is the result of the historical evolution:

> The present form of the Brazilian State came from the ideals outlined in the neoliberal period – brought about plans to change and reorganise the state in the end of the 20th century. Furthermore, it dealt with the context of the democracy outlined in the Republican Constitution (1988), which undoubtedly assumed the responsibility to create a system of cooperation and integration between the public interest pursued by the Administration, the social concerns and the new market demands. Therefore, the current State has the constitutional mission to make an effort to build a strict and prosperous democracy, getting particular attention to form new partnerships with the people, going up in value the consensus and also the citizens formation leading to them participating and acting in the social sphere.

So the subject: the private "goes public" and the public "goes private" has recently been discussed. In the first case, it has been said that it's the private interest is subordinated to the public interest or to the society, that is represented by the State. The public "goes private" refers to the group formation of private interests that takes advantage of the public interests to achieve the private interests.

However, it's important the demarcation between the private and the public law, but it's not essential. Nowadays the challenge of the State is to make possible the harmonious coexistence between the public and the private, always aiming the public interest.

5. Cases of interpenetration in Brazil

From now on some cases of connection between the public and the private law in the Brazilian reality will be briefly analysed in some aspects such as: social function of the property, contracts, affective abandon and inalienability.

5.1. The social function of the property

It's interesting to check what MARQUESI (2005) says about the theories of social function and their relationship with the property:

> (…) when the theories of the social function were created, they took into account the agricultural wealth. They didn't analyse other important irradiations of the domain, not only the relationship between owner and workers but also the natural resources and the urban property. However, after those other new restrictions have been imposed in the community's favour (the most recent ones are related to the environment). Thus, not only the meaning of the property rules comes from a slow transformation, but also the extension of the principle of the social function has been evolved from this century.

So, in Brazil when talking about property we must look carefully at the Constitution, always focussing attention on the social function.

For instance, the urban property must obey the City's Master Plan, which describes the fundamental requirements to the city organisation.

The rural property must respect the rational and adequate use of the land and also the correct use of natural resources always trying to preserve the environment.

The social function of the private property being fulfilled the intervention of the State should not be allowed (it can only be inspected).

But, if the property does not fulfill its social function, the State should act so that it could be fulfilled according to the Constitution and the law.

COSTA (2003) states that "[...] the intervention reveals the legal power of the State, based on its own sovereignty. It is the real power of the empire that the community should obey."

The intervenue of the State in the private property can occur in two different ways: restrictive and suppressive. In the restrictive intervenue, the State imposes restrictions on the private property, so that the owner must preserve it, as in recording, public easement, requisition, temporary occupancy and public restriction. Otherwise, in the suppressive intervenue the private property is transferred to the State and the owner loses his property, known as "condemnation".

The kinds of public easement, requisition, temporary occupancy and public restriction will not be detailed, what could be analysed in another opportunity.

The "recording", for example, a restrictive intervenue, is an administrative procedure in which the State, in order to preserve it as a public interest, imposes restriction on the private property. An example is the recording of properties in Belo Horizonte/MG (Brazil), which were built in the end of 1800s and had a typical architecture. The "recording" reduces the price of the property, makes its sale more difficult to negotiate, goes up the repair costs and demands special studies to be mended. Even if the property doesn't have to pay the annual tax (the Urban Land Property Tax), the owners' properties affirm that a recording property is not financially viable, particularly because of the hard procedure of repairing it imposed by the City Hall.

So, it is important to mention part of an amendment (First Federal Court - First Region) related to "recording":

> [...] the recording, which has a collective importance, comes from the identification that a particular area has some peculiarities which need special maintenance. In these areas the public interest of the properties is superior to the owners' one.
> [...] In these cases, the restriction imposed can be justified by the interest of the urban preservation, which represents the historical patrimony. (BRASIL. Tribunal Regional Federal – 1ª Região - AC: 6666 MG 2001.38.00.006666-6, Relatora: Maria Isabel Gallotti Rofrigues. Data de Julgamento: 24/11/2008, 6ª Turma, Data de Publicação: 19/01/2009 e-DJF1 p.154)

The condemnation is an administrative procedure by which the State, with previous declaration of public requirement, public utility or social interest, imposes on the people the loss of the property through a payment of an indemnification. However, in some cases the Brazilian justice provides indemnities that are not directly influenced by the market value of the property. Unfortunately, these Brazilian's families are unable to acquire another property similar to that one. In some cases, the owners request the judicial indemnification, but generally without any success.

In conclusion, the State can intervenue in the private property due to the public interest. But, this intervenue should be reasonable and the owner of the property should not suffer any consequences.

5.2. Contracts

The contract is an agreement signed by the parts, which are adjusted to their will. Each part has the freedom to define the content of the contract and also the option to sign it or not.

MARQUESI (2005) says:

> The State always tries to preserve the contract equilibrium, imposing a counterbalance when needed. The contract parts (employer and employee, supplier and consumer) are materially unequal; the rich people's wishes take advantage of the poor's ones [...]. Therefore, the government action is required to keep balance: through the contractual duty, the delimitation of the will or using mechanisms which could favour the rights of the person who is in disadvantage.

The contract is being increasingly affected by the State intervenue, what has caused a social sight of the contract theory. However, it doesn't represent the independent and perfect wills. The intervenue takes place not only in the Legislative Department but also in the Judiciary one.

The Legislative intervenue in the private law is called "contractual dirigisme" and it limits the contractual freedom imposing cogent norms. HIRONAKA (2003) says about the "contractual dirigisme":

> The legislative intervenue of the State [...] carried out a new period, where the bad judicial liberalism consequences were de> creased by the social protection (which was economically available to the powerless). As a result of that, the "contractual dirigisme" repelled the contractual forms, which the law was available to one part and the obligation was only available to the other part.

The Consumer Code is an example of intervenue of the Brazilian State. The main purpose of this Consumer Code is the protection of consumers. The apparent inequality of this law aims at the supplier and consumer contract equilibrium. In that way, the formal inequality is accepted due to the material inequality.

The Brazilian Consumer Code allows the cogent norms to consumer contracts, for instance, the consumers who are favourable to the interpretation of the contract clauses (article 47); refuse right (article 49) and abusive clause (article 51). Besides, that Code has also a clause related to good faith, loyalty, equilibrium and harmony between consumer and supplier.

The Civil Code (2002) has interventionist norms, especially those related to the contractual relationship, which always seek ethic and social justice.

PINHEIRO (2002) states about the judiciary power intervenue:

> With progressive, active-productive, practical characteristic there are new models of legal thoughts based on the Case Law of the Interests and also on the Case Law of the Values. The jurist is invited to transpose the limits of the previous performance, turning his attention to the "interests" and the "values" which the legal institution can fulfill.

The Civil Code brought general clauses, which promotes the legal contract intervenue. RODRIGUES (2004) says about the judicial intervenue:

> We do not fear the mercy of the judge: we trust on him; it is essential not to obey it in fixed regulations. At least, he should know what is asked to him. So, what is asked to him? It's asked to him to establish the social function of a right, how the legislator recognises the existence of the rights of the property, the parental rights etc. Such a question does not involve solution on legal sphere because it is really great. The judge, forced to answer it, must stop controlling the law [...]

Finally, the judiciary making use of the Brazilian legislation, has instruments that allow it to intervenue in contracts aiming to limite their freedom.

5.3. Affection – affective abandon

The Family Law has some cogent public regulations, which cannot be moved away following the part's desire. GAGLIANO (2013) says that "the fact of belonging to the Private Law does not mean that the regulation of the system are all individual".

The Civil Code has Principles of Minimal State Intervention in the Family Law, as showed:

> Article 1513. It is not permitted to any person, public or private, to interfere in the communion of life established by the family.

In PEREIRA's (2012) opinion:

> The intervention of the State should merely protect the family and give it some guarantees, including the great manifestation of its will and that its members could live in such good conditions to maintain the affective core.

One example of this is the purpose of the State in norms related to members of the family and also to food. Regarding material assistance: there are a lot of regulations that force parents to provide material assistance to their children. The members of the family are highly protected by the State. For instance, the food is not renounceable and the civil prison of the debtor is admitted.

On the other hand, the right to moral assistance has always been discussed in the doctrine. It takes place due to questions related to the possibility of direct intervenue of the State in people's private sphere, demanding that one loves the other, otherwise the person should be ordered to pay "pain and suffering damages". It's called "affective abandon".

Until the Superior Court of Justice's decision - Appeal 1.159.242/SP (April 24, 2012), the Court was against the possibility of conviction for pay "pain and suffering damages" for affective abandon. The Court understood that in the Family Law the indemnity should not be analysed aiming punishment, other actions could be taken like the loss of parental power. It also considered that moreover the pecuniary conviction could also reduce the chance of a familiar reception. In the judgment of the Appeal 757.411/MG, the Minister Fernando Gonçalves concludes that " the judiciary can not force someone to love or to maintain an affective relationship; no positive purpose would be achieved with a claimed compensation."

After the Superior Court of Justice has changed its position, especially in the judgment of the Appel 1.159.242/SP, which decided in favour of the possibility of interference in the private sphere to sentence the parents to pay a compensation for their children's affective abandon.

In that Appel, the Minister Nancy Andrighi stresses that "love can not be discussed, its imposition can only be related to the biological and legal duty to take care of children, which is people's liberty to procreate or to adopt children." According to her the psychological assistance is a parents' duty. Its omission would result in an illegal act, which may cause damages and consequently condemnation in pay "pain and suffering damages".

The Minister Massami Uyeda, in his defeated opinion, remarked his concern with the consequences of pioneering decisions as the Minister Nancy Andrighi, such as violation of the principles of reasonableness and proportionality, because many children could complain about the education given to them by their parents. In his opinion, that decision cannot allow damages. He also defends that the property rights are guaranteed to the children at the moment of the inheritance. In this case there is no need to talk about pecuniary condemnation of "pain and suffering damages".

So, the change in case law states that the intervenue of the State in people's private lives influences the relationship between the parents and their children.

5.4. Inalienability

The inalienability clause doesn't allow the alienation of the property. It could not be donated, sold or be given in payment.

Therefore this clause aims to protect the family patrimony against future uncertainties.

Most of the doctrine, says that the properties can be incumbrance with the inalienability clause in wills and donations.

An important effect of inalienabity is the consequent imposition of incommunicability and "restraint of mortgage", even if they are not in the instrument of donation or in the will (aricle 1.911 – Brazilian Civil Code).

However, the Civil Code quotes: "article 1.848. Unless there is just cause declared in the will, the testator cannot establish the restraint of alienation, the restraint of mortgage and the incommunicability on the legitime's patrimony."

So, what is a "just cause"? According to the doctrine and the case law, it is the justification to restrict a property. For instance, a prodigal heir or legatee or even who has a mental deficiency, what could damage the patrimony management. However, only the testator is responsible for declaring the reason of the inalienability clause.

Nevertheless, the main question is the possibility of the State to impose a limit on the private sphere. For example, why cannot a testator force the inalienability clause to a property so that it remains with the family patrimony passing from one generation to the other? Is the State legislating beyond the public sphere and inappropriately reaching the private one, for instance, dealing with subjects that do not concern it?

It was usual in Brazilian society that old family properties inherited from a father to a son could not be sold due to a will clause.

Finally, according to the Brazilian Civil Law, for a person who incumbrances his patrimony with inalienation is essential to give a reason for doing this ("just clause"), what clearly shows the public intervenue in the private sphere.

6. The limit of the public law in relation to the private law

After explanations and examples presented in this study, it is possible to understand that, theoretically, the public and the private law are different, but in practice it often has not been applied. So, which is the limit for the public law performance in the private sphere?

This boundary is the Constitution, what can be reinforced by the Principle of Superiority of Constitutional Norms (the constitutional norm is superior to all infra-constitutional ones and it should have formal and substantial coexistence between the infra-constitutional norms and the other ones brought by the Constitution).

It is important to remember that the legal system is only one and that the norms, (private and public law) should always seek the most convenient for the collective interest, with the greatest possible balance between private and public interests.

The trend is to merge the public law and the private law: the public "goes private" and the private "goes public". The private interest always should be adapted to the public interest, what legitimates the State interference in the private sphere.

7. In conclusion:

The distinction between the Public Law and the Private one is ancient and has been even found in the Roman Law - "Corpus Juris Civilis".

So it is said that the Public Law protects the interests of the collective and the Private Law the ones of the individuals.

The doctrine presents many criteria to differ the two branches of the law, such as: the addressee of the regulation, the subject of the regulation, the type of relationship and the main interest.

However the dichotomy between the Private and the Public Law is losing its importance under legal discussions. The complementarity of these two branches of law has been debated and is stated that the Public Law has strongly influenced the private one, intensifying the projection of the collective interests in the relationship between individuals. The Private Law has already absorbed the collective discourse on the Public Law, so that the boundaries between these two branches of Law became permeable.

In this context, there are some cases of intervenue of these two branches of law in the Brazilian reality, such as: the social function of property, contracts, the affective abandon and the inalienability clause.

The public "goes private" and the private "goes public" have been increasingly discussed. So, the challenge of the State is the harmony of these two branches of law.

Finally, this study has shown a brief analysis of the boundary of the public law in the private sphere, which has led to make public the private law and to make private the public law. So, the State challenge is to harmonise these two branches of law.

Liberals, Communitarians, Republicans and the intervention of the State in the private sphere

Rafael Rodrigues Pereira[1]

Abstract: the aim of this paper is to discuss whether the growing intervention of the State in the private sphere – as we see in labor laws, consumer rights, bioethics and internet crimes – is compatible with the liberal ideal of neutrality, or, on the contrary, whether it can be seen as a turning point towards the position of communitarian or republican authors, for whom the State must endorse a substantive good. Such a turning point could lead to a reformulation of the public and private spheres, and, of course, raise questions over which values justify which kinds of intervention. The paper will cover these debates in three parts: firstly, by presenting briefly the history of the liberal conception of rights: we'll try to show that, from a starting notion based mostly on individual protection, the liberal tradition has turned to be more interventionist, which can be seen in the notion of "claim rights". Departing from John Rawls's work, we'll argue that this notion would allow some level of intervention, without betraying liberal neutrality. After this, we'll discuss the difference between this kind of intervention and the ones preconized by communitarians and republicans authors: the former will be illustrated by Michael Sandel's criticism of Rawls in Liberalism and the Limits of Justice, and the later by Richard Dagger's position in Civic Virtues, Citizenship and Republican Liberalism. Finally, in the third part, we'll discuss whether liberal principles can be harmonized with the republican and communitarian focus in civic virtues and the good life.

Keywords: State intervention, liberalism, communitarianism.

1. Introduction

It's possible to see the contemporary phenomenon of growing intervention of the State in the private sphere – in labor laws, consumer rights, bioethics and internet crimes – as directly related to the debate, in political philosophy, between liberals, republicans and communitarians. For one of the most important issues discussed there is State's neutrality: should government's actions favor some conception of the good life? Or should it be based only in a conception of justice, which would be – theoretically – independent and prior to such conceptions? If this latter view is associated to the liberal tradition, and if we understand "neutrality" by the refraining of intervention in people's private lives, then this recent phenomenon could reflect a trend to republican or communitarian views. But this conclusion could be too hasty, if we are able to conceive some kind of "intervention" compatible with liberal ideals. And if it is possible, how can we tell if this contemporary trend is related to such liberal view, or, on the contrary, to communitarian or republican values? And how could all those different values coexist in the same society? Those are the issues discussed in this paper.

2. Liberal interventions

Liberalism, traditionally, is supposed to have two main characteristics: a- a strong emphasis in liberty and individual rights; b- the neutrality of the State. A good way to understand what "neutrality" means, here, is by Rawls's formulation of the "priority of the just": the just isn't derived from the good. The State, therefore, must be neutral in regard to conceptions of the good life (Rawls 1971, § 5-6).

This neutrality is criticized, mainly, by republican and communitarian authors, who stress the importance of the virtues and the common good, which presupposes, of course, some conception of the good (Sandel 1998, ix; Dagger 1997, 175).

An interesting way to put this is to say that the key-concept of liberalism is autonomy, and not virtue. Autonomy, here, is understood as self-government – which, as Dagger puts it, isn't directly connected to a conception of the "good", as does the notion of virtue (Dagger 1997, 14; 17).

The emphasis on autonomy is an essential aspect of the liberal conception of rights, since its origins. Locke clearly conceived "rights" as a way to protect individual freedom – hence autonomy - against arbitrary interventions of others.[2] However, this individualistic notion has acquired, especially during the 20th century, a more stressed social dimension, establishing a kind of relationship between people. The distinction, made by Wesley Hohfeld, between claim-rights and liberty-rights, makes this point very clear: the autonomous individual is understood as an author of claims upon others. As Dagger puts it, the ancient notion of "natural rights" proceed from the idea of self-possession, but contemporary "human rights", though a direct descendant of the later, rests on some conception of "a person as a being with needs and interests, that must be met if he or she is to live a full human life" (Dagger 1997, 22).

This "social" conception of rights paves the way for a more interventionist State. A good example is Rawls's principle of difference, which can be seen as endorsing a claim right: Rawls thinks that the "least advantaged" members of society have the right to be somehow compensated for their bad luck in natural and social lottery (Rawls 1971, § 17). In this sense, the State can, for instance, tax the more fortunate – who doesn't deserve their good luck - in order to help them. This is, of course, a kind of intervention. The interesting point, however, is whether it is compatible with liberal neutrality.

Libertarian authors, like Robert Nozick, think that it isn't: if we understand autonomy as a kind of self-possession, then it implies, for Nozick, in the possession of our abilities – or "natural assets" - and of our holdings, as a product of our work (Nozick 1974, p. 224). That means that taxing people's revenues is an illegitimate appropriation of people's ownership, ergo a disrespect of their rights. Nozick compares taxing to stealing and forced labor (Nozick 1974, p. 169). This position is clearly related to liberalism's origins, when, as we said, the main purpose of "rights" was to protect individual's autonomy against external interventions.

Authors like Rawls – sometimes called "liberal egalitarians" – disagree. But their disagreement isn't about the necessity of protecting autonomy. On the contrary, their conception is also centered on this notion (if it wasn't, we wouldn't call them "liberals"). The difference to libertarian's position, then, must be understood as a different treatment of autonomy, more consonant to the relational dimension of contemporary rights.

This treatment is very well grasped by Kymnlicka's discussion: he stresses the difference between "formal" and "substantive" self-ownership. Let's imagine, for instance, a very poor person who needs a job desperately. The employer will be in a position to offer him a very low salary. Should this be considered a "voluntary transaction"? For libertarians, like Nozick, yes. As Kymnlicka puts it, they have a formal conception of autonomy, narrowly connected to the idea of "consent". If the poor person consented to his salary, then his autonomy was respected, and no rights transgressed (Kymlicka 2002, 123). As long as he had the right to say no, he didn't really belong to his employer. In this formal way, we can say that he belongs only to himself.

Egalitarians see this differently. For them, poverty and others material limitations should be seen as a kind of coercion. In his situation, the poor person can't really exercise his autonomy. The actual control of his life implies a minimum of material resources. This is what Kymnlicka calls a "substantive self-ownership" (Kymlicka 2002, 122).

Understood this way, the protection of autonomy isn't just a matter of refraining external interventions; it's also a matter of providing substantive conditions for the exercise of this autonomy. Individuals have ergo the right to claim for these conditions being provided. That's what, roughly, Rawls's "principle of difference" tells us.

This logic legitimates a kind of State's intervention that is completely compatible with liberal ideals, for it's not an intervention that threatens personal autonomy. On the contrary, it's made for the sake of it. Of course, we could think, in Rawls's case, that this intervention supports the autonomy of only some people – the disadvantaged –, while autonomy of the more fortunate is, in fact, disrespected. But it is not that simple. This is precisely the point where Rawls's notion of "ignorance veil" intervenes.

Rawls is, here, inspired by Kant, who thought that we are autonomous individuals only when our actions aren't determined by external, empirical laws. We must follow just the laws we give ourselves, which happens when we are rational in a strong sense (Kant 1993, Section III). The way Rawls finds to express this Kantian idea is to suppose that the principles of justice regulating a well-ordered society are chosen behind an ignorance veil: people don't know the empirical circumstances that particularize their situation in the world - social position, power, degree of intelligence or other talents, and even their psychological propensities. Rawls thinks that only in this hypothetical situation people can chose, in an autonomous and fully rational way, the principles that will regulate their lives. As he tells us, only then their choice will "express their nature as rational and autonomous agents" (Ralws 1971, § 40). In this sense, if some people pay taxes for the benefit of the least advantaged, their autonomy is being fully respected, because they are following principles that they would have autonomously chosen in the original position.[3]

Besides autonomy, Rawls's work also illustrates how some kind of "intervention" is compatible with another – and related – liberal ideal, neutrality: Rawls, in fact, is a famous defender of neutrality, as we can see in his already mentioned "priority of the just", but also with notions like "overlapping consensus" and "public reason", directly related to neutrality, in his later book Political Liberalism (Ralws 1993, II, 4 and 6). The original position may be seen, in fact, as a way of ensuring that our choice of principles of justice won't be influenced by any particular conception of the good – thus respecting neutrality.

We can therefore conclude that the relational dimension of contemporary rights makes possible a conception of "State's intervention" that is perfectly compatible with the liberal ideals of individual autonomy and neutrality. Now we can turn to the next part of our work, analyzing the distinction between this "liberal intervention" and the ones preconized by communitarians and republicans authors.

3. Communitarian and Republican interventions

The communitarian's position is well expressed by Michael Sandel's work. In Justice and the Limits of Liberalism, Sandel tries to show that Rawls's "priority of the just" presupposes an untenable conception of the self, the "unencumbered self", which would be previous to its ends (Sandel 1998, I). As Kymnlicka puts it, communitarians have three main reasons to believe that this liberal description of ourselves is wrong: a- it is empty; b- it violates our self-perception; c- it ignores our embeddedness in communal practices (Kymlicka 2002, 221). For Sandel, this emptiness is closely related to State's neutrality, for both are derived from the priority of the just, which ignores that "all political orders must embody some values" (Sandel 1998, 11).

In his most recent books - Justice and What Money Can't Buy -, Sandel applies these ideas to everyday cases, what can help us to understand which kind of "intervention" would be acceptable in a communitarian State. In both works, he stresses that liberal neutrality impoverishes political life, for it presupposes that we shouldn't bring our personal values and convictions to this field (Sandel 2010, Chap 10).[4] One consequence of this impoverishment is that our lives are more and more governed by impersonal mechanisms, like the market, which corrupts values that should be preserved (Sandel 2012).

[3] There are, of course, other more simple arguments about the problem of advancing the autonomy of the least advantaged. Kymnlicka stresses, for instance, that, since "substantive self-ownership" is a matter of degree, the autonomy of the least advantaged is actually being threatened by their lack of resources, while we can't say the same when the more fortunate pay taxes (Kymlicka 2002, 124).

Sandel doesn't make clear whether those values should be protected from the market simply by State's interventions; this idea, however, is implicit in several of his arguments, as, for instance, when he criticizes the legalized killing of animals belonging to endangered species (Sandel 2012, 43). The point, here, is clearly that this killing simply shouldn't be legalized. The same could be said in the comparison he makes between American and English policies of blood's donation: the later – in which payment is forbidden – is, somehow, better than the former (Sandel 2012, 62).

It must be said that Sandel's position isn't – neither communitarian's in general – that all problems should be solved by the State, in an authoritarian way. When he gives the example of a Swiss city in which citizens accepted to store radioactive nuclear waste, he stresses the importance of this being done by civic spirit. The source of this kind of attitude should be values shared by the community, not "because the government told so", and Sandel makes clear that an authoritarian State isn't the best way to promote civic spirit (Sandel 2012, 58-9). His point is that the law should enforce some values – hence his critic of the "priority of the just" -, but these values must be part of our identities, and continuously discussed in a public debate.

In our view, "communitarian's interventions" shouldn't be seen as necessarily more authoritarian that the ones supported by liberal egalitarians like Rawls. In fact, some of these interventions would be supported by both, as Sandel, once again, points out: in several of his examples, he describes two different kinds of reasons by which market's logic could be contested: "equality" and "corruption". Paying for an addicted woman's sterilization, for blood, for a place in a line or in a congressional hearing, can be seen as a corruption of certain values (maternity, donation, civic spirit), but also a way of exploring inequalities in people's positions (Sandel 2012, 10).[5]

We may therefore conclude that egalitarian and communitarian authors support both some kind of "State's intervention", even if only the former is compatible which liberal ideals. The difference between them rests, however, mostly in the reasons behind the interventions, for both will often - though not always - encourage the same ones.

We can now turn to the republican view. As we said before, we'll concentrate in Richard Dagger's Civic Virtues, Citizenship and Republican Liberalism, in which he discusses the differences and convergences between this position and the liberal one. Departing from the classical distinction between liberalism as focusing on individual rights and personal autonomy, and republicanism as focusing in civic virtue and public responsibility, Dagger argues that, although they are different, there is no real incompatibility between them. His strategy consists in showing that "autonomy" can be understood in a more collective way, on one hand, and "civic virtue" in a more individual way, on the other hand.[6]

What is more interesting for our purposes, however, is that this compatibility is possible, according to Dagger, only if we abandon one of the most important premises of liberal though: the idea of neutrality. As the author says,

> Republican liberalism, however, plainly is not neutral is this sense; on the contrary, it is a perfectionist doctrine that prescribes a certain conception of the good for everyone. Hence republican liberalism cannot be a satisfactory form of liberalism. If liberalism must be neutral or agnostic with regard to competing conceptions of the good life, republican liberalism truly is an oxymoron (Dagger 1997, 175).

Dragger strategy, then, consist in denying that liberalism can really be neutral. We don't have the room, here, to detail Dagger's arguments, but, in our view, he fails. Neutrality is a distinctive feature of [5] The results would be the same in several cases, but not always, as, for instance, in the case of the legalized killing of endangered species: a communitarian could have reasons to forbid it – for there are positive values being corrupted -, but it is not so obvious with liberal egalitarians, for people's autonomy isn't at stake.

[6] Dagger strategy consists in saying that the fostering of autonomy depends on our interdependence to other people (Dagger 1997, 17-18), and that civic virtue can be understood from cooperatives practices under the principle of "flay play" (Dagger 1997, 46-47; 110).

liberalism, since derived from the idea of "no intervention", implicit, on its turn, in the very notion of individual rights.

As it happened with Sandel, Dagger doesn't talk explicitly about "government interventions", but, again, we can think that this is entailed by his denial of neutrality. He stresses, for instance, the importance of education in fostering participative citizenship, which is, we could say, a typical republican view. It is true that he puts "educating desires" as an intermediate position between the more radical position of "molding" them, and the less stringent, liberal view, for which people's preferences are just given.[7] But this difference of degree doesn't change the fact that education will have some kind of purpose, supported by the State: to promote autonomy and civic virtue. In any "perfectionist society", as Dagger himself defines republican-liberalism, government's actions will reflect some view about the good, related to a conception of the good life. And this can be seen as a kind of "intervention" in the liberal sense, whether it be in Nozick's or in Rawls' version of it. Of course, there can be several levels of intervention, from radical to more acceptable ones, but discussions about degrees are not relevant for us here.

The important point, for us, is to stress the difference between this kind of intervention and the ones compatibles with liberal neutrality, like Rawls' principle of difference, related, as we've seen, to the relational dimension of "claim rights". Despite Dagger's pretentions in showing their compatibility, his work points out, in our opinion, to the opposite direction; for, according to him, this compatibility is possible only if we abandon one of the most essential premises of liberal thought, neutrality.

When we've approached Sandel's work, we saw that the communitarian view of "interventions" often leads to the same results as the egalitarian one. But our analysis of Dagger's republican position suggests that, even if it is possible, those views are still fundamentally different. Interventions based on promoting or preserving substantive conceptions of the good life can't be labeled as "liberals", even if their results are, in many specific cases, not distinguishable from it.

Another interesting way to distinguish those views is how they understand and relate private and public spheres. Republican and liberals conceptions are known for defending a more strict separation between them, while communitarians – probably following the Greeks – tend to support some kind of continuity, with the public sphere usually serving as a reference to the private one (Rosas 2008, 101). This importance given to public life is a point shared with republicans, while liberal societies are often accused to impoverish it, the public sphere becoming an instrument of private interests (Rosas 2008, 96).

[7] "For republicans liberals, part of the point of education is to help people live autonomously. Rather than 'carefully molding' desires and passions, then, a republican-liberal education will try to enable people to govern their desires and passions so that they may live as autonomous individuals in community with other autonomous individuals" (Dagger 1997, 117).

4. A possible coexistence?

We can now turn back to the basic premise of our paper: we've seen, lately – as in labor laws, consumer rights, bioethics and internet crimes - a growing intervention of the State in the private sphere. Can it be explained only by "liberal intervention", related to claim rights, focused on autonomy and respecting neutrality? In the actual stage of this phenomenon, it's difficult to answer this question, for, as we said, those different doctrines will often lead to the same results. If the State forbids sterilization for money of addicted women, for instance, this can be done for the sake of some substantive communitarian value (related to maternity), by a republican civic spirit, or, as liberals egalitarians puts it, as a way to avoid exploring inequalities in people's positions.

However, in our opinion, it's reasonable to suppose that the growing interventionist role of the State is somehow related to an historical tendency, in the conception of rights, from a strict formal view to a more substantive one. In fact, as we have noted, compared to its individualistic initial notion, "claim rights" are more social, establishing a kind of relationship between people. And this, in turn, is related to a more substantive conception of autonomy and self-possession. The idea, it would seem, is that freedom can't be so formal and individualist, for it presupposes cooperation, material resources, recognition and others goods.

The main point, however, is that this tendency - the dissatisfaction with formalist conceptions, and the striving for more substantive approaches -, persists. After a shift to a relational notion of rights, but still based on neutrality, actual "interventions" of government in the private sphere could be seen as a shift to laws that reflect substantive conceptions of the good life – in short, to communitarian and republican views.

We can point out as being part of this tendency, on the academic field, the recent revival of communitarianism and republicanism ideas – with the work of Michael Sandel, Alasdair MacIntyre and Charles Taylor, in the eighties, or republican authors like Philip Petit, in the nineties, and, more recently, John Maynor and Cécile Laborde – as well as the recent attempts to conciliate this views with the liberal one, as we saw in Dagger's work.

This tendency could also be present, in our view, on the legal field, as, for instance, with the growing concern with judicial paternalism (Farnsworth 2000; Kronman 1983; Trebilcock 1997; Zamir 1998), especially in labor laws, consumer rights and internet regulation. Bioethics is, of course, a rich domain for this issue: the protection of animals and the environment, or the debate about stem cells, aren't easily justified just by neutrality and the protection of humans' autonomy (Singer 2011; Regan 2004).[8]

If our analysis is correct, and this tendency actually exists, then some questions must be raised about the conciliation between liberal premises and more substantial conceptions of rights. This conciliation was possible, in the past, with the notion of claim rights; but this tendency could eventually reach a crucial point, in which it would become increasingly difficult for this harmonization to be done. As we said before, communitarian and republican views denies some fundamental premises of the liberal thought.

How to deal with this problem? One way is to think that this harmonization may be more easily reached in practice, even if not so in theory. Communitarian or republican elements may be tolerated in real societies and governments, even if their fundaments are liberal. Political theory tends to be monistic – everything coherently derived from one supreme principle -, but real societies are more pluralists, accepting the coexistence of different values in ways that aren't necessarily coherent. An example of this would be the recent problems with government spying – a movement started, perhaps, with George's Bush "patriotic act": the State must endorse many values, and those may be in conflict with one another. Even if the protection of civil rights – like the one of privacy – is very important, the government must also protect his citizens' lives. In some exceptional circumstances, the later may overcome the former. We are not saying that we support this, only using this example to illustrate how government's actions may be based on different values, not

Another contemporary example would be China, where a communist's principles based society tolerates, increasingly, several capitalist practices. Thus a country may adopt "mixed models", putting together components of different doctrines, that, although incompatibles in a theoretical level, may coexist in practice, with a certain tension between them being tolerated.

This phenomenon, in fact, isn't so recent: if we think about anti-abortion laws, for instance, very common – more in the past, but still today - in many democratic countries, it is not easy to justify them only by liberal principles. On the contrary, people opposing to it, defenders of abortion, are often labelled "pro-choice". Anti-abortion laws, in fact, are usually influenced by religious beliefs. And this is a good example of the point we are making: even if the overall principles of liberal societies are secular, following the separation between State and Church, it is possible to find laws, in these countries, based on religious beliefs, and even opposed, in some sense, to the ideals of autonomy and neutrality. Another example would be the recognizing, in liberal democracies, of only monogamous marriages – this clearly favors one way of life over others, and can't be justified only by the priority of the just (Mulhall and Swift 1996, 26-7). Real societies are complex structures, lacking the crystal clear coherence of a political theory.

This would be a way to explain how some laws, in liberal societies, may follow communitarian or republican principles. But there are others slightly different explanations: for instance, instead of seeing, here, a distance between theory and practice, we could elaborate a theoretical approach that takes into account this tension between divergent views – some kind of "tragic" or "agonistic" conception, inspired by authors like Nietzsche. One example of this sort would be the work of Chantal Mouffe: she thinks that modern democracies are based on two ideals, liberty and equality, that can't be harmonized. There will always be a tension between them, which Chantal identifies with political "left" and "right" wings. Society, them, will be marked by different configurations of power, depending on which one of those two ideals, temporary, takes over (Mouffe 2000, introduction).

We can therefore conclude that the dissatisfaction with the emptiness of "formality", that we've mentioned, and the consequent strive for laws based on more substantial values – which is, in our opinion, a contemporary tendency – could lead to the picture of a coexistence of liberal principles with laws and actions reflecting values endorsed by a conception of a good life. And this can be seen as a "practical incoherence" - where some elements not compatible with the overall principles are tolerated in some specific cases -, or as a sign of a agonistic model of society, where these conceptions are like forces, always present, competing with each other, leading to provisory configurations of power. It is important to note that, in this last case, this "taking over" would be much more than simply winning some election. In fact, as we saw, the nature and relationship of private and public spheres would be, somehow, reconfigured.

Conclusion

In Chantal view, the two competing ideals – liberty and equality – are both part of democratic cultures. We could say the same about the communitarian and the republican models that we've discussed. In this sense, they have in common with liberal principles the defense of democracy, and this ensures a kind of "high order" coherence between them. Our paper, then, raises two main questions:

Can the growing intervention of the State in the private sphere be seen as another stage of a process coming from a strict formal to a more substantial conception of rights, which already resulted on the notion of "claim rights", and now starts to incorporate elements related to communitarian or republican views? We think the answer would be yes.

If so, how these elements can be harmonized with the overall principles of liberal societies? Will they restrict themselves to some specific cases, being "practically tolerated", or will they become strong enough to really compete with the former? This, only time will show us.

The efficacy of the fundamental right to health in private legal relations established between health insurance companies and their customers

Abstract: This work aims to analyze the efficacy of the fundamental right to health in the realm of private legal relations established between health insurance companies and their customers within the context of the Brazilian legal system, analyzing its effects both on economic relations and in the market. Moreover, this work also aims to propose solutions capable of conciliating the effectiveness of the fundamental right to health, enshrined in Brazil's Constitution, with the protection to the important rights of private autonomy, contractual freedom and the free enterprise conferred to economic agents.

Keywords: Fundamental rights, Autonomy, Contractual Freedom.

1. Introduction

Given the scope and the many themes that can be developed with regards to the issue of the effectiveness of fundamental rights in the legal relationship between insurance providers and health care recipients this article, using methodological issues, will be limited to - examining specific situations in which the theme acquires important contours within the Brazilian legal system.

The big question to be answered is to define the extent to which operators of private health care plans are linked to the fundamental right to health. Are the operators of private health care plans required to provide mandatory medical and hospital coverage or services that were not objective of the contract with the beneficiary in the name of the direct effectiveness of the fundamental right to health?

The resolution of this important issue pervades by delimiting the extent of the fundamental right to health in private legal relationships between providers of health care plans and their beneficiaries in order to find a solution capable of reconciling the protection of this fundamental right with the protection of private autonomy, freedom of contract and legal certainty within the legal relations between individuals.

2. The right to health

The right to health is inserted among the fundamental rights of a social nature provided by the Brazilian Constitution. The Constitution of the 1988 Brazilian Republic included the fundamental right to health in the list of social rights of Article 6, to ensure it guarantees the fundamental rights to education, work, housing rights, leisure, security, social security, protection of motherhood and childhood, assistance to the destitute, observing the other constitutional provisions.

Disciplinary social order in Article 196 in the Constitution of the Republic, is explicit and unambiguous which sought to be the fundamental right to health and duty of the State, guaranteed through social and economic policies aimed at universal and equal access to actions and services for its promotion, protection and recovery, ensuring, however, the possibility that the private sector also provides health care services under the regulatory legislation.

In the Brazilian legal system, the right to health was regulated by Law 8080 of 1990, which provides the conditions for the promotion, protection and recovery of health, organization and functioning of relevant services. According to legal provisions contained in Article 2 of that legislative instrument, "health is a fundamental human right, and the State shall provide the conditions required for its full realization" through "the formulation and implementation of economic and social policies."

According to the second subparagraph of Article 2 of that statute, the "duty of the state does not exclude people, family, business and society" consecrating therefore the principle of social solidarity, which also constitutes one of the objectives of the Federative Republic of Brazil. The role of private enterprise to promote health, in turn, is governed primarily by Law 9656 of 1998 which regulates the activities of the operators of private insurance plans and health care.

2.1 Effectiveness of health rights in legal relationships between providers of health care plans and their beneficiaries.

Currently, the main legal disputes involving the operators of private health care plans and their beneficiaries deal with the coverage of medical procedures. The lawsuits, mostly relate to cases under which recepients of health insurance insist that the operators of private health care plans are required to cover and pay for medical procedures whose coverage was not previously contracted.

> Already there are reports of an imposition - including in the judicial sphere – of material benefits to private entities, in favor of other individuals. This occurs with some frequency (and, of course, in certain circumstances and under certain assumptions) in cases involving health plan sponsors, that even when claiming there is no contractual coverage, they are still required, based on the fundamental rights of consumer protection, health services constitutionally assured and to bear the medical and hospital expenses for its insured. (SARLET, 2006, p. 593)

Faced with these situations, the interpreter applicator is responsible to carry out the analysis of the contractually established restrictions, especially when faced with the fundamental right to health. They must also consider all consitutional normative framework to regulate the contractual relations between the operators of private health care plans and their beneficiaries, to find a constitutionally adequate solution to the problem. This is embraced by the definition of the extent of the effectiveness of the fundamental right to health under this legal relationship between individuals.

A careful and detailed study of cases involving litigations related to coverage of medical procedures by operators of private health care plans, we infer that there has been rare cases where the assigned solution entered the discussion of this important issue of the effectiveness of fundamental law to health within the legal relations between individuals, most of the time becoming of restricted analysis of abusive contract clauses limiting coverage.

> In the jurisprudence of Brazilian law a phenomenon occurs in a curious form. Not being as scarce as judicial decisions directly using the fundamental rights governing conflicts of private nature. However, with rare exceptions, these judgments are not preceded by theoretical reasoning that give support to the implementation of the constitutional provision to private party litigation. In fact, only now we are finding an echo in our discussion the fertile conditions and limits for the application of fundamental rights in the private sphere. (SARMENTO, 2008, p. 250)

An appropriate solution to the issue of coverage of medical procedures therefore requires the analysis of the following questions: Are operators of private health care plans required, based on the fundamental right to health, to cover medical and hospital services which are not subject to the contract? To what extent are operators of private health care plans linked to the fundamental right to health? These are therefore the issues to be examined from the proper understanding of the effectiveness of fundamental rights in private legal relations.

2.1.1 Concrete Implementation and densification of the right to health by the legislature

The fundamental right to health, due to the importance and direct relationship with the fundamental rights to life and human dignity, deserved special attention of the Brazilian constitional legislature, which edited two important regulatory legislatives achieving the relevant law fundamental to social nature. The first, represented by Law 8080 of 1990 is intended to regulate the promotion of the right to health by government and the private sector, and the second, represented by Law 9656 of 1998, was specifically intended to discipline private health care plans and insurance.

As legislative precepts, contained in Law 8080 of 1990, in line with those contained in Article 196 of the Constitution, health is a fundamental right of all individuals, and it is the duty of the state to provide the necessary conditions, duty which, however does not rule out the duties assigned to individuals and society as a whole. Also in accordance with that statute and the constitutional provisions contained in Article 199 of the Constitution, private providers of health care are allowed to directly act for private enterprise, which may develop promotion, protection and recovery activities, within the limits established by law.

Given the essential importance of the right to health, and on the premise of hypo-sufficiency of individuals, the legislature also enacted Law 9656 of 1998, a specific legislative instrument to regulate the role of private enterprise in the provision of private medical health care services. Moreover, with the aim to monitor the quality of services in health, through the enactment of Law 9961 of 2000 the government created a specific regulatory agency to regulate the activity of provision of health services of private initiatives, called the National Health Agency. This federal agency was charged with overseeing and monitoring the health supplement market, regulating the contractual legal relations between insurers and operators of private health plans and their beneficiaries.

In addition to this extensive regulatory framework, of regulating and implementing the right to health guaranteed by the Constitution, activities performed by insurers and providers of health care plans, to configure legal relationships of eminently consumerist nature, are still subjected to legislative precepts contained in Act 8078 of 1990. This established the Code of Consumer Protection, which is principally designed to protect consumer rights, making them the largest protective ballast to, for example, provide for the nullity of unfair terms, assigning operators of private health care plans the contractual obligations of information transparancy, among other protective rights of the beneficiary customer standards.

The enactment of Law 9656 of 1998 was an important legislative framework in the discipline of services conducted by operators of private health care plans. It contains an extensive number of legislative precepts intended to regulate, in detail, the most relevant legal issues involving these activities. This includes aspects that underlie the discipline of incorporation and registration of operators, methods of health care, medical procedures and treatments, mandatory coverage, waiting periods, increases in tuition, among others. This statute is therefore a true legal status of protection to consumer beneficiaries, including those protected by the principle of prohibition of retrogression. By aiming to provide maximum effectiveness and protection of the right to health this considerably limited private autonomy and contractual freedom of private health care plan operators and established the requirement that all private health assistance plans, necessarily promote, coverage for a mandatory list of medical procedures .

The Law 9656 of 1998, in article 10, aimed to protect beneficiaries by establishing a list of procedures and events in health coverage that are mandatory for operators of private health care plans. This gave rise to the reference plane called health care, having predetermined content, providing to the beneficiary outpatient medical assistance and hospital care coverage. This includes births and treatments, performed exclusively in the national territory, with standard ward, intensive care, or similar, when hospitalization is required. Also the diseases listed under the International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems of the World Health Organization are to be covered.

Law 9656 of 1998, beyond disciplining the reference plan, it regulates the existence of five other targeted forms of private health care plans, explaining, in each of them, in detail, the minimum requirements of contractual coverage and medical procedures in health events. These are the outpatient plans, governed by paragraph I of Article 12, the hospital plan, governed by section II of Article 12, the obstetric plan, governed by section III of Article 12, the dental plan, governed by section IV of Article 12, together with a complete plan. Moreover, Article 10 further establishes the list of procedures and events in health that are not explicitly mandatory for coverage, due to its non essentiality.

In all forms of private health care plans operators are obliged to provide their beneficiaries at least medical procedures considered mandatory and necessary for the protection of human health, as determined by the established National Health Agency, in line with guidelines developed by the World Health Organization. NÓBREGA, analyzing mandatory coverage of medical procedures by operators of private health plans, makes the following considerations:

> Truly, the medical procedures that serve as a reference being offered mandatory by these segmented coverages were enrolled by the legislation. The reference plan is the set of coverages offered by these targeted plans. In summary, the coverage of diseases and medical procedures, that each contractual model should present were predetermined by legal rule, so as to protect the consumer. (NÓBREGA, 2005, p. 150).

The legislature gave origin to the reference plan, as well as other disciplinary procedures for private health care plans, and eventually materialized and implemented the fundamental right to health in the context of private legal relations between operators of private health care plans and beneficiaries. This established a minimum ratio of medical procedures and health events of mandatory coverage, regardless of the type of contract agreed upon between private health care plans and individuals. To regulate the mandatory minimum coverage, the legislature, in the exercise of its reflection of interests of political activity, restricted autonomy and contractual freedom of operators of private health care plans in order to ensure the necessary protection of the right to health, contributing to the stabilization of these legal relations.

As NÓBREGA highlights, the contractual protection conferred by the legislature to beneficiaries, with establishing a reference plan aimed to "prevent the supplier taking advantage of the vulnerability of consumers to search for easy money." Given the legislative framework contained in the Act of 9656 of 1998, the legislature has exercised an important role in attaining and regulating the fundamental right to health within the legal relations between individuals, restricting a portion of the private autonomy, free enterprise and contractual freedom of the operating companies of private health care plans. NÓBREGA, analyzes the legislative precepts contained in Law 9656 1988 and highlights:

> The legislative technique, used by the legislature of the law of health plans, was the case series, trying to exhaustively define and complete every chance of applying the rule, forming a rigid and inflexible system, limiting the role of the judge to find the solution more just for the case, unlike the legislative technique which uses general clauses. (NÓBREGA, 2005, p. 148).

It appears , therefore, that the issue of the coverage of medical procedures was the subject of specific discipline by the legislature, which has the primary task, provided there is a democratically legitimized body, to carry the considerations between protecting the right to health and the necessary degree of restriction on private autonomy and contractual freedom of operators of private health care plans. Accordingly, in assessing the case in point, the considerations and decisions materialized by the Legislative Power with the enactment of specific standards can not be ignored by the interpreter applicator. Bearing in mind that , at first, " harmonization between the duties of solidarity and freedom of space of individuals is a task for the legislature , as a body democratically legitimized to undertake complex considerations of interests , involving abstract and intangible values . According to Ruy Rosado de Aguiar , the direct application of fundamental rights takes place when the case requires:

> (...) the immediate implementation of the constitutional provision, when inexistent constitutional legislatives admit interpretation in accordance with the constitutional policy, or lack general applicable clauses in that situation, even though it is a patent violation of the fundamental right. (BRAZIL, STJ, Rep. Ruy Rosado de Aguiar, HC 12.547/DF, DJ 12/02/2001).

In the wake of the chief advocates of the theory of indirect or mediate effectiveness of fundamental rights in private legal relations SARMENTO claims the legislative options adopted by the legislature should be respected by the interpreter and those who exercise the judicial function. The existence of prior considerations, held between constitutionally enshrined fundamental rights and values, such as those made by the legislature to edit the legislative Law 9656 of 1998, following which, there was a balance between fundamental rights to health and private autonomy, must be respected by the interpreter :

> Indeed, as already shown, in most cases the existence of a prior legislative option, when it comes to the resolution of disputes between individuals (and their fundamental rights as subjective rights), is the constitutionally appropriate solution where there will be no interference with the judiciary, penalty - in this case - to extrapolate their jurisdiction. (Sarlet, 2006, p. 583).

Operators of health care plans which don't offer procedures and events considered mandatory health coverage, are not directly linked to the right to health and are not forced to cover medical procedures that were not objects of the contract. We should not forget that, in principle, the right to health is a duty of the public authorities, and legally inappropriate to hold that individuals are, in all situations, directly linked to the fundamental right to health to the point where you may charge obligations to provide services, perform procedures or provide medications not considered mandatory and which have not been contracted by the recipient.

As a proponent of a different solution, but sympathetic to the indirect efficacy theory of fundamental social rights, STEINMETZ argues strongly that individuals "are not required, against the fundamental social right to health, to build hospitals, clinics or health or to pay medical treatment for other individuals", not constituting, " legal and constitutional duty of individuals, by virtue of the fundamental rights to benefits, propose, plan and implement social and economic policy - although they may participate as collaborators or partners." Ponder the realization of the right to health as a fundamental social right, besides constituting state duty pursuant to the constitutional text:

> are financially onerous and require options and positive actions, the imposition on individuals of duties of benefits consistent with the principle of free enterprise (CR, article 1, IV and Article 170, caput..) - and thus with the market economy - with the fundamental rights of liberty and property (CR, article 5, caption and XXII.) and the principle of private autonomy. (STEINMETZ, 2004, p. 279).

If upon the conclusion of the private health care plan contract, the beneficiary is duly informed about the extent of coverage provided by each of the modalities of health care plans, aware of the existence of other types of plans with more comprehensive coverage, opts for economic or free expression of will and contracts the reference plan with less comprehensive coverage , you can not claim in court against the operator of the private health care plan , for medical procedures that are not considered mandatory or that were not covered objects, with direct and exclusive basis on the fundamental right to health. Even Sarlet , a leading proponent of the direct effectiveness of fundamental social rights in legal relationships between individuals, positions himself in the sense that caution is needed , it is necessary to consider the peculiarities of the case :

> That acknowledgement - especially when directly effected, and without legislative mediation – of subjective rights of social benefits against private entities should be viewed with caution and passed through rigorous control when it comes to the criteria governing the settlement of conflicts of rights , already stressed, but are replayed . Justifiably in virtude of this need, it matters to build robust material criteria for the proper consideration in light of the case, they are equally recognized as essential, rather than - just taking care of this problem - announced the aforementioned Daniel Sarmento. (Sarlet, 2006, p. 593).

In this sense the espoused understanding of MATEUS is firmly disagreed when contending the exclusion of procedures and events of private health care contracts. Even those not considered mandatory coverage under constitutional legislation, based on scientific and developed technical studies of the National Health Agency and the World Health Organization, would represent an affront to the right to health and the existential minimum. According to the author, in these cases, the courts, on behalf of direct effectiveness of the fundamental right to health, shall determine the plans of the private health care providers that cover the procedures or events demanded by the recipient, so that in this way, you are guaranteed the protection of the right to health and the existential minimum.

> Because of the restriction, exclusion of certain procedures, although authorized by constitutional legislation, outrageously proved the existential minimum part of the postulant, should the judiciary, not in terms of the effectiveness of the rights on it, but by the direct effectiveness of the relations between individuals, plus the power of health plans and clauses existing opening in the CDC, pronouncing decision in the sense to guarantee procedures which are covenantally excluded. (MATTHEW, 2008, p. 146).

It is stressed that the contract clause establishing exclusion is prepared in strict compliance with a set of protective standards established by Law 9656 of 1998 and therefore does not provide for the exclusion of health procedures or events considered for that type of health plan contracted, of mandatory coverage, not even contemplating their abusivity, on the basis of legal provisions contained in Article 51 of the Code of Consumer Protection. This is because of the recognition of the unfair exclusion clause in this case which involves the indirect recognition of the inadequacy of regulations contained in Law 9656 of 1998 and the guidelines established by the World Health Organization and National Health Agency, against the fundamental right to health, which can not thrive.

2.1.2 Protection of private autonomy, freedom of enterprise, freedom of contract and legal certainty.

We must take into consideration that the legal system also ensures individuals the fundamental freedom and rights to free enterprise and private autonomy. It is not fact that the particular detainer of financial power become necessarily liable to give material benefits not contracted or not considered mandatory in the name of fundamental rights to health. The admission of an unrestricted rights to health under the legal relations between the operators of private health plans and their beneficiaries , and even in relation to non - beneficiary third countries , to the point where it is required to cover procedures or medical treatment when not contracted , violates the fundamental right to free enterprise , freedom of contract and private autonomy , braving the very effectiveness of the principle of preserving the company . Operators of private plans for health care companies having social responsibility is undeniable. However , social responsibility can not be extreme to the point of transferring particular social rights to prestacional nature and it is the duty of the government to give a true legal solidarism . SAMPAIO JR highlights :

> Given the inefficiency of the state to provide the population the minimum guarantees that could be expected, is transferred to the individual the obligation to discharge such burdens. Thus, fitting the owner of urban residential property, private hospitals, electric power and telephone company, private school and the transporter support the absence of public policies that guarantee the majority of the populations access to housing, health, energy and telecommunications, education and transport services. This practice is justified in reliance on an alleged duty of solidarity that should govern the private conduct, which, in turn, rests on reasoning-that part of the population would have a social debt with the remaining majority, which should be paid through the assumption of obligations which the State is unable to meet. (SAMPAIO JR., 2009, p. 7280).

The unconditional and irreflective adherence to a direct and immediate effect of fundamental rights in the legal relations between individuals , especially the rights of a social nature , such as the right to health , would lead to a difficult and complex problem to find a solution "to what extent may the Constitution determine the manner in which individuals should lead their lives". The direct application of fundamental rights within the legal relations between individuals can not ignore that our constitutional order guarantees individuals a space of civil autoregulation , which must be protected . In this sense it is BILBAO Ubillos who warns the fact that it is necessary to be careful not to convert all legal matters of civil life in conflicts between fundamental rights , formulating the following question "will we not be asking too much of the Constitution ?" For CANOTILHO, despite the order of private nature not being divorced from the constitutional order , suffering under its influence , we must be alert to the risks and undesirable consequences of trivializing the adoption of the direct effectiveness of fundamental rights in private legal relations, so to speak :

> Private law is not , of course, divorced from the Constitution . There is no free space of fundamental rights. However , the private law loses its irreducible autonomy when civil regulations - legal or contractual - see its content substantially altered by the direct effect of fundamental rights in private law. The Constitution , in turn , is convened for daily courtrooms with the inevitable consequence of constitutional trivialization . If the private law must acknowledge and guarantees the basic principles of fundamental rights, then the fundamental rights must also recognize space for civil self -regulation , avoiding turning into ' right of unfreedom ' of private law . In our view , the problem is not only the dangers that lurk the two orders - constitutional and civil - when it insists on strict conformation and egalitarianism of private legal relations through constitutional norms . At issue is also the problem of whether the attachment to Drittiwirkung doesn't carry a profoundly ignorant ethical and legal pathos of postmodern disruptions . (CANOTILHO. 2001, p. 228).[3]

The activity of implementing the right to health in legal relationships between individuals can not assume the garments of a communitarian discourse , marked by welfarism or legal paternalism and by unmeasured judicial activism , to the point of making the very existence of operators of private plans health care plans unviable. As CANOTILHO highlights , "judges can not become social conformers". BARROSO, discussing the role of the courts in implementing the right to health weaves relevant considerations about the inherent limits of this state function by stating that " the judiciary can not be less than it should be , failing to protect fundamental rights may be promoted with his performance". However, "it should not want to be more than it can be, presuming too much of itself and , under the pretext of promoting the fundamental rights of another, causing serious injury to the rights of the same nature to many others " . And citing

[3] Apud, BARROSO, 2009, p. 13.

AMADO, concludes " want to be more than it is , is to be less".

In this harmony, given the situation in which a beneficiary needs treatment or events not covered by private health care plans , not being procedures which are mandatory to be covered by the government legislation, is not sustain that the individual should be denied judicial protection of the fundamental right to health , but only that this guardianship is granted to compel the government , not the particular provider of private health care plans to cover the procedure or event necessary since it is the chief duty of public poweers , in the Brazilian legal system , to promote health through social and economic policies . The transfer of the particular obligation to fulfill the right to health, when the Constitution assigns this duty to the government , is unquestionably affronted by the fundamental rights to free enterprise , freedom of contract and private autonomy . As highlights BARROSO :

> Article 196 of the Constitution makes clear that ensuring the right to health will be through social and economic policies, not through judicial decisions. The possibility of achieving Judicial Power, regardless of legislative mediation, the right to health is encounters strong obstacles in the way of positivization Article 196, which clearly defers to the task executing agencies of public policies. (Barroso, 2009, p. 30-31).

Moreover, one can not forget the understanding of STEINMETZ, whereby the argument that the effective guarantee of fundamental social rights, is essential to create the factual assumptions necessary for the full exercise of individual fundamental rights of freedom, including by allocating duties on individuals to implement them in their private legal relations, despite being sociologically relevant:

> (...) The dogmatic-constitutional point of view, does not establish the linkage of individuals to these rights because it is not strong enough to rule out the principles of free enterprise and private autonomy and the fundamental rights of liberty and property. It is, rather, relevant in relation to the State. The higher the optimization of fundamental social rights produced by the State, probably the minorities will be factual social inequalities between individuals and will be ensured the exercise of the rights of freedom. Certainly one, perhaps the main one, of the desired constitutionalization of rights to benefits and make them enforceable against the (and unavailable - such as minimum subsistence - to) State with a view to > a more intense and widespread realization of freedoms. (STEINMETZ, 2004, p. 280-281).

Salutary is the understanding of Matthew, in the sense that the fact that the recipient has hired a private health plan for non complete health care assistence, in the exercise of their private autonomy, does not detract from the ability to litigate against the government the cost of procedures and health care not covered by insurance, having in view that "as health is guaranteed by both the state and society, it is possible, in respect for the autonomy of the will, that part is provided by the health plan, and part by the state . "Obviously, in cases of urgency or emergency, found that the beneficiary needs treatment not covered by the health care plan contracted, being that transfer to a hospital is unfeasible is maintained by the Government, subject to the life or physical integrity , should an operator of private health care plan , in the name of protecting the right to life and human dignity, cover the claimed procedure, except, in this case, the right to be reimbursed by the government for the costs of performing that procedure. By maintaining that the fundamental right to health in their prestacional dimension, is the duty of the government, and not claiming that this duty is unique to it, considering that individuals are to some extent linked to the right to health, not alleging that the operators of private health care plans , with respect to procedures or events not covered, or not hired, will always be relieved of their costs.

The operators of private health care plans, besides being indirectly and mediately linked to the right to health, given their obligation to fulfill the right to health within the limits set by the consitutional laws that govern and regulate their activities to provide medical and hospital services, only exceptional hypothesis, from a judgment consideration that takes into account the peculiarities of the case, will be directly linked to the fundamental right to health, as in the hypothesis outlined above, in which the protection of the right to life , physical integrity and human dignity become imperative to the action of the individual entity of this right constitutionally guaranteed to individuals, including a protection for the existential minimum. SARMENTO thus manifests:

> However, what we question in the case is the possibility of individuals based solely in the Constitution, complain about certain other individual material benefits linked to social rights. It seems, therefore, that this possibility should be, in principle, excluded in relation to social rights derivatives, which positively bind to the > state itself, require a legislative achievement. This is not to say, that full effective social rights depend on the legislator interposition not binding individuals, but only that the linkage does not go so far as to allow the extraction of some positive subjective right, valid within the legal and private relationship. (Sarmento, 2008, p. 303).

Moreover, contrary to what may seem to the uninitiated, it must be emphasized that the theories of direct or indirect effictiveness of fundamental rights in the legal relations between individuals are not exclusive. Both can act in ensuring the effectiveness of fundamental rights. What we must consider is, existing legislation regulating and specifying fundamental rights, as in the Brazilian legal system with the right to health , in which there are two important regulatory instruments, one should always take into account the considerations made by the legislature and only if one understands that the achievement made by the legislature did not give in an adequate form to that desired by the current constitutional order is that, from interpretation according to the Constitution and the recognition of the objective dimension of fundamental rights, should be assigned to legal ruling interpretation consistent with the goals desired by the constituent. In this situation, as STEINMETZ contends, the interpreter will assume the argumentative burden of presenting legal and constitutional compelling reasons to remove or adjust the built legislative solution:

> Moreover, in cases for which there is specific legislative regulation (embodiment), sufficient and consistent with the Constitution and fundamental rights, the Judicial Power, in accordance with the principles of separation of powers, should not plan without filing legal-constitutional weighted reasons (for the sake of argument), to depart from the legislative solution, this is, the judiciary should not overlap, instantly and satisfy a burden of rational and objective constitutional argument, the considerations of the Legislative Power implemented in specific regulations of private law. (Steinmetz 2005, p. 212).

Given the lack or incompleteness of legislation to allocate the fundamental right in question, based on a systematic topical method, based on the analysis of the peculiarities and specificities of the case, considering the fundamental rights in conflict, it is for courts to implement the fundamental right in question by recognizing its direct effectiveness within the legal relations between individuals. In addition to assessing the authenticity of desires externalized by the subjects when concluding the provision of medical services contracts, if it complied with the contractual duties of disclosure, transparency and good faith, should be examined whether the claimed medical procedure is mandatory or not, as well as the non-coverage of procedure in import risk to life or physical integrity of the beneficiary, among other factors relating to the case, behold the right to health in their prestacional dimension makes the activity of consideration even more complex than that held when it is before the given the right of defensive nature.

In this sense, we have to make exceptions to the understanding adopted by SARLET whereby fundamental social rights, "whatever the nature of the fundamental right in question" have a direct effect on private legal relations, to the point of the fundamental right to health, in your dimension, become "the particular lender of material benefits that say about health, such as medical and hospital care, supply of medicines, examinations of the most varied nature, in short, any essential provision to the implementation of this right to health."

This is because one can not ignore the existence of specific legislation that, considering the right to health, personal autonomy, free enterprise and freedom of contract, already provides extensive list of procedures and events in mandatory health coverage for operators of private care plans health, regardless of the modality employed by the beneficiary, assuring the existential minimum in regards to the protection of the right to health. There is no other reason that HESSE maintains that "la interpretación de la Constitución debe estar, en término de HÄBERLE, abierta al tiempo, yello implica que ha que tener en cuenta la Ley actualmente vigente". "substituir el Derecho todo en su poliédrica complejidad por la simple proyección constructiva de los derechos fundamentales. La quiebra de la seguridad jurídica sería la consecuencia"[4]

Without going into the merits of essentiality or indispensability of procedures and events considered for mandatory health coverage, and without questioning whether certain procedures or events in health should be inserted or not in this regard, given that this is to be accomplished by the consideration of an expert in medical sciences, the fact is that the establishment of the list of procedures and compliance with mandatory coverage by the courts, when urged to appreciate lawsuits involving claims for coverage procedures or events not considered mandatory health or have not been subject to the contract , gives legal certainty to legal relations improved between operators of private health plans and beneficiaries.

In addition to ensuring beneficiary procedures considered essential to the protection of fundamental rights to health, life and physical integrity, the establishment of the referred relationship gives transparency to the referred legal relations as well as legal certainty to operators of private health care plans, which, when the contracts are awarded to provide medical services, now have science extension of its obligations, in other words, in relation to the health procedures and events that will be required to be payed. In this line of thinking, as CRUZ highlighted, fundamental rights should help "to compose the essence of a legal system that legitimately want to stabilize the social expectations of behavior. Thus, demand respect for their professional conduct to avoid denaturation of the Law in Politics."

With regard to health plan providers, developing a relationship of events and procedures in mandatory health coverage, in conjunction with its effective observance and respect for the courts, in addition to providing and stabilizing security the legal relationship between these particular protecting the legitimate expectations of health insurance providers and beneficiaries, ensures mutuality and economic-financial balance of the health insurance contract, allowing the preservation of the company and at the same time ensuring that the coverage of a particular procedure does not harm service to other beneficiaries.

The principle of mutuality, which is closely tied to actuarial issues involving the contract of health insurance, can be conceptualized as "a system in which the entire customer base contributes so that some use more of the services of the operator and others use less, thus there is a risk of dilution". Because of the principles of mutuality and solidarity among the beneficiaries, they have a responsibility to contribute directly to cover the necessary procedures to all beneficiaries as these, taken in isolation, would not have been able to afford the cost of the necessary procedure to protect their health.

With these considerations, one concludes that it is not possible to maintain unconditional and irreflective way of the direct effectiveness of the right to health within the legal relations between operators of private health plans and beneficiaries, considering allocating those the duty to pay and cover procedures not contracted by the beneficiary or not considered mandatory coverage by current law, distorts and puts at risk the economic and financial balance of the contractual relationship. Thus, the idea one is protecting the right to health, the courts may in fact be weakening your protection as resources are spent by health plan provider for the cost of compliance with judicial decisions case by case, settled on voluntarism and subjectivism of the judge, may directly affect other beneficiaries, whether as a result of the transfer this cost to the price of monthly payments, whether due to economic and financial infeasibility of persistent health plan provider in the market. In this sense REZENDE warns that " operators of health plans are revealed as true managers of mutual funds - funded with resources provided exclusively by fees paid by users and used when those who are in need " is the reason its duty to ensure the right to health can not be confused with the state's duty to promote health through the implementation of public policies.

In a contractual relationship in which freedom of contract and private autonomy are preshaped to the need to protect the right to health, the prior regulatory obligations that will be the responsibility of the operators of private health care plans, allows them to ensure the economic-finance balance of the provision of medical services contracted, as in the case of business activity, the risk for operators of private health care plans is " to evaluate the costs and risks and should socialize the losses , in other words , calculate all the risks that might run in the course of the investment , when calculating the price of their services, " reason to which science should be effective with its contractual obligations so that they can calculate the costs , because if calculated incorrectly the error can not be imputed to the beneficiary customer , because of the protection afforded to it by law. Similarly, if the operators of private health care plans calculate their risks considering the duties assigned to it by law, and subsequently find themselves legally compelled to assume responsibility and cover medical procedures not considered mandatory or not engaged, this coverage legislatively has not provided an immediate impact on economic-financial balance of the contract and, further, if such a situation instigates a cascading movement or multiplier effect , it puts at risk the viability of the company, even compromising the protection of the rights of the other beneficiaries . In this sense SAMPAIO JR. highlights :

> When one determines that private hospitals or private schools meet the poor without any consideration, on the grounds that existential values can not be subject to the wicked and spurious profits of entrepreneurs, the first impression one gets is that such a measure would effectively required. After all, who could leave the > patient to wane medical treatment or a student without access to education? One resolves the problem is that of the patient or student, but at the expense of other users , who will bear the services not paid by the recipient, while the company has no motivation to require the State to meet its minimum obligations. Finally, one last consideration is required, and appears in fact that to transform law in a concrete set of values, increases the 'danger of irrational judgments, because in this case the functionalist arguments prevail over regulations' . (Sampaio JR , 2008, p. 4662) .

It is necessary to grant legal security to legal relationships between operators of private health care plans and their beneficiaries, including the protection of legitimate expectations of operator , which should, at the time of conclusion of the contract , noting the legislative precepts contained in legislation regency, have effective science to the exact extent of their obligations to their beneficiaries , so that it can enter into a contract in which the economic and financial equilibrium for both parties is guaranteed. The atividadas developed by operators of private health care plans may not be at the discretion of subjectivism and judicial activism that, totally disregarding the existing constitutional legislation, the result of legitimate and democratic action by the legislative power, imposes obligations not provided as mandatory or not have been subject to contract. If the intention is to raise the degree of protection of the right to health, one must proceed democratically and legitimately with the inclusion of other procedures on the list of procedures for mandatory coverage, because at least in this way, operators of private health care plans will have effective science of which are exact obligations to the beneficiary. As NOVAIS highlights:

> But also in terms of the division of powers between the organs of the State, the consequences would be significant. This is because all conflict between individuals is a conflict of fundamental rights, then the almost automatic consequence is the attribution of a disproportionate weighting between the the judge, namely the constitutional court and the legal and regulatory conformations of private relations. (...) However, this possibility extends not only extraordinarily pontential area of intervention of the Constitutional Court, as, taking into account that the Constitution rarely provides him, in the field of fundamental rights, certain guidelines and precise criteria of the decision, giving intense power to form specific legal relationship. (NOVAIS, 2007, p. 380).

Compliance with the criteria established by the legislature is of utmost importance to ensure the economic and financial balance of the service agreement , which does not preclude, as maintained in exceptional situations , the operator of private health care plans is compelled to cover medical procedures not contracted in order to ensure protection of life , health and dignity of the recipient . However , as noted , the interpreter applicating legal standards should act with caution and prudence , otherwise , the argument of ensuring maximum effectiveness of the right to health , to determine that the private operator of health care plan covers the cost of procedures which are not mandatory or contracted , compromising the very existence and economic viability of the provider , eventually generating a diverse desired effect , to undermine the protection of the right to health of the other beneficiaries . In this sense SARMENTO highlights that :

> We must remember that the primary entity responsible for ensuring social benefits is the State, and that the burden of private entities with positive obligations, even in law, may compromise in an exaggerated manner the dynamics of social subsystems, impairing its function, often in expense, as paradoxical as it is, of the most vulnerable and poorest groups of guardianship waived for social rights. (...) Legally, the market is not everything, but the law, including constitutional, is far from omnipotent, and - perhaps unfortunately - can never repeal the laws of the market. (Sarmento, 2008, p. 301).

In the wake of understanding SARMENTO , the interpreter and the courts , besides having to observe and consider the implementation of the right to health already undertaken by the legislature , to analyze the degree of authenticity of private autonomy and the externalization of will of beneficiaries, who should be informed in advance about the limits of coverage of health care plans offered, on behalf of the principles of information, contractual transparency and loyalty, should consider in its decision the existence of sunken risk to life , health or physical integrity of the beneficiary, to the point of making the issue so urgent to derail of which the government is liable for funding the essential medical procedures , as well as evaluating the economic impact of a court decision requiring the private health care plan provider cover procedures or events of non-mandatory health or that has not been the object of medical service provisions in the coverage of the contract.

> It is very important to analyze , among other things , the economic impact for the private agent , resulting imposition of a positive obligation linked to social rights in question . The size of the economic burden imposed on an individual is one of the pieces of information in consideration , because the application of fundamental rights in the private sphere can not import in disproportionate restrictions to the subjective sphere of anyone . (...) Even in the case of a rich and powerful private entity , the item in question is relevant because, almost always , the cost of providing, ends up being passed on to other individuals, often as or more vulnerable than the holder of social law who is allegedly injured . If a health plan were required , for example, to treat all their customers from a certain age for free, inevitably the tuition pais becomes expensive for the other consumers , some certainly more in need than the average beneficiary . (Sarmento , 2008, p. 306) .

In this respect, it is necessary to demystify and reject the false image often attributed to operators of private health care plans in the sense that they would be highly profitable companies, similarly to financial institutions. Contrary to what may seem to many, there is the large and lucrative market companies operating private health care plans, there are also medical labor cooperatives, smaller philanthropic organizations not economically sound, for which the impact of financial judicial decisions determining who is covered for procedures or events by health coverage not required or not hired may represent the closure of their activities, to the detriment of many beneficiaries. As Sampaio JR highlights, the interpreter applicating the legal rule can not fail to consider the effects and social reflection of his decision:

> (...) It is for the judge to analyze the economic reflection of his decisions and the impact they may have. Not that he necessarily gets carried away merely by economic considerations - as the focus of the law is justice, as warned by Ronald Dworkin - but it is imperative that he is fully aware that his judgment may cause reflections in a given sector, and these reflections are analyzed in detail and the result consciously assumed. We also must remember that he can no longer be considered the slave of the law and submitted to it inexorably, but continues to be a server of the law. (SAMPAIO JR, 2007, p. 4830).

It should be noted, we are not advocating that the court's decision pervades merely by an economic analysis of its effects on the market and on the activities of the operators of private plans for health care companies, but rather, given the significance where it is addressed by hermeneuticist and the magistrates, the nature of the claimed process, whether mandatory or not, whether contracted or not covered, and not forgetting the fact that it is the chief duty of the government to develop public policies to promote and ensure the effectiveness of the right to health. REZENDE highlights:

> Thus, we must reflect on this solidarity principle, if there is justification for the user to plead for coverage often not provided in the contract, assuming individualistic position before the rest of the customer base that truly bears the cost of services provided. Rezende (2008, p. 194).

To have an adequate and correct understanding of the matter , according to studies published by the National Health Agency (ANS) , in Brazil exists approximately 56 million beneficiaries of private health care plans , linked to 1697 plan operators of private health care with active records , of which 1218 are operators of private hospital and medical health care plans and 479 operators of private dental care plans (Table 1) . Among the 1697 operating private health care plans with active records , 11.4% have no beneficiaries , and 64.4 % are classified as small having less than 20,000 beneficiaries , 18.2 % are classified as midsize having between 20,000 and 100,000 beneficiaries , only 6 % are classified as large with more than 100,000 beneficiaries . (Table 2)

Also according to the published study, in general, regardless of the size of the private health care plan provider, expenses of funded procedures and events for health care denominated expenses, administrative expenses, are added together approximating the revenue earned by these. In the case of plan operators for hospital and medical care which are classified as small to medium-sized, the data demonstrates that the receipt of fees received are even lower than the sum of the administrative and assistance costs, pointed to a situation of a deficit. (Table 3).

This scenario of a defecit performance is subject to most operators of private health care plans, especially those classified as small to medium sized ports which tends to lead to the phenomenon of a concentration of the provision of health care services to a reduced number of operators considered to be large. Moreover a gradual decrease in the number of operators of private health care plans in operation in the Brazilian market over the last few years is observed, due to the increase in requests for cancellation of registration and reduction of applications to register new operators. It appears also that the order of cancellation of registration, since the year 2001, are manifestly superior to applications for registration of new operators of private health care plans , which resulted in the extinction of more than 1000 operators plans private health care in the last 10 years. (Figure 4).

According to REZENDE, the data presented is an indication that "resources have not been sufficient for the maintenance of operators in the market, which is causing competition in this sector to decrease. The same data also shows that costs are increasing year by year. "And this scenario is not likely to change, given the gradual aging of the population, due to the improvement of living conditions, which would tend to increase the number of beneficiaries of private plans for members of hospital medical care for ages greater than 60 years, with a consequent increase in health care expenses and claims.

The data presented thus only confirms the risks of the economic effects of an irreflective and unconditional admission of the direct effectiveness of fundamental rights in the legal relations between the operators of private health care plans and their beneficiaries. It is not intended to sustain and justify , from the data presented , the total absence of binding operators of private health care plans to the fundamental right to health, even because they are already linked to the protection of this right in accordance with existing legislation . However , one can not understand supplementary health as an extension of public health , on the point of justifying a similar linkage of operators of private health care plans found, in relation to the government . According to OLIVEIRA, neither the Constitution nor the constitutional legislation " establishes the duty of carriers to offer health care on a full and unrestricted basis , replacing the duty of the State" . He concludes:

> If the composition of the price does not take into account certain coverage that is pleaded and provided to users, one can take it for granted that there will come a time that the bill will be paid, either by the mass of the users of the plans, which will be required to afford the rising cost of extra coverage, or by the operators, which will be subject to having financial difficulties over time. (OLIVEIRA, 2008, p. 165).

As PIMENTA highlights

> the imposition of full health to private entities is perhaps disproportionate, ineffective and incompatible with our laws. Such an interpretation is a negative externality for the community, a disincentive to entrepreneurship in the market and, because of that, an incentive for monopoly prices and favoring economic groups established in the jurisdiction. Ones able to afford such cost of transaction imposed by the court. "(2010, p. 458).

In the same sense that FUX highlights:

> (...) passing on the duty to an individual, mercy unauthorized by the Constitution, considering the necessity of peaceful coexistence between state action and private and free initiative, breaks the principles that govern the contract of insurance, unbalances the equality between the contractors, despite the economy entities in favor of one at the expense of other beneficiaries. (FUX, 2000, p. 297).

The hermeneuticist, besides observing the existing constitutional legislation , which established procedures for mandatory coverage for any kind of plans for medical and hospital care , as well as the economic impact of a court decision requiring private health care plan providers to fund health procedures or events in not required nor the object any medical service contract provisions , one should consider in their decision the existence of risk to life, health or physical integrity of the beneficiary , for, in these cases , withdraw the considerations already undertaken by the legislature and determine that the private operator of health care plan is compelled to cover procedures or events in health coverage not required or has not been the provisions of the contract. Wisdom and caution is needed, as the pretext to protect and ensure maximum effectiveness of the right to health by unconditional direct application of fundamental rights in the legal relations between the operators of private health care plans and their beneficiaries , may reversely be prioritizing individual rights at the expense of the rights of an entire community of beneficiaries .

3. Final Considerations

From the analysis of the Brazilian legal system, it was possible to determine that the right to health is endowed with formal and material fundamentality, either in its own defense or prestacional dimension. If, in regards to a defensive dimension the question of the fundamental right to health in private legal relations doesn't arouse further questioning, given one recognizes that individuals have a duty to refrain from violating the health of other individuals, the same is not possible to maintain when analyzing the issue of effectiveness of the right to health in the context of private legal relations under the perpective of its prestacional dimension, in which case the question becomes contested.

Despite the Constitution having established the principle of solidarity between the government and civil society regarding the right to health, this solidarity can not be, in any and every situation, interpreted as to extend to the particular the obligation to cover and pay for medical procedures, medications or provide other materials to achieve benefits on the grounds that the right to health has a direct and immediate effect on private legal relationships. This is because this duty is assigned, under Article 196 of the Constitution, primarily, that the government, which will have to develop public policies for full access and health promotion. Individuals, in this sense, are only indirectly linked to the fundamental right to health and, only in exceptional circumstances, justified the constitutional point of view, direct and immediate way.

What it adds is that you can not admit a homogeneous solution in the sense that individuals, here including operators of private health care plans, will always be linked directly to the fundamental right to health and thus unconditionally obliged to assume responsibility for all and any physician-hospital procedure to its beneficiaries, especially those procedures and health events that are not considered, under the law, such as mandatory coverage, or have not been subject to contract. The decision by a direct or indirect link necessarily depends on the analysis of the peculiarities and specificities of the case, which should be taken into consideration, among other factors, the existence of legislation regulating the issue.

Besides being necessary to observe the existing constitutional legislation, the fruits of considerations made by democratically constituted bodies, as well as the economic impact of a court decision requiring the private plan operator of medical assistance to fund health care procedures or event of health care where coverage is not mandatory or has not been the object of the provision of medical services contract, the existence of risk to life, health or physical integrity of the beneficiary should be considered, for, in these exceptional circumstances, the considerations carried away by the legislature, embodied in the consitutional legislation, and determines that the private operators of health care plans are compelled to cover procedures or events in non-mandatory health coverage or have not been subject to contractual provisions guaranteeing their right to be compensated by the government.

It takes wisdom and caution, as the pretext to protect and ensure the maximum right to health by unconditional and uncritical direct application of fundamental rights in the legal relations between the operators of private health care plans and their beneficiaries, as it may have a reversible effect, prioritizing individual rights at the expense of the rights of an entire community of beneficiaries, generating negative externalities, such as increased tuition and creating monopolistic markets. Moreover, the effectiveness of direct unreflective recognition of fundamental rights in private legal relations may involve in itself suppression of civil space autoregulation provided by the individuals constitutional order, in clear protection of fundamental rights of freedom and personal autonomy.

In this crossing, the aim of this work was not to exhaust the analysis of the whole issue to the extent of reaching full effectiveness of the fundamental right to health within the legal relations between operators of private health care plans and their beneficiaries, but, recognizing the greatness of this theme and to contribute to this discussion, providing questions and notes that can be useful for improvement, contributing to the development of solutions ensuring the effectiveness of normativity and fundamental rights, combining the guarantee of the fundamental right to health, with necessary protection of autonomy, freedom of contract, freedom of enterprise, fundamental rights essential to the relations of private law, legal certainty and preserving human dignity, which are the pillars of a democratic state.

Solidarity in the private relations:
A study about the fundamental duties

Bruna Lyra Duque[1]
Adriano Sant'Ana Pedra[2]

Abstract: The goal of this article is to understand the solidarity duties in the private relations. The study intend to investigate the fundamental duties subject against the private autonomy and it will evaluate some issues linked to the duality of individualism versus solidarism, by focusing on the horizontality of the fundamental duties.

Keywords: Fundamental duties; fundamental rights; horizontality; private relations; solidarity.

Introduction

The study will examine issues related to the individualism versus solidarity movement, in private relations, with a focus on linking the fundamental duties of individuals, from the premise that an individual is entitled to a free and yet a holder not only on rights, but also on duties.

Solidarity is, indeed, the other side of the same coin in the set of rights and duties, since ratifying the incidence of fundamental rights covered by the constitutional provision, can be understood from a reciprocal relationship: if there are rights, however, there is the duty in solidarity.

Nevertheless, in the private field, autonomy is a tool that allows the free action of individuals authorized by the it is own legal framework, for the realization of their interests with diverse social and economic functions. Thus, each individual determines the course of its existence, according to their subjective preferences and materials, respecting their freedom of choice.

The Constitution of the Federative Republic of Brazil has not only rules which confer rights[3], but also has several duties of individuals as members of the State. Fundamental duties are reciprocal to fundamental rights (or rights of freedom), as limited by these and, at the same time as providing security for the exercise of freedom. A State, therefore, is not only designed to rights.

This way, the theme of the fundamental duties on the private autonomy will be considered from the theory of symmetry between fundamental rights and duties. At this point, we seek to understand how the recognition of a relationship synallagmatic between private individuals wears out private autonomy and can cause conflicts when applying without criteria and with absolutely form of the contractual dirigisme.

The theme developed will pass aspect of the economic analysis of law[4], using economic parameters to evaluate the limits on stipulation of fundamental duties aimed at particular face a conflict of interest.

1 Fundamental Duties

It is unquestionable that law operators focus their research around fundamental rights. The doctrine, in the same sense, is concerned

[3] On the need of society to organize itself with rights and duties, Carlos Alberto Gabriel Maino warns: "Thinkers have warned that it is not humanly possible to organize society around the concept of rights exclusively". The same author, citing Danilo Castellano, clarifies that "has emphasized that human rights are actually exercising the duties of man, or rights arising from the duties of others, or even from the use of goods that are the result of personal activities, for example, the work or property." too with the plan of fundamental rights, which results in the emphasis of duties and in the absence of dealings of topics related to fundamental duties[5]. Dimoulis and Martins (2011, p. 325-326) explain the understanding of Carl Schmittwhich, when analyzing the Weimar Constitution, the disinterest exhibited on the fundamental duties in four points, namely:

a) the liberal-capitalist State can not establish fundamental duties that would have the same structure of fundamental rights, since their purpose is to ensure spaces for free actions of individuals, limiting the state;

b) The Weimar Constitution merely establish duties to state agencies, the only explicit duty of citizens was military service;

c) The abstract references to duties can only be implemented by Law to deliver them;

d) The duty to comply with the Law is a determination empty of content, because the content of the obligations does not depend on the Constitution, but on the variations of ordinary legislation.

As proposed Casalta Nabais (2005, p. 81), rights and duties should be placed on the same constitutional level, since both rights and duties are elements that comprise the constitutional status of the individual.

The concept of duty has been decisive for the formation of modern Law (PECES-BARBA, 1987, p. 329-341). José Casalta Nabais (1998, p. 64) also reinforces the importance of coexistence between rights and duties in society.

Fundamental duties, at the constitutional level, are qualified by the majority of the doctrine, such as those linked to the objective dimension of fundamental rights, since they concentrate the values of the community in relation to the government, since the conception of fundamental rights as individual powers against State expresses the relationship between government and citizens. Dimoulis and Martins (2011, p. 75) argue that the fundamental duties are duties of action or inaction, sculptured in the Constitution, the subjects of which assets and liabilities are proclaimed in each standard or can be deduced by interpretation. Furthermore to the authors the ownership as well as taxable persons often are diffuse and content of the duty can only result from achieving infraconstitutional.

Carlos Alberto Gabriel Maino (2011, p. 42) clarifies that it must recover the horizon of the fundamental duties of both a social and political, legal point of view. This idea allows us to understand and recognize the other in his whole, and, therefore, fundamental duties covered here beside the maximum solidarity. Thus, recognizing the other, in private relations, becomes the challenge in understanding the fundamental duties and their applicability.

This article examines the issue of the fundamental duties both in the sense of abstaining when the subject's duty is forbidden to do something, such as the imposition of a positive behavior. The individual of law can not become individual in fact without first become a citizen. There is no, in its turn, autonomous individuals without an autonomous society, and society's autonomy requires self-determination, something that can only be achieved when it's shared by its members (BAUMAN, 2001, p. 50).

In this perspective, second thought of Michael J. Sandel (2011, p. 141) to act freely, according to Kant, it should act with autonomy. "And to act autonomously is to act according to the Law that impose myself – and not according to the dictates of nature or social conventions."

This way the fundamental duties can be conceived as legal duties[6] of the person, both physical and legal, which determine the fundamental position of the individual, having a meaning to a particular group or society and thus may be required in a public perspective, private, political, economic and social.

2 Solidarity in the private relations

The duty of solidarity is foreseen in Article 3 of the Brazilian Constitution as a goal of the Federal Republic, presenting itself as a purpose of building a free and just society[7]. In this context, it has to be on all private relations that principle should be considered. The essential function of such duties is related to the Communities expectations[8], in [6] Gregorio Peces Barba Martínez (1987) warns that "la identificación del deber jurídico y su distinción del deber moral es imprescindible para aclarar el sentido del término deber fundamental".

[7] Interesting arguments about justice are raised by Political Philosophy and Philosophy of Law. We highlight some current views as Michael Sandel and Amartya Sen.

[8] Michael Sandel, in a communitarian view, argues that the individual should be evaluated in the context in which it operates. The author proposes the communitarian thesis as opposed to contemporary liberalism. Sandel presents questions when he contrasts the concrete situations to assess theories of morality and justice (contract surrogacy and or-which human are located.

Such objectives highlighted in the constitutional text, in the Title I, like "Fundamental Principles", exalt the quality of what is essentially doing "with which enjoy of prominence, either in achievement by Public Authorities and other recipients of the saying constitutional, whether in task of interpreting it, and, by its light, interpret all planning of national law" (MORAES, 2008).

The role of the duty of solidarity, therefore, goes through the idea that the study of law can not be removed from the analysis of society, so as to enable individualization of the role and social phenomenon. The right has as reference point the man in his psychophysical evolution, "existential", which becomes history in its relationship with other men. "The complexity of social life implies that the determination of the relevance and meaning of existence should be made as in the social existence, ie as 'coexistence' " (PERLINGIERI, 2002, p.1).

On the fundamental duties in private relationships, Dimitri Dimoulis and Leonardo Martins (2011, p. 328) have the following situations: "The particular A can completely prevent the exercise of freedom of expression of B without violating it, in view of a clause contract or exercise of other fundamental rights". An association would then have the fundamental duty not to exclude an ideologically inconvenient member? A fundamental problem, therefore, is presented in this perspective: the limitations on private autonomy thus may occur under the guise of protecting itself the right holder?

Solidarity, in this scenario, ratifies the incidence of various fundamental rights covered by the constitutional norm. In other words, solidarity can be understood as a true reciprocal relationship: if there are rights, on the other hand, there is a duty in solidarity.

Maria Celina Bodin de Moraes (2003, p. 109-110) presents important distinction of solidarity. The author divides this element in two species, namely the phatic solidarity and solidarity as a value. The factual arises from the need of human coexistence, since solidarity as a value comes from the rational consciousness of common interests. Therein lies to the author, the dialectical concept of recognizing the other.

There is then a close relationship between duties and rights restrictions. It is a tenuous relationship between the fundamental duties, limits and restrictions on fundamental rights, because such restrictions can be justified on the basis of fundamental duties in the interests of society.

The thesis developed here involves the idea of restriction, but not a restriction alone, on the contrary, it is a restriction facing the prospect of solidarism in private affairs, and, therefore, opted for the application of the dialogue sources theory supported by Erik Jayme (2003, p. 114), which does not want to remove from the system any one of his sources, but aggregate them through dialogue. Starting from the idea that given legal reality shows about "reciprocal influence between the social, economic, political and normative-legal ones, the transformation from an economic aspect, political, ethical concerns – sometimes deeply – about the normative order and vice versa" (PERLINGIERI, 2002, p. 2).

Regarding the economic character of the theme developed here, it is used economic parameters to evaluate the limits/criteria of the advance or brake on stipulation of fundamental duties aimed at particular face of a conflict of interest. We start from the premise that the economy has a strong influence on private matters.

In the globalized economy[9], in view of that, there is the weakening of the states and the strengthening of markets, propitiating the merger of large firms that concentrate economic power. In this relationship between Law and Economics, agency theory admits the difficulty in stipulating the duties between subjects, from the premise that, for example, contracts are designed to be incomplete, and presents problematic issues such as information asymmetry, transaction[10] and opportunism

[9] Bauman (1999, p. 7-8), when analyzing the relationship of globalization with notions of freedom and the market, clarifies: "The use of time and space are sharply differentiated and differentiating. Globalization both divides and unites, divides while joining – and the causes of division are identical to those that promote uniformity of the globe. Along with the planetary dimensions of business, finance, trade and information flow, is put in motion a process 'finder', mounting space. Together the two intimately related processes clearly differentiate the conditions of entire populations and stocks of various segments of each population. What for some seem to be globalization, for others means location, which for some is signaling freedom for many others is undesired target and cruel. Mobility climbs to the highest level among the highly coveted values – and freedom of movement, a commodity always scarce and unevenly distributed, soon becomes the main stratifying factor of our late modern or postmodern".

[10] On "transaction costs", Richard Posner (2005, p. 9) explains: "El primero es que el Derecho, en cuanto compete a la promoción de la eficiencia económica, debería procurar minimizar los costos de transacción. Por ejemplo, definiendo claramente los derechos de in this economic concepts.

The private legal relations established between economic agents are effectively incomplete, since there is the ability to anticipate all future contingencies, even taking into account that none of the contractors will become a defaulter during or upon hire (SZTAJN, 2005. p. 74). And what is the relation this subject with the fundamental duties? What is it intended to propose with the thesis of harmonization?

3 Does fundamental duties restrict freedom of individuals in the exercise of private autonomy?

The notion that one has about fundamental duties is that these lend themselves to restrict freedoms. Nevertheless, as there is no absolute freedom, but "there is only freedom within the law" (PEDRA, 2012, p. 135), only when the fundamental duties are wrongly employed is that ultimately restrict the freedom of individuals.

The right does not have the power to enforce behavior to the human psyche and may not require the individual to think, act or nurture feelings this way or that way, but you can correct distortions in legal relationships and link social actors to respect the rule of law.

In the field of relations between individuals the autonomy portrays a positive and active aspect of personality, within the ambit of the people who can act as an autonomous and responsible. Thus, in an attempt to relate autonomy with duties in respect to horizontal fundamental duties, can identify constitutionalism in a simple idea, namely: who has rights must also have duties (DIMOULIS & MARTINS, 2011, p. 339). Such consideration occurs, for example, in the case of the individual who has preserved his privacy, social networks, and also respects the privacy of others in the same virtual universe.

propiedad, haciéndolos transferibles sin dificultad y creando soluciones baratas y efectivas cuando hay um incumplimiento de contrato. Los analistas económicos del Derecho han identificado una serie de doctrinas, procedimientos e instituciones para lograr el objetivo de minimizar los costos de transacción del mercado [...]. El segundo corolario del enfoque económico del Derecho que estoy exponiendo es que cuando, a pesar de los mejores esfuerzos del Derecho, los costos de transacción del mercado siguen siendo altos, el Derecho debería simular la asignación de recursos del mercado asignando a los derechos de propiedad a los usuarios que más los valoren". Posner, therefore, believes it is incumbent on the law to search for efficiency in order to minimize transaction costs, for example, when define property rights, creating, thus, cheaper solutions when the noncompliance of a contract occurs.

Due to solidarity, puts up the "disposition of vulnerable resources that allow the exercise of fundamental rights in a satisfactory manner, strengthening social cohesion" (DIMOULIS and MARTINS, 2011, p. 339). At this point, the fundamental duties are "tools that help community life by facilitating the organization, by itself, should be respected and enforced" (RUSCHEL, 2007, p. 231-266). Nevertheless, the application of instrumentation proposed by the author, in a strict and absolute manner, can weaken the private autonomy.

But is there criterion for the exercise and implementation of these instruments seeking solidarity? Said another way, how is the harmonization between the duties of solidarity and scope of the freedom of individuals in the exercise of private autonomy?

As we know, in the conflict of interests, it becomes part of the enacting legislators[11] which impose certain duties to private agents social and economic. In this sense, it is appropriate gratuity transport for senior citizens, the imposition of rules increases in health plans for certain groups and imposing rules for financial institutions intended portion of the proceeds to finance programs for popular housing (SARMENTO, 2004, p. 340).

The effectiveness of the rights and fundamental duties depends on the belief in its necessity and its significance for the preservation of humans in society, "besides a minimal degree of tolerance and solidarity in social relations[12]" (SARLET, 2001, p. 9). From this perspective, one may wonder e.g. whether there is a duty (critical) from the health insurance company that the obligation to conduct innovative medical treatment and exorbitant costs for the benefit of their insured, although there expressed contract banning, which has been much discussed in the Brazilian courts.

It is understood that the primary responsibility for ensuring certain benefits belongs to the State. Thus, the overhead of private actors with those benefits, without the existence of law and fundamental duty bias, entails the occurrence of an impairment of the dynamics of eco-

[11] Vieira de Andrade (2004, p. 170) believes that "the fundamental duties are not immediately applicable, depending on the intervention of the legislator to regulate them."

[12] The author further states: "the preservation of the environment, respect for privacy and private life, the protection of children and adolescents, equality between men and women, freedom of expression, depend on a healthily and responsible family and personal relationships, ultimately, much more than a legal system that formally make these core values, as well as the Courts to watch carefully for their fulfillment" (Sarlet, 2001, p. 9).

Thus the need for the application of the fundamental duties to individuals in their relationships (horizontality of the fundamental duties), mainly basing on solidarity, can not neglect the respect for private autonomy from most basic fundamentals of the economy[13].

In optical pragmatic "Law and Economics", it is proposed to apply the law to the interpreter in order to weigh up the likely consequences of various interpretations that the text permits, paying attention also to the importance of defending democratic values, fundamental rights and legal language as a means of effective communication and the separation of powers (SALAMA, 2010, p. 43). The thesis outlined here seeks to understand the economic analysis of Law as an instrument able to clarify legal issues in private harvest and point unfolding of various normative choices in this context.

From pragmatic perspective, Law is a tool apt for the achievement of social purposes. In thought of pragmatism, if emphasizes the rejection of the idea that the law "is founding on permanent principles permanent and that it is put into practice through its logic manipulation" (SALAMA, 2010, p. 41).

The author Bruno Salama (2010, p. 41) clarifies that Richard Posner posits that > the meaning of things are social, not immanent, and that human achievements should be assessed in relation to the circumstances and also evaluated by its consequences. This leads to rejection of all the fundamental criteria that can absolutely guide the normativity of law, including the efficiency criterion.

Thus, the particular has fundamental duty implicit of respect for others in the contractual setting, which is called by the doctrine of duties civilist attachments. However, private autonomy can not be curbed by the judiciary, through contractual dirigisme without criteria and absolutely, to impose on individuals and companies certain duties typically from states, as it is the case in some cases exaggerated interference in health plans. On the other hand, when the judge interprets the case to enforce the duty attachment solidarity, based on objective criteria of violation of duties of conduct, it should be the relativized private autonomy.

[13] In Special Appeal No. 1106625-PR (2008/0259499-7), whose rapporteur was Minister Sydney Beneti, it was considered the economic notion of contract, as follows: "[...] The legal order is harmonious with individual interests and of the socioeconomic development. It did not completely fulminates acts that are nonconforming to any extent. The theory of legal transactions, largely informed by the principle of conservation of its effects, states that even the cogent norms intended to organize and coordinate the practice of acts necessary to social life, respected legal transactions performed. It should prefer the interpretation that avoids the complete annulment of the practiced act, opting for their reduction and renewal to the parameters of legality [...]."

It is defended that social issues are inextricably linked to the market. One of the most dangerous current modalities is the expansion of markets and market analysis for the spheres of life delimited by rules that are not economic. There are moral issues that arise when the government hires private companies to provide hospital beds, or when the government omit to regulate commerce standards that greatly affect the labor market.

It is understood, therefore, that such issues do not concern only the private autonomy and utility. They are also linked to the balanced way of considering the most relevant social practices, thus, are also related to democracy. Michael J. Sandel (2011, p. 327) addresses this issue in his thesis on the moral limits of markets and warns that "social marketing practices can corrode or degrade the standards that define them, we need to ask what are the standards not dependent on market that we want to protect from the market interference"[14].

As warns Adriano Sant'Ana Pedra (2010, p. 7-36), "the dynamic nature of the Constitution as a living organism that is, allows it to monitor the progression of social circumstances." Thus, the imposition or not of fundamental duties rests on the sovereignty of the state as an organized community, sovereignty which can not however, make a clean sweep of human dignity, ie, the idea of the human person as the beginning and end of society and the state (NABAIS, 1998, p. 60).

What is observed, in our times, in the areas of bank loans, insurance, education and housing, is that the courts have manifested from the premise of absolute protection to vulnerable and dissociated form to economic issues, reviewing the particular (companies, plans health care and the people who are part of them, financial institutions etc.) duty that it would be of the State, that is, health programs, access to education,

[14] The author Sandel (2011, p. 128), v.g. in analyzing the case of contract of surrogacy presents the following questions: "Up to what extent our choices in the free market are really free? Are there virtues and goods of nature so high that transcend the laws of market and the power of money?"

promoting economic activity, etc.. However, passing on state benefits to individuals in exercising their economic activities, to create objective conditions that allow access to services or products in the line of duty of solidarity, can generate an even greater imbalance in the private relationship versus private.

The solidarism can be found in private relations generally (bonds, contracts, civil liability, business relationships, etc). In the family law it is considered the prevalence of child's best interest, as an expression of solidarity within the family, or even the control of the means of adoption. Maria Celina Bodin de Moraes (2008) explains, for example, that the family does not find it established in hierarchies, concerned with the preservation of family assets, to reveal how the space of personal fulfillment that it composes[15].

The theory of dialogue fonts supported by German jurist Erik Jayme (2003, p.114) assists in understanding solidarism in private relationships, as it is an instrument used to overcome the antinomies and seek for solutions consistent in several areas of law, a systematic overview for the interpretation of rules. Such a theory can be used as a solution "systematic and topical at the same time, as it should be more fluid, more flexible, to allow greater mobility and fineness of distinctions", can be applied to the question of the fundamental duties, personal autonomy and economic rights (MARQUES, 2004).

On the plane of systematic interpretation, the plurality composing the Constitution prevents the isolated analysis of a particular standard (PEDRA, 2010, p. 20). For its understanding, it is necessary to interpret systemic, being the thesis outlined here the relationship between individualism versus solidarity movement under the focus of horizontality of the fundamental duties. In this aspect, the research of the duties attached on the interpretation of the relations between individuals can be applied to concrete cases, given the contractual dirigisme of magistrate has imposed such a transfer of the obligation from the state to the private.

It is defended that, for example, the application of the particular duty to indemnify the other individual who has endured a moral injury[16]

[15] In the private area, we have been living for a long time in an "axiological revolution", no other action being necessary to entertain the division between public and private. The tripod private, family, property and contracts, is modified with the rupture of the wall "separating the state and society" (NEGREIROS, 2006, p. 48).

[16] "The defect of the service that resulted in the undue restriction of the customer name of the bank should not be confused with the fact that the service, which poses a risk to or material, in the case of breach of a positive obligation[17] as compensation for pedagogical. Matter the fundamental duty of solidarity fits the contemporary concern of civil rereading of the principles in the light of the Constitution. In the same way, Maria Celina Bodin de Moraes (2003, p. 108) warns that any "subjective situation gets guardianship of spatial up and while not only in accordance with the will power of the holder, but also in line with the social interest".

In the same vein, it is argued that the normative principles and their impact on the contractual relations is a way to encourage the application of the fundamental duties, as well as private relationships undergo the scrutiny of constitutional norms, especially solidarity.

With the (re)reading of the constitutional legal relations now socialized, aims to devise a transformation between the individual and the collective to understand the Constitution axiologically, seeking to replace the "have" to "be" with "the primacy existential realization over performing asset" (NEGREIROS, 2006, p. 62).

It is cited, even as fundamental duty under the bias of the fulfillment of the social function of the contract, the mitigation of the effects of relativity of contracts for its application in the social context, such as the sealing of unfair competition and the imposition of compensation by the insurer to the insured in the event of a claim.

The violation of the duties attached, also titled instrumental, laterals, or accessories of the contract - such as the general clause of good faith objective, general duty of loyalty and mutual trust between the parties - implies contractual liability, as the authoritative doctrine teaches with support in numerous precedents of this Court, recognizing that, in this case, the negative features illegal contract. 4. The case does not molded to any of the specific terms of the Civil Code, covering the ten-year limitation period provided for in Article 205, the mentioned Diploma.5. Special feature not provided" (STJ. REsp 1276311/RS).

[17] New institutes are being welcomed by the Brazilian Civil Law to ensure the protection of the rights of the debtor, such as the theory of the duty to mitigate loss (duty to mitigate loss). Similarly, the Council of the Federal Court has approved the Statement No. 169, at the III Journey of Civil Law namely: "the principle of objective good faith must lead the lender to prevent further detriment." Follow interesting judged appreciated by STJ on the topic: REsp 758518/PR Special Appeal 2005/0096775-4. Rapporteur: Ministry Vasco Della Giustina (Judge summoned the TJ / RS). Thus, there is a two-way street that requires activity of subjects also focused on the common good, as well as a role in society that does not sacrifice the individual good, supportive considered in relation to the property of others (ROSENVALD, 2007, p. 17).

Into the contractual domain, the respect to the minimum conditions of life applies. According to the German theory of the "limits of sacrifice", the contracts do not need to be fulfilled when their execution leads to overspending and not to provided, which can be checked when the due performance compromise survival. The free market system can be worked out as an example to demonstrate this theory of "limits of sacrifice" (AZEVEDO, 2002, p. 98).

Thus, the contract[18] does not hold in an isolated way. It is a way that drives the human wills. Even when there is a conflict of interests between the contractors, the judiciary uses the specific case to better apply the Law. In business in which the social function is more evident (finance, banking contracts in general insurance, family issues, etc.)., economic and social phenomena are even more noticeable. The judge, therefore, when analyzing of the case, should be concerned with the social contingent that also[19] is reached, because here is a reflection of the application of the harmonization of the duties of solidarity and space of freedom of individuals.

In conclusion: a proposal for the implementation of solidarity in private relations

It was found in this study that in private relations there are fundamental duties of individuals involved in solidarity, but at the same time, private autonomy must be safeguarded in some contractual scenarios, especially in view of the economic impact that a court may cause interference in future hiring.

[18] The agreement now needs to be understood as an instrument of protection of the human, more than that, as a support for the free development of the individual's existence as a real policy of solidarity, as proposed in Article 1, section III of the Federal Constitution , in which the "being available to the other", becomes to na online hermeneutic line for patrimonial situations (ROSENVALD, 2007, p. 10).

[19] "Underlying the idea of reciprocity is the community of equals, which, however, under the rule of formal equality is to be understood, both factual and legal, in the sense given: factually, stressing that inequalities are never so relevant, in the legal sense, disregarding the inequalities in fact, that men can consider themselves (although they can't actually be) as equals. Community of equals and equal interests, however, still referenced by individual values, expensive to individuals in real conditions of equality and while ended in its in individuality. The only rule of justice, in this environment, remains that of equality before the law" (Moraes, 2003, p. 113).

Thus, if certain states liens are passed on to individuals in exercising their economic activities, to create objective conditions that allow access to services or products in the line of duty of solidarity, such a scenario could generate, in certain situations, an imbalance greater in particular relation versus private.

It is tenuous, so the relationship between the fundamental duties, limits and restrictions towards fundamental rights, because such restrictions can be justified on the basis of fundamental duties in the interests of society, meaning not even the prevalence of public interest on the private.

It is concluded that the scope of the fundamental duty of the particular scenario of private autonomy, and how it brings harmonization between the duties of solidarity and space of freedom of individuals in the exercise of private autonomy, should observe the duties attached of business, but the private autonomy can not be curbed by the judiciary (subjectivism magistrate), through contractual dirigisme without criteria, absolutely and supposedly grounded in fundamental rights to impose on individuals and businesses some typically state duties.

The purpose of this study, therefore, lies in the notion that the private autonomy can only be relativized, in compliance with the fundamental duty of solidarity, when guided by rationally justifiable criteria and using dialogue sources.

On the origins of Rule of Law and the meta-physics of institutions

Bruno Meneses Lorenzetto[1]

Abstract: The question concerning the origins or the beginning of the concepts is a philosophical problem that is located at the core of some of the most important reflections in our current time. In specific, the question about the origins of the state – the Rule of Law – is taken as the object of this reflection. It´s known that there is a wide range of answers given to it, mainly by the classical perspective of distinct authors that addressed the issue, in an effort to create theories that could shape an outlook to the social community and explain some important themes which structure the identity of a society, as such, the origins of sovereignty, the legitimacy of the representatives, the declarations of rights and the functioning of the institutions.

The aim of the present paper is to show the mechanisms that work in the "underground" of these concepts or, how does the institutions use a meta-physical production of self-legitimating acts. Problems that can be seen in the "we" of term "We the people", in the following terms: who is the "we" that precedes the "We the people", or constitutes the "people"? The state is thought as being "always there", even before the "we"? One can say that our forebears created the state but, when? And, where did came the power that legitimated our forebears?

On the other hand, from where is originated the legitimacy of the Law? How to enforce the law, remembering that the Law is an authorized and justified force, a force that justifies itself. And, furthermore, the operation that creates the Law tend to be a coup de force, that no prior foundation could, by definition, guarantee, ensure or contradict.

In sum, the search for the origins of the Rule of Law implies in putting in evidence the aporias that constitutes both the Law and Politics and, as a consequence, the uses that Law makes of politics to legitimate itself, and vice versa. Considering that both institutions bear a meta-physical structure of legitimation.

Keywords: Rule of Law. Institutions. Politics.

1. Foundation

According to Hannah Arendt, the concept of authority has vanished from the modern world — not the concept in its large sense, but a specific form of it that has been valid in the Western world for a long time.[2] Arendt is talking about the Roman concept of political authority, in which the source of authority rested in the past, in the moment of the foundation of Rome, and in the importance of its forebears.

In Rome, says Arendt, since the beginning of the Republic, the sacred character of the foundation was sustained because once something has been founded, it remains connected to future generations. This was the form of political participation in Rome: the preservation of the foundation of the city, connecting it with the past, and the effort to build foundations that would last for eternity.

Those who held authority were the elders, the Senate or the patres, who inherited this authority from the founders of all future things.[3] For the Romans, the authority of the living was dependent on the founder's authority. Auctoritas connected to the past, to the tradition, and was set against power, potestas, the force of the living. Auctoritas was rooted in the past but was present and important to political life as much as the power or the force of the living. Although the power was derived from the people, the authority rested in the Senate.

According to Hannah Arendt, the Romans required "founding fathers" and examples of authority in terms of ideas. This led them to take the Greek ancestors as authorities who provided philosophy and poetry.[4] The past was sanctified through the tradition that preserved it, leaving the testimony of the forebears as a hope for the future generations.

Arendt noted that this model was incorporated by the Christian church, which transformed the Nativity into a "new foundation". The same phenomenon was used in the Enlightenment revolutions, in which the French and Americans preached belief in a future State and in a "vengeful God" as part of the new political body.

Thomas Jefferson affirmed the need for a divine principle, a transcendent sanction in the public realm. Curiously, this sanction was called for during the revolutionary period, demonstrating the founders' need for some type of metaphysical support.[5]

Although the authority, in its Roman sense demonstrated by Arendt, came close to complete oblivion, it has subsisted in Western political history in two ways: through modern revolutions, which rescued the importance of the idea of foundation, and in Machiavellian thought, in which the concept of foundation is fundamental.[6]

Conscious of the need for a new political organism, Machiavelli utilized the term stato, which identified him as the "father" of the modern concept of the State. Arendt adds that it is possible to consider Machiavelli the precursor of modern revolutions because he understood that in the foundation existed the central political action, the only great activity that could establish the public and political domain and that could turn the political into reality.

The modern revolutions – generally considered radical ruptures with tradition – emerged as events of political actions that were inspired by the origin of this tradition and extracted their primary force from it. According to Fioravanti, whereas the French revolution attempted to combine the individualist model with the State, the American Revolution attempted to combine individualism with historicism, excluding from its own horizon the European State philosophy of political sovereignty.[7] In both revolutions, the figure of constituent power carried enormous relevance. Nevertheless, it is important to distinguish differences between the revolutions beyond some coincidences related to the attribution of sovereignty to the people.

In this way, one can attempt to understand why, of the modern revolutions that concentrated and justified their searches for foundations, the American Revolution was successful in renewing the "broken thread with tradition".[8]

2. The institution's mechanisms

The next step is based on thinking how this worked in the configuration of modern institutions. From another perspective, it's important to remember that, according to Mary Douglas, the entrenching of an idea is a social process.[9] This process of entrenching implies also in determining intellectual, economic and political processes. Usually, to acquire legitimacy it will look after examples in nature and in reason, and it will be bounded to the very structure of the social order.

That's why it's common to think that institutions have a self-policing start, but, it's paradoxical to think that a community will grow up into little institutions. So, for a social convention turn itself into a legitimate social institution it must be accompanied by a cognitive convention that will structure it. This can be seen in the naturalization process that we are used to make in the dichotomist treatment we give to subjects like gender, ideology and politics.

The social principle is reinforced with a naturalized analogy: female and male, left and right, the people and the king. Mary Douglas observes that these dichotomies present both a complementary aspect, but, either a political hierarchy.[10] Ultimately, the grounding of institutions will refer to nature, and, in the XVIII century, nature was still deeply bounded to God. God wasn't dead – yet.

Other characteristics help to understand the processes of institutions is the relation with the forebears, usually it is settled a list of inheritance laws. Any person that wishes to validate its pretensions has to remark its ascendancy, and the same rule is applied to the ones wishing to contest their legacy. In addition, the social convention needs also a naturalizing principle, to give legitimacy to will be done in the future. It's not completely casual that Rome bears as its myth of foundation, the she-wolf relation with the twins Romulus and Remus.

The institutions endure to long phases in which they were simple fragile conventions. The early Christianity is also an example to this point. Being "naturalized", it became part of the universal order and, from this stage, it started to be used to ground different sorts of argumentation.

Another common aspect is that the founding analogies need to be hidden and the way of thinking about the world or the "epistemology" must also be a kind of secret, not accessible to everyone. That's the form in which institutions also give uniformity to a random mixture of items that count as "members" or "elements" of certain category.

The mechanisms by which the institutions provide this uniformity is not always clear. In the case of the Rule of Law, this can be seen in the efforts to eliminate antinomies, vagueness, and other imprecisions, derived from the use of natural language to create rules. But the major conflict about this subject involves the possibility of the judicial review. A practice that is originally legitimated in the name of the coherence of the whole legal system, but it produces a problem that goes beyond this simple question of maintaining its alleged coherence, the problem of legitimacy.

The way that institutions are build is squeezing the ideas into a common shape that pursues to be recognized by all, and become the parameter of correction of other variants – but it not happens always in a pacific way. Yet, institutions fix dynamic processes and hide their influence, they endow themselves with rightness. Mary Douglas understands that: "In marking its own boundaries it affects all lower level thinking, so that persons realize their own identities and classify each other through community affiliation".[11]

And it is exactly this question "who are the ones that belong to the community?" that is in the "underground" of the foundation of the modern States. It is on the root not only of modern problems like xenophobia but, in a more profound sense, concerning the origins of the people that created – ex nihilo – this community.

3. Deus ex machina

Jacques Derrida in his "Declarations of Independence",[12] start his reflections with one question about the Declaration of Independence: "who signs, and with what so-called proper name, the declarative act which founds an institution?".[13] This act, of signature is not only the gesture of signing, but goes beyond it because it performs, accomplishes itself, "does what it say it does".

What Derrida says is that a declaration that founds something like an institution, a constitution or a State requires that the signer engage himself with it, because the signature maintains a link with the instituting act. An example of it is the need that one institution has of keeping itself independent of the empirical individuals who take part in its production.[14]

But who signs the letter, the declaration? Which is the person that legitimates, that founds this actions? In the case of the Declaration, Thomas Jefferson, the draftsman of the project. By right, he writes but does not sign. Jefferson, the one who represented the representatives, the ultimate signers?

But the representatives sign, by right, for themselves, but also "in the name of", for others. By right the signer is "the people", the "good" people. They (the people) are the ones who declare themselves free and independent. The problem is that this "good people", which authorizes their representatives to sign the draft, does not exist. The inexistence is in the sense of an entity, before the declaration – and this is where the aporia is situated – can't be anyone, but the people is also the one who legitimates the signature – the performative act that constitutes a political community, "We the people". As Derrida says: "There was no signer, by right, before the text of the Declaration which itself remains the producer and guarantor of its own signature".[15]

The coup of force that found the Law, brings the law to the light of day, gives birth and day to the Law. In this point can be observed the union between the constation and performance of language.[16] The Declaration of Independence is a performative act, represents in the verbal form an empirical action, the creator of a new settlement of things and the maker of a baptism.

The signature sustains the simulacrum of the instant, as said by Derrida, they invent (for) themselves a signing identity. They sign in the name of the laws of nature, in the name of God. They place the foundation of their institutions in natural laws, in the name of God, that is, the creator of nature, the last resource for legitimation.

If the Declaration of Independence wants to produce any signification this must follow a model, one example – once again, the aporia and the search for grounding to something that through a performative act gives birth to itself. Which is the last instance? What is the last model – in the meta-physical field? To the "Founding Fathers" of the United States the answer can, in a first look, be simple. But this thought conceals a trap, because the French, in the same period, had their revolution, and they needed to change their political configuration, mainly, to put themselves against the Ancien Régime, so they didn't wanted to be inspired by their predecessors, but, this also was an important question to the ones who aimed to Declare Independence in the United States, even though they were inspired by England they wished to create their own institutional design.

Which alternatives were left? Can a people be born from their own baptism? The social contract is ratified by whom? Is there a group of persons that precedes the "We the people"? But, isn't this people that legitimates the Declaration of Independence – in the name of themselves? In that period there were few alternatives left to justify authority. But, this question was suspended. Or, one can say, resolved. The last signature belonged to God, the best proper name. But there is no proper name.[17]

From this first point a second one is developed. If, in one hand there is a crisis in the legitimation of the independent nation, the new State, on the other hand is the problem of representation. How representatives of the people can sign, speak in the name of the people? Is there a limit to the things that the representatives can do a limit to this procuration? The thin link between the paradoxes is located at the metaphysical people. The institution that institutes.

A representative cannot faithfully represent all the represented ones, not event their voters. But there is an invisible and indispensable

[17] "It is because the proper names are already no longer proper names, because their production is their obliteration, because the erasure and the imposition of the letter are originary, because they do not supervene upon a proper inscription; it is because the proper name has never been, as the unique appellation reserved for the presence of a unique being, anything but the original myth of a transparent legibility present under the obliteration; it is because the proper name was never possible except through its functioning within a classification and therefore within a system of differences, within a writing retaining the traces of difference, that the interdict was possible, could come into play, and, when the time came, as we shall see, could be transgressed; transgressed, that is to say restored to the obliteration and the non-self-sameness [non-propriété] at the origin". DERRIDA, Jacques. Of Grammatology. Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1997. p. 110 link between the voter and the elected, the sovereign and its subjects, the State and the people.

Bonnie Honig following this trace discuss the paradox of politics, democracy's grounding problem in which power should belong to the people, but the people is not allowed to make the important decisions that politics demands.[18] For this reason states Honig that:

> "The paradox of politics is not soluble by law or legal institutions, nor can it be tamed by universal or cosmopolitan norms. The paradox of politics highlights the chicken and the egg circle in which we are law´s authors and law´s subjects, always both creatures and authors of law. Thus, the paradox teaches us the limits of law and calls us to responsibility for it. And it teaches that the stories of politics have no ending, they are never-ending".[19]

In the beginning of democratic regimes, especially those derived from ruptures with authoritarian governments, can be settled an agreement about who are the opponents, who should be antagonized, but, in fewer cases is possible to make a consensual agreement about the main values that will rule the society, the institutional design of the new government, which are the principles and ideals that the new State should protect – all this stays suspended and usually is the subject of political disputes.

4. Revolution and institutionalization

After the birth of this new nation, various problems emerged regarding the political and institutional configuration of the United States. One important anchor of the national identity of the United States is stated in the Constitution. For Arendt, the relation between the American people before the Revolution and the Constitution was of a religious order, in the original sense of religare, the capacity to bind or to connect to one's origin.

This tribute to the origin has two axes, the first of which was mistaken because the men of the American Revolution thought that in rescuing the memory, they could adopt its rights and liberties. In this case, they were attempting to consolidate a liberal comprehension of the guarantee of these rights. The second axis treats a political agreement by deriving both the authority and the stability from a political body.

This is the aspect of the American Revolution that differentiated it from the others: the implicit authority in the act of foundation despite the belief in an immortal legislator or the promises established in the rewards and threats of a future life, the after-life. For this reason, the self-evident "truths" enumerated in the Preamble of the Declaration of Independence were those that succeeded in guaranteeing permanence to the New Republic.

Governments were instituted with the aim of promoting the guarantee of rights, and these governments were derived from the consent of the governed. This gave the people the right to contest or even destroy it if the government violated these original principles (the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute a new government). The new political body should be faithful to these principles to achieve happiness and safety in the best possible way.

In this original political derivation can be observed the inspiration of the Roman institutions before the challenges presented by the formation of a new sovereign entity as an organization of the internal structures of the social set and the stabilization of popular expectations. If the Roman example pointed to the power given to the people (potestas in populo), the authority remained with the Senate (auctoritas in senatu). In the case of the American revolutionaries, this formula was not fully used because the auctoritas was yielded to the judiciary.

From this perspective, Hannah Arendt notes that the lack of power presented in the Federalist indicates that the primary headquarters of the American Republic was the Supreme Court, which exercised its power through the constant constitutional activity of a permanent "Constitutional Assembly".[20]

This epoch was addressing the problem of how to make a perpetual agreement – surrounded by tensions of different orders, such as England's pressure and the necessary conciliation between the colonies – in such a way that the original act of foundation would become permanent. For this reason, a bet was made on trust in the stable and permanent figure of authority.

This "bet on authority" was also reflected in the double role played by the term "Constitution". According to Arendt, this term expressed the notion of a "constituent act" that preceded all of the governments, the framing of a society, and its political and institutional configuration as well as the manifestation of the legacy of this foundational moment, the Letter, the Constitution in its document form.[21]

This emulation of the "moment of origin" is the production of a foundational abstraction, a time in which the political actors were placed outside of the chronological continuum to become the "Founders". As noted by Arendt, the important point here is not the utilization of the Romans to anchor the foundation, which, in itself, represented a re-constitution, but that the political actors were ready for the paradoxical work of producing a "new origin". They were "Founders" with the authentic capacity to originate new things based in the nativity and in the comprehension of the fact that human beings existed in the world due the act of giving birth.[22]

The year 1789 marked two very important political occurrences: the French Revolution and the approval of the Constitution of the United States. Despite the political proximity between France and the United States, the institutional political models adopted by the two countries were significantly different.

However, in both cases, the revolution needed to be terminated. Therefore, the Constitution began to symbolize the institutionalization of the demands made by the revolutionaries. If, to a certain point, the Revolution had propelled the formation of new governance and a new institutional political architecture, it needed an end that allowed the transition of the revolutionary state to the Rule of Law.

The State was seen as the best form of government. Thus, the constitutional government attached democratic elements to non-democratic characteristics. This is an indication that there were tensions between the stabilization promoted by the Constitution and the Revolution linked to the constituent power and to the democratic expansion of the sovereignty.

In conclusion, it is important to note that the conventions were one of the political innovations arising from the American Revolution with the formation of a legislative body not directly connected with the legislature. The settlers had knowledge about these conventions, but, in 1770, the institutions of the government did not represent their interests. Thus, the conventions became the alternative defense of the people against the government.

[21] ARENDT, H. On Revolution.

[22] ARENDT, H. On Revolution.

As stated by Arendt, the American Revolution combined two important elements, mutual promises and deliberation. Therefore, it is remembered as the result of men who worked in common agreement backed by mutual promises because men should not be limited to the unpredictable inconstancies of fortune, waiting for their political constitutions to be graced by chance. As noted by Hamilton in the Federalist number 1, it was believed that societies of men were capable of establishing good governments as a result of reflection and choice.[23]

In this sense, the expression "We the People" in the Preamble of the Constitution of United States had the objective of establishing the fiction that the community was not governed by a king or an external power but by institutions that represented its own constitutional expression, with a political order that was not drawn from history but was created and implemented civically by the people themselves.[24]

The right to justification and the Rule of Law:
Towards a "justifiable" legal argumentation theory

Rafael Cascardo Cardoso dos Santos[1]

Abstract: The fundamental core of moral rights is far from being an undisputed matter among philosophers and scholars in general. Here, I intend to show a possible interpretation of moral rights as having a common ground: the right to justification. The whole construction of this argument relies upon Rainer Forst's book: The Right to Justification. In the mentioned book, the author defends that the content of this right is reconstructed by looking at the contexts of people's relations in society. Although firstly developed in the moral context, I also look to show how this right could be applied to the basic structures of society (here I also rely to Rainer Forst's ideas, however, in a more loose manner). Institutions, however, are limited in internalizing the requirements of the right to justification, since they work inside a pre-established design and not in a pure normative way. Considering these limitations, I will try to show how the Legislative and the Judiciary could act in harmony to enforce this right and to help each other in a synergistic manner. To justify the application of the moral notion of the right to justification to institutions, a parallel between this right and the Rule of Law is a useful resource, since the concept proposed here of Rule of Law seems to be close to what we could call an institutional ground to the right to justification. Finally, I will expose how the growing studies on legal justification and argumentation theories could improve with the normative idea of the right to justification. By doing so, my goal is not to show a correct legal argumentation theory, but rather to give an important ground to construct analytical rules and principles of justification in legal reasoning.

Keywords: Justification; Political Constructivism; Rule of Law

1. Introduction

Prior to starting the work itself, I will briefly outline its sections. Firstly, the components of a moral right to justification will be exposed and analytically decomposed. In this first part, I will focus on the idea shown by Rainer Forst on his book The right to Justification. Following this first description of Rainer Forst's normative conception of the foundation of moral and human rights, the second part shifts its attention to the basic structures of society. This part will show, by the method of political constructivism, how institutions – notably the Legislative and the Judiciary bodies – ought to play its roles inside the requirement of the right to justification and the Rule of Law. There are limits that prevent an institution from achieving an optimal result in theirs deliberative activity and these limits will be exposed not only descriptively, but also in order to suggest ways of making a better deliberation process. Furthermore, I will draw some remarks on Brazil's recent institutional experience and try to diagnose its problems with the help of the approach of the right to justification to political/judicial institutions. Finally, the last section is focused on legal argumentation theories and how they could be affected by the right to justification.

2. The core of moral rights: the basic right to justification

Rainer Forst formulates the right to justification as being the ground of morality, which "lies in the re-cognition of the human responsibility to reciprocally and generally justify one's actions in moral contexts in relation to all others affected"[2]. Moreover, he emphasizes the fact that the action must be reasonably (which means generally and reciprocally) non-rejectable rather than acceptable. This right has two important consequences, one as being positive and the other negative: it grants the affected a right to say in the matter (positive aspect) and a – qualified[3] - veto right against norms and structures that cannot be justified within the two exposed criteria and bring the disadvantaged unjustifiable inequalities (negative aspect).

The first important idea is the criteria of reciprocity and generality. According to Forst, reciprocity "means that no one may refuse the particular demands of others that one raises for oneself (reciprocity of content), and that no one may simply assume that others have the same values and interests as oneself or make recourse to 'higher truths' that are not shared (reciprocity of reasons). Generality means that reasons for generally valid basic norms must be sharable by all those affected"[4]. These criteria provide a common ground by which human rights can be "constructed" and against which no good reason can be raised. However, the principle of justification that gives rise to the duty to justify cannot itself be justified (or "constructed") and we must reconstruct the various contexts of human practices to conclude that the criteria of generality and reciprocity are always present in the intersubjective expectation of individuals. Again, Forst asserts that human beings are justificatory beings and "if we want to understand human practices, we must conceive of them as practices bound up with justifications; no matter what we think or do, we place upon ourselves (and others) the demand for reasons, whether they are made explicit or remain implicit (at least initially)"[5].

The methodological aspect of the criteria of justification applies primordially to the validity claims of moral relevant actions and norms. In his words, "a comprehensive analysis of practical and normative justification would thus have the task of examining the various contexts of justification within the framework of a recursive reconstruction of the validity claims raised in each context to identify the conditions for redeeming those claims"[6]. It is also very important to emphasize the contextual aspect of the discursive process of justification and its primary addresses: "those affect in relevant ways. This is far more in accord with the meaning of morality, which consists in respecting the justified claims of vulnerable beings. These claims find their way directly into the moral justification"[7]. Therefore, in the discursive procedure of justification, in order for the validity claim of the norm or action to be considered justifiable, the addresses – the most affected in relevant ways – must assess its reciprocal and general validity. The conclusion that we can reach is that, for Forst, the norms that pass the referred test have a "morally unconditional normative character and are in a strict sense categorically binding as norms against whose validity no good reasons can speak"[8]. The moral reasons which justifies the moral claims must be shared reasons, "in order to do justice to the openness of the procedure of justification and to underscore the (in this sense counterfactual) moment of reciprocal and general acceptability – or better, non-rejectability – independent of the factual acceptance or nonacceptance of reasons"[9]. These reasons "arise within a practice of mutual and general justification, and constitute a 'space of justification', which is not a space that contains a stock of moral truths that are fixed once and for all, but one that must always be updated and newly validated in concrete practices of justification"[10].

However, this categorical and unconditional binding gives rise to the question of how to conciliate the autonomy of morality and the morality of autonomy. Forst answers this questions with a second-order practical insight, which is an insight not in how to justify – which is explained by the principle of justification -, but into the unconditional duty of justification. This duty, according to Forst, is not derived from an obligation, "but rather as one that a person has in virtue of one's capacity for being a moral person"[11] and that "this means recognizing that (and how) one is accountable to others as an autonomous person, without any further reason"[12]. This insight into the moral point of view combines the "cognitive (the capacity for justification), volitional (willingness to give justification and act justifiably), and affective (the sensorium for moral violations) components"[13]. Forst creates his own view of Kant's idea of human being as an end in itself, affirming that "moral persons recognize one another in accordance with this duty as persons who have an irreducible right to justification. This, on my account, is precisely what it means to regard oneself and others as ends in themselves (…) Without this insight into, and acceptance of, the duty to provide justifications the principle of justification would be left hanging in the air"[14] and saying that "morality is in the first instance concerned with the dignity of other persons"[15].

Another interesting point of Rainer Forst's concept of the right to justification is the advantage of the negative formula – moral norms must be such that cannot be generally and reciprocally rejected – over the affirmative formula of merely saying that moral norms must be generally and reciprocally accepted. According to Forst, "it leaves open the possibility of morally admissible norms that could be legitimately rejected – and hence that are not categorically binding – but that can also be reasonably accepted because they concern actions that are supererogatory. Second, and more importantly, the criteria of general and reciprocal rejectability make it possible to test the character of the claims raised and to determine when a claim can be or could be reasonably rejected even in cases of (expectable) disagreement or of 'false' agreement (based, for example, on illegitimate influence, intimidation, or lack of information)"[16]. The possible limitation of the discourse of justification in the core of the definition of the right to justification makes it an interesting concept, especially regarding the next sections that will focus on institutions, which are, by definition, limited. The right to justification is compatible with dissent[17], recognizing that pure consensus theories are highly fictitious. Rainer Forst makes another good observation, paraphrasing Hannah Arendt, asserting that "reflection on the finitude of human beings also includes becoming aware of the finitude of reason and the impossibility of being able to resort to 'ultimate' and unquestionably certain grounds in procedures of moral justification. This impossibility grows more concrete as a moral problem is posed, from which, of course, the impossibility of justifying reasons does not follow, but rather the necessity of always reciprocally and generally reassessing the justifications provided. A morality of justification is a morality that can be criticized and revised in its details: a human morality 'without a banister' that cannot in principle exclude the possibility of failures and errors"[18].

To conclude this first part, it is important to emphasize that Forst finds the concept of justice – the core meaning of it being the right to justification -, as having its fundamental opposition in arbitrariness. His moral theory is thoroughly directed to fight arbitrariness, trying to make persons "understand and embrace the responsibility for finding a common 'ground' for their action on which they can stand and stand their ground: not an 'ultimate' ground, but still a stable ground precisely because of its openness to a critique in which 'nothing [is] so holy' as the 'agreement' or the 'veto' of each"[19]. Therefore, even though the right to justification is the base from which derives all other human rights; it does not give each of these human rights full potential. Instead, it delivers only a basic framework than can be developed on different grounds than the one offered by this right to justification[20].

3. Political Constructivism[21], institutions and The Rule of law

This section is divided in three parts: the first one makes the shift from moral theory to the formation of society's basic structures (focused on the Legislative, Executive and the Judiciary) and the role of the right to justification there (3.1); the second is a little bit more focused on how the connection of the role of the right to justification and the referred institutions can be conceptually binding, so it treats how the right to justification can penetrate the notion of Rule of law (3.2); and the last is especially dedicated to some remarks on Brazil's institutions and the contribution that could be made by accepting the right to justification as a mechanism of moral correction of these institutions (3.3).

3.1 The Right to Justification as a legit basic ground for institutions

So far, we have exposed Rainer Forst's moral constructivism based upon the right to justification. Now I am going to turn my attention to the possible effect of this right when applied to state institutions. Although I am going to gradually detach myself from Rainer Forst's lessons, I will start with some of his conceptions, remarkably by his view on political constructivism.

Rainer Forst affirms that political constructivism is on the second "discursive construction" level of a constructivist conception of human rights, on which "conceptions of legal, political, and social structures need to be developed in which these general rights are concretely justified, interpreted, institutionalized and realized as basic rights in given

[19] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 42.

[20] This "weak" aspect of the right to justification is important to make it more manageable in other contexts of justice which are not pure normative and have more complex constraints to the interaction of the actors.

[21] Although introduced by John Rawls in Political Liberalism, the concept here is used in a different, but similar away. The difference between the conception here defended and Rawls's can be seen at FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. Chapter 4.

historical and social contexts"[22]. The first level is composed by the already exposed moral constructivism.

The two levels are at the same time autonomous and dependent from each other. They are autonomous, since they work in different contexts – "moral norms have to be justified in the moral community of all human beings, whereas norms of political and social justice are to be justified in particular political communities"[23] -, but they are dependent because "moral justification is – in a normative-formal sense – the core of political justification"[24].

In fact, the moral construction must be integrated by political constructivism, since the general list of moral rights that appear by the method of moral constructivism can only be enforced and "concretely justified, interpreted, institutionalized (…) within a legally constituted political order"[25]. However, even though political discourse has limitations, it "may not violate the basic right to justification or the criteria of reciprocity and generality. What is valid in the universal moral context must also be demonstrably valid in particular political contexts"[26].

Nevertheless, since political contexts are situated socially and historically, they do not merely institutionalize moral rights previously established. The rights that are going to be legally prescribed depend on the demands that are going to appear in each political context. Then, it is important to say that "a legally binding interpretation, institutionalization, and realization of these rights can be supplied only in a law-governed state, a state in which the citizens confer upon themselves a right to justification and recognize the rights that are justifiable on the basis of this right (in the form accepted by them)"[27]. The concept of "law-governed" state can be interpreted as a state that is inside the framework of the Rule of Law.

Every state that works inside the Rule of Law has a constitution – written or not – that represents its fundamental legal base. Following Forst, "a constitution has the double task of fixing a list of basic rights that citizens of a democratic order who respect one another's basic right to justification have to grant and guarantee one another (…) and of laying down the principles and rules of fair deliberative procedures"[28]. These aspects reflect the constitution as "the result of a moral construction of a just basic structure and the groundwork for the political construction of a just political and social order"[29].

However, for the success of this continuous "process of moral and political construction", a special commitment from people is necessary. As Dworkin states in his community model of principle "(…) people are members of a genuine political community only when they accept that their fates are linked in the following strong way: they accept that they are governed by common principles, not just by rules hammered out in political compromise. Politics has a different character for such people. (…) In short, each accepts political integrity as a distinct political ideal and treats the general acceptance of that ideal, even among people who otherwise disagree about political morality, as constitutive of political community"[30]. Therefore, we can see integrity as central to politics[31] and as a useful virtue, even if ideal, that a political community should have to lay down the referred principles and rules of fair deliberative procedures that fits inside the requirement of the right to justification.

Klaus Günther also contributes to the matter, taking an intersubjective perspective rather than an individualist one that seems to be on the background of Dworkin conception. Günther affirms that "the principle of coherence, to which legislation is also subject, implicitly manifests this interconnection between societal solidarity and an intersubjectivist concept of law. Because every new right is valid always only in the context of consideration of other rights, they are embedded in relations of mutual recognition from the very beginning"[32]. Here, it is useful to go beyond Günther and say that not only rights are to be justified, interpreted and validated intersubjectively and interconnected to others rights, but also to affirm that in this complex chain all of them are ultimately related to the right to justification and its criteria of generality and reciprocity. Günther continues to affirm that "by 'equal concern and respect', one could mean the idea of impartiality (…) as a rule of argumentation in practical discourses. For this rule operationalizes only the universal-reciprocal sense of the idea of impartiality, namely, that of equally considering the interests of each individual when justifying a norm"[33]. Here it is important to observe that, in spite of considering the concrete interests when justifying a norm, he does not give a special consideration to the potentially affected in the context of justification, falling short to obey the criteria of the right to justification.

Now turning specifically to the concretization of rights by deliberative institutions following the criteria imposed by the right to justification, there are two points that should be mentioned. Firstly, the cultural background is an important factor to enhance the democratic deliberation. The culture aspect is optimized in the already referred scenario of Dworkin's model of principle community. Similarly, Rainer Forst says that a community of responsibility is important to develop relations of political trust between citizens. According to him, "trust is a normative resource of special importance in a democracy, for citizens need to trust both that other citizens will accept their responsibilities and that social institutions will work according to justifiable rules and norms, even if no 'perfect' institutionalization of democracy and of democratic supervision can be established"[34]. Secondly, the institutions themselves should enable effective and fair participation and argumentation. Freedom of speech concretized in efficient mechanisms of direct participation of citizens is crucial, in order to make the input of information and the accountability of the output provided by state decisions more democratic. As Forst affirms "political institutions in a narrower sense, most importantly parliamentary decision-making bodies, also have to be 'designed' so that the 'force' of the better argument can become a real political force"[35].

Nonetheless, if majority institutions fail to make justifiable outcomes, which will always happen to a certain degree, since institutions do not work in ideal deliberative conditions, judicial review is there to check political decisions. In fact, the institutional task of Judiciary related to the right to justification is to examine "political decisions with respect to the question of whether the criteria of reciprocity and generality have been satisfied, that is, whether important moral (reciprocally and generally non-rejectable) reasons have been neglected or trumped by inappropriate considerations, and with respect to the question of whether the procedures of political participation, inclusion, and justification have been adequately followed"[36].

Analyzing the matter of judicial review, Humberto Ávila proposes normative standards that should be followed by the Judiciary which are in accordance with the separation of powers. According to him, the Judiciary should be more self-restrained when "(1) there is a doubt about the future effects of the norm; (2) the matter is of a difficult and technical nature; (3) the constitution permits an open balance by the Legislative on the matter"[37], whereas when there is a restriction of fundamental rights and the premises on which it is founded are clearly mistaken, the Judiciary should act in a more activist (in a non-technical sense) way. Adopting a more restrained perspective, in a defense of judicial minimalism, Cass Sunstein asserts that "minimalism tends to be the appropriate course when the Court is operating in the midst of reasonable pluralism or moral flux, when circumstances are changing rapidly, or when the Court is uncertain that a broad rule would make sense in future cases. (…) When a democracy is in a state of ethical or political uncertainty, courts may not have the best or the final answers. Judicial answers may be wrong. They may be counterproductive even if they are right"[38]. In spite of making this presumption in favor of a minimalist approach, Sunstein also says that "Sometimes minimalism is a blunder; sometimes it creates unfairness. Whether minimalism makes sense cannot be decide in the abstract; everything depends on context, prominently including assessments of comparative institutional competence"[39].

Although the Judiciary has an important role in democratic societies, its importance should not be overestimated. In fact, taking a critical-descriptive approach, Forst asserts that "what is necessary then is the general and unimpeded possibility of raising objections to decisions by pointing out that reciprocally non-rejectable claims or reasons have been ignored. This is a task that is often fulfilled by courts, with all the disadvantages of turning political questions into legal questions and of excluding certain claims which may not be easily phrased in the established legal language; therefore – and dhis is even more important in large-scale democratic orders such as the European Union- it should be a task taken up by political institutions designed for that purpose"[40].

Therefore, the risk of a "juristocracy" is always imminent and should be taken seriously[41]. The Judiciary cannot go beyond the institutional design to correct a flaw from the Legislative, since there are institutional rules to which it should be deferent. Sometimes suboptimal outcomes are not only institutionally inevitable, but also required by the legal system. In the case of a flaw of a majority institution, it is even relevant to adopt a second-best choice in the legal decision, since in the future the majority can recognize its error by seeing the bad effects it had caused (which the Judiciary could not reassess, due to institutional limitation) and correct it by itself. In a similar way, Schauer points out that "in operating in this fashion, law does not intend to be perverse. It does, however, intend to take institutional values especially seriously, and it does that in the hope that in the long run we may be better off with the right institutions than we are when everyone simply tries to make the best decision"[42].

3.2. The Right to Justification as institutionally binding – some remarks and contributions on the debate of the concept of Rule of Law

The best way to analyze the right to justification as a required component of institutions is by tracing its similarity with the Rule of Law in its common aspect: the fundamental opposition to arbitrariness[43].

Nevertheless, the concept of the Rule of Law has been much disputed nowadays between scholars. The core idea of its opposition to arbitrariness is, however, an idea shared by almost all of them, even though they diverge in matters of defining the content of the Rule of Law. Here, I will briefly expose the view of Finnis and Raz which are two of the most recent and eminent scholars writing about the subject and then I will give reasons to provide an alternative structure for the Rule of Law.

Before starting, it is important to emphasize some other aspects that the authors consider common grounds. They all acknowledge that the Rule of Law in a certain State may be more or less followed, in other words, it doesn't follow the common binary code of judicial system of legal/illegal, being its implementation a matter of degree. Also, they all seem to follow[44] at least the eight requirements proposed by Lon Fuller, as being necessary to any law that exists in a State submitted to the Rule of Law[45]: generality, promulgation, no retroactivity, clarity, no contradiction, possible commanding, constancy through time, congruency between official action and declared rule[46]. At last, they agree on two basic functions of the Rule of Law: that the government should be ruled by law and that the law should be formulated as being able to guide human conduct[47].

Beginning with Finnis, it is important to say that he has both a substantial and procedural approach to the Rule of Law, although it seems, as it will be exposed, that the former always prevails over the latter. He draws his position referring to the Rule of Law as a necessary constraint in the relationship between rulers and ruled, in the sense that the rules must act towards the ruled based on a procedure fairness and reciprocity, aiming to achieve the common good[48]. A virtuous State in terms of the Rule of Law would be the one that puts the common good [44] It is important to mention that Raz has quite a different elaboration of these requirements, saying that some may not comply with what he sees as the two basic functions of the Rule of Law. In addition, he discards some of them criticizing Fuller's view that they have a value in itself, asserting that they are not independent from the two main functions of the Rule of Law and if they cannot guarantee that these goals will be achieved, other principles shall be established for that purpose. See RAZ, Joseph. The Authority of Law: Essays on Law and Morality. Oxford University Press, 1979. pp. 214-219.

[46] Although the authors agree in these components, they develop them in a different way. However, the exposition of these differences escapes the purpose of the present paper. For a dense approach to the development of these components, see MARMOR, Andrei. Law in the age of pluralism. Oxford University Press, 2007. pp. 10-33.

Finnis goes on to say that following the Rule of Law sometimes is not enough to attain the common good and then suggests that one should depart, "temporarily, but perhaps drastically, from the law and the constitution"[49]. Therefore, even if the law obeys the eight procedural requirements, which Finnis acknowledges as being necessary components of the law in the Rule of Law, provided it does not achieve the common good in a satisfactory way, the agent should not apply the law. It is important to mention that common good in the Aristotelian approach proposed by him seems to include other moral values and virtues (dignity and equality, just to mention two of them). Proceeding this way, Finnis is not being clear on which extent the common good is a substantive component of the Rule of Law, not offering a methodological way to verify it. Therefore, Raz is right in his criticism that the Rule of Law is not the Rule of the good Law, since if it was this way, "the term lacks any useful function"[50].

On the other hand, Raz offers a more minimalistic conception of Rule of Law[51]. He affirms that "it is the virtue of efficiency; the virtue of an instrument as an instrument. For the law this virtue is the rule of law. Thus the rule of law is an inherent virtue of the law, but not a moral virtue as such"[52]. However, he asserts that although not being a value in itself, it is of a great moral value, since it "enable(s) the law to perform useful social functions; just as it may be of moral importance to produce a sharp knife when it is required for a moral purpose"[53]. In addition, one of his main notions is that "the Rule of Law is essentially a negative value. The law inevitably creates a great danger of arbitrary power--the rule of law is designed to minimize the danger created by the law itself. Similarly, the law may be unstable, obscure, retrospective, etc., and thus infringe people's freedom and dignity. The rule of law is designed to prevent this danger as well. Thus the rule of law is a negative virtue in two senses: conformity to it does not cause good except through avoiding evil and the evil which is avoided is evil which could only have been caused by the law itself"[54]. He concludes by saying that "since the rule of law is just one of the virtues the law should possess, it should be expected that it possesses no more than prima facie force. (...) Conflict between the rule of law and other values is just what is to be expected. Conformity to the rule of law is a matter of degree, and though, other things being equal, the greater the conformity the better--other things are rarely equal. A lesser degree of conformity is often to be preferred precisely because it helps realization of other goals"[55].

The notion of Rule of Law that I will expose here is within a different paradigm. It has become a common ground nowadays that the Rule of Law must also presuppose the idea of a democratic State. By saying this, it is true that one gives a substantial value to the rule of law. However, I propose here that by giving the democratic characteristic to the Rule of Law, one necessarily incorporate the notion of the right to justification to the Rule of Law. The logical implication is that the eight procedural criteria mentioned above are not enough to describe the Rule of Law in democratic States. Nevertheless, the criteria of generality and reciprocity, as defined in the right to justification, makes it complete. In fact, Rainer Forst develops the concept of the right to justification in the basic structures of society taking as presupposition that these societies are democratic[56].

Finally, it is important to assert that the Rule of Law with the requirement of the right to justification makes the process of elaboration of the law to comply with the criteria of reciprocity and generality (and also the other eight original standards of the Rule of Law exposed before). The analysis is one of degree, since it is humanly impossible[57] to require the deliberative institutions (notably the Legislative) to achieve an optimum procedure referred to the right to justification. Furthermore, in a rather weak sense, the Rule of Law also requires a substantive approach regarding the approved law by the Judiciary in terms of judicial review. As it was shown, the right to justification demands that the law must be such that it cannot be generally and reciprocally rejected, so the [56] It is very important to emphasize that this is only one context in which the right to justification can be applied. In this specific context of basic institutions of the State, the right to justification requires a democratic State. In other contexts, this requirement may not be raised. Forst's argument for a right to justification is context-based. This right can also be applied in transnational perspective – which is usually done by Forst – and in this context it has other requirements. However, it is not the purpose of this article to analyze other contexts of justice than the ones of basic institutions within the national State.

[57] We can generally say that it is humanly impossible to achieve the practical discourse ideal conditions, since institutions invariably work in a suboptimal empirical context.

content will be analyzed in this manner, taking into account this aspect in a procedure of balancing based on the principle of proportionality.

3.3. A normative approach especially elaborated for Brazil's case

Before going further to the next section, I would like to make some remarks related to Brazil's institutional experience. Institutions do not work in a vacuum and we have to take into account the peculiarities of each State institution, in order to evaluate them. And now I have to do so, since, in my opinion, the second-best choice reasoning in the format that I just mentioned in section 3.1 is not a good way of reasoning by second order arguments in Brazil's institutions. I say that because the chance of the suboptimal decision taken by the Judiciary generating a dynamic effect to encourage the majority institutions of correcting its flaws by themselves in Brazil is very little. In fact, Brazil's majority institutions are under a very big crisis of representativeness[58]. Considering this scenario, scholars have worked a lot in order to justify the Judiciary activist approach inside the institutional design. However, it seems to me that the important issue to deal with now is to enhance the mechanisms of direct participation. Again, with Forst, it has been presented that the trust of citizen in each other is a strong value for the institutional democratic deliberation to be optimal. This is a important beginning to form a political culture that will make institutions to work inside justifiable rules and principles. However, Brazil does not have an ingrained culture of republican virtues, on the contrary, it possess a historical antirepublican tradition. Therefore, one alternative is trying to make a political reform[59] and expand the mechanisms of direct democracy to encourage the participation of citizens and the growth of republican virtues. In parallel to this, it is important that the Judiciary, ultimately the STF (Supremo Tribunal Federal), makes decisions that keep democracy alive with its substantial and procedural requirements, even taking a representative role when necessary[60].

[58] I am not forgetting here that this phenomenon is not exclusive of Brazil, but there the matter has taken critical patterns.

[59] For a proposal of political reform in Brazil, see BARROSO, Luís Roberto. A Reforma Política: Uma proposta de Sistema de governo, eleitoral e partidário para o Brasil. RDE I Revista de Direito do Estado. Ano 1, nº 3. Jul/set 2006, pp. 287-360. However, the scope of political reform here defended is more vast than the one in Barroso's, since it does not exclude mechanisms of direct participation not mentioned in the referred text (by saying so, I certainly do not mean to affirm that Barroso does not agree with mechanisms of directed participation). Another demand that would make democracy in Brazil on its way to a concretization of the right to justification in a specific context would be that of giving provisory prisoners the right to vote, since the rejection to it has no justifiable grounds (see SARMENTO, Daniel. Por um Constitucionalismo Inclusivo. 1ª Edição, 2010. Editora Lumen Juris. pp. 311-333).

Moreover, even though, as exposed in section 3.2, we can derive constitutionally the requirement of the right to justification in the context of institutions by the framework of the Rule of Law comprehended in a democratic State, the Brazilian Constitution[61] has other normative statutes that can be interpreted as requiring the referred right. The institutional duty of public administration to act in accord with the principle of morality[62], being a general command, can be interpreted as requiring the observance of the right to justification, since it has an ultimate moral basis. As for the institutional duty of the Judiciary, there is an explicit prevision of the duty to provide justified decisions[63]. Furthermore, the Brazilian constitutional system seems to comply with a moral interpretation that confers to some of its vague texts the reading that gives rise to a duty to justification by institutions of the State and the corresponding implicit right to justification by the people. Nevertheless, the lack of compliance to this duty by the institutions in Brazil is a problem observed empirically.

To help finding a solution to the posed matter, Forst considerations are always elucidative. He affirms that the "most important in institutional designs is the institutionalization of the possibility of what

[60] For an example of typical representative approach by the STF, see ADI 4650 about campaign finance reform. For a detailed treatment of the issue, see SARMENTO, Daniel; OSÓRIO, Aline. Eleições, dinheiro e democracia: A ADI 4650 e o modelo brasileiro de financiamento de campanhas. Available from: http://www.oab.org.br/arquivos/artigo-adi-4650-362921044.pdf

[61] It is also important to mention that Brazilian Constitution declares in its first article that its bases rely upon the legal democratic State.

[62] "Article 37. The direct or indirect public administration of any of the powers of the Union, the states, the Federal District and the municipalities, as well as their foundations, shall obey the principles of lawfulness, impersonality, morality, publicity and also the following:"

[63] "Article 93. A supplementary law, propose by the Supreme Federal Court, shall provide for the Statute of the Judicature, observing the following principles:

IX. All judgments of the bodies of Judicial Power shall be public, and all decisions shall be justified, under penalty of nullity, and the law may, if the public interest so requires, limit attendance in given acts to the interested parties and their lawyers, or only to the latter;".

one could call reciprocal objection. (…) Ideally, this kind of raising objections should already be part of the proper process of decision making, but given its constraints, this may not always be possible: thus, the need for additional checks that would require some institutional imaginativeness"[64]. The relation between the normative criteria of reciprocal and general justification and the concrete imperfect justification makes "democracy necessarily a self-critical enterprise"[65]. Therefore, the institution of mechanisms that confer a critical "veto" for relevant decisions interposed not only by structures of the state that aren't the authority in question, but also by associations of people, are important to strengthen the power of democracy in Brazil. However, as stated in section 3.1., there are other values to be taken into account and there are costs related to the establishment of a decision-making process more complex by the possibility of continuous objections. This empirical approach is a very relevant tool when evaluating the perfect equilibrium between raising the quality of democracy and not damaging too much governability. The way to make it concrete is a task for our time.

4. Legal Argumentation Theories, the Rule of Law and the Right to Justification – a possible approach

The moral right to justification as conceived by Rainer Forst, which is the idea that is being adopted in the whole paper, was not originally applied to legal argumentation theories. However, there is no reason to think that the criteria of reciprocity and generality could not be raised in the context of analyzing legal argumentation theories. According to Thomas Bustamante, "legal argumentation theories are theories about the use of arguments and its weights in the discourse of justification of the legal decision, looking to increase the rationality in the process of justifying and applying the law to an optimal degree"[66].

The possibility of linking the right to justification and legal argumentation theories becomes clearer if we accept Alexy's "special case" thesis[67]. The "special case" thesis affirms that legal reasoning is a special case of practical discourse, since it involves practical issues and these issues discussed have a claim to correctness, in spite of the discussion being framed within institutional limitations (the deliberation occurs inside a pre-established system of rules and procedures).

Moreover, procedures of judicial decision-making are not only institutionally limited, but also have an immense variety of constraints, being they internal or external to law. Fernando Leal states that "procedures of judicial decision-making are invariably limited. These factors will be separated within three big groups. The first consists of language and rationality limitations (extrinsic limitations), the second consists of typical limitations of judicial rationality (intrinsic limitations), and the third consists of institutional limitations"[68].

Therefore, it is easy to see that the right to justification will have a limited non-ideal penetration in legal argumentation theories, in a way similar to the limitations observed in the last section. However, by seeing specially the influence of the right to justification in legal argumentation theories, it is possible to know more accurately and analytically the manner by which the Judiciary will respond to society and to other state institutions with most of its responses being raised upon reciprocally and generally valid claims.

In addition, Peczenik states that the Rule of Law requires legal decisions to be simultaneously predictable and morally acceptable[69]. Nevertheless, there is a tension here between legal certainty and the other moral values, but this tension is only apparent since "1 - The law-giver cannot predict in advance or acceptably regulate all cases that occur in future practice. The evaluations to be done in legal practice, among other things concerning the question whether a decision of a given kind is just are easier to make in concrete cases, not in abstracto. 2 – Historical evolution of the method of legal reasoning has adapted it to the purpose of weighing and balancing of the wording of the law and moral demands. The judge has a far greater practical experience in applying this method to concrete cases than any legislative agency can have"[70].

[69] PECZENIK, Aleksander. On Law and Reason. Law and Philosophy Library. Dordrecht: Kluwer, 1989. p. 25.

[70] PECZENIK, Aleksander. Idem. p. 27.

However, the way Peczenik finds to solve this apparent tension is by his idea of coherence, which have ten quantitative criteria[71]. Two of these ideas are general and reciprocal justification[72], but not in the way that I am using here. Peczenik's choice to use the idea of coherence for a coherent system leads to a stability of practical opinion. Moreover, according to him, the ten quantitative ideas would lead to a moral result, since they would fulfill the demands of rationality. Peczenik says that "legal interpretatory statements are not true in the literal sense. But they can fulfil the requirements of Logical, Supportive and Discursive rationality. They thus can be both coherent and acceptable in the light of both morality and the legal paradigm. Consequently, they can fulfil important criteria of truth, coherence and consensus. For that reason, L-, S-, and D- rationality are indications of their correctness"[73].

Peczenik's idea seems to be the closest to an ideal normative and rational theory of justification of legal sentences. In spite of its analytical efforts, it seems that this theory would not achieve the requirements of the right to justification, since it does not pay enough attention to the various contexts of justification and to the addressees of the moral relevant norm. In addition, Peczenik's concept of coherence seems to rely too much on logic and rationality. As it was exposed, human rationality is limited, it is doubtful that theory that relies that much on human rationality would be altogether successful, not to mention the institutional and time limitation of gathering information. In brief, one could say that his theory talks too much about logical coherence and gives little attention to an equal – and sometimes more – important moral coherence[74].

It is important now to turn to another theory, which considers the time and rationality limits as important constraints to legal reasoning. Klaus Günther seems to propose a theory in this manner[75], by redefining the notion of integrity made by Dworkin[76]. According to Günther, "the principle of integrity can be understood as a principle for appropriateness argumentation. In this form of argumentation, societal relation of recognition are given effect in such a way that the network of concrete rights is applied equally in each particular case. (…) The right to be treated as an equal with concern and respect appears here as the right to equal treatment, that is to say, treating like cases alike not with reference to an individual norm, but with reference to a coherent set of principles as rights. This kind of equal treatment systematically creates differences and conflicts. But the very structure of such conflicts and a structure leading to the consideration of differences is the structure of appropriateness"[77]. Provided that by differences, Günther means potentially affected persons in the context of justification, then his structure of appropriateness obeys the criteria of reciprocal and general justification.

Finally, it is important to expose briefly the relation between the principle of contradictory and the right to justification. In judicial process, "the contradictory must be seen as a right to influence, which has a correspondent duty to debate, inherent to the cooperative structure of process"[78]. It is easy to conclude that "it is not possible to talk about motived decision, if it does not face explicitly the reasons brought by the parties in their manifestations"[79]. Since the parties in the process are the potentially affected in the judicial sentence, it is valid to see a context-related component of justification as presented in the relation between the principle of contradictory and the right to justification. However, in order to give a complete account of motivation of sentences that is not only context-related, but that also observes the criteria of reciprocity and generality, the following requirements of justification"(a) the enunciation of the choices made by the judge to; (a1) individualization of applicable norms; (a2) assentation of factual allegations; (a3) juridical qualification of factual support; (a4) juridical consequences derived from the juridical qualification of the fact; (b) the context of the nexus of implication and coherence between the statements and (c) the justification of statements related to criteria which put in evidence the rational quality of judicial decision"[80] may not be enough or relevant in all cases. In fact, these requirements may suffice in the concrete case to give effectiveness to the right to justification, may go even further than the basic requirements or may not be enough to comply with them. The point here is that the right to justification with its criteria of reciprocity and generality does not require specific standards that make it more concrete, since these standards may eventually fail in the concrete case to translate the idea behind the right to justification. On the other hand, the best approach is to see it as a metacriterion of correctness of concrete standards of legal argumentation theory, whether for the content of the standard itself or for its application. It is only by this way that the right to justification is read within legal argumentation theories as it is in the basic structures of society: at the same time being an internal feature that the justified standard (or application of the neutral standard) has and being a transcendental concept, since it is ultimately a moral concept that lies beyond the standard.

Conclusion

After seeing the application of the right to justification in different political contexts, I tried to show that none of them is sufficient by itself. All things considered, it is easy to acknowledge the synergy between the contexts of justification. Even though we recognize the limits of human rationality and of the basic institutions of society (especially the Legislative and the Judiciary bodies that were analyzed here), it is always possible to have the right to justification as a goal and a parameter to make institutions work better. If we conceive ourselves as human beings that live in an "order of justification"[81] with our basic institutions and our relation to others "governed by" the procedural criteria of reciprocal and general justification, then we can start talking about contextualizing the ideal notion of "forceless force of the better argument"[82]. This ideal should serve as a guide to a never-ending pretension to correction of concrete institutions.

Judicial process, jurisdiction and the tension between Constitutionalism and Democracy

William Soares Pugliese[1]

Abstract: Civil Procedural Law and Constitutional Law have shared the interest and doubts on the issue of jurisdiction. Through different optics, both disciplines aim to justify the powers and effects of jurisdictional decisions. What happens is that the dialogue that occurs between the two is minimal, so that the same subject is unevenly treated by much of the doctrine. This paper seeks to bring together the two rationales. At first, we shall proceed to an appreciation of theories of two classical authors, Chiovenda and Carnelutti, and two contemporary authors, Luiz Guilherme Marinoni and Ovídio Baptista da Silva - all arising from the Civil Procedural Law. On a second stage, we approach the perspective of legal theory and constitutional law through the analysis of proceduralists and fundamentalists theories, as control parameters between constitutionalism and democracy. From these two optics, we move on to the analysis of an empirical study of Frederick Schauer about the U.S. Supreme Court, which may prove quite revealing. From these considerations, it is argued that the new theories of jurisdiction must conform to the current constitutional model, not only respecting fundamental rights, but also the democratic game.

Keywords: Jurisdiction. Constitutionalism. Democracy.

1. Introduction

There are few works focused on the Brazilian Civil Procedural Law that do not bother to explain the concept of Jurisdiction.[2] Usually,

[1] PhD Student in Human Rights and Democracy at the School of Law at the Federal University of Paraná. Master of Laws at the School of Law at the Federal University of Paraná. Associate Professor of Civil Procedure of Positivo University. Member of the Legal Education Commitee of OAB/PR. Attorney at Law.

[2] This is, by itself, a contradiction, as the Jurisdiction is usually addressed by Constitutional Lawyers.

the books examine the opinion of a number of authors, until the most modern design is reached, from which a range of features and jurisdictional effects is extracted. Increasingly the concepts of jurisdiction have sought grounds in constitutional law, in order to justify the protection of fundamental rights and guarantees.

At the same time, Constitutional Law, aware of the role of the Brazilian Supreme Court and the Constitutional Courts of other countries, has used the terminology "constitutional jurisdiction" to refer to the procedure and decision making in higher courts. In this context, we examine the theory of judicial review, which conflicts two of the most expensive elements to the rule of law: democracy and fundamental rights.

However, the "Jurisdiction" which is referred by the proceduralists and constitutionalists is the same. After all, the judicial power is one and indivisible. What exists is merely a division of powers, but the activity exercised by a single judge and a Justice of the Supreme Court is essentially the same.[3]

In this sense, it is necessary to question what the relationship between the two separate concepts of jurisdiction (found on the Constitutional and the Procedural Law). More than that, we must look for elements that bring these concepts together, turning them into one.

In order to do that, this paper presents preliminary notions of the concept of jurisdiction set out by the civil procedural doctrine, with the primary goal to investigate whether the jurisdiction has creative power of the law, or whether it merely applies the rules enacted by the legislature.

Then, the duality that has concerned constitutionalists between democracy and the protection of fundamental rights will be examined. The responses obtained from this analysis are of vital importance to the concept of jurisdiction, because from this tension we can extract the limits to judicial activity.

Finally, some concluding remarks will be exposed about the current role of the judge facing the contemporary State and its division of powers. The purpose, here, is not to actually end the discussion, but rather to encourage reflection.

2. The various functions of the jurisdiction

The Italian Proceduralists from the nineteenth century claimed that modern jurisdiction was, in reality, a return to the Roman concept of iurisdictio. For Chiovenda, this return took place under a functional perspective,[4] as it will be shown.

[3] In Brazil, every judge has the power to exercise judicial review.

The Italian author defined jurisdiction as "the State's role which aims for the enforcement of the will of the laws, by means of the activity of public institutions, the activity of private or other public bodies, as in affirming the existence of the will of the laws, as in making them practically effective".[5] The purpose of the concept developed by the author was quite limited: to differentiate the judicial function of the executive and legislative functions of the State.

The differences between the legislative and judicial functions are simple enough to point out. The legislator dictates the rules regulating the activity of citizens and public agencies. The role of the Jurisdiction is to merely enforce these rules. [6]

The distinction between Jurisdiction and the Executive is a bit more complex. The difference consists in the fact that the jurisdiction is a substitutive activity. In other words, the intellectual activity of the Judge replaces the will and the thoughts of the parties and all citizens, stating how the will of the law must be applied to the facts. Also, the jurisdiction can substitute an act someone should or should not do (i.e. to pay an amount of money). One way or another, the jurisdiction substitutes someone's activity by the will of the law.

The Executive function, in turn, takes the law as a rule of conduct, according to the principle of legality. In other words, the official has a duty to act in accordance with the law; respect for the rules is the primary activity of the administrative function, so there is no substitutive activity. [7] The law is addressed to its own government and its institutions.

What is left to know about Chiovenda was the meaning he had for the "concrete will of the law". This expression must be understood in the most restrictive way, as the judge had little or no freedom to decide. One should not forget that the work of the Italian author has strong roots in the Liberal State paradigm, which gave the judge a mere duty to apply the legal text. It is worth saying that "the law was nothing more than the law, that is, the general standard to be applied to concrete cases".[8]

The power of the court, therefore, was minimal. There was no concern to relate the jurisdictional activity to the Constitution, as the codes were regarded as complete and could regulate society by themselves. For this reason, Chiovenda never bothered with the interpretation of statutes in accordance with the constitutional provisions.

A second author, contemporary to Chiovenda, developed a theory that, at first glance, may reveal a greater scope of power to the judge. Francesco Carnelutti considered that the judge's function is the composition of the dispute (lite), and that to perform his duty, the judge creates an individual standard that solves the case.[9] In this sense, the holding has a value in itself, by solving the conflict of interest between the parties.

This concept was seen at the time as diametrically opposed to Chiovenda's theory. It seemed, at the time, the by stating the judge created a single standard for the parties had a quite different result from the thought that there was only one general will of the law, enforced numerous times to actual cases.

However, time has demonstrated these two theories do not produce different practical results. More than that, it was revealed that both were strictly related to the liberal state model, and therefore were inextricably linked to the principle of the supremacy of law. This means that the judge, under the thought of Chiovenda and Carnelutti, creates no right when he decides a case. Rather, he merely repeats the general rule enacted by the legislature.

Jurisdiction had a mechanical performance: facts ascertained and determined the applicable laws, substituting the will of the parties or resolving the dispute. In fact, however, the result was the same: the iteration of the statutes, without any questioning about their values. The judge had no creative power and, of course, there was no parameter to escape from this repetitive role.

Anyway, there are elements of the classical theories that deserve to be commended. The findings of the judicial activity to be substitutive, through which parties may solve their matters by themselves, it is still valid. Similarly, the concept of lite designed by Carnelutti is still widely used by the procedural doctrine to explain the conflicting interests discussed in a process.

But we must go beyond these findings. The classical theories had strong concerns about legal certainty, which stemmed from the liberal value of formal equality. Therefore, for the same material situations, the judicial response should be equal. The uniformity of decisions was ensured by the proper function of the judiciary, which had no creative role. Observed with the proper precautions, we should keep in mind the merits of this theory, which provided the subjects of Law the possibility to predict the outcome of their actions.

Despite its merits, it is true that these classical concepts are incompatible with the current understanding of Law, in which every statement must be in compliance with a constitution.[10] In this sense, two Brazilian authors deserve to be mentioned, as they have developed concepts of jurisdiction consistent with the Constitution and its laid down fundamental rights.

Luiz Guilherme Marinoni argues that the current role of the Jurisdiction is to provide effective protection of the rights addressed by the Constitution and ordinary legislation. More than that, the right to a remedy is, in itself, a fundamental right of every individual, meaning that the State not only has a duty to provide assistance in order to decide a matter, but also has the duty to perform material acts necessary for the proper repair of the violated rights. [11]

The author derives from the idea that the legislature is unable to predict all factual situations that will be taken to the courts. Thus, he admits that the judge has the power and the duty to devise the appropriate protection for the right, even if there is no statute which points him the solution for the matter.

Marinoni goes even further. Rescuing the doctrine of constitutional principles, he states that the magistrate also has the power and duty to conform the law to the constitutional statements. Here his theory breaks sharply with the classical conceptions. With this statement, the author seeks to demonstrate that the judicial power does not consist in the mere application of the law to specific cases. Rather, it is the judge's duty to determine whether, in that case brought to the Judiciary, the infra-constitutional norms governing the factual situation does not produce an outcome contrary to the Constitution.

This conception explains, for example, the possibility of judicial review control by any court or judge of the territory. Similarly, it is stated that the magistrate should ensure the achievement of substantive equality between the parties, which underlies a number of statutory exceptions, the rules to reverse the burden of proof, which at the time of the Liberal State would be absolutely unthinkable.

To Marinoni therefore the jurisdiction has a diverse role. It is responsible for the protection of fundamental rights and the framing of the law with the Constitution. In simple comparison, it can be said that the magistrates will no longer serve the law, but the Constitution. The law has ceased to be an insurmountable hurdle for the correction of inequalities and the protection of fundamental rights.

Along with the thought of Marinoni comes Ovídio Baptista da Silva, who investigates the Roman iurisdictio and compares it to the modern jurisdiction. [12] For him, the great mistake of the Italians Proceduralists was to compare the figure of the judge with that of the Iudex, a roman who merely exposed the right previously established. The Iudex had no power of empire, so he was not able to create new rights, much less provide some sort of protection to the parties. This is due to the fact that the Iudex was a private judge, devoid of the power of ius dicere.

Obviously, this figure does not resemble anything like the modern judge, and in fact there is no reason for any resemblance. After all, the Iudex was someone with delegated powers of a more important figure: the Praetor. The Praetor was indeed gifted the true power of iurisdictio. The Praetor had the task to set the standard applicable to the case. As there was no prior legal system, the ius dicere looked more like a legislative activity than the jurisdictional activity. In the Roman sense, therefore, the activity conceived as judicial was, in fact, that which is known as legislation to the nineteenth century and beyond. [13]

We must make a caveat: the expression ius dicere cannot be understood as a way to "declare" as many proceduralists do. It establishes a bond, a specific legal regime for the parties. In summary, the ius dicere had creative character of law, as the Praetor gave meaning to the factual situation through varied and open sources with broad discretion.

With eyes on the classical conception of jurisdiction, Ovído concludes that "stating the Law - ius dicere - was a function of the Praetor, today is a function of the legislature. Who exercises jurisdiction, such as the Roman Praetor did, is actually the Legislature. The jurisdiction that our magistrates exercise is a delegated function, as was exercised by Iudex".[14]

At the end of his reasoning, however, the author makes a caveat that reveals the contemporaneity of his thought. He states that the early twenty-first century was marked by the search, or the resumption of, the Jurisdictional Law. In other words, there is a quest for a match between the judge and the praetor in order to create law, in order to the role of iurisdictio.

Ovído Baptista da Silva asks whether it is possible to the "null power" to reach the juditionalism.[15] The answer seems to echo in all courts in the country. Judges have declared statements unconstitutional; the Constitution was directly applied to concrete cases and has been interpreted quite differently to ordinary laws. In a recent decision, for example, the Regional Court of Paraná declared unconstitutional an article of the Civil Code, changing the rules of succession of the companion, equating her to a married woman, based on the direct application of Articles 226 and 227 of the Constitution.[16] Much more than the Paraná

Court, the Supreme Court assumed the role of Praetor and protector of fundamental rights and constitutional principles. Issues such as binding precedents have long since passed the stage of debate and are a reality.

Despite the appreciation of the Judiciary, it is necessary to make a very simple question: is this increase of power correct? Is it appropriate to grant such power to one of the functions of the state, to the point that all acts of another function, the Legislative, can be reviewed? What are the limits to judicial action?

These limits are established by the rules of the democratic game, which is also envisaged by the Constitution. The duality between constitutionalism and democracy is nothing new for the constitutional law, but it seems to receive little attention from Proceduralists. It is worth mentioning here that the biggest criticism of the conceptions that give the courts the ability to review statutes passed by the legislature is the lack of democratic legitimacy of the judiciary, especially the Justices of the Brazilian Supreme Court, who are not elected. In Brazil, this criticism becomes even stronger, as all the judges enter the office by passing a test, not by election. It is for this reason that it is necessary to examine some questions on the tension between constitutionalism and democracy.

3. Procedural democracy and constitutionalism

The fundamental idea of democracy is majority rule. It is true that the majority vote is the cornerstone in the current representative system, but the democratic principle does not end here. After all, most are unable to ensure political equality. In this sense, the result of the election is only the voice of the winners, and not the interest of all. For this reason it is stated that the government chosen by the majority must respect the rights of minorities. Thus, some rights were elected to the category of fundamental rights.

The tension between democracy and constitutionalism is evident, because this limits the freedom of deliberations of representatives elected by the people, who must respect fundamental rights as limits to the enactment of new laws. In this discussion, the authors can be classified into two main streams: the proceduralists, or monistic, defending the sufficiency of the formal procedure for the laws to be valid, and the fundamentalists, for whom the judiciary has the last word on the Constitution, including substantial in scope. Both thoughts will be considered.

Procedural democracy, or monistic chain, has in John Hart Ely[17] and in Carlos Santiago Nino[18] two of its prominent writers. It is the dominant theory in American constitutionalism, which revolves around one idea: during the period between elections, all acts contrary to what is decided by those who were elected will be undemocratic. At the moment the Supreme Court invalidates a statute, it commits a countermajoritarian act, which should be reviewed. [19]

To the Judiciary remains only to guarantee the exercise of democracy. [20] After all, judges do not have the legitimacy to decide on the substantive values of society, as they were not elected. It is worth saying that procedural democracy arose as a response to the American judicial activism, marked by the so called Warren Court. In short, it can be said that "the proponents of this conception of democracy see control of constitutionality of laws as undemocratic, ie, the idea that a group of judges are not elected by the people could not limit what was chosen by the representatives the people, through Parliament, under penalty of offense to the democratic principle".[21]

Despite criticism, the monists are forced to resort to the Constitution to support the role of the Constitutional Jurisdiction as guarantor of democratic procedure.[22] Consequently, they end up advocating the protection of fundamental rights that guarantee the democratic process. Therefore, they are still linked to theoretical conceptions of fundamental rights. What they do is simply to restrict the protection of fundamental rights of political participation and access to political speech rights.[23]

There is still another criticism of proceduralists: the appointment of members to the Supreme Court is regularly scheduled, and derives from the democratic procedure, because who appoints the Justices is the elected President. So what is the real reason to stop them to check the constitutionality of laws, limiting them to arbiters of democratic procedure? The legitimacy argument seems very weak, and does not hold for the reasons given.

In any case, the proceduralists should absolutely not be neglected. After all, they seek to uncover the power of the Legislature as the appropriate function to edit the rules that govern society, always in light of the Constitution. In this sense, it can be observed at the outset that the annulment of a law cannot be made by personal criteria or loosely reasoned, failing then as an undemocratic act.

First, however, to draw further conclusions, we must examine the fundamentalist chain. Here are the authors who choose to guarantee fundamental rights, even if it limits the powers of the executive and legislative branches. Existing variations between them refer to rights that are considered most important, however, all agree that the Constitution is concerned, above all, with the protection of fundamental rights. Indeed, the sense of entitlement is able to avoid the elected majority decisions which harm social welfare.[24] Ackerman reveals in precise synthesis the thought of fundamentalists: "rights trump democracy - provided, of course, that they're the Right rights".[25]

Fundamentalists claim that the fundamental rights of freedom act's limits on governmental power and que the jurisdiction has the primary objective of protecting these rights, even in opposition to the government. [26] For Dworkin, it is better some that some decisions are held by the judiciary because it will be based on statutory criteria. Otherwise, put the question to most, the basis for the decision would be moral. More than that, the decision by the Majority may offend equal representation, since the larger number may not represent the collective interest.[27] For this reason, Dworkin believes judicial review must guarantee rights by means if decisions based on principles.[28] In truth, the protection of fundamental rights by judicial action would ultimately strengthen the democratic process.[29]

For all the above, the theory of the fundamentalists is indispensable to understand the Brazilian jurisdiction. The protection of fundamental rights has been, as noted, relating to important debates within the civil procedural law. However, when importing the theory, let aside its counterpoint, which has contributed to making decisions absolutely disconnected with reality grounded in the protection of fundamental rights. Or rather, the adoption of the thesis of the fundamentalists without brakes imposed by proceduralists has caused the feeling that the judges can decide whatever they want, and that nothing prevents them from doing so because they are above the law (would therefore contemporary) praetors.

For this reason, we must find some of the limits imposed to American judges that even fundamentalists admit, as they are in constant discussion with the opposite pole.

4. Limits the performance of jurisdiction

Dworkin himself provides the first constraint to the judgments of the judiciary, which will be legitimate as long as they are based on principles.[30] It is totally unacceptable, however, that judicial decisions will based on arguments of policy and understood the arguments that establish a goal to be achieved, be it economic, political or social community.[31]

In this sense, decisions that give effect to economic criteria in the face of fundamental rights are inadmissible. For Dworkin, even in hard cases there are principles to be applied by the courts, thus avoiding the discretion. Of course, the demonstration of these principles must be accompanied by adequate, enabling effective control of even the decisions of the constitutional court.[32] But not only these limitations should guide the work of the judiciary.

Frederick Schauer recent published a study that had as its central concern the possibility of a "government by judiciary".[33] However, recognizing that he had little to add to the discussion of constitutionalism and democracy, he invites the reader to join in the plan of the most fundamental empirical premises of judicial activism: the notion that the courts are one step closer to occupy a substantial portion of the building of U.S. policies. To prove this assumption, he claims it will be necessary to investigate how the Supreme Court operates and what is its relationship with the government action.

The role of the Supreme Court can be measured by the cases in which it acted. But this can also be done for the cases where it did not act. By the year 2005, end point of the study, episodes like the Iraq war, terrorism, national security, immigration, Hurricane Katrina and bird flu dominated the public interest and directed much of the time and work of the government and the legislature. However, the Supreme Court dealt only with emphasis of terrorism and national security.

This view does not take away the importance of the Supreme Court, but it enables one to see with other eyes topics as control of constitutionality, after all the themes addressed by the judiciary are not the only ones of national importance. There is a clear contrast between this view and the idea that the Constitution and Supreme Court play an important role in the choice of policies, but also a huge part of American politics.

For Schauer, however, the role of the Supreme Court may be lesser. In this case it is necessary to revise the narrow doctrine of judicial review and understanding of the scattered location of the Supreme Court in the governmental plan. To develop their reasoning, the author goes on to examine the topics considered important by Americans. The survey used empirical data, as the headlines cover of the New York Times and public surveys made with the Americans themselves, to identify which are the most important issues of the country and its government. It was revealed that, with the exception of the topics "terrorism" and "war", the concern of the population always revolves around the same political issues: social security, health, economy and education.

The finding of the author is that the issues that concern the constitutionalists, such as homosexual marriage or individual rights are not mentioned by more than 2% of respondents. That is, the issues that concern the legal literature are not the same which general populace care about. However, it is noted that these issues are important in political campaigns. However, what happens is that these issues, although important to the State and to society, are not a matter for the everyday American citizen.

Even the Warren Court, known for its activism, deviated from the main interests of its time. In the period of the Brown v. Board of Education, for example, racism was only considered an important issue for 2% of the population. The only exception in history occurred during the New Deal, as the Supreme Court decisions on economic matters had enormous impact and importance.

Schauer's findings are important to reflect on an important point: the lawyers are conditioned to see the world from the legal lens.[34] For this reason, it is natural that reputable bigger issues are handled by lawyers very carefully by the higher courts. However, many of these issues are not of general interest of the population, which is why the popular event is very small on the jurisdiction. Also of note, like most lawsuits still works with private interests, it is very difficult to bring democracy into the judiciary, since there are few mechanisms to confer standing on third parties seeking to influence decision making.

Despite the considerations made so far, says Schauer, it cannot be said that the role of the Supreme Court is not vital to the nation. Much of what the Constitution and the Court is dealing, in general terms, procedural matters. What the Supreme Court does, in fact, is to decide how [34] "And we forget about all of this because as lawyers (and especially as legal academics obsessed with courts and their written opinions) we are conditioned to see the world through a judicial lens." SCHAUER, Frederick. The Supreme Court. In: Harvard Law Review Vol. 120:4, 2006, p. 41.

the policy will be taken. In other words, it can be seen as an institution that does its own work, instead of entering into political debates.

This is precisely what you want from a court: she is aware of their role in society, who worry about the legal issues - in principle, as Dworkin preaches - and avoid making policy. With this, the court retains its connection, allowing you to take unpopular and contrary to the most fundamental decisions to protect the rights of minorities.

These comments can be directed to the Brazilian Supreme Court without many changes. Its role is to control the constitutionality of laws, but without bowing to political or economic pressures. It is absolutely feasible to admit that jurisdiction resumed its creative role of law, but should be recognized, too, that the creation process is quite distinct from the Legislature. To create Law judges must observe the unity of the legal system, respecting the judgment of their peers, and more than that, the sovereignty of the Constitution. Moreover, the judiciary should stick to matters that are brought to him, and decide according to the law, not bowing to external influences.

However, it should be noted that the limits to which it refers are not exactly the limitations to the jurisdictional activity. On the contrary, if followed, jurisdiction could become an even more respected and efficient power.

5. Conclusion

As Luiz Guilherme Marinoni sustains, the new theories of jurisdiction must conform to the current constitutional model. That's what we intended to undertake. Without trying to supplant the more modern theories, we sought to provide elements to improve them and demonstrate mainly that excessive protection of fundamental rights is not interesting, even for fundamental rights.

There must be respect for the democratic principle and the laws passed by the legislature, especially the laws of political character should. Courts must know in which matters there is interest and rights to be protected and when it must not act.

Naturally, some more complex issues will require careful examination of the courts, but at no time shall the judges succumb to economic interests or other matters outside of the law, because that is not its function.

Moreover, there is no problem in assuming that the judge creates law. The observation of Ovídio Baptista da Silva may well already be found in the courts. It is interesting to recognize, once and for all, the creative character of the Jurisdiction. It is pointed out, in this sense, the preservation of legal certainty, represented by the notion of equal treatment for equal cases.

What is totally unacceptable is that the jurisdiction confuse its power with the political power, granted to the executive and the legislature. If this occurs, the courts shall take not only constitutionalism and the protection of fundamental rights, but also what is meant by democracy. And the moment that this duality is concentrated in the hands of one power, the tension will be over, as well as what is meant by constitutional state. It will give rise to something new, but certainly undemocratic, because despite the difficulties of the subject, it is the duality between the two poles, constitutionalism and democracy, which drives the development of society and the law.

Universal International Law?
A challenge and a contribution from the peoples in the South

Henrique Weil Afonso[1]

Abstract: This article explores the role of the Third World in international legal affairs vis-à-vis post-colonial readings of the history of the discipline. It sets of by examining the liberal legacy in present International Law to propose a critical survey of the methodological aspects of historical approaches to the field, namely historicism. It develops an argument according to which the Third World represents a valid, yet thoroughly diverse and complex, category of resistance committed to the interrogation of present-day projections of colonial relations and imperial agendas. After engaging with Indian Subaltern incursions in history along with Latin American post-colonial thought, the article concludes by arguing for a sustained appreciation of the methodology of history and the viability of emancipation discourses it forecloses.

1. Introduction

One prominent consensus within mainstream international legal scholarship became evident in the immediate aftermath of the Cold War. The old Bipolar struggle, facts reviewed, had at last come to an end to the benefit of capitalist world economy, driven by developed countries who found in the USA the adequate leader to set the road ahead. Whatever meaning the Cold War period had to the Third World, the debacle of the URSS along with its global agenda could have had but one interpretation: all States, regardless of evident peculiarities, could – and would – take advantage of the capitalist market driven economy in order to bring about that very elusive quest: development and prosperity. Hardly a surprise, international law was profoundly influenced by these events, though not necessarily prone to the interests of less economically developed States.

This study intends to examine the intricate relationship, on the one hand, between the ways international law perceives its history and, on the other one, the construction of its universal design. There is reason to suppose that recent perceptions of traditional international legal scholarship rest firmly on a particular understanding of the historical phenomena that posits present-day developmental schemes at the top of international community's agenda. Turning one's eye to the past, it is suggested, has the effect of understanding current discourses about how the world is and how the world should be, and the very method adopted in this exercise should unfold international law's proneness towards universality.

A brief survey of early theorists, namely 16th Century Spanish theologian Francisco de Vitoria and 19th Century liberals such as John Westlake, should add to the understanding of this intricate and complex relationship. It should be argued that international law's history is thoroughly based on particular perceptions of the international, and non-European peoples only marginally figure in this narrative. In response, it is by reviving the relevance of the Third World in international affairs that counter-hegemonic alternatives to established modern thinking may gain voice. The Third World today materializes the outcomes of colonial and imperial practices upon which the discipline is so intrinsically connected. Confronting the ways these conditions have reached the 21st Century acquires resonance within academic movements engaged with new designs of the international plane that are more inclusive when it comes to diversity and more receptive of plural forms of the legal and the historical narratives.

2. Universalism and International Law: historical views in debate

The new "age" in international affairs launched in the beginning of the 1990's is presented by doctrinal elaborations regarding both norms in practice and the justification for revisiting certain legal institutes. The idea and praxis of liberal democracy symbolizes the grindstone for a large number of accounts of this new moment[2], as an examination of the writings of theorists like Thomas M. Franck and Fernando Tesón should disclose. Professor Franck sustains a defense of liberal democratic values as the ideal form of political participation in State level, to be transplanted to the international plane: the latter is powerfully connected to the former, and the more democratic States become, the more democratic the transnational sphere would be. Accordingly, Franck speaks of an "emerging 'law'" that corroborates domestic governance and reflects in the cannons of international law. "This newly emerging 'law'", the author explains, "– which requires democracy to validate governance – is not merely the law of a particular state that, like the United States under its Constitution, has imposed such a precondition on national governance. It is also becoming a requirement of international law, applicable to all and implemented through global standards, with the help of regional and international organizations."[3]

[2] On this particular issue, the bibliography is quite vast. See, generally, SLAUGHTER, Anne-Marie. International Law in a World of Liberal States. In: European Journal of International Law, vol. 6, no. 2, p. 503-538, 1995; SLAUGHTER, Anne-Marie. A Liberal

Argentinean professor Fernando Tesón is in line with Franck's insights regarding the nature of this supposedly new international law. In his work A Philosophy of International Law, Tesón elaborates a comprehensively liberal theory of international law based on Kant's essays Towards Perpetual Peace and The Idea of a Universal History From a Cosmopolitan Point of View. The merits generally accredited to democratic forms of government appear to be based, initially, on the assumption that "[…] the very point of democratic institutions is to keep political power (with all its corrupting potential) under check"[4], coupled with Kantian universal imperatives that deposits certain duties to be carried out by States: "the categorical imperative is universal and holds for every civil society regardless of history and culture. Liberal democracies, ranging from laissez-faire states to welfare states, are the only ones that secure individual freedom, thereby allowing human beings to develop their potential fully".[5] In short, liberal democracies, according to these views, embodies the definitive characteristics to foment dignity to human existence and prosperity to all peoples.

With the end of the Cold War, some would claim, so did the Third World come to its term and, consequently, the category no longer deserves historical significance while regarded as an entity in itself. According to specialist Mark Berger, who writes in the 1990's, a central point to be considered is that the mentioned group of States is not suitable to fit its purposes in a globalized world. In face of the trump of globalized market economy, all less economically developed countries have been put in the developmental route. Taking the Asian Tigers as a role model to be followed by other nations, Berger emphasizes the timely need to set aside this old-fashioned, Cold War response-type classification – a group of States struggling for existence outside US-Soviet dichotomy –, in order to foster economic growth and political stability via consolidation of democratic practices and processes. As Berger states, "'Third World' now serves primarily to generate both a dubious homogeneity within its shifting boundaries and an analytically irrelevant distinction between the 'Third World' (developing) on the one hand and the 'First World' (developed) on the other hand".[6] Additionally, the author suggests replacing the category for an all-inclusive treatment brought about by liberal world views that may have better results or, in other words, "an emerging approach to 'development' which privileges historical particularity, but also adopts a global perspective".[7]

Adopting a similar argumentative strategy, though enriched by universalist ideals, it is worth taking note of the influence that standard end-of-the-world, Fukuyaman-based ideologies, have taken concerning decisive steps towards the consolidation of certain practices and norms, either by means of legal reform – today's legal responses to terrorism, such as military intervention to end terrorist threats[8] – or reinterpretation – in the case of ius ad bellum, the debate on preemptive and preventive self-defense.[9] It follows that the scope of participation of the Third World in international legal affairs is downplayed by an apparently natural surpass of capitalism and liberal democracy.

In other words, the end of the Cold War fomented a new universal beginning to international law, and it achieved this point by retrieving the spirit of world community that illuminates the doctrine of human rights and transnational solidarity. Third World claims, while up to a certain extent representative of interests located outside US-Soviet disputes, are labeled to be outdated when confronted to this new paradigm. In this sense, so reads the passage from Akehurst's Modern Introduction to International Law:

> Nevertheless, major changes in international law have occurred since 1945. Western states were anxious not to drive Third World states into the arms of communist states, and have therefore agreed to many of the alterations sought by the non-aligned countries. Most of the rules which developing countries used to regard as contrary to their interests have changed, or are in the process of being changed. Similarly, when the interests of Western states change, such states are often just as ready as other states to abandon the old rules and to replace them with new rules which are more in keeping with their own interests. Modern international law is not static, but has a dynamic nature and is in a continuous process of change. The accusation that international law is biased against the interests of Third World states is, on the whole, no longer true.[10]

These remarks on the status of the Third World are woven into a specific view on history and its mode of production. It is often acknowledged that the study of the history of international law represents a relevant aspect of the study of the discipline itself. Nevertheless, some specialists tend to approach history through rather limited lenses, embracing certain views on history as self-evident statements, or, though not without difficulties, as a natural fact that dismisses proper methodological scrutiny. Within these premises, the act of turning one's attention to the past could be initially associated with a narrative focused on the progress of the discipline, a narrative that elucidates key moments, setting aside the ones that are of less relevance, in order to finally reach the present times in a triumphant style.

Internationalist Lassa Oppenheim insists on the importance of surveying the history of the discipline, for an adequate knowledge of its history provides the international lawyer with the tools to cope with current legal or institutional challenges. International law makes its own history side by side with the evolution of the international society: together, they compose a promising portrait of the narrative of international law's institutions and norms in an ever changing world where conflicts are inevitable. In any case, there remains one steady, uncompromising fact: to speak of the history of international law means precisely to speak of the successful narrative of the discipline towards progress and universality, or, to put it differently, the triumph of international law over international anarchy. In this sense, Oppenheim asserts that "the master-historian […] will in especial have to bring to light the part certain states have played in the victorious development of certain rules and what were the economic, political, humanitarian, religious, and other interests which have helped to establish the present rules of international law."[11]

The method outlined by Oppenheim has been measured in detail by David Kennedy, to whom such an approach to history plays a central role in conventional scholarship, which is "[…] to reinforce the fantasy that some thing called 'international law' has had a continuous presence across differences in time and place."[12] Telling history according to these parameters, Kennedy points out, reflects in the act of investigating the precedence of a given rule or institution. In the same way, such a task can also be understood as an inquiry over history in a very peculiar sense: the rule or institution reaches out present day international relations through an evolutionary road that departs from the sphere of politics and, by a series of events, intentional practices, advances and drawbacks, is finally inserted in the domains of the legal world.

Professor Kennedy stresses the functional nature of the act of addressing the history of the discipline in this way. Paradoxically, though, this implies a process of writing history by selecting certain events that meet the requirement of having what it takes to leave the historical and political spheres to join the prestigious hall of legalized practices and institutions – for instance, 1648 Treaties of Westphalia –, or, in Kennedy's terms, "an argument about a rule or principle, or institutional technique in international law is almost always an argument about history – that the particular norm proffered has a provenance as law rather than politics, has become general rather than specific, has come through history to stand outside history."[13]

Writing history within the boundaries pointed out by Kennedy evidences the influence of positivistic philosophy – historicism – over international law's historians. Assumed to be a fact, the distinction between the historical world and what we say about it works as the framework for the much preferred scientific understanding of history vis-à-vis the broader complex and contradictory worldly processes. According to Kennedy, "the conventional tale of international legal history is a progress narrative, a fable about how the discipline grew and who its enemies are – above all, this history teaches, turn your back on politics and ideology, and then also on philosophy, theory and form."[14]

Historians seek to provide epistemological foundations to the discipline, and, as Michel-Rolph Trouillot highlights, "the more distant the sociohistorical process is from its knowledge, the easier the claim to a 'scientific' professionalism."[15] Once the craft of writing – and producing – history, as positivist tradition reveals, is determined by scientific assumptions, some preliminary conclusions should be considered regarding the positivist methodology. First, the qualification of a set of events that are likely to compose the historical narrative is a task to be performed with scientific criteria. It follows that, even though some claim to produce their own history – for instance, the Third World, social movements, minorities, etc –, it is not up to them to decide whether their tales should join 'official History'. As post-colonial Indian historian Dipesh Chakrabarty points out, "[historicism] tell us that in order to understand anything in this world we must see it as an historically developing entity, that is, first, as an individual and unique whole – as some kind of unity at least in potential – and, second, as something that develops over time."[16] Secondly, and as a consequence of the former statement, the very act of writing history embodies a precise, yet disguised by language, act of power and violence.[17] Here comes necessary the question posed by Trouillot: "what makes some narratives rather than others powerful enough to pass as accepted history if not historicity itself?"[18]

Taking Trouillot's insightful remarks, one should ask his question to contemporary international lawyers. At a first glance, one should reckon it to be a highly demanding task, though, to draft a comprehensive critique of the historical biases, the occluding processes or oppressive institutions and norms. Yet, any critical understanding of international law must come to terms with the urgent commitment to tackle history. The entrepreneurship would require diverse mechanisms that are capable of, but not only, exposing the flaws, continuities, discontinuities, and an understanding of the language that narrates history, and confront it with a vocabulary that escapes conventional scholarship. It is argued that such a vocabulary may be available in alternative readings of modernity, in social movements that permeate the peripheries of modern rationale, even perhaps in local democratic and political practices that defy the single-minded developmental model.

3. The Third World: stories of resistance and emancipation in XXI Century international law

The search for alternative readings of international law's foundations, history and subjects, conventionally taken for granted by mainstream research, has encouraged promising investigative legal approaches.[19] Present-day world relations are unquestionably complex,

In this remarkable and highly provocative monograph, Trouillot dedicates the third chapter to discuss the mechanisms by which the 1790 Haitian Revolution has come to be labeled by historians of its time as a non-event that was not apt to enter history.

[19] Among these approaches, one could cite the feminist, international relations theory, broad-ranging and conflictive, which places international law in the intricate yet unavoidable position of providing normative regulation for innumerous competing perceptions of the international phenomena. Among these, the Third World Approaches to International Law (hence, TWAIL) movement has recently attracted considerable attention from international lawyers who display concern with the situation of developing countries in the global landscape.

TWAIL scholars are engaged in a number of projects ranging from the complex relations between colonialism and imperialism to contemporary surveys aimed at deeper transformations of the international plane. The movement embraces a very distinctive departing point: rather than assuming international law to be a thorough and finished project based on a conjugation of universal ideals claims and State behavior patterns, TWAIL perceives international law to be a culturally and historically constructed scholarship.[20] Conceiving classical international law as the normative product of an international order drafted by the European powers over the last five centuries, TWAIL aims at exploring the mechanisms by which colonialism, imperialism and economic dependency have framed the international order in detriment of developing and Third World countries, social movements, minorities, and other innumerable forms of communal life. International theorist Obiora C. Okafor provides a sound description of the movement:

> TWAIL scholars (or "TWAILers") are solidly united by a shared ethical commitment to the intellectual and practical struggle to expose, reform, or even retrench those features of the intellectual legal system that help create or maintain the generally unequal, unfair, or unjust global order […] a commitment to centre the rest rather then merely the west, thereby taking the lives and experiences of those who have self-identified as Third World much more seriously than has generally been the case.[21]

Telling the "untold stories" of international law, as Pooja Parmar asserts, materializes one the main imaginative purposes of TWAIL researchers. The widely perceived notion that modern international law was born out of the European order conceived by the 1648 Peace of Westphalia has driven the discipline into a particular set of postulates and legal theories revolving issues such as sovereignty, recognition of States, regulation of war and appeasement of conflicts. Keeping the international realm in order has attracted international law's attention for over four centuries, whereas the claims for international justice, emancipation of Third World nations and protest against economic dependency have been largely neglected. A change in the manner international problems are traditionally conceived, so as to include alternative solutions based on alternative epistemologies – non-European modes of thought, values, institutions, practices – is at the heart of TWAIL's inquiries.[22]

Whereas coming to grips with the formation of international law in its structural, ideological and normative aspects compose the mosaic in which TWAIL scholars focus their research, a further proposal in the movement aims at providing alternative solutions to contemporary socio-legal problems – underdevelopment, hunger, domestic conflicts, dependency, AIDS, to name but a few. In order to accomplish this dual objective, it adopts "[…] distinctive ways of thinking about what international law is and should be; they involve the formulation of a particular ser of concerns and the analytic tools with which to explore them."[23] Taking history seriously and critically is one of these "tools".

3.1. Who is the Third World in International Law?

The 1970's symbolizes a turn of the tide on the surveys of the role of the Third World in international legal knowledge. The aftermath of decolonization and the immediate debates that emerged concerning newly independent States that were joining the international arena and being granted international legal recognition provided the scenario for political contestation and cooperative initiatives. Taking a standard account as a starting point, it could be argued that the main concern addressed by Third World internationalists was the proposition of fair rules of commerce and perspectives of economic development that could meet these countries long-awaited expectations. Nevertheless, theorists would soon come to grips with the more profound structures and processes disrupting Third World nations' expectations.

In this large picture, Indian internationalist R. P. Anand, among others, has sounded a note in favor of the interests of Third World countries. Prof. Anand points out the perpetuation of colonial and imperial relations despite the promises of political decolonization. International economic institutions, such as the IMF and World Bank, on the one hand, and international legal forum, such as the WTO and even the UN to a certain extent, on the other hand, were drafted upon a world consensus that acted in favor of inequality, exploitation and control over the populations in the South. Despite well-known cooperative efforts, namely the Non-Aligned Movement (G-77) and its drafting of a New International Economic Order as an alternative developmental path independent of the Cold War ideological settings, colonial relations have taken new forms of influence and control over the Third World, as well as the articulation of the imperial reason has been reshaped so as to fit economic interests of rich nations. These remarks notwithstanding, Anand insists both on reforming world institutions in order to address developing nations interests and developing countries' balancing positions to confront anti-reformist discourses: "The only way the poor countries can better their lot is by increasing production and by industrialization. It is now generally recognized that the only way to have a stable and peaceful world is to help the poor countries in their development."[24]

Anand's ideal international system would embrace everyone's interests. In this sense, important documents such as the 1974 Declaration on the Establishment of a New Economic Order[25] emphasized the need to cope with injustices and the ever-widening gap between developing and developed countries. Similarly, the Preamble to the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States[26], also approved in 1974, stated "it is a fundamental purpose of the present Charter to promote the establishment of the new international economic order, based on equality, sovereign equality, interdependence, common interest and cooperation among all States, irrespective of their economic and social systems". In light of these developments, international theorist Mohamed Bedjaoui argues for an international law of participation "[…] genuinely all-embracing and founded on solidarity and cooperation [which] must give great prominence to the principle of equity (which corrects injustices) rather than the principle of equality".[27] Both Anand and Bedjaoui acknowledged the dangers that arise from treating international norms – e.g, sovereignty and sovereign equality – uncritically, being it for international law remains deeply structured and influenced by imperial and colonial relations.

This seminal treatment of the Third World in international legal affairs is well deserving of its dues. This recognition notwithstanding, recent TWAIL scholarship have been focusing its efforts, on the one hand, in the direction of a deeper understanding of the specificities of this heterogeneous assembly of States that shapes varying legal arrangements, and, on the other hand, TWAILers have been drawing upon what Karin Mickelson labels "interconnectedness". As for the former, research is being carried out in major areas, namely (i) the articulation of different legal orders – and varying cultural traditions – to fashion a less Eurocentric oriented international law[28] and (ii) the accommodation of cultural diversity both within present legal institutions and around new designs of the national/international legal frameworks, especially in form of epistemic resistance[29]. Mickelson, in her turn, argues in favor of authentically interdisciplinary approaches aimed at composing a distinctive Third World approach. "Interconnectedness", in light of interdisciplinarity, cannot mean anything but an engagement between international legal institutions and norms, on the one hand, and a threefold analysis of justice, morality and history.[30]

Following Mickelson's analysis, the resurgence of historical studies in international law is highly noticeable. Over the last two decades, an increasing interest in the history of the discipline has given rise to academic courses and disciplines dedicated to several aspects of such a broad-reaching interconnectedness.[31] Once historical studies were back in the scene, theorists have been committed to understanding the foundations of the discipline, its disputable relations with specific historical contexts and processes and, last but not least, the formation of the nation-State along with its worldwide spread. Finally, the treatment of colonialism and imperialism, often coupled with historical approaches, emphasizes the critical twist that some contemporary internationalists imprint in their works.

3.2. Colonialism, imperialism and International Law

TWAIL benefits extensively from these propositions. For instance, the examination of colonial relations, the formation of specific historical biases – one-sided official Histories – and its repercussions to present-day global institutions and norms consist in one of the ways in which international law is seen through critical lenses. Consequently, there is reason to question the role played by early thinkers towards the consolidation of its universal vocation: the dynamics of colonial and imperial relations from the 16th to 19th Centuries, and up to our times, are generally left untouched by conventional scholarship.[32] Since the latter usually employs universalist arguments in their description of international law – in Koskenniemi's words, their "sensibilities"[33] –, and since a certain view on history seems to spring from such an approach, the study of history within critical parameters becomes a much needed undertaking. The production of history, or the processes by which the discipline has come to be around a certain selection of events, often conceals, or even discredits, the o*ther* non-European, his/her values and world views.[34]

Taking account of the very first questions posed by theorists such as Francisco de Vitoria – and other early "founding fathers", such as Suarez and Grotius – in his quest of providing both moral and legal justifications to the just title of Spanish colonial actions in 16th Century Americas, as well as the solutions advanced by him, encapsulate an effort to apply TWAIL's postulates to an early legal scholar within the dictates of the historical domain. Humanistic interpretations of Vitoria's ius gentium, despite being postulated by eminent internationalists[35], have nevertheless had contending aspects of their studies questioned and deconstructed. The purpose of these investigations must not be a complete deconstruction of these authors' opinions, placing them – entirely out of context, it should be said[36] – as co-responsible actors of colonial and imperial practices. Instead, this process discloses Eurocentric minded assumptions, particular modes of thought that are granted global access, and a highly enthralled, yet at times disguised in universalist fashion[37],

[33] Koskenniemi's works reflect a turn towards the history of the discipline that is coupled with surveys of controversial aspects of this relation. See, generally, KOSKENNIEMI, Martti. [37] Both the Indians – term that represents the innumerous groups of native Americans – and the Spanish, representatives of thoroughly contrasting cultural manifestations, were immerse in differing standards of values. The peculiar mode each culture relates to the circling environment, the specificities in the relations towards the divine and the percep-imperial discourse in the making that represents the standard attitude or inclination of the discipline, an attitude that it avoids facing directly.[38]

The duty to bring civilization to the peoples of the New World, in different ways present in the writings of these authors, is rooted upon a belief of the superiority of European institutions, economy, religion, values and ways of life. An occluding attitude towards the Other – the Indian, the Oriental[39], the inferior –, as pointed out by Latin American philosopher Enrique Dussel[40], is a key component of modern reasoning, which unfolds the myth of modernity coupled with its underside, relentless subjective and, perhaps more troubling owing to its deceptive nature, objective violence, to use Žižek's terms[41]. This comprises a tion of the other are some of the elements that allocates the Indians and the Spanish. In this sense, when in 1492 Columbus sent to Spain his primary descriptions of the New World, it should not come as a surprise the fact that these accounts were immersed in the Christian tradition. The reality the explorer encountered was perceived, understood and interpreted through a method named by Tzveran Todorov as finalist hermeneutic, in which the most significant argument is the one derived from authority, rather than the one based on personal experience: "[Columbus] sabe de antemano lo que a encontrar; la experiencia concreta está ahí para ilustrar una verdad que se posee, no para ser interrogada, según las regras preestablecidas, con vistas a una búsqueda de la verdad." TODOROV, Tzvetan. La Conquista de America. El problema del otro. Mexico: Siglo Veintiuno Editores, 2003, p. 26. In Vitoria's works, such a set of values is unquestionably the values of the Spanish society. Whenever the theologian was confronted with the question whether the Indians could be considered civilized, he would not hesitate to compare the colonized peoples' institutions and practices with the correspondent element within his own cultural patterns, which forged "a standard based on the capacity of socio-political organization and self-government whereby the Spaniard's system of governing is the natural benchmark." [41] Slovenian philosopher Slavoj Žižek differentiates two types of violence. Subjective violence derives from day-to-day relations concerning the physical or regular conflict bedistinctive feature of international law vis-à-vis its colonial and imperial roots, as internationalist Brett Bowden asserts:

> The very essence of the function of a standard of civilization. If in the eyes of the Spanish, the Indians are unable to measure up to European social and cultural practices, and more importantly, systems of political organization and government that are assumed to be the universal norm, then they are deemed as 'barbarous', 'uncivilized', or 'infantile' – in any event, inferior.[42]

The standard of civilization was the legal mechanism that admitted or excluded peoples and nations into the international society, "the cultural values and practices of Christian societies are taken for granted and are the infallible yardstick."[43]A particular focus at this stage is laid on tween individuals or societies, e.g. crime and terror. This kind of violence is self-evident and can be noted by the nude eye. Conversely, objective violence operates inside symbolic signs – namely, language, racism, hate-speech – or structural elements – economic, political, legal relations. Žižek's point is to explore the ways we perceive and misperceive violence. See ŽIŽEK, Slavoj. Violência. Seis notas à margem. Lisboa: Relógio D'Água Editores, 2008 (English version: Violence. The mechanism is described in detail by Todorov, in his compelling survey of the "discovery of the Americas". Todorov tackles Spanish attitudes regarding the native peoples, which, as he points out, are based on a previous and definitive conception of the role the colonizer plays vis-à-vis the backwardness of the colonized populations, which may depart from a viewpoint of the similarities between the two peoples or the its differences. In either case, there exists an excluding and eclipsing approach towards the other. Columbus' writings and actions are representative of these interpretations: "La actitud de Colón respecto a los indios descansa en la manera que tiene de percibirlos. Se podrían distinguir em ella dos componentes, que se vuelven a encontrar en el siglo seguiente y, prácticamente, hasta nuestros días en la relación de todo colonizador con el colonizado; ya habíamos observado el gérmen de estas actitudes historical studies dedicated to 19th Century internationalists. The ideas of progress, civilization and economic freedom are generally regarded as distinctively present in international lawyers of that period. Rising nationalism contrasted with mounting awareness of world affairs, as the European continent experienced relatively peaceful times.

One should note, however, how theorists confronted questions of international society and universal values in quite troubling terms. As Martti Koskenniemi explains, internationalists engaged in fierce debates over the characterization of international society often advanced proposals about what should international law become. Despite obvious theoretical divergences, e.g. among people like Von Martens – who confined his reflections around positivist-minded assumptions – or John Westlake – who advanced an organic understanding of international law –, Koskenniemi highlights a common belief in them: European society and civilization materialized the cornerstone of any project of the international arena, which echoed in European attitudes towards peoples outside Europe, or, in other words, "even as international lawyers had no doubt about the superiority of European civilization over 'Orientals', they did stress that the civilizing mission needed to be carried out in an orderly fashion, by providing good examples, and not through an unregulated scramble".[44]

Non-European peoples were granted access to international life provided certain conditions were met. In these accounts, Europe occupies the vertex of an allegedly natural – a fact of nature – evolutionary pyramid encompassing all the peoples in the world. In his 1894 Chapters of the Principles of International Law, John Westlake puts forward the nec-en la relación de Colón con la lengua del otro. O bien piensa en los indios (aunque no utilice estos términos) como seres humanos completos, que tienen los mimos derechos que él, pero entonces no sólo los vê iguales, sino también idênticos, y esta conducta desemboca en el asimilacionismo, en la proyección de los propios valores en los demás. O bien parte de la diferencia, pero ésta se traduce inmediatamente en términos de superioridad e inferioridad (en su caso, evidentemente, los inferiores son los indios): se niega la existencia de una sustancia humana realmente otra, que puede no ser un simple estado imperfecto de uno mismo. Estas dos figuras elementales de la existencia de la alteridad descansan ambas en el egocentrismo, en la identificación de los propios valores con los valores en general, del propio yo con el universo; en la convicción de que el mundo es uno." essary attributes by which a certain people is considered a State – thus admitted to the society of States. Westlake calls these attributes the test of civilization. To him, the peoples in the world are expected to take European civilization as a mirror, should they look ahead to acceptance and active participation in international affairs. Accordingly, the differences between the civilized and the uncivilized cannot be bridged unless the latter is capable of being approved in the test of civilization. The test involves a given people's capacity to manage reasonably working institutions, such as law, administration and commerce, and inspire confidence that they can perform well without foreign "assistance". Westlake writes: "Can the native furnish such a government, or can it be looked for from the Europeans alone? In the answer to that question lies, for international law, the difference between civilization and the want of it."[45]

In Westlakes's view, international law should mediate the treatment of non-civilized peoples so as to expand the standard of civilization throughout the world. The sort of legal discourse performed by early internationalists such as Vitoria, works through 19th Century international affairs, though in more elaborate and contemporary arguments, usually concerning sovereignty, sovereign equality and basic principles of government and Constitutional achievements. In this aspect, if one considers the legal relevance of sovereignty, a cornerstone of legal subject hood for European countries, it could be argued that it is framed upon universalist assumptions: on the one hand, the peoples who are not granted with such a gift[46], because stuck in inferior scales of human progress, do not deserve recognition by the society of States; on the other hand, progress and civilization are to be brought by European interventionism, an inevitable step towards the maturing of less-developed peoples:

> Accordingly, international law has to treat such natives as uncivilized. It regulates for the mutual benefit of civilized states, the claims which they make to sovereignty over the region, and leaves the treatment of the natives to the conscience of the state to which the sovereignty is awarded, rather than sanction their interest being made an excuse for more war between civilized claimants, devastating the region and the cause of suffering to the natives themselves.[47]

This seems to display the standard, or the legitimate fashion, for the violence that has been committed towards native populations in America, Africa and Asia since early 16th century and continued onwards, reaching the 21st century through varying mechanisms and structural imbalances. In Anghie and Chimni's remarks, "violence has been displaced in part from the first to the Third World by a number of international practices that have resulted in the South's subjugation to a range of unsustainable economic and social practices policed by international institutions and trade institutions that enrich and favor the North."[48]

4. The international and the post-colonial: dissident voices and the vocabulary of decoloniality

If Anghie and Chimni make a strong a point, that is to say, if colonialism and imperialism, rather than a feature of a distant past, but a component of legal Western tradition, then by what mechanisms do these aspects endure in contemporary international law? An attempt to answer this elusive question could stand upon the contributions, first, of post-colonial Indian historian Dipesh Chakrabarty[49] surveys along within the Subaltern Studies movement members on the alternatives to confront historicism with a commitment to provincialize Europe give life to the subaltern voices, and second, Latin American philosophers like Aníbal Quijano[50] and Walter Mignolo[51] and their critique of Western modernity through epistemic mechanisms known as coloniality of knowledge.

Delinking – the rhetoric of modernity, the logic of coloniality and the grammar of de-coloniality. In: Cultural Studies, vol. 21, nos. 2-3, p. 449-514, 2007.

The conceptual framework that forges modernity, Chakrabarty outlines, "[…] entail an unavoidable – and in a sense indispensable – universal and secular vision of the human", that meaning a totalizing narrative that makes a particular reality the only reality. Departing from it, "the European colonizer of the nineteenth century both preached this Enlightenment humanism at the colonized and at the same time denied it in practice"[52], which reveals a hierarchy of values and the geographical site of the production of historical events. The logical conclusion, the cunning of reason tell us, is that all should converge to a desired point in history despite evident historical particularities.

Historicism is a product of modernity and functions by presenting certain evolutionary stages that, once achieved, should grant the necessary credentials to join official history. This reasoning is perhaps somewhat present in legal institutions like the recognition of States, the principle of self-determination and the idea of the nation-State itself. In order to tackle these assumptions, Chakrabarty suggests provincializing Europe, that is, examining the hidden ideological-historical-legal-political-cultural mechanisms responsible for projecting, to the globe, a determined local sensitivity, while downplaying other conceptions of diversity: "to 'provincialize' Europe was precisely to find out how and in what sense European ideas that were universal were also, at one and the same time, drawn from very particular intellectual and historical traditions that could not claim any universal validity".[53]

Anibal Quijano's reflections on modernity, too, display a permanent concern with making sense of the byproducts – violence, poverty, dependency – of the historical process. Western modernity presents itself linked with its totalizing counterpart, a specific mode of production of knowledge labeled coloniality. The relations between the colonial mode of thinking and reasoning – coloniality – and modern social-legal dynamics are reflective of a permanent exercise of power and violence directed at plural visions of knowledge that escapades or defies modern/colonial parameters. These forms of subjugation and occlusion of diversity inevitably colonize knowledge, in the precise sense that valid knowledge must abide by a set of standards should it be willing to be accepted globally. Modernity/coloniality, together, comprise a structure of power that is virtually inescapable because it creates a hierarchy of knowledge and dictates the parameters of recognition within the realm of valid knowledge:

> That specific colonial structure of power produced the specific social discriminations which later were codified as 'racial', 'ethnic', 'anthropological' or 'national', according to the times, agents, and populations involved. These intersubjective constructions, product of Eurocentered colonial domination were even assumed to be 'objective', 'scientific', categories, then of a historical significance. That is, as natural phenomena, not referring to the history of power. This power structure was, and still is, the framework within which operate the other social relations of classes or estates.[54]

Large scale political decolonization that took place in the 1960's and 1970's did not represent, based on Quijano's insights, the end of epistemic and systemic colonization. Colonial logics sustains action through the imposition of political, economic, social, cultural and epistemic patterns, on the one hand, and the empowerment of a matrix of power55 that is permanently categorizing knowledge and life, and it does so by the unilateral implementation of values with universal appeal. Coloniality disguises itself in universal/cosmopolitan clothing, forging a "mystified image of their own patterns of producing knowledge and meaning."56 The universal categories put forth by Western modernity through colonization and informal imperialism produce universalism by claiming the exclusivity of its epistemic position despite the contingency of the historical and cultural and social biases.[57]

[57] The working of the parameters of universality in 16th century legal thinking was examined by Peter Fitzpatrick. The author defends the thesis that Spanish Scholastics, like Francisco de Vitoria, have developed a vocabulary that placed political-theological concepts within the rationale of modern imperialism. It follows that legal practices and norms become secular features of modernity whereas the theological remains active as it absorbs and reenacts the religious continually. FITZPATRICK, Peter. Working in similar argumentative structures, Walter Mignolo develops further the concept of coloniality so that it could give rise to decolonial strategies capable of unraveling, deconstructing and reconstructing those tales, experiences, forms of life and knowledge that have been silenced for the past five centuries. Decolonial strategies, in Mignolo's words, set the road to new modes of thinking, "a delinking that leads to de-colonial epistemic shift and brings to the foreground other epistemologies, other principles of knowledge and understanding and, consequently, other economy, other politics, other ethics."[58]

4. Conclusion

So as not to drift into unnecessary excavations that may lead this study astray, two main conclusions should be made up to this stage. Firstly, international law's foundations face severe criticism by the craft of theorists who display a commitment to disenthralling given assumptions, biases and differentiations upon which legal doctrine takes root. The reasons for revisiting key thinkers such as Vitoria or 19th Century liberals are unfolding before us: these studies tackle both the history of the discipline and the broader social context in order to come to terms with the so often elusive, at times misleading, quests for decolonization and promotion of diversity in global reach. Secondly, once history has become a prominent element in TWAIL's methodology, internationalists ought to come to terms with the difficulties, limitations and perspectives woven in the task of taking the history of the discipline seriously. In other words, the Third World searches for its own voice inside international law and, while they seek to write history from distinctive perspectives, such histories may be located outside the discipline's classical accounts.

It is the extent to which violence, be it subjective or objective to use Žižek's terminology, becomes institutionalized within present practices and norms, that raises notes about the urgency of revisiting the history of the discipline and the unfolding of acts of power, occlusion or exclusion that grants a particular culture – Europe – its universal status. International law, as the discussions above may reveal, often projects particular modes of life, culture and politics to the detriment of multiple modes of life, culture and politics that are strange to its language and appeal. In this sense, the accounts that dismiss the relevance of the Third World in post-1990's international affairs work in tandem with all-encompassing historical views that flattens pluralism and diversity, yet spreading a belief on current norms' proneness to address the interests of all peoples in a liberal-fashioned community of States.

The road to development becomes evident in the horizon of official History as the alleged fragmentation of the Third World gains prominence. In face of this, TWAIL advances vocabularies, practices and pluralism aimed at a double movement of, first, confronting established scholarship in their own foundations and, second, of bringing to the fore epistemic alternatives, the excluded voices of the Others, the subalterns, in international level. By embracing this critical methodology, the movement takes seriously the need to expose the limits of mainstream thinking, its promises of emancipation and development, in order to give room to academic approaches firmly grounded on social movements, alternative thinking and a commitment to act otherwise.

Critical theories, such as TWAIL, reject linear perceptions of time and history, and allow for epistemic strategies capable of recognizing counter-hegemonic conceptions of society, culture and diversity. International law, in light of TWAIL's remarks, insists on a hegemonic discourse firmly rooted on historicism. Therefore, by interpreting colonial relations both beyond temporal limits and alongside the dimension of coloniality, as proposed by Latin American and Indian post-colonial thinkers, international lawyers are able to perceive their discipline in more diverse ways. Silenced stories, oppressed subjects and diverse manifestations of legal pluralism will find room for a broader democratic debate that outdoes the boundaries of historicism and its embedded postulations.

The freedom of speech in the network society:
New forms of controlling information[1]

Marco Antônio Sousa Alves[2]

Abstract: At the beginning of his inaugural lecture at the Collège de France, Foucault poses the following question: "What is so perilous about the fact that people speak, and that their speech proliferates? Where is the danger in that?". Soon after, Foucault advances his hypothesis, according to which "in every society the production of discourse is at once controlled, selected, organized and redistributed according to a certain number of procedures". Following this line proposed by Foucault, we should not dream of a world without any kind of discursive control or coercion over speech. The very "conquest of freedom of speech" should not be seen as a complete liberation. Moreover, freedom of speech (which is always limited) was associated with a set of transformations that replaced the power based on the censorship of the Sovereign or the Church. The recognition of this right is linked, in the eighteenth century, to a new technology of power based on press, public opinion and mass media. In short: Is the freedom to speak or publish one's ideas an achievement or an evolution of mankind? We can say yes, but without forgetting that it also introduced a new form of domination, which takes place precisely through the exercise of this "freedom". Nowadays, with the internet, the freedom of speech acquires a new dimension and meaning, and new forms of control and domination emerge. I highlight three contemporary forms of information control: (1) ownership of content through private monopoly on large databases; (2) control over computer file formats through proprietary software and codes or technological mechanisms to control information, such as DRM (Digital Rights Management) technologies, (3) control over access, which occurs through search engines and providers, as we see in the selection criteria imposed by the Google algorithm. At the same time, new forms of resistance are raising: practices of illegal sharing, free software movements and hacker groups. Like the press in the eighteenth century, the internet today brings back the libertarian discourse, promising the end of media's control and the fullest liberty. But the supposed freedom of information brings withal new forms of control, linked to new monopolies and a new information economy.

Keywords: Freedom of speech; Information society; Michel Foucault.

Much has been said about the importance of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of information, etc. They are usually seen as a human right, a great achievement of mankind, part of the Western political ideals since the late eighteenth century. There are few cases in which the perception of abuse of that freedom leads to restrictions (for example, against groups of intolerance, bullying or injuries to privacy).

In this communication, my intention is not to analyze the cases of abuse that point to the need for restrictions on freedom of speech. More than that, I would like to put in question the very idea of freedom of speech and the belief that it is a kind of liberation or achievement of mankind. From the perspective of Foucault's analysis of power, I intend to present some considerations about the conflicts that characterize the information society, looking for diagnose the emergent ways of controlling freedom of speech, as well as the new forms of resistance associated.

At the beginning of his inaugural lecture at Collège de France, Foucault poses the following question: "What is so perilous about the fact that people speak, and that their speech proliferates? Where is the danger in that?".[3] Soon after, Foucault advances his hypothesis, according to which "in every society the production of discourse is at once controlled, selected, organized and redistributed according to a certain number of procedures".[4] Following this line proposed by Foucault, we should not dream of a world without any kind of discursive control or coercion over speech.

The very "conquest of freedom of speech" should not be seen as a complete liberation. Moreover, freedom of speech (which is always limited) was associated with a set of transformations that replaced the power based on the censorship of the Sovereign or the Church. The recognition of this right is linked, in the eighteenth century, to a new technology of power based on press, public opinion and mass media. Instead of conceiving freedom of speech only in its positive aspect, I would point to its negative or coercive side, as a piece of a new mechanism of power. In place of a sovereign power that makes use of an explicit and repressive apparatus of censorship, we saw born in the so-called "democratic societies" a new power economy, increasingly open to the public and dependent on your opinion. We give everyone the right to speak, but that does not mean everyone will be heard. The construction of public opinion is not free from manipulation. This new democratic power is closely linked to a new form of discursive control of information through the mass media (initially the press and later also radio and television). In this new mechanism of power, the freedom of speech represents a calculated risk, assimilated and manipulated in the service of the status quo.

In short: Is the freedom to speak or publish one's ideas an achievement or an evolution of mankind? We can say yes, but without forgetting that it also introduced a new form of domination, which takes place precisely through the exercise of this "freedom". Following this way of thinking, I propose to diagnose our time and make visible some new forms of control and subjection that internet brings with it. Nowadays, the freedom of speech acquires a new dimension and meaning. If, since the press revolution, the freedom of speech was associated with the emergence of a powerful mass media and a new technology of power (what we call liberal bourgeois), today it is linked to new forms of information manipulation. Like the press in the eighteenth century, the internet nowadays brings back the libertarian discourse, promising the end of media's control and the fullest liberty. But the supposed freedom of information brings withal new forms of control, linked to new monopolies and a new information economy.

So, I highlight three contemporary forms of information control: (1) ownership of content through private monopoly on large databases; (2) control over computer file formats through proprietary software and codes or technological mechanisms to control information; (3) control over access, which occurs through search engines and providers. At the same time, I aim at highlighting the new raising forms of resistance: practices of illegal sharing, free software movements and hacker groups.

1. The ownership of content through private monopoly on large databases

Several mechanisms currently exist for creating legal protections over the contents of databases. The internet and digital media, rather than serve for free exchange of information, allowed the formation of giant databases exploited by a few large companies. For example, proprietary databases are nowadays owned and controlled by companies such as Lexis-Nexis or Thomson Publishing (for legal information), Dow-Jones and Nasdaq (for financial information), Pfizer and GlaxoSmithKline (for human DNA gene sequences and medical research), MacGraw Hill, Reuters and Knight Ridder (for news and media information) and many others in different domains, such as AOL Time Warner, the Wall Street Journal and Reed Elsevier.[5]

Let's consider the case of scientific publication. The dissemination of the results of scientific production is nowadays increasingly appropriated and commercially controlled. Academics have to read and publish to sustain their careers, and if you want to do either you have to deal with some Big Journals. Today just three publishers, Elsevier, Springer and Wiley, account for roughly 42% of all articles published in science, technology, engineering, and medical topics.[6] Elsevier alone serves more than 30 million scientists and students worldwide, controlling more than 2,000 journals that publish every year 250,000 articles.[7] Besides the ownership of a significant portion of our papers, Elsevier may soon own a significant chunk of the bibliographic metadata stored by academics (Mendeley data) and all its commercial advantages. Its 2012 revenues reached $2.7 billion.[8]

Universities are today at the mercy of some few companies. Elsevier now rent access to their databases for vast sums of money. From 1984 to 2002, for example, the price of science journals increased nearly 600%. The price increases as high as 145% over the past 6 years.[9] Prices are increasing at a time when the Internet has made it cheaper and easier than ever before to share information. Reading a single article published by one of Elsevier's journals will cost around $30 or $40. In April 2012, the Harvard Library published a letter stating that their subscriptions to academic journals were "financially untenable" and singled out one group as primarily responsible for the problem: Elsevier.[10]

In sum, excessive database legal protections increase the cost of research and development for all of society, erecting a barrier to information access and restraining innovation. Against this commercial monopoly over scientific publication, more than 13,000 scientists have signed recently a boycott of Elsevier.[11] Furthermore, the Open Knowledge Foundation, founded in 2004 and dedicated to promoting open data and open content, fights to open up knowledge around the world and see it used and useful through many different projects.[12] In law domain, we saw the emergence of some free online databases of court rulings, such as Findlaw.com. Besides these attempts trying to build an alternative space for the dissemination of knowledge, I would like to mention the illegal actions, such as hacker attacks or P2P sharing networks.

An emblematic case in this regard is that of Aaron Swartz, programmer and cyberactivist that committed suicide at age 26 on November 8th last year. He was about to be sentenced to 50 years in prison and $ 4 million in damages. His crime was to break protection devices and try to disseminate on line scientific articles from JSTOR platform, without any intention of profit. Before death, he wrote the Guerilla Open Access Manifesto, which states that: "The world's entire scientific and cultural heritage, published over centuries in books and journals, is increasingly being digitized and locked up by a handful of private corporations. Want to read the papers featuring the most famous results of the sciences? You'll need to send enormous amounts to publishers like Reed Elsevier. […] That is too high a price to pay. money to read the work of their colleagues? Providing scientific articles to those at elite universities in the First World, but not to children in the Global South? It's outrageous and unacceptable. […] We need to take information, wherever it is stored, make our copies and share them with the world. We need to take stuff that's out of copyright and add it to the archive. We need to buy secret databases and put them on the Web. We need to download scientific journals and upload them to file sharing networks. We need to fight for Guerilla Open Access".[13]

2. The control over computer file formats through proprietary software and codes

Beyond the control of content, the very format in which information is saved could be appropriated. Moreover, various technological mechanisms are created to regulate access to digital files. A new technology of power emerges, no longer focused on the laws and courts, but in the machine codes or the architecture of cyberspace. Unlike the law, code affords no appeal, no recourse, and no formal institutional review and interpretation. In its effects, code more closely resembles the laws of nature, because it requires neither the awareness nor the consent of its subjects in order to be effective. Code might be used as a tool to subvert individual liberties or public values, for either commercial or political gain. In fact, the lack of transparency of code almost invites such abuses. In sum, a new code-centric world is taking the place of the old law-regulated system.[14]

The DRM (Digital Rights Management), for example, is a class of controversial technologies that are used by hardware manufacturers, publishers and copyright holders with the intent to control the use of digital content and devices. DRM is a set of access control technologies that seek to restrict viewing, copying, printing, and altering of works or devices. An early example of a DRM system, employed since 1996 on film DVDs, is the Content Scrambling System (CSS) that uses an encryption algorithm. In general, e-book readers also use DRM technology to limit copying, printing, and sharing of information, sometimes overriding some of the user's wishes.

DRM systems have received some international legal backing by implementation of the 1996 WIPO Copyright Treaty, the 1998 US Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA) and the 2001 European directive on copyright, imposing criminal penalties on those who make available technologies whose primary purpose and function are to circumvent content protection technologies. So, clearly code prevail over law, because DRM policies can also restrict users from doing something perfectly legal, such as making backup copies of CDs or DVDs, accessing works in the public domain, or using copyrighted materials for research and education under fair use laws.

[13] Swartz, A. Guerilla Open Access Manifesto.

More than an ungovernable and anonymous land, cyberspace became with these new technological tools an over regulated place. New practices of cybersecurity take place and cyberspace is today a prominent political and technical battlefield. In reaction to these technological devices, the free software movement is trying to give to the users the freedom to share, study and modify the digital world. In the site of the Free Software Foundation (FSF) their purpose is explained in this way: "Free software is about having control over the technology we use in our homes, schools and businesses, where computers work for our individual and communal benefit, not for proprietary software companies or governments who might seek to restrict and monitor us".[15] And besides these attempts trying to build an alternative space, there are several illegal actions against the so-called "Digital Imprimatur", like hackers methods to bypass DRM protections, such as the burn-rip process and many others.

3. The control over access through search engines and providers

In addition to the control over information's content and format, there is another important way of controlling information: the mastery of access. In fact, information without search engines is useless. In this sense, Google's stated mission is "to organize the world's information and make it universally accessible and useful".[16] This self-stated mission could seem megalomaniac, but it isn't. Google in fact has a quasi-monopoly over world information. The corporation has been estimated to run more than one million servers in data centers around the world and to process over one billion search requests each day, with more than U$ 40 billion of revenue, derived especially from advertising.[17]

[17] Google, from Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Google.

Google is the major player in the new information economy, based on creation, distribution, use, integration, and manipulation of information. Freedom of information, in this new scenario, is assimilated into a new economical strategy. This economical shift is related to new forms of controlling information for political and commercial interests. For example, the Page Rank, algorithm used by the Google web search engine, opens new possibilities to manipulate search results in order to give a preferential treatment to Google's own products or to serve certain political interests. It's a new kind of censorship, extremely effective and powerful, because Google has become the main interface with our whole reality.

Conclusion

To wrap up, I believe that freedom of speech is now included in a new power economy, properly assimilated and domesticated by new mechanisms of power. More than a land of freedom, internet is part of an incipient system with new political and economic strategies. New forms of censorship and monopoly are silently born within the digital world. It is up to us now to raise some important questions: after all, who is interested in the massive flow of information? What kind of freedom is really given to speech? And, last but not least, do all these changes represent some kind of liberation for humanity?

Featured expressions of the relationship between Law and Literature in Argentina

Miguel Angel Ciuro Caldani[1]

Abstract: Literature and art in general constitute a horizon of Law, which is especially present when the juridical object is constructed with the breadth of the tridimensionalist integrativism of the Trialist Theory of the Juridical World. According to the tridimensionalist integrativism, supported by jurists such as Miguel Reale, Werner Goldschmidt, Luis Recasens Siches, etc., Law must address social reality, norms and values. In accordance with the Trialist Theory of the Juridical World, founded by Goldschmidt, tridimensionalism raises itself on partitions of life, captured by norms and valued by a complex of values that culminates in justice. Literature and art in general are expressions of the Culture's deep meanings, as a whole, and of the Law in particular, that have to be integrated socio-normo-axiologically.

Our subject has been discussed also in Argentina. Personally we have engaged ourselves in the study of, for example, "Edipus", "Antigone", "The Divine Comedy", "Fuenteovejuna", "Don Quixote", "The Merchant of Venice", "The Mayor of Zalamea", "Facundo", "Martín Fierro" and lyrics from several tangos. "Facundo" and "Martin Fierro" constitute a skyline of significance very special to understand the Argentinean legal culture manifested in the Civil Code of 1869, which –with modifications- still rules.

The Argentinean culture, like a large part of the Iberoamerican culture, is marked by the conflict between traditional Iberian and Anglo-French sectors. The first of them, reinforced by the south European immigration and the assimilation of indigenous groups, is more organicist and communitarist, paternalistic, traditional Catholic and romantic. Its exponents are, for example: Felipe II, Rosas and Perón. The second one, reinforced by American influences, is contractualist, in a liberal sense, kindred to the Reformation and illustrated. Its exponents are, for instance: Carlos III, Moreno, Rivadavia, Mitre and Ar-amburu. Since the mid-twentieth century, the first of these sectors, usually rely on Rousseaunean democracy, while the second is more liberal and republican, affined with Locke and Montesquieu. The style of the current peronist government is, in many ways, traditional Iberian. The opposition is usually more Anglo-French.

The key to the Civil Code of 1869 –liberal, in the economic sense-, enacted under the presidency of Sarmiento, lies in the Anglo-French interpretation of the Argentinean culture that he had done in "Facundo", subtitled "Civilization and Barbarism". "Civilization" was Anglo-French and "barbarism", the Iberian traditional gaucho. Related to the juridicity implemented by the Anglo-French group, in 1871 the gaucho cried his sadness in the poem Martín Fierro by José Hernández.

I. Fundamental ideas

1. The Art in general, and within it especially literature, are manifestations of deep senses of culture as a whole and of Law in particular, with the limitations of the differences between the literary and the juridical thought. Each work of literature, especially when it is a classic, often builds a space of suggestions useful to understand the problems of Law, and constructs it as a paralegal literary expression[2]. The paralegal character of literature is especially present when the juridical object is constructed with the breadth of the tridimensionalist integrativism of the Trialist Theory of the Juridical World. According to the tridimensionalist integrativism, supported by jurists such as Miguel Reale, Wer-

[2] As in literature with jurical content. It can also be recognized a "parajuridical aesthetic" (it can be query Miguel Angel Ciuro Caldani, Comprensión jusfilosófica del Martín Fierro, Rosario, Fundación para las Investigaciones Jurídicas, 1984, Pg. 5). As in other cases, beauty is achieved mainly through love. Especially in literary works such as Martin Fierro, it is obtained through justice (Ibid., PG. 5). Beauty refers more to "resemble"; instead, justice is more related more to "being" (vid. José Ortega y Gasset, "Ensayo de estética a manera de prólogo", en Obras Completas, RdO, Madrid, 1961, t. VI, Pg. 256). Maybe the tension between beauty and justice has extreme expressions in Nietzsche's ideas, which submit justice to beauty. In the Christian thought, in a certain way, beauty is submitted to justice (and sanctity) (vid. Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche, El origen de la tragedia, trad. E. Ovejero Mauri, Espasa-Calpe, Madrid, 1980, Pg 16; Gustav Radbruch, Filosofía del Derecho, Revista de Derecho Privado, Madrid, 1952, Pg. 143/144.; about the political meaning of art, it is possible to query, for example, Pierre-Joseph Proudhon, Sobre el principio de arte y Sobre su destinación social, trad. J. Gil Ramales, Aguilar, Madrid, 1980).

ner Goldschmidt, Luis Recaséns Siches, etc., Law must address social reality, norms and values. In accordance with the Trialist Theory of the Juridical World, founded by Goldschmidt, tridimensionalism raises itself on partitions of life, conceived by norms and valued by a complex of values that culminates in justice [3].

Unlike the pure simplicity of the Kelsenian normativist proposal and the impure complexity, in which what we consider juridical object is "caught" from the outside by the Economy, the Sociology, the Psychology, etc., and unlike the internal "compression" -realist or iusnaturalist-, the Trialism proposes to differentiate and integrate the social reality, the norms and the values and to differentiate and integrate the Law within the cultural world, in respective pure complexities[4].

Under the trialist proposal, the Juridical World has to be built as a set of partitions of power and powerlessness (which favor or harm life and especially human life) (sociological dimension) normatively conceived (normological dimension) and valued, partitions and norms by a complex of values that culminates in Justice (dikelogical dimension). tic[10]. Its exponents are, for example: Felipe II, Juan Manuel de Rosas and Juan Domingo Perón. The second one, reinforced by American influences, is contractualist, in a liberal sense, kindred to the Reformation and illustrated. Its exponents are, for instance: Carlos III, Mariano Moreno, Bernardino Rivadavia, Bartolomé Mitre and Pedro Eugenio Aramburu.

Perhaps the traditional Iberian sector has more features related to feudalism, and the Anglo-French sector has more capitalist references. As for the philosophical disciplines, the traditional Iberian sector in general has more sympathy for the Metaphysics and is sometimes pre-Kantian; the Anglo-French refers more to other philosophical disciplines such as Gnoseology, Epistemology and Logic, and it is Kantian or post-Kantian. Since the mid-twentieth century, the first of these sectors, usually rely on Rousseaunean democracy, while the second is more liberal and republican, aligned with Locke and Montesquieu.

The architecture of the city of Buenos Aires shows the presence of the two: anglo-french areas that strongly resemble Paris and London -as the Recoleta-, and more creole spaces, such as San Telmo. In the "interior"[11] of the country, Salta is a traditional Iberian city, and Cordoba can be considered a synthesis between traditional Iberian and relatively current Anglo-French elements. The style of the current peronist government is, in many ways, traditional Iberian. The opposition is usually more Anglo-French[12].

3. The key to the Civil Code of 1869 –liberal, in the economic sense-, enacted under the presidency of Sarmiento, lies in the Anglo-French interpretation of the Argentinean culture that he had done in Facundo, subtitled Civilization and Barbarism. "Civilization" was Anglo-French and "barbarism", the Iberian traditional gaucho[13]. For this porpoise were strategic -especially in the project of Sarmiento- scientific [10] However, as an expression of the tension of a culture that is expressed in styles that are not proper to it, we recall that Sarmiento belongs to the Romantic movement of Argentina's culture. He is a romantic writer who writes against romanticism (about Illustration and Romanticism it is possible to query, for example González Porto-Bompiani, Diccionario Literario, 2ª. ed., Barcelona, Montaner y Simón, t. I, 1967, Pg. 254 and ss. - 475 and ss.).

[11] Sometimes the word "interior" leads to wonder if Buenos Aires is the "exterior".

[12] However, at the present time Frente Renovador party, the opposition, has certain traditional Iberian influences (August, 2013).

and technological developments; secular education: common, free and compulsory -the presence of American teachers was fundamental- (so remarkably embodied in Act number 1420 of 1884); the rigid application the Slothful and ill entertained Act; the Constitution; the Commercial Code; the Civil Code of private property and freedom of contract -akin to the French Civil Code-; and basically, the immigration of European people capable of grounding the national bourgeoisie, as intended very explicitly Alberdi. Related to the juridicity implemented by the Anglo-French group, in 1871 the gaucho cried his sadness in the poem Martín Fierro by José Hernández.

4. The origin of immigrants that arrived to the country was actually one of the reasons why the liberal project worked for a few decades and then came into crisis, thanks to the lack of support in the idiosyncrasies of much of the population. Many people came to work hard, but the spirit of entrepreneurship was not implemented.

The Peronism ascent to power -inspired by the Social Doctrine of the Church and certain characteristics of fascism[14], mobilizer of sectors that had been marginalized-, emphasized the traditional Iberian harassment to the liberal Anglo-French model already present years before. The Civil Code was significantly amended, some of them alleged to be exceptional, and a new Constitution was dictated. Of course, it did not pass the intended path settle to reform a legal instrument such as that, and was annulled from the Anglo-French culture by the so-called Liberating Revolution in 1956[15]. If the Anglo-French space relied heavily on the Civil Code, the traditional Iberian sector referred more to Labor Law. The non-class unionism, sometimes corporative, was one of the great foundations of the Peronist movement (Justicialista).

5. The excision of the country's culture is so marked that has come to have two sectors on the right, center and left, although the anglo-french element manifests itself as parties or " pre-parties", dotted with different ideologies and sharper, and the traditional Iberian Peronist element expresses itself in a movement that covers all three orientations[16]. Military sectors that frequently clashed in the early sixties of the twentieth century evidenced the opposition of the two sectors: Colorados, more Anglo-French oriented, and Azules less hostile to traditional Iberians[17]. When the guerrillas arrived, there was an Anglo-French faction: the People's Revolutionary Army (ERP)[18]; and another traditional Iberian faction: the Montoneros[19], which shared affinities and strained liaisons with the historical Peronism. The Military Dictatorship Process had in itself factions of both orientations[20].

of integration of the jiridical object, Argentina needs especially the integration of its culture, which should engage each and every Argentinean. The country requires not only the complex thought in Law but the recognition of the juridical subject's complexity [22]. The introversion of the tensions between sectors often hide the real problems and the possibilities of their solution. This often results in profit for sectors leading their actions in bad faith.

7. Based on the development of Private International Law we have developed a theory of juridical responses that deals with its scopes, its dynamics and its situation. This theory helps to understand the deployments of sectors from Argentinean culture, with processes of "plus-modelation" , "minusmodelation" and domination and little integration and coexistence of the Anglo-French and Iberian traditional areas[23].

II. "Facundo" and "Martin Fierro" in the Juridical World

1) The Juridical World in general

a) Sociological dimension

8. The Trialist Theory of the Juridical World positions Law in the field of allotments of power and powerlessness, i.e., what helps or hurts being and especially human life. The principal allotments are partitions. These are the product of human conducts which can be determinable and realize the value of "conduction". There is also a great interest in distributions, which are caused by nature, diffuse human influences or chance, which satisfy the value of "spontaneity". The world of the Pampa[24], in which to varying degrees are installed -in acceptance or rejection- the two sectors, is marked by the predominance of distributions of nature, diffuse human influences and, perhaps, chance. "Martín Fierro" is a strong expression according to that world. However in "Facundo" the author shows his significant pretention of replacing distributions by partitions -replacing spontaneity by conduction-. "Facundo" is a gaucho, but Sarmiento desires a new reality that extinguishes the world of the gauchos.

9. "Facundo" and "Martin Fierro" present a great bid for the partition of power and powerlessness, what helps or harms human life. The author of "Facundo" wants to grant power to a man of an "Europeanized" civilization, and powerlessness to the gaucho. "Martin Fierro" defends exactly the opposite order of allotments.

10. Partitions may be authoritarians, developed by imposing, and doer of the value "power". Or autonomous, developed by agreement, satisfying the value of "cooperation". These two realities: the traditional Iberian and the Anglo-French worlds, are spaces where authority predominate. But both worlds want to limit it: the first, to provide deployment of the sense of the antique rural man; the second one, to develope the capitalist economic life and "progress".

11. Partitions can be sorted according to a working government's plan, indicating who are the supreme partitioners and which are the supreme criteria of partition, and realize the value of "previsibility". Exemplary conduct is carried out persuant to the scheme: model and sequel, and bound by "reasonableness", which satisfies the value of "solidarity". Simplifying, often we speak of "law" and "custom". "Facundo" intends, at least, to impose its model -a planned order-, which realize the value of "previsibility". "Martin Fierro" instead prefers to keep the exemplary conduct of the gaucho's costumes, which satisfies the value of "solidarity".

12. Partitions may find necessary limits, emerged from the nature of things (usually physical, psychological, logical, socio-political and socio-economic limits). The two literary works demonstrate an awareness of limits, but "Facundo" shows a major drive to overcome them, while "Martin Fierro" gives to a certain sense of defeat. It wouldn't be until a long time after that the traditional Iberian sector was protagonic again to [24] It can be query our paper "La Cautiva de Esteban Echeverría y la juridización de Argentina", in Investigación … cit., 3, 1987, Pg. 11 and ss.

Argentinean life and even limited the access to power for Anglo-French space.

b) Normological dimension

13. According to the trialist proposal, the norm contains the logical conception of a projected partition by an observer, and can be classified primarily as individual, which conceive past social sectors and therefore, realize the value of "immediacy". Norms can also be general, related to future social sectors, and therefore realize the value of "predictability". Although both literary works rather prefer "predictability", it is clear that the Anglo-French culture of "Facundo" has a special sympathy for this value, to the point that one of his greatest achievements was Civil Law codification.

14. Between the beginning of the literary expression process -with "Facundo"-, and the sanction of the Civil Code and the appearance of "Martin Fierro"'s first part, the Constitution was dictated in 1853-60. It included a large number of civil rights and political rights, practically always denied to the gauchos. The sanction of the Commercial Code is also of relevance.

c) Dikelogical dimension

15. According to the trialist proposal, Law must realize a complex of values that culminates in "Justice". There are also other values which are part of that complex, such as utility and love. We can say that the complex of all values culminates in the value of "Humanity", the thorough "must be" of our own being. "Facundo" refers to a justice much more integrated with utility, while "Martin Fierro" is a protest on behalf of humanity. Hernandez's[25] tragedy seems to refer to a cosmic justice (metajustice), while Sarmiento's ideal is referred to a value that is considered parallel to justice (parajustice).

16. Justice can be thought in various ways (kinds of justice) whose path has been already superbly signaled by Aristotle. Unwrapping these trails is possible to conceive extraconsensual and consensual justice, with or without consideration of people (of people or their roles), symmetrical or asymmetrical (easy or difficult comparability of the powers and powerlessness), dialogic or monologic (one or more reasons) and commutative or spontaneous (with or without repayment). Justice can also be differentiate as "partial" or governmental (from part of the system or from all of it), sectorial or integral (directed to a part or to the whole), of isolation or participation, absolute or relative and particular or general (directed to particular good or commonweal). The particular justice is the ultimate Private Law requirement. General justice is usually the requirement of Public Law. "Facundo" is more oriented towards symmetric justice, commutative, of insolation and particular: in relation to that, it is more "privatist". "Martín Fierro" is directed especially to asymmetric justice, spontaneous, of participation, and perhaps even general. Maybe the traditional Iberian sector has metaphysical basis that make general justice more viable and therefore more "publicist". However, in general, Argentina has very limited sense of commonweal. "Facundo" contains a strong reference to "arrival" justice, which sacrifices the present for the future, different from "departure" justice, that keeps intact the present time.

17. Justice is thought as a pantonomous category[26], directed to all allotments: past, present and future. As that universe of allotments is unapproachable to us, because we are neither omniscient nor omnipotent, we feel the need to fracture justice to produce legal certainty. "Facundo" was designed with a contradictory reference to the future: on the one hand it unfractures it, opening possibilities. On the other hand, it compresses it to make the future happen in a certain way. It proposes a strong authority to ensure a certain course for the future. "Martín Fierro" design is oriented to the past and present. The gaucho feels insecure facing that unfractured future.

18. The supreme principle of Justice proposed by the Trialism, is to grant each individual a sphere of freedom to fully develop, that is, to become a person. Applied to the elements of the partitions, this principle indicates the justice of partitioners, its receivers, its objects of partitions, its form and its reasons. As for the receivers, the legitimating titles are specifically the meritoriousness linked to the need, and the merit, which depends on behavior. "Facundo" is a strong allegation in favor of merits, obtained from a specific behavior according to the Anglo-French standards. "Martin Fierro" refers to meritoriousness. "Facundo" shows the importance of the Anglo-French development for allotments of patrimonial powers.

19. To satisfy the supreme principle of Justice adopted, the system should be Humanistic and non totalitarian, i. e., it must consider each individual as an end, and not as a mean to obtain another end. Although in theory "Facundo" has a strong inclination to humanism, it is actually a significant totalitarian deviation that mediatized the gaucho.

[26] Pan=all; nomos=norm that rules.

Humanism can be abstentionist or interventionist (paternalistic), which leads to the respective risks of mediation by totalitarian individualism or totalitarianism strictly Inicially, "Facundo" corresponds to an abstencionist model and Martin Fierro to an interventionist one, but finally "Facundo" has a paternalistic sense and even becomes totalitarian concerning the gaucho.

For the realization of Humanism we must address to the unicity, equality and community of all men, who tend to require political liberalism, democracy and the res publica. Although the gaucho has a remarkable sense of individuality, it is in "Facundo" where we can find a special inclination for the unicity. "Martin Fierro" claims a climate of greater equality and a sense of community.

To achieve the regime of justice it is necessary to protect the individual against all threats: other individuals -as such, and as a regime-, from himself and from all "the rest" (disease, poverty, ignorance, loneliness, unemployment, etc.). "Facundo" initially seeks protection from the others and from the regime, but at the end, it advocated for a dictatorship to civilize the gaucho, safeguarding him from himself. Martin Fierro needs circumstantially the protection against the regime and demands protection from poverty.

2) The branches of the jurical world

20. "Facundo" puts on special emphasis on Patrimonial Law and the application of Criminal Law regarding the gaucho's "deviations". We could say that a sophisticated Civil Law was made for the Anglo-French sector, while a rudimentary system of penalties sought to reduce the traditional Iberian culture. In present terms it would be feasible to say that through Martin Fierro traditional Iberian sector claims for the development of Social Security Law and Labour Law. At the time Peronism unwrapped those claims, and unfractured the Anglo-French privatist patterns.

III. Conclusion

21. "Facundo" and "Martin Fierro" manifest the profound connections between literature and law. In particular express the often strained ties between two cultural sectors whose differences have been splitting Argentina's life and, to various degrees, the life of Hispanoamerica and the Hispanic life as a whole; Iberoamerican life and the whole of Iberic life. Pure complex juridical models, such as the trialist theory of the juridical world can help integrate these diversities[27].

[27] It can also provide recognition to the complexity of the legal subject.

Considerarions about memory and oblivion in Law from the short story 'Pai Contra Mãe', by Machado de Assis

Leonela Otilia Sauter Soares[1]

Abstract: This working paper aims to explore the relationship between Law, official History and Literature, and the limits of appliance in this connection. Initially, this research exposes how Law is important as memory of a nation. Simultaneously, it is made clear how occasionally Law can be partial as a legal order (Law can privilege certain people, as those who are/were in power, when it allows them to misrepresent information and to spread some data that do not always match the reality). From this, the presentation analyzes the short story 'Pai contra Mãe', by Machado de Assis and the context in which it has been written. This research discusses these points investigating the analysis of discourse, according to 'A Arqueologia do Saber', by Michel Foucault.

Keywords: 'Pai contra Mãe'; Law as memory of a nation; 'A Arqueologia do Saber'.

Introduction

When one first starts attending school, one learns to obey a set of predetermined rules. We are taught that we must obey the teacher, respect our classmates, and do our homework. One is also taught to write texts about one's routine, as well as about topics concerning one's reality. As one grows, the rules become more complex. If one was to consider that throughout a person's school life one writes one's history, those rules of behavior are a sample of law, and that textual productions can be a sample of the literature, then it is possible to say that "History",

"Law" and "Literature" are closely linked. It is important to question, however, if when seeking to understand the history of a nation, or of a country and the law of a nation, does this maxim still hold true? And does it still indeed, if we are to add literary texts? A strong desire to find more information that may allow me to answer such questions is the main reason for writing this paper.

It is said that the past of law (and its current development) is closely related to Literature. Stories and novels often serve to portray social aspects imperceptible by other paths that are not in the literary form[2]. Holmes Jr., said: "The history of what the law has been is necessary to the knowledge of what the law is"[3]. Law is important as narrative, when studied together with literature, because this approach "[can] provide a voice to those who, through the official channels of the right, are invariably silenced".

If we are to consider a linear evolution of the story, it is possible to say that written language is a fundamental part of the development of the history of people. Through language, historical records of cultural identity are made, which can be seen in Law[4].

However, when analyzed in its densest form, the link between law and history, must be paid much more attention to. In an attempt to seek the answer to the real link between law and history, it is proposed to define the object of study.

From there, our research starts to look carefully at the book "A Arqueologia do Saber" (The Archeology of Knowledge, free translation), by Michel Foucault. The author explains that when speech is analyzed, it is necessary to consider a lot of speeches for a period of time, referring them to the same object - whilst trying to find a relationship between them, by rearranging them. Thus, by taking this information into account, the study of the short story "Pai contra Mãe", by Machado de Assis, can commence.

1.1 The tale

The tale starts on the topic of slavery, which had just been abolished at the time the author wrote the story, but that in the story itself is still a common practice. The narrator explains about some instruments, which subdue the captives, such as the mask of tinplate. It forced slaves to not get drunk, as the mask only exposed a person's nose and eyes. The narrator also describes the collar used to arrest fugitive slaves. He says that those who were recaptured - and shackled - showed the condition of fugitives, when they walked down the street. But the narrator also describes that the practice of escaping was very common as slaves, and their masters frequently maltreated them. Those whose slaves had escaped usually offered a reward to whoever may capture the escapees. Advertisements were often printed in the newspaper, and catching runaway slaves was a serious profession at that time. It was doubtlessly not a noble craft, but the economic necessity often drove free men to become 'slave-hunters'.

Cândido Neves, as the author puts it, is the one who distinguishes the link between the description of the condition the slaves found themselves in, and the tale itself. Candinho (Cândido's nickname) did not have a regular job; and from many jobs he often left on his own accord, for lack of enthusiasm in carrying them out. When he felt in love with Clara, he decided to learn the craft that the cousin whom he lived with practiced: carpentry, as he wished to have a profession by the time he married.

Clara was twenty-two years old, Candinho, thirty. She was an orphan, lived with her aunt Monica and sewed at home in order to make a living. The young girl had had a few boyfriends, but she did not have a real interest in any of them. Cândido met her at a dance and they got married eleven months later. Clara's friends advised her to not marry him, as Candinho was a known trickster.

Clara, Candinho and her aunt, Monica, lived together after the marriage. Clara's aunt had warned them against having children, as the child would certainly be made to starve due to their lack of money. Despite the advice, Clara became pregnant. The young girl sewed increasingly in order to pay the bills and make outfits for the baby.

The aunt was concerned about the situation, as Candinho had not yet obtained a serious job. He refused the permanent job she found him by arguing that capturing slaves yielded enough money, even if it only used to happen occasionally. One day, however, his earnings from that job began to decline. The financial crisis was large, and there were many slave hunters. Consequently, Cândido's debts began to catch up with him, and he no longer was able to keep up even with the rent.

Out of pure desperation, he would sometimes capture slaves who had not actually fled, or even freed slaves by mistake. Aunt Clara advised him to find a new job, but he never followed her advice.

After Clara became pregnant, the situation worsened. During her last week of pregnancy, during dinner, Monica suggested that they should give the child to a foundling wheel[5]. After this suggestion was made, they were immediately faced with an angry landlord, demanding the late rent they owed. They were told that if the rent was not to be paid within the next five days, they would be evicted. Unbeknown to the couple however, Monica had already found a house where the three could stay for free, but she had not told the couple, with hopes that their desperate estate would drive them to cast out the soon-to-be-born child. In order to try to revert the situation, Candinho looked for runaway slaves as well as loans from friends, but is ultimately unsuccessful

The three characters end up being evicted and go on to live in the house that Monica has found. In two days, the child is born: a boy. To their own demise, the couple ultimately decides to leave the child in the foundling wheel.

On the day before the delivery, Cândido reviews all advertisement regarding the recapture of slaves. He finds one, offering a very high reward for the capture of a female slave. Cândido begins to look for her.

After a long day of search, he cannot find her and knows what awaits him once home: the casting forth to an unknown life of his first-born son. After much reluctance, he takes the boy, showers him with cuddles and protects him from the dew, covering the path leading to their separation. During the walk, the father turns away a few blocks from the wheel path, hoping to prolong the time with his son. It is then that he sees the figure of a mulatto woman. He enters a pharmacy, where earlier he had asked about the slave, and requests the attendant to take care of his son for some time whilst he investigates.

Cândido returns to the persecution. The slave is proven to really be the one described in the newspaper, Arminda - who is pregnant. Cândido calls the mulatto woman by her name, and she turns to respond, thus confirming her identity. Cândido chases and detains her. The slave begs not to be given up, promising obedience to Cândido, but after much resistance, she is taken to the owner. Nobody aids the women, even though all know what is happening: the capture of a runaway slave.

When they reach the house of the slave's master, he immediately pays Candinho for his services. Upon making the payment, however, the slave suffers a miscarriage. Candinho leaves the house without wanting to know more of what is happening, as he is only interested in getting back to his son. He takes his son, and goes back home with the reward. The aunt, Monica, hears about the events that took place and understands the necessity for Candinho's involvement, but criticizes the slave's escape and the abortion. The text ends with:

> Cândido Neves, kissing his son tearfully, in all earnestness, blessed the escape and cared not for the abortion.
>
> - Not all children shall live, said his heart[6]. (Free translation)

1.2 Historical Context

At the time the story is set, around 1850, the country is under the Second Brazilian Empire (1840-1889), of D. Pedro II. This period was characterized by the existence of Moderating Power[7], by the consolidation of the empire, and the liberal revolutions[8].

Since the Second Empire, the production of coffee began to gain prominence in the Brazilian economy, for which slavery was the essential hand labor. It was a period marked by alternation in State power between liberals and conservatives. Externally, it was the period of Issues

[7] Moderating Power, or "Poder Moderador", was a fourth power (Executive power, Legislative power and Judiciary) used by the Imperator to moderate the decisions taken by the other powers, except by Judiciary, that was independent.

[8] As an exemple, it is possible to mention "Revolução Praieira", which was suppressed by the leaders themselves because slaves were sticking to it.

Christie (a diplomatic standoff with the British, 1861-1865), also the time of the Paraguay War, and the beginning of attempts at industrialization, as well as the composition of immigration policies[9] .

Nevertheless, the work Pai contra Mãe integrates the book Relíquias de Casa, which was published in 1906, when the slave regime had already been abolished in Brazil. Slave labor had doubtlessly been fundamental for the country's economy.

The author of the tale, Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis, a black person, was born on June 21, 1839, to a poor family. He never attended university. In his lifetime, he published several works (ten novels, more than two hundred short stories, more than six hundred chronic), and is thus, considered to be the greatest writer in Brazil, equivalent, on a superficial comparison, to Shakespeare or Goethe. He wrote in almost all literary genres and introduced Realism as a literary period. He was the founder of the Brazilian Academy of Letters[10].

By taking into account the historical context of the time – of true ostracism, abandonment of blacks - and to understand the story and the relationships between law, history and literature, it will be analyzed how is the discourse of history.

2. History

It is necessary to distinguish, initially, that history can both refer to the past as a retelling of the past. Considering the plural forms of speech that stood out over time and the domination imposed (as the example of Eurocentrism), History as a discipline is not the past itself, but the interpretation that historians have made or make of it[11]. J.H. Rodrigues states that:

> God is not for the dead but for the alive, because to him, all are alive. History is also not for the dead, but for the alive, because it is the present reality, mandatory for awareness, for fruitful experi> ence. Life and reality are history, generating past and future [...][12]. (free translation)

Foucault pointed out that traditional history used to grasp, and memorize the monuments of the past, transforming them into registry and making them count the ways by which they 'traveled'[13]. For him,

> [...] history is that which transforms documents into monuments and which unfolds the traces left by men in order to be decoded. It is where a deep attempt at trying to recognize what they had been, is made. A mass of elements must therefore be isolated, grouped, made pertinent, inter-linked, as well as organized into sets.[14] . (free translation)

Regardless of the distinction made between what is known about the past and the past itself; historians have, throughout the years, been devoted to studying long periods seeking a possible stability or predominance of processes. In addition to the main story, other stories unfold, like wheat, dried, Gold[15], as a great novel.

Michel Foucault explains that in disciplines such as the history of ideas and literature, attention turned not to unity but to the phenomena of rupture along the lines of "recurrent redistributions". Such is what makes the concepts reconnect with each other and produce new visions, new pasts[16]. For him, the deeper ruptures are the clippings when "a science is founded highlighting it from the ideology of its past and revealing that past as ideological" (free translation)[17]. Here, it is fitting to look at the contribution of literary analysis, considered in the structuring of a work or a text. Thus,

> The big problem that will arise – that is arisen - in such historical analysis is not knowing through which paths continuities could establish (...) [,] the problem is no longer tradition and trail, but the cut and limit. (free translation)

In a simpler analogy, the problem is no longer to see the footprints in the sand forming a path, but rather, that of understanding why the footprint has not sunk in more deeply in the sand (though it may have been because of a cigarette butt or a small stone in the path, or even because it was near water or not near enough- thus the sand was too wet, or not enough). Foucault adds:

> In short, the history of thought, of knowledge, philosophy, and literature, seem to multiply the ruptures and search for all disturbances of continuity, which history itself, history in its pure and simple form, seems to erase, for the benefit of fixed structures, the irruption of events[18]. (free translation)

Foucault also notes that, with ruptures, there is no longer a global history and it begins to dawn what he calls 'general history'. For global history, he understands the attempt of "reconstruction" of a society, civilization, which is called "time". For both, there is a definite time-space and a system of homogeneous relations. Overall history, however, contains the elements that would allow identifying other units within this 'global history', identifiable through the reorganization of series, and of its limits[19]. "The problem that presents itself - and that defines the task of a general history - is that of determine what kind of relationship can be legitimately described between these different series"[20]. The notion of discontinuity is needed in order to better understand history. As Foucault himself said,

> Making historical analysis into continuous speech and making human consciousness the original subject of all becoming and of all practice are two sides of the same system of thought. The time is here conceived in terms of aggregation, where revolutions are never outlets of consciousness [21] (free translation).

This means that outbursts should not be erased from history. Nevertheless, it is not proposed that an unlimited description of the relationship be made, rather, it is necessary to limit it[22]:

> The conditions for the appearance of an object of discourse, the historical conditions in which something can be said about it as well as where several people may say different things about such object (...) are numerous and important. This means that you cannot talk about anything at any time[23].

In summary, it is understood that traditionally, global history is taught - the monolith of history - however, there are disciplines such as the history of ideas, which highlights the differences between historical periods, bringing them into conflict. However, both are not suitable to understand the relationship with the law. The most appropriate would be General History, which does not erase nor values differences, but allows one to notice the development of different "stories" such as wheat and gold. General history contains a more precise delimitation as well as limited relations, i.e., the historical moment. Let us now turn to the analysis of the discourse of law.

3. Law

As Gregory Robles Morchón believed: if there were no signs system, there would be no speech. He explains that the term "speech' applies both to each language, and in particular, to the set of them. In the same way that speech would not exist without language, he said, legal orders would not exist if there was no Law. Also according to Morchón[24]:

> In any society, whether primitive or advanced, whether it belongs to one culture or another, we use the word "law" to refer to a group, more or less extensive and complex, composed of communication processes between humans and whose immanent function is to organize life in a society and govern their own actions. In societies with low levels of complexity, these communication processes are quite simple[25](free translation).

Morchón[26] adds that different way of saying that the law is a communicational system is to say that the law is regulative organizational-text, which is to organize human society to regulate actions - and thus it differs from other texts, such as literary and historical[27]. Thus, each legal system would be formed by "actos de habla" (acts of speech) which take the name of judicial decisions[28].

To the meaning of law, it is necessary to make an exception. In Portuguese, the language that this work was originally conceived in, one can use the word "right" with different meanings (law as subject, as moral principle and right, e.g.). The same word can represent the law or the legal norm (law-norm), the power to act (law-ability), which is due for righteousness (justice-law), the law as a social phenomenon (law-social fact) or as a scientific discipline (law-science)[29]. Law does not designate one but several different realities. It is impossible to work with a unique formulation of law[30].

Although possessing such diversity in meaning, the law may end up being part of various formats. As Tercio Sampaio said:

> The law, thus, on one side, protects us from arbitrary power exercised on the sidelines of all rules, save us of the most chaotic and dictatorial tyrant, gives everyone equal opportunities and at the same time, protects the disadvantaged people. On the other hand, it is also a manipulative tool that frustrates the aspirations of the underprivileged and allows the use of control and domination techniques, which due to its complexity, is accessible only to a few specialists [31] (free translation).

Therefore, one must take all the possibilities that law offers when reflecting on memory and oblivion. Now, the connections between law and history must be analyzed.

4. Law And History - An Initial Approach

Law may end up being partial even for legal language, which is doubtlessly extremely technical and thorough. For being so technical, it distances from and sometimes injures those who seek Justice to resolve their disputes. As a legal order, law ends up being partial because it can favor certain groups. An example is given with the Nazi massacres, apartheid, dictatorship and slavery in Brazil, and even when regarding what happened to Arminda's, the mulatto slave's, son. Certain groups were in charge of, writing laws, and would, therefore put forth ideologies that were well ventilated at the time, leading to the aforementioned barbarities being perceived as 'legal'. Groups that prepare rules do not always take into account all sides, and it generally favors the side that it has interest in, or can empathize with. Other citizens (at least when they are considered citizens) are at the mercy of the interests of these groups.

If one is to consider Law as merely a set of rules of a nation, and as history, the linear progression of living of a nation, as usually makes common sense, one cannot say that this law is the memory of a nation, because the Law, like history, is not linear, and has much deeper influences than just rules. Moreover, the way in which the history in reports or books is seen or heard can be altered; "history producers" often would manipulate data or omit it, especially during periods of censorship. Thus, the power established by law can be broken with history and therefore relegate it to oblivion. Nevertheless, it is possible to refine the relationship between law and history from a more refined cut.

If law is to be perceived as a set of rules, principles and decisions (Common Law) or cases (Civil Law), whilst history is still perceived as a linear progression of the history of a nation, it can be said that this law is a reflection of prior to its production period, almost like a feedback, but it is not possible to say that such law is a reflection of nowadays concerns of the population, for it rarely foresees institutes. Law ends only making things retroactively. It is like giving a plate of food to those who do not eat for days, but were unable to stock up on food predicting famine.

At this point, trying to answer the question of how far law can be considered the memory of a nation becomes complex, because not all the history of a people is reported in judgments and rules, not all facts come to the attention of the judiciary. Those whom usually "make history" are the winners of the debate, i.e., historical records end up being very partial. However, an individual who may have been found to be 'right' at one time, maybe cannot be seen in such way anymore in the light of current rules, and the records to understand the circumstances may be scarce now. Furthermore, judgments do not always involve a sense of justice, and as everywhere, there are controversial decisions. If the historical study is based on a simple random decision, the result can be completely distorted of the average thinking (of the so-called general history, the discourse of the social group).

However, if we consider discourse, while systematic and continuous playback from an average of law, though, the sum of rules, principles, and decisions (Common Law) / cases (Civil Law) in parallel with the set of facts rearranged within an analysis general history, identifying reconnections between sets, and being a very specific (and short) cut of a period of time - as Foucault determined, one can say that, to some extent, law can be considered history. However, such analysis is possible of failures, because the lines of discourse remain different (one is a reconstructive idea – history-, the other is an authoritative text- law), and the cut would be much defined, whilst "history" is a very small fragment. In addition, the cutout for analysis of law should also be very limited because, at least in Brazilian law, there are civil law, the welfare law, criminal law, constitutional law, which sometimes show internal discrepancy, either in legislation (which applies to one does not apply to the other), whether the proceedings (civil or criminal law, for example).

Nevertheless, the general history enables a reinterpretation of document:

> [...] History has changed its position on the document: it considers as its primary task, not interpret to it, but rather, it says not determine the truth or what is its expressive value, but works it inside and produces it: it organizes, cuts, sells, and distributes commands in levels, establishes series, distinguishes between what is relevant and what is not, identifies elements, define units, describes relations. The document, therefore, is not more to the history, this inert matter through which tries to reconstruct what the men did or said, what is past and that leaves only traces: it seeks to define, document the tissue itself, units, sets, series, relations. It takes off the history with the image it reveled long and why anthropological found its justification: the collective memory of an ancient and which used material documents to rediscover the freshness of its memories, it is working and the use of a documentary materiality (books, texts, stories, records, minutes, buildings, institutions, reg> ulations, techniques, objects, customs, etc..) that always has and everywhere, in every society, forms of stays, whether spontaneous, either organized. The document is not the happy instrument of a history that would be in itself and in its own right, memory, history is, to a society, a way of giving status and preparation for mass document that it does not separate [32]. (free translation)

5. "Pai Contra Mãe", Law And History

In Pai contra Mãe, Machado focuses mainly on the issue of the name of the characters, Clara and Cândido, as irony to the purity of that social class. Machado de Assis, masterfully, focuses on the misery of the characters, showing that Cândido and Arminda, the slave - both cannot afford a real choice in life: one is involved in misery - and slave-hunting needs, the other undergoes slavery. Nevertheless, it shows that Cândido would still have the possibility of seeking a job, which he does not do. The storyteller also shows the disadvantage of the black woman at the time. Those characters - and this tale - show the average speech of the time (in a speech analysis), because they do not represent "Cândido" and "Arminda", but rather, the allegory of the time.

In regards to the legal situation of the time, what the laws depict does not necessarily reflect social expectations; they may be merely the result of political articulations. Rules, coolly observed, do not reveal the result of human cruelty or kindness. It is undeniable that there is more history outside rules and judicial decisions. Rules do not reveal moral and financial helplessness that blacks were submitted. In Brazil, at the time of the Lei Áurea[33], freed slaves went through many difficulties, but law, per se, did not favor this view, which is important for Brazil's memory consolidation. Returning to the story, this is reflected in the question: why did Cândido's son have more rights to be born than Arminda's child? Legal reports do not show these abandoned children, sometimes not even history does. It is only through literature that it is possible to see and understand these children, because the approach of literature gives the density of characters and allows analyzing the average discourse of the time.

Law can be considered history, rearranged within an analysis general history, identifying reconnections between sets, and being a very specific (and short) cut of a period of time within the law. Law, in general, is considered the fruit of the history, though it does not exactly match the historical period that it was drawn up, but on the previous. If one is to consider law as the set of laws, principles, decisions or case law, and history as a set of facts reorganized as Foucault, and associated disciplines such as sociology, philosophy, and some methods of analysis, law can be considered history. Law can be understood as a narrative of a nation, especially if analyzed from the perspective of literature, which adds information that are just captured by literature, as the density of characters, context, environments, scenarios, anguish [34]. Clearly each ratio analysis is a closed universe, demanding, sometimes, different literary text(s) case by case.

Conclusion: Law And History, the addition of Literature

History can indeed then, be considered as Law, in a limited time (general history) period, provided that one takes into account that law is the sum of the rules, principles and decisions, and an examination of a specific point in history. Moreover, it must be added to this analysis disciplines as literature, philosophy and sociology, taking care to not fall into the history of ideas, as Foucault well warns.

As already said by Anthony Smith[35], "no memory, no nation". The study of law whilst reporting cannot be divorced from history, sociology, or philosophy - it is that which gives them the ideological bias of the season and lead to knowledge. This perspective makes (or should make) judges and legislators increasingly responsible for their acts, as today is written in people's past, and it is through these reports that people will be remembered.

The role of Literature in promoting and effecting Human Rights

Laura Degaspare Monte Mascaro

Abstract: Goal: Firstly, this work intended to re-signify human rights, by interpreting freedom and equality from existentialism philosophy grounds, in a way that is sensitive to the existential essence of man; meaning that freedom and equality could be translated in authenticity and concern for others. Secondly, the present work intended to analyze the role of literature in promoting human rights, by its educational capacity, and of effecting these rights, by allowing the experience of freedom, authenticity and recognition into the life of those who come into contact with it. Material and Methods: The present work is strictly theoretical research. The material corresponds to the bibliography read principally under the hermeneutical method. We had no intention of going through the entire work of any specific author, but to accomplish a selective approach of the authors and their work, in terms of their contribution to the theme and perspective here adopted. The proposed theme raises an interdisciplinary approach which many times can find itself at the frontier between human rights, philosophy and literature. For this reason it has been necessary to examine the bibliography in a manner that allows a harmonious connection between the ideas brought by the texts, only possible by means of a creative and dialogical approach. Thus, theoretical andliterary texts could dialogue and validate themselves mutually.* Conclusions: We could conclude that literature acts by its way of being as an event and experience that is incorporated in the existence of writers and readers, as a way: (i) of understanding the world and building authentic personality and human ethics; (ii) of discourse and dialogue with another and with tradition, by the fusion of horizons and sharing of world views. Therefore, literature plays an important role in forming personality, ethics and the way of being of individuals, so that people are able to be-in- the-world and share it in an authentic manner, by allowing the comprehension and understanding of human rights in a familiar way, which makes sense in their existence.

I- Introduction: Re-thinking Human Rights

Philosophy of Law has always struggled to promote and effect established rights, based not only on the normative relation, but also on the axiological content of the provisions. Such movement is followed by the human rights, which, as we know, are in the precise moment to be made effective. It is fundamental, in this sense, to raise a question about which ways to promote human rights pay attention to the preservation and rescue of the humanity of men, and further, how can we characterize this humanity, considering the many attempts made by philosophy over time.

It is worth remembering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights wasn't primarily directed to the states, but to every individual and every organ of society, breaking, therefore, with the classical division between the state that ensures the protection and respect of rights and the civil society, which had been built by a Revolution of the bourgeois, from which derived the human rights of an egoistic man (MARX, 1975, pp. 25-30). In fact, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights points out to promoting human rights through education and development of human personality, in light of the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms[1].

Keeping this in mind, we intend to develop a proposal of interpreting freedom and equality principles governing human rights, having been enunciated in Article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, by existential phenomenology. Philosophy of Law must look beyond the subject of right inherited from legal positivism so that it can (re)think and (re)signify law and justice. Therefore, it is crucial to introduce the question of who we are for and at the Philosophy of Law (CHUEIRI, 2004, p. 61).

Re-signifying human rights is important considering that law exists only when it is applied and its implementation meets the comprehensive, temporal and historic horizon (MAMAN, 2003, p. 108). Only through dialogue with human rights tradition that speaks to us, mainly through the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, we will be able to conduct an interpretation attentive to the passing of time and to human contingency.

Human Rights validity and, consequently, its effectiveness are only going to be possible with the overcoming of the distance of time by performing a reading according to the sensitivity of the present. This places the interpreter closer to human rights (MAMAN, 2003, p. 110), which will be recreated and will be made present in every time. Only by these means their continuity and universality will be secured, by accompanying human historical move.

To re-think the past that speaks through these rights and, from a certain detachment, impart a project of sense suited to the existing human being are forms of exercising human freedom on the way to an ethics more authentic and appropriate to different times and places.

The issue that will rise from this hermeneutic undertaking is on the impact of such interpretation on promoting the human rights. Men's way of being is historical, thus, contemplates changing culture and values, also due to periodical ruptures and attempts to re-think tradition. Accordingly, human rights are a mutable class, derived from contextual choices. Because of that, a cast of posed rights in a certain historical moment goes through multiple crises of signification over time and through the process that leads to their fulfillment. Nevertheless, the question of human rights' grounding shouldn't be relegated to the position of taboo, and should be taken up every time in a philosophical way, even if it is not possible to reach a final, singular foundation.

To re-thing the past and tradition that have been carried with these rights is to give human rights a project of sense adequate to the existing man. Both secularism and non-essentialism demonstrate that the 1948 declarants didn't blindly follow the illuminist precedent; yet followed to some extent their own course. Critics that interpret the articles of the Declaration through a strictly essentialist or rationalist prism undertake a very limited interpretation of the document (MORSINK, 1999, pp. 296-302).

One way to escape the essentialist formula is, as proposed, to investigate how freedom and equality can be seen from an existentialist perspective. Thereby, the investigation on human rights' grounding, having as source value the human being, would take the dasein, as man in its existence, as a starting point.

Considering that the strictly essentialist view of human rights pacts with humanism, such a perspective would be fundamentally compromised with traditional metaphysics; which, by the way, is oblivious to the question of being. The task of thought would be: from a new impulse evoke the humanitas of the homo humanus and from this point find its foundation (HEIDEGGER, 2005, pp. 21-25). This new, though so original impulse approaches man in its relationship with the aletheia, being man the one that emerges from itself, so that in this bloom, and due to it, receives the verb[2]. At the verb[3] man relates to the environment where he lives.

The living being, which is the man, is the one determined by the blossoming and opening. Such Greek determination of the essence of men soon was changed by roman understanding: man became animal and ratio, and in modern thought the essence of subjectivity, namely, men's selfness, was reason.

One can infer from the dasein that men experience themselves previously to the cognition that all the experiences are theirs. Thus, the dasein behaves toward its being, this meaning: the essence of man rests on its existence (weise-zu-sein). Heidegger intends to redirect our understanding of what it is to be a person from self-conscience to how we live our lives.

Heidegger wishes to explore a more fundamental way of self-conscience and unveiling than traditional moral philosophy is used to do by the notion of responsibility and imputation: a sense of identity that underlies the awareness of convictions, commitments, thoughts and responsibilities. Thereby, being a person means to project someone to be, the reason why our being is an issue to us. Our life matters to us, even when we neglect it. To live is to answer the question of identity. However we do not confront the question of who we are by thinking about ourselves, but simply living a human life, experimenting. Who we are is prior and more fundamental than what we are responsible for. Thus, there is no objection to the development of a philosophy of ethics consistent with Heidegger's thought.

[2] The essence of the verb is that it allows the being to appear and preserves what is presented, which means: which is uncovered as such. The being manifests primordially through the verb (HEIDEGGER, 2008, p. 114)

[3] The essence of men, therefore, inhabits the relating to the beings as such trough the verb. As the being of men, the essence of the verb is grounded in the essence of truth and belongs to it; the true verb in the sense of the aletheia is the myth and the epic (HEIDEGGER, 2008).

The question of identity also permeates our relationship to others: in the measure that I care with who I am, I also care for who others are. This will become clearer when we explore the interdependence between the rights to freedom and equality.

Given contingency and vulnerability as characteristics of the existing human being, we can understand how human rights can be defined by the possibility of contingent and flexible interpretations trough time and space, which, however, are actual at each present and dialogue with tradition. Even because, despite man's contingency and conscience of its finite existential situation, he is the only one that can be elevated, in some extent, above the world that surrounds him. He is able to expand his worldview, explore possibilities - which are a mixture of his ability of creating and of the world itself -, and to find paths so that his being endures beyond his existence. Besides that, relating to other people and other times carries the possibility of taking his identity beyond himself and coming in contact with new horizons.

Therefore, human rights' universality rests precisely on its particularism. The tension between universalism and recognition of the cultural diversity of the world is dissolved from the moment one recognizes that plurality and diversity is the most universal feature of human beings.

Human rights, therefore, would promote the legal conditions and assurances for the existing human being to fulfill its identity in a wide range of possibilities, which also would admit the choice for authenticity. Rights to freedom and equality would acquire new meaning. Equality would abandon its formal siege to be materialized. However, this realization would depend on the openness and recognition of the other, and, by consequence, on the pre-occupation towards him. Freedom, in its turn, would no longer lie on the assumption of free disposal of nature and men, and would become the possibility of projection of our own authentic identity beyond the public opinion, facing and sometimes overcoming contingencies.

However, the fulfillment of our own identity towards possibilities and above the surrounding world would depend on a few elements. Firstly, of broadening understanding and, thereby, the horizon and worldview of individuals, which would directly reflect on the investigation of their identities and of the role to be played by them in the world, beyond the possibilities offered by the public opinion and by the Anyone. Secondly, it would depend on the proper material and social conditions for the fulfillment of such an identity project.

When the conditions for self-empowerment (of one's own being) are assured, as well as the conditions for the authenticity that fits a social context of equality in the terms proposed[4], the rights to freedom and equality are on their way to being fulfilled. As we saw earlier, freedom is essential to man understood as the existing human being; and such freedom takes place in the determination of identity as we live our lives. The existing human being, nevertheless, has the way of being-with, which determines who the dasein is, its identity, is wattled with the identity of others, since they share the world and the truth.

Therefore, we do not intend to describe a particular content of freedom and equality, yet we are posing the question of the ideal conditions for the existing human being to choose and live its identity in a wide range of possibilities, which would also bear the possibility of coming as close as possible of an authentic existence.

We must recall that one of the main foundations of the totalitarian regime was the opposition between the bureaucratic state and the totality of the people; the persecution to the enemies of the enemies of the state was restless and the entire people became suspect, being held under vigilance and complete submission. As a consequence, a radical policy of isolation of the individuals was elaborated based of systematic delation. According to Comparato (2006, p. 369), "such collection of individuals, mandatorily separated from each other – since all are potential betrayers (crime of intent) -, makes an uniform mass, composed of equal unities, perfectly fungible and, therefore, susceptible to mass extermination". Again appears isolation and uniformity as elements that create ideal conditions for the terror of state to flower, which are nothing more than the notion of das Man (the Anyone) forged by Heidegger taken to its verge.

Considering this proposal of re-thinking human rights, what would be the spirit of the education aimed at their fulfillment? And with this question comes another concern: of interpreting and re-signifying the declared human rights, so that they can keep current and be present in every context, in every existential situation where they are brought to, authentically.

[4] As recognition - of the plurality of men, and of the other - as determinant to the definition of one's identity. Also, equality of conditions and opportunities that can allow the exercise of freedom as a way to the fulfillment of human potentialities and possibilities, which, however, are exercised in the being with another and being in the world, which is shared.

To ensure that the education proposed humanizes in a profound sense and that it is integrated to the existence of every man, it should intend to be not a formal education, but the true formation (bildung) (GADAMER, 2007, pp. 44-47).

The formation, since the Greek Paideia, intended to educate through the ethics of men, not meaning the teaching of values, but posing the question of their identity and of their way of being that would come to define the paths and purposes traced by all. There is no biggest conviction than that forged on ethical grounds. It this way we prevent the objectification of the human rights values, because to define a value is to objectify it, leaving no room for hermeneutics (GADAMER, 2007, p. 50).

Evidently, the concept of formation won a lot with existentialist theories. In them, education leaves behind the concept of knowledge as an objectification relationship, aiming towards the domination of nature, of truth and of the other, while becomes a rescue of the pre-occupation with existence, recovering the essential relationship of man with speech and with the being, in other words, man once again has a more primordial sight of the world, that was covered by oblivion of the truth of the being and replaced by the technical-scientific.

Accordingly, the ethical debate passes to the foreground, caring the man for his identity, for who he is while thrown in a world he shares with others.

II – Literature as a source of humanization and authenticity

Here, literature comes in, with its way of being that, according to Antonio Candido (2004, p. 176), "doesn't corrupt nor edifies, but freely bringing in itself what we call good and what we call evil, humanizes in a profound sense, since it makes us live." At this point, bringing a passage of Arendt's Eichmann in Jerusalem can help us illustrate how literature is not materially necessary for men, not even for them to live their lives at the space of medianity, however can be essential for overcoming this condition:

> Eichmann's best opportunity to show this positive side of his character in Jerusalem came when the young police officer in charge of his mental and psychological well-being handed him Lolita for relaxation. After two days Eichmann returned it, visibly indignant; "Quite an unwholesome book" – Das ist aber ein sehr unerfreuliches

> Buch" – he told his guard. (…) The longer one listened to him, the more obvious it became that his inability to speak was closely connected with an inability to think, namely, to think from the standpoint of somebody else. No communication was possible with him, not because he lied, but because he was surrounded by the most reliable of all safeguards against the words and the presence of others, and hence against reality as such. (ARENDT, 2006, p. 49)

I believe she was talking about the ability to think and judge. Isn't it curious to think that Eichmann had such relationship with literature? Because when we take a look at Lolita, we see that is a fictional story that is narrated in the first person. In other words, you are compelled to put yourself in the perspective of the narrator, as despicable and pathetic as he may be. As this is an exercise not only of the ability to think, of the original logos, but of the ability to judge as well.

But how can literature's way of being provide an ethical experience of freedom?
