Norms, Semantics and Ontology

Wagner de Campos Sanz, PhD[1]

Abstract: Standard deontic logic has assumed that a norm is a proposition obtained by applying a deontic operator (obligatory, forbidden, permissible) – expression of an "ought to be" – to another proposition. This analysis assumes that norms are propositions expressing duties, or "ought to be" propositions. Hintikka is a former proponent of the idea.

Norms as "ought to be" propositions is not a particular conception of XXth century logicians. Philosophers like Hume and law philosophers like Kelsen, although not sharing the same point of view, also understood that the expression of a duty is essentially the expression of an "ought". Both have stressed the distinction between "is" and "ought". Most of the interpretations understood such contraposition as one between "to be" and "ought to be".

From the point of view of formal (Kripke) semantics, "ought to be" propositions are interpreted in a way that depends of a framework of possible worlds in which some of them are ideal worlds. In ideal worlds, norms are ideally valid, i.e., always fulfilled. This concept is close to utopia. The applicability of Kripke semantics to deontic logic thus requires models with a distinguished non-empty set of possible worlds, the ideal worlds.

However, it is questionable that norms are expressions of "ought to be's". We claim that Castaneda – mainly in Thinking and Doing – has the merit of defending an alternative analysis of duties in terms of "ought to do" in a broad philosophical analysis of practical reason. We are going to consider it in what follows.

*Keywords: ought to do, ought to be, norm, semantics, deontic logic, philosophy of law, philosophy of language, practical philosophy

1. Introduction

It seems to be a common feature of human cultures the concept, or idea, of an ideal world. It may be a world to be attained by means of some special practices or even a world impossible to achieve during a life time, maybe in the "after life".

Human culture and Christianity, in particular, have many times assumed de existence of an ideal world. The concept of an ideal world has been part of a cultural framework intended for explaining and giving sense to our universe. As a consequence, because of the characteristics of this ideal world, directives for human and social action were often shaped having it as a telos. Our supposed ancestors were expelled from Paradise because of their supposed inappropriate behavior. And this is why we now suffer and live in an imperfect world depending on our own labor. The after death ideal world will be a joyful world for the chosen. And to be chosen depends on the behavior on earth, depends on following certain directives.

It is not necessary to keep going on describing this well known metaphysics, with its accompanying "metaphysical history". This is not our objective. We want to point to the fact that when considering human behavior this metaphysical picture of an ideal world seems very entrenched, even in sophisticated philosophical explanations. No wonder then if historically the analysis of ethics and morals makes reference to this concept of an ideal world as a basic feature. To put it bluntly, it has been generally assumed that a moral rule has to be followed because this is "the" mean to achieve a supposed higher good, a better world or even to be chosen for living in the perfect world.

Paying attention to our reality it is surprising that the concept of an ideal state of affairs still plays a role in our thinking concerning legal systems, morals, ethics, etc. It is true, and we cannot deny, that many of our social rules are shaped having in mind the production of certain effects, supposedly desirable effects, although only effects happening in this imperfect world. But the picture reveals to be misleading when we apply ourselves to consider human experience with legal and regulatory systems. What kind of higher good is attained when someone fills a form according to some prescribed legal rules? Filling a form in a wrong way may produce unpleasant legal results. Why then legal and moral norms should be linked to any kind of ideality?

As human social beings we have this strange ability to build institutions. Institutions are not physical entities, although some institutions may "own" a few buildings. Institutions are not even volitional beings, although, we often talk about the will of an institution: the will of the Brazilian government, the will of the G8, etc.

It is true that historically there were moments in which the will of a person was confounded with will of a sovereign, as Louis XIV's old times. Nonetheless, this is at most an historical accident. Institutions are essentially structured around a normative code, be them social clubs or parliaments. So, we can ask, in what sense the norms of a social club are designed envisaging an ideal world or a higher good? Why the fact of someone following norms of a social club, are supposed to be related with an ideal world? At least, if we want to maintain an explicative role for the concept of an ideal world, we don't see why many of the legal rules should be considered a way of attaining higher goods.

One of the main philosophical movements of XXth century was analytical philosophy. More important than deciding to be pro or against it, we should recognize that it had a methodological impact over the philosophical practice and this impact consists mainly in considering the role of language and the use of language when dealing with old philosophical questions. The old descriptive metaphysics was too contaminated to serve the purpose of elucidation for some of the most important philosophical questions in western tradition. But the task is not finished. Even in deontic logic, the concept of an ideal world makes his way by the back door.

Instead of a metaphysical analysis of legal and moral directives what we should seek is a more down to the ground analysis of the ways we interact and use language when dealing with moral and legal directives. In this respect, the semantical and also pragmatical analysis of norms and imperatives should replace that old way of doing metaphysics. If the nature of norms corresponds to "ought to be's", then there will certainly appear some data providing confirmations for this semantical analysis.

To the question of what is a norm, you'll find different answers. Some of these answers consider commands to be norms too. This is a controversial point. Additionally, many authors have considered norms to be the expression of "ought to be's", some of them still alive. The core underlying idea is that deontic expressions when applied to propositions produce new propositions, i.e., propositions saying that something ought to be the case. For example, it ought to be the case that nobody smokes inside a public building is supposedly an explicitation of the meaning of the norm it is forbidden (for everybody) to smoke inside a public (government) building. However, we believe, there is room to doubt this explanation, since between a prohibition and its fulfillment there is a long road. Indeed, were it a correct analysis, almost all norms would never be fulfilled. Just one smoker between millions would make the norm false. But can we really say that the above norm is false? It belongs to Brazilian legislation, after all.

In our opinion, one author deserves attention for questioning this kind of explanation. He puts it in a different light. We are refereeing to Hector-Neri Castaneda, a philosopher from Guatemala that developed his career in EUA. In a nutshell, what he has done is just to propose in a number of writings to consider norms as "ought to do's" instead of "ought to be's". To be fair, he never said that there is no role for "ought to be's" in legal and moral questions. He just advocated the idea that norms should be primarily seen as "ought to do's" and this implies a different explanation of the semantics and the logic of norms. We observe that the author does not consider commands (imperatives) to be norms, although they are still expressions of "to do's".

Again, to be fair, we must recognize that Von Wright started in 1951 considering deontic logic to be related to "ought to do's" latter changing his point of view for the "ought to be's". Anyway, we consider his former deontic logic system not well succeeded and, maybe, the main reason is that he tried to reduce the concept of action to the concept of proposition.

There are good reasons for reading norms as "ought to do's". Imperatives are not norms, if norms are propositions, since imperatives are not propositions. In any case, norms contain deontic operators (obligatory, forbidden, etc.). Let's have a closer look.

2. Ought to do versus ought to be

The concept of proposition is a theoretical concept. Propositions are mainly aired by assertions. Propositions are held to be either true or false. Above all, their main use is a descriptive use. If we want to say that John bought a new car, we just say, using indicative mood, that John bought a new car, i.e., we describe a situation. And this description is related to a proposition. When the proposition is true, the description describes matters of fact.

Now, if norms are to be taken as propositions, in what sense are they descriptive? What do they describe? The answer akin to the "ought to be" point of view is to say that they describe a certain set of possible worlds. As a matter of fact, many times propositions are identified with sets of possible worlds, those sets in which the proposition is true. But that is not really an answer to the above question.

Let's consider that norms are like the following: it is forbidden to smoke inside public buildings or it is obligatory to use seat belt while driving are norms. What do they mean, if they are propositions?

Well, according to the mainstream tradition in deontic logic, those expressions of obligation refer to an ideality. If you don't use seat belt while driving this is because you live in an imperfect non-ideal world. In any ideal world (there is no reason to suppose that there is only one) all norms are respected, i.e., every driver, when driving, uses seat belt. An ideal world is then a kind of fiction, it is a world differing from the actual world and, there, all norms are respected. As a proposition, the norm it is obligatory to use seat belt while driving is true if and only if every world that can be accessed (can be viewed) from the actual world has it as a true proposition. Additionally, all ideal worlds are to be accessible from the actual world. In other terms, all designated ideal worlds are such that nobody drives without using seat belt in them.

In the above sense, the deontic operator obligatory is just a trick way of using the modal operator necessary (or necessarily). The mathematical machinery for dealing with the semantics of modal operators is interesting, but its application to deontic logic is no more than a trickery. In the end, we just reduce the explanation of the meaning of a norm qua proposition to the concept of a possible world. As currently used as it may be, the truth is that the very concept of a possible world is not a clear concept. And it should be questioned also if this concept really adds something to the explanation of what are norms. We have mathematical tools to deal consistently with possible worlds, but many questions at the philosophical core lie unanswered. If some stupid norm requiring us to fill a form with capital letters is to be understood as a description of an ideal world this world is everything except ideal. We may have good mathematics for dealing with the idea of ideal possible worlds, but it is nonetheless bad philosophy.

The answer to the above question – what a norm qua proposition describes? – is, therefore, that it describes a fictional world. It is true depending on the postulation of a (some) fictional world(s). We can call them utopia.

We remind that for some philosophers like Kelsen norms are not propositions or, at least, there is a reading of the sentences expressing them in which they are not interpreted as propositions but as commands. It seems a very difficult position, since the main verb in sentences expressing norms is customarily the indicative mood and this mood is normally used for conveying propositions, for describing, not commanding. The second reading, in which it is interpreted as a proposition, is really as a description of belonging. In this sense, a proposition saying that something is obligatory means that this very obligation belongs to some normative order.

Castaneda's analysis is a mix of pragmatical and semantical analysis. Let's consider the norm it is forbidden to smoke inside public (government) buildings. It seems clear that what is forbidden is something described by the (secondary) verb which appears in infinitive form: to smoke. The expression presenting what is forbidden is an expression used for describing kinds of actions, kinds of "doings". In the above case, a specific kind of smoking: smoking inside a public building. Only by means of a bad twist of the former sentence we read this norm as a norm concerning states of affairs: it is forbidden to be the case that someone smokes inside a public (government) building. In this twist the expression complementing the deontic operator is a proposition, i.e., an expression describing a state of affairs. However, it is very curious that the way norms are usually expressed does not make this propositional content clear. And we should ask: why not? Just consider the first and more natural formulation of the example above. Usually, norms contain an expression refereeing to actions as a kind, and not to states of affairs. The secondary verb in the norm is usually given in infinitive form. This is the starting point of Castaneda's analysis.

From Castaneda's point of view, a good semantical theory must accommodate a concept dealing with expressions that cannot be assimilated to propositions, as in the case of norms. There should be room in any semantical theory for expressions involving agents and actions which is not the result of a propositional copulation. In Castaneda's words there should be room for expressions that result from another kind of copulation: a prescriptional copulation. A norm like it is obligatory to use seat belt while driving is for the author the proposition we obtain when we apply the deontic operator obligatory to an expression expressing a prescription: to use seat belt while driving. More precisely, the corresponding prescription can be presented using the following (non-period) construction: everybody, to use seat belt while driving. Now comes two questions. What is the role of the deontic operator in this semantical analysis? After all, if norms are propositions the deontic expressions should have a specific role. Next question, do we have extra data not depending on the analysis of norms for giving support to the semantical concept of a prescription?

Starting with the last question, we do, is the answer. Indeed, the most basic way of expressing a prescription is by means of imperatives (commands). The fact that the command John, use the seat belt contains a name of an agent and also contains an expression used to refer to a well determined action being commanded means for our author that a kind of copulation has been practiced here bringing together in a whole an agent and an action. This whole is a prescription.

In support of his point of view we can easily realize that the above command is formulated by using a verb which is not in the indicative mood. Although the English sometimes does not make sharp syntactic distinctions on the respective moods, we nonetheless assume in cases similar to the above one that they are in the imperative mood. In other languages (Latin languages, for example) this distinction is more clear. Also, as propositions describe states of affairs, the preferential mood for their expressions is the indicative mood, not the imperative. As is well known, imperatives are neither true nor false. And prescriptions are also neither true nor false.

To be clear, the above prescription formulated as a command does not have a subject. The agent John is only invocated. It is to him that the command is directed "as a you" (and never "as he"). Or, yet, the action of using seat belt is not being predicated of John. It would be predicated if the statement were John is using the seat belt and in this case the name John would be used "as a he".

Now, going back to the example it is forbidden (for everybody) to smoke inside public buildings, Castaneda says that the deontic operator forbidden is being applied to what should be seen as a prescription: everybody, to smoke inside public buildings. Naturally, in the example, the prescriptional content is being precluded, and this is being indicated by the deontic expression forbbiden. The agents are identified by the quantifier and the action being prescribed (or, more precisely, being precluded) is the action of smoking inside public buildings. Summing up, prescriptions (or prescriptional contents) are the initial core around which norms are erected, and they are in a relation to linguistic acts of commanding (requesting, inviting, etc.) like propositions are in a relation to acts of assertion.

Concerning the first question then, the application of a deontic operator over a prescription (or prescriptional expression) has the effect of giving us a whole that becomes a proposition, i.e., an expression that has descriptive powers. Therefore, the answer to the second question – that concerning the descriptive content - can only be that the deontic operator somehow brings in "referentiality". It brings reference to a social context, to be more precise. Thus, the deontic operator forbidden is being used to indicate a reference to a certain state of affairs, a human or a social state of affairs. This explains why Castaneda postulates a sub-index attached to every use of a deontic operator. This index has the function of pointing to an aspect of the social reality. According to him, in the surface form, this index is, most of the time, implicit.

In our above example, the most explicit way of formulating the norm making explicit the social/institutional reality that goes hand in hand with the deontic operator is by means of an observation between commas. The index accompanying the deontic operator can be made explicit as follows: it is forbidden, according to Brazilian law, to smoke inside public buildings. In other words, according to Castaneda's theory, the above norm is exactly equivalent to the following proposition: Brazilian law precludes smoking (for everybody) inside public buildings. We see then that what Castaneda calls a norm roughly corresponds to what Kelsen has named norm proposition. Of course, Kelsen's expression norm proposition is completely redundant from Castaneda's point of view. There is no way of reading a norm like it is forbidden to smoke inside public buildings as a command, according to our author, contrary to what Kelsen intended. Naturally, we can extract directives for action from a norm, but norms are not commands.

Of course, the point of view delineated assures applicability of logic to norms, since they are propositions. However, the author goes beyond and claims that principles of logic also apply to prescriptions. But we are not going to consider this question here.

Castaneda considers that commandment acts could also be taken as part of the social reality in such a way that a norm may refer to this act. For example, if someone commands John, arrest Mary, then, depending on the relative authority of who issued the command, we can describe the situation by using a deontic proposition, or norm, like it is obligatory for John, according to authority X, to arrest Mary. What seems beautiful in this description is that norms are truth bearers and the truth of a norm depends on the fact of X being really an authority plus the fact and that X really issued the command. And these are social facts, socially determined, in this imperfect world. There is no need to make fictions in order to explain the truth of a norm. In more detail, if the person that issued the command has no authority at all, then it is completely false to say that it is obligatory for John to arrest Mary. Also, if nobody issued the command to arrest Mary, the norm is equally false. Therefore, falsity of a norm does not depend on it being fulfilled in an ideal world.

Going back to the smoking example. There is a norm in Brazilian law forbidding smoking inside public buildings. Therefore, the norm it is forbidden for John to smoke inside public buildings is a norm obtained by (logical) instantiation from the more general norm, the one belonging to Brazilian law. As such, John can clearly devise a directive for action for himself taking as a basis this instantiation of the norm. And, if he decides to be on the legal side, he will abstain of smoking inside public buildings. It does not seem correct to say that John is imperatively commanding himself. The reason is, according to a grammatical observation, there is no verb conjugation for the first person singular in the imperative.

There is a point where we diverge from Castaneda's explanation. It is where he seems to imply that underneath every true deontic proposition, or norm, there is a command issued by an authority. It seems to us perfectly plausible that other kinds of social events might well serve the purpose of anchoring a norm, making it true. Although a legal authority may say I now pronounce you (to be) husband and wife the same authority may also pronounce you are now legally married. Both cases are acts of fiat, the first one might be interpreted, with some effort, as a command, but not the second, since its verbal form is clearly in the indicative mood. Also, the fact that a law has been promulgated doesn't mean that a command has been directly issued, only that a norm has been made valid by a legal authority, be it a parliament, a president, etc. This is what we could name authority fiat. By means of authority fiats we can create social reality, institutions as well, which by its turn will serve to anchor a true norm. And these fiats are not necessarily commandments. By its turn, from a legal point of view, authorities are empowered also by authority fiat. However there is no infinite chain of authorities. The first empowerment is an act of sheer power.

3. Consequences of the paradigm "ought to do".

Since its formulation, standard deontic logic has been plagued with many paradoxes. A great deal of this paradoxes involves a principle according to which the deontic operator obligatory distributes over implication, i.e, if p and q are propositions and O is the deontic operator, then the following is an axiom of standard deontic logic: $O(p \supset q) \supset (Op \supset Oq)$.

From Castaneda's point of view this is a wrong axiom. And it is wrong because of the "ought to be" interpretation of deontic propositions or norms. Since deontic operators should not be applied to propositions but only to prescriptions, then the axiom should be reformulated as: $O(P \supset Q) \supset (OP \supset OQ)$, where P and Q are now prescriptions. This apparently simple semantic move is very powerful; it solves many paradoxes, although not all of them. The author himself was obliged to extend further his framework to deal with situations in which we have an action inside a more complex prescription like in the action of cooking slowly. If it is obligatory to cook béchamel sauce slowly (in order to be successful, let's say), then what is obligatory in this case is not the action of cooking but the act of doing it slowly. However, it is not clear that such a move can solve all problems. Also, it seems to us necessary now to develop more deeply the notion of what is, from a semantical point of view, an action. And this can be very complex.

Even if Castaneda's theory is only partial, it still has the merit of pointing to the fact that deontic operators usually operate not over propositions but over a different kind of semantical items: prescriptions. This is why deontic operators should be seen as "o*ught to do's*". If norms are propositions containing deontic operators which are pointing to a social reality or to an institutional reality is yet a subject open to discussion. But the starting point is good. Indeed, when someone tells us that something is obligatory, it seems a perfectly rational and well suited behavior to ask which authority is behind such an obligation.

From our point of view, Castaneda's proposal is a huge turn in the whole tradition of ethical studies, because the notion of "ought to be" has now lost its privileged place. If the claim is correct, then norms (and also commands), although being issued by someone having an intention backing it, are no more easily connected to the idea of an ideal world to be reached or the idea of a higher good. That moral rules and part of the legal rules where produced with the intention of giving us a better world to live is something that nobody would deny. Nonetheless, it is not true that all moral norms and legal norms are really a way of bringing to the horizon a better world. Not even to consider ideal worlds as a fiction helps anything. After all, we cannot be assured beforehand that the whole of legal norms (or moral norms) being considered as valid, as holding at some region in space and time, that they form a consistent set of norms. If they are not consistent, no such ideal world is really possible. The fiction is aborted before starting.

Experience shows that we indeed find ourselves in situations in which we have conflicts of duties. To believe that every conflict can be solved by an analysis of the norms involved is a belief that has no empirical support and it cannot also be a principle of pure reason. Therefore, if norms were expressions of "ought to be's", then it might be the case that there is no ideal world corresponding to some set of norms, since this set is inconsistent. This consequence is deniable by those for whom norms are not propositions, since, then, logical principles would not be applicable.

If deontic operators in norms represent "ought to do's" and norms are propositions, then the question of authority comes to the fore front. A norm is true if it was really issued and the issuer had enough authority. When legal norms and moral norms were thought to be given or to be grounded either by a rational divine being, either by nature, either by pure reason, it is understandable that the obvious complement of the norm given was the respect that the norm should be involved in, and this respect is nothing more than the respect for the authority that issued it. Such marvelous beings like God, nature, angels or pure reason could not be doing wrong or doing evil, thus it would be better to follow their directives, either because they were good either because some punishment would be in the oven for sinners. But, when such a picture is no more capable of satisfying sharper minds, then the question of the authority that issues norms and directives becomes essential. There must be social ways of giving authority for norm issuers that are either minimally rational or minimally backed by experience. But this will never be iron rules. It is normal that authorities may undergo defiance on their status. Good authorities will stand up criticism or, at least, their critics will not fare better, more probably they'll fare worst, when issuing norms.

Now, regarding legal codes it is clear that Castaneda's concept of what is a norm applies only to a small fraction of the expressions in the code. But, first of all, it has to be kept in mind, a code is a code. That is, it is formulated as concisely as possible. Nonetheless, it is natural that some expressions in the code are not norms in the above sense, because they are, for example, definitions or declaration of principles. A faithfull examination of legal codes has to open room for other categories of expressions and, so, the work cannot be considered to be finished.

Questions of fact and questions of law
Distinction and consequences

Gabriel Cabral[1]
Luiz Felipe Teves de P. Sousa[2]

Abstract: This paper intends to argue that even though there is no clear test on how to differentiate fact from law questions, such evaluation is imposed on the ones who have to make decisions in judicial framework. In judicial practice, it is not a judge's role to promote speculative or theoretical discussion, but practical arguments that reach a decision. According to the Law motto, no judge can free himself from a decision about a conflict that was given to him by claiming that the question is somehow complex enough that could prevent him to use his technical knowledge and experience, nor yet pacified in the correspondent science field, in such a way that the own assistance from an expert can also become useless. The State, when provoked, can not abstain from giving an answer. Such problematic reality based on the obligatoriness of taking early decisions is common to both juridical traditions of the occidental world. While in the Common Law such questions have entailments in the division of appreciable subjects between Jury and Judge, and in the filtering of the questions that can be revised (questions of law); in the Civil Law, such questions focus on the restriction of subjects that would be appreciated by the appeal courts. Thus, as the distinction is essential, it is fundamental to research how it occurs. The jurisprudence is analyzing this question limiting it in three matrices: ontological, epistemological and analytical – classification presented by Allen and Pardo (2003). The first field regards the distinction of the nature of fact and law. The second examines if the epistemological objectives such as accuracy, justification and the separation of knowledge from mere belief, are different. Finally, the purpose of the third is to check if they can be differed as sets with mutually exclusive elements. If in none of these fields it could be possible to establish a grounded distinction, the only choice to those applicants would be a pragmatic one. In this sense, the line that divides the questions to be treated as of fact or law would be drawn by allocation. Finally, it will be analyzed how the higher Brazilian Courts have been facing this question. Which paths have been taken by these Courts to filter fact issues? Do these Judges have the democratic legitimacy to restrict the access to judicial review by establishing alone the paradigms to what they wish/can decide?

1. Introduction

This paper intends to bring the discussion about the difference between questions of fact and questions of law[3]. It will be considered how this dichotomy is treated by the jurisprudence and by the ones who operate it, as well as how it should be interpreted and what the solution is for its incongruence. Therefore, it will describe how the common understanding of this difference is, to then present how it ought to be done.

As a first step, we ought to present its importance. Both in the Common and Civil Law Tradition, the difference has two purposes: (i) serves as a line that filters matters of fact from appellate review[4]; and (ii) divides functions at a trial court – the jurors responsible for questions of fact and the judge for the questions of law. Despite serving these key doctrinal functions, it has been seen that this difference has not been understood as it should, especially by those who are obliged to use it in the daily judicial activities. In this sense, lawyers and lawmakers, in general, seem to neglect the jurisprudential effort to deal with this complex subject, and use those terms as their differentiation was obvious, devoided of any further analysis[5]. This mismatch between jurisprudence and decision makers, poles that should cooperate, is what intrigues us and makes us question: can a conceptual distinction elaborated by jurisprudence be sustained at a dynamic environment of the courts? In other words, can a priori difference – easy and simple enough – be elaborated and used by these?

[3] This discussion is about one of the most difficult distinctions to be determined in both law and jurisprudence, just as noted by MacCormick, in: MACCORMICK, N. Editor Preface (1999), Law and Philosophy, v. 18, p. 443.

[4] As an example, in Brazil, the Supreme Constitutional Court has as a precedent the following state: "Para simples reexame de prova não cabe recurso extraordinário" – STF, Súmula 279 –, it means that one cannot appellate for simple reexamination of proof.

To answer this question it is first crucial to realize that there is an immanent obstacle. The difficulty arises from the fact that it is not the role of judges to promote speculative or theoretical discussion, but to present practical arguments that must reach a concise and timely decision. This collision between the principles of correctness – here considered as a result that can be better achieved by a deep and unchained examination – and celerity is often problematic. Hence, judges are necessarily bounded to early and superficial decisions in contrast of an exhaustive analysis, otherwise made by academic theorists, about the complex of the difference. Henceforth, what can be done to solve this obstacle? In other words, is there a way to establish a conceptual differentiation, especially regarding the matter of the questions of fact and of law that could be easily understood and applied by the judges in their daily activities?

After exploring many authors, some sustaining that there is a qualitative difference between fact and law[6], it will be defended, otherwise, that the beginning of a solution for this puzzle can be found in a text of Ronald Allen and Michael Pardo. In the article Facts in Law and Facts of Law[7], they propound that the difference is nothing but an illusion and should be approached in terms of its allocation. It is understood that they have found a very persuasive way of treating this complex subject. They organized their enquiry dividing it in three matrices: ontological, epistemological and analytical. Our purpose is, by using their formula, which follows the main idea of simplicity and usefulness here sustained, to deepen precisely the first two. The third one will be left aside once it is not treated by the authors as a fundamental ground for a philosophical speculation, instead, gathered different theories designated as analytical and establish critical to them. Finally, it should be asserted that the methodology used here is the analysis of the arguments exposed by these authors in the cited paper, so it is possible to contribute to the ideas.

2. Ontological

Regarding the ontological matrice, a question should guide the study: could a difference be drawn that establishes a clear test to differentiate a fact from the law? To initiate the discussion, here is what Allen and Pardo consider a fact: "any proposition that has true value, that can exist in the world and be described in terms of its truth or falsity"[8]. Thereafter, why do they consider the law as a fact? They formulate two answers. In the first response, they argued that our linguistic practice just exposes this treatment. For instance, when we say "it`s a fact that the law A rather than law B applies to C", we`re implicitly saying that the law A exists and urges to be applied[9].

In the second response, they asserted that the law constrains the behaviors in the "real world". In this sense, we quote them: "drivers stop at stop signs, merchants honor contracts, and people refrain from punching those whom they dislike"[10]. So, they have concluded: "To say that law is factual, then, is to say that there is such a thing in the world referred to as 'the law', that the law 'exists', 'is', 'is one way rather than another', or that a given answer to a legal question 'is true', or 'is the case'"[11].

To consolidate the argument, they noted that the consideration of law as a fact is not a new one. In the tradition of the jurisprudence, classical positivists, when insisting on the thesis of separation law/morality, recognize the law as an inextricably social or institutional fact (for instance Bentham, Austin, Hart and Raz). Oppositely, those who reject the separation thesis also presuppose the law as a fact, in the way that the law is dependent or coextensive with the moral facts[12]. Despite agreeing with this behavior constraining characteristic of law, this argumentation should be taken into a deeper analysis. Considering the thesis of the social ontology of John Searle[13], this discussion would gain much in clarification and the simple assertion that the law is factual would be more grounded.

What is a social ontology? And, in that sense, why does the law constrain? First, it should be illustrated the idea of John Searle. Imagine somewhere a natural wall of rocks and that, one day, some people began to use this wall as a protection from other people. A division between two populations would arise ever since. Then imagine that, by the course of time, somehow this wall was destroyed until its complete disappearance. At that moment, despite the physical inexistence of the wall, the boundaries between the two populations were still recognizable and limit their moves. This example shows that humans do create new beings, and despite the new wall was ontologically subjective, only existing in the minds, it could be objectively known, as to say, it could be described by propositions with truth value. Thus, when lawmakers create a norm that will guide and constrain people's life, it exists in the same way as the wall, as both can limit the free will of a person, even if the first only exists due to its recognition by the majority of the population, while the other by its very physical properties. Henceforth, law exists due to its recognition and, in this sense, is a fact.

However, this outcome is not immune to critics. The American philosopher Frederick Schauer[14] argues that fact and law cannot be together in the same ground. According to him, fact is ontologically different from law. A fact would involve a description of an event and the law a prescription applied to a hypothetical fact, in a very simple way. While one describes what the world is, the other shows what it ought to be; while the first is in the realm of the fact, the other is in the realm of the value[15]. Thus, the problem would arise when lawyers try to use this simple ontological distinction in the practice. So, on one hand, his thesis is conceptually concise and clear: there is an ontological difference between fact and law; on the other, the author recognizes the ineptitude of the applicability of this thesis to establish a difference in the practice field. In other words, although it could be established a very schematic difference between fact and law, it is still very difficult to do the same operation to what concerns the distinction between a question of law and a question of fact.

The thesis that Schauer sustains, that law and fact are not the same, does not confront the main purpose of the present paper, as his analysis is correct only in a pure conceptual ground. To say that the law prescribes human behavior – and in Schauer`s sense not factual – does not affect its possibility to fit the status of a thing that can be truthfully described in the world – Allen and Pardo`s sense of fact –, which concerns its ground of existence. The linguistic nature of the law is not necessarily related to its existential possibility. Law, morality and politics are normative instances, but they can still be described truthfully objectively. In this sense, from the existential view of the discussion, it's almost fruitless try to differentiate something from a fact. A fact embraces anything that is real in world, even if it is real only through the minds.

An effort could be made to differentiate the approach of the subject, in other words, maybe the distinction propounded by Schauer, contrary to his own thinking, is the best approach regarding the criteria of applicability in the judicial daily activities. Hence, as easy as it can be, judges could separate the questions by the very nature of them: on one side, what regards descriptive thinking, on the other, prescriptive. The problem is that this thesis cannot survive once scrutinized and, as it will be shown, the conclusion that a fact is a being and law another, as they were ontologically different entities, is of less importance in the specific context of the differentiation of questions of law and fact.

In this subject, Maria Gascón Abellán's lecture[16] should be accentuated. Gascón argued that thinking about questions of fact as they are used in the Courts also includes considerations of value judgments. The author considers that in the judicial syllogism the minor premise deals with the individualization of what is prescribed in the hypothetical fact of the major premise. Regarding this hypothetical fact, Gascón proposes a division: external facts, psychological facts, and the ones that require evaluations to be relevant[17]. It can be seen that there is at least one situation that value considerations are required in the analysis of questions of fact. An example in this sense is the requisite of obscenity of a conduct to be able to engender legal consequences. In situations like these, triers of fact would have to determine what happened with purely practical or evaluative assessments about what is obscene and what is not. In this specific case, Schauer`s conceptual notion of the difference between fact and law, or fact and value, cannot be sustained when the matter of discussion is, otherwise, the legal fiction of the questions of fact and of law.

It can be seen that there are two possible approaches to the question regarding the ontological matrice: on one side, Schauer`s conceptualistic approach to the ontological matter, considering that fact and law are different; on the other side, Allen and Pardo`s existentialistic approach, that considers that there is no difference on the ontological level, considering law as a form of fact. As for what has been said so far, the effort made in this paper was to demonstrate that both approaches are viable and defensible, but considering the argument brought by Gascón it is clear that, considering the distinction between questions of fact and of law, the conceptual distinction cannot be sustained at the complex environment of the Courts. So, when concerning the practical instance, it is not possible to establish a differentiation between the two questions on the ontological level, i.e. as if they were referring to entities of different nature.

[16] ABELLÁN, M. G. Los Hechos en el Derecho: bases argumentales de la prueba (2010).

Going even further in the discussion, it will be demonstrated that the distinction is also insuperable due the very structure of the legal norm.

A rule, in its basic coercive structure, describes a generic and hypothetical fact. In example: "to kill is a crime". First, we have that "to kill" is related to a piece of the reality, once is a fact to which has been given relevancy in context of the law. Hence, it's a fact in law. "is a crime", on the other hand, refers to a fact of law, once it derives from a legal rule and is something created by humans and used especially by them. While the act of taking a life from another form of being, whether practiced by humans or bacteria is as old as the world we know, the act of making this natural fact something prescribed not to be done or prohibited is a particularly human activity.

Thus, humans can create realities that, as the reality created by the law, would be otherwise none existent in a world of bacteria. This relatively new fact known as law concerns many aspects of the life of its creators, the humans, and regulate what would be naturally not regulated. If the fact of law, a very unique and technical system of norms, different from other systems of norms that can be found in other social animals, has its own existence linked to a human characteristic to regulate almost every aspect of their lives to make it better, its formulation always refers to another fact. Then, the fact of law to fit its purpose must be inseparable to the other facts it makes reference, making necessarily a fact about a fact.

To follow the purpose of the paper, in a trial, a question of fact is always analyzed according to the hypothetical fact that was described in the law, as well as a question of law has its own existence dependent to the same factual hypothesis. For example, to kill someone is only important to be considered in a trial for its derivation from law, likewise, the determination if that killing action was a crime or not – a question of law consideration – is essentially derived from an individualized naturalistic fact that was proven occurred.

3. Epistemological

Once surpassed the ontological investigation, the epistemological remains to be analyzed. In this dimension, Allen and Pardo take their attention especially to the possible equivalence regarding the epistemic situation in the analyses of questions of fact and law. Accordingly, the authors assert that both evidences and inferential processes are alike[18].

First, regarding the evidences, it is considered that in both questions they are factual. Judges, just like jurors, would have a spectrum of conflicting evidence to work with and call upon different sources too. These would be legal doctrines, different laws and case laws. In this sense, they would have to deal with evidences too, but evidences of law. A juror analyzing the testimony of contradictory specialist would be as a variation in the legal doctrine about certain law or laws of the case.

Concerning the inferences, it is sustained that both questions are equivalent due to the fact that both are worried to achieve the same epistemic goals. These goals would be accuracy and differentiation of knowledge from mere belief, in the deal of the respectively evidences. Just as the triers of fact, judges would have the care to be precise and clear in theirs decisions, which is endorsed by the rule of law, the regime that this paper clearly focuses.

Although the conclusion of the authors is, as it will be shown further, precise, it is also noticeable that their argumentation could be deepened.

Regarding the evidence discussion, it could argue that, when it is considered judicial trials, there is no real conflict between evidences. This argument is sustained when one is considering that in the most of the cases, which are the ones that there is no appellation, the fact of law – a law or a case law – seems to be easily precised by the judge. In fact, in most of the cases, the ones that the news do not cover, that do not involve renowned attorneys or a very polemic matter, a judge simply adjudicates and no one appeal. In these daily occurrences, it seems like the facts of law when used are not controversial between them, like they have a nature of being undebatable, which exceptions are the very few cases that lawyers debate passionately to defend their positions.

[18] PARDO, Michael; ALLEN, Ronald. Op. cit. p. 162.

This assertion based on an empirical assessment that attributes to the nature of law the cause to the context hereby stated is but an illusion. Rules are never clear enough. Regarding this subject, Schauer argues that every norm has in its very nature the perspective to overinclude or subinclude factual situations[19]; moreover, they are written with an open texture[20]. Considering the essential controversial characteristic of the law, then, in a trial, a part only abstains to appellate due to its lack of interest, never due to a consent to an adjudication that represents an undoubtedly interpretation of the norm. Evidences of law are always controversial.

Regarding the epistemic goals, especially how they are the same when it is being considered what kind of worries should the decision makers be worrying about when analyzing questions of fact and of law, it could be introduced a new feature to the argument brought by the authors, which is the concept of different propositional attitudes.

In 1992, the philosopher Jonathan Cohen developed this notion of propositional attitudes. He asserted that belief is different from acceptance[21]. Belief would consist on an attitude of, when confronting some evidences, and only because of them, it creates an intuition, a feeling about the occurrence of an event. For example, when facing an evidence of a wiretapping, the trier of fact reaches the conviction of the guilty in a murder. This act is involuntary, because there is not a way to ignore the trigger of the conviction in the mind. When you believe in something, there is not a way to remove the thought. Furthermore, it is independent from the context, because it occurs in the same way anytime: when someone sees an evidence, he/she elaborates an immediate thesis about what happened.

On the other hand, acceptance is voluntary and dependent of the context. It consists on the attitude of, when in front of an evidence, having the capability to sustain a policy to include the reason prior to the determination of what has happened. As so, imagine the same situation described in the last paragraph. If it were proved that the wiretapping was obtained illegally, the consequence would be its exclusion from the consideration of the triers of the fact. In this case, although the trier would still believe in the guilty, he now needs to ignore his belief and only follow the path that is acceptable, the one that can be rationally justified. Acceptation is voluntary once it is a rational effort of choice, and it is dependent on the context, especially the judicial one, with its epistemic constraint mechanisms. There is a necessity of a different attitude in the determination of the facts, which goes beyond the simple analysis of evidences. In this sense, we can consider that while belief is truth-oriented, acceptance is goal-oriented. Then, there would be no conflict if a trier believe in something, but cannot accept it in a certain context.

Hence, it becomes clear that in face of the epistemic constraint in the Judicial System – that can exclude evidences, disqualify witnesses, etc. – the most virtuous propositional attitude, the one that achieves the maximum effort in the search of the truth, is the acceptance.

Then, should the judges hold an attitude of acceptance in the determination of the law, even though not subjected to the same constrains of the triers of fact?

In order to answer this question, we must consider what Manuel Atienza asserted in the context of a critic to the American realists. Legal reasoning also includes the context of justification, not only the context of discovery[22]. The first context refers to the need of a logical fundament for a decision and the last to the necessity to explain the causes that converges to that, like psychological and historical investigations.

Therefore, judges are also institutionally constrained in their decisions, not by rules of evidence, but for the need of a justification. They cannot use their psychological motivation as foundation, once they have to logically substantiate what they have decided. Thereby, while deciding about law, judges cannot use every law they simply want, once they are constrained to some choices that can be rationally justifiable.

This constraining environment of the legal trials whose consequence is a requirement of its actors to be in the specific proposition attitude of acceptance, for the analysis both questions of fact and of law, can be seen whether it is being considered the presence of the jurors or judges as triers of fact. Jurors for the reasons stated above, because of the exclusionary rules of the evidence law and judges due to their need to justify logically every aspect of their decisions, even when they are acting as triers of fact.

4. Conclusion

As it has been exposed, reaching a clear way to distinguish questions of fact from questions of law seemed to fail. We could not figure out any solution that could help judges in their challenge to define which each one is a prior among them in a more comprehensive way. If there is a difference, whether it is in the ontological or epistemological level, it is not certainly something uncontroversial or that could be easily sustained.

Beforehand, what we have left is the solution presented by Allen and Pardo: the pragmatic approach. Judges simply choose what they want to consider as reviewable, as well as what jurors should decide. It is not a technical decision, but political. For example, we bring a Gascon Abellan's observation: the non-observable characteristic of the psychological facts, like intention, desires, etc., are being considered value judgments and therefore not factual by the Spanish Supreme Court[23]. The author realized that this understanding had the solely objective to conduct the matter to be appreciated by the Spanish Courts, which would be denied by them otherwise.

The same manipulation – if it is considered the main thesis of the pragmatic difference between questions of fact and of law – also happens in Brazil. The Brazilian Supreme Court is currently adopting a new way to interpret the precedent[24] that refers to the filter of questions of fact. According to this precedent, questions concerning reexamination of proof (of questions of fact) cannot be reviewed since only a reevaluation could occur. It must be noticed that the rule is silent to what regards the concept of revaluation. Under the pretext of a legal difference between reexamination and reevaluation, judges and lawyers - the first aims to choose which questions to judge, the second the interests of their clients – are arguing that in some cases, it is possible for the Supreme Court to judge questions it was otherwise unable to do.

This arbitrary way of treating the distinction is not a new one. Dean Green, back in 1930, already asserted: "No two terms of legal science have rendered better service than 'law' and 'fact'. They readily accommodate themselves to any meaning we desire to give them. What judges have not found refuge in them? The man who could succeed in defining them would be a public enemy"[25]. As we can see, there is not a simple solution to the distinction and we think that the deciders themselves do not want to look for it.

[23] ABELLÁN, M. G. Op. cit.

[24] Same text of the precedent of note 2, but it is a different Supreme Court, which is responsible for nonconstitucional issues, named Supreme Tribunal Of Justice.

Furthermore, it is sustained that the real problem is with the terms that are used. Establishing a comparison between two entities, like it happens with the distinction between questions of fact and of law, with the term fact rooted on one of the sides is to give too much discretionary power to judges – which is probably the very goal of this distinction –, once the semantic of word "fact" can refer to almost everything. Whether it was intentional or not, what can be stated nowadays is that it is an inglorious enterprise that is serving only to arbitrariness.

Finally, since it has been given a description of what can be stated on both jurisprudential and practical analyses of the differentiation of question of fact and law, we would like to discuss the solution. Lawmakers, due to the democratic legitimacy have to prescribe how they think the judiciary should work, should, by their own forces, intervene in the very letter of this specific legal fiction. Instead of the dichotomy about the "question of fact" versus "questions of law", it should be between "questions of what the lawmakers dictate to be tried by jurors" versus "questions to be tried by judges" and, in the same way, what issues could be revisited and what could not. It would be the end of the confusion and of the possibility of arbitrariness of its use by judges.

As an afterthought, there would be still two other possible formulations regarding equivalences between these: one about the inferences practiced by their respectively triers, as we think both start with an adductive reasoning; other, taking account studies made by both Barbara Spellman and Frederick Schauer, concerning the possible difference between jurors and judges capacities to deal with evidences. But these are discussions for a next opportunity.

Lights, camera, jurisdiction
Communication technology and the myth of transparent justice in Brazil

Joana Machado de Souza[1*]

Abstract: This paper approaches televising judicial proceedings as a relatively recent innovation adopted by the Federal Supreme Court of Brazil and examines its possible effects on judicial activity. Initially, it explores the bureaucratic conception of judicial activity from a classic civil law framework, in order to point out how it has been undermined by the contemporary global expansion of judicial power and therefore to contextualize the current claims for judicial transparency and accountability. The paper provides an overview of how, when and why we started to broadcast live, through "Justice TV", the debates of the Federal Supreme Court of Brazil, highlighting the contrast between American judges resistance to and Brazilian judges optimism about cameras in the respective Supreme Courtrooms. Ultimately it is argued that television judicial proceedings can give the public the sense of participation in an extremely important governing activity, if only by observing it, nevertheless it adds the risk that judges will tailor their actions in a populist direction, thereby undermining some of the value of (particularly) constitutional review.

the Supreme Court of the United States, in Brazil we are completing a decade of "Justice TV", an experience which to a certain extent puts the country at the forefront of the administration of the legal service.

Among the judges of the U.S. Supreme Court, there is great concern about the possible impact of television cameras on the functioning of the institution[3], which largely contrasts with the positive tone of the balance so far made in Brazil on the exercise of doing justice before the cameras[4].

Justice TV is a non-profit-making public television channel, run by the STF (Federal Supreme Court), the highest organ of the Brazilian Judicial Power. It was made possible as a result of Law 10461 of May 2002, curiously sanctioned by a member of the STF, Minister Marco Aurélio, who, during the government of Fernando Henrique Cardoso, had the role of Acting President of Brazil[5]. Since the law anticipates the need to reserve a channel for the Supreme Court to divulge acts of the judiciary and other correlates, Justice TV began on August 11, 2002, becoming the first broadcasting station in the world to show a schedule exclusively related to the judiciary.

In order to provide transparency and bring constitutional justice closer to society, this cable TV channel broadcasts live trials and public hearings of the court, among other initiatives such as news programmes, news bulletins, educational programs, interviews and debates. Over this last decade, with the same purpose, Justice Radio (2004) and the institutional channels "STF on YouTube" and "STF on Twitter" have also been created.

Among the innovations constructed and/or adopted by Brazil to divulge the acts of the Judiciary, Justice TV is by far the greatest gamble, especially since it allows people to see and hear, in real time, trials in the Supreme Court, without needing to travel to the capital, or even leave home.

But what is the scope of this innovation? What is the appeal of the liturgy and the stage wings of a decision-making process of the judiciary for anyone other than the parties directly involved?

2. Legal traditions and distinct conceptions of judicial activity

If times were others, of insulation of the judiciary from politics[6], there would be little point in investing so much in bringing society and judges closer together. In countries historically more inclined to the legal tradition of Civil Law[7], as is the case of Brazil, the cult of certainty, safety and truth[8] by means of codification condemned judicial activity, for a long period, to a bureaucratic and mechanical nature, referenced to the past. This is perfectly understandable if we consider the strong influence of the French revolutionary process about this normative understanding of the judge as the "mouth of the Law".

After the experience of an aristocracy in robes[9], France cultivated certain hostility to the figure of the judge[10], and made sure that the [7] I have adopted, on this point, a distinction between legal system and legal tradition, on the lines proposed by Merryman and Pérez-Perdomo: "a legal system, as that term is here used, is an operating set of legal institutions, procedures, and rules […] in a world organized into sovereign states and organizations of states, there are as many legal systems as there are such states and organizations […] a legal tradition, as the term implies […] rather it is a set of deeply rooted, historically conditioned attitudes about the nature of law, about the role of law in the society and the polity, about the proper organization and operation of a legal system, and about the way law is or should be made, applied, studied, perfected, and taught. The legal tradition relates the legal system to the culture of which it is a partial expression. It puts the legal system into cultural perspective" MERRYMAN, John Henry; PÉRES-PERDOMO, Rogelio. The Civil Law Tradition: an introduction to the legal systems of Europe and Latin America. 3 ed. [8] Civil Law is the oldest and most widespread legal tradition, marked by the ideology of encoding, that is, by the intention to concentrate in one single document (the code) without competition, all the reasons of Law, in a process of the production of truth. See: GARAPON, Antoine; PAPAPOULOS, Ioannis. Julgar nos Estados Unidos e na França: cultura jurídica francesa e Common Law em uma perspectiva comparada. Translated by Regina Vasconcelos. [9] "Before the French Revolution, judicial offices were regarded as property that one could buy, sell, and leave to one's heir on one's death. Montesquieu himself inherited such an office, held it for a decade, and sold it. The judges were an aristocratic group who supported the lands aristocracy against the peasants and the urban working and middle classes, and the centralization of governmental power in Paris". separation of powers would give long service to the insulation of the judiciary from politics. Under the empire of this depoliticized conception of the judge, it was logical to defend the institutional independence of the Judiciary with regard to society itself, in view of the web of the most varied private interests. It was for good reason that the Goddess of Justice, blindfold and equidistant from conflicting interests, conferred such a perfect aesthetic synthesis to the Judiciary – even if only provisionally.

Immersed in another legal culture, the U.S. laid down a very different relationship between judges and politics. The judiciary was not the target of the American Revolution, but an ally of individuals in the fight against the abuse of their rulers[11], consolidating itself since then, though not linearly, as a natural and necessary character in the political scene, in the deepening of the democratic process.

But countries that had fed for years not only on the practice, but on the ideology of codification and on the consequent mechanistic idea of judicial activity, have got used to the political-institutional framework in which the legislator deliberates about the future; the administrator or the executive deals with current problems in a way delimited by the law, and the judge acts guided by the past (a dated decision by the legislator, conveyed by law)[12].

For the construction of the Welfare State, this repertoire was insufficient. The role of the state needed to acquire the sense of planning, that is, a political process with a view to the transformation or consolidation of a certain socio-economic structure, of a certain political structure, which would not be possible with a retrospective legal practice[13], guided by previously and exclusively fixed political reasons.

Law is compelled to change its own reference time from the past to the future, which has an impact on the way of determining the law and on the composition of the actors who exercise this power[14], to determine the law and politics.

The legislation of the welfare state is open, and can be indeterminate. It transcends the traditional formula propagated by imperativist theoreticians[15] of "order and coercion" (which presupposes a previous selection between right and wrong), and presents new alternatives for the relationship between state and society, for politics[16].

In view of that, this new profile of legislation, marked by the presence of open clauses, by norms of principle, the judge is challenged to participate, along with the legislator, in composing solutions for the present and future, in the resolution of problems that no longer belong to a strictly legal field.

3. New Judicial Power, new claims: from distancing to accountability

Brazil is no exception to this process. Themes of great popular appeal began to appear with reasonable frequency on the agenda of the summit of the Brazilian Judiciary, such as research on embryonic stem cells, abortion, racial quotas, demarcation of indigenous lands, homo-affective union, among others.

According to the literature, it is a global trend of growth of the judiciary[17], a possible approximation of the countries of Civil Law with the American standard of determining and making the Law – a standard that, whether as a matter of principle[18], or because of a more pragmatic perspective of Justice[19], does not hesitate to allocate to the judge the role of a protagonist in the creation of law.

In countries such as Brazil, marked by substantive Constitutions[20], the judicialization of politics is a reality imposed by the constitutional agenda itself[21]. Whether this is a desirable course or not, it seems, to some extent[22], irreversible: the judiciary appears on the contemporary scene as a field of new possibilities for political representation[23].

In this context, the judiciary has come to have demands on it previously restricted to the areas of the powers that are traditionally considered political – the legislative and the executive. The discourse in favour of independence and distancing of the judiciary are giving way to demands for accountability[24], transparency, publicity, closeness to society.

It is natural, in this light, to require greater and greater access to the decision-making processes of the judiciary, to increase social interest in the activities and the members of that institution.

In Brazil, the Constitution of the Republic itself provides in article 93, IX[25], for the publicity of judgments by the organs of the judiciary. Unlike what happens in many constitutional systems, in which the actions of unconstitutionality are judged in private hearings, the trial sessions of the Supreme Federal Court have a public character and the votes of the judges, at least officially, may only be disclosed in this environment, even if they are preceded by a request for examination[26].

At the end of the trial, the findings, drafted by the rapporteur of the action or the judge whose divergence leads to the final judgement, are published in a printed and a digital version, in the Journal of Justice, the daily national newspaper of the official Brazilian press. Moreover, the whole content the trial is made available, that is, all the votes cast and the transcript of any oral debates that took place in the session, on the official website of the Supreme Court[27]. In addition, the debates are broadcast live on "Justice TV" and "Justice Radio".

In the U.S., although the Supreme Court already makes available the daily transcript of the trials and the audio recordings weekly, there is still strong resistance on the part of judges to accept the presence of video cameras in the courtroom, a stance that a great part of American society, the press and the academic community fails to understand. With so many possibilities of access to the decisions of the Supreme Court, what is the reason for closing the door only to video cameras, when all other means of publicity make the Supreme Court a kind of glasshouse[28]?

4. The risks added by the cameras

As stated at the beginning of this essay, the judges of the American Supreme Court still largely fear that the video cameras might modify the dynamics of the institution. Are these fears well founded?

A consistent answer to this question would certainly require empirical research in which the behaviour of judges with and without the presence of the cameras was observed.

With a full decade of "Justice TV" in Brazil, although we have no news of research conducted in the above terms, some impressions have begun to be discussed.

A quantitative study of the impacts of "Justice TV" on the judgments of the Supreme Federal Court found interesting data in the Direct Actions of Unconstitutionality: the votes have taken longer in the "post-Justice TV" era, the collective production of the Court has suffered a reduction, whereas the individual output of Ministers has increased significantly. This study rightly took care not to assert a clear causality between the operation of "Justice TV" and the data obtained, since it did not take into account other possible factors that could have an impact on the decisions analysed[29].

In any case, from the data collected, the study concludes that the votes of the STF are more referenced to the general public, and that fact could contribute to greater legitimacy of the court.

So it is in this last conclusion that the study seems to assume the delicate premise that the legitimacy of the Supreme Federal Court is being tuned between public opinion and the opinion of the judges, apparently disregarding the important counter-majority function that the judiciary is still supposed to fulfil.

It is in this very point that the great danger to exercising judicial power before the cameras lies, that is, the danger of the temptation of populism, in other words, attempting to embody the deepest real feelings of the people, understood as a self-evident truth, and which dispenses with the bureaucratic deviations of mediation proceedings[30].

On the other hand, the viewers run the risk of falling prey to the illusion of free access to the truth produced by the judges[31], which in Brazil still has obvious difficulty in assuming the political nature that largely encompasses its function.

The live broadcast of trials sells viewers the sensation of being eyewitnesses to the production of justice, blurring their view of the mediation carried out, the difference between the naked eye and the aided eye[32].

A logic of spectacle is imposed on judges and other actors, who, since they know they are being observed, can be even more stimulated to carry out performing acts, administrating their images and different interests, without necessarily making public reason prevail over private reasons. Judges are promoted to celebrities, almost all-present via the technology. The promise of bringing us closer to justice by the presence of cameras in the courts may ultimately be misleading, to the extent that the object tends to alter before the viewer.

In this historic year of 2013, when Brazil is taken by proceedings, as yet undeciphered, of teeming multitudes, demanding various political and social changes, the result of an opinion poll[33] on the presidential succession in Brazil, carried out in the heart of the demonstrations, is, at the very least, intriguing. Although he has never presented himself as a candidate for the post, the favourite in the opinion of the protesters was the current president of the STF, Minister Joaquim Barbosa, who became a bastion of the morality of the country after his "heroic"[34] role as rapporteur in Criminal Case no.470, the famous trial of the "monthly allowance scheme", accompanied live by many via " Justice TV ".

Those are basically empirical claims, and we ought to investigate them. Once we know whether these effects occur and how substantial they are, we would be in a position to make a normative evaluation of whether the benefits of televising judicial proceedings exceed their costs. Ultimately though we need to reflect more, and urgently, about what people take home when we do justice before the cameras, instead of simply assuming we are in a better place with them.

Judging online hate speech:
Challenges brought by the perspective of recognition

Anna Clara Lehmann Martins[1]

Abstract: This paper brings into discussion the challenges that online hate speech presents to law, especially to judging activity, in light of Honneth's theory of recognition. Whereas online hate speech can be regarded as a denial of recognition in terms of equality and difference value, law stands as a counterpart system, responsible for answering to disrespectful situations by means such as the judicial sentence. The sentence emerges, thus, as a channel for the judge to establish new reciprocity relations. In order to address the problem completely, however, its scope must go beyond the cognitive notion of equality, entering at the realm of valuing differences, in which both reason and emotion are present. In this sense, this paper aims to discuss measures which could be taken by the judge while responding to online hate speech cases so as to contemplate matters of difference value without putting at risk his impartiality and respect towards the constitutional system. Among appropriate measures, it is envisioned the usefulness of empathy and interdisciplinarity to judging activity.

Keywords: online hate speech, recognition, judging activity, empathy, interdisciplinarity, Honneth

As it can be evidenced by recent events, from the easy sharing of opinions on personal profiles to the articulation of complex popular manifestations, Internet emerges as an instrument of enhancement of freedom of speech[2]. And, if this media is considered on the basis of its

[2] We are fully aware that this assertion is object of much discussion in literature. Here, what we mean is that now a new kind of communication is made possible: a faster and instrumental potential, we can admit that it largely remains at the choice of the user whether to employ it in a positive form – case of cultural diffusion and open dialogue – or in a negative one – case of hate speech – the object of this paper. Here, we aim to discuss the challenges that online hate speech presents to law, especially to judging activity, in light of Axel Honneth's theory of recognition.

Yet, one may ask: is online hate speech a noticeable problem? Is it remarkably present at cyberspace? If so, has it already reached the courts? In Brazil, the issue has achieved alarming proportions. Statistics from the National Center of Report of Cybercrime, an organ powered by the non-governmental organization SaferNet and allied to the Brazilian Prosecution Service, show that, in 2012, from a total of 52.000 online reports, no less than 15.000 (30%) involved hateful content, such as racism, religious intolerance, homophobia, xenophobia and neo-Nazism (SaferNet, 2013). Regarding lawsuits at courts of appeal and superior courts, until 2011 at least 1% of the demands involving social networks were about hate speech (Silva et al., 2011). The issue gained national prominence in 2011 with the 'Mayara Petruso Case' – in which a law student was condemned because of a discriminatory message posted on Twitter[3].

As law, among other instances, is called to give response to such cases – especially through the figure of the judge, who establishes an important dialogue channel between victim, offender and society throughout the procedure –, it is necessary, firstly, to define what is being judged in an online hate speech case. From this point, the challenges inherent to the issue may be properly addressed.

simultaneous all-to-all communication, in opposition to the former one-to-one (letter, telephone) and one-to-all (newspaper, television) types. As evidenced by Manuel Castells, among other researchers, the user of the new media is enabled to make his voice heard by a larger scope of people, disposing of a wide range of tools to better express and deliver his message. From these changes, however, it does not follow that the online environment presents no rules or limitations to speech. As many scholars have argued, by employing perspectives from, for instance, Michel Foucault or Boaventura de Sousa Santos, Internet holds the potential to embrace veiled mechanisms of speech control and speech homogenizing, though its role is not reducible to it.

[3] The case was closely followed by national media: one example is the coverage by UOL Tecnologia (2012). It also called the attention of foreign press vehicles, such as The Telegraph (2012).

According to Honneth (2004; 2011), the construction of personal identity is directly attached to experiences of recognition. If the individual is able to refer to himself as a separate being, as a person both common and unique, he does so because of the interaction he establishes with other beings, more specifically with other persons. By himself, he does not possess the means to answer to the question 'who am I?'. The individual needs the external perspective of otherness, namely, recognition.

It does not mean, however, that the recognizing process involves uniformity or completeness. Inspired by the sketches of the young Hegel from the Jena period, Honneth explains that recognition takes three basic forms: love, law and solidarity. Each of them concerns a specific dimension of personality, the first being related to affectivity, the second to cognition, and the last, to both. On this basis, the success or failure of reciprocity relationships triggers an individual reaction called 'practical relation-to-self', which, in other words, is the immediately emotional and mediately cognitive result from the encounter with the other to the shaping of the individual's identity. Thus, whereas positive recognizing processes lead the individual to achieve self-confidence, self-respect and self-esteem, relationships of denial of recognition promote the lack of such traits.

One may wonder where does online hate speech stand in this context. According to Brugger (2007, p. 118), hate speech contains 'words which tend to insult, intimidate or harass people because of their race, color, ethnicity, nationality, gender or religion', among other attributes, enabling the instigation of violence, hatred and discrimination against targeted groups. It is, before anything, violence at the symbolic level (Wieviorka, 2007, p. 71).

Per se, its effects are already very serious: exclusion, denigration, further hatred. Transposed to the online level, they are made even worse. As demonstrated by Castells (2011), new media are characterized by the surpassing of time and space ordinary obstacles: they display high-velocity information flows and all-to-all modes of communication, regardless of the content of a given message. Among new devices, emphasis must be placed on social networks, recently incorporated into the daily lives of millions of users spread all over the world[4] due to their decentralized and friendly structure (Riva, 2010, p. 70).

Though the primary intention of these devices is to approximate people, the willingness of disclosure and the feeling of safety behind a computer screen may also lead to a state of indifference towards the other's pain and, thus, to the publication of contents that would normally be inhibited, such as intolerant speeches. From this point, it does not take much to prompt aggressive behavior. In a few words, what we mean is that, with the aid of the Internet, hate speech is dangerously allowed to expand the reach of its damage and recruitment in global proportions.

For all that has been said so far, it follows that hate speech articulates itself within the specific traits of a given culture and society. It relies largely on social context. Thus, if we apply Honneth's theory of recognition to the case of online hate speech, we will soon perceive that it concerns more intimately to the two historically situated forms of recognition, namely, law and solidarity.

These forms were once deeply mingled, as in the case of the Middle Ages[5]. The perspective of modernity, however, has drawn a rather clear distinction between the two: while on one side we have rights and obligations, of which any human being is entitled to partake of, just for the sake of being human, on the other we have social esteem, which relates to the particular value of each manifestation of diversity in society, taking in consideration the framework of cultural references adopted.

In such sense, as Honneth poses it, the recognition sphere of law addresses the individual in its equal dignity, an issue of cognitive respect. The recognition sphere of solidarity, on its turn, is concerned with the value of the individual, regarded in his uniqueness, to social development, an issue of rational tolerance and also of affective interest towards difference[6]. The hard strokes of this division have begun to be delineated during the Illuminism, but they are object of development to present day, with the advent of the Informational Society. One can say,

[5] A wide range of recent works deal with this unique entanglement between rights and social value, characteristic of the medieval period. The approaches vary from history of mentalities (Chartier, 2009; Duby, 2005) to critical history of institutions (Hespanha, 2005).

[6] This interest, expressed as active caring – or responsibility, as preferred by Ruiz (2003) and Lévinas (1997), constitutes a key aspect to the achievement of goals in a plural society. This is so because different skills and characteristics are capable of contributing to social goals only while preserved, cared for, an operation which necessarily requires involvement, not indifference.

thus, that within these spheres of recognition human being has been continually (re)discovered as simultaneously universal and singular.

Yet, such process of identity discovery through recognition is not always targeted at a positive direction. As shown by many examples spread in history, it can be reversed by operations of recognizing denial, such as hate speech. But how does hate speech specifically relate to each sphere of recognition? According to Douzinas (2009, p. 300), a single manifestation produces a double-folded damage: offended people suffer, in the first place, the non-recognition of their dignity and the denial of the correspondent equal respect, and, in the second place, the ruin of their esteem among themselves and before society, caused by the destruction of the positive evaluation of their character and shared history.

In short, we have that hate speech attacks people by discursively depriving them both of their equal humanity and their social relevancy, damaging their sense of self-respect and self-esteem. These lesions, we remind, are made even deeper because of the faster and expanded reach of the Internet. Such is, thus, the manner in which online hate speech addresses the recognition spheres of law and solidarity.

Having sketched how the double harm is articulated, one easily perceives that an effective judicial response must cover the two spheres of recognition attacked. Yet, a problem arises, especially when facing the sphere of solidarity: the interest towards difference – with its necessary affective dimension – does not endanger the impartiality imposed on the judge?

In order to properly answer to that question, first we must ask ourselves: what is impartiality? Our heritage from Positivism provides us a ready response: it is a neutral and strictly rational conduct at the performance of all judicial procedures, always placed within the narrow limits of law and aiming at its purely logical enforcement. In this context, the norm plays the role of a framework which contains reality, hardly the opposite. The lack of a place for the solidarity sphere of recognition is evident.

Nowadays, however, the growing complexity of social structures claims for more than mathematical solutions: the sentence is no longer regarded as an isolated soliloquy, but as part of a greater dialogue. It is the answer of the judge to the parties and to society, in which it is intended, on one hand, an immediate response to the conflict, in the sense of a direct action towards the involved parties; on the other hand, a mediate response is also awaited, in which expectations external to the parties will be taken into account, given the weight that society exerts over immediate responses (Ferraz Jr., 2008, p. 287).

This is so because, while judging and motivating his point of view, the judge is not on his own, solely with a normative system to recur to. Rather, he is situated among a whole complex of references: the legal context of the past; the current legal context; contemporary theories that favor one decision, as well as the ones that are opposed to it; the decisions from superior courts; the judge's own previous experiences; and, primarily, the expectations held by the parties and by society, which can be anticipated and further apprehended by the judge on the course of the procedure. Thus, the sentence emerges as a single link in the midst of an intricate polyphony of ideas and feelings. Using the terms of Bakhtin and Volochínov (2006, p. 99), it is an utterance among a vast chain of acts of communication. An act, therefore, referred to the other: an act of recognition.

In this sense, it is important to remark that the aim of the sentence focuses no longer on the safety provided by subsumption, but on the justice achieved by creative (and legal) decisions. This ethical shift is explained by the ever stronger realization that our real life problems, be they triggered by historical, social or technical reasons, easily surpass the reach of norms as written in great codifications. Law, more than ever, is in need of interpreters, of creativity, for it does not deal with abstract premises. It plunges into a complex of plural registers. So, if the judge is to give a satisfactory answer to a concrete conflict, he must first be able to understand the languages spoken. He must consider difference.

This is why, today, the mingling between neutrality and impartiality does not sustain itself. As defended by Portanova (2003, p. 74), neutrality is unattainable. Every human act is reported to value. Even the pursuit of indifference, for it values precisely the lack of value, or the 'values of tradition'. Law itself is woven in accordance to political wills, necessarily evaluative (Portanova, 2003, p. 65).

Judging activity, as posed by Silva (2006, p. 280), shows most brightly its unavoidable relationship with value at the moment of interpretation, in which the judge is not only challenged to reach the primitive sense of a normative precept, but also to harmonize it with the actual circumstances surrounding the case, breathing new life upon the written law. Even if it were possible to keep the judge away from any value, it would, in equal measure, keep the sentence away from its main goal, that is, justice. For the latter, when related to recognitive balance, to the good life in the context of a given community (as defended by Ricoeur, 1991), it relentlessly requires the addressing of all involved spheres of recognition, and thus, of values as well as rights.

This being said, we have that impartiality has gained a more specific meaning. According to Portanova (2005, pp. 77-79) it is restricted to the judge's immediate subjective connections, that is to say, to his personal interest towards one or both parties, and to his economical interest on the advantages which he may obtain directly or indirectly from the dispute. It does not concern in any way to aspects such as his interpretation of the law, his political views or his opinion on social issues. As we have seen, the idea of the judge as an acritical technician, as a bouche de la loi, is long surpassed. The very Brazilian Code of Civil Procedures supports this view, since it approaches the subject in the negative form, by enlisting specific cases of impediment and suspicion[7], related to personal and economical connections. In the list, there is no mention to values as historical and cultural manifestations.

If, however, there still remain doubts on the possibility of the judge to address the recognitive sphere of solidarity, one must remind that judging activity in Brazil is situated within a constitutional framework which values difference. Our Constitution (1998) devotes a whole section to the promotion and protection of the plurality of cultural manifestations[8]. Also, an individualized penalty is assured for offenders[9], demonstrating that they too must be treated according to their unique circumstance.

[7] These cases are enlisted in the Articles 134 and 135 of the Brazilian Code of Civil Procedures. For example, we have impediment when the judge figures as one of the parties (the same holding for his spouse and his relatives), or when he has already worked in this specific procedure as a lawyer or a prosecution officer. On the other hand, we have suspicion when the judge is known to be a close friend, a capital enemy, a creditor, a debtor or an heir in relation to one of the parties.

[8] We make reference to Title VIII, Chapter III, Section II: 'Of Culture'. The Article 215 reads: 'The State shall guarantee to all the full exercise of cultural rights and the access to the sources of national culture, and shall support and encourage the appreciation and dissemination of cultural manifestations'. Among the goods that Article 216 enlists as part of the Brazilian cultural heritage we call attention to (I) forms of expression and (II) modes of creating, making and living, besides creative work and cultural spaces.

[9] As it reads from Constitution's Fifth Article, XLVI: 'The law shall regulate the individualization of punishment'.

As a democratically elaborated Constitution, consonant with the goals and characteristics of Brazilian society, it evidently transcends the point of view of individuals, including those with the power of judging. It follows that this complex of norms stands as a valuable guide – and also an objective limit – on how a judge must regard cases of denial of recognition. As we can perceive, solidarity issues are fully allowed to be raised by his pen.

What matters now is how. In face of new problems, such as online hate speech, the judge is required to be creative, while within the legal limits. Which tools may best help him to approach the solidarity sphere of recognition? In this study, two instruments are suggested: the resource to empathy and the resource to interdisciplinarity.

The resource to empathy recovers the necessary complementarity between reason and sentiment in the apprehension of reality. Studies on the field of psychoanalysis, combined with recent discoveries on neuroscience, share the same contesting tone when the subject is the solitary reign of reason over the realm of decision. As noted by Damásio (2011, p. 276), there is no rationality without sentiment. Both are part of interconnected systems. In this sense, the openness to emotion, along with the realization that reason and sentiment form together a unique and complex system, contribute decisively to the achievement of the recognitive goals of the sentence.

This is so because recognition is a matter of putting oneself in the perspective of the other, in order to approximately experience his circumstance. In other words, it involves empathy: the ability to 'know' what others feel. Most often this trait is referred to at the level of the individual: one must develop empathy so as to cultivate healthy personal relationships (Goleman, 2001). Yet, it is no less true that the activity of 'putting oneself in the other's shoes' should also be present at the institutional level (Slote, 2007; Nussbaum, 2008). It constitutes a prerequisite for the accomplishment of justice (Dubber, 2006), since the just answer must be suitable to the situation of those who plead and those who receive.

In order to achieve this kind of immersion, the judge must firstly be aware of his own context and preferences. Empathy is nourished by self-knowledge: the more we are conscious of our own emotions, the more easily we will come to understand the emotions of others (Goleman, 2001, p. 109). Only after a mature stage of self-awareness the judge will be able to put aside himself and, thus, be receptive to the alterity of offender and victim, as well as other involved people. How does a member of the targeted group feel after reading a hateful message? What moves a person to display publicly her hatred towards a given group, in despite of all current efforts in benefit of equality and diversity? In this sense, we see that empathy provides the necessary openness to difference and to its subsequent evaluation, that is to say, to the recognitive sphere of solidarity.

A purely rational approach, instead, could compromise the sense of justice inherent to judging activity, as pointed by Damásio (2011, p. 282): 'When human beings are not able to see the tragedy inherent to conscious existence [an eminently emotional operation], they feel less compelled to do something to minimize it and may show less respect towards the value of life'. It means that the pretense of neutrality via the asphyxiation of feeling ultimately converts the sentence into an empty monologue, indifferent to the situation of both parties – and therefore selfish, solipsistic, even arbitrary. Of course we do not mean to support an absolute primacy of emotion over reason. Rather, we defend a joint and collaborative use of both faculties, in accordance with the affective and cognitive dimensions encompassed by the theory of recognition.

The second resource which comes to aid the judge at the approach of solidarity issues is interdisciplinarity. It recovers the need of a deeper understanding of the case in its multiple aspects, the 'understanding of the misunderstanding' (Morin, 2005, p. 109). This is so because the legal world, the judge's nearest tool, organized in prescriptions, permitted or prohibited conducts, is incapable of containing the world of life, considering its multiple and mobile nature, full of interactions, uncertainties, nuances between the ideal and the forbidden. In order to face this unbalance and, thus, improve the judge's analysis of reality, it is advisable for him to utilize tools present in other fields, from the sciences to philosophy and even to the arts.

The contact with new horizons of knowledge allows a more complex apprehension of the case, in as much as it aims to unveil the involved social structures and underlying non-recognition relationships. In this sense, the interdisciplinary approach might reveal itself especially useful while judging cases related to the Internet, because of the new (and not yet fully explored) circumstances of this media and its consequences.

Here we might recall, for example, the variable profile of offenders – from the 'domestic' profiles of students to the wider networks of neo-Nazi sympathizers (this when both are not connected!). We can remember as well the inconstant degree of awareness displayed by users on what concerns the consequences of a disrespectful message spread online.

Such circumstances articulate themselves in a very different way when compared to offline life, and the judge must be prepared to recognize and properly consider them. Whether he will do it by personal research, team research or consultation of court assistants, such as the amici curiae, it depends on many factors such as availability of time and personnel, but, most of all, it relies on his choice.

Having enabled the construction of a deeper contextualized procedure, as a result, the interdisciplinary approach increases the chances of effectiveness of the decision. It promotes the building of sentences with a greater ethical compromise. In this operation, law constitutes an important criterion to be observed (Portanova, 2003, p. 123), but, as we have seen, it is hardly the only one: there is also the social context behind the conflict, the applicable principles – emphasis being given on the protection to human dignity as well as on reasonability, almost always present –, the judge's own reason and emotions, the contribution of other fields of knowledge, among others. Summing it up, the judge must be attentive to the social, economical and political concerns of his time, assuming a conscious and responsible position regarding his historical context.

The adherence of all these elements to judging activity suggests the overcoming of the long-standing Cartesian paradigm that excludes the cognitive subject – the judge – from the subject-object relationship. As remarked before, the judge is no longer obliged to hide his values and ideas on the basis of an alleged duty of neutrality while judging. Instead, he is now stimulated to reintegrate himself as subject, in the fullness of his singularity, as defined by Morin (2008, pp. 30-31):

> The reintegrated subject is not the metaphysical Ego, foundation and judge of all things. He is the living subject […], random, insufficient, vacillating, modest, who mentions his own finitude. He does not carry the sovereign consciousness that transcends time and space: he introduces instead the historicity of consciousness.[10]

[10] Free English translation.

Therefore, even if the individual normative precept contained in the sentence reproduces exactly the same words from written law, its meaning is unavoidably different, unique, for it was envisioned for the sake of a specific context. Both the case and the judge, accompanied by their respective circumstances, are unrepeatable. This is why judging activity is ultimately artistic.

From the foregoing, one is allowed to conclude that the search for recognitive balance between parties and between them and society is fully compatible with an open, interdisciplinary and ethically compromised judging activity. This becomes clear as the sentence is seen not just as the procedural ending of conflict, but as an opportunity of harmonizing, within the contextual possibilities, the reciprocal relationships involved.

The ethical goal of the sentence, that is, the closest approximation to the good common life, encounters its translation in Honneth's theory as the closest approximation to collective success at the three sphres of recognition. In this sense, the sentence emerges as an instrument through which the judge is able to inaugurate new relations of recognition, in order to put an end to the harmful effects of previous denial.

Admittedly, the solidarity sphere can be more freely managed and reach the attention of a wider range of people on other fronts, such as public policy. Yet, the judge cannot escape dealing with this feature. It is part of his very circumstance as member of a historically situated environment. All public institutions, in fact, should give more attention to this aspect of recognition, by stimulating the use of more appropriate tools to deal with it, such as empathy and interdisciplinarity. Thus, it would be more clearly perceived that both these actions, judging activity and public policies, are complementary.

The sentence possesses social weight, such is an undeniable fact. It has an educative character, inasmuch as it establishes a dialogue not only with the immediate parties, but also with society. It remains as a relevant indicative of which differences are to be taken into account and how they are to be valued. In addition to that, one must remind that it is through the procedural path, whose summit it is the sentence, that constitutional norms are actualized, or rather, made reality – in terms of equality and in terms of difference.

Further on, it must be remarked that not considering the sphere of solidarity may give vent to aberrations such as that present in the 'Richarlyson Case' - in which the judge, refusing to withdraw from his own perspective in order to know the other (or perhaps he ignored such possibility was possible), shows a flagrant assent to situations of prejudice towards homosexuals[11].

It certainly remains for other sectors, as the press and education institutions, the hard work of 'translating' relevant judicial sentences, in order to make them accessible to people who are not familiar with the jargon used at courts. Such is a work which must involve great care and supervision, under the risk of deviating to sensationalism. But the importance of this task does not obfuscate the fact that the judge himself bears high responsibility in procedures involving recognition. In such a way that he must be encouraged to refine his modes of assessing reality, by getting actualized on the new trends – such as the ones presented by new media – but also by getting in touch with the specific parties and their contexts. For the judge is more than an interpreter of the law: while dealing with online hate speech cases he is touching matters of identity, of self-realization, of common good living. And he will have to transcend the predictions of pure law if he is to give a complete answer to the problem.

Methodology in comparative legal studies

Leonardo Machado Pontes[1]

Abstract: Regarding the history of comparative law we have traditionally methods such as descriptive (Aucoc), evolutional (Saleilles), functional (Rabel), factual (Schlesinger, Markesinis), structural (Sacco) and cultural (Legrand). The article will explore the functional and the cultural methods, but also the factual method, which is an extension of the functional method and was carried out by Rabel's disciples and others. The history of comparative legal studies will be shortly introduced, followed by the explanation of functionalism, the authors behind it, its later developments and main critics. Afterwards, functionalism will be confronted by structuralism and the hermeneutical methods, as possible solutions to functionalism's lack of theory. The article tries to portray a general picture of comparative legal studies and points of contradiction and ambiguity in the scholar literature of the present days.

Keywords: Compared law; comparative legal studies; functionalism; Rabel; Legrand; Sacco

Compared legal studies are receiving from methodology a great importance and an extensive production of articles[2]. For 'method' one

From the Greek word 'methodos', consists of the prefix 'meta' (later) and in the suffix 'hodos' (path). In the Latin form, 'procedure way' or 'rational process'.[4] As stated Descartes "j'avois toujours un extrême désir d'apprendre à distinguer le vrai d'avec le faux, pour voir clair en mes actions, et marcher avec assurance en cette vie".[5]

The 'scientific' character of comparative legal studies is object of controversy, although without the same intensity as before. There are those that simply describe it as a 'method' and not as a 'science', and those that defend its 'scientific' character. Cf. MALDONADO, Marco D. Silva. Crítica a la comparación jurídica y al método que emplea. Alegatos, n. 74, p. 131-146, 2010. In the beginning of the siècle XX Lambert, Arminjon, Nolde and Wolf defended compared law as a 'science'. Gutteridge, Ascarelli, Hamson and René David later would just treat it as a 'method', once that it could not, as they told, be disconnected from the other branches of law. The additive 'compared' thus would not create a separate 'scientific identity'. Cf. BLAGOJEVIC, Borislav T. Le droit comparé: method ou science? RIDC, v. 5, n. 4, p. 649-657, 1953. There are also those that defend comparative legal studies as both a science and a method, being of great importance the work of the French scholar Constantinesco. Cf. Nevertheless, Sacco's ideas of formants are more original and less neo-Rabelian. Mattei gets to call it structural comparativism, acknowledging the influence of Schlesinger in Sacco's work, even though Sacco's work was quite independent, being more complex than the factual method[16]. Sacco and Schlesinger never met, except for one time. They were introduced by Gorla, and Gordley carried out the project of translating some of Sacco's works to English[17]. Since Sacco was more influenced by Schlesinger and not by Rabel we can understand the differences between Sacco and Markesinis as well, although both of them descend from the functionalist heritage.

Comparative law was related to several different ideas, such as the idea of improving the national law; a science annexed to international law; an instrument of intelligence and progress; a historical-cultural method[18]. There is only 'compared law' when reflections are made in relation to the problem that the work intend to analyze. A work purely descriptive, that doesn't apply any type of critical reflection or a form of reinterpretation of the object of study cannot be called 'compared law'[19].

The comparison can be synchronous or horizontal, when it is compared regarding the space dimension, or diachronic or vertical, when it is compared regarding the time dimension. There is microcomparison when are compared fragments or institutions of the law; macrocomparison when the juridical systems are compared. The 'genotypes' of a law are present and permanent human activities in the juridical cultures, while 'phenotypes' are the analyzed data of first appearance. It is called 'operational formant' the rule that defines the decision, and of 'conceptual formant' the concepts used to understand the rule. There is no prominence of a formant in relation to the other. When the formants are not expressed, but implicit, we have a 'criptotype' – an obvious juridical and cultural mentality, which defines so completely a jurisdiction, that is not necessary to express it directly [20].

The formants ideas are based on the theory of the 'legal formants' or 'dynamic theory' of the Italian professor Rodolfo Sacco and of his fowlers, the 'group of Trento'[21]. Legal formants or structuralism develops a method by trying to study the object and what holds its relationship with the elements of the structure and with the system's totality. In structuralism there are the seeds of the postmodernism critics to functionalism, such as the possibility of conserving the otherness, evaluating what lurks behind the function and the system dynamics, a project that would be carried by others latter on[22]. Of course that the 'formant theory' is not the most important one, but just one of the existing theories, disputing with Ernest Rabel disciples of the 'functional method', as the English professor Basil Markesinis or the Germans Zweigert and Kötz[23], and the new form of functionalism proposed by Ralf Michaels or Husa[24]. Sacco can be seen as extension of the functionalist school, although his ideas try to eliminate a few of the functionalism mistakes, specially the idea of dynamic system, which lacks in Rabel's functionalism, as I shall demonstrate[25]. Although Markesinis and Sacco ideas are different they can be seen propagating the factual method. Nevertheless, Markesinis is more Rabelian than Sacco. Mattei and Bussani, Sacco's disciples, are applying the originality of the formant theory with the functional heritage and factual method of Schlesinger, renewing comparative legal studies and the way we traditionally think about functionalism[26]. Also, there is a dispute between Sacco, the neorabelians, and the 'culturalists', as Pierre Legrand, and the followers of the post-modernism thinking - the 'Utah group'[27].

The article pretends to analyze and give a general view of compared legal studies today. Part I will briefly present the history of compared legal studies. In part II it will be studied the functionalism and its critics. In Part III I shall go deeper and analyze the differences between the hermeneutical interpretation and the functional interpretation. Part IV concludes.

2 History of compared legal studies

The idea of studying another law is not recent. Delegates, for example, went to old Athena to study the law of Solon[28]. When the history of compared legal studies is analyzed mainly in Europe it is noticed that there were moments of contraction with the emphasis on the differences, as well as moments of integration, with the emphasis in the likeness. That was most of the times influenced by the historical context or by a form of philosophy of law that prevailed[29]. In the same way, the analysis could be restricted to the comparison of books or to reach the more deeply 'law in action'[30].

According to Glenn, the history of compared legal studies in Europe can be distinguished in two periods: a first preparatory period to the articulation of the national law (Roman law, canonical, customary) and a second period, starting from the XIX century, complementary to the articulation of the national laws[31]. As explains Constantinesco, the law needed to ascend its Ptolemaic condition to embrace a Copernican vision, resulting, in the light of several modifications in the commercial and political reality in the creation of a science of compared law and not just a comparative method[32]. There are authors that contributed with important works of comparison along the history, although it is only later on, in the XIX century that compared law will really become a method and it will reach its condition of a science. Therefore, there are important authors that can be seen as precursors.

For instance, the Englishman Bacon, investigating the tradition of the civil law, declared the need of a universal system of justice[33]. Besides him, the English Fortecue, Saint-German, Fulbeck, Selden and Lord Mansfield wrote important works or comparative reflections[34]; the Italians Azo, Bartolus and Vico[35]; the Dutchman Grotius; the German Leibniz; the French Montesquieu and, before him, the coutumiers Dumoulin, Coquille, Loysel, and Bourjon[36/37]. Montesquieu used data in a wide empiric-historical observation with the objective of legitimating a source of legislative experience, being considered one of the most important precursors of compared law[38]. This without doubt made those authors precursors but hardly could be affirmed that compared law would be created by them, once there was an absence of a rigorous methodology[39].

It is necessary to arrive to the first half of the XIX century to the first methodological attempts of systematization of compared law. That happens with the Germans of the south, of the Heidelberg's school - Thibault, Gans, Zachariae and Mittermaier –, opponents of the Historical School[40]. The historical school only had eyes for the Roman and German laws, perhaps the most Ptolemaic condition in the history of law, although, paradoxically, was the historicism and the diachronic methodological vision of the Historical School of Savigny and Eichhorn that would permit the subsequent development of compared law by its opponents[41].

There is, for instance, the so acclaimed debate between Feuer-

It is necessary to criticize rigorously the ideas of Monateri that affirms that the genesis of compared law is the creation of a political Aryan-Roman model, attributed to the historicism of the Historical School. Although it is the historicism as a method that supplies the tools for compared law to escape from a universalist tradition of natural law, on the other hand, is the same thing that impedes compared law in Germany, once the supporters of the historical school only had eyes to the German law. Compared law doesn't appear from the Aryan-Roman politics, but exactly from the opposition authors of Heidelberg. The work of Constantinesco, translated to German and mentioned by Zweigert and Kötz, demonstrates this precisely. MONATERI, Pier Giuseppe. Methods in comparative law: an intellectual overview. In: MONETERI, Pier Giuseppe (org). Methods of comparative law. Glos: EE, 2012, p. 12-15. In fact, the article of Monetari deifies the European law and turns null and without any roll other less 'prestigious' laws. According to him, there would be a 'cultural elite' that would exercise a dominance roll and that the criterion for the transplant of a given law would be the number of times which the law is mentioned and used by the cultural elite. Mittermaier himself declare that one of the purposes of comparative law was to be a weapon against the Pandectists. See CAEMMERER, Ernest Von; ZWEIGERT, Konrad. Évolution et état actuel de la method du droit comparé en Allemagne. In: Un siècle de droit compare en France (1869-1968). Paris: Librairie Générale de Droit et de Jurisprudence, 1969, v. bach and Gans about the jurisprudence and history of compared law. In 1810 Feuerbach declared that:

> Anatomists have their comparative anatomy, so why do jurists not have comparative law? Just as the science of linguistics comes from comparing languages, so if universal jurisprudence (indeed legal scholarship tout court) is to vitalize it needs to compare the laws and legal practices of other nations at all times and places, the most like and the most different[42].

The German Zachariae, in his time, developed the most important treaty on French law, studying Napoleon's code[43]. Heidelberg, Mittermaier, Bernhöft, von Litsz, von Stein, Goldschmidt, Mayer and Köhler, in the same way, developed important studies comparing foreign institutes[44]. Zachariae and Mittermaier, with the objective of giving evidence to compared law, founded in 1829 the Kritische Zeitschrift ffir Rechtswissenschaft und Gesetzgebung des Auslandes, a prominent review, dedicated exclusively to the subject[45].

Lerminier, Laboulaye, Foelix, Foucher, Saint-Josef, Ernest Glasson and Lévy-Ullmann created important compared law works in France, and the first and the second assumed the chair of compared law in Collège de France. Foelix, considered the founder of the private international law in France in 1834, trying to match the German review, founded the Revue étrangère of Législation without much success[46].

Benthan and Austin in England tried to undertake works with that aim, being, however, the works of Burge and Leoni Levi that marked the British field[47]. Kent and Story in the United States undertook important works studying the English law and the continental law in relation to the North American law[48].

Only in 1894, when was found in Germany the Internationale Vereinigung für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft und Volkswirtschaftslehre and in 1869 in France the Société de législation Comparée, the discipline of compared law became gradually recognized[49]. Those reasons were justified partially due to the enormous international success of the Bern Convention, harmonizing the subjects of copyright[50]. The projection of compared law was also due to what Kötz calls la belle époque du droit comparé, the first international Congress of compared law that happened in 1900 in Paris, organized by Salleilles and Lambert[51]. The important work of compared law of Lambert, published in 1903, is dedicated to Salleilles, which is described as a 'master'[52]. What the two comparatists had in mind was nothing less than an ambitious project of a droit commun de l'humanité.[53] Saleilles would try to renew the natural law; Lambert would seek a common legislative law as opposed to Gény's free scientific research; Lévy-Ullmann a science of universal law and del Vecchio that the science of comparative law, even regarding the diversity of systems, presented a striking number of similarities which permitted the identification of a common human spirit[54].

In the Congress, Salleilles affirmed that compared law would be a 'science' whose object would be to discover the concepts and the principles of all the 'civilized' systems, which he called droit ideal relatif, although, to be true, he mistakes 'science' with 'method'. Salleilles was based on the historical method and in Jhering's sociological positivism[55]. He translated from German BGB and he created numerous methodology works about compared law. ism, Salleilles would look for to renew the juridical method, reacting to the strict legalism of the exegeses and looking for a universal model that would allow the French to introduce foreign elements of compared law, appealing for the general influence of the character of jurisprudence. Besides him, also shared ideas of a scientific character the Europeans Levy-Ullman, Kohler, Arminjon, Nolde and Wolff, Rabel and Brutau, as well as representing the United States, Yntema, Rheinstem and Hall[56]. Kohler, for instance, explored the idea of an Hegelian object spirit ens realissimum, which through a dialectical process, forms the philosophy of history and a true, a convergent and objective law.[57]

As explains Kötz, the vision that prevailed in the Congress was that of Ernest Rabel's functionalism, placing compared law beside other sciences of the time[58].

In the same way, in the United States, although lately than in Europe, compared law gained force with the creation in 1952 of the American Journal of Comparative Law, founded by Hessel Yntema in the University of Michigan and for Rudolf Schlesinger's and Arthur von Mehren's works on the same decade[59]. The work of Schlesinger follows the same tradition of René David's work and Zweigert and Kötz, a tradition therefore that establishes itself in the 50's[60].

In Italy, equally, starting from the 50's compared law will gain more force due to Gorla's work[61], although the efforts undertaken by Amari in the previous century should be pointed out, rescued by authors as del Vecchio, Maroi, De Francisci and Rotondi. Gorla undertakes a historical compared law opposite to the positivism and the Germanic systematic conceptualism. He looks for to build an empiric science of the research of the facts, focusing his work in the jurisprudence analysis, just as the North Americans[62]. The functionalism penetrates in Italy, surprisingly, via North American influence. It is true, though, that in 1929 Galgano already founded the Institute of Legislative Studies in Rome.

In Brazil, there is a very rich tradition of compared law, from authors such as Teixeira de Freitas[63], Valladão[64], Caio Mário[65] and Clovis Bevilacqua[66]. Comparison was applied in Brazil since 1769, where the Law of Good Reasoning (Lei da Boa Razão) allowed the application in Brazil of different laws of civilized nations, regarding business transactions, even against the Portuguese law[67]. Arguably, is being the subject of even greater importance[68].

3 Functionalism

"Functionalism consists of comparing the elements that represent the same function in order to show that, although there are different used technical procedures, the remaining solutions are definitively equivalent"[69]. The functionalism is one of the most traditional methods used in compared law.

When one speaks of functionalism, the first obvious reference is the treaty of Zweigert and Kötz that wrote: "the basic methodological principle of all comparative law is that of functionality" and "the question to which any comparative study is devoted must be posed in purely functional terms"[70]. Although, to be true, they have not explained the subject satisfactorily, as noted, for instance, James Gordley[71], or at least mentioned other methods, as pointed Samuel[72]. For example, Samuel lists at least sixth methods, regarding the epistemic universe, as pointed by Berthelot: a) casual (if x, y or $y = f(x)$); b) functional (S→ X→ S), where X is analyzed by its X→ S function; b) structural, where X results of a founded system, as the language, regarding the disjunctive rules, A or non-A ; c) hermeneutical, where X is the expression of a subjacent meaning to be discovered by interpretation; d) intentional, where X is the result of intentional actions; and e) dialectical, where X is the necessary result of the contradictions inherent to the system[73]. One of the possible explanations for the absence of methodological theoretical outlines in relation to functionalism is its pragmatic character and a general preference of authors to depart directly to the analysis of practical subjects. That reveals, on the other hand, the inexistence of a pan-disciplinarily regarding methods in general that are not able to be separated completely from the context of the investigation[74]. Nevertheless, the father of functionalism is Ernest Rabel. Rabel's functionalism, for instance, is known for an absence of a deeper methodological theory, as recognized by one of his own disciples, Ernest Von Caemmerer[75], a theme which I will explore later on. Paradigmatically, though, Rabel was responsible for a very important shift on the way as we see now comparative legal studies. He's idea of focusing the social functions of problems as terra comparationis rather than the text of law was a major evolution against positivism and the speculative nature of comparative law[76]. This lack of theory, nevertheless, is also seen accompanying the followers of functionalism.

Thus, for instance, it is surprising that the treaty of Zweigert and Kötz of 714 pages only 48 are dedicate properly to methodological subjects. Gordley, that criticizes them and specifically writes an article about the 'functional method', is a victim of his own criticism, because he doesn't clear in almost anything the concept, although recognizing the lack of coherence of theories in a general way[77]. The merits, thus, for the systemization of the main elements of functionalism seems to be of Michaels, that promoted a variation on the theme of functionalism, trying to correct great part of its mistakes.

As explains Michaels, equivalence functionalism is

> [...] a response to the challenge that functions are either nothing more than causal relations, or contain an element of teleology. Equivalence functionalism explains an institution as one contingent solution amongst several possibilities. As a consequence, the specificity of a system even in the presence of (certain) universal problems lies in its decision for one against all other (functionally equivalent) solutions, a concept reminiscent of Cassirer's epistemological functionalism. Legal developments are thus no longer necessary but only possible, not predetermined but contingent.[78]

The equivalence functionalism would be, therefore, a method devoted to the problems, understanding the juridical institutions in relation to them, but not in an abstract or general way. It has an epistemological nature, not a metaphysical one[79]. The equivalence functionalism proposes functional equivalents to the foreign institutes, that is, solutions that could be adopt, departing from comparison. This is one of Rabel's ideas, nonetheless, to improve the "stock" of possible solutions as something necessary, especially because he was lamenting the loss of prestige among Germany cultural dominance and that this was mainly a result of the lack of interest of German jurists about the world[80].

As explains Michaels, there are seven functions studied by functionalism: a) the epistemological function; b) the comparative function; c) the presumptive function; d) the formalizing function; e) the universalizing function; and f) the critical function[81].

The first of the functions, the epistemological, opts to choose an observer's perspective as an alternative to the participant's perspective in relation to the cultural approaches, focusing the vision of the law in a specific functional relationship[82]. As such, the functionalism opts for a vision of an observer outside of the legal system not placed in the position of an internal observer. If somebody analyzes the North American system, it is unnecessary that he must think as an American to understand the system. To analyze the systems for functions and problems is to look for a constructive vision[83].

Even in relation to the anthropologists, as, i.e, Paul Bohannan, at least is impossible to think in comparing other culture without the use of one's concepts and own terminologies, which makes intelligible the comparison. Cf. ALFORD, William P. On the limits on 'grand theory' in comparative law. Wash. L. Rev., v. 61, p. 947, 1986. Among theories that were intended to be 'neutral', like Foucault's genealogical historiography, it was demonstrated latter by other authors as Habermas and Honneth that the linguistic concept of culture that he uses indirectly designates a pattern of thought of a society as a whole in a specific period, beating the supposed 'neutrality' of his theory, what demonstrates that even in the field of the ethnology the problem persists. The second function, the comparative function, it's based on the idea that functional explanations are more plausible than other possible explanations. Thus, given its pragmatic nature, is more plausible to look for to compare in an empiric way than philosophically; it is easier to question functions than values[84]. Under the perspective of equivalence functionalism, the problems can be compared not because all the societies have the same problems but because the search for answers to the contingent problems can be identified as a reference to other possible answers[85]. To look for legal solutions in cases with similar facts in a similar way but with different arguments may show that those solutions are only apparently different.

The third function, the presumptive function (praesumptio similitudinis), traditionally presupposes that the problems are universal, and when focusing the problems it is functionally possible to compare the solutions. Those problems will only be similar with relationship to the researched elements. Although certain solutions can be the same in a certain point they will be different or dysfunctional in relation to other[86]. As such, the comparability of institutions can lead to different solutions, even due to comparison, what means that functionalism doesn't necessarily generate similarity, although departs from this premise. It is interesting to notice, though, that the praesumptio similitudinis only has relatively room in private law that is not carried out by moral imperatives that constitute the public order. However, in the case of a more 'relative' private law, the third function acts while a heuristic device, even between the civil and the common law[87]. Gordley understands that Zweigert and Kötz would not have established the presumptive function as a premise of the functionalism, but just as a possible step to open new research lines[88], but that seems also to be incorrect, since Zweigert and Kötz specifically treat it as a heuristic device, that is, independently of being true or false, it should necessarily be adopted as provisory. Besides, as notes Samuel, the functional method clams the praesumptio similitudinis in one or another way due to its own nature[89].

The fourth function, the function of the construction of the system, means that the comparatist, after deconstructing the institutions of another system in functions, should look to explain those same functions through his on institutions or vocabulary. This would be done if:

> The solutions we find in the different jurisdictions… be cut loose from their conceptual context and stripped of their national doctrinal overtones, so that may be seen purely in the light of their function, as an attempt to satisfy a particular legal need.[90]

In the same way, it would be necessary for the comparatist to eliminate his prejudices as a result of his on education and experience in his national law. That is artificial and, as criticizes Glanert, completely naive and arrogant in the thought of the two Germans[91].The problem of an inherent ontology is inevitable, as it will be seen more ahead.

The fifth function, the formalizing function, is based on the idea that functionalism, when demonstrating the likeness or the dysfunctions of certain institutes, can supply mechanisms for the choice of laws, although functionalism doesn't have the pretension or the condition of affirming which institute or law would be the best[92].

[92] Even a law of local interest like Loi Badinte, of July 5 in 1985, related to the mitigation of the damages from the victims of traffic in the circulation, was characterized by the search of the French legislator of instruments of the foreign law for its creation. Cf. LEGEAIS, Raymond. L'utilisation du droit comparé par les tribunaux. RIDC, v. 46, n. 2, p. 347, 1994. The Italian legal tradition, i.e, in the XIX century was deeply marked by the French law. Later, by the German law. Starting from the decade of 50 by portions of the North American law, what demonstrates that the formalizing function permeates the juridical cultures. Cf. SACCO, Rodolfo. La formation au droit comparé: l'expérience italienne. RIDC, v. 48, n. 2, p. 273-278, 1996. In Canada, for instance, 23% of the decisions of the Supreme Court among 1984-1994 mentioned non-Canadian sources of law and

The universalizing function uses the functionalism method to the construction of uniform legislations, which transcend the obstacles of each private juridical order. In the European Union, i.e., the directives are not transposed in the structure of their doctrines, but only in relation to their results, which means that the States-members are free to approve legislations that work as functional equivalents[93]. The principle of mutual recognition of the European Union do not require similarity, but equivalence, that is, functional equivalence[94].

The seventh function, the critical function, means tolerance in relation to the foreign law, critic to the foreign law, critic to one's own law, and critic to the law as a whole[95]. The controverted point is the debate if a national court could use a foreign law as a reference to the construction of its own decision. For example, Portalis, the Civil Code architect, pled in his time a transnational science, being opposed to a pure exegesis of law, having mentioned authors like Blackstone, Bynkershoeck, Heineccius, Pufendorf and Wolf; the French courts of the century XIX based their decisions on foreign precedents; a court of New York quoted Grotius and Pufendorf in 1805 to solve a case mentioned until the present days[96].

One of the critics to compared law comes from the CLS movement - Legal Critical Studies or the 'group of Utah' – an amalgam of critics of the feminism, post-structuralism, post-modernism and post-colonialism, that seeks to denounce the paper of status quo in compared law as indifferent to the category of the 'other' or 'different'.[97] According to them one could never understand or to compare other system without a deep analysis of its social context, that is usually a result of the work of the sociologist or the anthropologist – an 'organic method'. Other critics are addressed properly to the problems of the functionalism analysis, as the problem of the tautology or of a false teleology, that is, the repetition of the category of the functions, that hides or doesn't clarify the perception of that which is simply repeated or that which is hidden underlying the function; still, an occult value that is used for the accomplishment of the comparison, that is unable to reflect other values in the comparison[98]. For a critic to the 'opacity' of the post-modernism in compared law, see Markesinis, getting to call it of useless under a practical point of view[99].

It is important to be clear that Rabel had already pointed out the importance of investigating the background of another culture, its history, economy, etc., what difficultly could establish functionalism as blind to these differences. Context and function is the same thing to Rabel, once that to study the social function of problems presupposes including the context in the function, although how to do this was greatly neglected[100]. According to Rabel, we should compare laws functionally, but also the problems they solve in each system; the laws should be considered in its context - bases of procedures and existent institutions; the socio-economic and cultural context should be analyzed to reach the depth of the knowledge[101]. So, Rabel's vision is a three-party idea: a) a deep study of the compared law, such as its functions, classifications and systematic exposition; b) longitudinal geographical cut and transversal systematical cut; c) critical evaluation[102]. The first step is the historical study, regarding the evolution of the systems; the second, the analysis of the operation among systems according to their social functions, showing their differences and likeness; the third, the philosophic analysis that would seek the greater knowledge among the first and second endeavors, which nevertheless he never did[103]. Kötz, a disciple of Rabel, according to Markesinis, declared the need to analyze the norms 'in its context', it's multidimensional form. It can be understood that Zweigert and Kötz follows the tradition of Rabel's functionalism, although reducing the practical importance attributed to a historical study more deepened[104].

Nevertheless, the critics to functionalism are important on three regards, as demonstrates Gerber: a) the absence of importance attributed to the process which creates the object of study (the reasons that give rise to the object are not clear); b) the absence of conceptual construction of the knowledge achieved, since as explained, functionalism does not have the tools to relate the objects, specifically how to think about context and function, because a method cannot be something loosen without any kind of theory to hold it or to be considered as an epistemology[105]; c) absence of a dynamic of systems, since functionalism does not regard the object of study during time, because a specific function is frozen, which makes the method ignore the otherness, the specific originality of a system and the consequences that it can have on the future functions[106].

4 Hermeneutics and functionalism

In relation to the study of a research method in compared law, it is common the opposition among two antagonistic currents. The first of them, the convergence approach, was proposed by Sir Basil Markesinis. According to this theory, although differences exist among juridical systems, in the level of the problem of its contextualization, the functional solutions to the problems tend to be similar, that is, that which really matters to the comparatist[107]. The search of similarities, as such, in the legal systems, common law and civil law, leads to a larger integration, mainly when addressed to the analysis of facts and of cases. As explains Markesinis "one way of achieving this aim was by merging the common and civil law teaching and presenting my subject thought cases"[108].

For so much, Markesinis had to choose to place aside the conceptualism of another system and to discover the true politics not-expressed that lied behind the factual situations[109]. He opted for a functional approach and not a conceptual one, through exegesis, comparison, and a historical course[110]. For instance, to analyze the German system, strictly built by the pandectists it was necessary to deconstruct it and later to reconstruct it, in order to make it palatable through the study of cases[111]. As he affirms, the base of his technique is the Germanic historical/comparative approach through the study of empiric data[112]. To be true, his book is also theoretically weak. The book should be seen as an empiric and practical testimony, not as a theoretical guide. He follows the same tradition of Zweigert and Kötz, although guiding the reader by the study of cases. As most comparatists, his efforts are addressed to the study of the thing itself for not falling in Radbruch's critic that "sciences that are too much concerned with its own methodology are sick sciences"[113].

On the opposite side, it's the non-convergence approach theory, proposed by Pierre Legrand, of culturalist nature[114]. According to this radical theory, the law is a part of a larger juridical culture, an alive part that cannot be limited to its own juridical framework. Departing from that premise to focus the similarities would be wrong or just superficial, once each culture builds its own cultural identity, according to different needs and movements[115]. Thus functional solutions not always will tend to similarity, what would be even counter-intuitive. Compared law, then, would not be a study for the search of the function, but a hermeneutical interpretation (démarche herméneutique)[116], what would eliminate any possibility of a legal transplant[117]. In fact, for Legrand, the method would be 'formalist' and 'unidirectional'[118] which he substitutes for the study of the mentalité, that is, the cognitive structures that are in the appreciation of the lurking culture[119]. He says that comparative law is an interpretative discourse that cannot permit the understanding of things as they really are. What the comparatist does is a reduction of re-interpretations[120]. That's the reason why this approach is said to be of non-convergence, because once the comparatist studies the culture, the history, the politics, the ideology, etc., he will see countless differences in relation to the studied object. On the other hand functionalism, because it works with likeness it will always be more willing to identify convergences[121].

The critic is that functionalism would be capable to just unmask a layer of compared law - the technical aspect -, missing its capacity to understand underlying meanings, as the ideological, social, political and economic context of the norms. One could not speak about the creation of a model, but just of a linguistic relativism[122]. In fact, evident epistemological limitations exist in relation to 'method' that cannot be unevaluated, as its speculative character, that lead Mallarmé to say that all method is fiction and Heidegger that any method is a method-in-the-world[123]. Gadamer demonstrated that is impossible to suppress the

It is important to notice that although compared law has been usually considered a science in France, there was never a lot of unit in relation to the adopted method. There was a profundity of works that were in charge of the problem, although coherence does not exist in relation to the epistemological categories. PICARD, Etienne. ontological dimension of the one that interprets, what would be applied to any comparatist[124]. As also points Legrand, the comparatist is a product of a situated culture[125]. Even translation involves a creative nature[126]. What he proposes is: a) an amplified hermeneutical analysis, studying the culture and mainly the reasons which generate the object of study; b) an interdisciplinary door, which seeks to understand as deeply as possible the object of study, even if he recognizes the limit of this approach; c) preserve and respect the otherness, as a prerequisite, showing first the different or the incommensurability[127]; only after trying to organize the differences.[128]. According to Legrand, following Derrida, because the English law and the French law are so different, we cannot say that we have a dialogue among then, but just a form of negotiation[129]. What a French student does is a projection, viewing the English law with the notions of the French law, what Derrida thinks is a false way, because the student does not leave his own law, which is ethnocentric always, even if minimal[130]. That's way Legrand insists on the notion of rendement herméneutique, because this kind of interpretation revels both the interpreter context and also the context of the object of interpretation[131]. He criticizes Markesinis, Zweigert and Kötz, opposing the thoughts of Leibniz and Derrida, arguably because of the manipulations of the comparison achieved by functionalism[132]. According to Legrand, functionalism is ideologically inclined to the unification of laws and it's dangerous to the point that to achieve similarities it manipulates and sacrifices what is[133]. As points Örücü, functionalism changes the focus of vertical to horizontal[134]. What Legrand proposes is that we can nevertheless, when studying other law, lessen our own mentality (mentalité) not by considering what is different bad, but respecting the different to better understand us[135]. Culture is a meta-discourse, which law is one of its discourses. We need to study the culture of other law to understand how and why: the simple study of jurisprudence and texts of law cannot account for this. The culture must account for the other's philosophy, literature and architecture, being of extreme importance the inter-textualité. For Legrand, the comparison is not impossible; what we compare are two different singularities to achieve a synthesis, nevertheless respecting the singularities[136]. That is one of the characteristics of the structural method, which, by focusing singularities and its relation regarding its opposition, creates a synthesis by discovering the subjacent structure[137]. Legrand's approach, even if it corrects two of the functionalism problems: a) the absence of importance attributed to the process; and b) the absence of a dynamic of systems, suffers from the same criticism regarding the absence of a conceptual construction, since Legrand does not create a theory to relate how precisely we must regard culture and law, creating epistemological problems. Nevertheless, we can consider this relation to be provided by his hermeneutical interpretation, somehow. The radical approach of Legrand can be criticized, though, by not accounting the inexistence of isolation among cultures:

> […] what Legrand fails to recognize is that neither linguistic communities, nor legal systems, nor civil societies/communities live in isolation from each other. There has always been cross-fertilisation, whether geographical, geo-political or cultural, whether in time or in space and these commonalities need to be recognized as much as the differences Legrand advocates.[138]

The suggestion of Bogdan that we must study the economic system, the political system, the religion, the history, the geography, the demography and even accidental or unknown factors, as interrelated categories, to see which of these develops a more leading role in one country's law is interesting, even if it suffers also from an absence of conceptual construction[139]. This could be explained by the hermeneutical idea itself, which says that social sciences cannot be grasped objectively as other sciences: social reality can only be interpreted.by reason or by dialectical reason[140].

The proposed debate, therefore, between Legrand and the functionalists, as Zweigert and Kötz, or proclaimed neo-rabelians, as Markesinis[141], lies in the difference between the hermeneutical interpretation and the functional interpretation. As explains Samuel, the hermeneutic interpretation is vertical, once it involves the relationship among two objects, the signifier (what is expressed) and the significant (what is). The significant, therefore, what is, would be represented by the cultural mentality. The functional interpretation, on the other hand, establishes a circular relationship, in which the significant is just another function[142]. That means that, epistemologically, the functionalists can be acting on premises that falsely understand the significant or that distort its role[143]. Although a hermeneutical analysis is deeper, it doesn't mean that is better than that functional one, once there are levels of hermeneutical interpretation, some deeper, other less. Short hermeneutical Interpretations, for instance, cannot be said better than functional interpretations[144]. In the same way, the functionalism method can be an initial apprenticeship that together with a hermeneutical analysis can be proven correct, when both interpretations will be merged in a subsequent structural level of larger profusion that can be conciliatory among both approaches.

The comparative juridical method, though, by reason of its own complexity, raises the need of some explanations. The first of them, the notion of ontological openness of the comparatist, postulates that an analysis that doesn't intend to be a mechanical translation of foreign legislations, will be produced, unavoidably, with the interpreter's distortions. That is because 'objectivity' is a pernicious epistemology, which will always have a measure of cultural suggestibility[145].

Thus, the comparatist is always an observer-participant[146]. As such he will always look for a pragmatic strategy focused in certain institutes arbitrarily chosen by him. That will result in a legal formalism, converging to a global market that will simply ignore other cultural contingencies[147]. On the other hand, "l'idéologie of l'autosuffisance culturalle n'est pas autre chose que l`idéologie du retard".[148]

5. Conclusion

As points Örücü, is very hardy to talk about "comparative methodology". What we have is a range of methods and they differ deeply,[149] especially in the context of law and of social sciences. This, of course, was first an observation made by Frederick Pollock and later done by Gutteridge[150]. Nevertheless, although functionalism is quite useful and a subject of constant renovation, it possess clear limitations. One possible way to advance a better methodology is to correlate the functional method with the hermeneutical and the structural methods. The obviously challenge is to create a theory that permits to better connect these methods to create a better understanding of the otherness, that is, how to relate the micro and macro comparison without creating illusions. Functionalism as proposed by Rabel does not work anymore. A radical postmodern theory that negates even the possibility of knowing the other also does not work. So Legrand's culturalist and light-postmodern theory insights are quite helpful, but as pointed before, he also lacks a theory of conceptual construction as precisely how to connect culture and law. Perhaps those results are clearly limitations of the jurist formation. It would seem that we need more persons from several areas of knowledge to work together. If law is just a form of interpretation validated by a community of persons or by society's legislative power, even if we have general hierarchal rules in a system theory of law, this means that comparative law is just a form of hermeneutics after all, even if we have a great range of methods. Hermeneutics, though, is rich and can be improved by the correlation with the structural method to limit its imperfections or always be the subject of the community's validation, although it will remain as subjective. Comparative law, then, must be an effort done by several scholars, from different fields, trying to minimize the error of the structural representation of the other. Recognizing the clear limits of comparative law may create a sad felling and negate the ideas of Lambert and Saleilles, but this is better to call something a "science" just for the sake of saying "I'm a scientist". The European project proves that the unification is possible, but I think this is much more a question of politics then really comparative law. Comparative law here is a political tool of change and reform, nothing more than a method. That's way the "functional core approach works", once that it's easier to justify politically.

Legal Research
Empirical analysis, philosophical work and the "non research" kind of studies1

Abstract: The paper focuses on the contemporary debate about legal research, with attention to the Brazilian situation. This discussion has intensified over the last decade and it is already possible to draw some prospective considerations and critical assessments about the difficulties in differentiating the various types of work produced by graduate programs and researchers. The first section reviews the discussion held so far, highlighting the emergence – both in speeches and in everyday Brazilian institutional scenario – of a different kind of legal scientific work: empirical research. The second part undertakes a critical examination of the debate and demonstrates that there are some outstanding issues related to legal research, in particular the difficulty in distinguishing between the professional studies and scientific research or philosophical elaboration. Those two kinds of legal research are identified and distinguished in order to show the possibilities of dialogue among them. Also, it indicates that it is crucial to the institutionalization of legal research a more demarcated border between the technical products and scientific products (pure or basic research), with a specific space to be granted to empirical studies. The third section concludes the paper based on the assertion that empirical legal research is an international phenomenon. Such assertion is, in this sense, comforting, since it allows viewing that the Brazilian scenario is in tune with what is being done over the world in terms of legal research. Also, it indicates that the path of consolidation of empirical research has proved to be relentless. Such research is needed due to the constant demand for diagnostic and assessments for the innovative propositions in terms of public policies. Finally, a critical argument is performed to postulate the future need of expansion in the volume of basic or pure empirical legal research to undergo the scientific objectives of refining the methodological tools and theoretical approaches. As such type of research can only be carried out by academic groups linked to graduate programs and students amidst their production of theses and dissertations, a special attention should be given to these institutional development and empowerment.

Introduction

The goal of the present article is to prune some conceptual misunderstandings related to research in legal studies; it will not have the shape of a diagnosis, but will make use of the already existing studies concerning the problem of legal research. The debate about this question has been intensified at the last ten years and it is already possible to extract some prospective considerations and, mainly, critical appreciations on the difficulties of differentiating the various types of works produced by post-graduation programs and by diverse researchers. The first part will review the discussion that has been held until the present moment, highlighting the emergence – on the speeches, so as on the Brazilian institutional everyday – of a differentiated kind of scientific work on law: the empirical research. The second part will proceed to critically examine the debate and will demonstrate some pendent questions related to the legal research area, specially, the difficulty in differentiating between technical or professional studies and philosophical research/elaboration. This part will demonstrate that it is possible – and necessary – to distinguish such lines of studies. The importance of differentiation shall not be understood as a hierarchy but rather, as a more precise localization of what should be understood as pure bibliographical review or technical and juridical consolidation. The third part, by its turn, will indicate it is essential to institutionalization of the legal research that that frontier be more demarcated between the technical/practical products (applied research) and the scientific products (pure or basic research), with a specific spaced regarded to empirical studies. The work's conclusion is that empirical legal research affirmation is not a national phenomenon; being related to a wide researchers movement, existing in the occidental world. The assertive is, in this light, comforting, once it allows visualizing that the Brazilian panorama is tuned – substantively – with what is being produced in the world in terms of legal research. Also, it is indicated that the path of consolidation of the empirical research has shown itself as inexorable, by determination of reality's imperatives, as the constant demand of diagnosis for the proposition of solutions in terms of public policies. Lastly, a critical appreciation is carried out in the sense that the volume of empirical research should be amplified as well, as a pure or basic key, in order that the techniques and approximations are refined. This kind of investigation can only be executed by research groups belonging to post-graduation programs and by students in the production phase of their dissertations and theses. Therefore, special attention must be directed to such institutional development.

1. The debate on legal research and the affirmation of empirical research as an evident factor of influence

The debate on legal research is not so new in Brazil, although it did not have a sounding board similar to the discussion on legal education. The discussion on legal education is as old as the creation of legal courses in Brazil, being the literature on the theme quite prolific, although it guards a strongly descriptive trace. There are several books, articles and reports that, since the eighties' decade, repeat this point (BASTOS, 1998; FALCÃO NETO, 2001). The goal of this section is not to retrace the historical trajectory of this debate. The idea is to demonstrate that the debate has reached a moment, in which the legal empirical research has served to oxygenate the discussion and bring new patterns to the debate on scientificity, concerning what is relevant: the rigor of research works in the area. It is for no other reason that this question must be debated over the light of reflections made by researchers that ended – by their trajectories – being inserted into the field of legal research and of social sciences. Roberto Kant de Lima is one of these researchers that have exposed their concerns about the roll of Legal Anthropology on the list of possibilities of researches regarding the legal world. In two recent works, Kant de Lima reiterates the difficulties found in the process of approximation between the fields of Anthropology and Law (KANT DE LIMA; BAPTISTA, 2010; KANT DE LIMA, 2007). Indeed, consonant to his diagnosis, "the anthropological action presupposes the relativization of consecrated truths while legal action through them reproduces itself, being this methodological contrast a significant obstacle to the dialog between these two fields."[4] (KANT DE LIMA, 2007, p. 90). This obstacle is, following, always dissected in the perspective of evidencing the problems of the comprehension between the two disciplines:

> Our legal tradition has very specific characteristics regarding the system of production and reproduction of legal knowledge. In a clearer way, our legal tradition makes use of pedagogical practices and processes of socialization on the professional field of law and on its concept of academic and scholastic knowledge which are analogue to those of the legal procedure (…). Concerning the scientific knowledge, it is performed through a progressive construction of successive consensuses which define facts, until that, by means of a revolution that produces a new and distinct legitimacy, can be countered (…). In face of this intrinsic precariousness of science, the scientific texts avoid their "manualization", in order not to affirm how should the knowledge field be. In our legal system, on the contrary, manuals, treaties and dictionaries proliferate, which are perennial fountains of controversial doctrinal opinions, to be instrumentalized (…). This brief introduction would be unnecessary, if these were not, in my already advanced opinion, the biggest epistemological obstacles that interpose between the academics of legal studies (law) and the academics of social sciences (KANT DE LIMA, 2012, p. 36-37)[5].

This point of view demonstrates that the question is easily equated, if visualized in the light of social sciences. The answer to the scientifatravés delas se reproduz, sendo este contraste metodológico um significativo obstáculo ao diálogo destes campos".

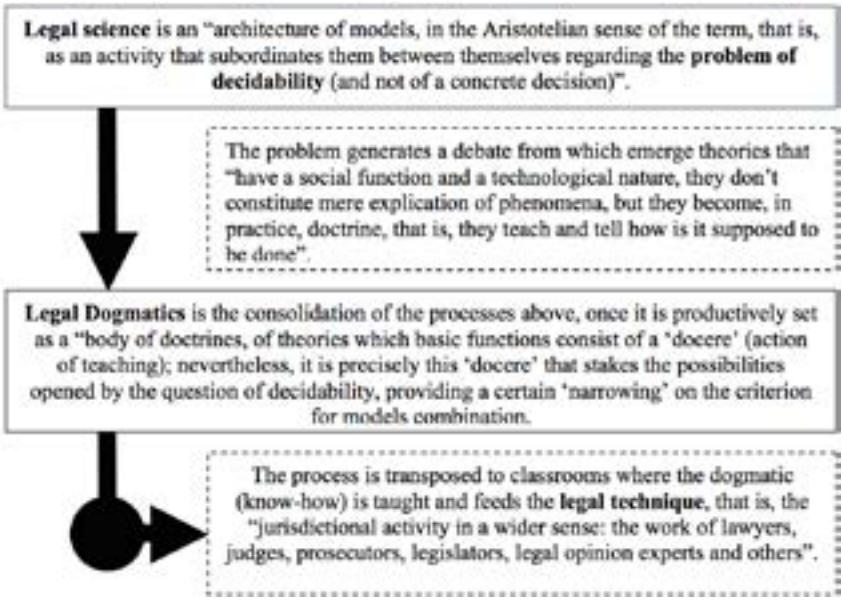
De modo mais claro, a nossa tradição jurídica utiliza práticas pedagógicas e processos de socialização no campo profissional do direito e no seu conceito de saber acadêmico e universitário que são análogas àquelas do embate judiciário (...). No caso do conhecimento científico, procede-se por uma progressiva construção de consensos sucessivos que define fatos, até que, por meio de uma revolução que produza uma nova e distinta legitimidade, possa ser contrariada (...). Em face dessa precariedade intrínseca à ciência, os textos científicos evitam a sua "manualização", para não afirmar como deve ser o conhecimento do campo. No nosso direito, ao inverso, proliferam manuais, tratados e dicionários, que são fontes perenes de controversas opiniões doutrinárias, a serem instrumentalizadas (...). Essa breve introdução seria desnecessária, se esses não fossem, na minha experiência já avançada, os maiores obstáculos epistemológicos que se interpõe entre os acadêmicos de direito e os acadêmicos das ciências sociais". (KANT DE LIMA, 2012, p. 36-37) ic statute of legal research becomes a closer reflection to the existing in social sciences. However, through this key, this debate contains the definition of frontiers that evidence the incomprehension. There has been an alteration in the discussion from an article written by Marcos Nobre when the question about legal research gained new colors and allowed to signalize other clues (2003). Beyond his opinion concerning the relative delay of legal researches, in comparison to the existing production in the field of human and social sciences, in a broad sense, the work brought a relevant critic about the very definition of legal knowledge. In the article, the author makes a reference to the work of Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Jr. to demonstrate strangeness with the following epistemological construction (NOBRE, 2003, pp. 150-153):

Fig. 1. Conceptualization of legal science according to Ferraz Jr.



The reasoning exposed at the picture above, which we hope is faithful to Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Jr., is clear: legal science would not be cognitive. It would be an architecture of models set to critically notice the various possibilities of decision in abstract and hypothetical situations for the consolidation of doctrines, which, in the end, would be translated in techniques for practical use. The heartwood of this exposition is the demonstration of how Marcos Nobre evidenced the huge difference between this conception of "legal science" and the other sciences, which always have the purpose of comprehending some partial aspect of the social or natural world. Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Jr., however, had already exposed that his conception of "legal science" does not aim at cognizance as the other sciences; it aims at assisting the didactic process of future professionals dedicated to decision-making:

> Legal science presents problems on order to teaching. This differentiates it from other approaches of the legal phenomenon, as Sociology, Psychology, History, Anthropology etc., which present problems and constitute models which intention is much more explanatory. While the law scientist feels bound, at the presentation of problems, to a solution proposal which is possible and practicable, the others can even suspend their opinion, presenting questions to be left open (FERRAZ JR, 1977)[6].

Of course questions derived from the indicated theory may bring a more complex appreciation than the schematic expression here indicated, as can be apprehended through the debate concerning the currency of Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Jr.'s conception (RODRIGUEZ; SILVA E COSTA; BARBOSA, 2010). Still, on the other side, it is evident that this conception of science is so diverse of the existing standard in the scientific and academic world that turns difficult to conceive its own methodological debate. Ergo, the analytical solution offered by Marcos Nobre consisted in indicating that he did not visualize any problem in which legal science could be explicative, although he had not enunciated how would this be given (2003, p. 153). The omission was given, including, in homage to the potential plurality of methods. After all, understanding the normative and jurisprudential framework in order to generate answers to legal problems seems to demand some effort of controlled comprehension, which could be gathered in a cognitively oriented science and not only grasped to the production of techniques for the practice.

Nothing better than an example to clear this up. The conception of science exposed by Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Jr. claims that the dogmatic is the instructional basis of practice. However, what if practice is an autonomous know-how in relation to legal dogmatic, doctrine and science? The answer is not so simple, as noticed in the work of Barbara Luppeti Gomes, which consisted in analyzing the orality principle in the legal practices established at Rio de Janeiro State Higher Court. In this endeavor, she achieved an ethnography and, from the observation of practices, noticed that the dogmatic concepts were not appropriated the way they were expected to be. They were used in an entirely diverse form from what had been prescribed by the doctrine and the legal dogmatic:

> Focusing on the study of the orality principle, applied to civil procedure law, I realized that, in fact, the dogmatic and empirical speeches are like parallel lines that, never, at any point, touch themselves, because of being at absolutely different plains. It occurs that, transposing this mathematical logic to law, it is seen that, actually, the problem is precisely on the fact that that they are not parallel lines! The theory and the empirical should not be considered as different plains that much, but only as different forms of manifestation of knowledge and, as such, for splitting and sharing the same object – the law – they could not relate as if they were reverse lines (BAPTISTA, 2008, p. 51)[7].

In our reaction to the problems posed by Marcos Nobre, there has been no spotlighting to the epistemological debate, even tough it is inseparable from the discussion concerning the problem of research (FRAGALE FILHO; VERONESE, 2004, p. 53-70). The discussion, at that initial moment, remained more focused on the field of political and technological science and on the problem of the institutions which produce science in the legal area. At the occasion, although we had recognized the existence of an epistemological problem of great bulk which confrontation was necessary, we found the space for doing so was scarce and it would not be possible to face the dilemma there. In fact, the central question is that both of us believed the central previous theoretical debate would be of little use for producing effective answers. The center of the theoretical inquietude – not debated – lies on the need of legal research to combine a realistic dimension and, with this, gain a cognitive and explicative focus. This way, there will be a legal science, combined with the influx of data collection, arising from other human science areas and improved to the legal field, as we indicated in previous works (VERONESE, 2011; FRAGALE FILHO; NORONHA, 2012).

This concern is quite present on the contemporary agenda. It is possible to indicate that this matches the diagnosis of Marcus Faro de Castro, according to which the legal conceptualism serves as a serious cognitive bulkhead. This comprehension is supported on the conclusion of falling on a misconception to consider the existence of a "legal science" inherited by Greek philosophy and Roman genie. On the contrary, such conceptualism turns into a limiting belief for the jurists' comprehension in relation to the phenomenon of law:

> Brazilian jurists absorb the 'conceptualist' legal culture of occidental European law. Treating law intellectually from prebuilt concepts, however, shows disadvantages. (…) The most common, in Brazilian legal education, is, until today, introducing and image of law as a group of decontextualized concepts, which have existed since antiquity, in the occidental world (…). It is also common that it is dumped on students, lawyers and judges, innumerous "general theories", through which conventional jurists try to give internal coherence to many ideas and about its consequences (effective impacts on society) it is now argued, because it is not researched (FARO DE CASTRO, 2012, p. 218-219)[8].

[8] TN: Freely translated from the original in Portuguese - "Os juristas brasileiros absorveram a cultura jurídica "conceitualista" do direito europeu ocidental. Tratar o direito intelectualmente a partir de conceitos prontos, contudo, apresenta desvantagens. (...) O mais comum, no ensino jurídico brasileiro, até hoje, é apresentar uma imagem do direito como um conjunto de conceitos descontextualizados, que passaram a existir desde a antiguidade, no mundo ocidental (...). É comum, também, que se despejem sobre o estudante, os advogados e os juízes, inúmeras "teorias gerais", mediante as quais os juristas

His final consideration is that it shows itself very relevant to enable the analytical exchange between law and the other human and social science areas, in order to permit a higher rigor and more functionality to researches in law:

> An ulterior group of reflections can be offered along the previous chapters – in contrary to older understandings and still in great part fossilized in Brazilian legal education – regards the importance that must be given to the effort of opening legal work to (1) the exchange with the "format" of other disciplines, an opening, therefore, to interdisciplinarity; and (2) the methodologically ordained engagement with the facts (empiric research), for them to acquire a "critical" perception – what could also be done with the help of interdisciplinarity (empiric research) or, in special, by the study of the legal approximation in relation to facticity and mirrored in courts decisions. On the context of this double overture, it must be drawn attention to the circumstance that it, as a whole, represents an strategy to avoid imprisonment of the jurist's mid to conceptualisms of little use to help the State promote effective good (FARO DE CASTRO, 2012, p. 221)[9].

In summary, we believe Marcos Nobre's diagnosis, in its epistemological key is still current, as well demonstrates the recent work of Marcus Faro de Castro. Therefore, we consider imperative that a reformulation of legal researches is set towards the quest for scholar and methodological parameters that parallels those existing in other humanities areas. At the next topic, three conceptions of research will convencionais procuram dar coerência interna a muitas idéias e sobre cujas conseqüências (efetivos impactos sobre a sociedade) pouco é indagado, porque não é pesquisado."

be focused. The first will be the "non-research", because it reverberates the traditional notion that legal studies do not need to understand any other aspect of human life – both in philosophical and empirical sense – and only organize abstract concepts – without problematization or conceptual immersion, ironically – to facilitate professional practice. Even tough it seems shocking; this "non-research" is still the dominant model in Brazil.

2. The two lines of legal research and the "non-research"

Polysemy is a quite emphatic problem in social sciences. The analytical appreciation of the social phenomena occurs in attention to language. Social facts are observed and translated this way. The ultimate analytical expression, derived from scientific interpretation, is also expressed through language. Even though the social phenomena direct observation technique is used, there will be a formulation intrinsic to language, be it at the collected data organization, or at the communication of results phase. Now, being language such a relevant element on the research, interpretation and communication of results' process, it is evident that the employment of the everyday lexicon may cause confusion with analytical concepts and, in the end, may induce to miscomprehensions or even false analysis and interpretation. In the law area, research – the word (but also the practice, as will be seen following) – suffers from this problem significantly (VERONESE, 2011, p. 174-175). The miscomprehension and the mistakes are, in part, derived from the few accomplishments and the lack of control of the academic production, which mark the area. From another part, the mistakes are related to disputes – explicit or not – existing in the law field to define what should be considered as research. The first process is related to the low level of institutionalization of legal research, a picture which is being gradually altered and is to be judged by the current debate, as indicated in the previous section. The amount of post-graduated professionals in the legal field has increased. The amount of people with a degree in law is increasing (MARTINS & CARVALHO, 2003). The amount of room for producing researches and scientific studies is also raising (FRAGALE FILHO & VERONESE, 2004). Moreover, the number of researches diffusion vehicles increase in quantity and quality. Last, the funds and sources of fomentation of legal research were augmented – even though not to desirable levels. The second process is related to a more refined and complex debate. This debate is profoundly imbricated with the definition of what is research in law, in terms of employable theories and methods. Can an ethnography about the operation of orality be regarded as legal research? (BAPTISTA, 2008). Can the appreciation of economic consequences of new legislation on the credit market be regarded as legal research? (ARAÚJO & FUNCHAL, 2009). Or, on the other side, can only be labeled as legal research the doctrine review studies, plus jurisprudential comments? Or, still, the philosophical debates on the nature of the legal phenomenon, without direct appreciation of reality data?

The concern with the possibility of a "legal carnival", as expressed by Marcelo Neves, is relevant and must be considered (NEVES, 2005, p. 14). Preliminarily, some consensuses that seem to be largely accepted currently in the legal area among researchers must be indicated. The first element about which there seems to already be a consensus about is that the academic products have a differentiated nature in relation to technical products. A legal opinion[10] is different from a research report. This quasi-consensus is evidently relevant for the existence some debate on the problem of legal research in Brazil. On the contrary, what could occur is a debate concerning the legal "non-research"; once it is subsumed to technical production on courts and legal advisory, public and private.

It is not easy to locate an academic source that currently postulates the scientificity of a final decision. Or, still, that legal opinions should be considered as potential academic articles. However, this confusion still exists in practice, once some legal journals still publish final decisions, sentences, and legal opinions on a par with articles, generating this gray area, never discussed or debated. However much academic practice in the legal area contains a certain confusion between the lines of academic world and the frontiers of legal area, an almost naïf optimism allows to notice that such misconceptions tend to diminish in the future. It is certain that a legal document – as well as a legal opinion – can be a source and give rise to law-based comments and that such process of appreciation may be achieved scientifically. This is what apparently could be regarded as "traditional research". Nevertheless, it is not. What we refute in the present work is that a congeries of jurisprudence or doctrine can be qualified as derivative of scientific research if it does not contain a clear and discussed theory of legal sources interpretation.

It was indicated at a paragraph above, readily, that there is a "non-research" and two other strands of research in law. These three fields will be unfolded. The two strands of legal research are dogmatic and philosophical research and empirical research. However, to advance, it is needed a concept that has been used in a very frivolous way when it concerns human and social sciences research: interdisciplinarity. As the word "research" has been taken over by a wide range of meanings, the term interdisciplinarity has also suffered from a little precise use. Marcelo Neves' concern with the "legal carnival" is well explained when his critics to "legal encyclopaedism" is visualized:

> A risk that prowls around the pretension of interdisciplinary legal research in Brazil is to understand it as a legal encyclopedia. Interdisciplinarity means a sum of the most diverse knowledge about law. This tendency, which remounts to iberoamerican education tradition and legal studies in Brazil, is intimately related to the so called "graduatism", within which a generalization in the sense of a knowledge which embraces a range of science and humanities spheres was overestimated. (…) What follows from this encyclopedic model, so well-know among us, is a generalized superficiality, of little practical relevance and little theoretic meaning to the diverse areas of knowledge (NEVES, 2005, p. 208)[11].

The quoted stretch evidences the problem. With an eagerness to break with the "non-research", which motto is to simply use doctrine texts or legal documents as sources, some jurists take the path through the eclectic conjugation of other areas' references, without specific theoretical support in the legal area, solely for fattening articles, theses and dissertations. In this process of thickening the work might arise the nefarious "historical chapter" or the offset "sociological chapter" in the middle of a thesis that would be better if restrained to its legal focus, in the strict sense, with great attention to the thick philosophical debate, as well noticed Luciano Oliveira (OLIVEIRA, 2003; OLIVEIRA, 2004). In the next topics it will be analyzed the modalities of "non-research" and the other two possibilities, highlighting the theoretically oriented researches and the empirical researches.

2.1. The traditional research; or the non-research

In the previous section some elements were mentioned concerning usual legal studies, which were indicated as "non-research". They are perceptible in the academic production of the post-graduation programs in Brazil, even though the process of strengthening of the other two lines that will be worked latter is in march. It is important to indicate that many are the Anglophone bibliographical sources which affirm and repeat critics to the traditional studies, indicated as obsolete and archaic. In the United States of America there seems to have been a certain triumph of legal realism, what must not be confused with sociological jurisprudence (HALIS, 2010). The first has origin in the movement of interdisciplinarity of law, and, actually, privileged the absorption of scientific methods and practices external to the legal field for the production of academic works. The second concerns the founders of a critique to the traditional studies in the USA, who proposed the construction of a decision-making practice that would break with formalism ties. The historic work of John Henry Schlegel exemplifies this trajectory by demonstrating how were teams of professors and researchers formed in the universities of Columbia, Yale and John Hopkins with the task to build thick and effective attempts of empirical research institutionalization, during the twenties and thirties of the last century, that is, right after the end of the World War One. By proposing his research project, which ended up becoming his doctorate thesis, the author recalls hearing: "We are all realists now; don't worry about these questions"(SCHLEGEL, 1995, p.2). Notwithstanding, he continued concerned with the theme and wanted to understand why the initiative of some academics of that period had failed, whereas the empirical methods had been, in a wide and general way, absorbed by the other human and social sciences. The author's final diagnosis is quite stinging, to the point that even positive advantages contain as well nefarious oppositions:

> Professionally, the background was admittedly nowhere near as favorable. The enormous American Law Institute scholarship engine had already been set in motion, its wheels well greased with money that might have been captured for empirical research in law, but that instead lined the pockets of more traditional legal scholars. That organization provided now tax deductible opportunities for slightly left of center, upper-caste lawyers to socialize in an atmosphere that reinforced the notion that theirs was a learned profession and thus further separated them from the stench of the Untermenschen of the profession. Even more debilitating was the notion fueled by the ALI's mere existence that library, not field, research was the method of legal research among the group in the profession that was the most likely to support empirical research in law. And the profession as a whole, or at least that upper portion about which something is known, was surely not interested in social science intrusions into the "practical" training for the practice of law, although at least parts of the profession were not adverse to using "scientific" methods when such methods seemed to advance the profession's interests. But the professional background could hardly be expected to be favorable at any time; union spokesmen can be expected to oppose innovations in the craft that smell of automation or, in that marvelous English word, of redundancy, and this is as true of unions of persons whose craft skills are mental as of those whose skills are manual.

The counterpoint portrayed by Schlegel in the academic world were the traditional Law professors. These were dedicated to then current law descriptions in a pragmatic key very similar to what is produced today in Brazil as legal practice. The rupture, in the USA, was gradual and was only firmed when universities reached a posterior level in its organization. The "non-research" was migrated to anew kind of legal research, which could be called as "black and white research", in the meaning given by Mike McCoville and Wing Hong Chui, in a manual about legal research methods:

> Legal scholarship has historically followed two broad traditions. The first, commonly called 'black-letter law', focuses heavily, if not exclusively, upon the law itself as an internal self-sustaining set of principles which can be accessed through reading court judgments and statutes with little or no reference to the world outside > the law. Deriving principles and values from decided cases and re-assembling decided cases into a coherent framework in the search for order, rationality and theoretical cohesion has been the fodder of traditional legal scholarship.

> A second legal tradition which emerged in the late 1960s is referred to as 'law in context'. In this approach, the starting point is not law but problems in society which are likely to be generalised or generalisable. Here, law itself becomes problematic both in the sense that it may be a contributor to or the cause of the social problem, and in the sense that whilst law may provide a solution or part of a solution, other non-law solutions, including political and social re-arrangement, are not precluded and may indeed be preferred. The law in context approach has given an extra dimension to legal studies that has been taken up in every higher education institution. (2007, p. 1).

What is inferred from the stretch transcript above is the possibility of construction of two kinds of research differentiated to law. The first lineage conjugates critical noticing of cases' evolution in search of systematization and cannot do without philosophy. From such analysis, it will be possible to identify regularities or ruptures and, with such elements, produce an analysis theoretically informed on legal sources. The second tradition lies on the field of empirical research and seeks understanding law from methods firmed in other areas. The conclusion is obvious. There seems be no more room for describing laws and for a casuistic absent from the pretension of systematization; thickly informed by law theory. To point this, it is worth to transcript the diagnosis of John Henry Schlegel, presented at his afterword, in defense of the validity of his thesis as a work about history of the intellectuals. He aimed to defend himself from the critic that narrative would be a mere story about three professors and not a relevant evaluation of the debates that had taken place on the development of legal research in the USA:

> It is my hope that this book exemplifies my wish to set us on a different, better path for thinking and learning about the ideas in our past. I have suggested three heroes Cook, Clark, and especially Moore. I have attempted to identify, when possible, where their ideas came from. I have tried to show how those ideas changed over time. I have even attempted, at some length, to explain why those ideas took the shape that they did and how they worked out in the practices that these thinkers believed that their ideas im> plied. I have done that work and present it as an example of what intellectual history ought to be.

> It will, I suspect, be easy to dismiss my work for just what it is, an example, and not a particularly representative one at that. "After all, these people were only law professors and we all know that law is not really a discipline," it will be said. There is no way for me to meet this criticism. They were only law professors and not particularly intellectually self-conscious ones at that. But law is a discipline, if a particularly silly one. There is little difference between seeing that, "If Sunstein says this and Michelman that, then it must be the case that "and Shazaam!, a newly minted assistant professor has an article, and seeing that, "If Jevons says this and Seligman says that, then it must be the case that" and Shazaam!, a newly minted assistant professor has an article. There is a dialogue in law, though a particularly inane one, just as there is a dialogue in economics, or sociology, or anthropology (SCHLEGEL, 1995, p. 260).

The sarcastic, very free, text, as usual in afterwords of technically dense works, aimed to protect his object of research from critics in the sense that the legal field would not have intrinsic relevance to be analyzed from the historic point of view. What can be extracted from the stretch is the volume of social critique existing against the scientificity of law in the academic world of USA, so understood as the absent pragmatic production of theory.

So much criticism must have a motivation. It would not be reasonable to suppose the academic USA world took path through an evident critical appreciation against a culture of knowledge production and migrated towards an interdisciplinary debate with other areas without motive. Our guess is that traditional studies face the same dilemma that exists in Brazil: is there a possibility of conducting legal researches having as source only doctrine and jurisprudence? The answer here is, emphatically, no!

The legal researches need a theoretical outline, as any social interpretation. Even though it is an intrinsic interpretation to law, that is, what Marcelo Neves puts clearly as the appreciation of possible decision limits – the term legal interpretation possibility would be too wide and would abandon the link with any potential exercise – demands theoretical appreciation. And this is the correct diagnosis. It is not possible to consider that the mere piling of legal and doctrinal opinions may form the scientific appreciation of a legal phenomenon.

2.2 The philosophical research in law

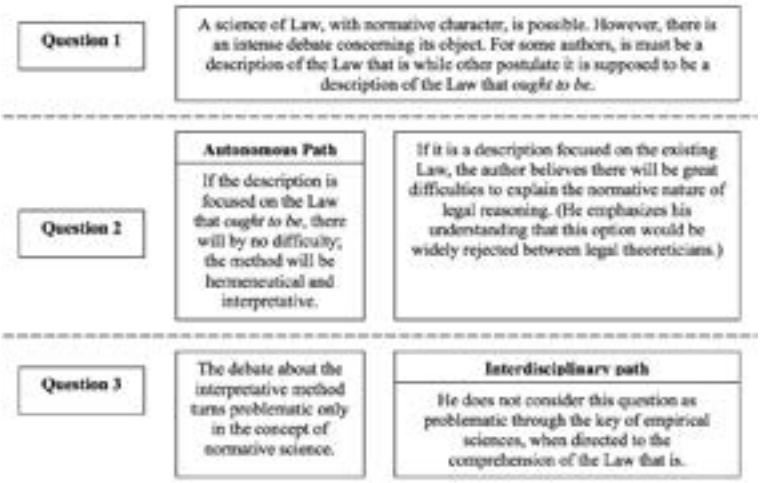
As previously mentioned, the debate about the needs of legal is historically related with the discussion around legal education and the possibility of its improvement. The diagnosis of the 90's decade on this problem was quite emphatic. The legal researches, produced on the post-graduation programs would be deficient and one of the reasons for this would be a gap in the Philosophy of Law education (CONPEDI, 2000). The diagnosis was well-written, because it focused a field still lacking rigor. The historic transition in the legal academic production evidenced a walk to overcome a past period, in which the grey zone between technical studies and legal studies were less pronounced. The current baseline has been inserting theory in the post-graduated studies, what lines off a relevant advance. Notwithstanding, as is clear throughout this text, such modification of the production's state is not plainly consolidated. The employ of the expression "dogmatic studies" has been an element of contribution to this confusion, as mentioned before. In fact, the central question is to differentiate the existence of a methodology driven to the interpretation of the law in contrast to other methodological option to the understanding of the legal system as an object. In synthesis, a question can be formulated: is a specific and particular science of law possible? In recent publication, Jaap Hage evaluated the European debate about the scientific formulation of law and brought three questions (2011, p. 43):

Fig. 2. Questions about legal science posed by Jaap Hage

Question 1	The science of law, in the sense of describing legal norms, is not impossible because of the fact that it is a normative science.
Question 2	Abstractly, all sciences' method, including legal science, is creating a coherent group of propositions that all embraces and, therefore, as well, our social beliefs about law.
Question 3	The appropriate method for a legal normative science consists primarily in the methodologies of Sociology, Psychology and Economy, once the last question to be answered if the collective effectiveness through which norms satisfy the "H" standard (happiness); the traditional hermeneutic methods are only useful to the extent that they help stabilizing the positive law that contributes to social happiness through legal security.

This debate is very antique and it can be indicated that the classic work of Hans Kelsen took a path in search of the formulation of a science of law. The question would be to find a methodological statute for such science that would allow its normative dimension, in contrast to the almost consensus about the other social sciences that, for working with an empirical key (data), walk away from the epistemological problem of legitimating normative interpretation as scientific. The mention to the "H" standard, brought by Jaap Hage, is an explicit dialog with an utilitarian formulation. After an intense analysis, the author respond to the three questions above referred (2011, p. 44):

Fig. 3. The admeasurements of questions about legal science by Jaap Hage



The formulation proposed by Jaap Hage notices that the scientific debate on the legal field is oriented by the two options indicated in this article. Either we have researches related to the interpretation of legal norms, highlighting the concept of law-object and to the interpretation method employed in a wider context, or we have empirical studies in which the author explicitly considers as existent and supposed to be taken in consideration. It may be obvious; however it is not. The definition of these questions, as indicated by Jaap Hage, is crucial to the possibility of an academic research that follows an autonomous route in the interpretation of law. It must be indicated if the law-object studied is being described through the prism of variety of possible decisions in the sense of the ought to be, or if it is being appreciated in the sense of what it is. It is evident that the description of the law that is, absent of theorization, does not possess sense in the debate of scientific legal research. It only gains functionality when coupled with sources for empirical research or enrolled to the philosophical debate, as indicates Mark Van Hoecke, in the same volume:

> The fact of description and interpretation of law, together with the theoretical systematization and formulation, have been the central tasks of legal research, preventing from disregard its enlargement following interdisciplinary direction when it poses law systematically in context, as well as making use of methodologies appropriated from other disciplines . The question here is: how far should researchers of law go in this direction and when will they achieve their point of ineptitude to empirical research? Submission to the paradigm of empirical science is not a good enough reason itself to invest in such techniques; however, to effectively understand law and to elaborate theories and legal concepts, the focus on the law in context is required (2011, p. 18)[12].

The synthesis which can be extracted is positive. Even in the theoretical philosophical debate of highest level, there is an evident recognition of the interlocution required between empirical research, seen as a normative science, and the field of empirical legal research. The comprehension of the prevailing law requires apprehension of reality, that is, of how social interpretation of legal norms is given in the contexts of decision (courts, administration, corporate decisions etc.), inside the social groups dedicated to this ends. Such interpretations require social theory (RAGIN; AMOROSO, 2010). It also demands the analysis of the socially interpreted or effective law, either by groups or by social beliefs. However, the analysis field of possible interpretations of the applicable law, in frames of multivariate decisions – the law that ought to be –, is attached to the debate of normative sciences and has Philosophy and Hermeneutics, accompanied by the past discussion on the conditions of existence of law to jurists and to society, as focus. In one conclusion, it is possible to understand that the methodologies for empirical research have left the ghetto of the external look into law, to be part of the internal cognitive tool-box and that such debate is fruitful. Still, more positively, that this is happening without being necessary to disregard the need of scientific debate internal to law. The only focus that is no longer pertinent is the existence of technical works, without theoretical basis, postulating acceptance as if scientific or academic they were.

2.3. The empirical research

It's left evident that the origins of empirical legal research were given, initially, with works external to the area. It's still common identifying trajectories of legal researchers that searched for graduation in social sciences courses, once their objects of research demanded the apprehension of techniques and the supervision of Professors that were only allocated at social sciences departments or institutes. Consequently, the scientific discussion – with empirical focus – on law ends having its stronger origins in the field of social sciences and not properly in the legal field. A good example has already been given by us when we computed the research resources allocated by the Conselho Nacional de Pesquisa Científica e Desenvolvimento[13] (CNPq), and identified that part of the resources driven to research with a legal object in the areas of Sociology, Anthropology, Political Science and Economy exceeded the amount of resources allocated by the own law area (FRAGALE FILHO, VERONESE, 2004). That is, this areas external to law possessed more resources to study law then the jurists. This is not a negative fact. Is must be interpreted only as evidence that these areas were more dedicated – be it in quantity of researchers, be it in terms of their qualified demands, that is, projects that may be object of fomentation – than active researchers in the legal field. It is evident, this way, that quantitative, qualitative and comparative research methodologies began to be initially employed by social scientists that dedicated to study law and this originated a certain rejection by the legal area regarding such methodologies. As it rests above indicated, the international contemporary literature has reviewed this posture and walked towards the dialog, while the legal empirical research field is consolidating in the world.

[13] National Counsel of Scientific and Technological Development

In the Brazilian case, it is worth to indicate which we have already made reference to. In the shadow of the classic critic of Luciano Oliveira, that undresses the historicism, the methodological syncretism, and the "manualism" practiced in the researches developed in the pots-graduations of law, it is possible to aggregate other two other compelling problems: a first epistemic, related to the naturalization of concepts, and a second, methodological, present at the elaboration of "great-hypothesis" (FRAGALE FILHO, 2013). In a context of "non-research", facing all these problems is an innocuous exercise, as, in a philosophical perspective, it reveals itself as secondary. The empirical research has the merit of evidencing them forcefully, even though it configures a straight entrance door to legal academic works, once it is seen as improper to its own purposes. With effect, in an area populated with technical norms manuals (what, by the way, only reinforces the critic made by Luciano Oliveira), the own discussion about the method seems to be absent, as evidences the surprisingly facultative character of the correlative discipline in some post-graduation programs. In the end, this absence of methodological discussion reinforces the consolidated practices that make the academic work a species of replication of the assented model of a legal opinion[14], built from a bibliographical census, that concludes in favor of an opinio juris ratifying of the initial position of the investigator (NOBRE, 2003). The problem is that, like this, the possibility of distortion of the hypothesis or reconstitution of the demonstration disappears, remaining as only alternative the offer of a contrary opinio juris, that is, of an alternative discourse based on a diverse position of authority, but that contrasts the view of the social investigator.

As long as we are not starting from a specific data-base to design a theoretical state of art, that, for this reason, is here explicitly assumed as precarious and incipient, we believe we are not equivocated when we affirm the existence of empirical works is absolutely marginal on the legal academic field. The tradition of this area is far from incorporating such methodological strategy, as a matter of fact, well observes Maria Tereza Sadek when she indicates:

> "It's a common place finding that the biggest part of Law schools in the country are mere factories of graduateds. The courses are based on conference classes, without space for research or reflections of bigger span. Even at the most traditional courses and of highest level – usually linked to public universities – there are no disciplines dedicated to empirical research (2002, 0. 225)[15].

That is, beyond the absence of the employ of an empirical strategy as methodological resource, the legal courses do not posses a tradition of research tout court. The diagnosis is severe, because it postulates, on one side, that the research tradition is nonexistent at Law schools, and, on the other side, that, if anything there is produced under an academic rubric, whatever it is it does not correspond to the research traditions of higher education. The rigid diagnosis, even though it can eventually be contested by the legal field, seems to find in it some shelter, once the area, on a research fomentation ambit, repeatedly and insistently renews with the speech of its specificity, of its production's particularities, that also ends refuting the methodological strategies of other academic spaces, specially the empirical approach.

This circumstance made legal empirical research so far be effectuated almost exclusively from the outside to the inside, that is, from other disciplines' matrix. A strange view – original from Sociology, Anthropology, Economy and Psychology – seems to consolidate even more around law as an object of investigation. This view, constructed from the outside to the inside, would be guiding the empirical analysis, even when they are made from the own legal field, once the theoretical arsenal mobilized does not take its own roots. With that, the field of investigation rests completely open to other disciplines and the legal research closes itself around its specificity. The oddness around such studies is evident, relegating them to a sort of grey area, that turns difficult (or even forbids) the recognition by both fields involved: the internal (law) and the external (other mobilized knowledges). In other words, despite refuted by the legal field as impertinent to the area's dynamic, they don't either find shelter in the correlated areas. As highlighted by Maria Tereza Sadek, when analyzing the academic production relative to justice systems, a schizophrenia is produced in the field, questioning from the specificity of the object to the disciplinary legitimacy of the analysts, whose discoveries possess few interlocutors (SADEK, 2002, p. 247). In the end, all of this means that researches produced from the outside to the inside are not as well made in consolidated spaces and are also subjected to rejection.

Explaining how this is given is a necessary task and, under the risk of precariousness and incipience, we would like to advance with the idea consonant to which the rejection to the empirical is based on an equivocated perception that is must be necessarily quantitative. Now, nothing could be more false, because the empirical work is, actually, an activity built from observations of the world, that is, built above data, that can be quantitative or qualitative (RAGIN; AMOROSO, 2010). In this sense, like the legal research, under the argument of its specificity, uses as entrance door a view over the ought to be, its rejection makes sense not out of numbers, but out of the difficulty in effectuating observations on the world. Our researchers, before describing the world or establishing causal relations, establishing inferences between some of its different dimensions, are more concerned with saying how it ought to be. Therefore, the answers seem to precede the formulation of the problems.

How to conjugate, thus, empirical legal research with the theoretical approximation previously described, as exposed in the past section? The relevance of this question can be synthesized in one assertive: the knowledge about the social phenomenon at its juridical strand demands comprehension of the intricate notions employed by its participants. Now, in simple terms, how is it possible to understand socially law, fully, without understanding the semantic subtleties of the legal debate? It is certain that if the cognition process is driven to some focus or objects, the need is a lot smaller. Just think of a study which focuses the social consequences of a determinate judicial decision. In truth, the law-object in the case is not understood as a specific social process. It is only appreciated as an "output", that is, in the same way a political or economical decision possesses social consequences. The product is taken as a black box (LATOUR, 2000). The object of this research will be the actors – recipients – of the judicial decision. For example – we can have the appreciation of contractual cost's raise due to a legislative alteration that strengthen subjective rights of the borrowers or, still, that difficult the execution processes. Another example would be to understand the consequences of the creation of special criminal courts for domestic violence and to demonstrate that criminal transaction[16] would not be enough to socially restrain man from spanking women. In fact, these hypothetical studies don't demand, in principle, familiarity with legal knowledge, especially with the debates about polemic points of interpretation. However, there is an interdisciplinary field in which there is a need to concatenate legal parlance and its concepts with empirical apprehension of the phenomena. This is possible, although not quite understood in practice and has been giving place to the occurrence of many problems – expressed in academic products – under the label of interdisciplinarity.

> Another risk the interdisciplinarity speech can turn invisible refers to the fact that, in its name, are developed only forms of disciplinary imperialism within law. This is not an exclusive Brazilian problem, it rounds also law schools in the so called developed countries. So this is, that, for example, many times, implicit or explicitly, under the label of interdisciplinarity, the roll of the economic analysis of law is overestimated and, mainly under the apparent interdisciplinary formula "law and economics", it is intended to subordinate the criteria of law to a rationality purely economic. (…) Also in relation to a political analysis of law, there is a strong tradition of considering law as an epiphenomenon of power or political ideology, claiming a "political jurisprudence". Symptoms of this tradition were manifested, at last, in the movement "critical legal studies". (…) Last, certain tendencies of legal sociology must be adverted that, in an apparently interdisciplinary assumption, transforming sociologic legal knowledge in an ultimate standard of the legal practice, proposing a sort of "sociological jurisprudence". Instead of an interdisciplinary intermediation between sociology and legal dogmatic or in the shape of "law and society", it is, in this case, a "sociological imperialism" or social colonization of law. (NEVES, 2005, p. 209)[17].

In a previous work, Alexandre Veronese divides legal knowledge in four fields of incidence, in order to identify the possibility of theoretical and analytical coupling of the many methodological options (2011, p. 109-130), in a sense near to what was diagnosed by Jaap Hage. The figure below summarizes the exposition of the possible conjugation:

Fig. 4. The four moments of the legal analysis

Consequences	"How is law applied?"	Empirical sciences
Interpretation	"How to analyze law?"	Hermeneutics
Description	"How are norms organized?"	(a)Normative science of law; and (b) empirical sciences
Theoretical assumptions	"What is law?"	Epistemology

A legal research in the field of normative science of law, before indicated as philosophical or theoretical, can move between the three last fields, above listed. It can be a work about legal epistemology, that is, a study on the possibility of cognitive conditions about the legal phea desenvolver-se apenas formas de imperialismo disciplinar no âmbito do direito. Esse não é um problema exclusivamente brasileiro, ele ronda as faculdades de direito também nos chamados países desenvolvidos. Assim é que, por exemplo, muitas vezes, implícita ou explicitamente, sob o rótulo da interdisciplinaridade, superestima-se o papel da análise econômica do direito e, sobretudo sob a fórmula aparentemente interdisciplinar "law and economics", pretende-se subordinar os critérios do direito a uma racionalidade puramente econômica. (...) Também com relação à análise política do direito, há uma forte tradição de considerar o direito como epifenômeno do poder ou ideologia política, pleiteando uma "political jurisprudence". Sintomas dessa tradição manifestaram-se, por último, no movimento "critical legal studies". (...) Por fim, cabe advertir certas tendências da sociologia jurídica de, em pretensão aparentemente interdisciplinar, transformar o conhecimento sociológico do direito em padrão último da prática jurídica, propondo uma espécie de "sociological jurisprudence". Em vez de uma intermediação interdisciplinar entre sociologia e dogmática jurídica ou na forma de "law and society", trata-se, nesse caso, de "imperialismo sociológico" ou colonização social do direito".

nomenon, as well as a debate about the interpretation methods or the description of possible understandings about the current law. It is interesting to notice that empirical sciences, applied to legal phenomena, can help apprehending current law, by the contraposition between effective law and the various possibilities of appliance, besides allowing understanding wider causes and consequences of the legal phenomenon, by apprehending the normative phenomenon combined to the social prism.

The horizon of possibilities is immense. It's even possible to imagine that legal research comes to incorporate an empirical dimension, amplifying the heterogeneity of its practices. The diversity – especially, of methodological strategies – is a preponderant factor to enrich the process of construction of a true academic community in the legal field. Those who make empirical research into it more than one time have already expressed their wishes of belongingness. However, the richness of the future cannot serve as a weak answer to the problems of the present (SANTOS, 2008). Actually, so that the future is not just a horizon of possibilities, strong answers must be offered to (at least) two current questions: the dominance of the technique and the scientific posture.

As to the first question, it must be recognized that, on one side, empirical research is not totally strange to the legal field. But, on the other side, it is also necessary to admit that the common trace of this pioneer empiricism lies precisely in the voluntarism of its achievers. Indeed, the dominance by the legal empirical researchers of the methodological arsenal mobilized in such circumstances is, most times, very precarious, because it is fruit of autodidactism. The apprenticeship occurs in practice and, sometimes, in an intuitive way, usually without any specific formation being obtained during the education process. Now, this can be a problem, not because in order to make legal empirical research it is necessary a total dominance over the techniques which are related, but because it is necessary to know, specially within a collective work (as is, most times, the empirical work), how to lend intelligibility to the dialog about the method. Therefore, eventual methodological problems arising from technical choices are not seen as true black boxes, which can only be opened by "experts", but are faced naturally and collectively discussed. For overcoming this handicap, it is necessary to make an effort to amplify the familiarity of the legal researchers with the empirical research techniques. Beyond desirable, it would be a fundamental initiative to socialize and amplify the knowledge around quantitative techniques (especially, of statistics), so as to qualitative techniques (as, for example, interviews and documents). Actually, it is necessary to overcome the voluntarism of the first initiatives and thicken the knowledge around possible methodological strategies at disposal of the investigator.

As to the posture, it must be recognized – without hesitations or tergiversation – that we are used to other kin of exercise, which does not correspond to the academic model. Indeed, we are used to defend hypothesis instead of truly testing hypothesis. Though it can be used (and effectively be used) to reinforce a supposed specificity of research in law – that, in the end, only amplifies its (our) isolation –, this posture is translated by a strong contamination of the academic work by the juridical practice, that is, by the praxis tradition. In other words, the legal academic works are essentially structures from the binomial problem-solution, instead of facing the classic hypothesis-demonstration line. The reading of the production effectuated within post-graduation law programs is, in this sense, very revealing. With rare exceptions, dissertations and theses do not possess a hypothesis, but start from a problem and, after surveying the different possibilities of solution, indicate which seems to be the most adequate of the answers. Little or none demonstration if effectively made, what explains, by one side, the little importance attributed to the methodological aspects of the works and, by the other side, the strong "technical norms manual" characteristic of the correlated disciplines in the post-graduation in law programs.

Moreover, the question of the posture might be a good clue to explain the resistance of the legal area to the professional master degree. Effectively, as the academic production about law would be essentially structured above the binomial problem-solution, which, by its turn, would be the main characteristic of the professional master degree, we would have a huge difficulty in distinguishing what would actually be academic or professional. In other words, our post-graduation programs, while qualified as academic, would already be professional. We insist, however, that this is just a trace for further investigation, that would require a good mapping and reading work of dissertations and theses for a thicker proof. But, this is a question of public policy within the law post-graduation programs that goes beyond the purposes of this text.

3. Final Considerations

The universe of possibilities is wide and instigating, moreover on a scenario in which the number of interlocutors seems, although slowly, to enlarge itself with the institutionalization of some spaces for socialization of research results. A research coordinated by Luci Oliveira, executed with fomentation from the Ford Foundation by researchers of FGV Direito Rio, was divided in two focuses (OLIVEIRA, 2012). The first was to identify the researchers and means of diffusion of the empirical research in law in the social sciences field. Journals of the area had their data analyzed, conjugated with information from the main congress of the area, carried out annually by the Associação Nacional de Pesquisa e Pós-Graduação em Ciências Sociais[18] (ANPOCS). Under other focus, the research was driven to studies presented at the annual congresses of the Conselho Nacional de Pesquisas e Pós-Graduação em Direito[19] (CONPEDI) and to the analysis of the curricula at the Lattes platform. It is true that, at the CONPEDI, the theme of the empirical research is still very residual – less bodied – than the spaces in construction at the Associação Brasileira de Ciência Política[20] (ABCP) and the ANPOCS. Nevertheless, as hard as predicting the future may be, it does not seem impossible to speculate around two scenarios, which signalize, from one side, being more of the same, and, from the other, to just a shy rearrange of the area. In other words, in the first, the empirical research would remain marginal and strongly executed by other areas, without turning visible a possible equationing of the schizophrenia pertinent to the grey zone in which is found the correlated production, whereas, in the second, the empirical research would be constituted as a legitimate field of investigation, encouraged by pairs, converging to a dialog with researches theoretically informed, such as indicated in the precedent fields. Naturally, researches who propose to privilege the scientific view over reality desire the triumph of the second scenario with its constitution in a palpable reality in the Brazilian academic field. However, the answer is not in our desires. Actually, it is necessary to transform the desire in conquest and, for such, there is still a lot to be done.

There are two indications that the attention to empirical research – and to the marching dialog – must continue. The first is the strengthening of public initiatives for alternative fomentation of researches applied to public policies, which focus has been eminently at the conjugation between the debate of the law universe with the comprehension of wider phenomena. These researches started with isolated initiatives, initially fomented by traditional sources and, after, by new fountains, as resources from the Associação de Magistrados Brasileiros[21] (AMB) (VIANNA; MELO; REZENDE DE CARVALHO; BURGOS, 1997) and of the own Conselho Nacional de Justiça[22] (CNJ)[23]. However, the first large scale initiative, sustained through years, has been the program "Pensando Direito" ["Thinking Law"][24], managed by the Secretariat of Legislative Matters (SAL, in Portuguese) of the Ministry of Justice and fomented by the United Nations Development Program (UNDP). Recently, the Department of Judicial Researches of the CNJ reproduced the well-succeeded Ministry's program and created the project "Justiça Pesquisa" ["Justice Researches"], which is currently in its first call for papers. The varied sources can be seen at the figure below:

The initiatives of creating incipient sources for legal research in Brazil, highlighting the need of empirical researches production, have fomented an interesting phenomenon: the involvement of researchers so far primarily focused on the theoretical debate with applied researches. This fact itself is an evidence that the dialog between theoretically informed researches and the field of empirical researches is already happening and must generate good works and debates in the next years.

The second evidence is that the international debate has amplified itself significantly. It is not possible, in the space of this article, to dimension how much accretion was given to the discussion between researchers of the two alignments. Notwithstanding this, the bibliography referred through this exposition shows that even groups which were primarily dedicated to the theoretical and philosophical debate started to discuss the need of convergence between the two fields. The problematic synthesis to the future of research in law in Brazil, regarding the two evidences mentioned, is the need that these traditional research sources, inserted in the fomentation agencies (CAPES, CNPq and foment foundations), observe this international tendency and destine more resources to convergence researches that allow the debate about Theory of Law, together with the obtainment and analysis of realities' information. That is, so that the debate about law that ought to be is not made separately from the interpretation of the law that is. Following this tendency, the density of the legal scientific field in Brazil will only tend to increase.

Kelsen's legal theory, indetermination and completeness in law

J. Alberto del Real Alcalá[1]

I. Inconclusive law or completeness of law?

One of the most persistent controversies in law is related to its completeness or incompleteness. Roughly speaking, the law is complete when within the universe of foreseen (real) and unforeseen (possible) cases, all are envisaged by the legal system in their full scope. Fullness or completeness is synonymous with "regulation" or "deontological qualification" and its consequence on implementation and interpretation is the absence of legal indeterminacy. An action or situation is "regulated" - and consequently "determined" - in a legal system if there is a rule or principle belonging to this system that qualifies the action or system. Thus, law is declared to have fullness or completeness when it provides a legal qualification in every specific case for every action or situation, real or possible[2]. On the other hand, the law is inconclusive when it does not contemplate a specific solution for each and every given case.

There are three areas that can provide information on whether the law is or isn't complete: the criteria of legal validity; the rules and principles of law; and judicial decisions. In this text I will refer to the question of fullness or incompleteness in relation to the rules and principles of law, as well as the influence of the aforementioned positions on legal interpretation (judicial decisions). To this end I will take into account canonical legislative formulations (rules), but also the implicit content of legislation (principles); in other words, both statutory law and the law implicit in statutory law. In addition to the above, in synop-ses three and four I will discuss the doctrine of the norm as a frame and the thesis of indeterminacy in KELSEN.

As mentioned by R. de ASÍS, the problem under discussion can be approached synthetically as follows: we begin with the fact that "it's obviously difficult to believe that the legal system has sufficient rules to solve all conflicts", even though "the legal system is obliged to view the law as something capable of providing solutions to all problems that may arise". Fullness is therefore a kind of ideal view of the law to be pursued by legal practitioners "who should act as if the legal system were complete". This allows us to distinguish two senses of the term "fullness" (completeness) of the law: an absolute and a relative sense. From the "absolute" point of view "fullness is associated with the existence of norms that solve, as it were, all problems". From the "relative" point of view, "the absence of specific norms for solving certain problems is accepted, but... [at the same time] so is the existence of mechanisms that integrate these problems into the legal system"[3]. In both senses (absolute and relative), the law is full and complete.

In this respect, of the three cases that diminish the occurrence of fullness or incompleteness of the law, it is only the "absence of a norm with a precise solution and [furthermore] the impossibility of finding a solution through various techniques" that would allow us to say in the strict sense that "fullness has deteriorated". The other two cases ("The existence of a norm that provides a precise solution to the problem [in a legal dispute]"; and "The absence of a norm with a precise solution, but the possibility of reaching a solution through various techniques") would not constitute cases of incompleteness of the law[4].

From the above we can infer that the fullness or completeness of the law is assessed according to the following criteria:

Firstly, the ability of the rules and principles to cover any actual or possible (future) case that presents itself within the legal system. If the rules and principles apply to any actual or possible case, they constitute a factor of the completeness of the legal system. If the opposite is the case, the law lacks fullness.

And secondly, for the law to be full or complete, its rules and principles must "regulate or contemplate in all their scope" those cases which they cover, without leaving any aspects of these cases indeterminate. If this is the case, and the rules and principles extend their application to "any aspect" of the cases they relate to, this favours the completeness of the law; if they do not, they affirm incompleteness as a characteristic of inconclusive law.

Approaches to this issue vary according to the various theories of law and of the legal argument used.

Thus, the completeness of law is discussed by contemporary legal positivism with the idea that the law is indeterminate because it is incomplete, as it is impossible for it to regulate the entire universe of foreseen (real) and unforeseen (possible) cases. Consequently, not all legal controversies that judges must resolve can be solved through established law, but rather sometimes (partial indeterminacy) or always (complete indeterminacy) the judge must use his powers of discretion to resolve a particular case[5]. Positivists believe that this conceptual framework - which includes a significant thesis on legal indeterminacy - receives the greatest support when testing the suitability of legal theory to the practice of law[6].

In this debate, an argument that has increasingly gained favour in determining the fullness or incompleteness of the law is related to the explanations given by various legal theories as to why genuine disagreements occur between jurists in a legal case. As Albert CALSAMIGLIA rightly states, "one of the fundamental characteristics of the legal profession is controversy; jurists discuss and have numerous disagreements about the solutions offered by positive law", and yet "very few theories have paid attention to the analysis of these disagreements"[7]. However, the genuine disagreement between jurists involved in a legal case, in terms of legal reasoning, has been explained primarily from two points of view: firstly, from the fundamentals of law applicable to the particular case ("theoretical disagreement"); and secondly, from the question of whether or not these fundamentals are in fact satisfied in a particular case ("empirical disagreement")[8].

The main explanation supplied by legal positivism is empirical and is directly related to: a) the notion of "open texture" in law; b) the consideration of "borderline cases" in the legal system; and c) the significant affirmation of (partial or complete) indeterminacy of the law. Borderline cases (doubtful, indeterminate or marginal cases) must be taken into consideration, as must those legal cases that involve indeterminacy at the moment of application and interpretation, whether in all legal controversies (if it is believed that the law is always indeterminate) or only in some of them (if it is believed that the law is sometimes indeterminate). In other words, the mechanisms of legal interpretation that may be able to solve borderline cases will either never be able to solve them (complete indeterminacy) or sometimes will and sometimes won't (partial indeterminacy).

One legal positivist has been most successful in explaining genuine disagreements between jurists: H.L.A. HART, with his notion of the open texture of the law [9], which arrives at the conclusion that the genuine disagreement between jurists is an "empirical disagreement". Thus, when jurists must apply a legal term to a particular case, genuine disagreement arises because this particular case has fallen into the twilight zone of the area in which the paradigm case of a legal term can be applied. This generates subjective uncertainty or doubt (which may lead to legal indeterminacy) as to whether the particular case falls within or outside of the area of clear application or clear non-application. The result in this case is that the legal term is "indeterminate" within the legal system, which consequently lacks fullness and is inconclusive. The disagreement or dispute is an empirical one because it centres on the act of applying (qualifying) a legal concept to a particular case. It is true, as Jules COLEMAN warns, that if we pay too much attention to the genuine controversies between jurists when resolving the issue of fullness or incompleteness we may end up understanding law exclusively in terms of litigants and judges, and overlook the important role of law as a "guide" for citizens[10].

In opposition to the current positions of legal positivism, the contemporary anti-positivist approach, as developed by L.L. FULLER and R. DWORKIN, uses two core arguments to support the fullness of the law: a) the radical statement that the implicit contents of the law are integrated into the judicial sphere, and that these implicit contents avoid legal indeterminacy by producing an "ex post determinacy" of law in relation to any given legal case, whether in relation to the explicit law of rules or the implicit law of principles[11]; b) the "argument of controversy" in response to the question as to why genuine disagreements arise between jurists.

The anti-positivist theory of L.L. FULLER already provided an argument in favour of implicit law: "in the law or in legal provisions there is always a substratum of implicit law"[12]. FULLER also uses other arguments in the field of constitutional law to explain why a theory on the sources of law must include implicit law:

(i) because "the drafting of any Constitution would be impossible unless the writer can assume that the legislator will agree to accept certain implicit notions.... [for] if the writer tries to foresee all possible arbitrary actions of the legislative power, his constitution will turn into a museum of monstrosities and excesses"[13];

(ii) because "it is necessary to anticipate emergency situations, and to foresee the modifications that will have to be made in order to confront such situations"[14];

(iii) another reason "why a written Constitution cannot avoid assuming implicit principles on the integrity of the law that can not be formulated ... is the simple fact that the words of a Constitution must be interpreted before they can be applied" given "the fallacy of supposing that a judge simply extracts from a legal text a meaning that the legislator has inserted into it". FULLER talks of the "implicit sources" of law, "which are derived from the uses, practices, community attitudes and a sort of consensus" in relation to them, which allows the law to cover the whole range of cases the judge is presented with, and to do so to their full extent[15].

Given that for R. DWORKIN "the legal norm is an ideal more noble than the norm of a legal text"[16], only a theory on the sources of law as described above (that includes implicit law) can allow the rules and principles to cover any legal case, in such a way that the judge is able to determine the "demands" of the law in every legal dispute. For citizens, this would make it possible for "every one of them to have rights and duties in relation to other citizens and in relation to their government, even when not all of these rights and duties are codified and written down in books"[17]. This leads him to reject the positivist claim that if a legal dispute is not regulated by explicit law it is because the law is indeterminate. From this anti-positivist approach, a legal system will always have rules and/or principles (identified and determined by the criteria of legal validity) that are able to contemplate any problems of any case that presents itself to the legal system. This means that any legal dispute can always be resolved - and to its full extent - by the law, and that the law is therefore complete.

This position depends largely on the "argument of controversy" as an explanation of genuine disagreements between jurists. In fact, modern anti-positivism resolves this issue in such a way that, through interpretation, rules and principles can be determined for every real or possible case. This is the case even where these rules and principles include imprecise terms that may at first appear to generate indeterminacy in their application to a particular case. Thus, in contemporary anti-positivism the argument of controversy constitutes a factor of the completeness of law in relation to rules and principles, and in the two following senses:

a) In relation to the "disputed" nature (as opposed to open texture) of law, and the Dworkian distinction between the concept itself (legal) and conceptions (of the concept)[18]. One should bear in mind that R. DWORKIN, in opposition to the "open texture" nature of law described by Hartian legal positivism, claims that the law (rules and principles) is always "determinable" (for every case) even when it is "disputed". This means that any problem in law dealt with by legal practitioners that is initially indeterminate can always be resolved by the mechanisms of legal interpretation and integration[19].

There is a prior reasoning that underlies the anti-positivist explanation as to why jurists disagree. It is crucial to understand that when the argument of controversy distinguishes between a "concept" (legal) and "conceptions" (of the concept) it is not referring to the difference between the meaning of a legal term that is part of a norm and its empirical application (extension) or non-application to a given case. Rather, the distinction is a "conceptual", theoretical one concerning differing conceptions (of a theoretical/doctrinal nature) that each of the parties have in a legal dispute in relation to the term or legal concept included in the norm that the legal practitioner is interpreting. In other words, the argument centres on the distinction between the "abstract idea (or conception)" and the "specific idea (or conception)" that the legal practitioner applies to the legal term in order to particularise the abstract idea in a given case[20].

Therefore, the reason why genuine disagreements occur between jurists is not, as the positivists wrongly claim, because the legal terms or concepts under discussion (as to whether they should or shouldn't be applied in a particular case) have an open texture and are therefore indeterminate. They occur because such legal terms are "abstract" concepts. And in order for the abstract concepts contained in a rule or principle to be applied to a specific case, it is not enough to simply observe the facts and subsume them under some applicable paradigm; but rather a particular "conception" of the legal concept must be developed in relation to the given case. In short, the key to explaining legal controversy is the fact that each party to the dispute develops a "different conception" of the same legal term. This is where legally controversy truly derives from.

[18] DWORKIN, R.; "Thirty Years On", in Harvard Law Review, vol. 115, 2002, pp. 1655 et seq.

[19] DWORKIN, R: Los derechos en serio, p. 176 and also p. 173. Also cf. [20] DWORKIN, R.: Law's Empire, cit., p. 71.

In fact, R. DWORKIN classifies abstract concepts (those that necessarily require a particular theoretical/doctrinal conception in order to be applied) as "disputed" concepts. Of course, to say that a concept is disputed does not in any way imply that the concept is vague and indeterminate[21]. In fact, disputed concepts are not indeterminate but simply subject to litigation: the parties dispute over their specific meaning in a given legal case.

b) In view of the above, the argument of controversy that states that in legal disputes there is a theoretical disagreement between jurists regarding the conception of legal terms, and not an empirical disagreement regarding their application, represents, for anti-positivists, an important factor in the completeness of the law in relation to rules and principles. In fact, according to A. CALSAMIGLIA, the argument ofdisagreement between jurists is the Dworkian anti-positivists' most potent weapon for challenging contemporary positivism. In his own words: "There are disagreements about what it is the law demands. This is the basic disagreement [between jurists], the one which must be explained, the one faced by those who deal with law from an internal point of view. Disagreements between jurists aren't about whether or not a law has been passed. Their disagreement goes much deeper as it is about the extent to which state coercion should be used in this case and how it can be justified. The problem is not just about identifying the text without using it. And this requires the reconstruction of something more complex and abstract than the semantics of the norm. Even if they agree on which laws are in force, and agree on the meaning of the wording of the law, theoretical disagreements about what the law demands [in each case] can and do arise. Dworkin would suggest that the law is an interpretative concept and that texts say nothing in and of themselves. A particular approach is required and that is what positivism has not understood". [22]

The conclusion is that, from a contemporary anti-positivist - and especially Dworkian - point of view, the controversies between jurists are "interpretative" and can therefore be resolved through the methods of interpretation afforded by the legal system. Consequently, these controversies do not imply any legal indeterminacy[23].

[21] For T. ENDICOTT, the "abstract" concepts that Dworkin speaks of are "vague" concepts. See ENDICOTT, T.: "Herbert Hart and the Semantic Swing", in Legal Theory, v. 4, no. 3, pp. 283-300.; Spanish translation: ID., "Herbert Hart y el aguijón semántico", in NAVARRO, P.E. and REDONDO, C. (comps.), La relevancia del Derecho, Barcelona, Gedisa, 2002, pp. 37-38.

The issue of whether or not the law is complete or incomplete has an impact on how judges approach the task of legal interpretation. They can either accept the thesis that cases which are (partly or completely) "non-regulated", and the rights and duties of citizens that are argued over judicially, are ineradicably indeterminate, meaning that the law is an inconclusive system. Or they can preserve their decision-making capacity through interpretative methods and rules of construction that always and in every case resolve the initial indeterminacy, meaning that the law is a complete system.

So, according to the anti-positivists, the resolution of a legal dispute is never indeterminate as long the judge is always able to identify a unique and correct response within the law. This statement that the law is complete is of crucial importance to anti-positivism, as it is the final and most important step of the argument that it uses to reject the conclusion of legal indeterminacy. It is so important that anti-positivist law is largely reduced to a theory of adjudication, a theory of how to construct the judicial decision: it practically views law as an argumentative practice, wherein the most important development is the judicial process. Naturally this may give the impression that, according to anti-positivism, what makes the law complete is not that it is complete in and of itself, but rather that the anti-positivist theories of law (particularly its theories of adjudication) act as a factor of completeness (and the main factor) while constructing the judicial decision.

A closely related point is that the anti-positivist approach has largely focused on how to tackle the hard cases that arise in law, a test bed for theories of law and adjudication in observing how the judicial decision is constructed in legal practice. Indeed, Dworkian anti-positivism largely reduces contemporary positivism to an erroneous "theory of hard cases" where Dworkin understands hard cases as those that arise in a legal system "when a particular litigation cannot be clearly subsumed under a legal norm previously established by an institution, [and that in order for them to be settled] the judge has 'discretion' to decide the outcome of the case". [24]

However, R. DWORKIN argues that where, in positivism, the judge "has discretion to decide the outcome of the case", this implies that if "one of the parties has a pre-existing right to win the case,... this idea [from the positivist point of view] is no more than a fiction". Indeed, when positivism settles a legal case in this way it is creating "new rights": "the judge has introduced new rights [through the interpretative solution, granting them to the party that wins the case, and] applying them, retroactively, to the case"[25].

From an anti-positivist point of view, the description of the judicial function in terms of discretion in hard cases does not give a satisfactory account of what adjudication is or of the structure of judicial duty[26]. The alternative for anti-positivism is to try "to present and defend a better theory" that more plausibly reflects legal practice [27]. To this end, Dworkian anti-positivism must construct the "judge Hercules procedure": a model of an ideal judge, a paradigm of how to construct the judicial decision in hard cases, although equally valid for easy cases[28]. The Hercules procedure is also a descriptive and prescriptive perspective on adjudication, based on the idea of law as an integral social practice that takes into account the internal point of view of those who participate in the legal practice; in other words, arguments in the practice of law that develop within the judicial process while solving the legal controversies that arise therein.

In fact, the Herculean procedure constitutes one of the most important strategies that anti-positivism (in its paradigmatic Dworkian version) uses to provide grounds for the completeness of the law, and to counter the thesis of its partial or complete indeterminacy. The basis of the Herculean procedure is the conceptual link between law and morality, based on a theory of the sources of law that includes both explicit statutory law and the implicit content of statutory law. This theory leads to the claim that the legal system has always envisaged a "correct" response to every real or possible legal dispute. The result is that the judge can settle all cases in law.

As an argument generated by anti-positivism in favour of completeness, the unique characteristics of the Herculean procedure which provide an ideal model of judicial decision-making, do a great deal to vindicate the view of law as a full system. I refer to the following characteristics:

(1) Always settling a dispute according to the law; that is, through arguments of principle, and not with political or opportunistic arguments (discretional arguments)[29].

(2) The bivalent structure of the judicial decision, by virtue of which the Hercules procedure contains a "bivalent" logical and conceptual scheme for judicial decision-making. The judge does not have a third possibility available in which a rule and/or principle "neither applies nor does not apply", as this would constitute an "indeterminate" response. In anti-positivist theories, judicial bivalence is a technical resource for the completeness of the law, even for confronting the most complex legal disputes.

(3) The correct univocal response that the law has for any present or future legal dispute[30].

(4) The strength of principles in constructing the judicial decision: to bring about a situation wherein the law covers all cases (foreseen and unforeseen), the (implicit) principles of law play a very important role in the legal argument of the Herculean procedure. The use of principles for the completion of law has often been used in contemporary anti-positivism as, for example, L.L. FULLER's theory on adjudication when used to solve what he called "problematic cases".[31]

(5) The "unlimited capacity" of the interpretative resources of law as a factor in the completeness of law[32].

By virtue of these premises, judges perform their duties with the supposition that for any legal dispute that citizens bring before them "there is some solution inherent in law that is waiting to be discovered". For this reason, the judge "must never assume that the law is incomplete, inconsistent or indeterminate"; and when it appears to be so, he must realise that the defect is not within the law but rather due to the limited abilities of the judge himself to discover the solution that the legal system envisages for the particular dispute, whether by virtue of rules (explicit statutory law) or principles (implicit law). So the judge not only has no room to create law in the performance of his duties, but he must also justify what he believes the law to be. He must work to identify the principles that are objectively enshrined within the system, and if divergent ideas (conceptions) on these principles exist, he must decide which of these ideas corresponds to the best conception of these principles[33].

Completeness in the area of the judicial decision means that "every case compiled involves an opinion [the judge's decision] that maintains that one of the parties has, after the [judge's] assessment, the best legal argument [and therefore wins the case]" within the legal dispute[34]. Thus, according to this anti-positivist position, if the judges did not follow the Herculean procedure as an objective and decisive procedure for resolving both hard and easy cases, it would be impossible for them to fulfil the professional duty required of them by the Rule of Law to always settle any legal dispute raised by citizens[35]. This is the sine qua non for satisfying the fundamental right of citizens to effective justice[36].

However, two significant kinds of objections have been made to the anti-positivist view of adjudication. First of all, is it really possible (and not merely conceptually) to totally eliminate the indeterminacy that sometimes occurs in law? Or is this not a useless task, or even a not really desirable one, as HART[37] or T.ENDICOTT[38] claim, for any theory of adjudication, given the structure of the law? Another objection relates to the question of whether this doctrine can adequately respond to challenges such as the argument of higher-order vagueness (for example, the distinction between clear cases and hard cases is not always clear cut). According to T.ENDICOTT, the legal theory of R.DWORKIN - to which the thesis of the completeness of the law is fundamental - cannot respond to this argument.

II. Legal indeterminacy in Kelsen

According to the criteria discussed in the text, Hans KELSEN's theory of law, a paradigm of legal positivism, should be classified as one of the legal theories that accept the incompleteness of law due to its indeterminacy. Traditionally, it has been claimed that KELSEN's thesis of the indeterminacy of law derives from his doctrine of the "norm as a frame".

However, I would like to briefly present a number of important points that question this affirmation. If these reasons are valid, it would be more correct to say that H.KELSEN's legal theory contains a "thesis of the completeness" of law than a thesis of indeterminacy. Consequently, whilst DWORKIN and KELSEN set out from opposing positions and move in different directions, both of them would arrive at the same conclusion that law is "complete".

The reasons I put forward can be resumed as one: Kelsen's legal theory does not really contemplate borderline cases, as long as it can settle all present and possible cases "according to the law". And it would seem meaningless to "accept" the thesis of legal indeterminacy, while simultaneously "denying" the existence of indeterminate cases in law. In my opinion, this is precisely what H.KELSEN's thesis of law does. I therefore question the traditional view that Kelsen accepts the thesis of legal indeterminacy.

Four strong arguments serve to undermine the view that H. Kelsen's theory of law contains a thesis of indeterminacy. They are as follows:

1) The argument for the distinction between "individual" and "general" norms.

From a Kelsenian point of view, "the norm can be either individual or general in nature. A norm is individual when it dictates a unique and individually determined required behaviour; for example, a judge's decision"; and "a norm is general when it dictates a required behaviour determined at a general level."[39]

From the Kelsenian perspective, the individual norm seems to correspond to clear cases. Logically, the Rule of Law provides judges with precise, and largely objective cases, and these are used to settle clear cases in accordance with pre-established law. In this type of court case the ruling must be made from within the law, in contrast to cases that can only be settled discretionally. However, these procedures are insufficient when the legal case has no solution within the legal system because it is a borderline case.

If we consider the fact that H. KELSEN equates the individual norm with the typical situations of clear cases, it is probably true that the general norm should correspond to those represented by borderline cases. However, this is where the contradiction arises in Kelsen's legal theory, as will now be explained.

2) The argument of the "norm as a framework", based on the above distinction.

As H.L.A. HART observed, borderline cases are located in the "area of indeterminacy" or "twilight zone" of the area in which rules can be applied, for "in any legal system there will also be cases that are not legally regulated".[40] These cases are then indeterminate.[41]

Borderline cases are characterised as being:

i)- "marginal cases", in that they are at the limit between the clear applicability or clear inapplicability of the law.

ii)- "doubtful cases", in that it is uncertain whether or not the law can be applied to them with certainty.

iii)- "indeterminate cases" by virtue of the consequence of indeterminacy they produce when applying the law.

iv)- "hard cases", by virtue of the complexity involved in constructing the judicial decision in these indeterminate cases, which are either incompletely regulated or even not regulated in any sense by the legal system. This contrasts with the simplicity of constructing a decision in clear cases.

According to ENDICOTT, borderline cases can be synthetically defined as "those cases in which one does not know whether the rule should be applied or not, and the fact that one does not know is not due to ignorance of the facts".[42] I use the nomenclature borderline cases or marginal cases, as this is the most common in legal theories that accept the thesis of indeterminacy.

Traditionally, the category borderline cases and the thesis of legal indeterminacy are common to positivist legal theories. However, an interesting case arises in this context: H. KELSEN's theory of law, considered as one of the paradigms of legal positivism. Kelsenian legal theory supposedly allows some type of a thesis of legal indeterminacy, but it also tries to make it compatible with the opposite thesis of the completeness of the law. In my opinion, stating one thing alongside its opposite its inevitably paradoxical. This contradiction arises because in Kelsenian legal theory, genuinely incomplete legal cases do not really arise. In fact, all legal cases that this legal theory considers can be resolved "according to the law". This seems to run counter to the very nature of an authentic borderline case.

The work of completing the law, and of consequently eliminating all legal indeterminacy, is performed by H.KELSEN through his theory of the "norm as a framework". For Kelsen, "The legal system is a system of general and individual norms that are interrelated in accordance with the principle that law regulates its own creation. Every law of this system is created according to the prescriptions of another and, ultimately, according to the fundamental norm that constitutes the unity of the system".[43] In this regard, "From a dynamic point of view, the court's decision represents an individual norm, created on the basis of a general norm of statutory or customary law, just as this general norm is created by the Constitution"[44]. And, "For this reason, the judge is always a legislator, even in the sense that the content of his rulings can never be exhaustively determined by a pre-existing norm from substantive law"[45].

Consequently, for Kelsen, a judicial decision "is an act by which a general norm, a law, is applied; but at the same time it is an individual norm that imposes obligations on one or both of the parties in conflict". So "by resolving the dispute between two parties", what occurs is that "the court actually applies a general norm of customary or statutory law". And although, as H. KELSEN claims "the court simultaneously creates an individual norm establishing a particular sanction to be imposed upon a certain individual", this creation does not mean that the judge is going "beyond" the law. This is because "this individual norm can be referred to general norms just as the law is referred to the Constitution".[46] From this it can be deduced that the legal system can always provide the solution to any legal case from "within" the law.

What seems to be clear is that the judicial decision in Kelsenian indeterminate cases, which are resolved using the notion of the norm as a framework, does not present exactly the same characteristics as those typical of the judicial ruling in genuine borderline cases: that is, those that do not just present themselves as indeterminate "initially" but "ultimately" turn out to be indeterminate. And for this reason they find no solution within the legal system. However, KELSEN does not consider this type of case. Moreover, from his point of view, when the judge resolves indeterminate (Kelsenian) cases, he is not "stepping outside" of the law, but rather reaches a resolution from within the possibilities of the norm, and hence, according to the law.

The question that now arises is whether a genuinely indeterminate case can be resolved according to the law, because then it would not "ultimately" be an indeterminate case, but rather a hard case contemplated by the law (a pivotal case).

3) Even where H. KELSEN accepts the notion of the judge as legislator, the argument that his legal theory refutes the "theory of gaps" in the law rejects the indeterminacy of the law: "This theory [of gaps] is erroneous, as it is based on ignorance of the fact that when the legal system does not impose any obligation upon an individual, his behaviour is permitted." [And] "where an isolated legal norm cannot be applied, it is nonetheless possible to apply the legal system, and this is also an application of the law"[47].

Moreover, H. KELSEN believes that the "theory of gaps" is a "fiction", allowing for the thesis that the "completeness" of the law is always possible: "The legal system cannot have gaps." The theory of gaps is really a fiction, because it is always logically possible, even though at times inadequate, to apply the legal system when passing judgment"[48].

4) The argument for the "completeness" of the law, which he advocates from a legal positivist position that he defines as "consistent", is incompatible with the thesis of legal indeterminacy:

H. KELSEN tries to safeguard first and foremost "the postulate of legal positivism that every specific case must be resolved on the basis of current positive law."[49] And, in his opinion, "it is essential for a consistent positivist theory of law to show that the system of positive law contains this express or tacit authorization [to "fill this or that gap"]"[50] But the idea that positive law can resolve any type of case does not seem very compatible with the thesis of indeterminacy.

III. Conclusion

For contemporary legal anti-positivism, the law is clearly complete in relation to laws and principles, because the legal system is always able to provide complete regulation through the interpretation of these laws and principles in relation to any real or possible case. This approach argues for the completeness of the legal system through a theory on the sources of created law, including explicit and implicit law, from which a solution to the Universe of real and possible cases can be provided. Non-regulated cases are seen as gaps, a sort of defect of the law, but one that can be fixed through a theory of interpretative adjudication, which is always able to provide a correct response to any legal dispute. It follows that the completeness of law is one of the theses that most clearly distinguishes anti-positivism (especially the Dworkian paradigm) from contemporary legal positivism. On the other hand, legal positivism claims that the nature of the legal practice is such that the law is inconclusive as it is incomplete, and supports a (partial or complete) thesis of legal indeterminacy.

This has a consequence on the application of the law and on legal interpretation. For anti-positivists, completeness necessarily evokes a "model judge" capable of resolving all current or future disputes, regarding which the law will never be indeterminate; and even if a case is initially indeterminate, this has no significance or relevance to the law, as the case can always be resolved through the interpretative methods supplied by the law itself. Legal positivism, by contrast, questions the fullness of the law by noting its open texture, the existence of borderline cases and the resulting conclusion of legal indeterminacy that gives rise to judicial discretion. The inevitable result is that the law is inconclusive as it is incomplete.

The disagreement between the two legal theories seems to reside in the "ideal description" of the law given by anti-positivism and the more realistic description of the legal practice given by Hartian positivism and by the followers of this doctrine. In any case, both theories currently compete with each other to provide the best description of the legal system underlying the Constitutional Rule of Law.

However, this account of the differences between positivism and anti-positivism breaks down when we consider the thesis of indeterminacy in Kelsen and his doctrine of the norm as a framework. If the four arguments we put forward to consider his (apparent) thesis of legal indeterminacy are correct, they may put into question the claim that Kelsen's legal theory allows for legal indeterminacy. This is because it does not appear logical to accept a system of law that both "indeterminate" and yet "without gaps", as suggested by KELSEN. In other words, if we accept that Kelsen's legal theory allows both one thesis (legal indeterminacy) and its opposite (the completeness of the law), we must at least accept that H. KELSEN's legal theory contains a "paradox" in relation to indeterminacy.

In my opinion, these considerations show that this legal theory is closer to the thesis of the completeness of law than it is to the thesis of the indeterminacy of the law. Or at least, they seem to seriously challenge the idea that this theory of law is really a thesis of indeterminacy.

Perhaps the issue can be clarified by distinguishing between cases that are indeterminate in the Kelsenian sense, which are not real borderline cases as they can be resolved within the law and according to the law; and cases that are indeterminate in the Hartian sense, which can only be resolved by "stepping outside" the legal system, as they consist of cases that are really not contemplated by the law, or incompletely contemplated. Only these latter cases constitute genuine borderline or indeterminate cases.

It seems that contemporary legal positivism of the Hartian variety understands indeterminacy in terms of cases that are "un-regulated" (or at least incompletely regulated) by the law. And indeterminacy from Kelsen's perspective refers, by contrast, to cases that are regulated by the law "within the norm as a framework". Therefore, whilst cases that are indeterminate in the Hartian sense can not be resolved by the legal system, the indeterminate cases considered by H. KELSEN can always be resolved by the law and by the system of established sources by applying the doctrine of the "norm as a framework". Consequently, such cases never ultimately imply the indeterminacy of applicable law. So why is it claimed that H. KELSEN's theory of law contains a thesis of legal indeterminacy? It should also be considered that if Kelsen's legal theory does indeed contain a thesis of indeterminacy, it would be a thesis of indeterminacy that denies the existence of indeterminate cases, which seems meaningless.

Thus, if this reasoning is valid, it means that the legal theories of H. KELSEN and of R. DWORKIN paradoxically converge in denying legal indeterminacy, albeit from radically different and opposing positions. It would also follow that both theories include a thesis of the completeness of the law.

From ought-to-be to ought-to-do semantic investigation in Kelsen and Castañeda

Gustavo Vieira Vilar Garcia[1]

Abstract: Accordingly to the polish legal philosopher Jerzy Wróblewski, although Kelsen's normativism was one of the first legal theories able to be built-up over solid philosophical foundations, it still suffers from an important theoretical lack, which corresponds to the non-characterization of its peculiar semantics, the ought-to-be. In fact, Kelsen assumes explicitly in his Pure Theory of Law that the difference between the Is and the Ought "cannot be explained further" and that "we are immediately aware of the difference".

It is so an unconcluded work, especially within philosophy of law, the adequate description of the semantic basis of norms and normativity. For this task, it seems that we can resort to logic, and more specifically to the logic of norms in order to achieve a better understanding of the position occupied by norms in language, and its function in logical theory (despite Kelsen's deep distrust towards the logical approach to normativity).

It seems that a valid and sharp analysis of this subject was undertaken by Guatemalan philosopher Héctor-Néri Castañeda. Overcoming the long-term discussion about the proper status of norms between prescriptions and propositions, Castañeda assume norms to be a species of the proposition gender and proceed to a semantic correction: rather than belonging to the ought-to-be, as maintained Kelsen and the deontic logic tradition, it seems that a most suitable semantic basis for norms is the ought-to-do. This position has some roots in the history of philosophy, that could be traced as far as to the autonomy of practical reason in Aristotle, and as near as the recent development of the logic of action, within which Castañeda's proposal could be adjoined. As for the ought-to-do, it expresses an important alternative for the description of norms that could deal either with the profuse linguistic inconsistencies (paradoxes) that emerge from the formalization of arguments with prescriptive elements in traditional deontic logic, and also with the semantic deficiency in positivistic normativism.

Keywords: ought-to-be; ought-to-do; semantics.

1. Introduction

This paper, entitled "From ought-to-be to ought-to-do: a semantic investigation in Kelsen and Castañeda" intends to adjoin theoretical contributions originated from deontic logic, more specifically from the logic of action as it was proposed by Guatemalan philosopher Héctor-Neri Castañeda[2], and from the normativistic positivism of Hans Kelsen, taken as a privileged theoretical model of law as a system of norms.

The beginning of our inquiry can be traced back to a conceptual lack existent inside kelsenian thought (WRÓBLEWSKI, 1981, p. 510). Although the author sought to conceive a science branch having norms as its central element, his description of norms as featuring an ought-to-be of human conduct is limited to his straight assertion that the difference between what is and what ought-to-be cannot be further probed: says Kelsen it is impossible to deny the fundamental difference between something that is and something that ought-to-be (KELSEN, 2006, p. 06).

This self-limitation in Kelsen's thought, clearly pointed out by legal philosopher Jerzy Wróblewski, seems to indicate insistently the need to develop a semantical approach specifically aimed to norms, concerned with the particular problems and fundamental features of legal systems and normativity.

This claim, however, seems to be in contradiction with a warning stated by Kelsen himself and addressed to the attempt of pulling together logic and normativity: according to the author it is not possible to apply logical principles to legal systems for a very straightforward reason: norms, unlike propositions, are not true or false. Ultimately, norms could be qualified as valid or invalid, if enacted by the competent authority and accordingly to the adequate legislative procedure, a classification which keeps no connection to the typical bivalence of propositions.

[2] Born in San Vicente Zacapa, Guatemala, Héctor-Neri Castañeda began his philosophical studies at the University of San Carlos, Guatemala. In the United States the author obtained his Ph.D. title, granted by the University of Minnesota, under the tutelage of Wilfrid Sellars. Castañeda taught in many universities, among them the Wayne State University, Oxford University, Indiana University, University of Texas. Founded the philosophy journal Nôus. Died in 1991. (RAPAPORT, 2005).

Another problem that could be associated with the last one is the necessary relationship settled between logic and proposition. Since Frege, formal logic was established as the natural course of development of logical theory, by embodying mathematic's typical language and also by assuming mathematical problems as datum for the investigation of language. In linguistic field, proposition was taken as the basic unit of assertive activity and the primary work material of logicians. Since propositions concern to states of being, a significant part of language could not be adjoined to logic, or was hardly done, bringing forth several technical inconsistencies and linguistic paradoxes.

Deontic logics, in this scenario, emerges as a theoretical possibility of systematic comprehension of prescriptive expressions in general, as imperatives, mandates, orders, requests and norms belonging to manifold normative systems, as moral rules, the rules of a game and, finally, legal norms.

In this vast framework of prescriptive categories under the analytical lenses of deontic logic, what is the possible contribution to clarifying the logical form of norms? How to preserve the relative autonomy of law in view of theoretical approaches that seems not to consider the existence of principles generated by legal systems themselves to face their normative conflicts and gaps?

The imprecision (or absence) of a semantical basis to norms in Kelsen's work authorizes the search for comparative models in normative logics and, specifically regarding Castañeda's logical system, a model that admits settling legal experience over practical reason, from where emerges the ought-to-do semantic model.

2. Kelsen and the is-ought dichotomy

Within the limits of a legal system, the ought expressions from which we can derive prescriptions and rules of conduct receive the particular status or title of legal norms. Admitting norms as the central object of his investigation, the Austrian legal philosopher Hans Kelsen aimed to describe norm-analysis in a scientific manner, which culminated in the publishing, in 1934, of his celebrated Pure Theory of Law. The seminal work of the major exponent of legal positivism in its normativistic branch was, according to the Polish legal theorist Jerzy Wróblewski, one of the first legal theories able to be built-up over solid philosophical foundations, related with the is-ought dichotomy, located in the basis of positivistic thinking:

> The dualism or dichotomy of the Is and the Ought is basic for Kelsen's normativism. This dualism is not only proclaimed as one of the foundations of the pure theory but also in fact is highly relevant in normativistic thinking. It is, thus, not a decoration making the positivistic antecedents more philosophic, but is the real basis of normativism. (WRÓBLEWSKI, 1981, p. 509)

A remote and not fully developed version of the dichotomy already appears in the Treatise of Human Nature, from David Hume, under the title of what would be later called "Hume's Law", or naturalistic fallacy thesis. Hume observes that many authors of his time were using premises connected by the verb "is", in order to prescribe a rule of conduct. He then identified a logical error that consisted in extracting from factual premises, which belonged to the logical category of is, conclusions entailing a prescription, without the addition of any premise that enabled this logical consequence. Although Hume had aimed the moralists of his time by criticizing the logical form of their arguments, the author, reflexively, suggests the existence of two specific modalities of thought, one of them directed to the assertive activity through the use of the 'is' copula, and the other headed to the prescription of conducts, by means of the 'ought' copula.

The most remarkable consequence of the dichotomy seems to be the postulation of an inferential barrier (GENRO, 2007, p. 84), that distinguishes and separates these two apparently well-organized dimensions of thought. In the dimension we shall call cognitive our thought turns towards the acquaintance and description of the world, concerning itself with the truth or falsehood of its assertions — the scientific attitude of thinking. On the other hand, the normative dimension of thought seeks to ascribe courses of action to its addressees, determining how agents should conduct themselves — the characteristic field of morals and law.

Kelsen's accession to the naturalistic fallacy thesis is doubtless, as we can extract from the following excerpt of the Pure Theory of Law. After having briefly discussed the necessary distinction between the norm, taken as an ought-to-be of human conduct, and the conduct itself, as a part of the being dimension, that may or may not conform to the normative pattern, Kelsen approaches the topic:

> The difference between is and ought cannot be explained further. We are immediately aware of the difference. Nobody can deny that the statement: "something is" – that is, the statement by which an existent fact is described – is fundamentally different from the statement: "something ought to be" – which is the statement by which a norm is described. Nobody can assert that from the statement that something is, follows a statement that something ought to be, or vice versa. (KELSEN, 2005, p. 06)

The kelsenian insight, however, abandons us to our own efforts, as it refuses to establish minimum parameters with which we could examine the is-ought dichotomy within his theory, claiming only that "we are immediately aware the difference"[3].

If we cannot find amidst Kelsen's theory an adequate description of the semantic structure of legal norms we should pursue it elsewhere, having in mind the fundamental distinction within his work of is and ought, often alluded by the author.

Thereby, the systematic analysis of the logical relations between norms is in debt to the great development of deontic logics, and to the relative autonomy it achieved face modal logics.

Although Kelsen had contact with the approach given to prescriptive statements by deontic logics, as displays the debate he had with the German logician and legal philosopher Ulrich Klug between 1959 and 1965, Kelsen denied the use of logical principles in the evaluation of legal norms because these, unlike propositions, were not able to express contents imbued with truth values (truth and falsehood) (KELSEN; KLUG, 1984).

Despite Kelsen's warning, normative or deontic logics and, specifically, the logical approach to norms had a considerable development in the course of the last century, mostly due to Georg Henrik von

[3] Wróblewski identifies this definition problem in the Pure Theory, stating that it is necessary to deeply probe the dichotomy in order to understand its rich implications for normativism: "Any analysis of the Is-Ought dichotomy within the framework of Kelsen's normativism is difficult because of the lack of any definition of both concepts involved in it: Sein as well as Sollen are thought of as primary, undefined concepts or categories […]. One has, therefore, to identify the meaning of the dichotomy in question from the context of its use." (WRÓBLEWSKI, 1981, p. 510).

Wright's works, and the consequent systematization of the modalities of obligation, prohibition and permission existent in normative systems.

3. Ought-to-do and practical reason in Castañeda

We had the opportunity to briefly notice that the ought-to-be category was always bound to prescriptive discourse, not only in Law, but mainly in Morals. We also remarked that Hume had observed the is-ought dichotomy in ordinary language, when he identified a confusion in the application of their appropriate copulas and indirectly distinguished ought-to-be as the adequate mode of the language of conduct, conceiving a primitive formulation of the naturalistic fallacy. It was, then, natural to Kelsen and many other jurists to unadvisedly take hold of the ought-to-be as the basic configuration of norms, especially having in mind the established opposition between the logical forms is-ought, so dear to kelsenian normativism.

According to Castañeda, an ought-to-be semantics is not able to integrate agents and actions in prescriptive statements and so is unfit to lay down rules of conduct or prescriptions and to guide practical reason. In the end, ought-to-be is useful strictly to enunciate wishes and utopias in general terms, without aiming no agents at all.

> The primary contrast in the above conception of deontic logic [standard approach, ought-to-be] is the contrast between what (it) is and what (it) ought to be. The idea of who is to realize the obligation is not considered, so that the approach can handle very nicely genuinely impersonal statements like "There ought to be no pain", meant merely to articulate something about the universe, which is not conceived as an agent but simply as the totality of all existents and all facts. This impersonal statement tells of what would be a necessary lack in every universe, and neither attributes responsibility for any action to somebody nor demands any action from anybody: the statement is oriented to no agents: it has the structure of the statement 'It is (would be) desirable that there were no pain'. (CASTAÑEDA, 1970, p. 450, our note)

Facing the apparently inadequacy of the ought-to-be, Castañeda proposes a semantic correction so that the standard approach may be replaced by an action semantics, under the peculiar form of the ought-to-do. The ought-to-do semantics in Castañeda demands the construction of sentences yielding agents, and actions prescriptively assigned to those agents, that is, requires the use of copulas that denotes its normative character. That doesn't mean, on the other side, that agents should explicitly take part on the norms contents. What a norm must achieve, in fact, is the establishing of a normative focus that could be able to guide conducts of agents, determined or not.

> Now, an important feature of certain deontic statements is that they involve an action and an agent and demand that the agent do, or fail to do, the action in question. Many an ordinary statement that is apparently agentless demands an action; e.g., "Cars ought to have plates" demands that some agents put plates on cars; it is short for a statement to the effect that people in a relationship R of a certain kind to a car (ownership, usership, managership, etc.) put plates on that car. The statement supports imperatives of the form "If you are R to that car, put plates on it" That statement contrasts very sharply with the agentless statement "There ought to be no pain" […]. In short, deontic statements divide neatly into: (i) those that involve agents and actions and support imperatives, and (ii) those that involve states of affairs and are agentless and have by themselves nothing to do with imperatives. The former belong to what used to be called the Ought-to-do and the latter to the Ought-to-be. Our non-standard approach, then, is not suited for the Ought-to-be; but, we hope, it is adequate for the Ought-to-do. (CASTAÑEDA, 1970, p. 452)

Castañeda's proposal, then, is located within the theoretical field of the normative logic of action, founded over the ought-to-do-semantics. The author's philosophical system takes as its initial step the exam of the ontological primacy of pure reason over practical thinking. Men, however, are not only well constructed machines that formulate hypothesis; what, on the other hand, seems to better fit human reason is its aptitude for concrete action, for decision-making, although this function is inwardly connected with the investigative and propositional leaning of thought:

> […] if a creature is an agent endowed with practical reason, he is, a fortiori, endowed with contemplative thinking. […] The comprehensiveness of practical thinking that includes and requires contemplative thinking is characteristic of a mind that has the adequate mechanism, with great survival value, for keeping fast to > the needed unity of the world of contemplation and the world of action. While contemplative thinking is, as explained, ontologically prior, and could in principle appear pure in an angelic creature, practical thinking becomes psychologically dominant and logically encompassing. The ultimate unity of reason is the unity of practical reason. (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 08)

Practical reason is deeply linked to institutions, where mandates and orders are enacted, decisions are made, duties are addressed, different norms and promises conflict with each other, and where Castañeda locates a theoretical lack that deserves the attention of philosophy. His magnum opus entitled Thinking and Doing announces clearly this pretension in its subtitle "The Philosophical Foundations of Institutions". The institutions which rule practical life act by means of its own legislative activity (enactment) that establishes its normativity field. From Constitutional Law to the rules of a game (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 179-181), normative systems regulate its field of activity, and are even determined by the contents of its norms. In order to identify what would be the complete theory of a normative system, Castañeda relies on a definition that remarkably approximates him towards Kelsen and his idea of law's science:

> The full theory of a given institution i is at bottom, then, the total theory of the norms characterizing, or, better, constituting, the normative system N(i) that determines institution i. This is the theory that accounts for the logical form of such norms, their implication relationships, and their truth conditions. For example, the total theory or philosophy of morality is the theory of the norms of the form 'X ought morally to do action A' as well as of the complex statements composed of such norms. Likewise, the theory or philosophy of law is the theory of the norms involving the form 'X must (ought, should) legally do A'. (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 03)

Castañeda lists several linguistic categories concerning practical reason, as deliberations, mandates, prescriptions, intentions, and also what he conceives as deontic judgments or norms. His deontic system is framed in a threefold structure that includes prescriptions, intentions and deontic propositions. Prescriptions and intentions are grouped under the common title of practitions. Practitions themselves are not equivalent to propositions, but, in the context of his work, are imbued with semantic values analogous to truth values, said Legitimacy values or or- thotic values[4]: "prescriptions and mandates have ontological, or semantical values that are formally, logically exactly analogous to truth-values" (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 120). Deontic judgments, on the other hand, are taken as the fundamental form of institutional norms, among them legal norms. Its peculiar aspect is that, unlike practitions, deontic judgments are propositions to which the deontic operators of obligation, permission, prohibition and option are adjoined. The immediate consequence of this conclusion is that, in fact, norms can be taken as true or false (something that was completely rejected by Kelsen). But says the author: "What are we to do? Are we to say that deontic judgments are true or false? Are they true or false in exactly the same sense in which ordinary propositions are true or false?" (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 183). These questions seem to be related to the perception that something goes wrong when comparing deontic truth to scientific or mathematical truth:

> Nevertheless, there is a difference between mathematical and scientific verification procedures and all the procedures for verifying deontic judgments. The difference is, roughly, that many a deontic truth seems to depend intimately on legislative procedures, so that deontic truth seems man-made in a way in which scientific and mathematical truths are not man-made. (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 183)

What truth is, then, in deontic sense? What could be accepted in deontic logic as a reference frame, able to establish a correspondence with deontic propositions, in order to lay down deontic truth values, in the same manner as the isomorphism relation between facts and propositions that distinguishes truth for propositions?

According to Castañeda, deontic judgments are integrated by a deontic property/operator that denotes its belonging to a specific normative system — that is, a deontic operator underwritten by a variable that expresses its relation with a specific normative system, as, for example, obligatory, that could be understood as an obligation in legal sense — and by a core practition (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, pp. 40 e 190). Let us return, then, to practitions. As Castañeda says, Legitimacy or, in his terminology, orthotic values of practitions can be determined from Legitimacy contexts, bonded to intended ends. Agents to whom practitions are addressed in compliance to these ends may act in a Legitimate or Illegitimate manner, in case they endorse or not the mentioned practitions, qualified by Legitimacy contexts. But orthotic values of practitions vary according to their qualification contexts. The same practition may be Legitimate or orthotic with respect to Legitimacy context p, but Illegitimate or anarthotic according to Legitimacy context q. This means that, unlike truth values that are perennial and independent, Legitimacy values are determined by its context of use.

> There is a tremendously important difference between the semantical values of propositions, i.e., those involved in implication, namely truth and falsity, and the semantical values of practitions. The former are just two absolute values in the sense that a proposition has its values once and for all tenselessly and regardless of how large a segment of the actual universe we consider. [...] On the other hand, the semantical values of practitions are many and depend intimately on segments of the universe. (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 240)

We saw that Castañeda admits the propositional character of deontic judgments. This aspect, yet, do not reproduces truth notion in exact the same manner in which mathematical propositions, for instance, reveal themselves to be true. On the contrary, deontic propositions truth values refer, ultimately, to the Legitimacy values of their corresponding practitions. Now, if deontic judgments are subject to the modulations of relative institutional contexts, what could be the theoretical achievement in admitting them to be imbued with truth values?

> But the Legitimacy or Non-legitimacy of an imperative relative to a certain context constituted by a set of facts, ends, procedural conventions and decisions would be useless unless the conflict were resolved in a larger context. In cases of conflict, life itself forces us to make choices and produce a balance, so that we may speak of a total context, in which we regard the ends and procedural conventions as hierarchically organized, even if that organization is rough and revisable and even if its structure and outline are only dimly conceived (as it may well be, especially in the case of a conflict.) (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 241)

The total contexts of hierarchically organized ends are referred by Castañeda as absolute contexts. In effect, the ordinary use of imperatives disregards the persistent designation of the context taken as relevant to legitimize the usage of a mandate. This means that not all imperatives depends on specific legitimization contexts, or as Castañeda sustains, that some obligations draw their legitimacy from implicit absolute contexts, that mark them with such a degree of prominence that they become dominant in regard to conflicting duties (overriding oughts). The values matching them also receive a special designation: as they aren't qualified by specific contexts, they are taken as unqualified orthotes. Well, deontic judgments belonging to this category are precisely those imbued with universal truth values, that can't be subject to the critic addressed to relativity of local institutional contexts.

4. Conclusion

Labeling norms as deontic propositions and, in consequence, allowing to verify them in terms of truth and falsehood under the semantic form of the ought-to-do seems to be a considerable gain, especially when it becomes clear that all achievements of propositional logic are also admitted in the analysis of norms. Castañeda himself catches a glimpse of this possibility: "We rejoice at our fast enrichment of logical theory. Since deontic judgments are propositions, every principle of truth [...] discussed [...] automatically applies to deontic judgments." (CASTAÑEDA, 1975, p. 184)

So Castañeda offers a consistent theoretical instrument whose main benefit seems to be his meticulous consideration of human practical activity as essential in the task of examining prescriptions and the linguistic display mobilized in the leading of human acts. If this is Law's foremost duty and if legal norms could be rightly described by the ought-to-do semantics, then we can also conceive a vast and promising investigation field concerning Law and its components.

The countermajoritarian theory
A philosophical perspective on rawlsian public reason[1]

Abstract: The significant difficulty in identifying minorities and majorities results in the precariousness of the countermajoritarian conception. Two kinds of minorities may be defined, though, political and popular minorities implies the countermajoritarian dualism. Both share supporting difficulties. Certainly, the countermajoritaran character of judicial decisions are not easily verifiable. A comparative study between the United States and Brazil taking into account the public opinion, institutional designs, and Branches' dialogues suggests that countermajoritarism is not as obvious as doctrine usually suggests. Furthermore, Rawls suggests that if a Court prevents biased legal changes by transient majorities, it is not antidemocratic, but antimajoritarian regarding to ordinary legislation. It is not, however, antimajaritarian regarding to the higher law. By the other side, transient majorities eventually embraces constitutional interpretative changes hindered by judicial enforcement of public reason. Moreover, if public reason is a characteristic of a certain people, countermajoritarism is in-

Introduction

The "countermajoritarian difficulty"[6], is so commonly regarded that it is neglected its conceptual difficulty. It is a metonymical difficulty. That is, the lack of a clear definition of minorities and majorities concurs[7], ipso facto, to the conceptual brittleness of majoritarism, which also involves the countermajoritarism back cover.

Majorities, however, can be satisfactorily joined into two categories: (i) popular majorities, (numerically - CPr - or ideologically - CPr2 – considered), from which stems popular countermajoritarism (CPr), and (ii) political majorities, (composed by political coalitions within and between branches), from which stems the political countermajoritarism (CPo).

Moreover, Rawls comprehends the Majoritarian Theory in a particular way: majorities, political or popular, might be figured under the public reason ideal, especially within the public political forum, as in judges' decisions. However, it does not overcomes conceptual difficulties. That said, none of the understandings about the Majoritarian Theory make it an objective and well-defined theory, and they are unable of correctly defining the character of judicial decisions.

Democracy and Majorities

Firstly, the Majoritarian Theory is related to Democratic Theory, by the fact that the ideal of democracy has long been defined a "majori-

The so-called "countermajoritarian difficulty" has been used later by Alexander Bickel. See BICKEL, Alexander. The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. tarian phenomenon"[8]. Indeed, Tocqueville has said that, "it is the very essence of democratic government that the power of the majority should be absolute, for in democracies nothing outside the majority can keep it check." [9]

However, it is accepted nowadays that democracy also presumes the possibility of insurgent minorities take part somehow of political decisions[10]. The judiciary has the authority to assure them that right if they lack political support. Thence follows an allegedly difficulty[11].

However, it is inherent to judicial decisions any eventual agreement to majorities, or indistinctly to minorities preferences[12]. The Court therefore paradoxical and invariably offends democracy (a) when it upholds minority interests (democracy as majoritarian phenomenon) or (b) when it overlooks them (democracy as equality, or anything like that). The discussion thus deviates from democratic principles.

[8] "It is not at all difficult to show by appeals to authorities as various and imposing as Aristotle, Locke, Rousseau, Jefferson, and Lincoln that the term democracy means, among other things, that the power to rule resides in popular majorities and their representatives […] [n]o amount of tempering with democratic theory can conceal the fact that a system in which the policy preferences of minorities prevail over majorities is at odds with the traditional criteria for distinguishing a democracy from other political systems". [11]Hamilton, however, affirms that interpreting the constitutional "by any means suppose a superiority of the judicial to the legislative power. It only supposes that the power of the people is superior to both" (Federalist No. 78). Bickel, by the other side, suggests that declaring laws unconstitutional actually frustrates popular sovereignty. BICKEL, Alexander. The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics. New Haven: Yale University Press, p. 16-17). Moreover, Bickel describes judicial review as "a deviant institution in the American Democracy" (i*dem. p. 18.*).

[12]As Dahl has said, "no matter how the Court acts in determining the legality or constitutionality of one alternative or the other, the outcome of the Court's decision must either (1) accord with the preferences of a minority of citizens and run counter to the preferences of a majority; (2) accord with the preferences of a majority and run counter to the preferences of a minority; or (3) accord with the preferences of a minority and run counter to the preferences of another minority, the rest being indifferent". DAHL, op. cit. 282.

Two Countermajoritarian Models

Firstly, we support that majorities are gatherable in two categories: i) popular majorities and ii) political majorities, from which stems, respectively, i) popular countermajoritarism e ii) political countermajoritarism.

Popular Contermajoritarism (PoC)

Popular minorities are repeatedly addressed numerically. However, PoC is essentially a matter of public opinion; we do not mean there are no groups that lack full enjoyment of rights, but only that ensuring them those rights does not necessarily make a decision countermajoritarian.

Brown and Dred Scott are elucidating. First, let's take Brown v. Board of Education[13], paradigmatic to the Majoritarian Theory. At the time of the decision, blacks were numerically minority (one-tenth of the American population). Numerically, decisions sympathetic to the black cause would be supposedly countermajoritarian; ideologically, however, "a national majority favored the result of Brown, as well as external political elites. Brown was not an example of an attack by the Court to the will of the majority, it was an example of a Court that is aligned to the dominant political coalition and the national political elites"[14]. Moreover, political leaders and presidential wings of both parties favored the eradication of segregation. Brown v. Board of Education, therefore, historically adopted as a countermajoritarian paradigm, perhaps meant precisely the opposite[15].

Hereinafter, let's take the decision in Dred Scott v. Sanford[16] (con-

[14]BALKIN, Jack. Framework Originalism and the Living Constitution. Northwestern Law Review, Vol. 103, No. 2, 2009, p. 576.

[15] Graber demonstrated, by the way, that the Eisenhower to the Supreme Court were well-known proponents of blacks civil rights, and recent studies suggest that they have been chosen because of that. Moreover, even South democrats that lacked interest to vote civil rights proposals have supported the nomination of racial equity proponents in federal judges. GRABER, Mark. The Nonmajoritarian Difficulty: Legislative Deference to the Judiciary. Studies in American Political Development , No. 7, 1993, p. 37, p. 63. The same way, the legal recognition of same-sex marriage in 2011 by the Brazilian Supremo Tribunal Federal (Ação Direta de Inconstitucionalidade - ADI) 4277; Arguição de Descumprimento de Preceito Fundamental – ADPF - 132) cannot be easily defined. It's not enough the existence of a numerical minority and a favorable decision.

sidered one of the biggest gaffes of the American Supreme Court), apparently a clearly majoritarian decision. It has neglected black slaves' rights (one-fifth of the American population, between 1850 e 1860), so it did not incur in difficulty. It has supported south interests, precisely the property rights of slaveholders. "This decision so universally condemned today was not universally condemned by the vast majority of people in 1857", especially in the South[17]. Moreover, slavery was a constitutional evil necessary to the Union[18].

However, disasters arising from that decision are clear[19]: it has frustrated the population because it has decided that case; Lincoln did not oppose the decision, but the Court deciding[20]. Moreover, Dred Scott was a slave bought by army surgeon John Emerson in the state Missouri in 1834; the transfers of Emerson led him eventually to the free states of Illinois and Minnesota, and then again, "voluntarily" to Missouri. Dred Scott challenged his adjudication to Emerson widow in 1843, and required his freedom by living at a Free State. In 1857, Dred Scott demand reached the Supreme Court.

[17] Even in the North, abolitionists were not a majority, said Mark Graber to C-Span (march, 2007): "everybody in the south, of course, said "a wonderful decision". Northern republicans [were] intended to ban slavery in the territories, so "this is a horrible decision". But it is worth noting that democrats were about half of the northern population mostly said "not a great decision, but we can leave with this…" […] That this decision so universally condemned today was not universally condemned by the vast majority of people in 1857. Indeed […] Abrahan Lincoln during the Lincoln-Douglas debates specifically said he was not going to complain about Dred Scott for its holding that free persons of color could not be citizens; indeed, he announce the people of the state that he was opposed to making free blacks citizens of Illinois. That's how strong the public support among white people was for the racist aspects on Dred Scott".

[18] GRABER, Mark. Dred Scott and the Problem of Constitutional Evil. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2008.

[19] "Historians would say that the Supreme Court tried to put itself in a position of resolving the dispute about the extension of slavery and resolving it in a particular way that it thought was the best for the nation, and we saw what disastrous consequences flowed from that". ROBERTS, John. Senate Confirmation Hearings (2005). Rehnquist trata também dos graves efeitos da decisão ao longo da história Norte-americana: "The Dred Scott decision, of course, was repealed in fact as a result of the Civil War and in law by the Civil War amendments. The injury to the reputation of the Supreme Court thatresulted from the Dred Scott decision, however, took more than a generation to heal. Indeed, newspaper accounts long after the Dred Scott decision bristled with attacks on the Court, and particularly on Chief Justice Taney, unequalled in their bitterness even to this day. REHNQUIST, REHNQUIST, Willian. The Notion of a Living Constitution. Harvard Journal of Law & Public Policy, No. 2, Vol. 29, p. 411

[20] [T]he candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government, upon vital encouraged the Civil War, becoming doubtful the support to the decision. Thus, it is not clear the character of Dred Scott.

Finally, popular countermajoritarism is not sustainable: majorities and public opinion are unintelligible – it requires an ideological assessment; polls or national elections may failure[21]. Therefore, under popular perspective, it can rarely be said the character of judicial decisions.

Political Countermajoritarism (PlC)

Political representation also arranges itself in majorities through coalitions. The ideological assessment indispensable to identifying or recognizing majorities occurs regularly through suffrage; individuals, therefore, delegate to a minority group decisional authority. The political branches essentially the Legislature presumably represent the population. The Legislature express itself through lawmaking, or failing to make it. There, considering Congress a majoritarian institution the judiciary is lato sensu (PlC1) politically countermajoritarian when it decides against legitimate political decision-making (essentially laws) or decides about political matters.

However, political majorities are transient; given that, said Dahl, "it is to be expected, then, that the Court is least likely to be successful in blocking a determined and persistent lawmaking majority on a major policy and most likely to succeed against a "weak" majority", "a dead one, a transient one, a fragile one, or one weakly united upon a policy of subordinate importance" [22].

[22] DAHL, op. cit., p. 286. By the way, Balkin said that "federal courts cooperate with the national political coalition by limiting or striking down laws that reflect an older coalition's values". BALKIN, Jack. Framework Originalism and the Living Constitution.Northwest-

An exam of the cases in which the Supreme Court and the STF declared unconstitutional the Federal legislation confirm the expectations. It is verified in the United States (throughout the entire history) and Brazil (from 1995) that more than half of the unconstitutionality decisions has been taken after four years the approval of the unconstitutional law (precisely 58.9% in Brazil and 65.2% in the U.S.).

Thus, it might be understand that the Court is constrained by a four-year-term; countermajoritarian (politically), therefore, would be the decisions of unconstitutionality of for-year old (or less) laws[23], "so that the Court could be plausibly be said to be standing against the preferences of the current, national lawmaking institutions"[24].

It is affirmed that, at least in the U.S., "on the whole, the Court has been no more likely to strike down the laws of its partisan opponents than the laws of its partisan allies".[25]

Either way, however, the plausibility of the political countermajoritarism in a broad sense remains precarious as to another objection: the judiciary can be no more than a scapegoat to legislative omissions. That is, the Court has often interfered in matters legislative coalitions lack interest to deal with or are "unable" to. A significant implication is that judicial review of this kind serves both the national party coalition and the party system, removing disruptive matters off the agenda of political majorities. [26]

The countermajoritarian difficulty does not offer an appropriate access point for assessing an institution that typically decides solely over "vacancy policies". The supposed lack of independence (or connivance), therefore, implies the definition of the political countermajoritarism stricto sensu (CPo2). Hereafter, the judiciary must be comprehended as an independent institution, and there will be called countermajoritarian independent decisions that frustrates the interests of political majorities.

However, there seems to be a broad consensus that judicial review is fully independent from constraints only it is identified a segregation of political coalitions[27]. PlC, then, is supportable if it is verified the Court's independence. In Brazil it seems not to be, though. There are three tips:

1. The first of them stems from the number of appointments to the Federal Supreme Court between 1985 and 2013. There were 24 successful appointments within the period; one appointment each 1,1 year, in average, which means the appointment of 7,1 Justices during a double-term mandate, or 65% of the composition of the Court:

succeeded by Justices Francisco Rezek and Marco Aurélio Mello. The appointment of Justice Carlos Alberto Menezes Direito, who died two years after later, has not been considered among Lula appointments. Justice Dias Toffoli has succeeded him.

2. Considering that a Court is fully independent when parties are segregated, a study of the Congress composition between 1995 (first term of FHC) and 2011 (first term of Dilma Rousseff) reveals that the government basis of the presidency repeatedly overcame the opposition, suppressing, though, the Court independence. The only exception is the first term of Lula, when the STF mostly declared Federal legislation unconstitutional.

There are reasons to assume, therefore, it has been in the last decade a strong alignment and coalition of political branches and parties, thus it is absent the requirement for full independence of the Court (the inexistence or weakness of coalitions) preventing Political Countermajoritarism supporting.

Rawlsen Prospect of Countermajoritarism

The Rawlsian prospect of the Majoritarian Theory is distinct from the ordinary understanding. That is, he considers the Supreme Court "the highest judicial interpreter of the Constitution"[30] and defines it the exemplar of public reason. Therefore, in a democratic and constitutional system that cherish justice as fairness with judicial review, public reason is the reason of the Supreme Court.

Thus, the Court is a protection tool of the higher law. When it accords to public reason, it prevents the erosion of the higher law erosion by transient majorities' legislation. If the Court assumes this role, it is incorrect to say, Rawls assumes, that it is undemocratic. It is, in fact, antimajoritarian regarding to ordinary law, because it can declare it unconstitutional. However, the Court is not antimajoritarian regarding to the higher law when its decisions reasonably agree with the Constitution and its amendments.

It is noticed therefore that Rawls prospect of majoritarism is essentially political. That is, the judiciary is, lato sensu (PlC1), politically countermajoritarian, when it decides against legitimate political decision-making (essentially laws); that is, when it declares them unconstitutional.

Ralws, however, states that those decisions are not countermajoritarian regarding to the higher law when they agree with the Constitution and its amendments. It is undoubtedly an originalist interpretation. The majoritarian difficulty is a subgenre of the "democratic difficulty" and judicial decisions are said countermajoritarian when they disregard transient ordinary legislation. The Constitution is a review parameter, but not a redemption for judicial decisions. Transient majorities legislation do not imply necessarily an outrage to the higher law. By the way, says Rawls, the Court is not antimajoritarian regarding to the higher law when its decisions reasonably agree with the amendments of the Constitution. Amendments are, in other words, legislation of further majorities, commonly transient. It may not be the case of the United States, but it is the Brazilian. In Brazil, there were 72 Constitutional Amendments between 1992 and 2013. It may be affirmed, therefore, that amendments in Brazil distinguish or have nothing to do with higher law despite enjoying the same legal status paradoxically. In any case, there are two logical conclusions: (i) the Brazilian Supreme Court is countermajoritarin when it declares constitutional amendments unconstitutional, but it is not undemocratic because its decision is supposedly coherent with the higher law; (ii) the Brazilian Supreme Court is countermajoritarian when it declares unconstitutional ordinary laws that disagree with Amendments, but it is not undemocratic because, in this case, the Amendment integrates the higher law.

Therefore, the Amendment is simultaneously a transitory tool of constitutional erosion, but it is part of the higher law when it works as a parameter for assessing the constitutionality of ordinary laws.

Finally, if the ideal of public reason (the reason that satisfies the criterion of reciprocity) is satisfied by judges, legislators, executive chiefs, or other government official, that is, if citizens explain their reasons for supporting fundamental political views under the political conception of justice (in other words, exercising the duty of civility)[31], countermajoritarism must be disregarded.

One should only cogitate majorities or minorities who acquiesce or not to those reasons; however, they are mere undefined majorities who lack common values. Moreover, boundaries between majorities and minorities are tenuous if citizens are reasonable and satisfy the criterion of reciprocity.

Conclusion

The different sides of countermajoritarism share the same difficulty, namely the lack of a particular premise - minorities, public opinion or judicial independence. It seems rather reasonable, therefore, accounting henceforth the "the nonmajoritarian difficulty"[32] or "the antimajoritarian difficulty"[33], instead of the "hailed" "countermajoritarian difficulty".

Thus, none of the conceptions of the Majoritarian Theory, neither the Rawlsian, makes it an objective and well-defined theory, or precisely defines majorities. They are therefore unable to identify the character of judicial decisions in Democratic States. Incidentally, Ralws is paradoxical because he assumes majoritarian imbalances ideally reasonable in societies.

That said, perhaps attributing to the countermajoritarism the "myth" epithet is not but a rhetorical effect, but with great caution it should be said that the character of a particular judicial decision is "clearly countermajoritarian".

Police-Community Partnership Forum (FKPM) as a means of implementing Restorative Justice Study Case in Lasem, Rembang, Central Java, Indonesia

Ferry Fathurokhman[1]

Abstract: Restorative justice has been studied and implemented in several countries as a new method handling crime in lieu of criminal court. The basic idea is to meet victim needs, to instill the offender that his/her act has been harming victim and community that affected by the crime. The ending process of restorative justice would be something that can be done to repair the harm. In Indonesia, best practice in term of restorative justice would be found in FKPM, a Police-Community Partnership Forum (FKPM) that consisted of one police officer and stakeholders in one village. A data shows that FKPMs in Lasem have succeeded to reach peaceful settlement of 19 cases outside of criminal court. Different from criminal court, FKPM seeks to 'win-win' solution in order to meet victim needs, offender reforms and community demands. FKPM fixes victim-offender relationships which the same thing does not happen in criminal court.

Prior to the wide spread of restorative justice notions, all criminal cases should be proceeded under criminal justice system. Conflicts within society are taken over solely by the state. Victim's interest was neglected and abandoned. These conditions were naked facts that can be easily found in our justice system. However, for most of Indonesian people, criminal court is the last resort for seeking justice. If they have a conflict, they would rather to solve the conflict by themselves assisted by their relatives. The victim's family and the offender's family will gather to discuss the best way out of conflict resolution. However, since there is no legal basis for the agreement therefore there is no guarantee that the state would not take over the case, even if the case already resolved.

FKPM gives a legal basis for the settlement between parties. Chief of Police of Indonesian Republic gave FKPM an authority and competency to handle and settle some criminal cases, particularly in the area of misdemeanors. With FKPM, restorative justice now meets its legal basis.

1. Definition of Restorative Justice

Restorative justice has become global trend in handling crime. But, what is actually restorative justice? This paper is not designed to solve this unsolved question. Proponents of restorative justice propose definitions. Some are completing its predecessor whilst some other reject and create a new one. The definitions that I quote here is merely for the interest of basic understanding regarding what restorative justice is.

In his audio visual lecture, John Braithwaite, an Australian criminologist, explained restorative justice by describing the history and process in this way:

> "Restorative Justice evolved from searching more productive way of dealing the crimes rather than putting more and more people away in prison. The main idea is about restoring the victim, restoring the offender and restoring the community. Because crime hurts, justice should heal. In a typical process the victim will be asked to say who would they like to come to support them trough the audience, and the offender will be asked in the same way, and supporter of the offender with the offender come together with the victim and the victim supporter, facilitated, sit together in a circle. First, they talk about what happened, who was hurt by what happened and what might be done to right the wrong and come up with plan of action. Facilitator follows up and checks whether the plan of action actually implemented to the satisfaction of all stakeholder.2

For most of criminal law scholars, the notion for incorporating victim [and affected community when appropriate] as stated above in criminal justice process is a relatively new idea since in criminal justice system, the role of victim is represented and taken over by prosecutor. Definitely restorative justice idea has a different core with criminal justice.

Utilizing lens in photography as a parable, Howard Zehr urged its reader to understand that the choice of lens affects its outcome and result. Different lens creates different picture. The same way goes for understanding a crime. If we view crime through retributive lens, he noted, the "criminal justice" process fails to meet many of the needs of either victim or offender. The process neglects victims while failing to meet its expressed goals of holding offender accountable and deterring crime.[3]

To understand its differences, Zehr then differentiates criminal justice and restorative justice as shown in this table below: [4]

Table of Two Different Views of Justice

Criminal Justice	Restorative Justice
• Crime is a violation of the law and the state • Violations create guilt • Justice requires the state to determine blame (guilt) and impose pain (punishment) • Central focus: Offenders getting what they deserve	• Crime is a violation of people and relationships • Violations create obligation • Justice involves victims, offenders, and community members in an effort to put things right • Central focus: Victim needs and offender responsibility for repairing harm

According to Zehr as cited by Mark Umbreit and Marilyn Peter Armour, the two approaches above have different way in seeking justice. The differences can be cleared by emerging three questions. In criminal justice system the questions are what laws have been broken? Who did it? What do they deserve? While in restorative justice perspective, the questions would be who has been hurt? What are they needs? Whose obligations are these?[5]

To Allison Morris and Gabrielle Maxwell restorative justice is a process which drastically reduces the role of court, the judiciary and other criminal justice professionals by returning the offence to those most affected by it and by encouraging them to determine appropriate responses to it.[6]

Relying on reparative and encounter conception,[7] Daniel W. Van

[7] The key point of reparative conception is crime causes harm, justice must repair that harm while encounter focuses on the important of stakeholder meetings and on the

Ness and Karen Heetderks Strong defined restorative justice as a theory of justice that emphasizes repairing the harm caused or revealed by criminal behavior. It is best accomplished through cooperative processes that include all stakeholders.[8] Steve Mulligan by citing Marian Liebmann wrote that restorative justice is a criminal justice paradigm that emphasizes restoring victim.[9] Lyle Keanini, cited Tony Marshal work, wrote that restorative justice is "centrally concerned with restoration: restoration of the victim, restoration of the offender to a law-abiding life, [and] restoration of the damage caused by [the] crime to the community."[10]

There are many more definitions proposed by restorative justice proponent due to the development of restorative justice program. Some are general which can cover all restorative justice programs, some others leaving loophole that does not fit some restorative justice programs. In many respect, some definitions complete one another, while the others criticize and formulate a new one. This will be discussed more in categorization of restorative justice part of this paper.

2. Categorization

Presently restorative justice has been developing widely. To understand the variation of restorative justice, I categorize it in four categories as below:

2.1 Based on its Origin

Restorative justice may be divorced into two narratives: a novel and innovative system and modification of indigenous law. The earlier sees restorative justice as a subsequent movement from its first experiment in Kitchener Ontario Canada, North America.[11] The latter means many benefits that come as stakeholders discuss the crime, what contributed to it and its aftermath. See in Daniel W. Van Ness and Karen Heetderks Strong. Restoring Justice: An Introduction to Restorative Justice 4th Edition. New Jersey. Anderson Publishing. 2010,p. 42.

[11] To many, VORP (Victim-Offender Reconciliation Program) is the first "baby" of restorative justice program in sense of modern form. VORP was born from "Kitchener that restorative justice is not a novel neither innovative system rather restorative justice is an old practice, practice that precedes a theory, theory come later before we realize that old practice is actually restorative justice.[12] According to Steve Mulligan, there has no dispute in the first narrative which is different with the second narrative.[13]

In the view of the first proponent, the second narrative proponents mislead in viewing restorative justice. For instance Kathleen Dally who tried to redress misconception that conference is based on indigenous practices. According to Dally, efforts to write history of restorative justice where a pre-modern past is romantically invoked to justify current justice practice are not only in error, but also unwittingly re-inscribe an ethnocentrism they wish to avoid. Dally added that this misconception is ubiquitous, found in many prominent source of restorative justice advocates. In particular, Dally asserted that just because restorative justice is flexible and accommodating does not mean that conferencing experiment" in 1974. At that time, two young teenagers (ages 18 and 19) from Elmira, Ontario, Canada, pleaded guilty to vandalizing 22 properties (houses and cars). The case was published and discussed widely. Mark Yantzi, a probation officer whom in charged in preparing the presentence report in that case, attended a Christian group meeting which was conducted several days earlier before guilty pleading was filed. The meeting discussed about Christian response to shoplifting. He then imagined that if offenders meet the victims to repair the damage. In criminal procedural law, this idea is impossible to be done since the victims interests is taken over by the prosecutor as I earlier mentioned in this part. Mark then buried the idea due to lack of legal basis for his notion. Dave Worth, coordinator of voluntary service worker for Mennonite Central Committee (MCC), endorsed Mark to realize the idea. Mark took a change and proposed to judge that the offenders meet and pay back the victims. As previously predicted, the judge refused the idea. However Mark proposal seemed had influenced the judged, when the time for sentencing arrived, the judge ordered the offenders to have a face-to-face meeting with the victims in order to work out restitution as a condition of probation. The offenders then, accompanied by their probation officer, visited all their victims negotiated restitution and within three months repayment had been made. (particularly in New Zealand) is indigenous practice.[14] However, in my view, the practice of FGC in New Zealand is difficult to be detached from the practice of Maori's people which has gave great contribution to FGC. Therefore even though it can not be said as indigenous practice as Dally wrote, in the same way it is also can not be said as the very new practice. To end this part I cite Zehr and Ali Gohar regarding on this issue as below:[15]

> "…the movement owes a great debt to earlier movements and to variety of cultural and religious traditions. It owes a special debt to the native people of North America and New Zealand. The precedents and roots of this movement are much wider and deeper than the Mennonite-led initiatives of the 1970s. Indeed, they are as old as human history"

2.2 Based the Initial Forms

Paul McCold wrote that there are three forms of the initial form of restorative justice practices, namely Mediation, Conferencing and Circle.[16] These practices transform onto many programs. For instance Victim Offender Reconciliation Program (VORP), Victim Offender Mediation (VOM) and Community Mediation are belongs to mediation category. In the field of conference there are Family Group Conference (FGC), W*agga Wagga* Conference, and Community Group Conferencing. The example of last category is Navajo Justice and Sentencing Circle. The brief further detail described below:

2.2.1 Mediation

[14] Kathleen Dally. Conferencing in Australia and New Zealand: Variations, Researchs, Findings and Prospects in Allison Morris and Gabrielle Maxwell (Eds). Restorative Justice for Juveniles: Conferencing, Mediation and Circles. Oregon. Hart Publishing. 2003,p. 65.

[16] Paul McCold. Primary Restorative Justice in Allison Morris and Gabrielle Maxwell. Restorative Justice for Juvenile, Conferencing, Mediation and Circles. Oregon. Hart Publishing. 2003,p. 42

VORP

- The primary purpose is reconciliation (involving healing of injuries and restoring right relationship)
- Direct mediation (face-to-face meeting between victim and offender)
- Complementary to traditional criminal justice system (not a diversionary model)
- Faith-based (particularly Christianity values)

VOM

- Occasionally needs pre-mediation session of each party
- Non-directive "dialogue driven"
- Direct mediation (face-to-face meeting between victim and offender)
- Can be used at various stage of criminal justice process[17]

Community Mediation

- Operated by community dispute resolution center
- Receive cases from police, prosecutor and probation
- "Settlement-driven" (mediator can not impose decision but may help to finding multiple path to an agreement)
- Theoretically secular model (not in practice)

In further development, these characteristics are becoming blur and not clear cut. For example indirect mediation recently also possible to be done for the victim who does not want to meet but still want to express their feeling that caused by the crime.[18] In Europe also, most of mediation such VOM does not mandatorily need direct meeting between victim and offender.[19]

2.3. Based its Time-line Operation

Susan L Miller breaks down restorative justice programs into two types: diversionary and therapeutic. Diversionary type refers to any restorative programs which are designed to operate in lieu of criminal justice system process and provide alternative outcome. In her view this type is more offender-centered. On the other hand, the later i.e. therapeutics, are more victim-centered since they operate after offender have been convicted. The goal of this type is to empower and heal victim.[23]

In relation with this category, Moriss and Maxwell mentioned three possibilities process of restorative justice referring its flexibility: pre-court as a diversion; pre-sentence to inform sentencers; and pre-release.[24]

[22] The first its emergence was in Mayo Town, Yukon territory, Canada. A 26 years old recidivist committed "new" crime after his 46 criminal convictions. Realizing that conventional criminal justice process will not effective for the offender, the judge, probation officer and Crown Counsel explored another way to engage other parties within sentence determination. The judge then modified the courtroom setting. 30 chairs arranged in a circle, the judge, lawyer, police, First nation officials and members, probation officer, victim and other could sit there. By this way, the judge gets a number of advantages to using circle process as opposed to a traditional sentencing hearing. See in Daniel W. 2.4 Based its Enforcement

The last category is based on its enforcement: voluntarily and coercion. In many literatures, this category is known also as "the purist" model and "the maximalist" model respectively. The purist relies on initial definition of restorative justice. Take for instance Toni Marshal whom, for many, categorized as the purist. He defined restorative justice in this way: "restorative justice is a process whereby all the parties with a stake in a particular offense come together to resolve collectively how to deal with the aftermath of the offense and its implications for the future." From Marshal's definition, it was clear that the initial notion of restorative justice is to "resolve collectively", not by one-side party, it means voluntary consent of each party is necessarily needed.

On the other hand maximalists take different path by referring to Lode Walgrave and other who defined restorative justice as "all activities oriented to realize justice by restoring harm brought by a crime."[25] In maximalist view, the word "all activities" can be extended, therefore all measure can be done to realize justice as long the purpose is to restore the harm caused by the crime. This also means coercive way is enforceable to be enforced in restorative justice. For example it can be done by judge verdict regardless whether the offender agree or disagree with the verdict.

In conclusion, restorative justice should be understood in a very wide aspect to obtain a clear comprehensive picture of restorative justice. With these categorizations, a nation can choose which category that fit its nation characteristic so restorative justice is plausible to be implemented.

3. Police-Community Partnership Forum (FKPM), a Form of Indonesian Restorative Justice[26]

Police-Community Partnership Forum (FKPM) is a means to resolve dispute, criminal dispute included, restoratively outside of criminal justice system. It is a communication vehicle between police and the community which is conducted based on voluntarily agreement in order to discuss social problems that need to be solved by community and police in order to support police function.[27]

Its establishment is based on police discretionary power which assured by Ordinance of Indonesian Police Chief Number 7/1998 and Decree of Indonesian Police Chief (Skep/433/VII/2006) as its legal basis. Based on this legal basis, FKPM is given authority to settle several cases as its jurisdiction of subject matters which are:[28]

> 1. All cases that are stipulated in book III (Misdemeanor) of Indonesian Penal Code.
> 2. Criminal offenses that are threatened with a maximum of 3 months imprisonment
> 3. Petty crimes: light maltreatment to animals (Art.302), light maltreatment (Art.352), light theft (Art.364), light embezzlement (Art.373), light fraud (Art.379), simple receiving of stolen property (Art.482), simple defamation (Art 315)
> 4. To resolve social conflict.

Ideally, FKPM is formed in every village in Indonesia which means actually there should be 72.944 FKPM in Indonesia. However by virtue of many problems, one FKPM may be formed for assisting three villages.[29]

The structure of FKPM consisted of one police officer and several representatives from community member that voted through a deliberation (musyawarah). Community here may in form of geographical community or community of interest.[30] The head of FKPM should always from the community member. The police officer will merely be a secretary of FKPM. According to Hermanto, this is in order to assure the fairness process in settling a case within community.[31] Typically the structure of FKPM will be consisted of a head, a secretary, and divisions which differ from FKPM to FKPM.

[27] Currently in Indonesia, the inhabitants outnumber the police in term of ideal ratio. The ratio number between police and citizen presently is 1:650 whilst the ideal ratio based on standard determined by UN is 1:400. FKPM is one of solutions to balance this ratio by using community policing concept.

Lasem, a sub-district in Rembang Regency, may be considered as a sub-district which has successful FKPM. Lasem constituted of twenty villages which means has twenty FKPMs.

Since its establishment in 2007, FKPMs in Lasem has been settling 19 cases out side of criminal justice system. The cases are included: Domestic violence, adultery, fights between villages, theft, inheritance, irrigation.

In FKPM there is no strict separation between civil and criminal dispute. For instance dispute within inheritance is actually the area of civil law. As long as the dispute parties agree, the case may be settled at FKPM.

The theft case above involved a teenager who stole a part of scale at a traditional market in Lasem. The boy was caught later by a villager when the boy offered the stolen good to be sold. The case was handed over to FKPM to be solved. A conference was held, the juvenile delinquent and his parents, the victim and FKPM members deliberated to discuss and find the best outcome of the case. The parents of the juvenile felt ashamed for what their son had done. Both the juvenile and the parents apologized to the victim. The victim accepted their apology since the victim sought merely an apology from the offender. Nevertheless, the delinquent parents insisted to give back a good with the same as the stolen thing i.e. a part of scale. Now, the boy is growing up and become a driver in Lasem.[32]

The same outcome for juvenile case settled within FKPM above would not be gained within traditional criminal justice system. Albeit a juvenile delinquent would have the same feeling i.e. ashamed if s/he is charged under criminal justice system, the shaming is a different kind with shaming within a conference such in FKPM. This is probably in line with what Braithwaite called as re-integrative shaming which differs from disintegrative shaming within traditional criminal justice system. To understand the two different shaming above, I cite Braithwaite as follow:

> The crucial distinction is between shaming that is re-integrative and shaming that is disintegrative (stigmatization). Re-integrative shaming means the expression of community disapproval….are followed by gesture of reacceptance into the community of law-abiding citizens … Disintegrative shaming (stigmatization), in contrast, divides the community by creating a class of outcast (Braithwaite, cited in Gerry Johnston 2011: 99)

Furthermore Zehr described shame that mirrors traditional criminal justice system in this way:

> The shame that our criminal justice system reflects is a stigmatizing shame. It says that … what you did is bad, but you are also bad, and there is really nothing you can do… You will always be an ex-offender (Ibid: 98)

FKPM offers an integrative way of handling crime and an ADR (Alternative Dispute Resolution) in lieu of criminal justice system. The typical process of dispute settlement would be like this. Mostly, the case would be reported by victim to an FKPM member, FKPM follows up and analyzes the case, determines the interest parties that should be invited in FKPM. Usually the parties that attend the forum will be victim and his/her supporter, offender and his/her supporter (mostly the supporter is their family), a head and a secretary of FKPM and other FKPM member or parties if needed depending on the case. The forum is led by the head of FKPM as the mediator. If mediation ends up with successful mediation, the end of the process will be established by a joint decision as an agreement which mainly has three points: apologize, redress, and a promise there will be no reoffending. So far there is no record of failure mediation in Lasem, however, if the mediation ends up with a disagreement the case will be transferred into formal criminal justice system. Schematically, the whole process of ADR in FKPM is portrayed in scheme below:

4. Conclusion

From the categorization I mentioned earlier, FKPM may be categorized as voluntarily and diversionary system. Based its initial form, FKPM is close to conference. In addition, its dispute settlement process is actually rooted from Indonesian local wisdom, meaning it is not something that new for Indonesian people. So far FKPM can be considered as an effective means for implementing restorative justice in Indonesia based on police discretionary power as its legal basis.

Laïcité and the affaires des foulard
An analysis based on the work of John Rawls

Camila Sombra Muiños de Andrade[1]

Abstract: "How is it possible that there may exist over time a stable and just society, whose free and equal citizens are profoundly divided by reasonable though incompatible religious, philosophical and moral doctrines?" This is the question that John Rawls seeks to answer in "Political Liberalism". Starting from the notion of the existence of a reasonable pluralism in comprehensive conceptions of the good (be these religious, philosophical or moral), Rawls concludes that the only possible point of agreement is the principle of tolerance. He understands that, for a democratic society to be stable over the long term, it cannot depend predominantly on coercion, but must be freely supported by citizens with a diverse range of views. This is the foundation of liberal tolerance, which forms part of Rawls' project for the construction of a just society. The plurality of comprehensive doctrines of the good, particularly when religious in nature, was specifically responded to in France: in the principle of French secularism, or laïcité. French secularism, one of the influences left over from the 1789 French Revolution and the consequent adoption of Republicanism, is related to the principle of formal equality, requiring that the State remain neutral when dealing with diverse religions. In the name of this idea, a series of restrictive legislative measures has been taken in France regarding the use of the Islamic veil, such as Law no. 228 of 15th March 2004, which bans from public schools religious symbols considered "overt", and Law 1192 of 2010, which outlaws the concealment of the face in public spaces, thereby affecting the use of so-called full-face veils, such as the burqa and the niqab. The question that guides this investigation is this: is the principle of laïcité, as evoked in this specific case, a consequence of the ideas of neutrality and liberal tolerance, like those understood by John Rawls, or a degeneration of them? This work seeks to analyse the issue of neutrality and liberal tolerance, centred, above all, on John Rawls' perspective. In seeking to clarify this issue, it sets out from the French debates about the use of Muslim veils in public spaces (the affaires des foulards), which are the product of the above-mentioned legislation. These debates provide evidence of the timeliness of this theme and provoke reflections about the demands of liberal tolerance and its potential configurations and limitations.

Introduction

"How is it possible that there may exist … a stable and just society of free and equal citizens profoundly divided by reasonable though incompatible religious, philosophical, and moral doctrines?"[2] This is the question that John Rawls seeks to answer in Political Liberalism.

Starting from this question, Rawls concludes that the only possible point of agreement is the principle of tolerance. He understands that for a democratic society to be stable over the long term, it cannot predominantly depend on coercion, but must be freely supported by citizens with a diverse range of views. This is the foundation of liberal tolerance, which forms part of Rawls' project for the construction of a just society.

This article seeks to analyse the theme of neutrality and liberal tolerance, particularly centred on the perspective of John Rawls in Political Liberalism. In seeking to investigate this issue, it considers the French debates about the use of Islamic headscarves in public spaces - the affaires des foulards -, which provide evidence of the timeliness of this theme and provoke reflections about the demands of liberal tolerance and its potential contours and boundaries.

I. Tolerance and neutrality in John Rawls

A. The fact of reasonable pluralism and tolerance

When constructing his idea of liberal tolerance in Political Liberalism Rawls begins with an assumption: the "fact of reasonable pluralism". This is the expression he gives to the observation that "the comprehensive diversity of religious, philosophical, and moral doctrines is not mere historical contingency, fated to disappear immediately, but rather a permanent feature of the public culture of democracy".[3]By "comprehensive doctrines", we mean moral or religious beliefs or those otherwise present in society, the sources of varied ideas about what a valuable life is and how it should be lived.

For Rawls, this plurality is a social fact that arises from the limits of the burdens of judgement, in other words, from a situation in which reasonable people inevitably disagree about what constitutes the summum bonum. Such dissonance not only arises from ignorance or personal interests but is also a result of the exercise of human reason on free institutions.[4]

As Rawls himself notes, he departs from the tradition of political philosophy, marked by thinkers such as Plato, Aristotle and Bentham, who dwelt on a single, rational and reasonable good to be pursued by society.[5] Rawls does not theorize about the valid way of life, but asks himself this: given the fact of reasonable pluralism, how can the stability of democratic society be achieved, bearing in mind that consensus about the comprehensive doctrine that society should adopt is unattainable except by oppressive political means?

Moreover, Rawls does not seek any type of stability, such as that provided by a modus vivendi. As he explains, this term is used to designate "treaties between two states whose national objectives and interests place them in conflict". The author highlights the fragility of this type of agreement, in that respect for the treaty tends to come from States only when they consider it to be in their national interest. Once these circumstances alter, however, a breakdown may occur to the commitment undertaken.[6]

His concern is thus with achieving stability for particular reasons, that is, for moral reasons and not merely as a result of the use of force. In this sense, he concludes that the only possible point of reasonable agreement between two such doctrines, which remain stable even in the face of changes to the distribution of power, is the principle of tolerance.[7] This state position of tolerance, as Álvaro de Vita observes, is opposed to varieties of "perfectionism", a term used to designate doctrines that assume a pre-determined way of valuing life that must be pursued, whose political consequence is the distribution of opportunities and resources and even the use of state coercion to achieve the pursued societal ideal.[8]

According to Rawls, the principle of tolerance, within an interpretation of the requirement for stability, is the object of an overlapping consensus. This concept, introduced in Political Liberalism, is based on the idea that several reasonable comprehensive concepts[9] may support the idea of justice for reasons internal to their doctrines.[10]

Based on this notion, the formulation of the stability of justice as equity is divided into two stages. Added to the common basis of the public justification of society, which stands on its own because it is grounded on the liberal principle of legitimacy (which requires that the exercise of political power meet the criterion of no reasonable rejection)[11], is the justification of overlapping consensus.[12]Besides the independent justification of the fact of reasonable pluralism, this division thus provides a justification that addresses such diversity.[13]

This tolerance argument occurs through a distinction made between reasons internal to the comprehensive doctrines and public reasons.[14] The idea is that a person may consider that their comprehensive doctrine is reasonable, while at the same time understanding that others may reasonably reject it. In this way, one's doctrine may not serve as a justification for public social coercion.

This concept of public reason has an implication for citizens: the duty of civility. This duty is an exact result of the idea that, "citizens

[9] By reasonable doctrines, one should understand those that accept a democratic constitutional regime and the idea of legitimate law related to it (RAWLS, O liberalismo político, p. 523).

[10] RAWLS, O liberalismo político, p.175.

[11] "our exercise of political power is fully proper only when it is exercised in accordance with a constitution, the essential of which all citizens as free and equal may reasonably be expected to endorse in the light of principles and ideals acceptable for common human reason" RAWLS, O liberalismo político, p. 161

[12] RAWLS, O liberalismo político, p. 161.

[13] RAWLS, O liberalismo político, pp. 165-177.

[14] In Rawls' definition, public reason is public in three ways: as the reason of citizens, it is the reason of the public; its subject is the public good concerning questions of fundamental political justice; and its nature and content are expressed in public reason, since it is determined by ideas and principles of the political concept of justice (RAWLS, O liberalismo político, p. 251).

must reason by public reason and be guided by the criterion of reciprocity, whenever constitutional elements and matters of basic justice are at stake." [15]

Rawls' Political Liberalism does not, therefore, apply to every single topic, but only to those related to the public political forum, referring to matters of basic justice and essential constitutional elements.[16] Rawls divides the contents of the public political forum into three content categories: "the discourse of judges in their decisions", the "discourse of government officials, especially chief executives and legislators" and "the discourse of candidates for public office and their campaign managers". [17] Thus, the theory of political liberalism addresses itself to people as citizens, and does not seek to interfere in every single domain of human life. It is only these fundamental themes of a political nature that must be guided by the ideal of public reason.

There remains, therefore, the arena for public discussion – the background culture – in which matters of public interest may be discussed based on comprehensive concepts of good.[18]

To achieve this ideal of tolerance, a certain type of state neutrality is necessary, as we shall see below.

B. Neutrality in Rawls

For Rawls the value of tolerance is therefore achievable through some form of state neutrality in relation to the several comprehensive doctrines of the good, guided by the duty of civility between citizens, who must justify fundamental political decisions based on the ideal of public reason.

This idea of liberal neutrality was attacked by MacIntyre, who asserted that liberalism does not constitute an independent tradition, through which matters of justice that involve conflicting traditions related to concepts of the good may be arbitrated, but rests, as do other traditions, on a concept of good in itself.[19] According to this point of view, the idea of tolerance based on liberal neutrality is tainted.

[19]MacINTYRE, Alasdair. Whose Justice? Which Rationality? Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1988, p. 346.

Brian Barry formulates a response to MacIntyre's assertions, questioning the idea that justice as impartiality, grounded in ideas of neutrality related to the several concepts of the good proposed by Scanlon and Rawls, is a fraud. Barry's central argument is that the required impartiality is second order, in the sense that it does not specify what concept of the good should be adopted. It is a neutral concept in the procedural sense and not substantive.[20] As an example, he asserts that, "justice as impartiality will have things to say about how the legislation or policy can be framed consistently with the demands of justice, but it is silent on the question of what the content of the legislation or policy should be." [21] He sums up by saying that there is a difference between that which may integrate individual beliefs and that which may serve as a justification for the organization of institutions in society. [22] Thus, in this idea of second order procedural impartiality, the values internal to the several concepts of the good are not questioned.

Álvaro de Vita states that one may respond to MacIntyre's criticism by making a distinction between the neutrality of justification and the neutrality of results. The latter involves the requirement that Liberal State politics do not favour any concept of the good. However, as the author notes, a politics of strict neutrality, in the sense of results, does not even enable the adoption of a principle of religious tolerance. Thus, egalitarian liberalism demands neutrality in terms of the justifications it refers to in matters of basic justice and essential constitutional elements.[23] This form of impartiality is based on a notion of pure procedural justice, explained by Rawls as the circumstances under which "in their rational deliberations, the parties do not consider themselves obliged to apply or subscribe to any principle of law or justice which is provided in advance".[24] It does not intend to be absolute neutrality, guided by the idea of the neutrality of results, precisely because this is unattainable.

What to say then about Michael Sandel's criticism, that liberalism, supported by the idea of neutrality in relation to comprehensive doctrines of the good, cannot offer an adequate response to important moral issues, such as abortion or even slavery, which in this regard depend upon a position? Sandel asserts that in these cases the priority of the just over the good cannot be sustained.[25]

Rawls contests this claim and denies that public reason is too limited to address such issues. Regarding 19th century North American debates about slavery, for example, he states that the views of Lincoln (who, contrary to Douglas, did not understand that state politics must be neutral in relation to slavery, but considered it a moral evil) would be considered reasonable in terms of public reason, while those of Douglas would not, since only the former ensures the constitutional dimension of fundamental equal liberties.[26]

As Álvaro de Vita explains, all that the liberal neutrality norm requires is the possibility of justifying the validity of the principle in question rather than, in the case of religious tolerance, to presuppose the intrinsic superiority of any one specific religious concept.[27]

C. Liberal tolerance, its contours and boundaries

The idea of liberal tolerance forms part of John Rawls' project for the construction of a just society. As Thomas Nagel notes, the protection of both the rights of individuals and of pluralism, such as the guarantee of socio-economic equality, are interpreted by Rawls as expressions of human equality in relation to political and social institutions.[28] Precisely because they derive from the same foundation, the two pivots of Rawls' liberalism cannot be disassociated. In this sense, Álvaro de Vita explains that the value of liberal tolerance in Rawls is not merely the idea of non-interference associated with negative liberty, but is also dependent on matters of distributive justice. For this reason, the author notes that, more properly, it is an idea of effective liberty.[29]

Although John Rawls understands that the stability of a concept of justice depends on the realization of an ideal of tolerance, the definition of its contours and boundaries is not an easy task.

In this sense, R. Forst highlights an important aspect - the political use of the concept of tolerance, that is, the attempt always to cast one's own proper behaviour as tolerant and to categorise that of the other as intolerant.[30]

Scanlon also points to another difficulty involving tolerance: the challenge to balance the desires of those who seek to protect potentially excluded groups and the intention to protect a workable system of tolerance (safeguarding it against erosion).[31] There are countless debates about this, such as those relating to the best way to deal with hate speech. Moreover, countries provide multiple responses, ranging from the American formula of not restricting hate speech, to the Brazilian framework for the crime of racism, which typifies intolerant demonstrations/behaviour.

Based on Rawls' theory, one should immediately refute the criticisms made by anti-liberal theorists, who understand that equivalence exists between the imposition on the whole of society of a particular group's comprehensive doctrine and the use of force motivated by the defence of liberal tolerance. Stephen Holmes points out the risks of such thinking:

> Attacks on the idea of neutrality have a sordid message. They imply that one form of "intolerance" is worth another. There is no difference between my imposing my beliefs on others by force and a democratic government forcibly preventing me from imposing my beliefs on others by force.[32]

Forst also demonstrates concern about the confusion between the two meanings of tolerance, and concludes:

> To call both points of view equally "intolerant" pre-supposes that there is no non-arbitrary, impartial way of drawing the boundaries of tolerance in the light of normative considerations of a higher > order. However, for the concept of tolerance to be saved from this destructive paradox, such a possibility must exist; only then can the criticism of a possible action against "intolerance" be itself more than just another form of "intolerance". [33]

In this sense, the same author indicates that there are two forms of tolerance: the concept as permission, which is established against a minority by a majority in power, and the concept of tolerance as respect, in which the parties recognize each other, establishing a relationship of mutual respect. In the first case, he asserts that the boundaries of tolerance end up depending on the concept adopted by the majority, while the concept of tolerance with respect seeks to guide its contours and boundaries via a criterion of procedural justice, supported by the principle of the justification of justice, in the sense that institutions should be justified on grounds that others cannot reciprocally and generally reject.[34]

The concept of tolerance that Forst calls permission may, therefore, be associated with the modus vivendi referred to by Rawls, who considers it insufficient to guarantee the stability of a democratic society. The tolerance sought by Rawls is that informed by a relationship of respect between citizens, which intends to achieve the ideal of public reason, guided by the duty of civility. In this sense, names may change, but not the central ideas.

Once the issue of the anti-liberal claim of equivalence between the two forms of intolerance is confronted, how does one establish the boundaries of liberal tolerance? For Forst, such limits "must be placed where intolerance begins".[35] This also appears to be John Rawls' position:

> The conclusion, therefore, is that, although the intolerant sect does not have, in itself, the right to complain of intolerance, its liberty must only be restricted when the tolerant, with sincerity and reason, believe that their own safety, and the safety of the institutions of liberty, are in jeopardy.[36]

For Rawls, therefore, it is not a simple fact of one group being intolerant, or defending types of intolerant action, that justify the employment of coercion against a group in question. Indeed, the intolerant must also be treated through this notion of mutual respect. As Álvaro de Vita notes, this idea of tolerance appears to be guided by John Stuart Mill's harm principle, that is, the idea that, through political or moral coercion, society may only interfere in such objectives so as to avoid harm caused to others.[37]

II. The French approach: Laïcité

The plurality of comprehensive doctrines of the good, particularly those of a religious nature, acquired a specific response in France: the principle of French secularism, or laïcité.

This value was not attained following philosophical reflections about the importance of religious liberty, but, as Dominic McGoldrick notes, is the product of centuries of a painful, and often violent, relationship between the State and the (Catholic) Church.[38]Looking at the history of this principle, Jean Glavany remembers that the first French secular text translated into law is the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen from 1789. This asserts that, "no man ought to be molested on account of his opinions, including his religious opinions, provided that his avowal of them does not disturb the public order established by law". Following this Declaration, one has to wait more than a century, until the Third Republic, when, as Glavany states,[39] the republican laws about public schools were established. Secularism in schools formed part of the measures by the Minister of Education, Jules Ferry (1881-82, 1886), for whom school ought to be an agent of assimilation through which a common language, culture and ideological formation is reached.[40] The end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century were also marked by secular or non-confessional legislation: the divorce laws of

1884; the cemetery laws of 1887; and the laws about congregations of the 1st of July 1901 and 7th July 1904.[41]

Finally, secular law was enshrined in the 1905 law regarding the separation of Church and State.[42] Considered one of the pillars of the French Republic, laïcité acquired constitutional status in 1946. This is explained in a report about the "Application of the principle of laïcité in the Republic"[43], which asserts that although all democratic states respect freedom of conscience and the principle of non-discrimination through the separation of the political, the religious and the spiritual, France had elevated laïcité to the level of a founding value of the Republic.

French secularism cannot be defined simply as the separation of Church and State. This principle requires that specific cultures and religions are only expressed in the private sphere, since it considers that the public sphere should only contain free and equal individuals under the law. As Scott[44] observes, this means the State protects individuals against the interference of religions. In the United States, on the contrary, it involves the protection of religions from State interference. As the same author notes, laïcité, or the French version of secularism, is part of a universalism, which, paradoxically, is unique to French culture, to the extent that it can only be described as such in its original language.[45]

The first legal instruments inspired by laïcité addressed the relationship between the French State and the Catholic Church. Today, they principally address the relationship between the State and Islam, the second largest religion in the country, which involves new inspirations that claim to be guided by principle. Under these circumstances, the country has adopted a series of restrictive legislative measures related to the use of the Islamic headscarf.

It is worth providing a brief historical overview on this subject here.

In 1989, a French professor from Creil, a suburb of Paris, forbade three students of Maghreb origin from attending a class because they were wearing the foulard, arguing that this offends the secular principle, considered one of the pillars of the French Republic.[46] This incident gave rise to a huge debate that mobilized several sections of society and inaugurated the "affaire des foulards", a series of controversies around the country regarding the use of the Islamic headscarf in public spaces.

In 2003, at the request of the then President Jacques Chirac, the Commission of Reflection on the Application of the Principle of Secularity in the Republic, also known as the Stasi Commission (in reference to its president Bernard Stasi), published the "Laïcité and Republic" report. One of the report's recommendations was the prohibition of the use of symbols of a religious or political nature in educational establishments.

In 2004, this recommendation was adopted into Law no. 228 of 15 March[47]. Under the legislation, religious symbols considered "ostentatious" were banned in public schools, based on the argument of state secularism. Through the legislation, the use of a range of types of Islamic headscarf (the hijab in Arabic, or foulard in French) were then banned in public schools, although they continued to be permitted in universities. Although the prohibition laid down in law covers "ostentatious religious symbols" and is not directly or literally aimed at the Islamic headscarf, the historical context from which it derives, as well as the debates that followed, have proved that limiting the use of the headscarf was most probably the French government's main objective. At the very least, it is undeniable that Muslim women were the most affected by the new law, so that the only recourse for those who refused to follow the new dictates were private educational institutions.

In recent years, government attention has specifically returned to the use of full-face veils (the burqa and niqab, which cover the wearer's face), extending its reach beyond educational institutions. France's hostility to the full-face veil becomes clear in the light of ex-President Nicolas Sarkozy's declaration on 22 June 2009, asserting in Congress that the "burqa is not welcome in France".[48] Finally, in 2010, France became the first country to mandate the prohibition of the use of the full-face veil in public spaces. Following approval by the two houses of Congress, the French Constitutional Council endorsed the bill and the legislation came into force on 11 April 2011.[49] The new legislation stipulated a fine of 150 euro for non-compliance and provided for the offense of forced concealment of the face, referring to circumstances in which the full-face veil is worn under the duress of another, the penalty for which is imprisonment for one year or a fine of 30,000 euro.[50]

Far from the affaires ending with this law, they have continued to multiply. In April 2013, the French High Court, in what has since become known as the "Baby Loup" case, reignited discussions. This decision concerned the story of Fatima Afif, who worked in a private crèche until she was dismissed for insubordination and misconduct. Reversing the decisions of the lower courts, the Court found, on the contrary, that Fatima had been dismissed as a result of discrimination on the basis of her religious convictions. According to its report, this dismissal occurred when, following a period of parental leave, she returned to work wearing a headscarf.

Before reaching a consensus about the boundaries and requirements of laïcité, the decision was accompanied by a series of debates and proposals that aimed to further limit the use of the Islamic veil (in any of its forms, not only the full-face veil).[51]On this subject, President Hollande announced that a new law about ostentatious religious symbols was required. The intention was that the prohibition should be extended to private establishments, such as crèches, in situations where there is contact with children. At the same time, complaints from Muslim women that schools have prevented them from accompanying their children on school trips (to museums, libraries etc.), because they were wearing a headscarf, have multiplied. Although there is no law banning women in headscarves from participating in school trips, a note published in 2012 by the Sarkozy government's Minister of Education recommended that schools ensure public service neutrality on trips. The decision thus remains at the discretion of each school establishment. The protest group "Mamans Toutes Égales" was founded in response to the growing number of Muslim women prevented from accompanying their children on trips.

[50]The debate about the use of the full-face veil in public spaces is not limited to discussions about the application of the principle of laïcité but involves arguments about the assertion of national identity, gender equality, and others. However, this work does not address these other perspectives.

[51]CHRISAFIS, Angelique. "France's headscarf war: 'It's an attack on freedom'". The Guardian, 22 July 2013.

Moreover, these proposals are not limited to the care and education of children. Hollande himself has suggested that a law may also be required to limit ostentatious symbols in private companies that have contact with the public. In April 2013, as a symbol of the topical nature of discussions related to the laïcité principle, the "Laïcité Observatory" was officially set up to support government policy decision-making. Although formally created in 2007, Observatory members were only named this year. In the months to come, it is expected to present a report about how to establish a new law that restricts the use of the headscarf and religious symbols in private crèches. The Observatory will also have to examine the proposal of the High Council for Integration (Haut Conseil à l'intégration - HCI) to extend to universities limitations on the use of religious symbols considered ostentatious.[52]

As Jean-Louis Schelegel suggests, from 1989 onwards, a new moment in the post 1905 history of laïcité in France has been observed, which may be characterised by religious visibility[53]. In fact, the principle has been the foundation of a number of measures to restrict the visibility of religious symbols, in particular the Islamic headscarf in all its various forms.

III. Rawls and laïcité

In the light of such events and with new legal instruments, one may ask whether the principle of laïcité is a requirement of the ideas of neutrality and liberal tolerance as understood by John Rawls.

For Catherine Audard, the response is negative. According to this author, French secularism is not compatible with Rawls' vision of tolerance, which requires a secular State, but one founded on a range of justifications. She claims that such liberalism does not require that religion be kept completely private, with no influence in public spaces, or that such influence be excluded from legislative debates.[54]

In the words of Milena Doytcheva, "If the secularization of public life is a feature common to all Western countries, France is one of those countries that elevates to the highest degree the requirement of neutrality in relation to any particular religious or spiritual concept."[55]Jean Baubérot goes even further, in a discourse about how French secularism plays the role of a "secular religion"[56]:

> The ties between various forms of anticlericalism, from the most radical to the more moderate, and the French Revolution are moral as well as political. The rights of man, as proclaimed by the Revolution, appeared as nonreligious values, even antagonistic toward Catholicism, and Catholicism was the lens through which all religion was viewed at the time. Mona Ozouf demonstrated that, beyond mere political changes, the goal of the French Revolution was to regenerate the human being, to create a 'new man'. Therefore, it is not surprising that this reference to the founding age of the revolution has also taken on a quasi-religious dimension. The most ideological forms of French Republicanism can indeed be termed a 'secular religion'.

Álvaro de Vita appears to assume a similar position; he defines laïcité as a concept of comprehensive secularism extremely hostile to the expression of ethnic or religious identities within the public space[57]. In another text, the same author, referring to legislation adopted by the French State, asserts, "the ideal of liberal tolerance in no way requires a demand that Muslim women remove their headscarves to attend public school".[58]

In these terms, laïcité should not be understood as a requirement for Rawls' ideals in Political Liberalism. Indeed, Rawls' defence of tolerance does not involve strong secularism, since the author understands that this would also constitute a comprehensive doctrine of the good. Regarding these secular arguments, he states:

> a central feature of political liberalism is that it views all such arguments in the same way as it views religious ones and, therefore, these secular philosophical doctrines do not provide public reasons. Secular concepts and reasoning of this kind belong to first philosophy and moral doctrine, and fall outside of the domain of the political.[59]

In Political Liberalism, Rawls views religions as reasonable doctrines. This is because he understands that his model of society requires support from citizens of faith in order for to be endowed with stability. This is reflected in several aspects of his idea of tolerance.

As well as the idea of "overlapping consensus", in the essay The Idea of Public Reason Revisited, he emphasizes that the justification of liberal tolerance does not require religions to be compatible with the idea of free faith, since they accept that the internal reasons of these doctrines are not public reasons, renouncing the desire to take the professed doctrine as a political model for the organization of society:

> While no one is expected to put his or her religious or non-religious doctrine in danger, we must each give up the hope of changing the Constitution so as to establish our religion's hegemony, or of qualifying our obligations so as to ensure its influence and success.[60]

Along these same lines, Rawls raises the possibility that arguments based on reasonable comprehensive doctrines enter public discussions because, at the right moment, arguments come to be presented that serve the idea of public reason (what he calls the proviso). Thus, arguments that introduce religious vocabulary are not necessarily excluded from a notion of appropriate public reason.[61]

In Rawls' own words, the problem of Political Liberalism is to formulate "a political conception of justice for a constitutional democratic regime (liberal), which a plurality of doctrines, both religions and non-religious, liberal and non-liberal may endorse for the right reasons".[62]

IV. Final Considerations

About half of the global population lives in democratic countries, although only 11% (eleven percent) reside in full democracies (research categorises nations according to this and three other regimes: flawed democracies, hybrid regimes and authoritarian regimes). This is the conclusion of the "Democracy Index 2011" report, which is based on the following aspects: the electoral process and pluralism, civil liberties, the functioning of government, political participation and political culture.[63]

Added to this data is a statement that political freedom and religious freedom do not always go hand in hand. As the magazine The Economist[64] observes, on the one hand there are democracies in which religious freedom is restricted, for example in India, a democracy that has "anti-conversion" laws, which prohibit the renunciation of Hinduism. On the other, there are secular dictatorships, which do not interfere in the religious freedom of minorities, although they adopt a harsh attitude in relation to political dissidents.[65] The Arab Spring appears to confirm this situation. There was hope at the beginning (the end of 2010, the beginning of 2011) that this would bring about a range of freedoms, including limits to restrictions about beliefs and religious practices, but this did not take place. A recent study by the Pew Research Center indicates that the already high levels of religious restrictions in that region of the Middle East and North Africa had further increased.[66]

In its study of religious freedom, the Pew Research Center's Fact Tank takes into account not only government restrictions but also social hostility to religion (manifest, for example, in violence and harassment). Based on these indicators, in 2009 the institution indicated that 70% (seventy percent) of the global population, 6.8 billion people, live in countries with high restrictions on religion, which tends to affect religious minorities.[67] In August 2011,[68] the organization published a new report, which confirmed that more than 2.2 billion people, about one third of the world's population, live in countries where a substantial increase in religious restriction was observed between the middle of 2006 and the middle of 2009. Most of the fourteen countries that recorded the greatest government restrictions over this period were in the Middle East or North Africa, but two European countries were also included in the group, France[69] and Serbia. It is also worth noting that Europe was the region with the highest growth in social hostility over this period – five of the ten countries that manifest this tendency are European: Bulgaria, Denmark, Russia, Sweden and the United Kingdom. Substantial growth in some form of religious restriction was therefore observed in democratic countries with a high level of human development.

In John Rawls, we encounter a proposal to guarantee the freedoms of thought, conscience and religion: the idea of liberal tolerance, the guiding principle of his political liberalism.

This is not, however, an easy task. The challenge of tolerance is ongoing, continuously gaining new and specific contours. In many countries today, this occurs because of high levels of immigration, and many controversies come about when Islam is at the centre of the debate, such as those relating to the Islamic headscarf or the construction of minarets.[70] Furthermore, there is a specific difficulty associated with Rawls' tolerance: the ideal does not prescribe a recipe to follow. For this [69]In the case of France, as well as restrictions to the use of the veil in public spaces, the report cites the pressure from the French government in relation to religious groups that are considered cults, such as the Scientologists. reason, the construction of a tolerant society is a perpetually unfinished process, which demands a case-by-case delineation of the contours and boundaries of tolerance. It is a process guided by an idea of procedural justice, supported by the ideal of public reason, which does not indicate what should be decided but how to conduct the decision-making process.

Scanlon acknowledges that there are many risks and difficulties linked to the politics of tolerance. Despite this, the author still believes in this principle. Other alternatives, he concludes, leave us in a position of antagonism or alienation in relation to other citizens.[71]

Can one dispense with the idea of social contract as parameter for a relevant theory of justice?
Some disadvantages of Amartya Sen's Comparative Approach

Fábio Creder

Abstract: In The idea of justice, his 2009 work, Sen sets out a biting critique of modern political theories grounded on the idea of social contract, especially that of John Rawls, whose approach to distributive justice is among the most notable examples of this trend. In this paper, I intend to examine the merits of Sen's critique to the Rawlsian contractarianism, to which he opposes an approach supposedly focused not on the transcendental identification of the ideal justice, but in comparing the empirical results of the attempts to fight the phenomena of remediable injustice we face on a daily basis.

Sen's critique clearly has several merits, but one needs to question the possibility of a political theory to conceive the basic structure of a society without a minimal conception of social contract. Sen's theory of justice, marked by the characteristic dynamism of the economic thought, with his comparative method, focused on the achievements actually viable in actual societies, probably lacks elements that enable the design of a minimum institutional structure for a state in constitutional stage. It seems, moreover, that the Rawlsian doctrine is essentially a theory of constitutional law, and as such is to be interpreted.

Thus, the hypothesis I would like to come up with in this paper, suggests that Sen's approach, despite its laudable pragmatism, rather than being an alternative to the Rawlsian theory of justice, would be better considered its important, and even indispensable complement. I intend to show that contractarianism, especially the Rawlsian version, satisfactorily fulfills the task of being a kind of regulative principle of social justice in a given society. But its claims to "perfection" (in Sen's words) must be offset by an impartial and objective analysis of concrete situations of the concerned societies, and of the viable accomplishments towards an effective advance of justice, although precarious, because reality always imposes limits on our most noble aspirations. The method best suited to such an analysis seems to be, in fact, as Sen wants, the comparative; but its application does not exempt the adoption of a more abstract theoretical framework, as proposed by Rawls. Rather, I think that, in fact, it presupposes it.

In his 2009 book, The Idea of Justice, Amartya Sen outlines a biting analysis of modern political theories grounded on the idea of social contract, especially that of John Rawls, whose approach to distributive justice in the work A Theory of Justice constituted a new paradigm among contractual contemporary theories.

In this paper, I intend to examine the merits of Sen's critique of the social contract theories in general, and specially the Rawlsian one. To these theories, he opposes the approach supposedly focused not on the design, or transcendental identification of the ideal of justice, but on the comparison of the empirical results of attempts to fight remediable injustice phenomena with which we encounter every day.

As we shall see, Sen's critique clearly has several merits, but it is natural to question the possibility of a political theory to design the basic structure of a society dispensing with some minimal conception of the social contract. Sen's theory of justice, marked by the dynamism characteristic of the economic thought, with its comparative method, focused on achievements effectively viable in societies such as we deal with nowadays, probably lacks elements that enable the design of a minimal institutional structure to a State under constitution.

Therefore, the hypothesis I would like to suggest in this paper, proposes that Sen's approach, despite its laudable pragmatism, rather than appear to be an alternative to Rawls's theory of justice would be best considered its important and even essential complement.

A leitmotif runs through the work in which Sen outlines his theory of justice: the idea that what moves us to act against injustice is not the realization that the world fails to be complete fair, but the fact that the injustices we want to eliminate are clearly eliminable. It is not, therefore, the frustration of a desire perhaps impossible to be satisfied that moves us to action, but the recognition that there are injustices whose abolition is possible.

That is why Amartya Sen argues categorically for identifying eliminable injustices as the crucial element of a theory of justice. His goal is, consequently, quite accurate. He does not want to know, or to conceive, the nature of the perfect justice. Hence, certain difficult issues that have been placed on this issue, especially in the theories of justice prevalent in contemporary political philosophy, does not seem to him worthy of the effort to answer them. Indeed, according to Sen, other are the questions we must answer. They do not inquire what constitutes the perfect justice, but what is within our reach to do in order to promote justice and eliminate injustice.

Sen emphasizes particularly three differences between the kind of theory of justice which he endorses and the one to which the other theories of justice still prevalent today are affiliated (cf. Sen, 2010 [2009], p. ix-xi).

The first relates to fitness to serve as the basis of practical reasoning. Theories of justice that only aims to characterize perfectly just societies are unable to serve this purpose. Only a theory of justice that includes ways of judging how to reduce injustice and promote justice can serve as the basis of practical reasoning.

There are therefore two antagonistic exercises underlying each of these kinds of theory. One consists in identifying perfectly just social arrangements, and the other in deciding whether certain social change promotes better or not justice.

Sen considers the exercise inherent to the second type of theory to be central to decision making about institutions, behaviors and other determinants of justice, and that the process by which such decisions are deliberate are crucial for a theory of justice that intends to guide practical reasoning about what should be done. This is a comparative exercise, which, according to Sen, does not depends absolutely on prior identification of the requirements of the perfect justice.

Secondly, Sen recognizes that although is effectively possible to solve many comparative questions of justice, so one can reach, about them, an agreement based on reasonable arguments; there are comparisons in which conflicting considerations cannot be completely resolved. Sen argues for the possibility of several distinct reasons of justice being able to survive a critical scrutiny, and, nonetheless, producing differing conclusions.

Thirdly, Sen notes that the presence of a remediable injustice might not be associated with institutional deficiencies, but with behavioral transgressions, since the idea of justice is concerned, above all, with the way people live, and not merely with the nature of institutions that make up the basic structure of their society.

In contrast, the contemporary theories of justice Sen objected consider crucial the objective of establishing just institutions, attributing to behavioral aspects a merely ancillary and derivative role.

Rawls's approach of justice as fairness, for example, would produce a peculiar set of principles of justice whose purpose is to establish just institutions that constitute the basic structure of the society, presuming that the behaviors of its members are impeccably suited to the demands of the proper functioning of these institutions.

The theory of justice advocated by Sen seems to consider naive this emphasis on institutions, as well as the presumption that people's behaviors are properly docile to their demands. What instead we need to emphasize, according to Sen, are the lives people are able to live. The focus on real life in the evaluation of justice would have thus many broad implications for the nature and scope of the idea of justice.

The use of the comparative approach adopted by Sen's theory of justice would have the great merit of transcending the limited and limiting structure of the social contract, in engaging in the making of comparisons of the practices of promotion of justice.

Sen dates back both his approach to justice, as those against which he opposes, to the two basic and divergent lines of reasoning about justice arising in the context of the European Enlightenment, to which he calls, respectively, transcendental institutionalism and comparative approach focused on realization.

Transcendental institutionalism, according to Sen, would assume primarily the task of identifying just institutional arrangements to society, and two basic characteristics would distinguish it. The first would be precisely the focus on the identification of the perfect justice, and not on relative comparisons of justice and injustice. The second, in turn, would concern to the fact that, in the pursuit of the perfect justice, the focus is on obtaining the correctness of institutions, rather than on the actual societies that would eventually emerge. According to Sen, both characteristics refer to the "contractarian" way of thinking inaugurated by Hobbes and developed by Locke, Rousseau and Kant.

A hypothetical "social contract", presumably chosen, is clearly worried about an ideal alternative to the chaos that otherwise could characterize a society, and the main contracts discussed by the authors dealt mainly with the choice of institutions. The overall result, according to Sen, would have been the designing of theories of justice focused on the transcendental identification of ideal institutions.

In stark contrast to the transcendental institutionalism, Sen proposes that other theorists of the Enlightenment adopted comparative approaches, concerned with social realizations. Versions of this comparative thinking would be found, especially in the works of Adam Smith, Condorcet, Jeremy Bentham, Mary Wollstonecraft, Karl Marx and John Stuart Mill. Although these authors, with their ideas so different from the demands of justice, have proposed ways completely different of doing social comparisons, Sen assumes that all were involved in comparisons of societies that existed or could feasibly arise. They would be concerned with comparisons focused on realizations, and would be interested in removing manifest injustices in the world as it actually is.

For Sen, the distance between these two approaches is quite significant. Would have been on the transcendental institutionalism that contemporary political philosophy leaned on its exploration of the theory of justice.

The contractarian approach has been, therefore, according to Sen, the predominant influence in contemporary political philosophy, especially since the publication in 1958 of the article by John Rawls, "Justice as fairness", that preceded his definitive statement on this approach in the classic work, A Theory of Justice, in 1971.

That is the reason why Sen dedicates a significant place in his analysis of the idea of justice to an understanding of some fundamental aspects of the Rawlsian work, whose conception that justice must be considered according to the requirements of fairness Sen regards the better achieved example of what is essential to a proper grasp of the subject.

Indeed, Sen emphasizes the value of the Rawlsian perception that fairness, whose most striking feature is impartiality, appears to be the crucial aspect of justice, substantiated in the requirement of equal consideration of interests of all the people involved, and therefore in the zeal to avoid the precedence of any interests, priorities, eccentricities or particular prejudices.

The notion of fairness, in the core of which lies the need of avoiding bias in evaluations and actions, would be for Rawls, as Sen points out, even more important than the development of the principles of justice.

Rawls expresses the primacy of equity through the famous artifice of the original position, whose most striking feature is the effort to devise a way for individuals in a given society to be willing to cooperate with each other, although adhering to "comprehensive doctrines" as disparate as reasonable. Rawls thought that, despite, for example, their religious convictions and several overviews of what constitutes a good life, the citizens of a polity would be able to share a minimum political conception of justice allowing them to elect, in an entirely consensual manner, a set of principles of justice, reputed fair by every reasonable members of the group. Such principles would guide the choice of the elementary social institutions that would constitute the basic structure of this original society, as well as of every subsequent social arrangements.

Sen said to be skeptical about the Rawlsian proposition of a necessity of unanimous choice of a particular set of principles essential to the constitution of a society completely fair.

According to Sen, there are general concerns genuinely plural, and sometimes conflicting, which support an understanding of justice in whose core is rationality, fairness and equity. This fact, according to Sen, radically undermine Rawls' theory and determine its abandonment.

Perhaps one can synthesize Sen's critique to transcendental idealism in general, and to the Rawlsian social contract theory in particular, highlighting what he calls "the problem of the starting point".

Sen thinks that the question of contemporary theories of the social contract, which is "What institutions would be perfectly fair?" is inherently flawed. The question we should put first is "How would you promote justice?"

To start from a pragmatic concern with the effectively possible realizations, instead of with just institutions and rules, would require a radical change in the way we formulate theories of justice. Nevertheless, it would respond to what Sen considers the two basic problems of the social contract theories, namely the problem of viability and the problem of redundancy of searching for an abstract or transcendental solution.

The problem of viability is the fact that there can be no reasonable agreement, even under strict conditions of impartiality and unbiased analysis (e.g., as identified by Rawls in his "original position"), over the nature of the "just society".

Sen insists that there can be serious differences between the competing principles of justice capable of surviving a critical scrutiny and having claims of impartiality. According to him this is a very serious problem, for example, for the Rawlsian assumption that there will be a unanimous choice of a single set of "two principles of fairness" in a primary hypothetical situation of equality (original position), where people ignore their own subjective interests. This assumes that there is only one kind of impartial argument able to satisfy the demands of justice, stripped of personal interests. Sen believes that this may be an error.

If a diagnosis of perfectly just social arrangements is hopelessly problematic, says Sen, then that will deeply affect the whole strategy of the theories of the social contract, even if every conceivable alternative in the world was available. For example, the two principles of justice in Rawls' classic investigation of "justice as fairness" is precisely about institutions perfectly fair in a world where all alternatives are available. However, what we could not know is if the plurality of reasons of justice would allow a single set of principles of justice to arise in the original position. Rawls theory of social justice, which proceeds gradually through the identification and establishment of just institutions, would then be stuck at its very base.

The problem of redundancy, in turn, supposes that an exercise of practical reason involving a real choice requires a framework to compare justice (without which it would be impossible to choose between viable alternatives), rather than an identification of a perfect situation, possibly unavailable, which we could not transcend.

Probably we will take some time to fully assimilate and properly understand the novelty of Sen's approach. Hilary Putnam has not exaggerated when he said that The idea of justice is the most important contribution to the subject since A Theory of Justice.

Rawls's work inaugurated a new phase in the social contract theories. Sen's criticism of the social contract theories might have, for a long time, a similar effect to that caused by the critique once formulated by Hume, but is not likely to determine the decline of such a solid tradition as that of the social contract.

Indeed, in order to respond to the many criticisms addressed to it throughout history, the social contract tradition has undergone very important transformations that allowed it to retain relevance. The main one was to move from an emphasis on consent to an emphasis on agreement, thereby distinguishing the question of what generates political obligation (which was the main concern of the consent tradition of the social contract way of thinking) from the question of what constitutional orders or social institutions are mutually beneficial and stable over time. Therefore, there was a shift from an emphasis on individual obligation to an emphasis on social or public morality.

The central idea of the contemporary theories of the social contract is therefore agreement, and the act of making an agreement indicates what reasons we have. If individuals are rational, that about which we agree reflects the reasons we have.

In contemporary theories of the social contract, such as Rawls', the problem of justification thus becomes central. The revival of the social contract theory by Rawls in A Theory of Justice, therefore, does not derives obligations from consent, although the apparatus of an "original agreement" persists.

The social contract in contemporary moral and political theory, therefore, is an attempt to solve a justificatory problem converting it into a deliberative problem. At its core is the "question of justification."

Justifying social arrangements requires demonstrating that all citizens have favorable reasons to these arrangements. This would be an unnecessary requirement if the reasons of the citizens fully converge. It is because citizens have various reasons that it is necessary to justify social arrangements demonstrating that all citizens ideally have reasons favoring these arrangements.

The social contract is inevitably hypothetical, abstract, ideal (or, to use the term dear to Sen, transcendental), but it is an abstraction whose purpose is to illustrate an argument, justify it, provide reasons. The fact that it is a rhetorical device does not make it irrelevant, but just the opposite: makes it a valuable tool for public discussion.

It seems to me that the social contract theory, namely the Rawlsian one, function as a kind of necessary regulative principle of social justice in a given society. But their claims of "perfection" (in the words of Sen) must be compensated by an impartial and objective analysis of the concrete situations of the societies concerned, and of the realizations that can be achieved towards an effective advance of justice, however precarious, because reality always imposes limits on our most noble intentions. The method most suitable for such an analysis seems to me, in fact, as Amartya Sen wants, to be the comparative one, but its use does not exempt the adoption of a more abstract theoretical framework, as proposed by Rawls. Rather, I think it, in fact, assumes it.

The voice under arrest in The Queen of the Prisons of Greece, by Osman Lins:
An analysis of Paul Ricoeur´s concepts of subject of right and of narrative identity

Abstract: The article aims to analyze the constitution of a subject of rights capable of respect and esteem through the concepts of capacity and of narrative identity elaborated by Paul Ricoeur. It intends to evaluate the capable, emancipated human being, the self that has an ethical and moral dimension and that is susceptible of ethical and juridical imputation, as it is explained in the text "Who is the subject of rights?", in the book The Just, as well as in Oneself as another. Ricoeur leads the discussion to the level of the ethical recognition, way of identifying the other as a person worthy to be regarded as a human being. Ricoeur emphasizes the role of protagonist that the capable man or woman performs in the narrative of his history. The passage to the narrative identity implies the idea of otherness and the contrivance of a narrative dimension that characterizes man or woman as the protagonist of his (her) history and of a people. Ricoeur´s The course of recognition constitutes the theoretical basis to interweave narrative identities, besides Oneself as another, a necessary reference insofar that the hermeneutical of the self aims to point out the individual´s identity marks in the narration of his existence. An intersection between philosophy and literature is proposed as a way of capturing the literary representation deviced by Osman Lins in The queen of the prisons of Greece, particularly in the character of Maria de França, symbol of the poor and defenseless woman interpreted from an educated man´s point of view. The literary interpretation exposes a plot of divergent narratives, although deeply intermingled, that expresses the tension of the lack of recognition, the main point articulated in this reading.

Introduction

The aim of this paper is to examine the constitution of a subject of right capable of respect and esteem through the concepts of capacity and of identity narrative elaborated by Paul Ricoeur. The work will follow the formation of the capable man as explained in the text "Who is the subject of rights?", in The just , as well as in Oneself as another. We will see that Ricoeur leads the discussion to the level of the ethical recognition, way of identifying the other as a person worthy to be regarded as a human being. Indeed the analysis of "the man who speaks" ("Who is it that is speaking?") and of "the man who narrates" ("Whose story [or history] is this?") (Ricoeur 1996, p, 164; 2000, p. 2) establishes a grammar of the capable human being, as such described in The course of recognition (2005, p. 93), in the elaboration of the hermeneutical levels of the self. Ricoeur emphasizes the role of protagonist that the capable man or woman performs in the narrative of his (her) story (history). The notion of capacity constitutes then the central theoretical framework for the comprehension of the formation of man, and it will be examined in the second part of this paper.

The passage to the narrative identity implies the idea of otherness and the contrivance of a narrative dimension, historical and transformable, that characterizes man or woman as the protagonist of his (her) story (history) and of a people. Ricoeur´s The course of recognition represents the theoretical basis to interweave narrative identities, besides Oneself as another, a necessary reference insofar the hermeneutical of the self seeks to underline the individual´s identity marks in the narration of his existence.

An intersection between philosophy and literature is proposed as a way of capturing the literary representation conceived by Osman Lins in The queen of the prisons of Greece[2], particularly in the character of Maria de França, symbol of the poor and defenseless woman interpreted from an educated man´s point of view. The literary composition exposes a plot of divergent narratives, though deeply intermingled, that expresses the tension of the lack of recognition, the main point articulated in this reading.

A connection between philosophy, literature, and expanding to the domain of law, reveals the importance of the interdisciplinary approach as a possibility of better understanding the humanities and the social phenomena. The first part of the development will discuss the relation between philosophy, law and literature in order to consider literature as an artistic expression of the existential problems, a way of highlighting the human being exploitation and, at the same time, of building a humanistic conception of life.

Maria de França´s misfortune, deprived of a legitimate speech, is crossed with the narrator´s, who fails to allow the narrative experience to reach its goal, that is, the movement of communication of the self and the other, in a unique meeting of reception and recognition. This reflection seeks the emergence of a subject capable of inscribing his role in society, with ability to deliberate, as a basic existential condition for the improvement of the intellect and the vocation of politics. The main purpose is therefore to discuss the promotion of the human rights and of the identity questions involving people and groups traditionally excluded from the great narratives constructed by recognized subjectivities. The topics mentioned above will be developed in the second and third part of this paper, respectively.

The examination of the literary text has ultimately the purpose of underlining the social injustices and inhumanities that the people, deprived of the power of speaking according to the cultural patterns, are submitted.

1. The theoretical, literary and juridical relation: its limits and extent

To trace the frontiers between philosophy, literature and law is not an easy task. They represent different fields of knowledge and present specificities that sometimes are considered antagonistic. Furthermore it is important to point out that it has always existed a quarrel between philosophy and literature, conducted in a decisive way by Plato in The Republic, by expelling the poets and the tragedians from the political community (Politeía), conceived upon an educational model based on a rational method that enables man to develop his cognitive potentialities (Platão 1996, book X, 605d, pp. 472-473[3]; Havelock, 1998, p. 3-15).

However Plato does not succeed in disguising the visible signs of his irresistible vocation to poetry, as demonstrated in his dialogues. Xavier Zubiri affirms that the philosophers exercise their minds whereas the tragedians the páthos, saying that "we can say that while the philosophers´ work is the noetic form of Wisdom, the tragedy represents the pathetical form of Sophia." (1974, p. 92).[4] In the same way Aristotle, in the Poetics (1966), reveals the philosophical dimension of the tragedy declaring that "poetry is something more philosophical and serious than history since that refers to the universal and this to the particular" (1966, 1451b, p. 78; Nussbaum 1995, p. 5).[5] It is precisely at the frontier between poetry and philosophy that the Greeks shape a constellation of beautiful ideas and forms.

Therefore literature can be a powerful instrument to decipher the human condition, which constitutes a valuable resource to understand the human rights in a liberating and emancipating conception (Fachin 2007, p. 19). In this aspect, the juridical speech connected to a literary text is on the route[6] to reveal the incongruities of the State policies and the clamors for justice, derived from a political and juridical system still predominantly unjust. Nevertheless it is important to observe that the literature has its own artistic particularities; so it shall not be interpreted as an ideological speech or as a repository of legal terms.

Literature is essentially liberating and surpasses the limits of an instrumental conception. Indeed literature goes beyond the commonly notions established between literature and philosophy. Literature should be understood as the right to literature, as proposed by Antonio Candido (2011, pp. 171-193), that is, a right that cannot be removed from the process of education. The right to literature leads to the discovery of the obscure reasons that make men practice so many iniquities. For this reason it is deeply related to the human rights. According to Antonio Candido, we still live in a time characterized by barbarism (2011, p. 172-173), so it is necessary that human rights must be considered in relation to the otherness; without the other as a reference, any attempt to speak about human rights will be fruitless.

As a literary critic, Antonio Candido conceives literature performing three principal and simultaneous functions: as a construction of the literary structure and meaning; as a form of expression; and, as a form of knowledge (2011, p. 178-179). The literary text is a creation that could arouse significant changes and reflections. It constitutes a kind of learning that can guide the reader towards a broader view of humanity. Antonio Candido speaks of the danger of "mutilating the personality" (2011, p. 188) in case literature would be restricted during the learning process of the human being.

[4] In Spanish: "Puede decirse que mientras la obra de los filósofos fue la forma noética de la Sabiduría, la tragedia representa la forma patética de la Sofia." .

[5] The translation into Portuguese of the Poetics: "a poesia é algo de mais filosófico e mais sério do que a história, pois refere aquela principalmente o universal, e esta o particular." (1966, 1451b, p. 78; Nussbaum 1995, p. 5).

[6] Melina Girardi Fachin titles the Part I of her study "Law and Literature: towards the emancipatory narrative routes" (In Portuguese: "Direito e literatura: em busca das rotas das narrativas emancipatórias", 2007, p. 21), as a possibility to create an interdisciplinary dialogue between the juridical and literary speeches in order to produce fertile narratives between the two fields of knowledge.

Therefore literature helps in the understanding of different languages, silent voices, invisible people, that the literary work allows us to perceive. Maria de França´s portrait in The queen of the prisons of Greece, by Osman Lins, shows the misfortune of a significant parcel of the population still deprived of the fruition of literature, ipso facto, of humanity. Additionally Paul Ricoeur´s philosophical support on the constitution of the capable human being leaves no doubt about the privation of rights suffered by Maria de França in the making up of her characterization. She cannot be considered a subject of rights and, consequently, be the author of her own story.

2. The constitution of the capable human being

It is relevant to consider the ability of judgement that implies the recognition of a capable human being, worthy of esteem and respect. To Paul Ricoeur the capable human being emerges from the ethical and moral dimension of selfhood (1992, passim), which enables him to be susceptible of the ethic-juridical imputation (2000, pp. 1-10). To achieve the last step of the formation of a subject of rights, Ricoeur begins with the question Who?, which arouses several interrogations in relation to the identification of the subject.

From this first question, we move on to the notion of the capable subject. The concept of capacity presupposes the condition of the individual to be the author of his actions, to whom will be attributed rights and duties derived from this "ability to do something, what in English is designated by the term agency (Ricoeur 2000, p. 3), that is, it follows that man is able to act free and conscious according to his own judgement. Ricoeur´s emphasis on the question Who? determines the possibility for man to designate himself as the author of his acts and, consequently, of his story (history). This identity mark is crucial for constructing the core of the self (ipse) and for the formation of the moral and juridical predicates that regulate human action, implicit the notion that the capable human being assumes the equivalent duties, thus becoming a responsible man.

The question Who? is enlarged to the modals forms of "I can" in the following stages: "To Be Able to Say" (Ricoeur 2005, pp. 93-96); "I can" (to act; "making something happen")" (pp. 96-99); "Being Able to Narrate and to Narrate Oneself" (pp. 99-104); "Imputability" (pp. 104-109). We can affirm that there is a complementary relation between the question Who? and the verbal phrase "I can" because the central point of the questioning is the identification of the subject of the speech, of the action, and of the narrative. The goal is to identify the authorship of these predicates, the capable human being the author of his own enunciations and, for this reason, of his identity.

It is important to stress that the pragmatic speech has a fundamental role in the formation of the capable human being due to the relevance of the illocutionary aspect of the act, which implies the notion of the engagement of the speaker. The ability of using the language, taking part and requesting approbation (Ricoeur 2005, p. 96), represent the self-assurance of the capable human being and the recognition of the interlocutor. The speech requires the relation to the otherness, and, therefore, the act of recognizing and of being recognized. (Ricoeur 2000, p. 6). It presupposes the idea of otherness in terms described by Ricoeur:

> "[...] The self-designation of the speaking is produced in interlocutory situations where the reflexivity is combined with otherness. The speech pronounced by someone is a speech act addressed to someone else. What is more, it often is a response to a call from others.[...]" (2005, p. 96)

In this sense, the concept of justice is built in the direction of the other, taking the otherness into consideration. For this reason Ricoeur, by examining who is the subject of rights, guides the discussion to the level of the ethical recognition, way to identify the other – in spite of the ethnic and cultural diversities – as a person worthy to be respected. Also, by analyzing the linguistic implications peculiar to this approach, Ricoeur stresses the role of protagonist that the capable subject develops in the narrative of his story (history). In "Who is the subject of rights?" (2000), Ricoeur expands the horizon of the interpersonal relationships to a broader sense:

> "The same triadic relation of me/you/third person can be found on the plane we have distinguished by the question 'Who acts' 'Who is the author of an action?' The capacity to designate oneself as the author of one´s own actions is inscribed in a context of interaction where the other figures as may antagonist or may helper, in relations that vary between conflict and interaction. But innumerable others are implied in any undertaking. Each agent is bound to these others by the intermediary of different orders of social systems. [...]" (2000, p. 6).

Ricoeur emphasizes the ethical dimension in the constitution of the capable man insofar the self-esteem (1992, p. 171) is accomplished with and for the others. Ricoeur names solicitude (1992, p. 188) for the movement of the self towards the other, that is, the true search of reciprocity and recognition, of giving and receiving. The perspective of the otherness interrupts the persistent cycle of inequality that has always split an abysm among men. In fact, some men are guided by the will of absolute power; as a consequence they establish several criteria of discrimination based on false beliefs and on the desire for domination (Ricoeur 1996, p. 165).

In the construction of the identity of the capable human being it is implicit the notion of identity narrative, which it is considered a fundamental element in the hermeneutic of the self, conceived by Paul Ricoeur. The significant hermeneutical components might surely help in the intersection between philosophy, literature and law in a consistent way, as it is proposed in this paper.

3. The conception of identity narrative

Ricoeur´s theoretical course of the hermeneutic of the self leads to the third stage, especially to the description of the verbal phrase "I can narrate" ("Being Able to Narrate and to Narrate Oneself"). Ricoeur points out that in the narrative dimension time has an important function. It refers to the sequence of the facts in a lifetime, in other words, of the episodes that characterize the story (history) of a person. In this regard, it emerges the notion of identity strictly related to the question Who? (1992, passim). Marcelino Agis Villaverde notices that Ricoeur´s Oneself as another is a fundamental reference to a perfect comprehension of the narrative identity. Ricoeur describes the hermeneutical of the self in order to capture man´s identity marks in the narration of his existence (Villaverde 2004, pp. 9-34).

Related to the concept of identity, Ricoeur conceives two terms denominated identity as sameness (idem), and identity as selfhood (ipse) (1992, p. 116). It must be observed that sameness and selfhood are not coincident terms in the theoretical frame built by Ricoeur in Oneself as another. There is a dialectic construction to the problem of the idem and the ipse, named the "dialectic of selfhood and sameness" by Ricoeur (1992, pp. 140-141). Following his exposition, it should be noticed that "this dialectic represents the major contribution of the narrative theory to the constitution of the self." (p. 140).

The central point is drawn to the question: Who am I?, in the sense of creating narrative mediations that could assign the task of inventing life to a man as being the author of his identity. The emphasis is on the protagonist of the story (history), responsible for the composition of countless revealing plots interwoven by an identity (a unity) full of significance. In fact the narrative identity is constructed by the person, who composes the identity narrative from the elements of the plot corresponding to the chain of movements of a lifetime contrived by the dialectic idem-ipse perspective. It follows the writing of a story (history) from a person who is the author of a certain action.

Ricoeur refers to Aristotle´s scheme presented in the Poetics[7] (1966, 1447a to 1462b; Ricoeur, 1992, p. 143), studying the concept of emplotment (1992, pp. 140-144) which constitutes primarily the notion of the interweaving of the actions in the plot, through the unification of the elements in the poetical making up. This composition is defined by putting all the divergent components into a constitutive order, called the "discordant concordance" (1992, p. 141), peculiar to the narrative compositions, and reaching the highest level of configuration, according to Ricoeur, in a "synthesis of the heterogeneous" (1992, p. 141). Man is allowed to perceive the condition of being able to tell a story (history), as foreseen in the third stage of the hermeneutic of the person.

The process of narrative mediation reveals the otherness. As a matter of fact the narrative composition is intended to weave the connections of the stories in a fictional frame in order to make the reader be identified in the narration and also to be able to recognize the others. The narrative experience makes it possible the communication between the self and the other, in a unique meeting of reception and recognition. Selfhood does not remain passive in its own identity, unable to see the other who shows himself to it. The act of communicating with the other, through the function of the mediations produced in the narrative, inscribes the otherness in the identity, opening a long course of knowing oneself, each one, and the world. For this reason this perspective places the ethics in the confluence of the identity narratives, and therefore the importance attributed to the act of reading in the constitution of a capable human being.

It should be underlined that the conception of identity narrative is not only restricted to individual reports but also to historical studies of the identities of peoples and nations. It is of special relevance the possibility of constructing collective narrative identities, mainly in communities traditionally segregated from the great centers of reference. The search for recognition of groups or persons considered inferior implies the capacity to tell their stories (histories) and to assume the role of protagonists in the plot of the historical happenings (Ricoeur, 2000, pp. 3-4).

With the purpose of constructing a broader, historical and emancipatory narrative, linked to the question of human rights, we shall conclude with some impressions of Maria de França´s character and of the impossibility of a constitution of a subject of rights.

4. Maria de França´s non recognition: "the voice under arrest"[8]

Osman Lins, in his novel The queen of the prisons of Greece, tells Maria de França´s trajectory, a poor Brazilian woman from the northeastern part of the country, who moves to Recife with her mother and brothers in search of better opportunities. The protagonist symbolizes the reality of many poor Brazilian people as far as she is a worker without no qualification, always been described having problems at her jobs. Besides the stupidity and the mental illness are frequently associated to her behavior (Dalcastagnè 2005, pp. 48-49). She struggles hopelessly to obtain a physical disability pension from the social welfare system due to her insanity.

[8] It is important to remark that the sub-title "the voice under arrest" is taken from Regina Dalcastagnè in the book Entre fronteiras e cercado de armadilhas: problemas da representação na narrativa brasileira contemporânea (Between frontiers and surrounded by traps: problems of representation in the contemporary Brazilian narrative), in which it is inserted an article called "O intelectual diante do espelho" ("The intellectual in front of the mirror"); see particularly the part entitled "A voz encarcerada" ("The voice under arrest"), which discusses Osman Lins´s A rainha dos Cárceres da Grécia (Dalcastagnè 2005, p. 48-58; the version into English was free and made by the author)

Maria de França´s remarkable traces are her madness and illiteracy, which keeps her completely deprived of any fruition form the educated universe. Regina Dalcastagnè observes that Maria de França is introduced in the narrative by the man who interprets the novel, left unpublished by his deceased lover Julia Marquezin Enone. This narrator elaborates a kind of an "essay-diary" in which he himself (re)constructs his self deeply injured owing to the absence of his lover. (Dalcastagnè 2005, p. 49).

The nameless narrator creates long mythological and literary associations related to the novel. He is a well educated man, in spite of being only a teacher of biology without great academic ambitions. Actually he intends to give some dignity to the character, that is, the purpose of his reading is to emphasize that Maria da França could not have a relevant role in the novel unless his interpretations would have been added to the text (poetical representation, sophisticated metaphors). According to Regina Dalcastagnè "to Julia, the character would have voice (even if it would be only to reproduce a radio station), smell, taste, sensibility, to her interpreter [the narrator] she loses substance, changing into an object of representation, depositary of metaphors and other figures of speech, in a well conceived literary exercise whose explanation is in his charge. (...)" (Dalcastagnè 2005, p. 51; free version)[9].

Maria de França and Macabéa, another Clarice Lispector´s character in The hour of the star[10], do not have voices because someone else speaks for them. We know their lives through the information given by intellectuals that make an attempt to reveal (or to enhance) their existence. As examined in The just (2000), the capable human being is the one who can speak, who can narrate, who can act and is responsible for his actions, therefore being able to construct his own identity. The difficulty to express herself appropriately suits the character of Maria de França in Ricoeur´s analysis about the man that can speak (or cannot speak).

Indeed Maria de França does not achieve the level of a person who speaks because her cognitive atrophy prevents her from expressing fluently her perceptions and opinions. She is a mere repository of disconnected information, incapable of understanding the meaning and of articulating with other narrative contexts. In opposition to her we are presented to an educated narrator, master of the plot, and of the precarious life and story of Maria de França (Butler 2006, pp. 128-161; Dalcastagnè 2005, pp. 54-56). It is evident the asymmetry of the characters portrayed.

It is clear that Maria de França does not become a subject of rights due to her limitation to utter enunciations about her life and desires, which deprives her of self-esteem and respect, attributes inherent in the ethical and moral dimension of the selfhood. Concerning the literary work - The queen of the prisons of Greece -, it is undeniable the lack of recognition in relation to Maria de França, a victim of human negligence and misunderstanding. The passage below describes the feeling of hopelessness that surrounds Maria de França´s existence:

> "Denunciation, accusation and expulsion also work together in the book´s final scene, when the unmaned man, a projection of Maria de França, smashes his right hand. By destroying his hand the man excludes himself, cuts himself off from the useful, productive universe of which he no longer wants to be part. His gesture indicts, in a sort of synthesis, the insensitivity of the ruling classes, expressed in Maria de França´s struggle with the social welfare system narrated in the book. (…)." (1995, p. 51).

In this perspective it is worthy of notice that the debate about who is the subject of rights constitutes a fundamental point in the assertion of the human rights, as it is connected to the idea of recognition, that is, to respect for the other and to justice. According to the previous analysis, the identity narrative dimension implies the otherness interwoven in the narrative. It seems that the narrator succeeds in identifyng Maria de França´s misfortune. Or is it the author – Julia Marquezin Enone or Osman Lins - who expresses the feeling of helplessness that pervades the miserable people´s universe?: "Yes, everything seems clear and in keeping with the central theme of the work: man unarmed in a hostile environment. […]" (1995, p. 123).

Silent voice, without a trace of existential identification, Maria de França represents a significant part of the Brazilian society devoid of the minimal conditions for a dignified survival. Paul Ricoeur´s analysis highlights the concept of capacity, which requires that man shall be the author of his actions. In other words, man must be able to act free and conscientiously according to his judgement. The constitution of the capable human being is a guarantee to the exercise of citizenship, as a necessary condition to the flourishing of the intellect and to the exercise of the political debate. Maria de França is, on the contrary, the negation of the subject of rights in the existential and political level. In the literary plan, however, she is the possibility to a more humanistic view of the human rights, in Antonio Candido´s the precious lesson.

Final considerations

The connection between philosophy, literature and law is undoubtedly profitable as it creates the adequate instruments for an intense and inspiring dialogue. It is the possibility of discerning a deeper sense of humanity towards the recognition of segments of people deprived of social and political intercourse.

Paul Ricoeur´s theoretical course leads us to cross several levels of the capable human being, mainly in the stages denominated "I can speak" ("To Be Able to Say") and "I can narrate" ("Being Able to Narrate and to Narrate Oneself"). It is well constructed a hermeneutical of the selfhood, decisive to the affirmation of the otherness and of the intrinsic components of identity. It is important to conclude that the steps taken by Ricoeur in describing those stages lead to the point where man can be considered the protagonist of his (her story (history).

The conceptual references brought to the research about the capable human being are appropriate to the analysis of The queen of the prisons of Greece, by Osman Lins, mainly of Maria de França´s fragile portrait. Ricoeur reinforces the narrative identity in the composition of the capable human being. Indeed the literary creation offers the necessary elements to the shaping of a hermeneutical based on self-esteem as far as the subject participates artistically in the poetical game and feels confident to contrive a story himself. The other (alter) is identified and the course to recognition is taken, while interweavening a narrative identity through a synthesis of the heterogeneous, as Ricoeur nominates the unity reached by de divergent components of the narrative. The narrative is not reproduced by a singular point of view; it acquires widespread outlines since it portraits the story of an individual, a people, a country.

Actually Ricoeur´s theoretical support clarifies the characterization of the subject of rights, being able to be respected by the others, and, therefore, to be an ethical agent in the reflection and construction of politics based on the principles of a just society to the fulfillment of the rights of man. Maria de França is the artistic representation of the denial of the basic human rights. We, as readers, should recognized her human condition and struggles for justice.

Law & Literature:
Justice and vengeance on Shakespeare and Aeschylus tragedies

Fernanda Borges da Costa[1]

Abstract: This work draws two different conceptions of justice in the tragic plots of Aeschylus' Oresteia and Shakespeare's Hamlet, in accordance to the representation of revenge acts and based on the literary studies of H. D. F. Kitto and A. C. Bradley respectively. Firstly, it establishes the connection between the acts of revenge and its relation to justice, both familial and political demands, in accordance with the revealed background in each play. In order to illustrate different conceptions of justice and vengeance of Orestes and Hamlet narratives I demonstrate the plot's approach that qualifies this comparison, such as the family crime, the prince usurped from his father's inheritance, the tyranny originated on illegitimate power, the demand for revenge against the offender among others. Likewise, each chosen tragedy result in two different conceptions of justice. I highlight particularly the variations in the heroes' attitude across their duty of revenge. Both embody this obligation, only the Oresteia narrates the one-sided sense of justice into the conflict between fate, curse and salvation in a clash of divergent godly orders and divine laws, while Hamlet ponders in doubt about the sense of justice inside the conflict between his fate and freewill amid questionings about the established order on custom and tradition. He lives a two-sided justice that by one hand demands his commitment to bring justice upon his father's murderer, and in other hand claims unfairly his life, casted into damnation for the sake of revenge. I also remind that each play reflect a particular mentality, being needed to assume that relevant features in the literary narrative belongs to certain worldviews and contexts, so that the relationship between justice and vengeance in Oresteia comes through an established cosmic order that necessarily tends to balance within the conflict. Whilst in Hamlet the link between justice and vengeance results in the split of moral obligations and ethical expectations and reflects the very deterioration of a worldview as a unit. It is still important to highlight that my comparisons do not exhaust this extended and interesting subject.

Keywords: Law & Literature, Justice & Vengeance, Shakespeare, Aeschylus.

1. Introduction

[1] Master's student in Classical Studies at Coimbra University, e-mail du.chan@hotmail.com.

I will present here a brief comparison between justice and revenge in the stories of Orestes and Hamlet, the tragic heroes from Aeschylus' Oresteia (from 485 BC) and Shakespeare's Hamlet (between 1599 and 1601 AD). I have based this paper's literary critics on the studies of H. D. F. Kitto and A. C. Bradley respectively, and have chosen those plays for they are quite similar, although their staging is separated by more than a thousand years. These plots narrate the murder of a powerful king by relatives, which become the kingdom's tyrants. Then the young prince is forced to retrieve the power and avenge the murder in dire circumstances. Yet, each tragedy displays two different conceptions of justice inferred from the Hamlet's and Orestes' acts of revenge (or, we may say, acts of justice). Such differences can also lead into two worldviews for the grounds of the staged vengeance are elementarily shared with the tragedies original audience. Here I must remember Kitto's warning to deal with a historical background when dealing with a historical literature (1990, p. 97):

> The dictum that all great art is timeless must be received with caution: it certainly does not mean that any ordinarily sensitive spectator can stroll up to some ancient work of art, in whatever medium, and upon inspection understand and appreciate it; he may be disabled by certain unexamined prepossessions of his own, not shared by the artist.

This comparison is based in Law & Literary studies – since I see the presented questions of justice as much important for Law as it is for Literary studies – by searching for one of the most basic conflicts: the murderer among equals and its given solutions. It is also supported by the yet controversial thesis that literary works are able to talk about their own context, subtly revealing the worldviews of their own time merged into the writer's creative imagination. That is even more apparent if we remember that both tragedies are based on oldest myths, itself a reservoir of a community's memories. In that case, the values and most importantly, the conflicts within the stories, reveals some features on the conceptions of justice and vengeance from their original contexts. Even more interesting is the central connection seen in vengeance as justice and the just act being an act of payback, a core that our modern criminal law still has difficulties to deal with.

I will approach this subject divided into three parts. Firstly, I will compare the tragedies and some common features giving a brief summary for each plot. Then I will point out three main differences that reveal each conception and values inside justice and vengeance conflicts, making into the third topic where my conclusion comes in: each play reflects a particular meaning for justice and vengeance matching, at least in part, their specific civilization's worldview.

2. Two similar stories: Who are Orestes and Hamlet?

Now I must highlight the connection between the two acts of revenge and their relation with justice. Aeschylus' Oresteia is composed by three plays. The first is called Agamemnon and tells the story about the victorious return of this Greek king from Troy, Orestes' father, and his murder by his wife Clytemnestra, with the help of Aegisthus, Agamemnon's cousin and lover of the queen. Orestes only appears in the second play, called Libation Bearers or Coephoras, to avenge his father by killing his mother, who was since then living with Aegisthus and ruling upon Argos. What remains in the last play, Eumenides, is the story about how Orestes is about to be killed by his mother's avengers, the Furies, when Apollo's aid comes. Then the tragic hero is taken to the Areopagus' court, created by Athena specially to judge his case. There the goddess and the judges decide for his spare and establish a new kind of justice procedure, which tame the horrific Furies into docile Eumenides. Therefore the old goddess give their power to maintain justice at it course, keeping a vigilant eye on men's procedure that here and onward will deal with the need of punishment and vengeance of hideous crimes.

Shakespeare's play Hamlet tells us a similar story. The young prince Hamlet comes back from England to his motherland Denmark to attend his father's funeral. Three months later, at the castle's walls, his father's ghost appears and reveals the identity of his murderer. It was Hamlet's uncle, Claudius, who married the queen and sat on the kingdom's throne. The ghost demands revenge, for Claudius cannot stay with the crown. Thereafter, while pretending to be mad, Hamlet wobbles between delivering the vengeance and the desire to carry on his wishes. He feels his father revenge as a fair request but an unfair destiny to be driven upon. There is justice in the quest, but there isn't any justice in the heroes' circumstances – what makes it tragic by itself. After many advances and retreats, many deaths and a sword fight against his former friend, Hamlet manages to kill Claudius, getting killed in the process. By the time the play closes, all royal family dies and the kingdom is about to be taken by Fortinbras, king of Norway.

Although they are very distant in time and tradition, both heroes face similar situations that call for their action. The vengeance is needed for family and political reasons. The former kings were killed by someone close and the assassins were not only part of the family, related to the hero by blood, but they also become the ruler in the rightful heir's place by the means of treason and murder. Both plays stage a family crime where the king's son is the only one that can claim justice against the killer. In addition, the murderers become the highest authority by ascending the throne illegitimately, in a way that only the heir can reclaim it. Facing a family crime, the prince is usurped from his father's inheritance. In Orestes and Hamlet's situation, the illegitimate tyranny originated by murder goes beyond the familiar layers in a way that the demand for revenge against the offender also turns out as a public issue.

In this particular case, that is the assassination of a king, there is no higher authority able to meddle in but the gods and supernatural forces. In Aeschylus' play it does interpose: Orestes receives an oracle from Apollo stimulating the matricide, then the Furies came in to torment and kill Orestes and avenge Clytemnestra, but they cannot succeed for the hero is protected by Apollo and Athena, Olympian gods quite aware both of Orestes acts of justice, needed to reclaim the balance in a hideous family filled with the curse of bloodshed, and of the unfair circumstances that had driven his pure hand to kill his mother by god's demands. Although Hamlet is encouraged to vengeance by his father's ghost, who came through unnatural forces to claim punishment, the absence of God and any other powers that be that can save the hero from its tragic circumstances is constantly referred to. In other words, God is an emptiness felt in every corner of the narrative by not interfering either to help the hero in fulfilling the act of justice nor giving hope of salvation for Hamlet after the murder of Claudius.

There are many other important distinctions to be made, but for now I will just point out the heroes' opposite actions when it comes to trustworthiness of the supernatural instances and phenomenon. I think that it is important for it explains part of the tragic heroes' worldview and their evaluation of the revenge. Orestes receives Apollo's commands and his obligations as absolute measures with no questioning. Actually he does say that he do not want to kill his mother, but he must do it because he desires (or rather needs) to act virtuously and act accordingly the god's demand. As for Hamlet, after he faces the ghost wishes he will find himself doubting about the truth and rightness of his father's ghost:

(1) he might ask if the ghost's speech was true and for doing so he will seek for visual prof; (2) he will doubt if he actually had seen the ghost or it wasn't just an illusion; (3) and by clearing the last two, he start to doubt if the creature with whom he spoke was really his father. His beliefs in tradition and supernatural are seriously questioned throughout the piece, which indicates a certain type of worldview that no longer fits into the schemes that we see in the Oresteia.

In both tragedies, the assassination of the king's murderer turns out the only way to restore a disturbed order. But each play got its own background that gives their own sense to the narrative, thus the hero's mission to restore a disturbed order can have very different meanings according to their references.

3. Two different conceptions of Justice and Revenge: pre-modern and modern narratives

Although Orestes and Hamlet are in very much alike circumstances, each hero acts by his own ways to fulfilling vengeance, as well as each play illustrates different conceptions of justice. I intend to demonstrate how their course of actions tends to two different claims of justice by the dissemblance attitude of the tragic heroes.

Aeschylus' Oresteia narrates the sense of justice from the conflict between hero's fate, Orestes family curse and the last minute salvation in a clash of different orders and divine laws (Olympics vs. Chthonic Gods). The Greek hero's destiny precedes his birth. Since his first ancestors his blood is cursed to engage into mortal family conflicts. In the range of Aeschylus' play we witness Agamemnon sacrificing his daughter Iphigenia and being murdered for it by his wife. We also are reminded of Thyestes' curse upon Atreu; Agamemnon's ancestor that cooked his nephews for their father's to eat. This present a chain inside a stained household that drives Orestes fate to slay his mother. Also his vengeance is commanded by old divine laws that demand revenge limb by limb, were killing of kings is almost always paid with more bloodshed.

On the other hand, Shakespeare's tragic hero Hamlet considers in doubt the sense of justice from the conflict between his fate and free-will, amid questioning the order established by custom and tradition. Hamlet finds himself bonded to become a murderer for his father's sake. Despite admitting that killing Claudius is the most correct action to secure justice, the prince seems concerned that he cannot decide about his own fate, in which he does not intent to take part in the bloodshed. Hamlet is angry against his uncle's actions and his mother's promiscuity, yet the revenge is not taken from his own will and goes against the plans he had for himself.

I would like to remind that each play tend to reflect a particular mentality from a specific civilization (and its time/space features), since the plays firstly addressed a particular audience that sure may understand the laws, social roles and obligations those shown by the heroes (even when the narrative seek to break the expectations). Hence I will assume the possibility of assigning relevant features for the literary narratives that belongs to certain worldviews and possible contexts. In that case, the relationship between justice and vengeance in Orestes path comes from an established cosmic order, in a human world that somehow matches the gods' orders and lawmaking – even if the humans themselves don't quite get how it is done. The struggle between the ancient hero's tragic fate comes from an ambiguous situation that is somehow originated and solved by gods guidance. Otherwise, the relationship between justice and vengeance in Hamlet establishes a split between moral obligations and ethical expectations, which reflects the very deterioration of modern worldview as a unit. He no longer can rely on supernatural beings nor does he fit the virtues within social roles that don't take in account his own freewill.

3.1 Orestes' vengeance and pre-modern background

Aeschylus builds in its tree tragedies a sequence of crimes and their correspondent acts of vengeance that will utterly lead to Orestes matricide. The author goes back to the Trojan War which culminates with the internal failure of Zeus' cosmic order when impose to Orestes absolute but also incompatible obligations (Kitto, 1990, p. 72):

> The obvious implication is that we have here a conception of Dike that cannot work, even though it is the present will of Zeus. If this is not already plain, the rest of the play will make it so: the instinct for violent and bloody retribution dominates and unifies the whole play, and in the end it leads to complete breakdown; we are to see how it is morally, philosophically, and politically bankrupt.

This mechanism of retribution is called dike[2]. Clytemnestra kills her husband upon the calling of dike for her daughter's murder. Dike works as a sacred maintenance medium of Zeus' order, for a crime cannot be tolerated without its needed retribution. This same order is meant to chaos when drives Orestes to avenge Agamemnon by killing his mother. Yet Aeschylus' trilogy has a harmonically conclusion. The conflict between Orestes obligations for his father and mother is ultimately a conflict between old and new divine beings. In the clash between these two orders (the Furies Chthonic goddess revengeful desire vs. Zeus that seeks a reestablished order) the Olympic god act trough Athena to create the Areopagus' Court and by that meddling judge Orestes destiny. It is also a political argument. Orestes does submit to Athena and the Court, and it reflects the social transformation implied from monarchy to democracy and from familiar vengeance to civic distribution of justice. By all means, dike remains as a renewed sense of justice that is still retributive yet domesticate through reasoning, since the Furies shall be domesticated by Athena's arguments and are turned into Eumenides to work alongside the Areopagus' Court.

This cosmic order and divine meddling are typical features of a pre-modern background that inspire the ancient tragic plays. The very own comprehension of Orestes himself is made by comprehending his social functions and correlated duties. In this sense Orestes – being as virtuous as he is – is obliged to act according to his social role as son and heir. It is enough for him to know where he socially belongs for deducting the according course of action. He must honor his father, dethrone the tyrants, clean Argo's palace from all miasma and obey Apollo's wishes, therefore he must kill Clytemnestra. This reflects an ethical aspiration (what the individual desires for himself) that matches with a moral tradition (what is the right thing to do).

However it does not imply an absolute loss of hero's autonomy. Orestes knows his duty and acting in accordance with it is his virtuous choice even meaning his own destruction (that is the tragic element here). This pre-modern acknowledge of virtue is what make him able to keep his obligations in the direst circumstances according the gods' will. Orestes could have not killed his mother and leaved Argo forever, but then he wouldn't be a virtuous tragic hero that this narrative needs. And his virtuous nature is what breaks the thread of bloodshed that I will soon draw here, he is the first through his history that remains a pure avenger and gives himself to the divine instructions moved only to fulfill his obligations wherever the consequences (Kitto, 1990, p. 79):

> So far they have been met in the spirit of blind and guilty retribution; Orestes approaches the task very differently. For the first time we meet an avenger whose motives are pure.

The Oresteia is a trilogy that converges of two traditional tragic myths, the myth of Atreus' curse[3] and the Trojan myths. The Atreus' curse is bought to the play by Aegisthus intervention, as the heir of Thyestes whose older sons were cooked and given to eat by Atreus, giving another meaning for Agamemnon's death. He establishes a connection between the past family crimes and the present ones as Agamemnon also dies to achieve Aegisthus vengeance for his father. I dare say that Iphigenia's sacrifice being avenged by Clytemnestra and even the Orestes matricide also carry a new meaning into this family bloodshed as part of consanguineous murders' curse. Alongside there is the connection with the Trojan myths. Agamemnon is the Greek king that claims the vengeance obligation against the Trojans and lead the Greek army into the ten-year battle. Here is also mentioned his daughter's sacrifice that made possible to the Greeks vessels to cross the sea and reach the Trojan shores. In the play there are constant references to Helen, Paris and the Greeks and Trojan sins, making the Oresteia a chain of retributions and vengeances.

Thus the Oresteia's tragic core revolves around the chain of revenge. The first play allows contextualizing Agamemnon's death as required continuity of both myths (Atreus' curse and Trojan War) that will lead to the unavoidable matricide. The tragic context holds the human action in a way that will lead to the collapse of the revenge's chain. But it is important to know that for their context the human autonomy still endures, the individual is still free to performs role, his duties and claim his rights. And he knows the correct actions as long as he knows his roles in the cosmic order. That is partly what happens with the following characters.

Between Paris and Menelaus there was a duty of hospitality[4].The [3] It is a Family curse caused by an offensive act against the gods and its laws. It is hereditary, so it is characterized by being transmitted from generation to generation, until the crime is wear over time or is withdrawn by divine interference.

[4] From the Greek ξενίνα, from where comes Zeus Xénion, or ξένιον (v. 362 of Agamemnon). It is an obligational relationship formed firstly by Zeus and Amphytrion, Heracles relation between host and guest is a ritualized act and widely protected by Zeus. It has its own terms and obligations that were broken by Paris when he kidnapped Helen, Menelaus wife. After the crime, Menelaus is obliged to seek revenge upon Paris in accordance with Zeus host rules; otherwise he would cast to himself the rage of the god. Thereby the Trojan War proportions became as huge as the clash between two great civilizations when king Priam of Troy welcomes his son and blesses his marriage with Helen. By offending a king in the Greek tradition is an offense to its kingdom and its people and Menelaus needed Agamemnon's aid to unite the Greeks into one army to march against Troy. On the other hand Paris owned to Aphrodite a charisma[5]. The goddess had given to the Trojan prince the most beautiful woman on earth in exchange of choosing her as the fairest Olympic goddess. By Aphrodite hands Helen belonged to Paris since the beginning and seemed only fair to take the gift once he meets the Spartan queen. Helen being a promised divine gift Paris could not refuse it, for the rejection of Helen would mean an offense to Aphrodite. As for Helen, when a child she had received a prophecy that would command her to be given to the fairest king on earth, since Menelaus couldn't match the title, Paris was most promising to fulfill the prediction.

The same cornering came to Agamemnon when the fortune teller reports the need of Iphigenia's sacrifice to appease Arthemis and allow the Greeks to march into war. Before going to the Trojan War Agamemnon is driven to condemn himself, to stain his hands with the blood of his favorite daughter, and by doing so to be killed by his wife. Otherwise he would have condemned not only himself but also all Greece to face Zeus' wrath by not proceeding with the revenge. It is also possible to relate Clytemnestra's action in these dialectical duties. She must overcome her marital obligations in accordance to atone for Agamemnon's sins. The murderer of the king is her only way to retrieve justice for Iphigenia and restore the cosmic order. Similar to his mother, Orestes hangs between two absolute duties for his both parents – and one must be destroyed. Therefore the Oresteia is the quintessential tragedy of vengeance, driven by human's choice and divine designs. And this conflict shall be tragic for the very divine laws are struggling for balance casting its terrors into human's lives. Even if one cultivates the excellence and virtue his horrific-but-just acts shall be paid with violence, for the yet not renewed law of the dike demands it. Orestes tragic destiny is driven by his unavoidable circumstances; he must choose either to not avenge his father casting upon himself the Furies from the King's grave and condemning Argos to tyrannical rulers, or to kill Clytemnestra and commit matricide, the worst of crimes. Only through this chain of facts that Orestes dilemma can be really understood (Kitto, 1990, p. 92):

> The dilemma can be stated in general form thus: there can be no such thing as Justice if a king, husband, father, can be murdered with impunity, since ordered society would be at an end. On the other hand, there are instinctive, intimate loyalties and sanctities without which society cannot continue: to the body politic, matricide is no less deadly than regicide—and we have just seen that with matricide Aeschylus combines parricide and outrage to guests.

3.2 Hamlet's vengeance and (almost) modern background

Bradley analyses the Shakespearian hero by noting that the characters actions are not the only factor that will determine the narrative events, although it is the determinant element that will lead to the tragic ending (1905, p. 11-12). Differing essentially from Aeschylus's pre-modern play, Shakespeare's narratives are not tragic by its circumstances but are made tragic by the characters choices (1905, p.11):

> Nor yet would it become so, in the Shakespearean sense, if the fire, and the great wind from the wilderness, and the torments of his flesh were conceived as sent by a supernatural power, whether just or malignant. The calamities of tragedy do not simply happen, nor are they sent; they proceed mainly from actions, and those the actions of men (…).

We see a number of human beings placed in certain circumstances; and we see, arising from the co-operation of their characters in these circumstances, certain actions. These actions beget others, and these others beget others again, until this series of interconnected deeds leads by an apparently inevitable sequence to a catastrophe.

Even taking in account the fortune and all supernatural forces, is ultimately the characters acts that will construct the tragic plot. But also the actions are determined by the characters since their character builds the final misfortune. About Hamlet, Bradley notes that the whole narrative turns around the hero's peculiar character, and without any notion about his character, the history would be inapprehensible (1905, p. 67):

> But for Shakespeare's scanty use of this method there may have been a deeper, though probably an unconscious, reason. The method suits a plot based on intrigue. It may produce intense suspense. It may stir most powerfully the tragic feelings of pity and fear. And it throws into relief that aspect of tragedy in which great or beautiful lives seem caught in the net of fate. But it is apt to be less favourable to the exhibition of character, to show less clearly how an act returns upon the agent, and to produce less strongly the impression of an inexorable order working in the passions and actions of men, and labouring through their agony and waste towards good. Now, it seems clear from his tragedies that what appealed most to Shakespeare was this latter class of effects.

So the hero's character and his decision making seen through action are essential parts for the tragic comprehension.

Comparing Hamlet with Orestes, the latest as perfect fit for his role as son and heir is completely driven by his sense of justice and obligation against the king's murderers. Orestes does not doubt about what are his (even so conflicting) duties, nor concerns about his destroyed future. Unlike the ancient hero, Hamlet fells many needs, for instance he need mundane proof of Claudius' guilt since he does not completely believe the ghost's tale. Hamlet does not feel comfortable towards the supernatural and is unable to proceed until clearing his doubts. The ancient heroes and characters also minded carefully the supernatural, but they didn't doubt their very own existence when facing it. To accentuate the difference in the character of Hamlet Shakespeare's play carries two other individuals driven by the need to avenge their fathers – Fortinbras and Laertes. The similar circumstances are as surprising as Hamlet's refusal to act in accordance, forthrightly in favor of honor and revenge, exactly as one would expect of a hero like him. And precisely what Hamlet cannot do. The play can be seen as a set of mirrors, in which the secondary characters are able to reflect every shattered aspect of the complex personality of the hero.

Hamlet can perceive the moral obligation that constitutes his father's need of revenge but he also question if killing Claudius is the best course of action. His endless reflection turns out to push him away repeatedly of the fulfillment of his duty and extends the range of the tragic conflict. His meditation challenges the preordained social roles in a way that a pre-modern hero cannot be able to do, for he is not a righteous obedient hero nor is he quite the opposite. Hamlet brings out all the craziness inside that traditional ways of justice by using his mad reasoning; thus, Hamlet's character presents many traits of modernity that allow us to identify an ethical aspect developed beyond his role and the correspondent social position. Hamlet is not only a son, a prince and an heir to the crown, but he is also able to understand himself as an individual apart from those roles that put him against his will and ethical choices.

This ability to see himself apart from social roles, as a unique individual, is part of a modern ethos. It highlights his individuality in so far as he realizes his identity apart from his moral order and in relation to what he designs for his own life. Thus Hamlet is able to shed its role as son and heir, his differences with Orestes, Fortinbras and Laertes are in the level of his individualistic modern character. When capable of determining himself against his social roles, Hamlet is not limited to the circumstances of revenge but has to deal with this ultimate conflict between his desires for himself and the disturbed order that seek for repair.

This Shakespeare's tragedy is not limited to the vengeance plot inasmuch the prince brings his questioning upon the whole human condition. That's why Hamlet's tragedy is seen as profoundly disturbing for a limited and mortal human condition and perverting the very model of the vengeance tragedies. Nevertheless Hamlet's action is also determined by the weight of the obligation to fulfill his father's wishes – he also feels it as an unavoidable obligation even at moments of inertia. All the action staged is only meaningful if we constantly remind the vengeance not yet perpetrated.

Hamlet is abandoned by god, forced into a murder situation by a family crime and the traditional ways to deal with it. He is de modern individual driven through the world in a pre-established social order and with insurmountable social roles that even so tries to rationalize and understand his surroundings. His motivations are unclear; he is not able to deal with the pressure and seems rash and inert in different moments. Hamlet is seen for us modern individuals as a more humanly hero trying to survive in a world out of joint.

4. Conclusion: a one-sided justice vs. a two-sided justice

The heroes' characters are quite different. Here I take as uncontroversial that one's character is build according to one's action inside the tragic plays. Orestes acknowledges a one-sided justice. So he takes action only concerned about justice against Clytemnestra, unwary of the consequences for himself since the current rule is clear: once becoming a murderer for the sake of avenging a murder, he will at some point be killed to conceal his own crime. Any case of mercy that may fall over him can only come from the gods, another level of power and decision making that he cannot interfere but only hope to be blessed with. Then he will fulfill his role as heir and son, whatever may happen to him later – if any salvation is possible, it will only be available after the fulfillment of his duty. Ultimately, Orestes knows that without a miraculous interference his fate relies in the same rules that his mother's, that is, the killer must pay his crimes with blood even if he has done so seeking justice, ordered by a god's will and following an ancient law.

In other terms, Hamlet feels that he needs to take care of a two-sided justice. He is doubtful both about the justice of killing Claudius and about the justice of depriving himself of the life he had planned in order to carry out that duty. He is able to himself at the same time as responsible for avenging his father and as an unfair victim of that burden (while Orestes does feel burdened but in an unavoidable situation). On these terms, Hamlet is concerned about a two-sided justice, meaning one justice for the action and another for the agent (that is, himself): he wants to act justly and to be treated justly. Even if he finds that revenging his father is the right thing to do, it will still be unfair since he will turn into a killer contrary to his will. This conflict between justices (for his father and for himself) is quite shown in the hero's actions, where he is constantly questioning his duty that comes with the social role as prince and son. Hamlet's hesitations and retreats could only be better explained as actions that exteriorize his inner doubts.

Orestes and Hamlet characters conceal some important differences. Orestes obeys the gods laws and oracles because he is determined to be virtuous in a fulfilled life, which means he will avenge his father and deprive his palace from the tyrants even if it is by killing his mother and condemning himself. He chose to fit in his social roles as son and heir, therefore Orestes will take these obligations within the roles up to extreme consequences. His ethical enterprise matches his traditional values. That is why he is only tied to a one-sided justice: he fits his role, even if it means doing something he didn't want for himself, so what he thinks that is just for him and for his social role is actually the same thing.

But Hamlet acts differently and questions those roles and its obligations. He is concerned with his individual values and freedom besides (or better alongside) the need for revenge. And he is able to do so because he faces a separation between the individual person and its social role. So, he acknowledges that revenging his father's death is needed and taking action would be carrying out justice. But Hamlet also thinks that is unfair to be forced to become a murderer when that was not in his personal plan. He recognizes the right thing to do according to his obligations, but also takes in account the (un)fairness of being driven to become a murderer. In that way, Hamlet faces a two-sided justice and this view also re-reads his tragic situation: in addition to targeting two different obligations (with his father and with himself), their fulfillment is self-excluding. He cannot do both, to serve one justice is failing to the other.

Orestes vengeance, although terrifying and monstrous, can lead to true virtue and be recognized as fair by the guardians of law, being gods or their guided judges. But Hamlet's vengeance is uncertain, as well as his values and virtues, and it is surrounded by many questions while he has no safe place to rely on – in his world, the complications of assassination and vengeance can only be handled by humans, in all its roughness and uncertainty. I may dare to say that Hamlet's tragic situations comes as a result (or the progression) of a disenchanted world, where humans are by themselves when it comes to face their worst crimes and speechless taboos – forsaken by Gods and their rules. But I will also remind that Orestes situation is as tragic as Hamlet's, for depending on transcendental powers only emphasizes human's limitations.

Universality, ethical community, and human rights in Lima Vaz

Laura Souza Lima e Brito[1]

Abstract: This paper addresses the opposition between nomothetic universality and hypothetic universality for Henrique Cláudio de Lima Vaz as a core matter for the feasibility and establishment of a universal ethical community and, consequently, for defining and ensuring universal human rights.

Keywords: Universality. Ethical community. Human rights. Henrique Cláudio de Lima Vaz.

1. Initial remarks

This paper has been presented to the Law and Ethics working group at the XXVI World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy, which took place at the Federal University of Minas Gerais. It has the purpose of extracting from the body of work of Henrique Cláudio de Lima Vaz, an important Brazilian philosopher and formulator of a concrete ethical system, what the understanding of the relation between ethics and law may contribute to comprehend the possibility of a universal ethical community today.

This work approaches the relation between ethical community and human rights according to Lima Vaz's conceptions. In other terms, the question to which we seek an answer is: which are to Lima Vaz the present obstacles for the consolidation of a universal ethical community and for the realization of human rights as universal rights?

The search for an answer to this question is theoretical and will take place in Henrique Cláudio de Lima Vaz's work, as well as in works of his commentators, which have already produced in Brazil a vast repertoire on ethics according to Vaz's view

[1] PhD Candidate at the Law School of the University of São Paulo. E-mails: lauraslbrito@gmail.com/laurabrito@usp.br

Therefore, the intent here is to verify, through the prism of ethics, the requirements for the formation of a universal ethical community, from which universal rights would emerge and, by confirmation of this possibility, to also verify the reasons why this community and these rights are not consolidated in the world today.

The relevance of this topic is placed before the actual existence, today, of a world community, in technical and economic terms. In light of this fact, more than ever it is necessary to expand such technical universality to an ethical and legal universality, which is only possible, according to Lima Vaz, by consolidating a universal ethical community, built on the acknowledgment of others and not on the needs of an individual.

2. Contextualization of Henrique Cláudio de Lima Vaz's ethical and legal thinking in his body of work

To face legal issues in Henrique Cláudio de Lima Vaz's thinking is not possible if they are not understood as ethical issues – especially because there lies the focal point of Vaz's position: law cannot be dissociated from ethics.

Lima Vaz built a dense and consistent ethical system whose structure is based on a dialectic of three stages: abstract universality, particularity and singularity, considering that the second stage denies the first and the third one preserves the previous, elevating them to the status of a concrete universality. This is how Lima Vaz understands and explains the world of nomos: man as a person, the act to an end and ethics that permeates the human world.

Through his system, it is possible to understand that modern individualism, based in subjectivism, remains stuck at the moment of particularity, denying the universality of the search of good by mankind. It is this obstacle that the proposal of Lima Vaz's ethical system tries to overcome by returning to metaphysics. As noted Maria Celeste de Sousa:

> Claudio Henrique de Lima Vaz is a systematic and dialectical philosopher. His anthropological thinking and ethics lies within the ratio that founds human being and acting in a critical attitude to the primacy of modern subjectivity, and so he is positioned in favor of returning to metaphysics as prime philosophy.[2] (2010, p. 19)

In context of his ethical system, Lima Vaz will denounce how modernity led to dissociation of law and ethics, due to the abandonment of ethical action that leads to the common good, for the sake of acting for maximum utility. And within this ethical system, the problem of ethical community today excels for Lima Vaz because "he cares about men in their historical vicissitudes, especially with today's social status, its spiritual crisis, solipsism and ethical nihilism extended to the field of ideas and social practices"[3](Sousa, 2010, p. 19).

3. The matter of the ethical community

In order to discuss the matter of the ethical community to Lima Vaz, we must understand what the ethical community means within Vaz's system. Man, as an intelligent and free being, behaves in view of an end, namely, the realization of good. Therefore, the question that guides the behavior of the individual should be: what should I do? How should we live?

This way, a man reveals himself as an ethical individual, and may only remain so as long as he is aware of the ethical knowledge that surrounds him and as a participant in an ethical community and, ultimately, the universal ethical community. In this sense, the universal ethical community is the interaction of all men in pursuit of the common good for humanity.

In antiquity, homologically to the cosmological order that governed the natural world, there was a normative order managing the human world. Thus, there was a determination of the teleological character of ethical action. With the advent of modernity, untying normative order from natural order, by technical reason, caused a rupture within the idea that humanity seeks good to forge the hypothesis that humanity seeks greater utility in its actions. It leads to the crisis denounced by Henrique

Cláudio de Lima Vaz:

> There it is, probably, where lies the core of the crisis in our civilization: its working reason expanded in several directions - scientific, technical, organizational, political, following the expansion of its historical and cultural space; in the field of ethos, however, it cannot create a new paradigm of ethical rationality or universal ethics for a universal civilization.[4] (2002, p. 168)

Classical thinking corresponded to a nomothetic universality, which is configured "as from the concept of a universal order to which a prescriptive character of law is assigned"[5] (Lima Vaz, 2002, p. 217). This in turn, modern thinking has forged a hypothetical universality grounded in the hypothesis of a primitive state of nature, from which man escapes by alienation of his freedom, as Mac Dowell explains:

> The individual, therefore, waives part of his original freedom due to his own interests, favored in a greater scale by the limitation of everyone's freedom, in social life, than by self-isolation or conflict state, the 'state of nature'. (...) the decision to join the social contract results from calculation of advantages it brings to the individual.[6] (2007, p. 242).

In the words of Rubens Godoy Sampaio:

> The universality that determined the horizon of antiquity had as foundation a world order that was supposed to be manifested and in which the nomos or the laws of the city were the way of life of men, who reflected the order of the cosmos as contemplated by > reason. In hypothetical and deductive universality, the foundation is hidden and needs an explanation coming from a former hypothesis, not empirically verified and which needs to be deductively supported by its consequences.[7] (2006, p. 93).

The shift in ethical paradigm, as presented by Lima Vaz, occurred in track of scientific thinking paradigm shift:

> The phenomenon that forged the epistemological assumptions for the overcome of classical horizon (nomothetic universality) to the horizon of modernity (hypothetical and deductive universality) was the scientific revolution, also responsible for the mathematization of physics and mathematizing intention of reality understanding. One of the most significant effects of the Cultural Revolution was the arising of technique as determining factor for the approach of nature.[8] (Sampaio, 2006, p. 92).

The domination of nature by man with modern technical development reinforces the culture of utility, and it is based on the isolated individual. It is not a critique of the advances brought by modernity, but rather to point out serious ethical consequences that emerge on track of technological advances.

The paradigm of calculation of benefits favors subjectivity in its particular moment, discrediting the moment of intersubjectivity, in which an individual acknowledges himself in the other. It is this acknowledgment that guides ethical action and is rather necessary for the pursuit of the common good in the ethical community.

The problem of the ethical community, under the hypothetical universality paradigm, is the superiority of individual interests over the common interest (common good). The solution is to overcome the subjectivist rationality that supports modern society by rescuing communal life.

The goal of Lima Vaz with his philosophical proposal "is to raise society to an ethical level, as a community of free men, whose intersubjective relations are governed under the right of each one having his personal dignity recognized and being part of the rational consensus around the common good."[9] (Sousa, 2010, p. 20/21)

In due course, the realization of human rights is essential to achieving the scenario designed by Lima Vaz and, as he said, it is precisely the construction of society on a hypothetical universality that prevents the realization of these universal rights.

4. Ethical community and universal human rights

Vaz's proposal for ethics has direct repercussions in the field of law and, in a special way, in regards to the possibility of conception and consolidation of human rights as universal rights. That because law is an ethical phenomenon par excellence, since it is practical reason that should guide the formulation of legal rules.

If "the manifestation of ethical life is objectively universal, since all cultures seek good, even if it is not predetermined as good"[10] (Brito, 2013, p. 104); it is possible, homologously, envision universal rights which are not addressed to cultural particularities, but which precisely guarantee freedom and communal living for the sake of common good.

But if the ethical phenomenon is universal, what explains the ineffectiveness of protection of human rights at the global scale? Lima Vaz attaches to the consolidation of the fundaments of ethical and political life in the hypothetical universality the deep paradox between the overwhelming attempt to define universal human rights and the inability to "bring down such rights from the dead and abstract plan of formalism and bring them to a concrete realization in social practices and institutions"[11] (Lima Vaz, 2002, p. 237). This because the hypothesis in question is formulated exclusively for the satisfaction of insatiable interests of the individual.

[10] In the original: "a manifestação da vida ética é objetivamente universal, vez que todas as culturas buscam o bem, ainda que não seja um bem previamente determinado"

The consolidation of universal human rights does not meet the criteria of utility, but, in fact, to a pretense of equality, in which all human beings share freedom, acknowledge themselves in each other and participate in the construction of the ethical knowledge for humanity.

> In effect, for society to be human, it must transcend the individual interests and create space for men to be consensually equal. This level of sociability is thus constructed as a relation of differentiated acknowledgment, which is not limited to equally satisfying individual needs, but for equality that dialectically supersedes these differences, raising individuals to the political sphere of universal acknowledgment, or of living together with the purpose of universal good.[12] (Sousa, 2010, p. 31)

That's why, in Vaz's perspective, there is an implication between nomothetic universality and the universality of human rights. In this sense, the author underlines that:

> No universal ethics will be possible without that the proper interpersonal relations, especially those that are established in a mutual order between rights and duties, which are interwoven among individuals of an alleged universal civilization and which derive for groups and subgroups within that civilization, are recognized and experienced as ethical relations, that means, objectively legitimized and publicly in force as expressions of an ethical community.[13] (2002, p. 170)

[12] In the original: "Com efeito, a sociedade para ser humana tem que transcender os interesses particulares e criar espaços para que os homens sejam consensualmente iguais. Esse nível de sociabilidade se constrói, portanto, como uma relação diferenciada do reconhecimento, que não se limita à igualdade da satisfação das necessidades individuais, mas pela igualdade que suprassume dialeticamente essas diferenças, elevando os indivíduos à esfera propriamente política do reconhecimento universal, ou da convivência em vista do bem universal."

To summarize, in Lima Vaz, the consolidation of a universal ethical community, grounded in intersubjective ethical act, which allows equality and acknowledgment among individuals, and aiming the achievement of the common good of humanity is the path to the realization of universal human rights.

5. Final remarks

We sought to understand in this paper what are, within the work of Henrique Claudio de Lima Vaz, the barriers today to the consolidation of a universal ethical community and the realization of human rights as universal rights.

It has been shown that the abandonment of a universal order to which a prescriptive law character is assigned (nomothetic universality), and its replacement by a hypothesis of social constitution grounded in a calculation of individual advantage (hypothetical-deductive universality) is to Lima Vaz the reason for the exaggerated individualism of our time, which prevents the acknowledgment of the other and the formation of a true universal ethical community.

To overcome the impasse created by the universal presence of the ethical phenomenon and the ineffectiveness of human rights, with the consolidation of a universal ethical community, in which universal human rights are actually guaranteed, Lima Vaz relies in the "assumption of a constitutive relation of the human being to a rational instance, which is in itself transhistorical, but normative throughout historical action: the instance of a transcendent good."[14] (2004, p. 241).

Ethical pluralism as a lesson in humility for lawyers[1]

Beata Polanowska-Sygulska[2]

Abstract: The paper aims at making an interpretation of the two strikingly different positions in contemporary jurisprudence, represented by Joseph Raz and Ronald Dworkin. It is stated that Raz's and Dworkin's positions in jurisprudence constitute an epitome of the maxim: While the 20th century was the age of parliaments, the 21st century is the age of the judicature. A claim is put forward that it is the two philosophers' divergent perspectives in ethics that are responsible for the mentioned gap. Thus, a theory-laden statement is made that the standpoint in moral philosophy bears heavily on the position in political and legal philosophy.

The consequences of the two philosophers' disparate ethical perspectives for the application of the law are examined. Characteristic of Raz's value pluralism, social dependence thesis, in particular his deep insight into the so-called dense human relationships that require habituation, is juxtaposed with the famous Dworkinian 'one right answer' thesis, stemming from the latter's ethical monism. A conclusion is drawn that the value-pluralist position in ethics, initiated independently by Isaiah Berlin and Joseph Raz and continued by John Gray, has a relevant lesson in humility for lawyers.

The starting point of this article is a thesis of a profound connection between the three levels of practical philosophy – legal, political and moral. Such an approach is characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence whose influence seems to dominate nowadays general reflection on law. The intellectual path of Joseph Raz, the disciple of H.L.A. Hart and his successor to the Professorship of Jurisprudence at the University of Oxford provides a perfect illustration of the aforementioned relationship. The starting point for Raz's interdisciplinary reflection was exactly jurisprudence; in this field he adheres to the so-called 'hard' legal positivism, stating that the legal and moral are utterly separate realms. Raz's firstly jurisprudential interests evolved with time to a more general reflection, touching on political philosophy. The main result of his investigations of this stage is his perfectionist liberal doctrine, alternative to that of John Rawls. It constitutes an original synthesis of liberal principles, so to say, going beyond the dispute between liberals and communitarians. The most recent sphere of quest that seems to crown Raz's intellectual path is moral philosophy. In this domain he adheres to a relatively novel, dynamically developing movement in ethics, i. e. value pluralism. According to Raz the three fields on the meeting of which he works – jurisprudence, political and moral philosophy – constitute disciplines that throw light on different aspects of human life. He believes in the unity of the aforementioned branches of practical philosophy; his own interdisciplinary investigations express this creed. In a conversation with me carried out in 2010 in Oxford he revealed:

> For many years, probably well before The Morality of Freedom, I doubted that morality constitutes (or includes) a distinctive set of considerations, principles, or values. Engaging Reason is the first book in which I argued that the distinction between moral and other normative considerations is stylistic, contextual, etc., but devoid of any theoretical or practical significance.[3]

The intellectual profile of Joseph Raz presented above is meant as an introduction to the essence of the present paper. I share Raz's conviction of the unity of practical philosophy. Yet, in one vital respect I shall go beyond his perspective. I put forward a thesis that theoretical assumptions made - whether consciously or not - on the deepest, moral level translating into a given conception of collective life, extend some decisive influence on a vision of law and its applying.

Let us refer now to the considerations of maybe the most eminent contemporary legal philosopher, that is the recently late Ronald Dworkin. It seems at first glance that due to both thinkers' belonging to the same political and jurisprudential tradition their views should closely correspond to each other. After all they share the widely understood liberal standpoint. Raz, apart from his communitarian inclinations, vigorously defends the true to type liberal ideal of autonomy. Dworkin promulgates an exemplary, rights-based liberal doctrine, embedded in his individualist perspective. However, both thinkers adhere to two opposite political visions: Raz to state perfectionism an Dworkin to state neutrality. Yet, apart from this theory-laden difference they belong to the same, widely understood liberal tradition.

The more striking are their divergent jurisprudential positions. Raz turned back from his master's - i. e. Hart's - path leading towards the sophisticated legal positivism, firmly supporting a definitely hard version of this standpoint. Dworkin, also dissociating himself from Hart develops an original approach in jurisprudence that goes beyond the well-worn opposition between legal positivism and natural law tradition. His most influential conception of law as integrity gives up the vision of law as an ready object, strongly underlining law's interpretative dimension. Thus, he emphasizes the role of the judge, who acquires in Dworkin's 'law's empire' the status of a prince. The divergent points of view of the two legal philosophers seem to provide a paradigmatic epitome of the maxim: 'While the 20th century was the age of parliaments, the 21st century is the age of the judicature'. In this respect Raz's hard positivism locates him in the 20th century, while Dworkin's interpretative jurisprudence definitely belongs to the present, 21st century. There arises a fundamental question: on what level should one seek for the sources of the aforementioned gap? It does not seem that the field of political philosophy might offer an unambiguous answer. As it was mentioned before, Raz and Dworkin share a liberal standpoint, and consequently promote priority of the individual over the community. Thus, perhaps the focal point is situated much deeper, on the level of crucial moral presuppositions. It is my contention that the cardinal gap between Raz's and Dworkin's positions in jurisprudence is due to their different ethical perspectives. I would also risk a thesis that apart from all the reservations one might have about Raz's philosophical standpoint, ethical pluralism in which he believes on the one hand has a relevant lesson in humility for lawyers, and on the other – reveals dangers, involved in the opposite, Dworkinian stance.

Juxtaposition of both philosophers' ethical perspectives requires sketching an outline of Raz's specific viewpoint. Ethical pluralism to which he adheres to is, so to say, an intermediate position on the spectrum of ethical theories, distancing itself both from monism and relativism and offering a unique, different from the aforementioned movements' account of ethical life. Monistic conceptions assume that there exists only one acceptable system of values; different variants of ethical subjectivism or relativism presuppose that all values are expressions of individual preferences or social conventions. According to the pluralist standpoint in ethics fundamental human values are objective and knowable, but irreducibly plural. Thus, they can neither be ranked, nor reduced to a common measure. Some of them may be incompatible and/or incommensurable. In Raz's interpretation the phenomenon of incommensurability of values, which is indicative of the pluralist position in ethics, boils down to their incomparability. Thus, there is no ultimate standard which would allow rational resolution of unavoidable conflicts among them. The vision inherent in the pluralist perspective is a field of unavoidable clashes of values, moral dilemmas and loss, involved in necessary choices. This is a realm in which by its very nature one cannot have everything; which does not allow achieving complete harmony or any 'final solution' of human problems. This is a reality permanently marked with lack, suffering and possibility of occurring tragedy.

The worldwide discussion on the originated in Oxford, value-pluralist position in ethics, broke off in 1995, after publishing a powerful book by John Gray, entitled Isaiah Berlin. Because the authorship of the idea of ethical pluralism is generally ascribed to Isaiah Berlin, although both he and other authors identify its sources in the views of a whole galaxy of former thinkers. The pluralist outlook, roughly sketched in Berlin's writings, has henceforth been remarkably developed.[4]

Joseph Raz promulgated a version of value-pluralism, as it were, parallel to that of Berlin's. Raz's conception amounts to the most sophisticated and theoretically rich contribution to the pluralist movement. Its distinctive trait is the so-called social dependence thesis, i.e. a conviction that human values hinge on social practices. Let us elaborate on this very topic, as it is liable to prove highly relevant to lawyers. One of the arguments for the social dependence thesis advanced by Raz pertains to the so-called comprehensive goals, i.e. those which have an impact on many spheres of human life. Raz claims that such goals cannot be realized without familiarizing oneself in practice with appropriate social forms. In other words, an individual cannot acquire the goal by explicit deliberation, for it can be learnt only by experience. Raz invokes the so-called 'dense relationships' as between spouses or among parents and children. Let us refer directly to the philosopher's characteristics of such relations:

> (…) most of our behaviour remains based on learnt semi-automatic responses (i.e. ones which we can, usually with some effort, suppress, but which we normally do not deliberate on and which we are not explicitly aware of.) Often even where such responses can be deliberate they should not be. They acquire their significance from the fact that they are not. We value their spontaneity, their instinctive, non-reflective immediacy."[5]

Raz contends that dense relationships do not allow explicit description or learning; they may be portrayed adequately enough only in fiction or in drama.

Let us now examine jurisprudential implications of Raz's ethical perspective, invoking an authentic postulate, put forward by an Ecuadorian MP. Several years ago when a new Ecuadorian constitution was being drafted a feminist MP suggested that it should include the right to orgasm. Such a constitutional provision would entitle women to take legal action against their partners in case they do not provide them with adequate sexual satisfaction. Raz's penetrating analysis displays all the absurdity of such an idea. Surely there is no other sphere of human relations that is – in Raz's terms – more 'dense' and for this reason more difficult to be analyzed and described and thus less prone to rational decision or adjudication. It is then preposterous to submit this very realm to court jurisdiction. Moreover, in the light of Raz's devastating critique of rights-based morality and procedural liberalism, the idea of perceiving interpersonal human relations in terms of rights appears by its very nature as pointless because of its not doing justice to the richness of ethical experience.

These issues present themselves quite differently in the perspective of Ronald Dworkin. His postulate of 'taking rights seriously' is an expression of an opposite to Raz's standpoint on the idea of rights-based morality. In other words, contrary to Raz Dworkin perceives human relations just in terms of rights and duties. Let us imagine a legal system including the aforementioned right to orgasm. Dworkinian 'prince of law', that is an ideal judge whose modest name is Hercules, possesses phenomenal knowledge and experience, inaccessible to the man in the street. Thanks to them he is able to capture the social normative structures of a given political community, recognize its ruling principles, balance them and thus identify the one right answer to the legal question.[6] He then encroaches on the territory of delicate human relations armed with a sort of an intellectual circular saw and - if he happens to deal with a developed legal system, abounding with rich legal sources and judicature - he performs a successful vivisection of normative social structures in order to reach the desired effect. He is not, like his positivist counterpart named Herbert bound up with the opinion of majority; he follows his own judgment, depending on his own knowledge and experience. His is a task up to a classical hero; it is exclusively 'princes of law' who are predestined do cleanse the empire in which they wield a real power from allegedly incommensurable conflicts of rights.

On the ethical level the basis of such an approach is a belief in an integrated system of values – which boils down to a monistic standpoint. Dworkin openly declares for such a position in his last but one work, entitled Justice for Hedgehogs. The very first sentence of this extensive work is as follows: 'This book defends a large and old philosophical thesis: the unity of value."

The gap between Raz's and Dworkin's positions in jurisprudence reaches down to the level of moral philosophy. Implications of the value-pluralist perspective, which for Raz express the richness and complexity of human ethical experience, for Dworkin evoke the image of the Augean stables to be cleaned up by Hercules. That which according to Raz reveals the limits of reason, according to Dworkin amounts to a challenge for contemporary heroes i.e. judges, equipped with almost superhuman expertise. Unavoidable conflicts of incommensurable values which, in Raz's view, offer a powerful argument for leaving open fundamentally contested issues to forms of political settlement and compromise which can be renegotiated later, in Dworkin's view should be represented as matters of right and thereby submitted to judicial power. As a result, chiming in with the spirit of the 21st century, the process of shifting power from the legislature to judicature will accelerate.

I perceive this tendency for many reasons as disturbing; the more valuable seems the lesson in humility for lawyers, offered by penetrating investigations of Joseph Raz and of other pluralists, like Isaiah Berlin and John Gray.

Cultural heritage and urban protection legislation

Marina Salgado

Abstract: In the Article nº 216 of the Federal Constitution of 1988 is mentioned the issue of listing, which may occur at the municipal, state and federal level, as a way to promote and protect the cultural heritage, in addition to inventory, registration, monitoring, expropriation and other . The listing was established by Decree-Law No. 25 of 1937, which organizes the protection of historical and artistic heritage, establishing the necessary guidelines for the protection and preservation of this heritage.

Focusing on the preservation of cultural heritage, the City Statute sum also urban instruments that can contribute to the protection of these heritage. This article aims to explore some of these instruments, such as: transfer of the right to build, right of preemption, neighborhood impact study, joint urban operation, beyond some specific laws for the preservation of cultural heritage in the city of Belo Horizonte.

The goal will be to demonstrate that the preservation of cultural heritage can occur concomitant with urban development through the application of urban instruments that allow the maintenance of the main features of a building or area, and contribute to a democratic management of the areas considering the interest by the population.

Keyword: Cultural heritage; urban legislation; preservation.

Article No. 216 of the Federal Constitution of 1988 defines the nature of what Brazilian Cultural heritage:

> Article 216. Brazilian cultural heritage is any material and immaterial property , taken individually or together, that bears reference to the identity, action, and/or memory of the various groups that make up Brazilian society, including:
> I - forms of expression;
> II - ways of creating, making, and living;
> III - the creations of science, art, and technology;

> IV - works, objects, documents, buildings, and other spaces intended for artistic and cultural expressions;
> V - urban complexes and sites of historical, natural, artistic, archaeological, paleontological, ecological, and scientific value. (BRAZIL, 1988, p. 97)

Article 23 also establishes that the preservation of public heritage is the common responsibility of the Union, States, Federal District, and Municipalities, and Article 24 states that it is f up to the Union, states, and Federal District to legislate concurrently on the protection the historical, cultural, artistic, touristic, and landscape heritage.

Article 216 further mentions the issue of drawing up lists, which can take place at the local, state, and federal levels, as a way to promote and protect cultural heritage, as well as establishing an inventory, registration, monitoring, and dispossession among other things. The listing was established by Executive Order 25 of 1937, which organizes the protection of historical and artistic heritage, thus providing the necessary guidelines to protect and preserve it.

> Listing is an administrative act of the government aimed at the preservation of cultural heritage. It is characterized by the recognition of the value of the property and its inscription in one of the four books of the Fall - I. Archaeological, Ethnographic, and Landscape II. History III. Fine Arts and IV. Applied Arts. (FERNANDES; Rugani, 2002, p. 17)

The Federal Constitution also provides some urban instruments to ensure that the urban property fulfills the social function, namely: compulsory subdivision or construction, progressive property and urban land tax over time, t expropriation, and usurpation. Focusing on the preservation of cultural heritage, the City Statute also added urban instruments that may contribute to its protection.

> The City Statute leaves no room for doubt: to protect, preserve, and restore cultural heritage is not merely an option or choice of city administrators and urban policies, but a bound duty of public order and social interest aimed at the collective good. (MIRANDA, p.3).

The transfer of the right to build, regulated by Article 35 of the City Statute, provides that the owner of urban property, whether private or public, may exercise its right to build as set forth in the Master Plan, in a place distinct from its source property or sell this right to a third party. Therefore, it becomes an instrument that helps with the preservation of cultural heritage since it compensates for those homeowners who cannot undertake any changes in the building, preventing the use of the constructive potential of this land from taking effect in this site, which could compromise the goal of preserving historical, cultural, landscape, and environmental heritage. However, the owner may transfer his right to build to another location, thus ensuring the right provided for in the Master Plan or specific town planning legislation.

> A very simplistic example may facilitate the understanding of the institute. Imagine that the owner of a listed property that has two stories could build the equivalent of six stories, , according to urban standards, if the building had not been listed. With the listing comes the inability to change the property, thus preventing the full realization of this right to build, with a sacrifice of construction potential equivalent to four floors. In this case, the property owner, may exercise his right to build elsewhere or convey it to third parties by deed, provided there is a local ordinance to that effect. (MIRANDA, p.8).

In addition to this instrument, the Statute City regulates the right of preemption through Articles 25, 26, and 27, being characterized by giving preference to the purchase of urban property to the municipal government, which shall establish by law, based on the Master Plan, the delimitation of areas that will address such an instrument. This may be exercised for unique urban purposes, when the Government needs areas to "protect areas of historical, cultural, or landscape importance" (Section VIII), among other purposes set forth in Article 26.

Thus, the Government may establish areas to which this instrument could be applied, those located in the vicinity of the listed items, thereby ensuring the preference of purchasing real estate in this environment and, consequently, control actions that may mischaracterize an ensemble of cultural interest.

Considering also the issue of the preservation of listed ensembles, the neighborhood impact study is adding one that had been previously reported, since it sets the execution of this technical document for specific types of projects to be defined by municipal law to demonstrate the impact of these developments on the "quality of life of the resident population in the area and its surroundings." Article. 37 stipulates the minimum amount in this document, and Section VII addresses issues concerning the "urban landscape and natural and cultural heritage."

The Circuito Cultural Praça da Liberdade is a program implemented by the government of the State of Minas Gerais to make use of the buildings previously occupied by the State Secretariats with equipment designed for culture and recreation, such as libraries, museums, restaurants, shops, a planetarium, space workshops, auditoriums, and more. Therefore, it was necessary to conduct a Neighborhood Impact Study to predict the interference of this change in the daily use in the Praça da Liberdade, in relation to the possible increase in the flow of pedestrian and vehicle traffic and the increased demand for parking in the vicinity, for example.

A joint urban operation is scheduled in Section X of the City Statute and provides for the development of specific municipal law that would determine the area to be applied such an instrument in accordance with the Master Plan, and is characterized as:

> "(...) Set of interventions and measures coordinated by the municipal government, with the participation of owners, residents, permanent users, and private investors, aimed at achieving urban structural transformations, social improvements, and environmental enhancement in an area." (BRAZIL, 2001, p. 7)

As an example, in view of the use of urban instruments with the aim of preserving the cultural heritage, we can cite the Urban Operation of the Casa do Conde, Act 8.240/01, to rehabilitate the area surrounding the railway line next to the listed building Casa do Conde de Santa Marinha, located in the downtown area of the city of Belo Horizonte. This environment has some open areas and buildings, such as sheds, which had no practical use being that, through Urban Operation, this site should be transformed into a complex geared toward leisure and culture. For its implementation, The responsibilities for its implementation would be divided between the private sector, which "would fit design and implement projects in accordance with the rules of law", and the municipal government, which "would be responsible for implementing the required road works due to the new subdivision proposed for some of the lots . "

In addition to the instruments provided in the City Statute, one can also cite the example of Belo Horizonte by municipal law 5839 of 1990 that sets up the reassessment of exemptions, incentives and benefits, according to Art. 21 of the Temporary Constitutional Provisions Act of the Organic Law of the Municipality of Belo Horizonte. Article . 9 of this law provides for an exemption from property and urban land tax for listed buildings, with only one caveat: this benefit will focus only on the characteristics that supported its being listed for preservation.

Still using Belo Horizonte as an example, we underscore the establishment of conservation areas of interest through ADE - special guidelines area - envisaged in the Master Plan of Belo Horizonte, Act 7165/96 and amended by Act 8137/2000, which define the ADE standards. This mechanism was created from the observation that the city is formed by a series of spaces with distinct features that ultimately confer identity to them, which are recognized by residents and the general population alike. To maintain these values as to their use and occupation, cultural, social, historical, and environmental aspects, ADEs have been set up with their own parameters and guidelines that overlap with the zoning area. Some examples are:

> • ADE da Serra, with rules for the protection of altimetry;
> • ADE da Bacia da Pampulha, with rules for environmental preservation and permeability;
> • ADE da Cidade Jardim, with rules for protecting the landscape, cultural, and historic ambience zone for single-family residential use, with some economic activity allowed ;
> • ADE de Santa Tereza, with rules for the protection of the characteristics of the occupation site with historical value (as regulated by Act 8137/2000);
> (MUNICIPALITY OF BH, [200 -], p. 2-3)

In light of the above, the possibility of preserving cultural heritage concomitantly with urban development can be seen through the application of urban instruments that facilitate the maintenance of the main features of a building or area and contribute to the democratic management of areas considered to be of interest by the population.

The social function of urban property

Marina Salgado

Abstract: Currently, much of the population lives in urban areas, this index being higher than that which occupies the rural area. From this concentration of people around the centers, we observe the appearance of a number of problems related to the organization of the city, among them the issue of urban land that are directly related to the quality of life urban community.

The Federal Constitution of 1988 earmarked a special chapter to the issues of urban policy and provides in its Article No. 182 the institution of the Master Plan, which can be considered a sort of instrument of growth and expansion of urban areas. From the moment the city follows the requirements of the Master Plan, it can be said that the social function of urban property – base of the national urban law - is being fulfilled.

In 2001 it enacted the Federal Law No. 10.257, the City Statute, which regulates articles No. 182 and No. 183 of the Federal Constitution, beyond to establish general guidelines for urban policy, regulating the use of urban property for the goal of the.

From the moment that the issue of urban land use is regulated by law, it creates the possibility of establishing an interference with private property by the government, in order to, even private, this will be at the service of the collective welfare. Thus, the social function of property, based on ensuring the prevalence of the public interest over private, will be discussed in this article based on the urban instruments present in the Master Plan and the City Statute.

Keyword: City Statute; social function; urban property

Currently, most of the world's population lives in urban areas, with this index being higher than that which occupies rural areas, in other words, urbanization is a growing phenomenon – which in Brazil began in 1930 - where people increasingly seek urban centers. The popular rural exodus movement, or rural-urban migration, ultimately generates a large concentration of people around these centers. This concentration led us to observe the appearance of a number of problems related to the city's organization. Among these problems is the issue of urban land, which is directly related to the community's quality of life.

The Federal Constitution of 1988 dedicated a special chapter to the issues of urban policy and provided in Article 182 for the institution of the Master Plan, which is a municipal responsibility and mandatory for cities with more than twenty thousand inhabitants, and may be considered an instrument of growth and expansion for urban areas. As long as the city follows the Mater Plan's requirements, it can be said that the social function of urban property – the basis of the national urban law - is being fulfilled.

In other words, the improper use of urban land, without the premise of social function, can lead to segregation and social exclusion. To achieve this goal, add Article No. 183, which also provides for an adverse possession instrument in certain specific situations. In those cases that do not meet adequate urban land use, the Federal Constitution also provides for some measures, such as expropriation, compulsory subdivision, and a progressive property and urban land tax over time.

In 2001, Federal Act 10.257, the City Statute, was enacted and it regulates Articles No. 182 and No. 183 of the Federal Constitution, aimed at establishing general guidelines for urban policies and regulating the use of urban property for the goal of social function. The chapter on the Master Plan emphasizes its importance as a tool that ensures the full development of the entire city's social function and the welfare of its population, in other words, the satisfaction of the collective interest through disciplined urban expansion. Furthermore, this Act mandates that the Master Plan should be revised every ten years, which considers our cities' dynamics and becomes an instrument in the process of ongoing planning, ensuring that urban growth is accompanied by guidelines consistent with the city.

> Urban policy has received constitutional treatment, and Federal Act 10.257/2001 - City Statute - established its general guidelines. Thus, the Constitution of 1988 advanced the treatment accorded to the right to property and its social function, being a benchmark for the start of the walk from the legal institute of urban property that matures slowly in our regulatory system. (PIRES, 2007, p. 49-50)

Since the issue of urban land use is regulated by law, this regulation creates the possibility of the government interfering with private property , so that, while being private, the property will be at the service of the collective welfare. Thus, the social function of property is based on ensuring that public interest prevails over private, in an attempt to create a coordinated, cohesive city.

I It should be emphasized that property that goes beyond its limits is understood as being private, because it directly affects the city as a whole, from its close neighbors up to entire neighborhoods as part of a much more extensive and complex context. This can be exemplified by issues defined by occupation and land use, such as ventilation, sunlight, densification, urban landscape, and the dialogue between public and private spaces. From this holistic idea, the use of private property within the urban space should be socially fair to the citizens, democratizing access to property rights and its consequences.

Thus, it is the duty of the Government to make sure the social function of property is fulfilled, and settle legal instruments to be applied should the owner make self-serving use of his property, or one devoid of its social function as according to Figueiredo (2007, p.69) "we mean property as a right and social function as a duty."

Recently, we noted that the production architectural guidelines established in the Master Plan - Use and Occupation of the Land Act - are used to achieve the maximum degree of use of urban land's building capacity , forgetting the commitment that the architecture has with the city and its inhabitants. This is responsible, in large part, for the inhabitants' quality of life and, therefore, directly related to the social issues that are imbued in architecture.

The concept of republican architecture goes against the idea of the social function of property, since both value the overlap of public values on private to promote a democratic and socially sustainable environment. Within this perspective, Vieira and Salgado (2007) use the example of the Sulacap/Sul-América building, constructed in the center of the city of Belo Horizonte, as a project conceived as respecting and valuing social issues and the inhabitants of this city, not taking only into account the issues related to legislation and the constructive use of the urban land's potential.

> Architect Roberto Campello, designing for a particular area, was careful to take into account the importance of the lot and space that was indispensable in shaping the view from Afonso Pena to Assis Chateaubriand Avenue, highlighting the Santa Teresa viaduct. The results masterfully wielded a public function that is in> herent to it. The logic of maximum land use was set aside in favor of the collective benefit. (VIEIRA; SALGADO, 2007, p. 6)

It is observed that the social function of property must be take root in the city, for it must be integrated into the different performances of all branches of power - executive, legislative and judiciary - not only through the aforementioned legislation , but also from social responsibility and joint action on the part of its inhabitants, who should actively participate in decisions that affect the future of their cities, therefore a democratic management, ensuring that the city is sustainable not only today but also for future generations. "Ensuring the citizen's voice and opportunity implies recovering the original meaning of the word "republic" and building public trading of the different interests in society."

The rule of law on a plural society under the perspective of realist culturalism:
Considerations on a Brazilian urban development case

Alan Mariano Bezerra de Carvalho[1]

Abstract: In this paper we look into the proliferation of gated communities in the city of Vinhedo, in the state of São Paulo, and the problems it ensues. Our analysis will be centered on the concept of rule of law, as defined by the United Nations. This concept will be the focal point for our critic on the applicable urban development laws, applying a "realist culturalist" perspective, expression taken from Miguel Reale's work "Teoria do Direito e do Estado". This perspective brings a pragmatic view of the legal phenomena, according to the "axiological historicism" of his Tridimensional Theory of Law. Our critic also takes this distinct approach on the positing of legal norms, on which the State Law is recognized as the highest level of law positing and other law positing nexuses are recognized, although with lesser positivity.

Keywords: culturalism, rule of law, urban development.

Introduction

Several distinct factors, such as the increase in the feeling of public insecurity, the absence of recreational public facilities in most neighborhoods, and the problems at getting urban infrastructure maintenance from the municipalities, led the real state market in Brazil to develop a new product in response to the increasing demand for better public services.

These gated communities claimed to combine the comforts and individuality of domain of a land lot and the perceived safety of condominiums, the two main forms of urban development according to the Brazilian law, each with its distinct legal framework.

The Brazilian urban development laws did not foresee this kind of approach to the creation of new housing and neighborhoods. There was much confusion on how to legally implement such a product.

Some of these projects were registered as a kind of condominium, applying the respective legal regulation that structures the institutions for common interest administration to a newly formed "private neighborhood".

Other projects were made by using the land parceling procedure, creating homeowners associations that took over the "condominium management", charging maintenance fees in the form of associative contributions, and in general trying to emulate the institutions of the Condominium Law to make these associations work.

This last alternative became the most usual way these communities were created, with the development of a new neighborhood using the Land Parceling Law procedure, then obtaining municipal authorization to enclose it within walls, with gates for private access control. These neighborhoods can only be accessed through these gates, manned by private security forces hired by the homeowners association.

The public offices were no less confused by this development. Some prefectures accepted the registration of these gated communities as new neighborhoods by the Land Parceling Law or as condominiums, in the case of those made by claiming to follow the Condominium Law. Others claimed that there was no legal support for these enterprises and looked for ways to make them regular by means of municipal laws or administrative acts.

The city of Vinhedo is a focus for this kind of enterprise since the decade of 1970. Vinhedo is located near the city of Campinas and crossed by the Anhanguera Highway, one of the major highways in the state of São Paulo. It had both the available land and ease of access to appeal as a prospective "bedroom city" to the major metropolitan areas nearby.

After decades of urban development using this gated community model, the city of Vinhedo started to see its negative implications. There was a significant absence of public spaces for the implementation of public facilities and services for the wider population.

According to the Brazilian Urban Land Parceling Law, on every land parceling for the creation of a new neighborhood there must be lands destined for public use. These lands are transferred to public domain after the parceling project is finished. With the gated community model that had been accepted so far, the public lands were now located within walled perimeters, with restricted access for the general population and even some difficulties of access for the public authorities.

We will analyze the case of Vinhedo, as an example of the heavy impacts of the implementation of gated communities to a city's urban development. For this end, we will have to set up our baseline regarding the concept of Rule of Law. We will then make quick considerations on the Brazilian urban development laws, under the guidelines of the adequate promotion of the Rule of Law on the national level. We'll then look at the implications of an adequate Rule of Law enforcement on the case of the gated communities of Vinhedo.

1. Concept of Rule of Law

For this work we will be applying the concept of Rule of Law as defined by the UN Secretary-General[2], that states that "It refers to a principle of governance in which all persons, institutions and entities, public and private, including the State itself, are accountable to laws that are publicly promulgated, equally enforced and independently adjudicated, and which are consistent with international human rights norms and standards. It requires, as well, measures to ensure adherence to the principles of supremacy of law, equality before law, accountability to the law, fairness in the application of the law, separation of powers, participation in decision-making, legal certainty, avoidance of arbitrariness and procedural legal transparency."

Attendance to each of these principles that compose the concept of Rule of Law can make for a more reliable and legitimate legal structure. By identifying which principles are not observed on the legal and administrative practice, we can also seek for ways to improve legal norms and institutions, as a way to reinforce the Rule of Law as way to promote the stability of the legal structure and of society itself. A strong Rule of Law approach can help raise the trust of the population on the legal institutions, and help raise the efficacy of legal commands.

2. Brazilian urban development laws[3]

The Brazilian laws have been increasingly adopting an urban development framework with a focus on the public interest over private interests. It is integrated on a general level by the Condominium Law (L.

[2] U.N. Security Council .Report of the Secretary-General: The rule of law and transitional justice in conflict and post-conflict societies., 24 Aug. 2004 (S/2004/616), pp. 04.

[3] The names of the laws are presented in a free translation by the author.

4591/64), the Urban Land Parceling Law (L. 6766/79), the City Statute (L. 10257/01) and the Law of the My House, My Life Program (L. 11.977/09).

We present these laws on chronological order as it is relevant to consider the growing concern with the social implications of the access to housing and to the city itself on Brazil over these last decades.

The Condominium Law regulates both the implementation and the administration of condominiums. It establishes the incorporation procedure, a special administrative procedure applied to condominium construction. It also regulates the condominium assemblies, which are responsible for the decisions that affect matters of common interest and the life of the condominium. This law is heavily influenced by private law principles, and mostly focuses on balancing conflicts of property rights and creating institutions for the management of issues of common interest of the owners.

The Urban Land Parceling Law brings a legal structure centered on public interest, while still leaving the initiative for urban development to private companies. It regulates the land parceling by lots and the procedure for the dismemberment of land, which implies the existence of basic infrastructure. It also has dispositions on the conversion of rural land into urban land.

The Urban Land Parceling Law implements several social safeguards and compensations for the parceling projects, such as the obligation the parceling company to build the minimum urban infrastructure, using part of the land parceled as insurance to its completion.

If the parceling company fails to complete the minimum infrastructure, these works will be taken over by the prefecture, selling the lots given as security to finance its completion. It also establishes the need for the transfer of part of the lots to public dominion, registered as green areas, destined environmental preservation and recreational purposes, or institutional areas, destined for the building of public facilities and services such as public schools and hospitals.

The City Statute holds the general guidelines for urban policy, regulating the Article 182 of the Brazilian Constitution, that states that urban policy is centered on the prefectures, and that the prefectures should promote the ordered development of the city's social functions and guarantee the well-being of its population.

It brings the legal tools for urban policy implementation, which are divided on urban planning institutes, tax and financial institutes and legal and politic institutes. The municipal Master Plan deserves a special mention, as it is stated as a mandatory general planning tool, with social participation as one of its legal validity requirements.

These tools enable a proactive stance of the prefectures in ordering the city occupation and the activities allowed on each of its regions, allowing property to realize its social function, as defined by Brazilian law.

The law of the My House, My Life program is listed here as it not only gives the general guidelines for this specific program, that seeks to promote the expansion of housing for low income families, but also brings new tools to recognize the rights of irregular occupations by low income people, due to the deficit of affordable housing. It alters previous urban development laws and focuses on implementing the access to adequate, affordable housing to low income families.

The current urban development legal structured has evolved to reduce social inequality regarding access to housing and to the city itself, and its core values seek to promote a peaceful coexistence of people on the urban environment.

From a Rule of Law perspective, we see a chronological improvement on the legal texts, with the creation of new forms for the people to participate on matter regarding the interest of the whole city, a greater concern for transparency and accountability to the law for both private parties and public institutions.

The weakest link on the Brazilian urban development legal framework is also its key actor: the prefectures and the municipal law. By means of urban planning laws and the approval for urban development enterprises, the prefectures can direct the development of the city according to its local characteristics and interests.

While there are legal tools for urban planning and development, their proper use requires well prepared public offices and servants. This is far from a reality for many of the Brazilian prefectures. There are generic Master Plans aplenty, leaving a legal vacuum regarding many urban development issues especially relevant to these cities.

This is the case of the city of Vinhedo, which is now trying to correct this figure by means of its new Master Plan. It had significant popular participation and was made under close watch of São Paulo's State "Ministério Público".

It has not yet given an adequate solution to the situation of the deficit of institutional areas on the city, having to contend with the numerous existing gated communities and homeowners associations and while also giving a response to the needs of the people who live outside the walls.

3. On the gated communities of Vinhedo

The city of Vinhedo has several characteristics which made it a target of the real state market for the implementation of high value housing projects. Among these characteristics are its proximity to the major city of Campinas, easy highway access through the Anhanguera Highway, the lack of major urban issues found on the bigger cities and the existence of available land for parceling.

The population of the city of Vinhedo has increased from 47.215 inhabitants on the year 2000 to 63.611 inhabitants on the year 2010. According to the local office of the "Ministério Público", 40% of the urban population of the city lives on gated communities[4].

This development was due to the prefecture's complacency on the approval of land parceling projects. There was a lack of control of the actual nature of the projects and the observance to the applicable law.

Some of these gated communities were regularly established as condominiums, as by the condominium law, using the incorporation process and attending to that law's basic requisites. Most of the gated communities in Vinhedo, however, were made according to the procedures of the Land Parceling Law.

The Land Parceling Law procedure is mandatory for projects that divide the land into lots of individual dominion and that require the opening of new streets, essentially creating a new neighborhood that must be integrated to the city, generating new demands for public services.

The social safeguards and compensations of the Land Parcelling Law are required due to the impact of these projects on the whole city, and the approval procedure requires the judgment of the viability of this integration of the new neighborhood to the whole.

What happened for several years in the city of Vinhedo was a lack of criteria on the approval of land parceling projects. After being approved according to the Land Parceling Law Procedure, the company or a homeowner association would request the permission to erect walls around the new neighborhood. These requests where usually granted, without greater inquiry, and the homeowner associations would them act as if they were a "condominium assembly", institution established by the Condominium Law.

These associations would be regulated by private statutes that would promote compulsory association by all homeowners, and consequent compulsory payment of association fees for the maintenance of the "common areas".

These "common areas" where actually the areas legally destined to public domain as green areas and institutional areas, now enclosed within the walled perimeter. With the access to the gated communities restricted by private security, these areas were now out of reach of the wider population it was originally destined to serve and incorporated to the private dominion of these homeowner associations.

During the making of Vinhedo's new Master Plan a diagnostic of the situation was made by the prefecture, and the city saw that this situation hampered its ability to offer public services, due to the lack usable, accessible institutional areas. There was also a deficit of access to green areas and public recreational facilities to the wider population that lived outside of these gated communities.

The new Master Plan was made, promulgated by the Municipal Complementary Law 66/2007, in which the illegality of these gated communities was finally recognized. There was a prohibition to the creation of new gated communities and guidelines to legalize the existing ones. This legalization would involve the compensation for the public areas that existed within the walled perimeters, with the objective of giving the social compensations owned to the city.

These compensations for legalization where removed by the Municipal Complementary Law 98/2011, and the situation is still unsure as if there will be any compensations at all.

After analyzing the closure proposal of the Civil Inquiry 163.754/12, made by the local office of Vinhedo, the Superior Council of São Paulo's State "Ministério Público" decided, on 2013.06.18, that the investigations needed to continue, as several problematic points still remained regarding the observance to the Urban Land Parcelling Laws.

4. Rule of Law implications of the current Master Plan of the city of Vinhedo and insights of a "realist culturalist" perspective

The current text of the Master Plan of the city of Vinhedo has noxious implications from a Rule of Law perspective. Giving up on the social compensations for the legalization of the existing gated communities goes against the principles of accountability before the law and equality before the law.

It consists on a pardon for the appropriation of public property by these homeowner associations, depriving the citizens as a whole from its benefits.

The alternative of unmaking the walls and gates as means to give the population access to those areas is also in grave conflict with the principles of legal certainty and fairness in the application of law. The population of these gated communities has lived in this way for decades, in some cases, with perceived legality due to administrative acts of approval from the prefecture agents.

The original text of the Master Plan, even with the apparent contradiction of accepting as legal urban parceling made without the observance to the applicable laws, actually enforces the general guidelines and values of the current urban development legal framework.

There is also the need to reconcile the private statutes of these homeowner associations with the Brazilian Constitution, as a way to make these associations accountable to the law and protect the base rights of the people who live under them.

Miguel Reale sustains, based on the work of Del Vecchio, that State Law is not the only positive law applicable, and that positive law can be originated from different sources of power manifested by social integration, the State Law being the greatest level of positivity relative to other legal orders.[5]

The Brazilian Constitution ensures the freedom of association, according to the items XVII, XVIII, XIX, XX and XXI of its 5th article. It protects this freedom from both a positive and a negative perspective, the item XX clearly stating that "no one should be compelled to associate or stay associated"; and item XIX stating that "associations can only be unmade by a judge's decision". These dispositions both recognize the legitimacy of the private social integration process and gives the means by which the state affirms its supremacy as the greatest level of legal positivity.

By the means of compulsory association clauses, these homeowner associations arbitrarily violate constitutional rights of the individual owners. The dispositions of such statutes should be reconciled with the State Law, as means to assure the principles of the supremacy of law and avoidance of arbitrariness.

[5] Reale, Miguel. Teoria do Direito e do Estado, 5 ed., Saraiva, São Paulo, 2000, pp.102.

Conclusion

The Rule of Law on a plural society faces the twofold challenge of conciliating Freedom and Safety, of allowing the people to follow their will and act according to it while protecting the same people of the harmful acts they would practice unto themselves or unto other members of the same society.

The State Law has the role to be this common denomination among the varied foci of power and norms, guided by such distinct values that can be taken as a vector of action. Religious norms, customary norms, private norms, all these distinct norms have their role on regulating our lives, but none can be allowed to have power of the Freedom of the whole of society, on the risk of undermining the very structure that allow them to flourish peacefully.

Right to the city as a condition to the effectiveness of social rights
The possibility of judicial activism and public space

Alessandro Bruce Lied Padilha
Giuliana Redin

Abstract: The efficiency of the social rights is connected to the complexity of development policies, what presupposes public choices. These choices might not be connected to the local demands. It is in the city, by its temporal and spatial dynamics, the first space of effectuation of social rights. According to this view, the government policies of development might not consider the local demands about social rights, which are perceived by specific analysis of the local reality. Given this context, it is put to the Judiciary the challenge of being a public space of claim for local demands, being required from it the taking of political decisions by the legal basis of the social rights. Thereby, It is asked: does the Judiciary represent a public space of claim for local demands about social rights? It's questioned about the capability of the Judiciary at facing the merit of public choices nationally and stately projected, by the presupposition of local public space by the complexity of Right to the City. The Federal Constitution establishes government competences and legal criteria for the formulation and application of public policies, but the realization of social rights might reveal high levels of complexity that transcend the capability of these decisions to satisfy the basic needs of the local sphere, therefore, can the Judiciary be taken as legitimate instance of public choice revision? The goal of the present search is the confrontation of the constitutional core about the legitimacy of the Judiciary to serve as a public space of claim and not only as a sphere of application of the public decision. It is, in Arendt's theoretical perspective on space and public sphere, the political and philosophical analysis of the current constitutionalism, which Dworkin faces starting by the question of the principles and the capability of the judiciary to decide politically. Furthermore, along with the matter of principle, specifically on the agenda is the realization of social rights, which are directly connected to the city, as the first instance for its effectuation, according to Lefebvre. Finally, social rights are complex rights regarding its effectiveness, thus, the search deals with the concepts of basic needs instead of minimum needs, according to Potyara Pereira's approach. As methodology, the research adopts a dialectical approach, since it makes dogmatic confrontation of the current Brazilian constitutionalism, as well as procedural technique, besides the theoretical and conceptual literature, documentary research and case study.

1. Introduction

The transformation of the conception of a traditional state into a Welfare State is understood as a deepening of the individual's protection and reduction of uncertainties. The new characterization of the modern state reflects on the promotion of social rights by the state. Social rights are constitutionally assured in Brazil, although its effectuation depends on public policies, which presupposes public choices.

The goal of the present work is to analyse whether the judiciary can be considered a legitimate space of claim by the civil society on the pursuing of social rights. In order to achieve this goal, the following works are observed: A Principle Question by Ronald Dworkin, which debates the idea of on what the judiciary must be based on to make decisions; "Necessidades Humanas: Subsídios à crítica dos mínimos sociais" by Potyara Pereira, which brings the debate about human needs and the strategic position of the rulers to satisfy those needs with social services; and Right to the city by Henri Lefebvre, that explores the thought that the construction (and reconstruction) of the city must be perceived by a local sphere.

The investigation about the possibility of the judiciary be considered as a legitimate space of claim by the civil society on social rights is seen as a very important issue once it is an ally to the satisfaction of those needs. Social rights are assured by right but depend on public choices. Those rights are satisfied when they are effected in the place where they are needed, in the city.

2. Social rights

Social rights are connected to the role the state plays upon its people. The level of implementation of social rights depends on the state offering, and this offering determines the accesses the individuals enjoy. Rosanvallon (1997) observes that the welfare state is a deepening of the traditional state. While the traditional state provides right to life and right to property in a way to protect people from an unstable scenario, the welfare state provides practices of redistribution and collective public services in order to reduce the uncertainties and produce a safety environment. According to Rosanvallon (1997) the welfare state shouldn't be seen as emerging from economic determinations but it is derived from a historical process connected to a certain social contract, certain level of economic development and social relations.

The civil and political rights are connected to the ideal of liberty and individual autonomy while the social rights, given their own collective nature, they are linked to the conception of need and keep a relation with the principles of equality, equity and social justice (PEREIRA, 2011, p. 37). Economic and social rights are assured, in 1919, by the Weimar Constitution and, they are derived of the social constitutionalism that gives the idea that happiness of men is achieved not only against the state, but above all, by the state (SILVA VELLOSO, 2003, p. 3). Those rights are a socialist inheritance and they are constituted by rights such as right to social welfare, right to work, right to health and education (SILVA VELLOSO, 2003).

Social rights, such as education, health, work and housing are assured in the Brazilian Constitution of 1988. Despite of being assured, they depend on public choices to have its effectuation in a way they can be accessed by the civil society. The organic bill of social assistance (Lei Orgânica de Assistência Social), with number of 8742, was promulgated in Brazil in 1993, and its content establishes the criteria for the organization of social assistance. In its first chapter and article it expresses that the social assistance is a right of the citizen and must be provided by the state. The nomenclature used connects social minimum to satisfy basic needs, and those provisions are part of a non-contributive policy made by the government which is understood as an advance (PEREIRA, 2011).

The Organic Bill of Social Assistance establishes the promotion of social minimum accesses by the state to satisfy basic needs demanded by the population. Pereira (2011) sees the relation between social minimum accesses and basic needs as a strategic position of the government. Pereira (2011) says that for the satisfaction of basic needs the government must provide social basic services and, only then, will exist an accordance between what is needed by the individuals and what is provided by the state. Her explanation goes on saying that only when it has an accordance between what is needed and what is provided will be possible to talk about fundamental rights, the ones every citizen is holder.

According to Pereira (2011), needs are different of aspirations and desires because the non-satisfaction of needs will lead the individuals to conditions of serious damages. She says that in every culture the individuals have common basic needs, and even if the satisfaction of the needs varies according to the culture, the need doesn't vary. Defining needs as an objective phenomenon is important to the elaboration of trustable public policies, which can allow the civil society to be free from the coercion made by need. Therefore, to the satisfaction of human basic needs is required social basic services, only then the effectuation of social rights will be made satisfactorily.

3. Right to the city

The city is the space where individuals have their first contact with the material reality and is the place where occurs their first relation with the society they are inserted. The individuals interact constantly with the city, giving to it shape, meaning, making part of its building, influencing and being influenced by it. The urban space is created and recreated by the human relations established in its space through meetings, trade, productive activity, events, politics, etc. This joint of interactions constitute the dynamics of the city, where the individuals dwell and it is also the space where the social rights are demanded by the civil society (LEFEBVRE, 2001).

The city constitutes the first space of participation of individuals in the reality they are inserted and in its space the individuals assume double perspective, as subjects and objects. As the city is seen as the habitat of individuals, the realization of social rights and the satisfaction of human basic needs with social basic services occurs in its space. Therefore, the satisfaction of social rights requires a planning upon the city, its structures, its shape, its dynamics and its ideologies. According to Lefebvre (2001), the realization of the urban society requires a planning oriented to the satisfaction of basic social needs in the city. Only when it is achieved, we can have a right to the city, a right which is superior in relation to the other rights because it is a joint of social rights formulated and thought together with local perspective.

To the city be oriented to the satisfaction of social rights it has to take into account the local demands, or sad in another way, the demands perceived by local population. This local perspective presupposes that individuals occupy a public realm in their political expresses to speak what kind of accesses they need. Then, the civil society in their political expression occupies a public realm to debate about public choices which are related to the local reality. This way the public choices can have an accordance to social rights in the proportion they are needed in a certain reality (ARENDT, 2013).

The right to the city recognizes that the space where individuals are inserted and where they have contact to the society is the local realm, therefore, the city. The city is the space in which social rights are demanded in the shape of social basic services to satisfy basic needs. The city is where the individuals live, where they are housed, where they have the chance to participate of social and political life. Therefore, the right to the city expresses itself as a right when the human relations and demands established in the local reality are took into account to the construction of the public space (LEFEBVRE, 2001).

4. Judiciary activism for the realization of social rights

The effectuation of fundamental rights rely on public choices, which depend on decisions made by the government. From the government comes guidelines to satisfy human basic needs, but when those choices are thought nationally and stately they might have some disconnections on what is needed by the individuals in their micro space. Although a new management in the government presupposes a new ideological background, the provision of social rights is assured in the Brazilian Constitution of 1988. Therefore, independently of the governmental choices the social rights such as right to health, right to education are rights that must be provided by the state (PEREIRA, 2011).

Sometimes the public choices to allocate available resources in the society don't satisfy social rights properly and given this scenario is questioned: Can the judiciary be considered a space of claim by the civil society for the effectuation of social rights? It is unquestionable the normative content of social rights, then it is needed to comprehend how far the judiciary might go for the effectuation of those rights. According to Dworkin (2000), the judiciary can not make political decisions and then decide what is best chosen for the society, but must make decision based on principle.

The social rights are connected to the dynamics of the city and to the mutability of social life and human relations, so they are complex and not perennial. Therefore, when are exhausted other ways of effectuation of social rights, the judiciary can serve as a legitimate space of claim by the civil society to satisfy their basic human needs on the sphere of the city. The judiciary serving as a space of claim on the issue of social rights is decided on a matter of principle due to the reason that social rights are connected to the principle of dignity of the human person, which is written in the Brazilian Constitution of 1988 (SARLET, 2009).

When the civil society come to the judiciary to claim for a school or a health center in their city they are expressing their local demands on social rights, therefore, this demand is based on a principle question. The dignity of the human person is a principle assured in the Brazilian Constitution of 1988 and beyond its recognition, as Sarlet (2009) observes, the protection and promotion of this principle rely on social rights.

5. Conclusion

The satisfaction of human basic needs by the provision of social basic services has its effectuation in the space where the individuals are inserted, the city. Therefore, the Right to the City is a right to welfare for individuals from their mundane life condition, in other words, their human condition must be considered and respected by the local realm. The effectuation of those rights is connected to public choices of economic opportunities and they are possible where they are needed, in the local sphere of the city.

Consequently, the satisfaction of human basic needs in the sphere of the city is directly linked to the capability of the civil society manifest their demands. In this perspective, exhausted the traditional ways of claim, the judiciary show itself as a legitimate space of claim to hear and to receive the demands of the civil society by a question of principle. Once the social rights are changeable and not perennial the activism of the judiciary is seen as legitimate space for the effectuation of social rights.

Influence of ethics in the concept of law
Questions about actual stage of the "Hart-Dworkin" debate

Leonardo Figueiredo Barbosa

Abstract: This work intends to question the role that ethics plays in the identification of the concept of law. With this purpose we established a theoretical specific point: It will start with an analysis of the debate between Herbert Hart and Ronald Dworkin, focusing on relevant points to the study of the relationship between law and morality. Notwithstanding the debate called "Hart-Dworkin" has started in the 70's and has more direct origins in the debate initiated by Lon Fuller and Hart in the 50's, remains relevant to this day as it can be seen both in the last few books published by Dworkin before his death in 2013 - Justice in robes (2006) and Justice for hedgehogs (2011) - as in the current discussion between proponents and detractors of theories where the connection between morality and law is the focal point of divergence.

Keywords: Hart-Dworkin Debate. Concept of Law. Ethics

1. Introduction

This presentation is derived from an ongoing research that intends to question what is the role moral values[1] may play in identifying

[1] Although there is an extensive literature discussing the existence, or not, of differences between the ethics and morality concepts, we will not review such discussion in the development of this project and we will take the terms as synonymous. This decision is due to two reasons: first of all, because the objective of this work is to evaluate whether there is a required relation between the moral values and the legal system, whether such axiological standards refer to a specific person, group or society or to supposedly global or globalizable values because they can be discovered by the reason or through the idea of dignity. Secondly, because the existing divergence on the subject would require a more detailed analysis, as well as explanatory notes each time one of the terms was quoted, what would deviate from the scope of work and would make it more tiring than necessary. Just as an example to show the diversified handling of the terms: Hart, The Concept of Law (1994, pp. 168 and 184) deals with ethics and morals as "associated or nearly synonymous terms", although making a distinction between the "accepted morality" and the critical moral that can be opposed to the former. Dworkin, Justice for hedgehogs (2011, the concept of Law and, specifically, the role of such values in decisions taken by the Judiciary Branch in current democracies, that is, at the current moment of construction of judicial decisions. A specific theoretical section has been established with this objective: this problem shall be analyzed from the discussion between the theories of Herbert Hart (1907-1992) and Ronald Dworkin (1931-2013).

2. The theses of hart and dworkin

Presenting the main points of a debate that lasts nearly five decades can be a risky task; in spite of this, we seek to summarize below, in a logical chain of ideas, the main points in the debate between the binding and separation theses between law and morals.

2.1 Hart's theory

Hart's work search focus on the structural issue of the law, trying to point out the common elements that this social construction would have in any contemporary community and, therefore, that could be identified by any reasonably educated person, as "important points of similarity between the different legal systems" as listed below:

> (i) rules forbidding or enjoining certain types of behavior under penalty; (ii) rules requiring people to compensate those whom they injure in certain ways; (iii) rules specifying what must be done to make wills, contracts or other arrangements which confer rights and create obligations; (iv) courts to determine what the rules are and when they have been broken, and to fix the punishment or compensation to be paid; (v) a legislature to make new rules and abolish old ones. (HART, 1994, pp. 3).

Later, along the work, Hart would summarize these five characteristics of the similar structure that the several contemporary legal systems present into two different types of rules: primary (that determine that the individuals do or do not do something) and secondary pp. 13), however, in his latest work – Justice for hedgehogs – understands that ethics is the study on how to live well, while morals would be the study on how we must treat others: "I emphasize here and throughout the book the distinction between ethics, which is the study of how to live well, and morality, which is the study of how we must treat other people".

(that allow the creation of new primary rules, extinction or modification of old rules; determine its incidence and application; and identify the aspects or characteristics able to define which law rules are valid), the interaction of which is considered by the author as the "key for the law science". Therefore, Hart elects as the central or paradigmatic case for his project of identification of the law concept, the combination of primary and secondary rules, arguing that their correct observation and description could clarify a number of issues that were not adequately explained by imperative theories of law (such as John Austin's theory).

Obviously, all theoretical assumption has some consequences and that would not be different here. Among the various consequences resulting from the selection of this paradigmatic case, we can point out the following ones:[2]

1. Social sources of law –The idea that the law is comprised of a set of standards – regardless whether they are rules or principles – that may be identified through the observation of the social practice, raising the argument that the ultimate criterion of legal validity derives from the courts' practice to accept what Hart called as "a rule of recognition".
2. Judicial discretion - If law can be characterized, at least in central cases, as this set of primary and secondary rules, this means that there may be cases not covered by these rules. In addition to the possible absence of rules, Hart admits that the incompleteness of law may also derive from limitations derived from human language itself, as well as the relative ignorance of fact and the relative indefinite purpose that are typical of any undertaking that aims to influence future behaviors-resulting in what the author calls open texture of law. Due to all this, it is reasonable to say that the law is partially incomplete or indefinite - in cases where there are no rules that are clearly applicable (either because this fact has not been anticipated or because the rules created incur in the open texture of law), there is no "law" previously established – and, in such case, if the Judiciary Branch need to make a decision, it is up to the magistrate to exercise a discretionary power - since there is no applicable legal rule and, therefore, there is no compulsory binding rule (for the positivists, only the statutory law is required to be complied with) - for the creation of a law for that specific situation.

3. Conceptual separation between law and morality - Ultimately, if it is possible to identify the law based on the impartial observation of these rules that occur in social practice, there would not exist any required relation between morality and legality (for others, between what the law is and what it should be, between ethics and law, between validity and justice) - although there may exist contingent connections in certain communities –, that is, the existence of the law is one thing; its merits or demerits, is another.[3]

Therefore, these three pillars of Hart's positivism would be logical consequences of his theoretical assumption, that is, that the heart of law is constituted by the gathering of primary and secondary rules that can be objectively identified by a descriptive methodology.

To this work, one of the most important consequences of Hart's assumption is the impossibility to evaluate the value, within a purely descriptive science, since the methodology aims solely at observing and describing the elements listed above. This does not mean that the community's values (included the internal point of view) cannot be present among the elements that will be described – it is in this direction that Hart (1994, pp. 244) states that "description may still be description,

[3] This statement, which is the true mantra of legal positivism up to present time — or, as Hart would say (1994, pp. 207), evidences the battle-cries of legal positivism – is based on Austin's work, originally published in 1832, *The Province of Jurisprudence Determined: "The existence of law is one thing; its merit or demerit is another. Whether it be or be not is one enquiry; whether it be or be not conformable to an assumed standard, is a different enquiry. A law, which actually exists, is a law, though we happen to dislike it, or though it vary from the text, by which we regulate our approbation and disapprobation. This truth, when formally announced as an abstract proposition, is so simple and glaring that it seems idle to insist upon it. But simple and glaring as it is, when enunciated in abstract expressions the enumeration of the instances in which it has been forgotten would fill a volume". (AUSTIN, 2007, pp. 157) even when what is described is an evaluation". Here, the author intends to defend that the descriptive approach not only makes prevents the consideration of values that may be present in the object of study, but, also, that the reporting of these values does not mean researcher's acceptance of the values reported. MacCormick (2008, pp. 203) – in order to defend the reasonableness of Hart's vision – states that it is possible to consider "important for the improvement of understanding to study a particular object, institution, or set of institutions without ascribing particular moral value to the object or institution(s) studied ", which, in turn, does not mean to say that what has been described is not subject to moral evaluation; it only means that such evaluation shall not be made within the science sphere (or, at least, within the project sphere) but that it only intends to be descriptive and not evaluative.

This does not mean that Hart does not see the possibility of influence of ethics on law. Since the original version of "The Concept of Law", in 1961, Hart had already recognized several possibilities of connection between both of them (Chapter IX, Section 3), however, for the author, all these relationships would be merely contingent or would not have as a consequence the required inclusion of morality as a criterion for validity of legal rules, what would allow us to state the existence of morally wicked rules.

Once again, after this particular context is explained, it is possible to consider intelligible Hart's statement that his project "is morally neutral and has no justificatory aims: it does not seek to justify or commend on moral or other grounds the forms and structures which appear in my general account of law"[4] and, therefore, is an undertaking radically different from Dworkin's theory of law, which is envisioned as evaluative and interpretative.

Such statements indicate that the characterization of Hart's theory as something that seeks to define the law only based on the linguistic or semantic use of the word may be a frivolous accusation – notwithstanding the issue of the philosophy of language being actually crucial for Hart's works. However, it is important to clarify that although Dworkin (2006, pp. 165) continues featuring Hart's thesis of social sources as a "semantic statement", the U.S. professor also recognizes, at least in more recent works, that "Hart did not mean, of course, to offer a simple dictionary definition or set of synonyms for any particular word or phrase".

However, even if Hart's project is not solely about the search of the concept of law through an analysis of the use of the word "law", but rather is characterized as a proposal for identifying a social concept through a descriptive methodology that focuses on central or paradigmatic cases, characterized by the gathering of primary and secondary rules, there still remains the question on whether the assumption adopted by Hart is true or if it is the best option in the identification of the concept of law, as well as whether the methodology adopted based on this assumption is appropriate and why it would be a better project than the evaluating and justifying alternative proposed by Dworkin.

To take a position on this question, we will use the path suggested by Hart to compare different concepts, although this suggestion is also used here to compare the different methods to achieve the definition of a concept:

> For what really is at stake is the comparative merit of a wider and a narrower concept or way of classifying rules, which belong to a system of rules generally effective in social life. If we are to make a reasoned choice between these concepts, it must be because one is superior to the other in the way in which it will assist our theoretical inquiries, or advance and clarify our moral deliberations, or both. (HART, 1994, pp. 209).

Therefore, we must question whether a solely descriptive methodology complies with the mission to find the concept of law, than a methodology that also adds an evaluative and justificative dimension of that institution (value dimension) stating that there are goals to be achieved and assessing which, among the interpretative options, match the actual practice, can be considered the best methodology from the moral point of view. In addition, there should be made an analysis on the assumption that the central or standard case of law would be characterized by the set of primary and secondary rules regardless of the moral values.

2.3 Dworkin's theory

In this presentation, it is assumed that the initial discussions – on whether the law is composed only by rules or by principles as well and whether the rule of recognition is able to deal with these new standards – are relatively overcome. This work will not analyze these oppositions, since we will focus on the latest arguments which, even according to some positivists (SHAPIRO, 2007, pp. 27), still represent an "extremely powerful objection" to the legal positivism. [5]

Dworkin's subsequent arguments, mainly after his book "Law's Empire", focus on stating that positivism is not able to explain the occurrence of situations that Dworkin refers to as "theoretical legal disagreements". These would be cases where people, although not disagreeing on historical facts relating to a particular situation and not even on the existence of certain provisions of law (which would drain the veracity conditions of law, according to positivists), still disagree on the application of the law to the case under analysis.

In order to understand this criticism, we must first consider the main argument of the "Law's Empire" (DWORKIN, 1986, pp. 190, emphasis added): "the concept of law [...] connects law with the justification of official coercion. A conception of law must explain how what it takes to be law provides a general justification for the exercise of coercive power by the state". This argument seems to be grounded not only in the opinion many jurists would have about law – at least in the contemporary democracies –, but it also seems to reinforce the position defended by Dworkin since the work "Taking Rigths Seriously": rights as political assets that the citizen has against the State.

Once again, as noted in the explanation on Hart's theory, all theoretical assumption has consequences:

1. If the law has a purpose, this means that its identification and application are, at some extent, associated to such purpose. This is why the law consists of an argumentative practice, that is, it is characterized by understanding that the participants need to submit reasons so that the legal propositions they defend are understood as true by other participants of this practice. Consequently, any proposal on what law means must be an interpretation that considers the intentionality and pur-

[5] "Indeed, it is one of the great ironies of modern jurisprudence that in spite of the huge amount of ink spilled on the Hart-Dworkin debate, so little attention has been paid to this second, more powerful objection. To be sure, legal positivists have relentlessly attacked Dworkin's positive theory of constructive interpretation. Yet they have made almost no effort to defend their own theory against Dworkin's negative arguments in Law's Empire. They have made no attempt to show how theoretical legal disagreements are possible".

2. Any interpretation of a social practice, exactly because it has an evaluative dimension, is characterized partially by more abstract propositions that are shared by the members of the Community (concept - consensual part), but from that abstract level of consensus, it is possible to propose sub interpretations of that more abstract and consensual idea (conception - nonconsensual part). Therefore, to Dworkin (2006, pp. 10-11, emphasis added), law would be an interpretive concept, that is, one of those concepts that people share, despite acute differences on the criteria (there is no consensus) for concept identification and application (e.g. winning a round in boxing). Such concepts "encourage us to reflect on and contest what some practice we have constructed requires. […] the answers to these questions turn on the best interpretation of the rules, conventions, expectations, and other phenomena [of social practice] and of how all these are best brought to bear in making that decision on a particular occasion".
3. Therefore, it would not be possible to define an interpretive concept perfectly through a purely descriptive methodology: (i) either because there is no perfect consensus on the criteria to be used to define/identify the concept; (ii) either because such concepts require an interpretation and not simply an account of what occurs or has occurred throughout history. This does not mean that the descriptive methodology is not important and even necessary; however, it is not sufficient in these cases, because an evaluative methodology is also required.

Maybe, after developing Dworkin' line of reasoning, it is now easier to understand why he accuses the hartian positivism of being unable to explain the "theoretical legal disagreement". If the law can be explained simply as a descriptive form from its structural elements (factual elements), why people disagree on what the law determines in cases where, apparently, everyone agrees about the existent facts and legal texts?

Dworkin (1986, pp. 3-6) proposes that in order to understand the true nature of the disagreements that exist when the legal experts differ on law, we need to understand two basic concepts:

1. propositions of law are those claims that indicate what law allows, authorizes or prohibits – which can be true or false - and the truth, or not, of these propositions depends on what he calls;
2. "grounds of law" which are "other, more familiar kinds of propositions on which these propositions of law are (as we might put it) parasitic", and that specify when these propositions of law "should be taken to be sound or true" (DWORKIN, 1986, pp. 4 and 110 respectively). That is, ultimately, what 'the law really is' depends on what we consider as grounds for the identification of the law. [6]

Therefore, for Dworkin (1986, pp. 5) "they disagree about whether statute books and judicial decisions exhaust the pertinent grounds of law" as well as on the corollary of this divergence: If these elements do not exhaust the grounds of law, what else could be considered as an element able to make legal propositions true?

Dworkin (1986, pp. 5) declares that the disagreements on the veracity of what is determined by law - propositions of law - can occur in two ways:

1. empirical disagreement – people can have the same vision as to the fundamentals of law, but they differ with regard to the effective factual occurrence of such grounds in a case (it would be a ?);
2. theoretical disagreement – people may disagree exactly about the identification of the grounds of law, that is, which are the arguments that make a proposition of law true, although agreeing on the facts, "even when they agree about what statutes have been enacted and what > legal officials have said and thought in the past"[7]. They are disagreeing about what must take place in their legal system before a proposition of law can be said to be true or false.

[6] These two concepts are critical for Dworkin's recent proposal - in Justice in Robes - about the different meanings that the word law can have.

For Dworkin, Hart's positivist theory could only explain the empirical differences because it assumes, based on the rule of recognition - accepted by the community as the last rule of the system, which allows the criteria through which the validity of the other rules of the system is evaluated –, that the grounds of law are fixed by consensus among legal officials. So, for the positivists, in general, they either simply disregard the existence of theoretical differences or simply disqualify this kind of disagreement stating that this is nothing more than an illusion, it makes no sense or is it just a disguised policy (DWORKIN, 1986, pp. 6-11).

Despite of that, the observation of cases decided by the courts – at least in Western democracies – and the understanding that jurists themselves have of their practice is sufficient to say that the theoretical disagreement effectively occur: in several cases, jurists, although agreeing about factual issues and on what legal texts say, disagree on what the law determines for that specific situation.

Conclusion

While recognizing the merits of Hart's theory, in particular concerning the evolution that represented to the positivism, we consider that Dworkin's theory corresponds more to the judicial practice accomplished in the democratic countries.

Hart's theory – even considering that it is a purely descriptive proposal - seems to disregard that there are concepts that can only be fully understood through an analysis that does not end with the observation of what occurs in social practice, but that also positions itself on the aims and objectives of this practice (see the epilogue that MacCormick includes, in 2008, at second edition of his book H. L. A. Hart). Some examples in the history of mankind can help clarify this argument: One thing is to describe the differences that the concept of "citizen" suffered throughout the history of mankind, another thing is to defend the conception that is considered appropriate to the assumed purposes of this concept; one can define the concept of "equality of opportunities" based on the idea that everyone should be treated in a formally equal manner, in another case, in a manner substantially equal; the concept of "marriage" - if we were to adopt a purely descriptive methodology based on its occurrence in the West after the middle ages - could not have evolved to encompass the same-sex unions, as it has occurred in several countries. Each of these examples, although considering elements of a descriptive methodology (the observation and description of different social systems throughout the history of mankind), at some point, goes beyond the mere description and positions itself on its own merits and demerits.

It is true, however, that Hart does not exclude the possibility and even the need for an assessment of the merits of the law, but he claims that the validity (either of individual rules or the legal system as a whole) does not depend on such evaluation, as this would be made externally to the concept of law. Hart may be right in saying that the consideration of moral values is a political choice, however, he seems to be wrong when he gives the impression to suggest that it is possible to identify political concepts or any other social concepts as if we were archaeologists looking for something that is just waiting to be disclosed.

The presence of Hobbes and Machiavelli in authoritarian thinking in Brazil and Germany in the Decade 30

Abstract: The central objective of this paper is to analyze the thought of two authors, Hobbes and Machiavelli and what their influence on authoritarian doctrine applied by the governments of Brazil and Germany in the 30s of last century. In this period, Brazil was ruled by Getúlio Vargas, and Germany lived the rise of Nazism. Both governments were sustained by authoritarian governments that had its theoretical justification in the thought of Hobbes and Machiavelli.

1. Introduction

The proposed work is to discuss the influence of the thought of Hobbes and Machiavelli in Brazil and in Germany during the 30s of the twentieth century. As is generally known, the period between the two world wars was characterized by the rise to power of authoritarian regimes. In Brazil, had the government of Getúlio Vargas, though brought a great economic development to the country, while starred severe measures contrary to the democratic regime. The policy measures were taken from a central decision without participation of other social actors, such as parliament, social movements or people. The mass was coopted by providing material goods and rights denied before, and in exchange legitimized the government via public acclaim.

In Germany, the presence of an authoritarian regime was felt more strongly than in Brazil, because the Nazi regime sought to control the masses by fear and not by legal inclusion as occurred in Brazil. Germany took advantage of a bureaucratic system of control of social and political decisions, not only of the German state, but direct control of society itself, including the physical elimination of that considered different.

The legal thinking which legitimized these schemes in Germany and Brazil was designed by Carl Schmitt and Francisco Campos in their respective countries. There are, however, at the thought of the two authors a strong influence of Thomas Hobbes and Machiavelli.

The first (Hobbes) influences the thought of Schmitt and fields to propose the existence of a state of chaotic nature that justifies the existence of an absolute leader to lead the masses. The use of the concept of sovereignty is evident in the thinking of the two authors, when proposing the idea that sovereign is he who decides on the state of exception, the cornerstone of the Brazilian authoritarian thinking and German.

The second (Machiavelli), describing the Italy of his time, demonstrates the existence of a State Total Qualitative, indicating that the state, to keep their existential interests, must act promptly in certain situations. It is the use of the concept of reason of state, launched by this thinker, to justify the actions clearly authoritarian period indicated in the two countries to be investigated.

2. The Thought of Hobbes

The Englishman Thomas Hobbes (1588/1679) is known as the father of absolutism. The basis of his thought is man's need to establish and remain in a state of coexistence, as HOBBES puts himself (, p. 237):

> "This is what concerns the elements and general grounds of national laws and policies. For what is right between nations, is the same thing as natural law, because that is the natural law between two men before the establishment of the republic, it is then the right of individuals between sovereign and sovereign "

Hobbes was born at a time when the consequences of the great navigations were felt, and drove the new society reflections on the role of the state. The discoveries of new continents have questioned the organizational role of European society, relando the reflections of how society should behave before the result of the great voyages. Hobbes walks towards the pacification and unification of individuals in society.

The State of Nature in the thought of Hobbes means the previous stage to civilization stage in which prevailed the total freedom of the individual. The situation of full freedom for all in the State of Nature led to the conflict of (bellum ominia contra omnium). Hobbes, in his rational jusnaturalism proposes that man abandon his State of Nature.

Only the state could impose order on the chaotic situation of the state of nature, creating a common government and imposing rules sovereignly socializing among men. This state was created by an act of will among men, the so-called Social Contract, contract in which men, the desire to achieve peace, cede their freedom to the state that becomes the Sovereign State Hobbes comes to call Leviathan.

According to HOBBES (1999, p. 27).:

> "And art goes further, imitating that rational creature, the most excellent work of nature, man. For by Art is created that great Leviathan called a State or City (in Latin Civitas) which is but an artificial man, though of greater structure and strength than the natural man, for whose protection and defense it was designed. And in which the sovereignty is an artificial soul, as giving life and motion to the whole body, magistrates and other judicial officers or executives, artificial joints; reward and punishment (by which, linked to the throne of sovereignty, all joints and limbs are driven to do his duty) are the nerves, that do the same in the body > natural; wealth and prosperity of all the individual members are the strength; Salus Populi (the safety of the people) is a goal; counselors, through which all the things you need to know are suggested, are the memory; justice and laws, an artificial reason and will; harmony is health, sedition is the disease, and civil war is death. Lastly, the pacts and conventions by which the parts of this Body Politics were created, combined and unified resemble those Fiat, Let the man uttered by God in creation."

All power is concentrated in the state and the individual becomes a subject of the state, but obedience to this because with the social pact, sovereign and subjects merge into one reality (HOBBES, 1999, p. 147).

Hobbes inaugurates the modern age, shifting the center of social thought to the individual who, in an act of reason transfers sovereignty to the state founding and justifying the absolutist political regimes.

3. Thought of Machiavelli

Shortly before Hobbes lived Italian Niccolò Machiavelli (1469/1527). The thought of Machiavelli does not seek to create a General Theory of Government, but explain how the government, particularly during the period in which he lived, in an Italy divided multicore power. Machiavelli inaugurates the concept of applied ethics to politics, particularly ethics in the pursuit of the common good.

The moral virtues should be required of the prince in governing, is called virtu must also be accompanied by the virtues of historical possibilities (luck) for the exercise of power. For Rodrigo Suzuki Dias CINTRA (2011, p. 222):

> "There are two concepts in the book The Prince that seem to characterize the construction of the characters in The Mandrake: fortune and virtù. Fortuna and virtù divide the life of men. Fortune is the key to success in politics, but corresponds to that part which can not be governed by man. It provides the occasion, the opportunity to be grasped by man virtù. She can be lucky or unlucky a man. The virtù, on the other hand, was knowing enjoy the most favorable time for action. Machiavelli in The Prince, uses a metaphor to explain the two concepts, the metaphor of the river. Fortune is a torrential river that can devastate all that man has created. But the man virtù can prevent using dikes and dams for the river does not destroy everything it encounters the frente.É must not > confuse virtù with virtue. Virtue, in the Christian sense, preaches kindness will be rewarded in heaven. The virtù Machiavelli may be preferred strongly to the kindness and not a hope of salvation, but effective action of man on earth, in pursuit of power. A prince of virtù not depend on others, which are unstable and profiteers, but of himself. Reading these concepts by Machiavelli Lefort (1980, p. 44) is extremely unique:

> Certainly this virtù is defined as the antithesis of Fortune, is the power to escape the mayhem of events, raising up the time, as we learn, shoos all before it, is to grab the occasion and therefore know it is short, in the words of the author, enter a form in matter. You could say that virtù respect to the size of man's ambition and his ability to live up to his own ambition."

In other words: How many vocations policies will not have been wasted because they have appeared in historical times and places in which she was required? On the other hand, how many historical possibilities will not have been lost by the absence of leaders equipped with the specific virtues appropriate to act in a situation where the men were prepared to drive policy? Here emerges the crucial importance of history in the theoretical construction of Machiavelli. Does the relationship between concrete and specific historical conjunctures particular men who meet there will emerge-or non-political action able to found a new order.

Moreover, to remain in power, the ruler of conquering people's sympathy, which occurs through the exercise of virtù and not through fear. To stay in power the ruler must conquer the people's friendship, admiration. Thus, the art of government depends on the good deeds of the ruler, so the power, action, unlike Hobbes whose power stems from an act rationally.

Being ethical action, Machiavelli builds an ethic of ends and not means, breaking the hitherto dominant rationalist logic.

4. The Influence of Hobbes and Machiavelli

Although Hobbes and Machiavelli has not been the basis of authoritarian thinking developed in Brazil and Germany, both authors had a strong influence on the structure of thought.

To do so, we must mix the concept of the Sovereign State of Hobbes, with virtù Machiavelli, being the result of mixing the base of the authoritarian structure existing in Brazil and Germany.

On the one hand, the thought of Hobbes's Sovereign State entered the thinking of these countries to attract all social life into the state life and on the other hand, there is a whole system of acclaim leader (Prince) by people who justify maintenance of the leader in power, something similar to that proposed by Machiavelli.

In general, both states - Brazilian and German - were the intervention, but in the social field, in order to avoid that the pluralism of the social harm somehow Economic Power. The role of the state was intervening in order to organize society in a new light, indirectly creating a wall of protection to the economic, social demands that were beginning to organize themselves politically in the periods preceding the Vargas and Hitler.

The pretense of Germany was to restore social order and economic power prior to World War I, adapting and modernizing these orders (social and economic) to modern times, an issue that would imply the deconstruction model Weimar. In Brazil, the intention was to break with the historical evolution cycle, creating a Brazilian identity and a new state model that passed the recognition and inclusion of the controlled masses.

This state was the refurbishment of the refurbishment of the modern state, the bourgeois establishment who ascended to power in the French Revolution, and shaped a new social and political organization which replaced the power relations of the Middle Ages. The proposal from Germany and Brazil is not in the sense of mere suspension of existing political institutions and forms, with the suspension of the classical liberals (suspension of the Constitution), as some mistakenly assert authors, but proposed the reform of society itself would structure from the central decisions of the State, which was allowed by the ideologies of Brazil (Comtean positivism) and Germany (existentialism).

This division of labor that created the social structure in a given territory, facing economic activity is the accumulation of capital which has been the target of both governments, including the exclusion of changes in the process of capital accumulation. Just as liberalism reshaped the social organization (POLANY, 2012, p. 211) breaking with the conditions that preceded it, this social organization was remodeled (or adapted) for the maintenance of liberal capitalism, only now no more self-regulated, but yes arranged from the State.

This has created a state in which "there are two ideologies between the dominant ideologies about the development of Western Europe - the com- petitive model, market, and normative concept of State" (SANTOS, 1978, p. 32) - duality ideological applied to both countries.

This duality of ideologies is actually the ambiguities that leaders - myths - of both countries possess. On one side the figure of myth carries the historical tradition of personal power coupled with irrational elements as the emotions of the masses and, on the other hand, carries the prospect of modernization, the role of science (reason), the specialized bureaucracy and economic development .

The difference in the myth is the myth in German vision had the role of deciding and from this decision created is the legal while in Brazilian vision myth was a top figure in the institution (State) who held the central power, ie, the myth was part, if the apex, the bureaucracy can not create it.

Both authoritarian models implemented, it should be mentioned, seek to avoid conflicts in society that cluttering the model standing order. Thus, the "authority" of the state does not fall on the whole society, but only those that require intervention to check the homogeneity of the model. No room for organizational models outside of that particular State, and the State shall ensure the incorporation of the "different" within the state, as in Brazil or disposal as occurred in Germany and, to a lesser extent in Brazil.

The state will then cease to be a mere guarantor of rights as in the liberal state, becoming an instrument in the service of authoritarian conception.

In Brazil, this intervention was given for social inclusion, especially of the working masses, which until then were not recognized as social actors, including that this was due to the creation of labor legislation and social security, as well as by other means, such as women's suffrage , happening this and other measures, the nickname Vargas, "Father of the Poor".

Germany, although it has a policy of territorial expansion in search of new habitats, there was a policy of incorporation of the masses, but rather, the exclusion of certain sectors of society, including the occupied territories. Germany expanded to undo political pressures estrangerias. Thus, while in Brazil, were expanding rights, Germany restricts them.

The ideological aspect in Germany was much stronger than in Brazil, reason leads to differentiation already explored in the introduction that the German model was Totalitarian State, with a much deeper ideological control that allowed the defense of ideas as the superiority of the German race, or the Third Reich that would last longer than the Roman Empire. Brazil had a model of Authoritarian State which did not advocate collective psychology issues - except the adoption by acclamation of Vargas - but only the quest for social order, and only those cases of divergence political ideological punished by the State Security Court but always in the individual aspect, never with the elimination of a particular social or economic class.

It was created in Brazil no movement or political party for sustaining Vargas or anti-liberal ideology, a fact that was to take place in Germany with the creation of the National Socialist Party expressing an ideology and a government platform capable of supporting Hitler in power .

However, both policies were expansionary increasingly regulating sectors of society that actually led to the increasing emergence of doubts and questions to the system, which were suppressed by the organs of state security (SS in Germany and TSN in Brazil).

5. Conclusion

The model of control of the masses created in Germany and Brazil, influenced by Carl Schmitt in the first country in the second and Francisco Campos is a Hobbesian model in which, through public demonstrations mass transfer sovereign power to the leader, transforming the state in Hobbes's Leviathan that controls all social life.

The State becomes sovereign with the transfer of power, can determine who is a friend of the State and who is your enemy and must be eliminated. This assumes sovereign state will own that is represented in the person of its leader that works with the unconscious mass to love him, similar to that proposed by Machiavelli.

We concluded that the thought authoritarian Brazil and Germany were built largely with the theories of Hobbes and Machiavelli on State and Power.

From Leviathan State to Leviathan Executive
An institutional perspective of Brazilian powers behavior

Abstract: This paper addresses the issue of separation of powers and analyzes how the American institutional theory developed critics over the madisonian conception of this institutional arrangement. The main object of this study is the Brazilian government. The post-madisonian approach of this paper relies on Daryl Levinson and Richard Pildes's Separation of Parties, Not Powers, and Eric Posner and Adrian Vermeule's The Executive Unbound. These works were built according to the American constitutional democratic experience. The paper argues the possibility of comprehending the Brazilian constitutional design, and disconvering how its main institutions interact within this perspective of separation of powers. In this sense, the paper emphasizes, in the Brazilian political context, the difficulty in conceiving its government as divided or unified, and the limits of its presidency, even unbounded, characterized as an Executive own-bounded. In the modern administrative state, the Leviathan State idea is substituted by some kind of Leviathan Executive according to its growth and superiority if compared to other departments.

tivity and theoretical and conceptual development.[4] First critics emerged in the 1990s, presenting an institutionalist approach of legal and political scenarios.[5] In the twenty-first century, this approach has strengthened, such that it set an institutional development theory – or, as commonly referred, an institutional turn.[6] An important ground of this theory is [4] The perfectionist perspective identifies largely with the figure of Judge Hercules, defined in the following terms: "I must try to exhibit that complex structure of legal interpretation, and I shall use for that purpose an imaginary judge of superhuman intellectual Power and patience who accept law as integrity. Call him Hercules." DWORKIN, Ronald. Law's Empire. Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1986, pp. 239. A harsh criticism, however, is formulated by Cass Sunstein in: "Or consider perfectionism: the view that the Constitution should be construed in a way that makes it best, and in that sense perfects it. Imagine a society—proudly called Olympus—in which the original public meaning of the document does not adequately protect rights, properly understood. Imagine that the text is general enough to be read to provide that protection. Imagine finally that Olympian courts, loosened from Thayerian structures, or from the original understanding, or from minimalism, would generate a far better account of rights and institutions, creating the preconditions for both democracy and autonomy. In Olympus, a perfectionist approach to the Constitution would be entirely appropriate". SUNSTEIN, Cass. Second-Order Perfectionism. Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 144, 2006, pp. 3.

[5] This paper adopts an institutional placement corresponding to the American perspective that renewed his studies, in terms of institutions, in the 1990s as GILLMAN, Howard and Cornell CLAYTON. The Supreme Court in American Politics: New Perspectives institutionalist. Lawrence: Kansas University Press, 1999; GRIFFIN, Stephen. American Constitutionalism: From Theory to Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.

[6] This perspective has received greater definition from the publication of the article responsible bythis institutional turn. "By drawing attention to both institutional capacities and dynamic effects, we are suggesting the need for a kind of institutional turn in thinking about interpretive issues. […] In many ways the question of constitutional law is harder, simply because people disagree so sharply about what constitutes a good outcome. Ironically, however, constitutional law has already witnessed a significant if partial institutional turn: Many people emphasize that any approach to the Constitution must take account of the institutional strengths and weaknesses of the judiciary. Even here, however, we have seen that influential voices in constitutional law argue in favor of interpretive strategies in a way that is inadequately attuned to the issue of institutional capacities. Those who emphasize philosophical arguments, or the idea of holistic or intratextual interpretations, seem to us to have given far too little attention to institutional questions. Here as elsewhere, our minimal submission is that a claim about appropriate interpretation is incomplete if it does not pay attention to considerations of administrability, judicial capacities, and systemic effects in addition to the usual imposthe criticism over the madisonian separation of powers and its control mechanisms and mutual supervision.

Institutional theory offers a different way of assessing the government's willingness, and understands certain situations arising from the relationship maintained between its major institutions. In the institutional theor there is an Leviathan Executive rather than a Leviathan State. If traditionally citizens fear the tyranny of a whole government or basically its liberal representation in which the power is concentrated in the Legislative branch, the modern administrative state is characterized by the strengthening of the Executive and the difficulty of law and other branches control its behavior.

The main object of this work is the Brazilian government, specifically regarding its separation of powers and constraints mechanisms under a post-madisonian outlook. However, this post-madisonian institutional perspective was constituted from analyzes of American democratic constitutional experience and requires certain considerations about the Brazilian political and institutional realities. Thus, the hypothesis formulated is: post-madisonian perspective on the separation of powers is enough to understand arranges and interactions in the Brazilian government.

Among the major benchmarks of institutional thinking designated as post-madisonian, it is possible to points out (i) the defense of separation of parties, not powers, as well as (ii) the failure of liberal legalist doctrines in an attempt to constraint the expansion of Executive branch. Therefore, the subject adopted, understood in the structure and activity of their officers, will be appreciated from these two institutionalist frameworks: (i) the divided or unified government and (ii) the expansion of executive power in the administrative state.

The objective of this paper is to find out possible circumstances and situations that, at first, are not observed in the United States government, and furthermore contribute to the development of the institutional theory, especially within the post-madisonian perspective over the separation of powers.

2. The post-madisonian perspective of the american institutional theory

2.1 The politics in divided and unified governments

The disposition of separated branches is a deeply settled institutional arrangement and, despite critics, hardly replaceable in countries that lack democratic constitutional experience.[7] When conceived in its original design, the separation of powers answered three political assumptions that are target of severe criticism in institutional grounds. Through the teachings of James Madison, the separation of powers was justified by the need to, after "enable the government to control the governed", "oblige it to control itself".[8] Pursuing this goal, Madison sustains three political assumptions, central to understand the original meaning of this institutional arrangement.

Firstly, Madison points out that "it is evident that each department should have a will of its own".[9] The Framer wanted to establish [7] The above passage is based on the following: "Why focus on institutional design writ small? The principal reason is that '[d]emocracy is inherently a device for regulating marginal political conflicts'. This reads as an essentialist claim about the very concept of democracy; in context, however, it is a claim about the insuperable costs of changing the large-scale structures of an ongoing democratic order on which the whole society has coordinated. The fact is that in most democratic polities, the basic constitutional arrangements are no longer up for grabs." VERMEULE, Adrian. Mechanisms of Democracy: institutional design writ small. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007, pp . 2.

[8] Complementing the passage: "In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself". MADISON, James. Federalist No. 51: The Structure of the Government Must Furnish the Proper Checks and Balances Between the Departments. In: Alexander HAMILTON, James MADISON, and John JAY. The Federalist Papers. Electronic Classics Series Publication: Pennsylvania State University, 2001, pp. 232.

[9] Complementing the passage: "In order to lay a due foundation for that separate and distinct exercise of the different powers of government, which to a certain extent is admitted on all hands to be essential to the preservation of liberty, it is evident that each department should have a will of its own; and consequently should be so constituted that the members of each should have as little agency as possible in the appointment of the members of the others." MADISON James. Federalist No. 51: The Structure of the Government Must Furnish the Proper Checks and Balances Between the Departments. In: Alexander HAMILTON, James MADISON, and John JAY. The Federalist Papers.

that it was a personification of the government departments, extracting such a will that would be different from that expressed by the people during the elections, as well as by government officials in their activities.[10] This "ambition" mentioned by Madison is the willingness of each department to strengthen and concentrate powers under its control. Secondly, the Founder asserts that "[i]t is equally evident, that the members of each department should be as little dependent as possible on those of the others".[11] The relevance of this high degree of independence of department holders would be justified, according to Madison, as a personal motivation necessary to sustain the corresponding "ambition". Thirdly, strictly linked to the previous assumption, Madison considers that "such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government" and "[a]mbition must be made to counteract ambition".[12]

These three madisonian political-theoretical assumptions represent a minimal structure to understand the original meaning of the separation of powers in the American constitutional design. In summary, each department would have in a personified way its own "ambition" supported by a certain degree of independence between the managers of departments. That is the main assumption of the effective exercise of mechanisms of checks and balances. This way, the madisonian separation of powers is marked by a branch-based competition. Two factors

Electronic Classics Series Publication: Pennsylvania State University, 2001, pp. 231.

[10] "In the Madisonian simulacrum of democratic politics embraced by constitutional doctrine and theory, the branches of government are personified as political actors with interests and wills of their own, entirely disconnected from the interests and wills of the officials who populate them or the citizens who elect those officials." LEVINSON, Daryl and Richard PILDES. Separation of Parties, Not Powers. Harvard Law Review, 119(1), 2006, pp. 3.

[11] Complementing the passage: "It is equally evident, that the members of each department should be as little dependent as possible on those of the others, for the emoluments annexed to their offices." MADISON James. Federalist No. 51: The Structure of the Government Must Furnish the Proper Checks and Balances Between the Departments. In: Alexander HAMILTON, James MADISON, and John JAY. The Federalist Papers. Electronic Classics Series Publication: Pennsylvania State University, 2001, pp. 231-232.

[12] Complementing the passage: "Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place. It may be a reflection on human nature, that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government." MADISON James. Federalist No. 51: The Structure of the Government Must Furnish the Proper Checks and Balances Between the Departments. In: Alexander HAMILTON, James MADISON, and John JAY. The Federalist Papers. Electronic Classics Series Publication: Pennsylvania State University, 2001, pp. 233.

then should be considered. First, it is a government model characterized by competition in which at least two antagonistic agents and rivals have opposing goals. Second, these objectives are characterized by an interest essentially linked to a personified department of govern.

Despite the historical importance of the proposed madisonian separation of powers as well as the export success of this organization of the state model, it is an anachronistic and unrealistic perspective if regarded as the current political and institutional contexts, according to Daryl Levinson and Richard Pildes.[13] The institutional critique presented in the work Separation of Parties, Not Powers against the madisonian perspective can be summed up in two key aspects. Firstly, the authors contend that this "ambition" does not originate in the departments of the government, but the ideology of political parties. Secondly, because of the separation of powers is currently recognized as a party-based design, there would be times where competition among public officials would give way to a party-based cooperation. Therefore, the degree of control and oversign mechanisms exercise depends on the competitive or cooperative conjuncture established between representative departments.[14] The cases of party-based cooperation are often marked by the management of Congress by the Executive. It is one of the evidences that contemporaneously there is not a Leviathan State but, more specifically, an Executive Leviathan.

From that criticism, the institutional theory moves apart the formal vision as separate departments possess own interests. Diversely, [13] "Few aspects of the founding generation's political theory are now more clearly anachronistic than their vision of legislative-executive separation of powers. Nevertheless, few of the Framers' ideas continue to be taken as literally or sanctified as deeply by courts and constitutional scholars as the passages about interbranch relations in Madison's Federalist 51. To this day, Madison's account of rivalrous, self-interested branches is embraced as an accurate depiction of political reality and a firm foundation for the constitutional law of separation of powers. […] Recognizing that these dynamics shift from competitive when government is divided to cooperative when it is unified calls into question many of the foundational assumptions of separation of powers law and theory. It also allows us to see numerous aspects of legal doctrine, constitutional structure, comparative constitutionalism, and institutional design in a new and more realistic light." LEVINSON, Daryl and Richard PILDES. Separation of Parties, Not Powers. Harvard Law Review, 119(1), 2006, pp. 3-4.

[14] "If interbranch checks and balances remain a vital aspiration, the failure of the Framers' understanding of political competition raises the risk of a mismatch between constitutional structures and constitutional aims." LEVINSON, Daryl and Richard PILDES. Separation of Parties, Not Powers. Harvard Law Review, 119(1), 2006, pp. 72.

it reviews, hereinafter, how the interference of "ambitions" from other political actors could determine the disposition of a government as divided or unified. Thus, the logic behind the exercise or mutual control between powers – unlike suggested by James Madison – essentially derives from the way in which political parties are arranged in command of the government apparatus.[15] The focus is redistributed to the interests of officers of powers to the interests of the party to which it was affiliated. A unified government is characterized by the absence or low level of control and supervision between the representative bodies.[16] According to the U.S. Federal government, the governments are unified by a set occupied by the same political party that commands a majority in Congress Presidency.

2.2 The expansion of Executive branch in the administrative state

The Madisonian understanding of separation of powers was not limited to the original term of the U.S. government, influencing legal theorists and constitutionalists, among others, recognized in academy. Why keep a common feature about factors that would limit the powers of the Executive, such authors are combined into a single figure by Eric Posner and Adrian Vermeule.[17] The liberal legalist doctrines thus represent a comprehensive and complex set of theorists who "holds that representative legislatures govern and should govern, subject to constitutional constraints, while executive and judicial officials carry out the [15] "Political competition and cooperation along relatively stable lines of policy and ideological disagreement quickly came to be channeled not through the branches of government, but rather through an institution the Framers could imagine only dimly but nevertheless despised: political parties." LEVINSON, Daryl and Richard PILDES. Separation of Parties, Not Powers. Harvard Law Review, 119(1), 2006, pp. 2.

[16] A unified government is characterized with the control of Executive and Legislative branches by the same political party. This situation will give rise to numerous problems such as excessive facilitate to adopt extremist and radical legislation in Congress, too fast, recklessly, and without deliberation, favored by the disappearance of the presidential veto, among other factors.

[17] "Liberal legalist cannot be defined in a sentence; it is a complex of theoretical views and institutional commitments related by a family resemblance, including elements of philosophical and political liberalism, constitutionalism, and deliberative democracy". POSNER, Eric and Adrian VERMEULE. The Executive Unbound: after the madisonian republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010, pp. 3.

law".[18] These authors are trying to sustains that the Executive may be, and in fact is controlled by law and is subject to the oversight of other departments.

The thesis defended in The Executive Unbound is the ineffectiveness of the legal and traditional mechanisms of control and supervision supported by liberal legalist doctrines. The authors seek to demonstrate how the modern administrative state is marked by a predominance of the executive in the government scenario. Even the authors argue that in times of crisis, this growth of Executive becomes more significant due to their better preparation for managing exceptional situations. In contrast to the Madisonian tradition of thought, the authors adopt, albeit partially, the Schmittian theoretical framework to characterize the prevalence of regular Executive before the other departments from the perspective of an ex ante or ex post performance. Part on the principle that a present-oriented, and especially for the future is an essential activity for the leadership of the Executive factor.[19]

The administrative state, according to post-madisonian perspective, is marked by this executive dominance, even under normal conditions, but "during crises, the Executive governs almost alone".[20] The action of the Executive in circumstances of crisis can be analyzed alongside factors such as delegations and emergencies, designated by the authors of The Executive Unbound as twin problems of liberal legalism.[21]

[18] "But the simplest version of liberal legal theory holds that representative legislatures govern and should govern, subject to constitutional constraints, while executive and judicial officials carry out the law." POSNER, Eric and Adrian VERMEULE. The Executive Unbound: after the madisonian republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010, pp. 3.

[19] "The nub of Schmitt's view is the idea that liberal lawmaking institutions frame general norms that are essentially 'oriented to the past,' whereas 'the dictates of modern interventionist politics cry out for a legal system conductive to a present and future-oriented steering of complex, ever-changing economic scenarios.' Legislatures and courts, then, are continually behind the place of events in the administrative state; they play an essentially reactive and marginally role, modifying and occasionally blocking executive policy initiatives, but rarely taking the lead." POSNER, Eric and Adrian VERMEULE. The Executive Unbound: after the madisonian republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010, pp. 4.

[20] "And in crisis, the executive governs nearly alone, at least so far as law is concerned". POSNER, Eric and Adrian VERMEULE. The Executive Unbound: after the madisonian republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010, pp. 4.

[21] "Two problems bedevil liberal legalism: delegation and emergencies. The first arises when legislatures enact statutes that grant the executive authority to regulate or other-

The problem of delegations is the transference of lawmaking and policymaking authority, while the problem of emergences is the impotence of any other branch in overcoming the crisis situation. Furthermore, it is usually two problems related in practice. The central argument made by the authors to justify the reason of delegations and emergencies constitute the main problems of liberal legalism too. According to the authors, "The same institutional and economic forces that produce the problems of delegating and emergencies also work to undermine legalistic constraints on the executive".[22]

Delegations and emergencies are factual situations that, in the context of the administrative state, the Executive may lead to a framework of greater concentration of power, de jure or de facto. There are other circumstances, however, preventing the reach of Executive branch and its submission to the control liberal legalist instruments. Besides the ex post performance of the other branches, they are affected by a considerable informational deficit with the Executive structure of technicians and specialized in large-scale agents. According to the authors, there are areas in which this deficit is, for reasons of secrecy, even more sensitive, as national security and foreign policy. Moreover, the hierarchical structure of the Executive remains safe from problems faced by the legislative and judicial collegiate institutions, such as the influence of pluralism in determination, collective action problems and the need to promote partisan compositions. These facts and propositions argued in The Executive Unbound can be faced as the second and clearer evidence of the Executive Leviathan thesis. The problem is not the government and the risk of tyranny is not associated to the traditional understand of State. The Leviathan in the modern administrative state is represented precisely by the president and its main agencies.

When authors argue in The Executive Unbound Executive is not subject to the constraint tools such as rule of law and separation of powers, seem to suggest that no able means to control this department. However, this is not the proposed text. The term "unbound" is used with the intent to characterize what the authors call tyrannophobia. The currents of liberal legalism contend that the Executive is, and must be controlled by law and for the supervision of other powers under the Madisonian perspective. The failure of these mechanisms does not mean that Executive branch became absolutely "unbound". Instead, the authors argue that tyrannophobia would not be necessary to prevent a dictatorship regime, because other factors are exerting some control of the Executive. Such factors are politics and public opinion.[23]

[22] "The same institutional and economic forces that produce the problems of delegating and emergencies also work to undermine legalistic constraints on the executive". POSNER, Eric and Adrian VERMEULE. The Executive Unbound: after the madisonian republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2010, pp. 9.

The political and public opinion factors would be able to, unlike the liberal legalistic mechanisms, control the Executive. According to the authors, "[e]ven between elections, the president needs both popularity, in order to obtain political support", "and credibility, in order to persuade others that his factual and causal assertions are true and his intentions are benevolent".[24] Even in times of normality, it is essential that the president make commitments act responsibly and negotiate interests to optimize the support it receives from the people and alleviate their relationship with other representatives. Strengthening Executive largely depends on how it conquers politics and public opinion. After promoting concessions and win popularity and credibility, president becomes able to focus greater powers at its disposal.

The thesis provided to The Executive Unbound also addresses the Madisonian theme, though more broadly. It involves a whole set called liberal legalism, and sustains the failure of rule of law and separation of powers, as well as their legal control mechanisms and mutual oversight in an attempt to constraint Executive. This, in turn, would be essentially limited by the way the president conquests achieves popularity and credibility to finally become more powerful.

3.1 The Brazilian political context and the difficulty in dividing and unifying the government

The American democratic experience allowed researches to demonstrate how the institutional "ambitions" would not be based on departments, but in political parties. This understanding provides a conception of government as divided or unified. During determined times of American constitutional history, some presidents were supported by a Congress dominated by his same political party.[25] In these scenarios, political competition advocated by Madison gives way to a cooperative dynamic, defined by the "ambitions" of the political party concentrating power. The traditional perspective believes in the competition of departments, in order to concentrate powers and control the interests of others. In these cases, actually seems more realistic two powers acting together to implement a political agendas pursued by a particular party. On one hand, divided government remain political competition as a rule, although the replacement of "ambition" to political party interests. On other hand, unified governments, beyond the replace "ambitions" to party interests, reduce or eliminate competition, demonstrating how the interests of Executive may coincide with those within Congress.

The American political context, however, authorizes a rating between divided or unified government safer than the Brazilian context. In United States, the national representation is dominated by two political parties with a regular and well demarcated ideology. This fact facilitaters the task of determine whether governments are divided or unified. In Brazil, this assignment seems to be more complex. Brazil has a multiparty system. A multiparty system multiplies the number of political actors and difficult the rating of government as unified or divided. Starting from these Brazilian political and institutional realities, it is certain that, according to Levinson and Pildes, the separation is not of powers. However, there seems to be accurate and precise hold that, in Brazil, the separation is exactly of parties.

[25] "From 1832 to 1952, an incoming President assumed office with his party also in control of both the House and Senate in all but three elections. Periods of divided government cropped up mostly during the turbulent years leading up to the Civil War (1840–1860) and during the period of fractious politics in the aftermath of Reconstruction (1874–1896). Then, during the first half of the twentieth century, divided government all but disappeared. In only four midterm elections from 1900 until 1952, two of them at the end of wars, did the President's party temporarily lose control of one house of Congress (1910, 1918, 1930, 1946), and in each case unified party control was restored in the next set of elections. During that period, twenty-two out of twenty-six national elections (85%) produced unified party control, with the Republicans dominating in the first quarter of the century (with an interlude during the Wilson Administration) and the Democrats in the second quarter." LEVINSON, Daryl and Richard PILDES. Separation of Parties, Not Powers. Harvard Law Review, 119(1), 2006, pp. 19.

Unlike the American political and electoral systems with a clear predominance of two political parties, Brazil observes a pluripartidarism organization – a partisan fragmentation. Officially, Brazil has thirty-two political parties regularly registered at the Superior Electoral Court (TSE).[26] Among these thirty-two parties, twenty three have at least one national representative at Congress.

The problems related to Brazilian political parties are not, however, restricted to quantitative measures. It is not easy to distinguish accurately the interests and projects of each of these parties and the mere numerical fragmentation has not been identified by researchers as the main cause for this. This fluid and unstable dynamics have been linked to issues such as low institutionalization of Brazilian parties and the absence of well defined party ideologies in the country. An example of the problem faced by Brazilian policy can be extracted from existing discussion about the so called "party loyalty". A deep discussion was started in Brazil over the possibility of a parliamentary break his bound with the party after elected. This practice has been suppressed by the TSE and also by the Brazilian Supreme Court.[27] More recently, Brazil faces a new and similar controversy. The electoral law guarantees some strategic issues to political parties. Among these, there is a transfer of financial resources to political parties in proportion of their representation in Congress, coming from the called Party Fund (Fundo Partidário). Besides this financial benefit, an amount of minutes in media outlets for disseminating canvass is distributed according to the party representation. The Brazilian Congress discusses the possibility of preventing "disloyalties" representatives to transfer financial and communication resources for parties created during the legislature. The proposal gave rise major repercussions not only for its theme, but culminate in advance from one year to the presidential elections. Both the emblematic case about party loyalty, as the latest controversy over the electoral guarantees for parties created during the term, show problems related to the Brazilian political-party context.

[26] On September 24, 2013, the TSE approved the registration of two political parties: Republican Party of Social Order (Partido Republicano da Ordem Social – PROS) and Solidarity (Solidariedade – SDD).

[27] The TSE suppressed the practice of party unloyalty through Resolution (Resolução) No. 22.610/2007, as amended by Resolution No. 22.733/2008. The Supreme Court addressed this subject through the MS No. 26.603/DF, STF, Plenary, Related by Celso de Mello, Judgment at October, 04, 2007.

Political fragmentation is so not the only problem faced by Brazil. The above examples illustrate how the politicians do not seem to be securely linked to the political party they are affiliated at the time of election. The party loyalty and the creation of political parties are problems related to low institutionalization and the fragility of their ideologies. These problems, in turn, only made worse by the succession of political parties observed. Given the recurring creation and dissolution of political parties, the low institutionalization and the fragile ideology of parties can be associated to its time of existence, among others causes. Both the internal organization of a party, as the construction of a set of ideas and thoughts are sufficiently consistent issues that require time and democratic experience. The lack of tradition and transcendence in Brazilian political parties may actually hinder the rating of government as divided or unified.

The Brazilian policy is often referred to as a coalition of parties. First, there is no clear division or unification in the government, since the composition of Congress is atomized from around thirty-two parties. Moreover, these parties hardly have a strict ideology that promotes a consistent overview of the constitutional issues or a sedimented internal organization. Beyond that, the parties succession prevents such problems are addressed satisfactorily. Even when a grand coalition is formed to reduce opposition, the support that can be expected of this coalition is not regular and stable. In this sense, it is not merely a question of coalition parties but coalescence too. Coalescence is understood as the internal cohesion in this coalition supporting the government. In many cases, even when a great number of parties is formally linked to the president, the substantial support to his political plans depend on the chose of benefits distribution strategies.

Political parties seem not to be the main political actors in the Brazilian government. Unlike the parties, seeking a formal constitution to promote comprehensive thoughts and ideals in politics, some parliamentary countertops and fronts, with a greater degree of informality in order to protect specific interests – as religious doctrines, professional or business categories, environmentalists thoughts or minority groups politically organized, among others. There is one objective criterion used to differentiate a parliamentary countertop to a front. A countertop becomes a parliamentary front when it obtains at least one third of parliamentary federal legislature – considering the Brazilian Senate and House of Representatives.[28] Anyway, both forms of political organization have suprapartisanship nature and have performed with high efficiency in the implementation of their political programs and especially the preservation of their interests.

In this context, some disputes can be analyzed in support of this idea. Two of most significant political defeats in the Dilma Rousseff government, the distribution of oil royalties and the New Forest Code (Novo Código Florestal), are regarding to parliamentary fronts.[29] In both cases, presidential vetoes were overturned by Congress. This requires an absolute majority of the Legislature and, in these differences between the Presidency and Congress, the political parties were not protagonists. In the oil royalties case, three Brazilian states would be deeply harmed – Rio de Janeiro, Espírito Santo, and São Paulo. The harm is associated to an opening of the royalties obtained from oil companies distribution to non-productive states, without respect contracts already concluded in productive states. In New Forest Code case, the discussions were intensely locked inside the Congress, in which are represented groups of antagonistic interests. Among Brazilian suprapartisan structures, there are the rural front, composed by representatives of agriculture, livestock, extraction and landed speculation interests, particularly in the North and Midwest of Country, and the environmental front, focused on the preservation of the main Brazilian ecosystems, including the Amazon Forest – situated in the North and Midwest of Country. When finally both groups signed an agreement, the Presidency initiated a series of changes to the details of the codification. The reaction was an overturn of all modification terms by Congress.

[29] Regarding to the modification of the oil royalties sharing system, the Law Project (Projeto de Lei) No. 2.565/11 aimed to redistribute them more evenly between producing and non-producing states. President Dilma Rousseff have tried to veto one hundred forty two devices of this bill, with the goal of preserving the contracts already signed by the producer states and local governments to compensate for environmental damage . This resulted in the overthrow of presidential vetoes by a majority of Congress. Regarding to the New Forest Code, Law (Lei Federal) No. 12.651/2012, vetoes and amendments were promoted by President Dilma Rousseff, which significantly altered its content. The National Congress, before the intervention of the Executive rejected the vetoes of the presidency.

Between these two recent major controversies involving the Presidency and Congress, although the first case is not a strong example of political dynamics around the stands and parliamentary fronts, the second depicts clearly the form of your organization and its activities. In the case of distribution of oil royalties, the formal support of the coalition parties was dropped to meet the interests of an economic nature. Likewise, the case has not been defined as a matter of party ideology. The case of the New Forest Code illustrates even more clearly how suprapartisan organizations articulate in Congress and, depending on the interests at stake, can disregard the will of the political party or coalition that their parliamentarians they are affiliated.

The Brazilian political context makes difficult the analyses of government through a divided or unified logic. This difficulty in dividing and unifying more rigorously derived from the difficulty of the Brazilian political system based around the political parties. American politics can be defined as a "separation of parties, not powers", characterized by a party-based competition or by a party-based cooperation. In contrary, Brazilian design can not understood safely within political parties. Competition and cooperation therefore depend on more determinant variables in the Brazilian design. The difficulty of conceive the Brazilian institutional reality as a party-based model is related to the following problems over its party system: (i) fragmentation in thirty two parties, some of them without representation in Congress, with, in general, (ii) a low institutionalization and (iii) a fragile ideology, exemplified by cases of "party loyalty", and (iv) a strong succession of parties. Despite this problem, Brazil has a peculiar way of organizing around specific themes. In this sense, some suprapartisan organizations performance can be most successful than political parties. The thematic limitations of parliamentary countertops and fronts, however, does not allow us to affirm that Brazilian policy can be strictly based on these forms of organization, but remains enhanced the difficulty of establishing whether the government is divided or unified.

3.2 The Brazilian constitutional design and the Executive own-bounded

The American institutional theory holds that the Executive is often a department standing out in the modern administrative state. According to the Framers' understand, the role of Executive branch is merely apply the content of laws, drawn up by a powerful department that could oppress the rights and freedoms of citizens and therefore should work from a bicameral structure. This Madisonian perspective, in which Legislative concentrates power, while Executive just is submitted to the legal control and the oversight of other branches, seems to be overcome. Not only against Madison relies the current critics, but also against a pool of theorists who believe in the potential of the rule of law and separation of powers to constrain the Executive named by Posner and Vermeule as liberal legalists.

The American administrative state presents some political circumstances in which the growth of Executive branch can be real. Given the low potential of control within the legal instruments, the Presidency can use their resources to anticipate critical situations that facilitate the expansion of its prerogatives and thus invest in the conquer of popular support and trust before govern officials. The Brazilian constitutional design may correspond to determined aspects of The Executive Unbound's argument, but it is necessary to verify to what extent the institutional reality of this particular Executive allows its expansion.

The 1988's Constitution of the Federative Republic of Brazil (Constituição da República Federativa do BRasil de 1988 – CRFB/88) allows the edition of Provisional Measures by the president[30]. Provisional Measures are general and abstract rules, legally founded by "urgency" and "relevant issue", applied as Legislative acts throughout the national territory. In fact, less urgency in relevant areas could be observed than actually Provisional Measures edited. These two legal requirements settled for its edition is typically liberal legalists. Regarding than, the Brazilian Supreme Court adopts a firm understanding that only fits the Executive define the meaning of these terms.[31]

[30] According to CRFB/88: "Article 62. In case of relevance and urgency, the President may adopt provisional measures with the force of law and shall submit them immediately to Congress. […]" (free translate)

[31] ADI No 2.150/DF, STF, Plenarium, Related by Ilmar Galvão, Judgment at September, 11, 2002.

Moreover, the approval of Provisional Measures without attempt to its legal requirements – urgency and relevant issue – by the Congress is not usually a difficulty faced by president. The Congress is competent for approve Provisional Measures, but it it has no institutional capacity enough to discuss the issues raised in these executive orders. Since only the Executive structure can mobilize adequate institutional capacity to take initiative in highly technical and complex issues, the approval by Congress ends up becoming the rule.

Likewise, legal limitations do not lead the Judiciary to repress this instrument of Executive. In an emblematic case, the Supreme Court analyzed the constitutionality of a Provisional Measure converted into law by Congress responsible for creating the Chico Mendes Institute for Biodiversity Conservation (Instituto Chico Mendes de Conservação da Biodiversidade – ICMBio)[32]. The Provisional Measure was passed by the Legislature containing constitutional formal vice because certain stages of the proceeding had not been regularly attempt. On the first day of voting, the majority of the Court had already pronounced – in a live television transmission. On the second day, however, an office holder similar to the General Attorney (Advogado Geral da União – AGU)) announced that about five hundred Provisional Measures were approved by the same rite. The outcome of the trial was unanimous by the invalidity of the procedure, but only from that decision. The measure adopted by the Judiciary after the production of five hundred unconstitutional rules was mere co-validation of the acts.

The Brazilian Executive used Provisional Measures in even more clearly unconstitutional situations. According to CRFB/88, this instrument would not be able to deal with matters relating to budgets and additional and supplementary credits, except to meet urgent and unforeseen expenses, such as those resulting from war, internal commotion or public calamity. This reinforces the assertion that Provisional Measures are actually observed more than times of crisis. In recent years, no serious exceptional occurrence reached national proportions, but Executive still appealed to the Provisional Measures to open additional or extraordinary credits[33]. Only in the year 2012, twenty nine billions in the Brazilian current monetary unity (Real – R$) were opened in additional or extraordinary credits by Provisional Measures[34]. The exceptional criteria authorizing the opening of additional and extraordinary credits have not been met by the Executive. Thus, the Executive can take ownership of significant financial resources, often applying them so quickly that no action can be implemented by other branches.[35]

The way Provisional Measures are edited is an evidence of the legal constraints fails in Brazilian political reality. Executive violate constitutional rules, the Provisional Measures are approved by Congress and the Judiciary don't offer a significant suppression. The fundamentals of urgency and relevant issue for edition, the ones approved with constitutional formal vices and unlawful opening additional or extraordinary credits can illustrate how the presidency can overcome liberal legalist instruments of constraint. Neither the legal limitation of control nor the interbranch inspection defended by madisonianas could successfully difficult the Brazilian Executive in pursuit its governmental interests.

In The Executive Unbound, Posner and Vermeule, after presenting the fallacies of liberal legalism, argue that factors such as the electoral and party systems, as well as political culture, would be better able to control the Executive.[36] In Brazil, where most of the laws that make up the rule of law are proposed by the Executive itself, the expectation of control becomes even smaller.[37] This context thus suggests that the Bra-

[36] "Our argument is simple: the system of elections, the party system, and American Political Culture constrain the executive far more than do legal rules created by Congress or the courts; and although politics hardly guarantees that the executive will always act in the public interest, politics at least limits the scope for executive abuses". [37] There is a regular predominance of the Executive in the Brazilian legislative activity. In addition to the Provisional Measures, whose percentage of conversion in Law by Congress nears 85%, about 80% of approved legislative initiatives are proposed by the zilian Executive has a considerable tendency to expand, which would require greater political control and public monitoring on its activity.

Public opinion, while a mobile of popularity, despite all the terminological vagueness and methodological problems encountered in their conceptualizations, seemed to be asleep in Brazil. At least until middle of 2013, the elements most closely this notion of public control of the government, as endowed with activism, was the means of media and even social networks. There wasn't, in Brazil, spokespersons mobilizing the community and leading to pressure or responsible public authorities. As an example, significant popular movements of our short democratic experience, such as those disseminated as "Direct Now" (Diretas Já) – defending direct elections in the end of dictatorship regime – and as "Painted Faces" (Caras Pintadas) – requiring the impeachment of President Fernando Collor –, were induced by means of media and promoted by artistic and musical events and celebrities, More recently, a significant movement occurred along the oil royalties controversies with initiatives of State Government of Rio de Janeiro – than, it is not a properly popular movement.

One effective factor in the American administrative state seems not hold the same potential in Brazil. Recent events, however, may suggest a possible change in this scenario. From June of 2013, the population, public authorities, national and international press were surprised by the magnitude of events that unfolded in the main cities of the country a wave of daily protests occupied the main urban roads in capitals and Brazilian metropolitan regions. The movements attacked municipal, provincial, and federal public entities of Executive and Legislative – at times, smashing them too.

The curious wave of protests erupted in middle of 2013 causing perplexity and many observers expect this to have been a landmark in the political consciousness of a population hitherto latent. The media and the social networks try to entitle this turn of events as "Brazilian spring", "wake up Brazil", and "come to street", among others. The Executive. Moreover, the Brazilian Executive has a remarkable participation in processes of formal constitutional change and proposed about one third of approved projects in general, including four of the six most significant reforms regarding the matter and amount of changes in the constitutional text. See SEPULVEDA, Antonio, Carlos BOLONHA, Henrique RANGEL, Igor de LAZARI, and Roberto KAYAT. The Path of Brazilian Convenient Branches: The Executive Supremacy. University of Maryland Schmooze "Tickets", No. 166, 2013. popularity may indeed be crucial to the constraint exerted against the Executive – as well as against any institution or public authority. It remains for the Brazilian case wait and see if this democratic experiment will result in the civic maturity of the population and make the protests a repeated practice of our public culture. Only in this way the prospect of an active public opinion forcing the accountability of agents as the president would be compatible with the Brazilian political and institutional context.

In turn, the policy as an expression of credibility seems to be an effective means of control of the Brazilian Executive model. A distinction should be made at this time, dating back to the party system adopted in each country. As already mentioned, some party problems in the Brazilian coalitions systematic hinders to rate government as divided or unified. In unified governments, there is less tendency to political control compared with divided. The Brazilian political reality shaped by a multipartisan organization in the form of irregular and unstable coalitions and the presence of suparpartisanship actors, however, requires other means of evaluation of its potential for control of the Executive.

Brazil's recent democratic history provides an example of changing the political scenario that helps the understanding of how the Executive can be controlled. A strong political transition in Brazil was observed with the outcome of the 2002 elections. In previous years, a party of liberal economic orientation, the Brazilian Social Democracy Party (Partido da Social Democracia Brasileira – PSDB) occupied the presidency, but the loss of credibility and popularity led to his defeat for a party of interventional guidance, the Workers Party (Partido dos Trabalhadores – PT).

The PSDB government was marked by a strong concentration in the distribution of political benefits. The presidency was primarily focused on satisfying the interests of his party and others whose economic orientation was compatible with his. The parties seen as opposing the government formed a minority coalition and his attempts to negotiate with the government were constantly frustrated. The result of this political orientation of the PSDB government has a credibility deficit in Congress and when the popularity ratings of the Presidency at the end of the second term of Fernando Henrique Cardoso (FHC), reached a low expressiveness, the team led by Luis Inácio Lula da Silva (Lula) opposition was successful in elections. The new presidency was conscious of the need to collect credibility within the Congress and decided to adopt a strategy of decentralized distribution of political benefits. The first expressive measures adopted by this interventionist government had a concession character, like a constitutional reform on the social security in the manner desired by the opposition.[38]

The concentration mode of political benefits distribution is associated to a particular goal of the government. When the government focuses this distribution between the parties of its coalition, the result is an increase in the internal cohesion of the organization (coalescence). In this case, president increase its levels of governance. This was the intention of the PSDB government. The period of their term corresponds to the time in which the Executive participated in most processes of constitutional reforms. Thus, there was enough support for approve measures of simple majority, but also to implement supermajorities plans. The current government of PT also has a high margin of governance instruments when considered simple majority, but increasingly invests less in initiatives to amend the constitution. Rather, this party is characterized by decentralized way of distributing political benefits. While the concentration of such benefits entails increased governance, as inversely proportional, the opposite occurs with the political stability of the president.

The prospect of embarrassment Executive through politics relates to the degree of concentration of the political benefits distribution. With a political party system characterized by fragmentation, which defines a more or less robust support in Congress is the political strategy adopted by the presidency. This factor suggests that Executive control is not rigorous. It depends on the behavior adopted by the president. In theory, with enough popularity and regular trading, the prospect of contention is reduced but the benefits devolve to approach the opposition gets their own dissatisfied coalition, affecting their governance as well as its credibility. The coalition and the presidency can distances easily. This confirms that the politics may be, also in Brazil, one able factor to control the Executive, although this depends on for the most part the political strategy adopted by him.

Despite a still uncertain potential of control the Executive by the Brazilian public opinion and its recent events, politics can still exercise determined constraint. The Brazilian Executive, as well as the American one, seems not to be subject to legal limitations, such as the liberal legalists doctrines defend. In turn, the factors that in principle exert this control in the modern administrative state seem certain weakening compared to American reality. In this sense, one could ask whether the Brazilian Executive would not be truly "unbound". To do so, however, it is necessary to check its own potential for expansion.

The Executive is in fact composed of specialized agencies and has a numeric body of administrative staff that puts you ahead of the other branches of government. Meanwhile, the exorbitant cost of maintenance an administrative machine of great proportions in an emerging society and a technical-specialized qualification restricted to only a few strategic institutions seem to characterize the Brazilian Federal Executive. The capacity of the Brazilian Executive to maintain its prominent position requires a structure whose maintenance seems to have escaped the control of the Executive itself.

During the financial meltdown in 2008 started in America and diffused to whole world, Brazil has tried to sustain a strong stance on the international scene. Brazil is a Country with high taxes. Approximately 36% of the Brazilian Gross Domestic Product (GDP) is composed of tax collection and this explains the reason for the Executive strategically invest in the institutional strengthening of the Federal Revenue Service (Secretaria da Receita Federal – RFB).[39] In addition, the Brazilian government does not usually engage in economic investments of exceptional expenses or costly military maneuvers. The most expensive investments in the country tend to be led by the private sector, like the commodity and oil markets. These factors indicate how Brazil has a large collection, but like most of their resources are not directed at economic nature programs, the financial crisis can be overcome with relative safety.

Brazil, especially from the PT government with social and economic "interventionist" orientation, has expensive commitments on social programs. As examples, Brazil has the Unique Health System (Sistema Único de Saúde – SUS) that, despite having numerous problems, structure the provision of their services by the criteria of comprehensiveness and universality, i.e., every sickness may have your treatment, at least in theory, fully funded by the government, regardless of the methods or techniques are. Moreover, there are different programs for income distribution and poverty alleviation in the Country. The most significant of these is the "Family Grant" (Bolsa Familia) which in 2012 was responsible for the implementation of two hundred forty-eight billion reais.[40]

Apart from spending on social programs maintained by the PT government, the Brazilian government has a costly institutional structure. The maintenance cost of the Brazilian Congress, i.e., is target of immorality and administrative misconduct accusations. The Brazilian Federal Legislature consists of the House of Representatives (Câmara dos Deputados), with five hundred thirteen Federal Deputies (Deputados Federais) and the Federal Senate (Senado Federal), eighty-one Republic Senators. The annual cost of each Federal Deputie reaches the amount of approximately six million six hundred thousand reais.[41] The annual cost of a Republic Senator reaches thirty three million one hundred thousand reais.[42]

Based on these examples, it is possible to analyze how the Brazilian Executive, despite its large collection, has problems in its administration. Legal constraints, according to the thesis of The Executive Unbound, are insufficient on the administrative state. Particularly in Brazil, public opinion and political factors are not responsible for the effective control of the Executive. Although these political circumstances suggest that the Brazilian Executive became a true "unbound", the institutional reality within this design indicates that its main constraints can be associated to its own performance. The cost of social programs and the Brazilian institutional framework hampers the public administration and, even with the high levels of tax, the government observes a significant restraint on his economic and financial resources. Moreover, technological, scientific, and informational investiments and resources in the Brazilian structure can't be compared to the American standards. There is not, in Brazil, a great commitment of economic and financial resources of government in infrastructure, research and technology, which can be implemented to rise the institutional capacities of its agencies, except for those more strategic to the governmental structure – as the Revenue Service. As much as the Brazilian political reality does not present a substantial expectation of Executive control, in liberal legalism parameter or post-madisonian one, political and institutional realities present the Brazilian government not as an example of "unbound" Executive but an Executive "own-bounded".

4. Conclusion

The traditional perspective over separation of powers has suffered severe criticism of an institutional nature in recent years. Currently, the issue is "was Madison's original understand overcome?" The madisonianism defends the separate of powers based on ideas such as the "ambitions" and the mutual oversight. Some problems can be pointed out in this traditional perspective and the institutional theory created an alternative model: the post-madisonianism. This more realistic perspective over the separation of powers is based on some ideas as the dividing and unifying government and the Executive growth in the modern administrative state.

Firstly, Levinson and Pildes were responsible for defending the branches operating on the basis of partisan orientations, with the possibility of the scenario of political competition be replaced by cooperation if the government stayed characterized by unification. Second, Posner and Vermeule argued that the rule of law and separation of powers, with the legal instruments of control and supervision, would not be able to contain the advances of the Executive in the modern administrative state, at least not with the popularity and credibility efficiency. These two contributions can aid to portray the moder administrative state as the Leviathan Executive. Contemporaneously, there is not a strong govern, concentrating power against the citizens, but an increasing of Executive in unified governments and with the twin problems of emergency and delegation.

Considering these notes, constructed from the American democratic experience, this paper aims to examine whether such post-madisonianos arguments would be compatible with the Brazilian political and institutional realities. Thus, as a conclusion of this research, it can be argued that such arguments allow us to better understand the Brazilian constitutional design and the way its main institutions interact, but cannot characterize precisely the Brazilian government.

The prospect of "separation of parties, not powers" does not look compatible with the Brazilian political reality due to at least one particular problem: the difficulty in conceiving the government in Brazil as divided or unified. This difficulty occurs due to two key reasons.

On the one hand, the Brazilian party system has serious problems that hinder this analysis as divided or unified government, such as: (i) fragmentation in thirty two political parties, seven of them even with representation in Congress – besides two newly registered –, in general, (ii) with a low institutionalization and (iii) a weak ideology, exemplified by the practices of party disloyalty and in addition (iv) a strong succession of parties that exacerbates the problems above.

On the other hand, this difficulty is deepened by the presence of suprapartisan organizations in Congress achieving high cohesion compared to parties and coalitions. The successful performance of parliamentary countertops and fronts reinforces the argument that, in Brazil, competition and cooperation policies can not be reliably understood according to a partisan analysis. However, the informality, the limitations on the structure and especially the strictly specialized nature of these forms of suprapartisan organization prevents to relies on them to establish the division or unification of the government.

The thesis defended in The Executive Unbound, to establish the impossibility of limiting the Executive through purely legal instruments according to the modern administrative state, seems perfectly compatible with the Brazilian political and institutional realities. The post-madisonian argument that politics and public opinion are able to constrain the presidency, however, needs some consideration about the Brazilian realities, without implying in an Executive absolutely "unbound".

Firstly, the use of Provisional Measures by the Brazilian Executive disregarding constitutional rules illustrates the fail of liberal legalism. Provisional Measures represent a strong de jure power available to the presidency. What is striking, however, is the way its normative constraints are not met by the Executive and his edition is approved by Congress, without any significant suppression observed even by the Brazilian Supreme Court. Examples of abuse suffered by the presidency not control or supervision, may indicate: (i) failure to comply with the legal requirements of "urgency" and "relevant issue" in regard to his edition, (ii) the validation of more than five hundred Provisional Measures in a single trial, approved with constitutional formal vice, and (iii) the opening of twenty nine billion reais without observing the legal requirements on the CRFB/88.

Despite the failure of liberal legalism in an attempt to control the Executive through legal instruments, in the administrative state it could be constrained by public opinion and politics. This seems like a perfectly compatible with the American reality, but the Brazilian political context provides evidence of some weakening of such factors. The public pressure for public authorities monitoring and accountability is not characteristics of Brazilian political culture. As for public opinion, disregarding terminological inaccuracies and methodological problems, though all effects that have presently achieved, it would be hasty to recognize it as a secure means of restricting the Brazilian Executive. The embarrassment of the Executive through politics, in turn, depends on the strategy adopted by the government on the distribution of political benefits. The importance of this political strategy is associated with Brazilian party problems and the presence of suprapartisan organizations in Congress, making difficult to maintain regular and substantial the support from his own coalition. The exercise of political control against Executive largely depends on their success in the distribution of such benefits. In theory, the control can be reduced by a decentralization in this distribution, but in Brazilian political context, this also results in a strong loss of credibility within his coalition. With this, politics and all its caveats preserves given potential and, in fact, requires the president to compromise and negotiate some concerns.

Being insufficient legal instruments advocated by liberal legalism and being post-madisonianos factors relatively weak, one might ask if Brazilian government could be an example of "unbound". Otherwise, the Brazilian institutional reality shows as the Executive is constrained by issues related to its own structure. Brazil is characterized as a country with high tax revenues, not applying resources in an extraordinary way on significant developments or military maneuvers. However, much of its limitation is the lack of financial resources due to the cost required to maintain social programs and to sustain excessive – for many, immoral – spending on certain governmental entities, such as the Congress. With costs of such magnitude, invest in institutional capacity of the Executive becomes something restricted to a set of strategic institutions, such as that responsible for tax collection. Reasons such as these allow permit, even before the fragile containment factors, both madisonian and post-madisonian, the Brazilian case exemplifies an Executive "own-bounded".

In summary, such post-madisonians references are not fully compatible with Brazilian political and institutional realities, because of the difficulty, in Brazil, to rate government as divided or unified, and because of a partial fitness of public opinion and political to control an Executive "own-bounded".

Neoliberal hegemony versus social Justice

Natalia Pais Álvarez, PhD[1]

Abstract: It is possible that the hegemony constitutes the finished shape, the closing of the rational paradigm in the 20th century, and that from it we have met doomed to this period of disturbances, chaos, uncertainty, a sort of tedium. Already we cannot think the power from the old devices with which the privileged classes or the capital perpetuated its domination. The analyses that were uncovering the alienation, the oppression and the mystification (XIX and XXth) and were giving content to the dialectical draft owner - slave would finish with the relation, already they do not serve us; the question is that the destruction of the social links based on the domain already has taken place: it has been realized technically by means of the virtual emancipation (generalization of the exchange, reconciliation of opposite with the assumption of the Human rights…). The position of the owner is internalized on the part of the emancipated slave and there is solved quite in a paradox that, according to Baudrillard, he supposes the total liberation, the resolution of the conflicts and the free disposition of one itself they have led us to submitting us to the world hegemonic order.

Keywords: neoliberal hegemony, oppression, Justice

"It is a world in which the experienced events have become independent of the man (...)
It is a world of the future, the world of what happens without that happening to anyone, and no one is responsible."
(Bouvresse)

Talking about a concept like hegemony in a time marked by the discourse of the scientific-technical performativity at the market service, involves the risk that it could be read as an infertile abstraction against a conspirator and invisible faceless entity.

[1] University of La Laguna (ULL), Spain.

Precisely for this reason, what concerns us here is reveal them in the pursuit of the substrate of discourses and alternative/alterative practices to help overcome the historical conditions that have made it possible in the neoliberal and triumphant order on the capitalist world-system stage.

Antonio Gramsci had already established the distinction between domination and hegemony, so the domain would be crossed by a political dimension, which, in times of crisis can get to make use of coercion, while hegemony refers to an ideological-cultural and non coercive dimension, although it also involved political and social forces.

Gramsci will consider the need to traverse economist dimension of hegemony and gives great weight to ideology, that it will be a privilege engine to rethink policy as an authentic redemptive strategy for the conformation of social transformation subjectivities.

The connotation of domination, of prominence, vertical cutting, is clear and the objective of socialism exposed is governed by antagonism. The "normal" execution of hegemony in what has become the classic field of parliamentary regime is characterized by a balanced combination of strength and consensus. Strength does not overcome, but appears to be supported by the consensus of the majority, expressed by the so called organs of public opinion (which therefore, on certain occasions, are artificially increased).

Between consensus and strength, is the corruption-fraud (which is characteristic of certain situations which make it difficult to execute hegemony, in which the use of strength presents too many dangers). In other words, Gramsci purports that corruption-fraud provokes weakness and paralysis in the antagonists (123-124).

Hegemony as leadership arises, as an influence, not as domination, to the extent that is not imposed by force. It also posits the impossibility of a social order derivative of an absolute consensus. The dominance results in an imposition by force of a political-economic and social order, while hegemony, however, arises from the formula of consensus, although the strength can be used at times when it is impossible to reach it.

Now, it is not participatory and decisive consensus but, therein the problem lies, is considered democratic only insofar as it implies the absence of authoritarianism. And this returns not only dangerous reading of the concept of democracy, but that challenges Fukuyama's proclamation that we are witnessing the end of last metanarrative: the final Consensus, absolute order, absence of conflict or virtual empire of good. Are these indicators of a perception of reality that has lost its sense of itself, a virtual reality that defines our historical time: a false "order", "consensus" and "good" that overrides all resistance as simultaneously blurs the faces of what could be susceptible to reluctance.

And this, curiously in a postmodern scene inaugurated by the proclaimed death of the metanarratives in the era of mass media communication ecstasy. During this era, paradoxically perhaps the only metanarrative that has pervaded is that of "the metanarrative evil". We must not forget that the twentieth century, the postmodern century, which saw the expansion of the democratic regimes and the right of intervention in the name of democracy, the Universal Declaration of Human rights, and the emergence of pacifist movements, remains to be the same century of wars, terrorism and gratuitous horror. It seems pertinent to highlight here Marta Giacaglia's definition of hegemony:

> The achievement of moral, intellectual and political leadership through the expansion of a discourse that offers a partial meaning around nodal points. It comprises more than a passive consensus and legitimate actions: it involves the expansion of a particular set of rules, values and positions by persuasively "re-describing" the world (155).

These brands of hegemony are real symbols of our time. And this new symbology dethrones the old and certain concepts or representations we used to read the world, including politics. In fact, this hegemony is based on a fundamental principle of deregulation of meanings and references. Displays, in what Baudrillard calls the "ecstasy of communication" (Foster 193), just a series of signifiers promiscuous, desecrated, uninhibited, without regard where the community has no place, and subjects-seduced-fascinated diluted rolled back and are engrossed to withdraw in their particular symbolic universes.

Reality acquires meaning through a common screen where commonality is not possible: loneliness is the ultimate wake of meaningless hegemony. Nothing that is not part of the scene can be real and thus witnessing the beginning of the story of a fictionalized unreality, des-semanticized, that makes invisible the inhabitants of a reality that, after being touched by hegemonic signifiers, no one wants to dwell. So the hegemony proposes a symbolic challenge, makes invisible to those living in reality and creates a "not virtualized yet" people desire to make the big jump to the scene of order and consensus, where there are no antagonisms, negating any form of reaction reducibility question u option globalized world system.

Precisely, that hegemony with a "democratic" mask, which accommodates an alleged plurality, is what has made it possible the end of the domain, because, among other reasons, of the absence of the "authoritarian mark" and has served as strategy in the pulse between antagonisms, annihilating them.

Public opinion now made these diluted-seduced-fascinated subjects, has made, of the capitalist hegemony, a cultural practice, an awareness, a sense of life, a way of living. Public opinion, which is no more than the new translation of the old proletariat which Gramsci said would have to aspire to occupy the political-economic-social place of the bourgeoisie.

The question is, what are the historical and philosophical constraints that have shaped this as a permanent entity we have called hegemony? We have seen that deterioration at breakneck speed in the last quarter century with the exacerbation of neoliberalism as economic theory and beyond, as an ideology and doctrine of globalization, which envisioned a self-regulating and self-regulating system where free markets conjugated in direct proportionality with greater progress and greater freedom for the subjects (individuals).

Given that this market preeminence has led to globalization is a vital global sense governed by economic laws, to this new idea-force, States are left without arguments and reveal inefficient.

I use the term globalisation, despite Chomsky's warning which I completely agree with. I have not found a substitute which better encompasses the concept I wish to convey. Chomsky tweeted on February 14th 2013 that "Globalisation is a term of propaganda and we should never use it".

The very concepts of market logic move into the political assessment, appearing then the United deficient or unworkable. These succumb seeking their upgrading in the new rationality they understand powerful. So, with the delegation of business understanding them as improper (the distance between either pure, or mixed private good dissolves becoming everything in private good), ends in their basic duties (Education, Health, Social Welfare, Justice, etc.)

We live today another debacle and explanations to this global crisis offered by the economic arms of global State -International Monetary Fund (IMF), World Bank (WB), World Trade Organization (WTO), the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), United Nations Organization (UN)-, together with the brains of the overall state cabinet-the Group of Seven (G-7)- have been childish, laughable and propaganda.

But the truth is that the progression of the crisis will destroy the propaganda and exposing the inadequacy of explanations while discovering the chaotic nature of the global capitalist system and goes putting faces to those responsible of the chaos.

The real reasons for the crisis basically come from a translocation occurred in the global hegemony of the bourgeoisie. Until the end of the seventies it was a dictatorship of productive capital (Keynesianism).

Such restructuring is, in fact, the establishment of new rules of the game. Thus, what it has been called neo-liberalism is not, as suggested by Chomsky, nor "new" nor "liberalism".

This is a conceptual re-semantization of a process facilitated by the corporate elites who held the transnational domain of the capital, with the complicity of media and political legitimacy of the imperial triad, which have resized their position in the great world system board following the strategy of "throw away the ladder with a kick: first we break the rules to climb to the top, then we kicked the ladder so that others can not follow and proclaim justifiably indignant: "play fair and equal" (Esperanzas y realidades 99) inspired by the maxim according to which the aim of matching is reduced to the distribution of risks and costs: the benefits are not distributed (socialization of costs and privatization of profits). The law of the funnel, as Chomsky points out.

Countries grow with protectionist measures and once they gain a favorable position in the marketplace, encourage free trade and prevent other countries from competing on equal terms. Chomsky says: "while protectionism and state violence benefited greatly to England and the United States, and the rich industrial countries in general, liberalization imposed by the imperial powers created, to some extent, the Third World" ("Poder en el escenario global" 236). He clarifies that really it has nothing to do with neo-liberalism seeing as the strategy followed by the US is the same as that which imperial England used during the colonisation: protectionism in the first growth period, liberalism to maintain its dominant position as a super power.

The US did not forge a new path. On the contrary, it followed the footsteps of England, its predecessor as super power. In 1846, England finally adopted a liberal agenda after more than a century of intense protectionism and state intervention. Such protectionism, Chomsky purports, was far from cutting edge, to the extent that competition seemed relatively safe.

On the other hand, these initial protectionist measures which super powers have adopted are not only applied to their country, but transcend the "official" borders. They draw imaginary economic borders which extend as far as their own interests, which are appropriated by means of discourses which contradict the liberal doctrine. A clear example are the declarations of George Kennan (16th August 1954, in the National Security Council 5432) where he urged the "protection of our raw materials", referring to Latin America. Chomsky ironically observes how what is referred to as "our" raw materials, just so happens to be found in a completely different place ("Poder en el escenario global" 236-37).

That inveterate mechanics and interventionist welfare state would be replaced by the state small and expendable, because everything would be in the hands of the "virtuous market". Recall, for example, the words of Anthony Lake (National Security Adviser) when presenting the Clinton Doctrine, announced this new world opening in front of us, presenting "immense opportunities to get to consolidate the victory of democracy and open markets", only the logic and purposes of that market were ascribed more to a vicious circle to a virtuous one.

They shifted the axis of productivity to financial speculation, were made with the management of the world irrespective of any criteria of justice or fairness. Yes, succeeded in forecasting precarious state. What in the thoughtful analysis, Liliana Buschiazzo would say today the state as the main victim of the market and how we have become the Republican utopia to the dictates of the market:

> The state of the new millennium is not missing or perhaps weakened. The new state is under construction: it is a state that has caved in certain fundamental obligations (education, health, research, culture) but was strengthened in others (security, surveillance, repression). (9)

Multilateral agencies increase gradually their power of action and decision on developing scenarios. The UNDP (United Nations Development Programme), IDB (Inter-American Development Bank), the IMF (International Monetary Fund), the OAS (Organization of American States), ECLAC (Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean), WB (World Bank), among others, emerge as authentic references (some as authors, others as recipients) of new economic guidelines to be adopted, and it seems clear that this process has advanced sponsored packages of measures within the neoliberal structural adjustment program, which in any case is focused on the structural solution of poverty, but as a policy patch containing numerous contradictions sui generis and that reverses in an attempt to cut costs and public spending in a process of making a market of the public, including education.

In fact, this is a process of international order, through which they have tried to make public education in to a business. Due to this, according to his notes, in 1998 the WTO (World Trade Organisation) decided to make education one of the twelve services to be transformed in to commercial goods and had to be incorporated in to in to an international fair trade agreement. Consequently education had to be completely privatised in every sense.

We would therefore need to ask ourselves, first, an analysis of the strategies employed by organizations such as the World Bank as one of the visible arms of a project that seeks to limit public policies through privatization and public spending cuts. In fact too many arguments that would lead us to question these agencies and international development, including this one, although this should not be read, following Coraggio thesis, an analysis that denies the contributions of these organisms from positions that could be considered conspiracy.

In his speech questions the effectiveness of the measures the World Bank adopted for Latin America exposes some of its theoretical and practical weaknesses (n. pag.) Simply, we will just try to show, according to this author, some structural weaknesses.

First, we find that the WB is a self-legitimized body based on questionable validity criteria. The first is its undemocratic nature: its members are not elected (are elected by their peers, but can not speak of universal suffrage, representative democracy and, of course, participatory). Moreover, the WB works as the banking cooperative that it is, and the number of participants per country depends on these financial contributions to the institution, and this is an important fact to the extent that obviously weakens the legitimacy of their recommendations and makes suspect the possibility of interest that we are exposed to the public openly.

The question is also on this point, who are the beneficiaries of particular interests, that is, who serve their recommendations and if really the countries for which these packets have poured effectively demanding requirements of a group of organisms and unelected people from a democratic procedure.

Finally, it should be noted that social policies which seeks to develop the WB are based on strictly economic criteria, are technical proposals at a time when neopositivism triumphs, where as we believe rightly suggests Samoff:

> Is regard economics as the social science that has the important practical consequences because it handles the money and the power of money defines the sense of wellbeing. No wonder the notion of development is understood particularly as economic growth (Torres 173-74).

These organisms are based on the link between development and economic growth, but in many cases, the packages offered do not consider real economic contexts of the countries for which the prescription is prescribed, nor the fact that these are measures targeted and subsidiaries. But we can not read some perversion of the strategy, while income systemically favors (the object of capitalist accumulation of income, not the development of labor), the proposed measures for developing countries translate into the formation of labor in the service of the rentiers. In any case it seems load real equity intention or actual modification capitalist world system.

When, for example, the WB recommends investment in primary education, when economic grants loans to countries to launch your project, no guarantees, simultaneously, the results are to be expected. But when they fail, as has happened on numerous occasions, for example in Latin America, not assumes the relevant responsibilities: recognize the error should induce them to write off the debt incurred by some countries that do not knock on their door. When they fail, as has happened on numerous occasions, questioned how countries have implemented their project or only recognize they made a mistake. But those interests are to continue to be paid. In fact, Carlos Torres makes clear that the World Bank is not an agency grants, but loans, there is nothing to indicate that it is altruistic project, while as Bank makes profits (through tax interest) of its loans.

This would lead to a first inquiry regarding the actual purpose of such agencies. Also, as noted by this author, another aspect of the lending policy of the Bank is that it is "pro-active and not re-active", ie, "very often initiates contact Bank for the design of a loan specific contacts that reflect the link between knowledge and expertise on the one hand, and the budgets of funding on the other".

Carlos Alberto Torres suggests that these errors are the fruit of programmes that in many cases been exposed inadequate, especially with respects to their analysis of primary education. Amongst other factors, this is the result of the World Bank "experts"' naive beliefs that on finishing their studies, children living in poverty will be able to compete in a globalised labour market (Torres 174).

It also seems quite naive to think that they actually can not apply for higher paying jobs, could be used in countries with high unemployment rates. Palliative training for a global society that has no where humans occupy these assets. The WB offers solutions within frameworks of little or no operation: labor supply has also been globalized, so that only those who are willing actual mobility can access certain posts, and arguably even more: it is naive to project the link training / employability without providing simultaneously offer / mobility, at least not if you want that employability meets the minimum requirements that won't motivate employees to job insecurity (if indeed it comes to getting a job) that threatens fundamental human rights.

We can not talk about quality of life or well-being when an employee is forced to choose between no employment or precarious employment, when carried to countries whose languages ignored (in fact just have been taught through the Primary) in letters organized, although statistically the challenge of poverty reduction is met; somehow chosen mobility is a privilege, the forced, a fact which indicates the success of a particular economic and educational policy.

Propose job promotion in a globalized market and primary education as a means to reduce poverty is to condemn those who have an unfavorable starting point. The World Bank proposes, as we see, solutions (training) are not geared focused even call into question, to resolve structural errors in the system.

Coraggio is very strong at this point, when he says:

> The slogan of success, for individuals, social sectors and countries, is not cooperation and solidarity, but success in competition with others. Being competitive means being able to pass the tests posed by the market, responding quickly and efficiently to your changes. Nationwide, warned of the danger of achieving competitiveness just perverse short-term, based on the degradation of the value > of labor, the environment and quality of life, it is specified that competitiveness should be "authentic", sustainable and based on Investments in human capital (5).

And here we must expose the fallacy of the neoliberal thesis, according to which the market is a cybernetic system, rational, self-regulated by the natural laws of the market. The numerous crises in the different planetary scenarios after implementing international recommendations such as those offered by WB or IMF, evidence the inefficiency of those, and this is proof of that fallacy.

It might be logical to raise competitiveness projects an utopian global system where the gap between rich and poor countries did not exist, but as suggested Coraggio "sustainable competitiveness requires a non polarized, where there are expectations of continued improvement in the quality of life of economic agents [...] Human development can not be seen as a result of competition possible, but as a condition of it" (17).

Also, as suggested by this author, the policy imposes homogeneous WB have not yielded the expected results, especially in Latin America. What may then have political legitimacy not only undemocratic but inefficient? In the name of what followed have unquestionable budgets?

The World Bank proposes measures, "recommendations" on behalf of "truth" self-legitimized, measures to be adopted by many of the countries of the South, however, it assumes no liability related to who claims the right to decide on the economic destinies of much of the planet. There is an appropriation of success, but not the ownership of the prediction errors resulting from the homogenization resulted in packages of measures that do not take into account the particularities of the countries where they could have applied.

Following Agamben, hence it follows the display of violence, public exposure of the threat, the power of repression that would give the character of intangible sacredness that uncomfortable contiguity between sovereignty and police function, "[...] but the investiture the sovereign as a police officer has another corollary requires the criminalization of the adversary [...] Today there is throughout the land a head of state who is not in this sense virtually a criminal".

Agamben agrees here that this condition has a boomerang effect because criminalizing anytime can be treated as a criminal and Agamben, neither regret "because the sovereign, who willingly consented to appear with the character of executioner henchman and now finally shows its original proximity to the criminal"(92).

With the modifications made in the regulatory principles of life and the market in the last thirty years, opens the new era labeled as Neoliberalism and is not more than the emergence of orthodox capitalism founded on the privatization of services, free trade and economic deregulation.

1989, to give a date, was the beginning of the end of the bipolar world. Capitalism came to dominate the world stage. The implementation of neoliberal thesis had a starting point in making economic adjustment measures proposed in the 1989 Washington Consensus, and all public areas until then, begin to be seen as an expense that was to be minimized, through a privatization process which, as it progresses, is resulting in asmaller share of the poorest in the system. As pointed Grassi,

> The contradiction accumulation/legitimation is in terms different from those of the Keynesian welfare state, including the "naturalization" of inequalities. The relative success of the model lies in part in the conflict have returned to a society entirely fragmented, in which the actors are individualized to the rhythm that subjects lost collective entity. It is understood, then the orientation of social policy and collective consumption, and social rights, but attendance targeted towards those "less pressure capacity" (21).

Just as Andrea Novy, Washington stipulates, "it means the political-economic-intellectual complex integrated by international organisms (International Monetary Fund, World Bank), US Congress, Federal Reserve, top officials of the Administration and groups of experts as outlined by John Williamson". This discourse agreed on ten clear priorities summarised as follows: fiscal discipline which must guarantee a budget surplus; a change in priorities and diversion of public spending to the most productive areas; enforcement of tax reduction; liberalisation of the financial markets; maintenance of standardised and competitive exchange rates; liberalisation of trade, suppression of contingencies, and lower customs tariff; equal treatment of foreign and local direct investment; privatisation and deregulation (including sectors with social objectives); guarantee of property rights (Novy).

It seems specially worthy of mention, the last of these priorities given that the guarantee of property rights was created by those who are already property owners, without taking in to account the right to possess property of those who have nothing. Furthermore it makes no attempt to justify its protection of private property (as a priority) while the majority of people do not have their basics needs covered i.e. food, water, clothing and shelter.

The disappearance of bipolarity leads us to note the triumph of capitalist hegemony on a global scale and face the thought today for the first time, while a task devoid of illusion and alibis, "everywhere is being fulfilled before our eyes «great transformation» that drives one after another to the kingdoms of the earth (republics and monarchies, tyrannies and democracies, federations and national states) to the integrated spectacular State (Debord) and «capital-parliamentarism» (Badiou), which are end stage of the form of state" (Grassi 93).

Agamben makes us fall well aware that in the same way that after the industrial revolution destroyed the categories of public and social structures of the Ancien Regime, the same way they have transformed the terms sovereignty, right, nation, people, democracy and general will now covering a spectrum of reality that has nothing to do with what these concepts designated:

> Contemporary politics is this devastating experiment, which dismantles and void worldwide institutions and beliefs, ideologies and religions, identity and community, and then returns to propose them a form and definitely affected invalidity (93).

Our reference thinker continues at this point, unraveling the evolution of thought that claims the knot without telos of history in which we are immersed, and leads us to the choice of a thought capable of thinking both the end of history and the State end by facing each other, following Heidegger's style. The man has to take over his very being historical, of the same impropriety.

> The appropriation of historicity can not so still have a state-form not being the State other than the assumption and stay-hidden representation of historical arche -but must clear the ground for a longer life nonstate policy and legal entities that remain completely still thinking (95).

It is a proposal that called our partners as before "new historical project" or recovery of "republican utopia," in this case is radicalized and output Agamben appears as return to zero point, urging the abandonment of our political tradition and rethinking the concepts of sovereignty and constituent power from the beginning.

> Sovereignty is the idea that there is a link between violence and right undecidable, living and language, and that this link is necessarily paradoxical form of a decision on the state of exception (Schmitt) or one side (Nancy) in which the law (the language) is maintained in relation to the living withdrawing from it, abandoning it to one's own violence and lack of respect. The holy life, is life proposed and abandoned by the law in the state of exception, is the bearer of the sovereignty dumb, the real sovereign subject (95-96).

It infers from this that if there is now a social power, will go to the bottom of his own impotence and therefore the problem that has to face a new thinking, a new policy, tear of the questions:

> [...] is it possible a community policy that is geared exclusively to the full enjoyment of life in this world? But is not this precisely, if one looks, the goal of philosophy, [...] is not defined by the recovery case for political purposes Averrois concept of "sufficient life" and the "good life"?

Reminding that Benjamin left no doubt when he said that "the order of the profane should be directed to the idea of happiness". To finish deriving the redefinition of the concept of "happy life" as one of the essential objectives of thought that comes.

> The "happy life" should be based on the political philosophy can not be neither so bare life that presupposes sovereignty to make it the subject itself, or the impenetrable strangeness of science and modern biopolitics, the today it is in vain to make sacred, but precisely a "sufficient life" and absolutely profane, who has reached the perfection of one's own power and communicability, and over which the sovereignty and right no longer have any control (Agamben 93).

As rightly observed Viviane Forrester radical application of the neoliberal model in a context of economic and political globalization has created "a strange dictatorship" in which the political powers of national states are subject to institutional supranational powers, such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Trade Organization (WTO), and factual as multinationals.

The power we have come to focus these organizations put in check Western democracies, ironically under an official speech in which show just the opposite: global democratization. A democratic process must pass the filter of these organisms as indicated, there are not chosen. These powers have contributed greatly to the precarious state and the triumph of the neoliberal state.

Neutralization of a symbolic universe is as ingrained as widespread, therefore once the have been eclipsed and subsumed the real antagonisms subjectivities complex challenge for the new millennium opened and already announced Baudrillard, who wrote: "And the answer to the hegemony is not so simple. Antagonism, denial, dissent, violent abreaction, but also fascination and ambivalence. Because-and here lies the difference with respect to domination-all partake of hegemony" (La agonía del poder 26).

Utopia has become anti-utopia. The alleged rationality unifying the market is, obviously, a contradiction in termini: if the market is held on speculation is inherently irrational. Faith in the superior efficiency of the market on any other system or institution holds no empirical evidence, so that is another myth tax to disarm any new choice of economic and social planning. If I was a proven truth would not have fit-among many others-verifiable imbalances, preference for centrally programmed and controlled economies in emergency situations.

There is no excuse, today, from the memories of recidivism, to not to identify, report and disarm the new and always old ways of control of the subjectivities. Those that are reinvented, reproduce, reinstalled from the power over what emerges as threatening.

Today, from a perspective devoid of ingenuity, we find this possibility unlikely, especially given the emergence of the police state, the final entry of sovereignty in the police figure. The limited and ill state allocation of the work of control and repression in the service of a supranational order, a gendarmerie exercise far away from the administrative function of law enforcement original increasingly promiscuous naked next to the interchangeability between violence and Right.

Contiguity is no coincidence and utter confusion is today totally under judgement, constitutionality, providing States with impunity diminished one large capacity, the suspension of the validity of the law and the alibi of exceptionality: the reason of security, public order, set the exception state legitimacy. In the absurdity that has generated a system inspired by the endless accumulation of capital has been no horizon, habited by the simulated subject-seduced-fascinated, postmodernism breaks the infinite mirror fragments presenting the distorted image of a fragmented reality.

If we agree that the desire for progress, development and personal growth and group is found in the history of humanity as an ambition as legitimate as uncontrollable and excessive, we may note that the transformative effects of social mobility are merely substitutions of the actors hegemonic in the same scene.

Only players are exchanges at different times or spaces. The plot of hegemony remains unchanged. Traditionally disadvantaged sectors (not to use terms that may be obsolete such as subaltern classes, proletariat, etc.) greet a welcome descent middle class. In a system that has been commissioned to highlight the robust individualism bonanzas not be expected to generate solidarity between classes. We insist, remains a class war, but a war growing chasm between the contenders: capital is mobile, not workers.

An outstanding example (anecdote cited by Chomsky), which could be applied to any similar situation, is the case of the Illinois workers strike in the 1990s. Here it was made clear the weakness in the bonds of international solidarity between the working class and the idea that capital is mobile, but not the workers. One of the most important syndicates, United Auto Workers, lost the battle with Caterpillar (producers of construction machinery) who decided to substitute the strikers for other permanent workers.

Beside this, which as Chomsky observes, is considered legal in almost all the world, Caterpillar decided to use their capital to produce surplus abroad, even during the strike period. The workers' response around the world, from a solidarity point of view, would have been to stand in solidarity with each other, refusing to work, and joining the cause going beyond the geographical limits of the multi or transnational company operates ("Poder en el escenario global" 244).

So, it is difficult to expect that establishing the complicity necessary to generate a push for change, a change in the directionality only one that could be: from the bottom up, because what is absolutely unthinkable would be a sense of movement to the Conversely, that is, from top to bottom.

Is it possible to have an egological model of legal education?

Diego Luna

"The egological theory of law is a new analytic point of view to investigate to teach and to operate in the Law field."
Carlos Cossio[1]

Abstract: We start from the experience in teaching the egological theory of law, to further investigate and ask about the possibility of shaping the characters of an egological model of legal education. We take as reference the theoretical models identified by Cardinaux and Clérico: "systematic", "legal realism" and "critical analysis" under the assumption that the epistemological starting point about what is meant by law, and its beliefs have a direct impact on the teaching model assumed, as well as guiding the didactic decisions to be taken in teaching.

If it be conceivable an "egological model", at least from a theoretical point of view, to the extent that egology understands the law, as an object of knowledge, as shared human behavior, plural, observed from a specific normative perspective, it would share traits common to all three models of teaching characterized as "systematic", which corresponds to the traditional ius positivism that has its central interest on the norms; "realistic", who concerns about the explanation of social phenomena and predicting the behavior of the judges, and the "critic", which focuses on identifying the relationships among power, ideology and law. We do not intend to arrive at a closed model, but to submit our ideas to discussion as a reflection on the teaching practice.

I. Law as an object of knowledge and the education models.

Cardinaux identifies different ideal models of education that would correspond with the epistemological conception of Law taken as a starting point. Among others, the so called "legal realism", the "systematics" and the "critical analysis", consistent with conceptions found in the law phenomenon, are at the same time: an experience; a system of rules; and a group of practices producing a status quo, respectively. Each of them is consistent with a particular education model, namely: rational prediction through social studies (realism); logical regulatory analysis of dogmatic constructions (systematics); acknowledgment of the ideological basis of Law and strengthening skills for the access to justice (criticism).[2]

Without disregarding the fact that it is just about conceptual frameworks aiming at thinking about the practice of education, following the criteria outlined by Cardinaux, we wonder if it could be possible to think of an egological model. We make use of our experience in the teaching of the egological theory of Law, to look into the possibility of an egological model of legal education. A model that would be consistent with the epistemology inspired by the egological school that was founded by Carlos Cossio, which conceives the law, regarded as an object of knowledge, as a social phenomenon of human conduct in intersubjective interference.[3]

We believe that such a category should have something in common with the three models previously defined. As a starting point, I would take the realist conception of Law, which sees in shared conduct, in the otherness of social behavior, the core of Law as object of knowledge. All this, without disregarding the systematic aspects in terms of legal logic, and at the same time trying to provide a critical point of view for the analysis of a legal reality, which is always estimative, axiological and, therefore, contingent and affected by power and ideology factors.[4]

[4] Vilanova speaks of five thesis of the egological orthodoxy: 1) the legal theory studies –or should study- positive law; 2) the law is conduct; 3) conduct is always valuable (positively or negatively); 4) conduct is free; 5) the law is conduct in intersubjective interference. Therefore, he can maintain: "The first three affirmations define egology against

If the legal conception that serves as a basis must direct the didactic decisions, as suggested by Cardinaux[5], the egological model would be characterized for seeking a point of view that could make the contact, that would be as much direct as possible, with legal information on experience possible; that is to say, with what law would be in terms of object of knowledge, at the same time considering unavoidable the critical analysis of the legal reality and its political and ideological connections, based on the profile of the individuals involved in the legal phenomenon. Thus, law only exists under the condition of always being about to be: that which the law would be, according to Cossio, to some extent depends on what the person who acts in its development makes of it.[6]

II. An educational point of view with egological characteristics.

A theoretical counterpoint may be useful to start defining the model considered herein with more accuracy. We make use of Cardinaux contributions, who theorizes different ideal models to identify the diverse teaching method which is consistent with the epistemological conception of Law that is taken as a starting point.[7] Böhmer also understands that the general conception of legal education is based, at least, on three essential issues: 1) the conception of Law; 2) the teaching methods and 3) the goals of teaching it. The conception of Law that is adopted is essential and, in a way, conceptually precedes the other two: it is given in the teaching method, and therefrom emerges the way in which the future task of those who are being educated is conceived.[8] other philosophy of law currents and this could be sufficient. Egology is an appraisive realist legal positivism. In the first place, we can take advantage of everything, or almost everything, that positivists say in their confrontation with legal naturalists and then everything, or almost everything, that realists say against normativists" (Vilanova, José, *El concepto de derecho. In this sense, he states "…the law can be conceived as a group of positive regulations; or as a science that studies the systematization of this group of regulations; or as a form of moral discourse able of justifying actions; or as a profession to make a living and that consists in defending certain interests; or as a profession

A. Egology and the systematizing model of regulations.

An egological teaching would be incompatible with the starting point of the model that Cardinaux and Clérico call "systematizing model of regulations", which implies a teacher who transmits a student a rationalization of law "through its systematization in principles that will thereafter be of use to solve specific cases", able to "reduce the social complexity which must be faced on a daily basis or in which the jurist is immersed, and that may reduce it through the use of a full array of concepts".[9]

In open criticism of legal positivist conceptions which are the epistemological background of this educational approach, Cossio stated that the repetition of concepts that only reconciled with similar concepts and that give birth to new similar concepts, when transmitted by the chair through a good professor, are concepts that arise with prestige and that, therefore, keep the ideology of their origin alive".[10] According to Raffo, who agrees with the same criticism, the deficiency lies in not making a "pre-regulatory" description and that that way of developing theory "only finds an apparent foundation in the words of regulations or in the prestige of those authors and jurists who have developed it, who make use of the metaphor with a descriptive aim and that are circularly quoted creating the appearance of a foundation that is not such".[11] destined for the public interest, etc. At universities, depending on the definition that is adopted, 'law' will be taught based on what is found in the laws, codes, Constitution, law put into practice, economic analysis of law, logic of regulations, history of law, sociology of law, theories of justice, etc." (cit., note 1, p. 22).

Raffo states the following: "We believe that the knowledge of realities, as legal knowledge should be, finds its foundation in the pre-regulatory experience of the phenomena it seeks to explain, under prejudice of being reduced to developing verbal constructions that find their only support in words of regulations or renowned vocabulary; this methodology does not allow the possibility of being successful with most of its affirmations, but, to our belief, that success is similar to the one achieved by lucky people when participating in the game piñata" (cit.).

The problem, in this regards, lies in the non-existent empirical contact with the information on legal experience of the one that suffers such conception. The egological contrasting point of view suggests a very different thing: the contact with reality, with facts themselves. It could be said, as stated by Vasquez: "an inverse process to the one that is based on general regulations is at least possible. This procedure consists in using facts of reality as a basis and, of course, it is the only one which can be used by an individual with a jurisdictional case lying ahead. The parties, their representatives and legal advisors, and the judge who must solve the case must suddenly face facts that are subject to all the complexities of the human existence".[12]

As stated by Cossio: "…the scientific analysis of Argentina's current affairs, which must be undertaken by our School, must make a direct reference to facts and work on facts, in order to reveal their values and guide the action that mends their defects (…). Opposite to past professors, today's professors must get used to work with facts and on facts".[13] In this respect, what has recently become a problem of educational democratization is "the need of the university working towards the inside of the institution, for its task to respond effectively against the country's real needs. Education may be understood not only as a technical-methodological process of launching knowledge, but also as a process developing social actors".[14]

Beyond the value of his opinion in this opportunity, which is generally consistent with the critical position about the education of lawyers in the Law School of Buenos Aires, Cossio would say: "…my answer is a lecture, which is, in its entirety, a visible sarcasm for the Peronist University. Within the possibilities of expression that circumstances allowed without running a big personal risk, using as a front the old University which had ended in the Law School with the validity of a closed clique, the lecture has as a leading motif the idea that the School had abandoned the scientific analysis of our problems, to devote to an action of personal propaganda in a purely verbalist manner" (Cossio, Carlos, *La política como conciencia. While the systematizing model of regulations is based on concepts to produce more concepts which are ultimately upheld on their own, like a succession of gears that set their first link into the void; the egological model upholds the concepts on the facts which knowledge is reached through the aforementioned concepts. Therefore, it is contrasted with the sistematizing model of regulations, as the egological model intends to make a sufficient ideological criticism of the legal concepts in order to determine the ties in political traditions, power relationships, etc., which would be impossible to accomplish if the concepts were built without the criticism of the concepts on which they rely. The issue falls within what Cossio called "gnoseology of error".[15]

B. Egology with respect to the realistic model and the legal criticism.

The void in the mere regulatory analysis, regarding it is just logic of legal thinking, has been widely studied: the lawyer's or jurist's task does not run out in the mere repetition of legal texts. That's how it has been said that, due to the practical aim of the legal discourse, "it seems paradoxical for the legal education to rely on an educational technique –the course lecture- where the study of a legal regulation and its spirit prevails".[16]

In contrast, by pointing out the realistic nature of the science of law, nothing is gained if there is a poor imitation of the sociologist's job. In turn, the methodological criticism inevitably resulting from a social knowledge affected by political and ideological conflicts, even though it is necessary, it is not enough for a full understanding of the legal phe-

The specific problem of the gnoseology of error "…is revealing the ideological function of that predetermined harmony between capitalism and legal truth, which results in the thought of jurists, vested with a neutrality that, if it wasn't a pretense, it would show a miracle".

[16] Bianco y Carrera, op. cit., p. 170. Nevertheless, it is worth "…asking if the most effective way, if not the only one, of transmitting theory is the masterclass. This is a decisive point because theory may be, without a doubt, taught by means of different methods and the constant lecture does not seem to be the only possibility and is far from being the most effective" (Gonzalez, Manuela, Nancy Cardinaux y María Angélica Palombo, "Los discursos de los profesores de la FCJyS sobre el proceso de enseñanza, aprendizaje y evaluación", en Gonzalez, Manuela y Nancy Cardinaux, *Los actores y las prácticas. nomenon. If the first position would assimilate the jurist to the logician or philosopher (in the linguistic version of the logical positivism) and the second one, to the sociologist; I would assimilate the critical analysis to the political scientist, therefore readapting –in any of the cases- a useless methodological and epistemological repetition.[17]

In accordance with Cossio, we understand that the phrase that accuses the philosophy of law of "having one's head in the clouds" is justified when the task of the general theory of law is reduced to indicating the methodical point of view from which the jurist loses the contact with its information.[18] On the contrary, if –as set out by Cardinaux- the legal conception that serves as a basis must direct the didactic decisions, so the general theory of law must –in order to avoid going up towards the clouds- accomplish a point of view that enables a contact, that is as much direct as possible, with legal information; that is, with what law would be as object of knowledge.

The direct contact with multiple daily legal phenomena that a student faces for the sole fact of his social coexistence (sale, marriage, employment relationships, taxation, etc.) is of great use. However, a mere narration of the particular legal experience taken from the daily life of the students would result in an innocuous sociologism, even though it allows them to make up a composition of the "legal culture" that is lived and that does not always coincide with what is written in the laws.[19] The blind redirection of those individual experiences towards the general regulations that mention them or under which particular cases are considered is ruled out, otherwise it could fall victim of the dogmatic model which does not contribute anything essential.

"Poor judge of life who has not been a defendant before!" This

[19] According to Cardinaux: "When realists think of legal education aimed at lawyers, they do not doubt that the most appropriate education is the one that allows them to predict what the judges will decide, because that is the Law (…)It is, without a doubt, a very particular conception of Law, as everything that we can do is predict conducts, but the Law loses all its capacity of operating beyond the "legal culture" in which those judges are immersed" (Cardinaux, Nancy, "La articulación entre enseñanza e investigación del Derecho", en Orler, José y Sebastián Varela (comps.), Metodología de la Investigación Científica en el campo del Derecho, La Plata, EDULP, 2008, pp. 184-185).

expression by Ricardo Jaimes Freyre, taken from his book Los sueños son vida (The dreams are life), is the heading of the book El derecho en el derecho judicial (Law in judicial law), by Carlos Cossio. Even though not every Law student is a potential judge candidate, every judge has necessarily been a Law student, so that is why at the same time that the expression grossly questions the role of the criminal judge and the contact with the reality that it judges, it may also be generalized to the "poor lawyer of life" who has not had a previous contact with legal experience.

The analysis of reality allows the generality of the theory to be related with the actual experience that the Law student knows after having lived it and to which he is linked due to being part of a social group.[20] This allows him to intellectually deal with the social conflicts and connect them with the legal concepts obtained through the critical dialogue around the reading of the chosen bibliography.[21] All legal experience "shall be established in a conduct phenomenon with legal meanings that are given in advance and in a general manner by applicable regulations and individually by judgments; thus, the study of Law, in order to be realistic, cannot do without the conduct phenomenon as a starting point of its considerations".[22]

This viewpoint allows a better apprehension and comprehension of the legal phenomenon, as object of knowledge of the science of Law as a social reality imbricated in the tension of power, ideology, culture, the role of judges and judicial bureaucracy, etc.; all this allows a realistic approximation to the legal phenomenon and the problem of the theory of justice. With everything, the criticism related to the power, social, cultural, political and even ideological factors that may revolve around legal relationships and the considerations concerning the reasons behind the social phenomena, even though presented as a valid and necessary viewpoint, it is not enough as a use able to make the scientific nature of Law as knowledge clear.

Even though it must be present, the critical perspective must not exhaust nor replace the problem of the legal phenomenon, but act as a peripheral aspect of law education, to the extent that it allows seeing the social and historical situation in which legal phenomena are presented. The knowledge of Law as a specific social practice requires –as pointed out by Orler and Varela- taking into consideration its historicity, ideological aspects, issues related to power, violence, constituent essence and, especially, its conditions of production and reproduction, among many other subjects.[23] This historical situation, with its own political and ideological circumstances, cannot be separated from the law as a social phenomenon. It does not determine it, nor gives rise to it: it provides a situation and meaning. Its knowledge allows its better understanding.

[20] We believe it is appropriate to remember Vilanova's words: "The legal sense of particular actions is established by a community in accordance with it that forms the agent and the ones affected by the conduct. It is a sense "for them" which seems to make it undergo the disadvantages of subjectivity. However, a critical legal positivist conception must suspect of a legal sense that is "for everyone" because it would hide the main fact that it is certain human beings in a given time and place who build those legal senses" (Vilanova, op. cit., p. 86).

III. The challenge of a professional training in contact with the social reality.

Cossio noticed in the mid-20th century that "the professional failure as a complete divergence between what a Law School teaches and what experience in courts demands is a well-known secret in our country. The fact that the brand new lawyer suddenly realizes how much padding there was in everything he was taught and that his first task is to forget most of that education forever is catastrophic. However, this is the pure truth".[24] Notwithstanding the passing of time, it could be said, roughly speaking, that current issues can be identified with this diagnosis in a degree higher than imaginable.

We understand, in accordance with Bianco and Carrera, that "it is necessary to put theory and practice together, in the educational process of graduates, with a critical social sense and find institutional strategies to carry out this proposal".[25] The general theory of Law provides [23] Orler y Varela, op. cit., p. 8.

[24] Cossio, "Teoría y práctica...", cit., p. 263. " Even if the graduate is an outstanding student, he does not come out in practical conditions to carry out his profession. He must learn law by practicing it, after having graduated, the hard way in the forensic life and in court practice, with prejudice of their reputation and that of the clients who have entrusted him with their interests, trying to mitigate as much as possible this period of consideration and experiments through the wise or lost advice that may be given by a colleague who has already been down this road. Nobody ignores the fact that, at the time of graduating from University and entering into his professional life, the lawyer must forget almost everything he has been taught and learn it all over again" (Cossio, La función social…, cit., p. 96).

[25] Bianco y Carrera, op. cit., p. 171.

something to the practice, but it receives something from it as well. A good theory cannot be detached from experience because every theory just intends to be a conceptual understanding of the reality it targets and that is why from it derives the immediate technical use. The detachment of theory from practice only reflects one scientific mistake in the theoretical conception. It is the experience which presents authentic problems, deficiencies and obstacles; but it is the scientific thinking which, by taking charge of them, sets their course to overcome them.[26]

For education to be really practical, Cossio suggested that apart from students reading and commenting on a prominent judgment, it is necessary that they witness a hearing and that they learn that the hearing is not held by the Judge, as provided by the Code, but by a court employee; that the parties and lawyers get into unpleasant arguments among themselves or with the opposing party's witnesses; that procedural terms are longer than the ones provided by law due to the professionals' skillfulness or due to the employees' negligence; that notices actually have a different nature than the one arising from legal texts, etc. He added eloquently: "It is essential that they see the criminal's mood at the time he appears before the Criminal Court Judge when he is summoned to the preliminary personal hearing and that they learn how to make their own idea of the place regarding the psychological evidence. And like this one, there are a thousand more things that can only be seen through court practice. Without this contact with life, graduates that step for the first time into the courts will always be defenseless beginners who will have a painful learning.[27]

This contact with legal life claimed by Cossio and that students must face on their own leads them to understand what is a notice, a summons, a real hearing, where the judge is conspicuous by his absence, and a long list of other things that are given by the direct contact with legal experience. According to Méndez, the egological theory brings students closer "to the daily life of courts, of the profession, it is not a neutral study of legal regulations, but a committed study and research about "human conducts", which is the real object of the science they study". He also states that egology "is a kind of permanent plot that makes us think, it is not as boring as to make you sleepy, it comes to cause problems".[28] As stated by Cueto Rua, from the egological viewpoint, which conceives law as a human conduct in intersubjective interference, the memory is not developed through legal education, but through imagination; reality is identified and taken into account, but it is not approved just because it is, it is praised when it is what it should be.[29]

Of course, as stated by Morello, the analysis and understanding with which law men assume legal phenomena and their particular and systematized education is clearly different to the dreams, utopia and precisions that during the years 1920-1940 filled the illuminated and advanced minds like Cossio's.[30] However, we consider that that does not prevent appreciating and updating their contribution to education, given that, during the "egological period", legal education in the University of Buenos Aires was not only taught "in an original and creative" way, but it was also characterized for its approach to "philosophy of law in a way open to discussion of all tendencies and problems; there was a permanent exchange of opinions and that is why controversies were so frequent".[31]

A key element of egological contributions regarding law education is, according to Morello, the "necessary share of humanism that Cossio strived for with such conviction"[32] and which should not be absent in a full-scale and productive law education, if it manages to have some contact with the social reality in which it must be inserted. According to Cossio, "humanism tends to form individuals, who are spiritually complete, culturally comprehensive", and without disregarding the technical professional aspect in the education of lawyers, he considered that "the truth is that the human being must face, at any moment, while being educated, both problems: the technical and the humanist: the problem of struggle for life and the problem of the life earned in such los, Teoría de la verdad jurídica, Buenos Aires, El foro, [1954] 2007, pp. XII and VIII. In a way, it can be translated to the Law teacher in general, when Méndez proposes that "the great task of a Philosophy of Law teacher must be to clarify if the science of jurists should be a science of semantic ideals, or if it is about thematizing legal experience, as a biographical reality" (op. cit., p. XVI).

These thoughts have no other intention than putting them down in paper to stimulate the truthful exchange of ideas regarding the question that serves as a title. We do not intend to get to a complete and comprehensive system, but outline some concerns based on the appreciation of the contributions that have been made from the egological theory of law about the problems in legal education. We trust that, through these pages, we have contributed to achieve that goal.

Tax education as an instrument of social change

Ana Cecília Bezerra de Aguiar
Fernanda Castelo Branco Araujo

Abstract: Starting from the role given to the citizen by the current constitutional order and believing in the transformative power that legal rules have to meet the requests of those who create them, the present study looks up to investigate how tax education can contribute to a change that softens the social deficits observed in Brazilian citizenship. For this, we make an initial exposure about citizenship in Brazil, covering an historical analysis and showing the contours it has nowadays. Then we discuss the theme social change, arguing how law and education may contribute to its occurrence. So the study enters specifically on the field of tax education, focusing on the National Tax Education Program. Finally, the last part of the paper addresses to discuss about the deployment of social observatories in public spending in Brazil as a result of a change in citizens posture through the spread of tax education in the country. Based mainly on the connection between the aims of tax education and the components of the current concept of citizenship and the promising performance of social observatories, it is concluded that it's right to invest in tax education as a way of building an active citizen profile. We should not forget, however, that it is necessary to overcoming the difficulties pointed and to increasing such policies to ensure that the promoted social change is also increasingly significant. The methodology of the research is descriptive, presenting information about the elements that form the object of study, and explanatory, seeking to establish relations of cause and effect concerning the objects studied. Its nature, in turn, is qualitative, because the study aims to translate the phenomena of the social world.

Keywords: Citizenship. Social change. Tax education.

1 Introduction

In the current constitutional order, citizenship is given to great prominence, becoming a key precept on which the Federative Republic of Brazil is structured.

In the context of redemocratization in which the Charter was enacted, its citizen profile was insistently disclosed, as observed, for example, by the wide range of fundamental rights recognized. However, turning attention to the historical and social reality of the country, the gap between the profile of the citizens designed by the current Constitution and the effective popular participation in the conduct of the Nation´s political life.

Thus, it follows that the implementation of constitutional provisions requires changes in Brazilian society, so that people can be engaged in an active citizenship as prescribed in the Higher Law. The simple legal provision does not have the privilege of itself make the necessary changes. However, the existence of such rules offers legitimacy to all actions to turn toward the achievement of their goals.

Among these actions it is believed to be education toward citizenship that can contribute to social change more efficiently. In the present study, tax education was elected among the branches of citizen education to be examined on its potential to contribute to the formation of a stronger citizenship in the country, making concrete the existence of a democratic state.

We make an initial exposure about citizenship in Brazil, covering an historical analysis and showing the contours it has nowadays. Then we discuss the theme social change, arguing how law and education may contribute to its occurrence. So the study enters specifically on the field of tax education, focusing on the National Tax Education Program.

Finally, the last part of the paper addresses to discuss about the deployment of social observatories in public spending in Brazil as a result of a change in citizens posture through the spread of tax education in the country.

Based mainly on the connection between the aims of tax education and the components of the current concept of citizenship and the promising performance of social observatories, it is concluded that it's right to invest in tax education as a way of building an active citizen profile. We should not forget, however, that it is necessary to overcoming the difficulties pointed and to increasing such policies to ensure that the promoted social change is also increasingly significant.

2 Brief history of citizenship in Brazil and its characteristics in the current constitutional order

Considering citizenship as a historic construction, a position also adopted in this work, Marshall shares his concept into three parts: social and civil, and political. The first relates to the acquisition of the rights to freedom (of expression, of movement, of thought, etc.). The political element constitutes the opportunity to act interfering in the exercise of political power. Finally, citizenship incorporates the social element, that "[...] refers to everything that goes from the right to a minimum of economic welfare and security to the right to participate fully in the social heritage and lead to life of a civilized being according to the standards prevailing in the society."[1]

According to the indoctrinator mentioned, the rights listed in each of these categories were embodied in the concept of citizenship in the course of England´s history, in accordance with the following logical order: civil rights (eighteenth century), political rights (nineteenth century) and social rights (twentieth) century. In this sequence, the exercise of the foregoing rights resulted in the recognition of those belonging to the later category. Thereby, based on civil liberties, people claimed the right to vote (political right), and with the election of members of the working classes, the recognition of social rights was possible. [2]

Referring to the lesson outlined above by Marshall, Carvalho[3] clarifies that, in Brazil, this sequence was reversed. In the next lines, an overview of this route of acquisition of rights by the Brazilian people will be exhibited based on this author.

Starting from the colonial period, it is observed that the characteristics of Brazilian society at the time did not contribute to the development of citizenship. We had large land holdings, which developed export-oriented monocultures, using slave labor[4]. The society was formed basically by three groups: slaves, landowners and those who were in an

[4] In this bias, Bastide says: The Portuguese colonization rests therefore on a threefold basisbig lands, monoculture, slavery. Aristocratic society, with the white master occupying the top, vast domain owner and sugar mills - the servant or the native client, householdinhabiting of favors these areas, lower in status - and finally black slave located on the top step of this hierarchy (Freely translated from: BASTIDE, Roger. Brasil: terra e contrastes. 4. ed. intermediate layer between the previous two.

As explained Carvalho[5], the first group did not enjoy basic civil rights like freedom and physical integrity and was treated as goods. The landowners, members of the wealthier class, also could not be considered citizens because, although they had civil and political rights, they did not have the "[...] own sense of citizenship, the notion of equality of all under the law. [...] The government's power ended at the gate of the large estates."[6] Obviously, those who were between these two groups also can not be called citizens, since, although free, had no basic education for the exercise of civil rights.

Regarding to the education mentioned above, We must also clarify that the eminently exploratory Portuguese colonization did not invest in it. After the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1759, the home government took charge of the few existing initiatives of this nature. According to Carvalho, despite data of that period isn't available, the numbers from a next phase denounce the deficiency at this sector.[7]

In the period between 1822 and 1930, the situation had not undergone significant changes. [8] With respect to political rights, considering the 1824 Constitution, Brazil has a high number of voters compared to the size of the electoral college from other countries that also hadn't established universal suffrage (like England, Portugal, Italy and the Netherlands). However, when it sought to analyze the material aspect of this reality, the situation changed from optimistic to pessimistic, since most of the population did not have any kind of statement to the exercise of those rights. [9]

[7] […] if we check in 1872, half a century after independence, only 16% of the population was literate, we can get an idea of the situation at that time. [...] The situation was not much better in higher education. In contrast to Spain, Portugal never allowed the creation of universities in their colony. [...] The Brazilians who wanted and could do university degree had to travel to Portugal, especially to Coimbra. Between 1772 to 1872, passed by the University of Coimbra 1,242 Brazilian students. Compared with 150 000 of the Spanish colony, the number is ridiculous. Ibidem. p. 22-23.

[8] There was no republic in Brazil, ie, there was no political society. There was no 'repúblicos', ie, there was no citizens. Civil rights enjoyed by the few, the very few political rights, social rights have not yet spoke, since social assistance was in charge of the church and individuals. (Ibidem, p. 23-24)

[9] Ibidem, p. 31.

In the same sense, Amado[10], referring to figures for the first census that was done in Brazil, in 1872, stated that:

> The Brazilian people, existing as a living reality, could not fail to be only three hundred thousand or four thousand people belonging to families owning slaves, farmers, planters from where came out the lawyers, doctors, engineers, senior officials, diplomats, heads of companies, only ones who could read, had some positive sense of the world and of things and could understand, within their education, which came to be monarchy, republic, representative system, voting rights, Government etc.

The exercise of civil rights, in turn, was compromised by the legacy of the previous period: slavery, the estates and the State committed to private power exercised by a minority of the population.[11]

The advances in the area of social rights were shy, punctual and sometimes only formal, as the creation of the possibility of retirement and pension only for certain categories of professionals, or the absence of effectiveness of the Juvenile Code, adopted in 1927. A befitting state posture with an orthodox liberalism was prevalent, whereby providing any form of social assistance wasn't among the roles of government.[12]

This scenario of social rights in the country began to change in the period between 1930 and 1964, when there was, for example, the creation of the Ministry of Labour, Industry and Commerce and of an extensive social security and labor legislation.[13]

As the mentioned period was marked by political instability, in which alternated democratic and dictatorial regimes, there was also a major change in the context of political rights.

Thus, for example, after 1930, electoral reform promised by Getúlio Vargas resulted in the extinction of political parties, since for a dictatorial regime, and outside the implanted was nothing interesting multiparty system.[14]

Moreover, after the fall of the New State, in 1945, the country underwent its first properly democratic experience, with the increased honesty of the electoral process, giving added weight to popular vote.[15]

With regard to civil rights, teaches Carvalho[16]:

> Civil rights have progressed slowly. Not disappeared from the three constitutions of the period, including the dictatorial 1937. But its guarantee in real life remained precarious for the vast majority of citizens. During the dictatorship, many of them were suspended, especially freedom of thought and organization. The dictatorial regime promoted the union, but he did within a corporate framework, in close connection with the State. [...] The population's access to the judicial system has made little progress.

One should highlight in this period the emergence of a more significant popular participation, the consequences of which were the 1930 movement and nationalist campaigns of the 50s.[17] In part, this promotion of popular participation can be attributed to the educational policy implemented at the time. During the Estado Novo, the government was concerned about reforming education so that the values espoused since the late 20 th century would be widespread, among whom nationalism. Therefore, a curriculum that valued civic education through the study of History and Geography of Brazil, giving prominence to civic commemorative dates was implemented.[18]

During the military dictatorship (1964-1985), there was a broad restriction of civil rights, attacked strongly on a period marked by, for example, illegal arrests and censorship exercised by state agencies on cultural manifestations.[19]

In the same period, there was an increase of voting rights in 161%, considering the presidential elections of 1960 until the general election of 1985. Paradoxically, this was a time marked by the forfeiture of any other political rights of many Brazilians.[20]

Social rights, in turn, gained emphasis. [21] Is also worth mentioning, for instance, the creation of the National Social Security Institute (INPS) in 1966, and the Fund for Rural Assistance (Funrural). However, one can not help but cast a critical eye on those recognitions of rights, since as alert Carvalho, "[...] the Brazilian authoritarian post-30 has always sought to compensate for the lack of political freedom with social paternalism."[22]

With the end of military dictatorship, it is inaugurated in Brazil a new constitutional order by Federal Constitution of 1988. The Charter received the nickname of "Citizen Charter" during the speech delivered at the ceremony of its promulgation by the then Deputy Ulysses Guimarães, because, for him:

> The Constitution has changed in its preparation, has changed the definition of powers, has changed by restoring the Federation, changed when wanted to change man into citizen, and is only a citizen the one who wins fair and adequate salary, reads and writes, lives, and have hospital medicine, leisure when resting.[23-24]

In this context of democratization, in which Brazil is declared as a democratic state, strong popular participation is essential, as a result of the actions of citizens, true holders of political power, legitimizing its exercise. In this vein, highlighting the importance of promoting popular participation in democratic states, there is the lesson Canotilho:

> The constitutional state is not and should not just be a rule of law. [...] It has to be structured as a democratic rule of law, that is, as pre procurou compensar a falta de liberdade política com o paternalismo social".

[24] Similarly, let´s transcribe the preface by Ulysses Guimarães for the 1988 Constitution edition launched by the Senate and subsequently withdrawn from circulation: Man is the problem of Brazilian society: without salary, illiterate, without health, without home, so without citizenship. The Constitution fight against pockets of poverty that shame the country. Unlike the seven previous Constitutions, it starts with the man. Geographically witness of the primacy of man, which was written for man, that man is an end, and their hope is citizen Constitution. Citizenis what earns, eats, lives, you know, can heal. (Freely translated from: BONAVIDES, Paulo; ANDRADE, Paes de, op. cit., p. 501) > an order domain legitimized by the people. The articulation of "right" and "power" in the constitutional state thus means that the power of the state must organize and engage in democratic terms. The principle of popular sovereignty is therefore one of the cornerstones of the Constitutional State. Political power derives from the "power of citizens".[25]

This importance attached to citizenship by CF/88 is expressed, for example, in recognizing in that the foundation of the Federative Republic of Brazil.[26]

With the new charter, there was the expansion of political rights by letting illiterates vote as an option, last still existing constraint, the reduction of the minimum age from 18 to 16, and a lower restriction on the creation and operation of parties politicians compared to the previous legislation.[27]

The list of social law, in turn, is the broadest of all Brazilian Constitutions.[28]

Civil rights attended the same dynamic expansion, having been reinstated after suspension in military regime with some innovations in the legal system as a whole, as the creation of habeas data, the writ of injunction, the Code of Consumer and the National Program on Human rights.[29]

However, accompanying a global movement started on the 90s to review the concept of citizenship ruled only on ownership of rights, [30] it is adopted in this study, then, a broad concept of citizenship. It goes beyond the reductionist concept of Marshall and those that, even more briefly, relate citizenship only to the exercise of political rights.[31 - 32]

In this vein, Lopes inserts, on the concept of citizenship, the notion of duty until then forgotten. Thus, for the author, "citizenship should be seen as a right, while simultaneously and in parallel, the notion of duty must be inserted into its content, as there are no rights without their correlative duties".[33]

The same author also indicates citizenship as a fundamental right in the current constitutional order. For this, she used the following concept of fundamental rights: "[...] positive legal rules of a constitutional level, which reflect the essential values of a society to directly protect human dignity, in the quest for legitimacy of state action".[34] She continues detailing that citizenship appears on article 1, II, CF/88, as a core value of the society, since it refers, as already mentioned, to one of the foundations of the Federative Republic of Brazil (art. 1, II, CF/88); it binds to the protection of human dignity as citizens' participation in the construction of history itself is a condition for the existence of a dignified life. Finally, She explains that there is a link between citizenship and legal legitimacy of state action, asserting that popular participation, which follows citizenship, figure as an instrument of state actions, acting as a filter that guarantees the execution of only those that match the interests of the society. Therefore, state power greater degree of legitimacy is achieved.

In order to complement the notion of citizenship adopted in this

[31] As portrayed by Bulos, in his work, the definition of the principle of citizenship constant in art. 1, II, CF/88 would be the "status of individuals who are in full exercise of their active political rights (ability to vote) and passive (ability to be voted on and, also, to be elected). Freely translated from: "status das pessoas físicas que estão no pleno gozo de seus direitos políticos ativos (capacidade de votar) e passivos (capacidade de ser votado e, também, de ser eleito)." (BULOS, Uadi Lammêmgo. Curso de direito constitucional. 4. ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 414).

[32] Silva, speaking of citizenship in CF/88 also underscores the overcome of its link only to the ownership of political rights: "Citizenship is here on a broader than the rights of the holder of political sense. Qualifies participants in the life of the State, the recognition of the individual as an integrated person at State company (art. 5, LXXVII). Means there, too, that the functioning of the state will be subjected to the popular will. Then the term is linked with the concept of popular sovereignty (sole paragraph of art. 1), political rights (Art. 14) and the concept of human dignity (art. 1, III), with aims of education (art. 205), as the basis and the essential goal of the democratic regime. Freely translated from: SILVA, José Afonso da. Curso de direito constitucional positivo. 33. ed. São Paulo: Malheiros, 2010, p. 104-105.

paper, one add up the solidarity element. On the topic, one brings up the lesson Nabais according to which citizenship has currently undertaken a third stage, which he calls "solidarity citizenship" or "responsibly solidary citizenship".[35] This new phase is inaugurated after overcoming the previous two, the citizenship of the Liberal State, in which they sought the protection of individual rights, and citizenship of the Democratic State, when it sought to ensure participation in the political life of the state. In this new stage, the citizen plays an active role, assuming "[...] burdens, responsibilities and duties that derive from that same political life and that can not be seen as a state task exclusively [...]".[36]

The assumption of this position requires, however, solidarity[37] among society members, the result of a sense of belonging, which guides their actions in the pursuit of common welfare. In other words, there is awareness that the community is made up of individuals as a whole, the consequences of actions (whether positive or negative) exceed the private sphere and influence the configuration of that whole.

One can thereby conclude that, in the current constitutional order citizenship should be treated as a composition of the following elements: awareness of rights and obligations and the sense of belonging to a community that requires acting according to the dictates of solidarity.[38]

[37] According to Nabais, solidarity: while stable or lasting and more general phenomenon, refers to the relationship or the feeling of belonging to a group or social formation, among the very groups or social formations in which man expresses and currently holds its societatis affectio within which emerges naturally the community paradigm of modern time - the state. It follows that solidarity can be understood both in its objective aspect, as it refers to the relationship of belonging and therefore responsibility of sharing and connecting each individual to the vicissitudes of fortune and other community members, whether on subjective meaning and social ethics of that belonging to the community. (Ibidem, p. 134).

[38]Because of the close proximity to the what is here defended, let´s quote the concept of citizenship offered by Nabais, for whom it "[...] can be defined as the quality of the individuals, while active and passive members of a nation-state, are entitled or recipients of a certain number of rights and duties which are universal and, therefore, holders of a specified level of equality. A notion of citizenship where it is easy to identify the three constituent elements, namely: 1) the ownership of a number of rights and duties in a particular society, 2) being a membership of a political community (usually the state), usually linked to the idea of nationality, and 3) the possibility to contribute to the public life of the community through participation (ibid., p 143).

Contradictorily to the prominent role given to the citizen in the current constitutional order, what is not noticed in Brazilian society is the significant ignorance regarding the content of CF/88.[39-40]

Moreover, commenting on the political poverty, says Demo [41]:

> This is no exaggeration to state that the deeper aspect of the political poverty of a people is the lack of organization of civil society, especially from the state and economic oligarchies. A disorganized society comes not to establish itself as conscious and able to achieve its own space for self-sustaining people in history, but rather is characterized as reactionary mass.

Thus, according to the description made by Demo, a situation of political poverty can be identified in the country. It urgently needs to be changed so that the society can make progress in building a Brazilian citizenship in accordance with that placed above.

3 Law and education as promoters of social change and the role

[39] It is to be made clear that it is not required to memorize the entire population of the constitutional text. The essential thing is that it knows its "rights and obligations are in this booklet that President Eurico Gaspar Dutra was always at hand, designating it with this please, not to despise it, but to reveal exactly obedient affection that it was as head of the Nation. (Freely translated from: BONAVIDES, Paulo; ANDRADE, Paes de, op. cit., p. 481)

[40] Relating the lack of enforcement of rights conferred to citizens with the ignorance of those rights by the population, we have: These legal and institutional innovations were important, and some are already showing results. [...] However, it can be said that the rights that comprise the citizenship in Brazil are still civilians with the largest shortfalls in their knowledge, extent and guarantees. The precariousness of knowledge of civil rights, as well as political and social, is demonstrated by research conducted in the metropolitan region of Rio de Janeiro in 1997. The survey showed 57% of respondents knew not to mention one law and only 12 % mentioned some civil law. [...] Research has shown that the most important factor when it comes to knowledge of the law is education. Ignorance of rights was felt in 64 % among respondents who had until 4th grade and 30 % among those who had the third degree, even if incomplete. The data also reveal that education is the factor that best explains the behavior of people in relation to the exercise of civil and political rights. The more educated, the more population belongs to labor unions, professional bodies, political parties. (CARVALHO, José Murilo de, op. cit., p. 210)

of tax education

Because it is formed by human beings, who are constantly changing, society follows the same fate, so that is also not static, but lies in continual process of change.[42]

Social change may be so defined as the set of "[...] changes suffered in social processes and institutions, sometimes affecting the global society, sometimes particular groups".[43]

As states Falcão, the degree and speed of these changes are conditioned by several factors, among which he lists the natural factors, the number and composition of the population, social disruption (such as wars, revolutions and class struggles), cultural determinants (such as philosophical schools and the scientific inventions), economic factors, communication and contacts.[44]

From the multiplicity of effects that these factors could have on the processes of change in society, result the different types of social changes. Scientifically, they can then be classified according to the process used in its implementation and the possibility of human control over them.[45]

According to the first criterion, to be classified as normal, those changes must occur naturally and peacefully, whereas abnormal were those operated abruptly and violently.

The second classification, in turn, splits social changes in spontaneous and planned. Those happen unexpectedly, not requiring any human intervention. It is, for example, natural disasters. In contrast, the planned changes are those deliberated by man, who can influence on society through his intelligence and will. Due to the legal nature of this work, it becomes more relevant with regard to the study of social changes, the investigation of its relationship to the law, what is going to do next.

By overcoming realistic views (law conditioned by society) and [42] In this sense: Human society has the essential characteristics of those who form it. It is then to be a constant (control) and (change) to ensure its permanence and balance. idealistic (law as a conditioning factor of the society), it is believed that "[...] law plays a dual role within society: active and passive. It acts as a determinant of social reality and at the same time, is determined by an element of that reality." [46- 47]

Playing the active role, law can function both as maintainer of social reality and as a factor of social change. This second is intended to be highlighted in the present study.

In this context, we have that law can influence change in social reality directly or indirectly. This concept, taken from the work of Soriano[48], refers, respectively, to the possibility of the right to intervene in social reality, providing an immediate consequence (positive or negative) to the practice of certain conduct, or to their intrusiveness in an oblique way, when their standards correspond to plans, targets for a transformation of the society actually desired by its members.

Friedman and Landinsky[49], dealing with law as an instrument of social change, also highlight the capacity legal rules have on making true the desires of those who submit to it:

> Law is an institutional mechanism to adjust the human purpose to the aim of securing some concrete social relations. [...] In modern democracies, the rules and legal institutions are an essential ingredient of directed social change, are the strength and authority of the nation in its endless task of stimulation, allocation and reallocation of physical and social resources (health, dexterity well-being, knowledge, status) to economic sectors and social strata of the society. Law reflects the perceptions, attitudes, values, problems, experiences, tensions and conflicts of the society.[50]

[47] Sharing the same view: "sociologically defined the law as something that conforms to the human sense of duty being (human sense of justice) and with the current empirical science, it is clear that not only the economic and social development conditions the law as conditioned by this. (Freely trabslated from: SOUTO, Cláudio; SOUTO, Solange, op. cit., p. 347.)

[50] In a similar vein: "[...] not in rare occasions social change is planned and implemented by a formal legislative act." (SOUTO, Cláudio; SOUTO, Solange, op. cit., p. 336.)

Identified as norms of this nature (able to determine the beacons of the desired society) we have: the constitutional provisions that highlight the importance of citizenship and popular participation in the current constitutional order, in particular, the Article 1, II, already highlighted, those disciplining fundamental rights; those affording citizens the faculties of action (eg, filing a class action, the composition of the National Council of Justice and the National Council of Public Prosecutors and the offering of whistleblowing before the Court of Audit).

It is known that the simple legal provision does not have the privilege of itself make the necessary changes. However, the presence of these norms in the constitutional text, offers puissant legitimacy to all actions to turn toward the achievement of your goals.

In this sense, Bonavides[51] says:

> But let us not take us by the illusion that the Constitution itself solve all problems. Despite its critical importance, it is important to always remember that the basic law is formal principle: it is up to citizens take care that it is enforced. [...] For that to happen, it is urgent that society is organized to defend the principles enshrined in its Constitution. It is necessary that the formal principle is brought into your day-to-day, that it becomes alive, constitutive of social and political relations at all levels.

Thus, it is argued that education fit to make society lay hold of the principles on which stood the constitutional order of the country, among which is located citizenship.

It is believed, therefore, that the constituent elements of citizenship, mentioned above, can and should be disseminated throughout the population, so that, from assimilation, citizenship pass from theory to practice Law, as mentioned by Bonavides. There is the cause of the strong link between education and citizenship.

In this vein, Marshall advocates[52] that the right to education is a prerequisite for the expansion of other rights. And therefore, its absence is an obstacle which overcoming is somenthing required if you want to [51]BONAVIDES, Paulo, ANDRADE, Paes de, op. cit., p. 488.

Basically, it should be considered not as a child's right to attend school, but as the right of adult citizens to have been educated. (MARSHALL, Thomas Humprey. op. cit., p. 20.)

build an active citizenship.[53]

Moreover, it is a state's obligation the development public policies of education among the population for achieving citizenship in the above terms. No one is here dealing with anything new, since the Brazilian law itself enshrines the right to an education that will prepare the population for the exercise of citizenship.[54]

There is an apparatus accordingly in infraconstitutional legislation. It refers to art. 22 of the Law of basic guidelines of education (Law n. 9.394/96)[55], which contains the bases for national education, according to which: "Basic education is to develop the student purposes, assure him the indispensable common training for citizenship and provide him with the means to progress at work and in later studies."

The fact that the training of community members to citizenship is necessary and possible is so undeniable. However, citizenship education can be as wide as the very concept of citizenship, addressing various topics, such as concepts of health, hygiene, manners and environmental preservation. Among them, tax education was elected because of its the potential to corroborate the social change required the implementation of constitutional norms.[56]

Tax education, according to the material used in Brazil training course sponsored by the National disseminators Tax Education Pro-

[53] Although Marshall mention just civic education for children, the position advocated in the work considers the training for citizenship of the entire population. Without, however, fail to prioritize children, because they are in a more intense period of formation than those who have passed this phase.

[54] CF/88 has the following prediction: Art 205. Education is everyone's right and duty of the state and the family and will be promoted and encouraged with the cooperation of society, seeking the full development of the person, its preparation for the exercise of citizenship and its qualifications for the job. > Tax Education shall be understood as a pedagogical-didactic approach able to interpret financial aspects of fundraising and public spending, encouraging citizens to understand their duty to contribute jointly to the benefit of society as a whole and, on the other hand, being aware of the importance of their participation in monitoring the implementation of the funds raised, with justice, transparency, honesty and efficiency, minimizing conflict relationship between the taxpayer and the State.[57]

By reading the concept, you realize that it mirrors the goals of tax education programs[58], discussed below.

The first objective of tax education is "install in the national debate the tax issue, discussing the importance of taxes and transparency in public administration for the benefit of all."

It is known that the terms involved in the tax area are quite technical, which leads to misunderstanding on part of society as a whole. This factor is responsible for the lack of interest in issues related to the theme. Tax education aims then offer citizens the necessary tools to access these contents, making issues, once obscure, become familiar and part of day to day life of the community.

With this, citizen alienation is fought with regard to economic and social life of the country, portrayed by Demo [59]:

> In this same route, technocracy remains where it always was: pontificating in cabinets, pretending that replaces the organization of citizenship. We are so used to plan the economic and social life of the country without citizen participation, that people does not miss it, or is so ignorant that we must decide for him.

The second objective of tax education is "enhance respect for public affairs and to recognize the role of the state in the management of taxes".

[59] DEMO, Pedro, op. cit., p. 89-90.

Here, a key point of tax education is touched, namely, the search for the deconstruction of the concept of antagonism between state and citizen. Pinsky[60] portrays, quite accurately, the feeling that pervades this relationship, which goes beyond the disengagement and achieves the rivalry:

> Because of this separation between government and society, "they" do not respect us and "we" do not give them legitimacy. We do not feel responsible for the acts of the government, so we do not consider ourselves with obligations before the law. Breaking the law, evading taxes, crossing red lights [...] are acts that are often credited to our cleverness and rebellion, never considering them harmful to the citizens of the society of which we are a part or should be part.

To replace this notion, tax education proposes the awareness that there are no state and individuals who are subordinate to him. What actually exist are citizens that are organized around a fictional state, trained and coordinated by themselves. Exchanging the competition relationship between the citizen and the state of cooperation, then brings awareness of the importance of contributing to the welfare of the community by paying taxes, which is one of the expected political consequences of tax education.

The goal in comment also joins the feeling of belonging to the community and solidarity, mentioned earlier. Because the public good requires respect for the notion that, in the society in which we live, there are goods (tangible or intangible) that are at the same time, property of all. And, concomitantly, the awareness of the coexistence of the right to enjoy them and the duty to preserve them, remembering that the consequences of those actions will be for all people.

Among these goods can be found public resources, whose management and allocation are performed by those who hold political office, but the setting and monitoring of these activities is everyone's duty, and of all is also the advantage that a good management of these resources generates.

With this, we enter the territory of the third and final goal of tax education listed in Tax Education Program: "to rescue citizen participation with the exercise of active citizenship and shared responsibility".

matches the expectation regarding to the one that received this instruction. So, after building a framework of knowledge that allows to safely know the territory of tax issues and developing a notion of citizenry, what is expected is the monitoring of the administrative State action, through the supervision of the management and allocation of public resources, ensuring that they will be employed as adequately elected in those areas that most urgently need investment.[61]

4. Practicing citizenship from tax education: the case of the social observatories in public spending in Brazil[62]

From all the above shown about tax education, it is clear its potential to collaborate for the necessary social changes to occur, so that the Brazilian citizen can assume an active profile.

As a result of these changes promoted in society, its members has been organizing social observatories.[63] These entities have the goal of controlling public expenditure, valuing transparency in the allocation of resources and thus combating corrupt practices by managers.

It is clear, therefore, that the performance of these organizations fits perfectly in the description made by Demo[64] on the effects that can generate the conscious presence of an organized citizenry:

> [...]If there is a consistent presence of organized popular citizenship, the State curves, at least in part, to the purposes of society, not by vocation, but by control from the bottom up. These are less corrupt, less bureaucratic, more transparent and accountable of [61] Associating citizen participation in the monitoring of public policies commented above, we have the scholium of Guerra: "What is noted is that despite the various possible ways to address the issue of citizenship directions, is that participation, the act, the act to build their own destiny is inherent to their idea. What changes over time, are the degrees and forms of participation and scope. Therefore, citizenship demands a permanent citizen action in the community, in the monitoring and even in the direction given to public policies. > what they do States. They have no self authority above the popular verdict, which makes them fairly public thing in a very authentic sense.

As a way to better articulate the practices of these observatories, they began to organize themselves into a network called Social Observatory of Brazil (OSB). Currently, OSB operates in 60 cities in 12 Brazilian states (Pará, Paraíba, Pernambuco, Bahia, Rondônia, Mato Grosso, Mato Grosso do Sul, Paraná, Rio de Janeiro, Sao Paulo, Santa Catarina and Rio Grande do Sul), exceeding 1,000 the number of volunteers. To these observatories OSB offers technical support and articulates with them partnerships at regional and national level.

According to information gathered from the electronic site of OSB, due to the action of the associated observatories, there was, in 2011, a savings of more than R $ 100 million of public funds.[65]

Currently, the OSB is held by the following entities: the Federation of Industries of Paraná (FIEP), Federation of Business and Entrepreneurs Associations of the State of Paraná (FACIAP), Cooperative Credit System in Brazil (SICOOB) and SPREP Institute of Paraná.

In order to provide a better understanding about the social observatories, one passes to expose some prominent research data entitled Social Observatories geared to citizenship and tax education in Brazil: structure and operations conducted by the Research Group Politeia, Science Center of Management and Socioeconomic State University of Santa Catarina, between September and December 2010.[66]

It is important to clarify that the study included 20 Brazilian observatories, founded mostly (18 total) between 2008 and 2010, which indicates how this movement is current.[67]

Among the reasons listed for the creation of the entity, the most pointed (with the rate of 55%) was the perceived irregularities in the accounts of municipalities.[68] Then, with 45%, lies the support offered by both OSB as the monitoring centers of the neighbors municipalities, stressing thus the importance of the partnership between the organizations of this nature.

Besides the monitoring of public spending, which constitutes the main action front of observatories, they still work in promoting tax education and improving the quality of public management.

Such tracking is done exclusively by following up biddings, involving legal analysis of calls and even the suggestion of change, the attendance on contests, the request for clarification of actions when it seems necessary; monitoring the execution of contracts and delivery of products in warehouses, monitoring of data on local transparency gates; offering representation before the Public Ministry and the Board of Aldermen, and participation in public hearings.

From their actions the most common types of fraud can be verified, as the one that occurs while govern is carrying out biddings, constituted mainly by the performance of combinations among competitors to ensure the alternation between them; hiring by public managers without bidding in not emergency cases, and negotiation among the participants dividing among themselves the items to bidding to ensure that all win any of them, thus hindering the true hiring the lowest price.

Regarding tax education, observatories promote a wide range of actions. In the survey, the most frequently mentioned were the lectures and training courses, in addition to assisting companies to participate in biddings.

On actions aimed at improving the quality of public management, the presentation of suggestions for action based on the data collected to State agencies and participation in public policy-making[69] and

[68] In this regard: It is essential to surround the State by organized citizenship, before we become a society whose ideal is parasitize the state. (Freely translated from: DEMO, Pedro, op. cit., p. 93)

[69] This example illustrates the performance prediction made by Dallari for political participation in the XXI century. See: "The new century promises the world a new society. The political participation of many favor the fulfillment of each participant as a human being and accelerate the construction of the new society, in which political decisions referral of bills.

Finally, it is noteworthy the point of the research revolved about the main difficulties faced by monitoring centers in achieving their goals. The most often mentioned (72%) refers to the lack of skilled staff, which reinforces the need to promote actions to sensitize and empower the population to exercise fiscal citizenship.

Were also quite cited the difficulty of obtaining information by public agencies (50%), difficulty in obtaining financial resources (59%) and the resistance of politicians and regional leaders against the control activities performed (50%).[70]

5 Conclusion

In the current constitutional order, in which Brazil is declared as a democratic state, citizenship occupies a prominent place, it being considered even as a fundamental principle of the Republic.

Thus, for the legitimacy of political Power it is needed an active citizenship that, besides the exercise of rights and obligations, motivates himself for the feeling of belonging, and overcomes individualism, by orienting himself by solidarity.

However, it is observed that, in practice, this type of citizen is far from becoming reality. There is currently, besides an ignorance of the rights and duties among a considerable portion of the population, a poverty of political awareness, characterized, among other reasons, by the lack of articulation of civil society for greater popular participation in setting policy directions to be followed by Nation.

One can point out, as causes of this reality, the factors of Brazilian history analyzed in this article. We talk, for example, about the colonization of exploration undertaken by Portugal in Brazil, where it was not concerned with the development of education, making the knowledge to stay restricted to a small elite who could study in the metropolis.

After independence, the legacy of colonial phase persisted, setting up a society marked, even in our times, a glaring social inequality, in which the enjoyment of rights is restricted to a small portion of the Brazilians.

will be all. (Freely translated from: DALLARI, Dalmo de Abreu. O que é participação política? São Paulo: Brasiliense, 1993, p. 96)

[70] It is hereby clarified that the sum of indices exceeds 100% because each observatory can point more than one difficulty.

With respect to legal recognition of these rights, this has not occurred primarily as an achievement of the people who claimed them. Then, there wasn't a broad process of making people aware of the importance of seeing them positivized.

In addition, the legal provision, many times came unaccompanied of the basic conditions for its effectiveness, among which it was highlighted education as preparation for its exercise.

It is clear, therefore, that the constitutional plans of building active citizenship in the country lead to the need to transform this citizenship deficit.

Considering the feasibility of making people able to practice that expected citizen profile, in accordance to the constitutional norms, education is seen as a skilled instrument to operationalize this shift.

More specifically, tax education corresponds to this goal, since it aims to offer citizens the tools necessary to enable a monitoring of collection and allocation of public resources activities. Thereby, it promotes the proximity between rulers and ruled, even replacing the situation of antagonism between them. In addition, it is guaranteed that the funds will, in fact, be employed in policies required by the population and it Will reduce the possibilities of misuse.

Finally, it was shown the resulting change in posture of the Brazilian citizen that widespread tax education in the country, includes the creation of social, articulated observatories through the Social Observatory of Brazil network, which is already present in more than 60 cities.

From the survey carried out, it stands out as the main activity carried out by the observatories, the surveillance of public expenditures they make widely, involving, among other activities, the monitoring of bidding through the legal analysis of calls and face-tracking contests, the monitoring of the implementation of procurement and delivery of goods in warehouses, the monitoring of data from the transparency portal of the cities; the offering of representation before the Public Ministry and the Board of Aldermen, and the participation in public audiences.

From these actions, it was possible to determine the most common means of implementation of the illegalities committed with public resources, making it easier to work in the surveillance and eradication of this practice as odious as rooted in Brazilian politics.

The paper also listed the main difficulties faced by observatories, such as the lack of qualified staff, the difficulty of obtaining information by public bodies and fundraising, and the resilience of the political regional leaders against the activities performed.

It is important to emphasize, in conclusion, also the significant role that the discussion of solutions to overcome these obstacles act in achieving the improvement of the observatories performance, making closer, day by day, the constitutional provisions and the social reality.

Teaching law in basic education Research method

Anaína Clara de Melo[1]

Abstract: The purpose of this study is to discuss the possibility of teaching Law in basic education for the formation of a true citizen, based on the application of the teaching method which we call "research method". This method can be applied to any discipline in basic education. It is a path for reaching discussions on basic legal issues related to the students' social reality, such as bullying and domestic violence. Through the reflection originated from a problem initially presented by the teacher, the student must, through personal and collective reflections, live the problem, in order to make their own inquiries that are relevant to solve the situation. The teacher should allow situations that raise the questions needed by the student. Reflections made by the students must be similar to those ones thought in the real world. For example, when approaching the bullying thematic, the teacher should initially question about who feels discriminated in their classroom by a colleague. Students should think about the problem in a real way and find their solutions, developing their critical capacity to solve their own problems and fighting for the changes that bother them. The content is presented by the student itself, being the teacher just a figure for systematization of information. In case the dialogue is not productive, the teacher can intervene to elaborate another question that redirects students to issues that are relevant to bullying. Remember that this does not mean asking the student all the questions at once, the teacher shall only intervene with a question, if the dialogue does not progress towards the possibility of creating situations of reflection and questioning by the student itself. This means, that it is the student who has to feel the necessity for thinking about something, to decide something, to fight for something. Thus, it becomes an imaginary life experience for a real life problem, in order for the student to reflect and question something. The teaching of the contents would be based on an improvement on the social condition of the student while a human being inserted in a society. We intend to form a society that interferes in their reality, therefore we will be able to forme citizens who are committed to sustainable worldwide development.

1. Introduction

The experience we have in the education sector, teaching children, teenagers, students of law and teachers, led us to believe that teaching in Brazil can be improved if we, teachers, move to adopt a new teaching methodology in our classes. We believe that the teaching methodologies so far created by renowned theorists are only concerned with the teaching technique. In our proposal, we included the object of teaching as a factor constituting also the teaching methodology.

Thus, we argue that the law should be inserted in all disciplines of Basic Education. It is the child who must learn to reflect on our social, cultural, economic and political world: the Law, added to the disciplines and the "method of teaching research" will make this possible. This is our main goal in this text.

We can ask ourselves why we want it: simply because we wish to form and emancipated individuals who are committed to sustainable development worldwide. Emancipated individuals are those who have the ability to decide on their lives, change their reality, to think about their living conditions, to practice what they thought, to rethink and evaluate their decisions, to plan their actions. They are, in theory, reflective individuals who compose a society not "fetishized," not "alienated" - in Marxist terms. Only individuals perceive well the importance of sustainable development for the world.

In this sense, we present here our ideas about how the research method can be implemented in primary schools. In fact, it is the integration of the activity of thinking that needs to be widespread in our children, and legal thinking, so to speak, a think its useful life in the community where they live.

This study is too relevant to the extent that, as academics, we see a level of knowledge ever lower among students who enroll in higher education institutions. We always say that this is due to the low level in basic education in our country. Thus, we can ask ourselves why did not we think of using our knowledge to help in raising the educational level of basic education. It will provide a wider level of knowledge to the students that go to the universities. It would also provide the raise of the level of our discussions in the University.

The constituents of this methodological study is the ontological dialectic of Marxism and the reflection about the cultural industry elaborated by Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer. Regarding the ontological dialectic - the human being is at the core of social being - we must stress that it is external as a set of guidelines that govern a sector or the whole of reality. This is an explanation of the contradictions of thought and socioeconomic crises of life in terms of the essential relationships, contradictory and individuals that generate them. Georg Lukács explains that:

> [...] dialectic denies that may exist anywhere in the world cause and effect purely univocal: it recognizes even on the most elementary of complex interactions of real causes and effects. And historical materialism with particular force accentuates the fact that in a case such plurilateral and full of stratifications as is the process of the evolution of society, the total process of historical development-social only materializes in any of its moments like a intricate plot interactions. (1965:14)

The constituent T. Adorno and M. Horkheimer is based on the assumption that the objective social trend - the constituents phonograph - is embodied in obscure subjective intentions - control the culture of the masses for profit - the CEOs, as previously alluded to. This means that culture is determined by the market.

2. Emancipation of the human being

This section will discuss issues related to the theory of Marxism and cultural industry, because we believe these to be the basis of the idea of emancipation widespread by Brazilian educator Paulo Freire. Only then, we will present what we mean by emancipation of the individual. This is necessary because we understand that the function of education is to emancipate the human being.

2.1 Marxism

The first associations that are established about the marxism are the old trend that systematized so rigid and closed, the views Marxists orthodoxy. We begin, then, by stating that we will establish an update of Marxist ideas, so that we can adapt it to the current reality.

Marxism arises from selective fusion between the existing cultural heritage and political intervention of the proletarian. In the first half of the nineteenth century, European society is experiencing a burst of facts - the ideological legacy of the French Revolution and the proletarian insurrections of 1848 - decisive for the development of Marxist thought. It is an understanding of reality rationally, a meeting between the world of culture and the world of work (PAULO NETTO, 1985). In a famous passage of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, we have the basis of Marxist thought:

> [...] certain individuals, which act as producers of a particular mode also, establish among themselves certain social and political relations. It must, in each particular case, empirical observation necessarily put in relief - empirically and without any mystification and speculation - the connection between the social and political structure and production. (1986:35)

Thus, the reality can not be understood without a man to be analyzed within a macrossystem. It is a vision of historical development within an economic context of society. This economic context involves the transformation of modes of production, the social classes from these changes and also between those same classes. This way of thinking the reality is called historical materialism. Engels explains that:

> [...] the materialist conception of history part of the thesis that the production, and with it the exchange of products is the basis of all social order, that in all societies parading through the history, distribution of goods, and with it the social division of men into classes or layers is determined by what that society produces, by how the society produces and the way of exchanging your product. (1975:44)

In this sense, the causes of the social, political and historical operated in society must be thought within the changes in the mode of production and of exchange, ie, the economy in particular. The basis of this understand is the economic structure of society – it is the foundation on which rises a legal and political superstructure. Leandro Konder remember that:

> [...] ideas can never, by themselves, overcome a certain state of things: ideas can only overcome this state of affairs. Ideas outweigh ideas and not automatically material situations. Ideas can never accomplish anything (...), as for the realization of the ideas is that men need to put into action a force practice.(1981:61)

Dialectical materialism comes in addition to historical materialism. This is the aspect of Marxism which is more liable to the Western philosophical tradition, particularly Hegelianism. It is a kind of philosophy of Marxism, which has a view of the world:

> [...] a body of theory considered as true of reality as a whole, and designed, in a sense, as scientific, as a kind of " natural philosophy " that generalizes the findings of specific sciences (while it supports them) in its advance to maturity, among which is the social science of historical materialism (BOTTOMORE, 1983:258).

Dialectical materialism presupposes a unity between the material and the ideal. However, they are opposed and the matter is essential for this unit. The spirit of matter depends for its existence, it originates, but the reverse does not occur.

Leandro Konder explains that Marx draws on Hegel to formulate his dialectical method. Thus " in life, the contradiction is not the mere manifestation of a defect: it is a [sic] reality that can not be suppressed. Certain contradictions appear, others disappear (are overcome), but there is always some contradictions pending solution " (1981:56):

> [...] for Marx, life in capitalist society, presents many contradictions. The main one, but one that affects so more constant and more socially crucial the existence of individuals, is the contradiction between labor and capital, that is, between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie (1981:58).

One of the guidelines necessary for the Marxist conception of history is referred to the history of ideologies. K. Marx and F. Engels, according to G. Lukacs, understand that:

> [...] historical materialism recognizes - even at this point, in open opposition to the vulgar Marxism - that the development of ideologies and not mechanically attached or follow " pari passu " the degree of economic development of society. In the history of mankind under primitive communism and under the division of society into classes, about which Marx and Engels wrote, is not at all necessary that every economic boom and social unfailingly matches a flowering of literature and art, philosophy, etc.., it is not absolutely necessary that a more socially evolved has a literature, an art, a philosophy inevitably more evolved than a company with lower level of progress. (1965:17)

Therefore the ratio between the network infrastructure and the superstructure is asymmetric, according to Karl Marx. A State may be highly developed technologically, but do not have a cultural progress equivalent, much less artistic achievements of high quality. Thus, for more than a society evolve technically, the development of its culture is not always directly proportional to these developments. For example, in our times we see technology invade the space of our homes with the names of " ipad, ipod, iphone... " but that does not mean the general population also go through a process of transformation, adapting easily to all of these changes and therefore improving your cultural knowledge. These changes occur in isolated regions of developed countries.

Such disparities are also apparent in the field of Arts. A society can make multiple simultaneous productions: productions with artistic quality and other without artistic value. For example, a company may honor a concert of Brazilian Symphony Orchestra, as well as devoting artists without the slightest artistic and musical talent.

Thus, the basic hypothesis of this research is based on the Marxist conception that understand the social relations of production determine, contradictorily, the constitution of individuals. Man possesses certain characteristics collectively being exposed by this collective dominant ideology as the social totality. Knowing that all this is false, the human constitution is ideological, given that the community is too.

To approach the issue of human emancipation, we need the theory of cultural industry, Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer.

2.2 Theory of cultural industry

The theory of the culture industry by Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer is created from the postulates of Marxist dialectics. T. Adorno and M. Horkheimer used the category of reification[2] in preparing their study. This is a special case of alienation, where we saw a " human objectification ". In Capital, Marx explains that the commodity as value - of - use:

> [...] is intended to satisfy human needs, with its properties, either from the angle that only acquires these properties as a result of human labor. It is clear that humans by their activity modifies the way it is useful to form the natural elements. Modifies, for example, the shape of the timber, where it forms a table. Notwithstanding the table is still wood, something prosaic, material. (1996:79)

However, it seems to take the goods life itself be independent of man, from the moment that:

> [...] human equality of the work is disguised in the form of equality of the work product as values; measurement through the length of the expenditure of human labor force takes the form of the value of the amount of work product and, finally, the relationships between producers, which state the social character of their work, take the form of social relation between the products of labor. (1996:80)

This means that the merchandise hides the social function of men's labor. These start producing things with no direct connection with his being. The goods then present the social characteristics of men's labor " as material characteristics and social properties inherent to the products of labor." (1996:81) There is a specie of inversion of values: what is human becomes the object and what is the product happens to be human, to control, to be determined. The object ends, finally producing man. Hence comes the term " human objectification ". The ease with which this process occurs is imperceptible but real.

On the subject, Georg Lukacs acknowledges, this subversion of categories, the inevitability of fetishism in capitalist society. (1965:20)

[2] Tom Bottomore, previously referenced in his dictionary, which explains the concept of reification already appears in the Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts of Karl Marx. A more detailed analysis of this concept also appears in Grundrisse and Capital.

Similar phenomena occur with manipulation exerted by the culture industry on the man, including tastes, gestures, their conscience and their predilections.

The reflections on the cultural industry is an analysis that Theodor Adorno and Max Horkheimer weave about setting for mass culture in contemporary society. They believe that:

> [...] we live in a world completely surrounded by a web woven by the bureaucracy, the administration and technocracy. The individual is (...) a thing of the past: the era of concentrated capital, planning and mass culture destroyed personal freedom. The critical thinking is dead and gone. The society and consciousness are " totally reified "; seem to have the qualities of natural objects, the condition given and immutable forms. (BOTTOMORE, 1983:258)

To better explain this thought, T. Adorno and M. Horkheimer begin by stating that " contemporary culture gives everything an air of similarity." (1985:113) This is the basis of the theory of both: the whole - represented by macrocosm - means the medium in which we operate. The set of our habits, customs, culture... She is widespread as the universal. This macrocosms, expressed as a total system and true, make us understand that everything and everybody that have the same characteristics should be included in a common group of natural characteristics.

However, all this does not represent a common group because it does not represent the real true. In other words, what we think is an environment created naturally by the man actually is not. Some parts - represented by microcosm – do not belong to the common group of natural characteristics because they do not follow the order. These parts are necessary to the existence of the whole, but at the same time, need to be covert because not serve the interests of a ruling system. Thus, the total is never as such, as always missing one of its constituent parts.

Consequently, as the medium is not naturally formed, the individual also is not. The essence of the individual - his longings, his reflection, his character - is hidden, dormant for the macrocosm, it does not matter to the dominant system. "Under monopoly power, all mass culture is identical, and its skeleton, bone conceptual manufactured by him, begins to take shape." (1985:114) The need to be offset up, materialize, objectify themselves, in order that a domain ideological become intrinsic to the human essence, imperceptible and predominates in society.

The mentioned cancellation of the man gives up, obviously, in a way imperceptible to the eye more inattentive. Therefore, many believe that their psychological characteristics, and even physical result from one›s personality. In fact, they are conditioned through to be as such: " the music is administratively level the type of production of goods is justified with the willingness of consumers will naturally have manipulated and reproduced, which converges with the trend of the administration." (ADORNO, 1974:268)

In this regard, we note that the medium becomes false because it is not the total. Therefore, the individuals themselves are not what they seem. This is the reason that T. Adorno and M. Horkheimer announce that "the apparent unity of macrocosm and microcosm demonstrates for men the model of their culture: the false identity of the universal and the particular." (1985:113) We must pay attention to the fact that this relationship does not give explicitly abrupt. It is a slow, subtle and objective, which is beyond the control of individuals.

The consequence of the above explicit manipulation is the easy control of the leaders of production on society. The demand becomes equal, since the needs of society are standardized by the system unit. This is a technological explanation of the cultural industry, " the fact that millions of people participate in this industry impose reproduction methods that, in turn, become the inevitable spread of standardized goods to satisfy the same needs." (1985:114) The social need of the products manufactured by the culture industry - domination in the field of culture - is directly proportional to income generated by them.

The Frankfurt School scholars in question still show that "what is not said is that the ground on which the technique achieves its power over society is the power that economically stronger exert on society." (1985:114) In this sense, the cultural industry expressed the aspirations of the macrocosm, which expresses the aspirations of the rulers. Thus, " technical rationality today is the rationality of domination. It is the compulsive character of society alienated from itself. " (1985:114) The logic of art works equivalent to the logic of domination, one more reason to consider art as an expression of society that contains ideology: " the objective social tendency is incarnate in obscure subjective intentions of the directors general, these are basically the sectors most powerful industries "(1985:115): the culture of the company is void to insert themselves within a mass culture for profit.

The technique that the products of the culture industry should follow is to reduce the tension between the work of art and everyday life. The outside world should be extended without breaking the world who finds himself in the movie, music or any artistic product. If all life is standardized, the possibility is reduced critical, since there is no diversity of situations. The same occur with art when a variety of styles, shapes, should be abolished to give space to the singular art that does not cause estrangement to the public. Incidentally, cultural monopolies that do not fit these rules are purged by the system itself.

The consequence of this process is the dumbing of the individual represented by the the man without critic sense. Like all products of the culture industry are technically similar, the individual becomes uncritical, reaching act innocent to believe that his artistic taste is that he is consuming. Moreover, his life becomes confused with the artistic product tax, due to the absence of rupture between them. He believes, for example, money can achieve a person has received a day on television.

All this control becomes more solid and reduplicate if all speak the " language of naturalness ". It is hard technical schemes and the like, that make the consumer accustomed to and settle with a certain product. T. Adorno and M. Horkheimer explain that:

> [...] binge language technically conditioned that the stars and the directors have to produce as something natural for the people to turn it into your language, is about as fine nuances that they almost attain the subtlety of the means of a forefront of work, thanks to which it, unlike those, serves the truth. The rare capacity minutely to fulfill the requirements of natural language in all sectors of the culture industry becomes the standard of competence. What and how they say it should be controllable by the everyday language. (1985:121)

The consumer becomes accustomed to the style of non- style. Now, nothing is produced naturally by the artist. Everything is framed and mass-produced and thus no style. T. Adorno and M. Horkheimer turn to Nietzsche (1917:187) to clarify that the new style of the culture industry is " a system of non - culture, to which one can give even a certain ' unity of style ' if it still makes sense to speak in a stylized barbarity." (1985:121)

The industrial gear behind the cultural manipulation is such that consumers themselves are clamoring for dominance. T. Adorno and M. Horkheimer say that:

> [...] capitalist production as well as keeps them trapped in body > and soul that they succumb no resistance is offered to them. Just as the dominated always took more seriously than the dominant morality that received them, nowadays the masses snared more easily succumb to the myth of success than successful. They have their desires. Stubbornly insist on the ideology that enslaves them. The tragic love of the people for the evil that he makes come to anticipate the cunning of control instances. (1985:125)

It is noteworthy that all these studies on the culture industry comes from what was called the Frankfurt School.

2.3 The Paulo Freire´s emancipation

The theme of education as an affirmation of freedom has ancient echoes, even earlier liberal thought. Persisted since the Greeks as one of the most expensive ideas to Western humanism and is widely incorporated into various streams of modern pedagogy. Modern pedagogy, according to Pierre Furter, has the concern of providing " education for the decision, to social and political responsibility."

Paulo Freire opens caveats for their comments, saying that the considerations he weaves about education are only possible within the context of his time. We can say that the foundations of the society of his time, characterized by a context of poverty, domination and exploitation, have not changed much. Moved in terms of superficiality, wrapper, because today we are a virtual company - for ipads, ipods, iphones... However, in terms of essence, fit into her within the same context of exploitation of the time Freire.

We can name ourselves by "society bubbles". When we talk about bubbles, we refer to soap bubbles, whose residence time in reality is only a few seconds. We, humans, are also with a duration actually quite limited: our human values are increasingly ephemeral and superficial, and our human relationships are completely virtualized. This is because we live in the world that information technology creates for us. The culture industry that Adorno and Horkheimer refer is stronger than at other times: it is solidified by the internet, with a power of reach increasingly on people and influence even more profound than in ancient times.

In this sense, I see that we are emancipated (FREIRE, 1967). It occurs because we are still " a society without people, led by an " elite " superimposed on his world, sold in a simple man, minimized and no awareness of this minimization, [is] (...) more " thing "that man even (...). " (1967:35) method of teaching based on research that we intend to develop search here:

> [...] a new society, which, being subject herself, had on man and the people subject to its history. Option by a company or partially independent option for a society that " descolonize" itself increasingly. Which increasingly cut the chains that did and do remain subject to others, you are subject. (1967:35)

According to Paulo Freire, we believe that education should enable the company an option for change and freedom. This is an education aware that Brazilian society to take " an attitude of self-reflection and reflection on their time and space." (1967:36) The teaching method will be elucidated here intends to form citizens who are respected as people who accept amid diversities already known to us all towards a struggle for humanization and liberation of the individual (1967:36). Citizens who are integrated in society - in a statement, the educator Freire emphasizes the importance of integrating human characteristic:

> We insist on the whole body of our study, integration and not on accommodation, as the orbit purely human activity. The integration results of the ability to adjust to the reality of increased transforming it that joins to choose, whose keynote is criticality. To the extent that man loses the ability to choose and will be subject to the requirements of others and minimize their decisions are no longer his because resulted command strangers, no longer full. Accommodates up. Sets. The integrated man is man subject. Adaptation is thus a passive concept - integration or pooling, active. This passive aspect is revealed in the fact that the man would not be able to change reality, however, you change yourself to adapt. The adaptation would give rise only to a weak defensive action. To defend themselves, the most they do is adapt. Hence the unruly men with revolutionary spirit, is called subversive. Of misfits. (1967:42-43)

The teachings of Paulo Freire are very useful specially when he develops the idea of the need for " eternal dialogue of man with man. The man with the world. (...) It is this dialogue man about the world and the world itself, about the challenges and problems that makes history " (1967:59):

> An education that would enable man to brave the discussion of their problems. Its insertion in this problem. That warn of the dangers of his time, that aware of them, gain strength and courage to fight, rather than being led and drawn to destruction of his own " I ", subject to the requirements of others. Education that put him in constant dialogue with each other. That predisposed to constant revisions. In the critical analysis of their " findings ". At a certain rebelliousness towards more human expression(1967:91). Among us, (...) education would be, above all, a constant attempt to change attitudes. Creation of democratic arrangements through which replace the Brazilian and cultural old habits of passivity, by new habits of participation and intervention, according to the new climate of transition. (1967:95)

Freire also argues that " our culture set in the word corresponds to our inexperience dialogue, research, research that, in turn, are closely linked to critical, fundamental note of the democratic mentality. "(1967:97) This lack of critical thinking, questioning to reconstruct knowledge form a deficit in the teaching - learning deep, with a view to form students to passivity and accommodation to the world. In this study, we intend to change this view by inserting the basics of research as a teaching method.

3 Teaching method: research method

Education is governed by several key documents for their achievement. What is true, however, is a complete lack of part or all of it - our educators - and non-compliance with its precepts by the educational administrators. As a result, data on education in Brazil are catastrophic.

The Programme for International Student Assessment - PISA (Programme for International Student Assessment) - 2009 - shows alarming data of our education. The PISA assessments take place every three years and cover three domains of knowledge - reading, math and science - there, every edition of the program, emphasis in each of these areas. In 2000, the focus was on reading, in 2003, Mathematics, and in 2006, Science. The PISA 2009 starts a new cycle of the program, with the emphasis falling again over the domain of reading, the 2012 emphasized mathematical knowledge.

It is a program of international comparative assessment applied to students from 7th grade on, in the range of 15 years, age at which assumes completion of compulsory education in most countries. This program is developed and coordinated internationally by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), with each participating country national coordination. In Brazil, PISA is coordinated by the National Institute for Educational Studies Teixeira (Inep).

The main objective of PISA is to produce indicators that contribute to the discussion of the quality of education provided in the participating countries in order to support policies to improve education. The evaluation seeks to verify the extent to which schools from each participating country are preparing their young people to exercise their role as citizens in contemporary society. The results of this study can be used by the governments of the various countries involved as working tools in the definition and / or refinement of educational policies to improve the preparation of young people for their future life.

Data from Brazil are the most sufferable possible: more than half of our students from seventh grade until the age of fifteen have learning disabilities. It is necessary that the teacher community becomes aware of such data, to enable them to rethink their teaching practices in the classroom. And similarly: it is necessary that public policies in the area of education observe these data when developing their proposals (Sacristan; Gomes, 1998).

Some documents still must be disclosed in the process of finding solutions to an improvement in fact in our education. The first, which is the basis of all others, is the " World Declaration on Education for All: meeting the basic learning needs ". It is a UNESCO document, prepared in Jomtien, Thailand, between 1990 and 1998, which is the basis of all our other educational documents - such as the Law of Guidelines and Basis of National Education (LDB), the Curriculum nationals (PCNs), the national Quality Parameters (PQNs) and the National Plan of Education of Brazil (NAP).

Should work, when devising educational policies, focusing on the main objectives of the statement above: meet the basic learning needs; expand the focus beyond the content; universal access to education and promote equity, to focus learning, broadening the means and range of basic education; provide a suitable environment for learning, strengthening alliances between the federation, states and municipalities, to develop a policy supporting contextualized; actually mobilize resources for education; strengthen international solidarity (UNESCO).

Based on the focus of UNESCO,, which actually expresses what is most current, within each discipline, about the concepts governing the pedagogical practices of raw isolated arise guidelines LDB. The Law of Guidelines and Bases is unknown by many teachers and is not followed by many educational administrators. Our state of Paraiba is an example of a region that does not follow the daily practice of public schools, no such documents. We can even camouflage, saying that we follow, create projects to name these documents, but the reality of our schools is another. The court staff and teachers of our state is quite lacking in every way: they have no training for the role, working with little recourse from the government, do not give continuity to the actions initiated, finally, we do not have an identity education.

In this article, we intend to create an identity methodology for teaching in the public schools of Paraíba. For this it is necessary that teachers are aware of all educational documents mentioned above and that the practice in their daily profession. It is a constant study of its own shares in order to identify possible failures for immediate reflection on how to improve.

To begin the presentation of this teaching method, it is necessary to know the Socratic method called " maiêutica ".

3.1 Maieutics Socratic

The Socratic method is divided into two stages: the first is to bring the listener to submit their opinions on " then made him realize his own ignorance to contradictions or to undertake a clearance intellectual. Clearance But not only would lead to the truth - get to it was the second stage of the process, which occurred in the " birth of ideas " (expressed by the word maiêutica), at which time occurred the reconstruction of the concept, in which the speaker himself was " polishing " the notions to reach the true concept by successive approximations. (...) " (MELO, 2013).

Melo explains that, "according to Socrates, the philosopher's role is to help the disciple to walk, arousing their cooperation to get it for yourself, " illuminate " their intelligence and consciousness, redefining the role of the master, who was no longer a provider of knowledge, but one who awakens the spirits and must admit reciprocity in exercising its function " enlightening ", allowing the disciples to challenge their arguments the same way that challenges the arguments of his disciples. For the Athenian philosopher, only the exchange of ideas gives freedom to thought and its expression, which constitute essential conditions for the improvement of the human being." (MELO, 2013).

We fully agree with Socrates when he deems it relevant dialogue between the master and his disciple in the process of teaching and learning. However, we disagree, as many have already noted, that " the soul that resides and all knowledge relevant to humans ", or even know that this " already exists in your soul long before his birth, and already it right and complete".

The importance we attach to Paulo Freire is warranted at this time we do not understand, like Socrates, there 's truth in the inner man, but you know that is collectively constructed by man through dialogue. The disciple can teach to his master, and vice versa. Perhaps the disciple who is most known for being inserted in the community. We do not, for example, that our society participate in social programs - vaccination campaigns, for example - without understanding why they are contributing to their realization. You need to know in order to exercise their citizenship. We believe that the teaching method of research that developed here provides this dialogue with the contents of the student's life, directing it to a sustainable livelihood. We understand that the function of education is to make the individual to participate actively and critically in this community, with the possibility of social mobility, improved quality of life and their community.

The Socratic method leads to truths previously developed. We argue that the function of education should lead to truths built with world knowledge of the student, and that they are ephemeral, due to constant exposure of these truths to a reconstructive questioning. These truths must also be related to the community where students live so they have the opportunity to transform their lives and their community.

3.2 Method of research education

The creation of a teaching method whose agenda the research originated from a debate on the transfer of the universe of companies for schools in relation to the idea of Quality. Such transfer should help to highlight, in the realization of educational activities, the fixing of targets that protrudes, the participation and cooperation of all the task of pursuing them, the enhancement of group work, and especially the resettlement of habit, so often overlooked, to assess performance against the goals of the project is realized. The very idea of reconstruction of discipline may result from this increased importance of projects such as formatting of the basic activities of the school. Indeed, in a context where what counts are the goals of the project that is pursued, it may become more acceptable to the idea that the study of various disciplines or activities are means to achieve the intermediate useful life projects, articulated interests individual and collective through the construction of citizenship. (IEA, MACHADO, 2012)

Assessed that the crux of the matter lies in the fact that apply, in fact, the need for research to basic education. We intend to take the survey as a basis for the teaching method in schools because we believe that knowledge should be constantly questioned and collectively constructed to be rebuilt. These are truths found in the community, and to themselves, and exactly at that time. Other truths may be found in other times and with other communities due to the historical evolution of the natural things of the world.

In this sense, knowing that the research is characterized as a fundamental questioning, we argue that the teacher should introduce the content of their discipline from the questioning of knowledge. This problem must relate to the community and also serve so it can be modified. Can not be any problem, without a social function practice. We believe that the degree of student engagement with the lesson will be much higher this way, if one compares with a class whose content had no practical relation with their lives.

The foundation of our considerations assumes that man was created to communicate freely in society. The questioning will initiate a dialogue on education which will be based on a dialectic of continuity and discontinuity, a term used by Pierre Furter to sort the ideas in the work of Paulo Freire Education as the practice of freedom. It would be a construct and deconstruct knowledge.

Obviously, the teacher must know initially the group that works under the terms of social, economic and political. This will serve to get it to engage with the group with a mindset also for sustainability.

Starting from a problem, when we approach the ideas of Socrates, the teacher should make it into sustainable. Therefore, we believe that facilitates the teacher to build your teaching plan based on annual thematic groups have focused on sustainability. Thus, we could steer the thematic NCPs such as the environment, sexual orientation, health, ethics and cultural plurality. In our view, NCPs need, and here we would have included, a new thematic area, namely: science and technology. From these axes, the teachers would address the topics of discussion for sustainability, such as: child abuse, domestic and sexual violence, pedophilia, medicine leaflet, subject to medical treatments, importance of attending the medical dangers of self-medication, children's rights and Adolescent (ECA), consumer rights, the Brazilian Constitution, the importance of following laws, carry them to know, to know the enforcement of laws, to know vote, cultural diversity, tolerance, respect, happiness, acceptance of different etc.. All matters relating to a harmonious coexistence, peace and respect in society.

The teacher would select, within each subject, an issue for discussion in the classroom. Students would be heard, the teacher comment on the important points of the speech of students without closing the debate. It is important to leave open the speech of students because it is these that should end the discussion round.

For example, in a discussion about the differences, the teacher may start wondering what respect means. Then enlarges the question of the meaning of respect differences. The teacher must be aware of the breadth of the term differences, because if students aim for a specific type of difference, the teacher should interfere warning for other possible differences - often, for example, students may be disregarded because they are not using a expensive clothes and not have this notion. At the same time, the teacher should ask about why students have highlighted a type of specific difference. Probably will be the difference with which they are closest examples in your community. This would be a time for students to express their experience with that difference.

We can say that we are achieving our purpose from the time the child asks reflects progresses. We will note their emancipation by the level of depth of the questions asked by the teacher and answered by them, following the logic of questions they develop and by the very logic of these questions, the conclusions she will taking over the debate, the ability to relate to your group, by association of ideas with reality, the ability to listen to another idea without verbal. In English, for example, our biggest goal is to elucidate the functions and uses of language to bring a practical sense to the life of the student and provide the conditions for reflective thinking on social, cultural and legal individuals qualified to serve as to exercise their citizenship in search of a sustainable development of the world. In each discipline the teacher would have more specific objectives to be privileged.

The innovation of this study is the fact that the survey be a teaching strategy here transformed into a teaching method. We can say that this is also a way to make the questioning and solving world issues become the main goal in teaching-learning process. The great difficulty that we face in the public schools of the State of Paraíba is the heterogeneity of the group with which to work. Many students are distinct age group, the problem would be to create conditions that opportunities do everyone had a chance to ask and reflect, or even follow the progress of discussions. The teacher must be aware of those who are not following the discussion and reinforce the explanations for all to reflect together because the classroom is, for this teaching method, a working group in constant debate.

It is with this horizontal relationship of A with B, born of a critical array and generates criticality, we have dialogue to Jaspers. This, according to Freire, also states that dialogue nourished:

> [...] love, humility, hope, faith, trust. Therefore, only dialogue communicates. And when the two poles of the dialogue thus cling with love, with hope, with faith in each other, if critics are in search of something. It installs, then a relationship of sympathy between them. Only there is no communication. " The dialogue is therefore essential way," Jaspers says, " not only on issues vital to our political order, but in every sense of our being. Only by virtue of belief, however, is the dialogue and stimulus significance: the belief in man and his possibilities, the belief that only get to be myself when others also come to be themselves." (FREIRE, 1967:107)

We believe we are well, still developing the authenticity of students; spirit strategist, bold, insightful and critical. Characteristics are important because they allow the man to non- accommodation in modern life. Paulo Freire, appropriating the ideas of Karl Marx and Eric Fromm, shows that:

> From man's relationship with reality, resulting to be with her and be her, for the acts of creation, recreation and decision, will he streamlining your world. Will dominate reality. Will humanizing it. Will adding something to it that he himself is the doer. Will temporalize geographical spaces. Does culture. And it is the play of these relations of man with the world and of man with man, challenged and responding to the challenge, changing, creating, which does not allow the stillness, except in suits relative preponderance, or societies or cultures. And, in that, rearing and decides, will settling historical epochs. It is also creating, recreating and deciding that man must participate in these times. And the best will do, > every time, integrating the spirit of them, take ownership of their key themes, recognizing their specific tasks. One of the greatest if not the greatest tragedy of modern man is that is now dominated by force of myths and commanded by advertising organized, ideological or not, and so it comes renouncing time, without knowing it, their ability to decide. Has been kicked out of the orbit of the decisions. The tasks of their time are not captured by simple man, but he presented a "elite " that interprets and Taz delivery prescription form, prescription to be followed. And when judges who saved following the prescriptions, drowning in the anonymity of mass leveler, without hope and without faith, tamed and settled: it is no longer subject. Degrades to pure object. Objectifies itself. - "He freed himself - says Fromm - the external links that prevented him from working and thinking in accordance with what was considered appropriate. Now - still - would be free to act according to his own will, you know what you want, think and feel. But do not know. Fits (...) to warrant anonymous authorities and adopts a self that is not yours. The more proceeds in this way, the more they feel forced to conform their conduct to the expectations of others. Despite his guise of optimism and initiative, modern man is crushed by a deep sense of powerlessness that is staring, and as if paralyzed for disasters to come. " (1967:43-44)

Final considerations

The teaching in basic education in the state of Paraíba need a method that favors research. The teaching method of research here extolled proposes that we should teach to worry that we are developing procedures basic research rooted in the discipline of our content. At the same time, we must consider content emanating from the community to which we work, so as to check her needs and we can provide an education that can actually grow into the subject's life and their community, and that actually causes that the audience realizes the importance of sustainability in your life.

Education in the State of Paraíba needs a radical change, because we can not only record low levels of education, without applying a policy that actually will change this situation. Many social projects have been conducted in our schools, but I believe that the basis of the problem lies in a methodological issue. We need to refine the methodological foundations of education in the state, so that projects can be implemented effectively.

The teaching method of research is a critical teaching method that seeks to bring the subject to a new attitude toward the problems of their time and their space. The intimacy with them. The research, instead of mere, dangerous and boring repetition of passages and statements of its disconnected same conditions of life.

Terrorism, State of Exception and Human Rights
A look towards the perverted economic face of the 'declared war'

Rosa Maria Zaia Borges[1]

He´s a slave. But maybe a free spirit.
He´s a slave. Does that do him any harm?
Ask someone who is not.
One is a slave of pleasure, other, of avarice, other, of ambition, all of fear.
(SÊNECA, 2008)

Abstract: The paper titled "Terrorism, State of Exception and Human Rights: a look towards the perverse economic face of the 'declared war'" focus on the 2001 September 11th events. The intention is the provoke reflections about what we call "slavery of fear" in which we are (or we have been) immerse specially since 2001. Visiting authors like Noam Chomsky, Giorgio Agamben, Howard Becker, and also George Orwell, this paper starts reflecting the possible translations of the "September 11th"; right after it tries to discuss what it can and cannot be considered "terrorism", so that, in the final topic, create the conditions of possibility to discuss the State of Exception as the justifying mask of a "weapons economy", with green card to perpetuate the differences between rich and pour sovereignties.

Keywords: Terrorism – State of Exception – Human Rights

1. About the (un)nameable "September 11th"

The date: 2001 September 11th. The place: the city of New York.

[1] Doctor in Law at Universidade de São Paulo (USP/Brazil). Professor at the Faculty of Law at Pontifícia Universidade Católica do Rio Grande do Sul (PUCRS/Brazil).

The image: the Twin Towers being destroyed by a plane. The sounds: explosion; collapse; shouts, from inside and outside, those of desperate, these expressing the necessity of verbalizing what was seen; later discovered records from victims who were trying contact with family and friends from inside the building. The name: there wasn't, there isn't, since then we could only call it as a date "September 11th"[2]. Cruelty. Disgrace. Something that changed the course of history. Something that was never seen(?).

The act curtain of this paper is to demonstrate that this happening with senses and exceptional circumstances that was the "September 11th". The purpose is to provoke reflections about what we call "slavery of fear" in which we are (or we were put in) immerse specially since 2001, to create the conditions of possibility to bring into discussion the State of Exception as a justifying mask of an institutionalized politics turned to an "weapons economy", with green card to perpetuate the differences between rich and pour sovereignties.

Therefore, at this first moment, the reflexive provocation couldn't be any other but that one around what the "September 11th" was. Is it possible to translate/digest this event? Is it possible to transform "the date" in something with proper name and characteristics?

Baudrillard (2003, p.8) categorized the "September 11th" as the happening that ended the "strike of happenings". On the other hand, Chomsky defined it as a historical event, not because of the atrocities themselves, but because of the target. It is the first time, the first serious case, in which "one of the occidental powers was itself attacked in a way it generally attacks others"[3].

From these elaborations, it is possible to say that there are some

[2] For semantics reasons, and why not saying for rhetorical ones, in the lack of a proper name, every time the "September 11th" has to be referred it will always be put between quotation marks in this text.

[3] To illustrate his argument, Chomsky, ironically, reinforces that Europe has centuries of atrocities conduction around the world and it was never attacked: "[...] there were some smaller attacks, but Abyssinia didn't invade Italy, for example". To continue his argumentation, the author brings to memory that in Latin America, as well as in other place, the atrocities were hardly condemned, but always followed by some comment that established a link of familiarity with the situation. In this sense, he cites the example of a Panamanian journalist who compares the "September 11th" to the bombing against to El Chorillo neighborhood, in 1989, an intervention called "Operation Faire Cause", commanded by George Bush, in which around three thousand people were killed. (CHOMSKY, 2003, p. 118). See also: (CHOMSKY, 2002); (CHOMSKY, 2002b).

events that acquire meanings and exceptional connotations. Heuristic events like these bring historical and theoretical implications, which can be seen, as said Ianni (2003, pp.11-12), as "scientific experiments", because they explicit nexus, continuities, discontinuities, tensions and contradictions unimaginable in a previous time. In his own words, "it is like it was an explosion that involves the reality and the imaginable, in a way that soon it turned to be distinguishable the best relations, processes and structures of domination and appropriation that weren't well perceived". Suddenly, the social and mental frames of references of all people, individuals and collectivities, fall down around the world. With it, possibilities that weren't imaginable before are opened for the interpretation of relations, processes and domination structures, as well as social, political, economical and cultural nexus that cross the game of social forces and geopolitical operations are made more evident, visible, and transparent, in national, regional and world scales.

In a few time, all around the world, a lot of people realize that many things are out of order. Suddenly take place discontinuities, instability, affliction, fear, terror. The message transmitted by "September 11th", according to Ianni, was the following one: "it is time, for America, to discover how hated it is. The flight 175 of United was an intercontinental ballistic missile shot against America's innocence" (2003, p.13)[4].

It is like if the possibility of real, that was always haunting – but we never expect to be materialized, happened. The "September 11th" promotes the encounter to real, to what till now was dealt with as fiction. It became the metaphor of fear, of what is forbidden to talk about. The result: the forced recognition of fiction in reality, a trauma that can be translated as an excess of sense[5].

There can be many definitions. However, there is the necessity to give names so that the meanings can be associated and clear. Quickly, the "terrorism" category is elected as the translation of all this shock of [4] In another part, the author says: "For the first time in the history of the world supremacy of the United States of America it is confirmed, for one and another, in the United States and around the world, that the most powerful nation in the world is vulnerable. [...] It is a happening from what it is possible to raise the hypothesis that globalization rimes, simultaneously, with integration, fragmentation and revolution" (IANNI, 2003, p.15).

[5] Zizek (2003, p.34) teaches that in psychoanalysis the lesson is exactly the opposite: "reality mustn't be taken as fiction". It is necessary to have the ability of discerning, in what we notice as fiction, the hardcore of Real that we only have conditions to endure if we transform it in fiction.

reality. Fear. Violence. Destruction. Catastrophe. Barbarization. Death. Caused by whom? Who would be so cruel in a point of taking thousands of innocent lives, in a such barbarian and indefensible way? On the other hand, there's the necessity to find a guilty for the action itself but also to nominate the real that is revealed. It is necessary to recognize the "enemy" and that recognition is always a "performant activity" that, in the opposition of the deceiving appearances, brings to light or bild the "true face" of the enemy (ZIZEK, 2003, p.130).

Facing this, it is the conscience that we live in an isolated artificial universe that generates the notion that some criminal agent permanently threatens with total destruction. Therefore, it is possible to say, from Zizek's thinking (2003, p.49), that terrorists are transformed into an abstract irrational agent – abstract in the Hegelian sense of being isolated from the concrete social-ideological network that gave them existence. And "all the explanation that evokes the social circumstances is despised as a dissimulated justification of terror, and all particular entity is remembered only in a negative way".

It is like if it exists one manipulated (or manipulable) representation of who is "authorized to be victim". If the victim is defined, defined is the executor. Dichotomizations were always something welcome to humanity, in their most different aspects. "Things of the world" are divided in proper and improper, true or false, possible and real. All this because the established modern common sense settles itself in one truth: there is only one face of things(!), that one that the individuals can truly appropriate themselves. Nevertheless, the truth itself isn't something of what it is possible to take possession.

In this sense it is revealed the complexity of the dichotomy which is being manipulated post "September 11th": peace and war turned to be another dichotomy to be defined from very subjective criteria. And if it's right to say that the classifications of violence, crime and terrorism traditionally reiterate the purposes of economic and cultural powers, the violence associated to "September 11th" wouldn't be an exception.[6]

Even without a proper name, the "September 11th" became a [6] Stanley adverts, in a text written right after the attempt, that in various political pronouncements the pain and the suffering were associated to those ones lived by the United States. Specially, the author brings to memory the emotional pronouncement of Tony Blair at the time: "we must never forget how we feel when we watched the planes crashing against the towers, we must never forget those voice messages…" This speech turned out to be a 'cold shower' in the memory of the violence suffered by others in these and in the other next days after the bombing of Afghanistan" (STANLEY, 2002, p.209).

watershed in history. It isn't an exaggeration when Chomsky (2002b, p.66) says that the new millennium began with the monstrous crimes: the terrorist attacks of the September 11th, and the reaction against them, that certainly took an enormous number of innocent lives.

It is, therefore, (re)declared[7] the "war against terrorism". To call it like this, in Chomsky's words, "is simply an additional doses of advertisement, unless the war has as target, in fact, the terrorism" [8]. The irony of this speech turns to be, in the end, a crucial question for one deeper and critic analysis of "September 11th" and its consequences. After all, what "war" are we talking about? What is the difference of this "combat" and the other ones promoted, since long time, by the economically powerful countries? Indeed, what is terrorism and who is the terrorist? Who is the one to define it? From which criteria? Who fights who? With which means?

[7] Chomsky registers that the war against terrorism wasn't declared in September 11th, but twenty years before, during Reagan's administration. In accordance to the author, in that time, they announced the war against terrorism, particular against international terrorism directed to the State, as "the plague of modern era", and that it would be the focus of external politics of the United States. So, according to Chomsky, the war is (re) declared (CHOMSKY, 2003, p. 118).

[8] The use the term "war" here is not more than the mere reinforcement of the expression used by the United States when reacting to "September 11th". Chomsky incisively criticizes such used terminology, calling the attention to the convenience of the term "war". He remarks that, in the beginning, the United States used the word "crusade", replaced by "war" later, when they noticed that if there was the intention of make alliances in the Islamic world, for obvious reasons, the use of this term would be a big mistake. The same author recovers that, in Serbian case, the bombing was named "humanitarian intervention", term that, in any way, has a new use. Chomsky sustains that the most appropriate term for the situation of "September 11th" would be "crime", maybe "crime against humanity". However, he makes the reservation that, in this case, it is necessary really concrete proofs, what would open the doors for a dangerous question: who were the authors of the international terrorism crime condemned by Mundial Court fifteen years ago? The author refers to the attack conducted by the United States against Nicaragua, in 1980, when tens of thousands of people were killed. Nicaragua denounced the USA to the International Court of Justice and in 1986, they were condemned by illegal use of force (or international terrorism, as called by the author), vetting, right after, a resolution of the Security Council of the UN that claimed all the countries to follow the international laws (CHOMSKY, 2002, pp. 16-17).

2. Who is the enemy, who are you? Or how to define the terrorism

For the purpose of this paper, it is taken the premise as a consensus: the "September 11th" was a terrorist attack. Someone could call it an act of boldness(!). But, taking the same route of thinking discussed before, that one of reduction of world complexity by formulating dichotomizations, there wasn't any person who defended the event, in opposition of terror, as an act of peace. So, being true this premise, it is important to define what an act of terror is.

Hector SAINT PIERRE (2003, p.53) says that the "September 11th" provoked a new world order, from a realignment of alliances and strategic projections produced with the clear purpose of fighting against a non-definition terrorism or, even worse, a bad definition. His position is that one of the biggest difficulties in defining terrorism is the highly subjective characterization of terror.

The intention here is to propose one (among many others possible) analytical perspective of terrorism borrowing Howard Becker's (2008) concept of outsiders. The author is known by his sociological studies about deviation and develops his ideas since the next proposition: all social groups make rules and try, in certain circumstances, to impose them. This way, social rules define situations and kinds of appropriate behaviors related to them, specifying some actions as "right" e prohibiting other ones as "wrong".

When one rule is imposed, that one that presumably violates it can be seen as a special type of person, someone from whom it is not expected to live in accordance to the rules created by the group. This person is taken as an outsider. However, according to Becker (2008, p.15), the person labeled as an outsider can have a different opinion about the question. He/she cannot accept the rule from which he/she is being jugged, and cannot face those ones who judge himself/herself competent or legitimately authorized to do it. Consequently, it emerges a second meaning of the term: that one who violates the rule can think his/her judges as outsiders[9].

By this theoretical discussion we can deduce that the deviation is less a quality of the act that is committed by one person, and more a consequence of application by others of rules and sanctions to the violator. The deviator is someone to whom this label was given; the behavior taken as a deviation is that one people label like that. Becker (2008, p.25) alerts, however, that the graduation of an act will be treated as deviation depends also of who practices it and of who feels harm by it; and that the rules tend to be applied more to some people than to others. So, the deviation is not a quality inner of the behavior itself but in the interaction between the person that commits an act and those ones who react to it.

The author builds, yet, an important analysis for the discussion here proposed: if it's possible to think human activity as collective, it is possible to do the same with deviation. Calling it of "interactionist", the general idea of the proposal is the follow one: in its most simple way, the theory consists that all people are involved in any episode of supposed deviation. When this is done, it is discovered that these activities demand the open or presumed cooperation of many people to occur in such way. By this mean, when it is considered all the people and organizations involved in an episode of a potentially deviator behavior, it is also found out that the collective activity in course consist in more than acts in which it is alleged someone's bad action. It is a complex drama, where making accusations is the central point. The idea is to make "the study of deviation as essentially that one of the construction of reaffirmation of moral meanings of everyday social life". From this results that, some of the main social actors don't involve themselves in bad action, best identified as imposers of law or morality, as people who lament themselves that other actors are bad behaving, that arrest them, that present them to legal authorities or give them punishments (BECKER, 2008, pp.184-185).

By this discussion, it is possible to construct viable definitions of particular actions that people could commit or of particular categories of deviation as the world (in special, but not only, the authorities) defines them. But it is not possible to make both completely coincide, because they don't coincide empirically. They belong to two different systems, although partially overlap, of collective action. One consists in people who cooperate to produce the act in question. The other, in people who cooperate in the morality drama by which the "transgression" is discovered and treated, being this process formal and legal, or completely informal (BECKER, 2008, p.186).

In general lines, it is possible to take three conclusions from this briefly presented analysis of the concept of outsiders: a. the outsider is considered a "deviator" less by his/her act and more by the way the others label the act; b. the outsider is not a category that can be defined and comprehended isolated, individually, that is, the deviation itself is insofar as it reinforces/reaffirms the moral meanings of everyday social life; c. it exists a relation of power the authorizes who defines the outsider and who, is a consequence, is target of the definition.

About the terrorist being a deviator there is no doubt. The same can be said about the "September 11th": there is no doubt it was an act of terrorism. However, the important reflection that can be extracted from this discussion is: who fits the definition of terrorist on and who has the authority to define who is "in" and who is "out of" the definition.

We can borrow the definition of terrorism from the U.S. Code, an official document of USA government, 1984 dated, where an act of terrorism means any activity that: a. involves a violent act or a serious threat of human life that can be considered crime by the USA or any other nation, or that is crime as that recognized, if committed inside American or any other jurisdictional territories; and b. seems (i) to be an intimidation or coercion to civil population; (ii) to influence the governmental politics by means of intimidation or coercion; or (iii) to threaten the conduct of a government by a murder or kidnapping.

Thus, the "September 11th" could be defined as a terrorist attempt, although, the actors themselves, the Unites States, couldn't assume such definition, because if they do this it is revealed is terrorist State condition (CHOMSKY, 2002, p.17).[10] As we can see there's no mirror behind this definition.

It is clear that it's always easier to personalize the enemy, "to identify a big symbol of Great Evil", than try to comprehend what is behind the atrocities committed. And, of course, as remarked by Chomsky, "there is always the inclination to ignore the own role played in the question [...]" (CHOMSKY, 2002, pp.40-41). The "September 11th" gives to the USA the opportunity to understand the kind of world in which they take part. And, in accordance to the author (ZIZEK, 2003, p.63), they made the option to reaffirm their traditional ideological commitments: down to feelings of responsibility and guilty in relation to the misery of Third World, now we are the victims!

[10] In international plan, there is a background of frustrated tries of defining terrorism in a clear way. In 1937, the Convention of Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism, defines it: "(...) criminal acts directed against a State and intended or calculated to create a state of terror in the midds of particular persons, or a group of persons or the general public". Also in 1972, in the Project of the Convention for Prevention and Punishment of International Terrorism, terrorism is defined as "act of any person that kills illegally, causes serious body lesions or kidnaps another person". Yet, the Convention to Prevent and Punish Acts of Terrorism of American States Organization, of 1971; the European Convention for the Repression of Terrorism of 1977.

By making the correlation of terrorist as an outsider, it isn't difficult to conclude that some social actors stay on (or are put on) the "deviation window", while those who label deviate (ironically) themselves from the condition of part of the deviation conduct; and that the relations of power determine who suffers the sanction and who establishes the sanction. It is like, as a consequence of this representation, automatically, it remains authorized the decision making to answer appropriately to that one that is the perpetrator of violence – the outsider, it doesn't matter the means that foray will be done[11].

According to Baudrillard (2003, p.14), the collapse of the towers is the most symbolic happening. If the image wasn't that, the effect wouldn't be the same, the shouting proof of the fragility of the world power wouldn't be the same. This way, the towers, that were the symbol of this power, still embody it in this dramatic end, that remembers a suicide. By watching them falling down, as in an implosion, it creates the impression that they were committing suicide in response of the suicide planes. At the same time architectonic and symbolic object, evidently it was aimed the symbolic one; it is possible to imagine that the physical destruction brought about the symbolic collapse. But it is the opposite: the symbolic aggression caused the physical collapse.

About the terror, it is already known that it is all around, in institutional violence, in (sometimes not so) homeopathic doses. Terrorism just cristalizes all the hung ingredients. It enlaces, even being the violent deconstruction of this extreme way of efficiency and hegemony, the orgy of power, of liberation, of flux, of calculation, of what the Twin Towers were the incarnation. The twin sister of compassion (as twin as the two towers) is arrogance. People cry for themselves at the same time they are stronger. What gives the right to be the strongest is the fact of being, since now, the victims. It is the perfect alibi, all the mental health of the victim, through what it is eliminated all guilty, what allows in some way to use the unhappiness as a credit card (BAUDRILLARD, 2003, pp.30-).

Characterized the deviation conduct, there can be, according to the system of social rules, a sanction. Becker (2008, p.189) brings an interrogation that deserves to be brought into discussion: in which circumstances are done and imposed the rules ex post facto? The empirical investigation will show that this occurs when a participant in a relation is disproportionately powerful, so that he/she can make his/her will overpower above the objections of others, but desires to maintain an appearance of justice and rationality[12].

And fear is the key to open all the doors of the strategic constructions (or manipulations) around terrorism, around violence, around action and reaction, defining, on the other hand, in what side is one and other, respectively, terrorist and victim. Chauí (1995, p.44) would say about fear: "strange feeling that makes us insensate putting 'wings in our feet' when we were supposed not to run and 'attaching us to the ground' when running away is necessary. It steals us the courage and give opportunity to cruelty".

At this point, it is possible to say that the green card for the (re) affirmation of exceptionality as rule is issued: the State of Exception.

3. State of Exception[13]: the green card for the hegemonic trade of fear

Right after the Second World War, George Orwell wrote series of texts for the Tribune. One of these texts, 1945 dated, titled You and the atomic bomb, seems to be recently wrote. At that time, Orwell practically begins his text questioning, with a certain irony, the almost indifferent discussion about what he called the biggest concern to all: "how difficult are these things to manufacture?".[14]

[12] Such idea brings back to memory two situations involving states representatives. One of them when Condoleezza Rice, at that time assessor of National Security of the White House, declared that "being Saddam Hussein an entity of evil, the world must help us to fight him". The other one, in occasion of bin Laden's death, when Obama, in a public pronouncement about the "big act", said about the result of the operation that the "justice" have been done.

[13] We follow the terminology adopted by Agamben – State of Exception – in the opposition of the expressions used by Italian and French doctrine – that prefer "decree of urgency" and "state of siege" (AGAMBEN, 2004, pp.15-).

[14] "This George Orwell piece was originally published by the Tribune on October 19, 1945 within two months after atomic bombs were dropped over Hiroshima and Naga-

With this question, George Orwell (1945) concluded the atomic bomb is fantastically expensive, that its fabrication demands an enormous industrial effort, and because of that only three or four countries in the world are capable to do it. And he adverts: "This point is of cardinal importance, because it may mean that the discovery of the atomic bomb, so far from reversing the history, will simply intensify the trends which have been apparent for a dozen years past".

The sentence that justifies all the reflection of Orwell (1945) is the follow one: "it is a commonplace that the history of civilization is largely the history of weapons". He completes his argument saying that when the dominant weapons are expensive and difficult to manufacture it tends to be despotic times, while if the dominant weapon is cheap and simple, common people have a chance. Saying this, he concludes that a complex weapon makes the strong stronger, while a simple weapon gives claws to the weak.

To prove this thesis, Orwell (1945) creates a relation between succeed popular revolutions and the facilities of the production and the utilization of certain kinds of arms. While developing his argument, he turns to demonstrate that the evolution of the arms is inversely proportional to the empowerment, from the states or who else that already can (or could) do it. And prophesizes: "The one thing that might reverse it is the discovery of a weapon – or, to put it more broadly, of a method of fighting – not dependent on huge concentrations of industrial plant".

Orwell (1945) proposes an exercise of speculation: suppose that the surviving great nations make a tacit agreement never to use the atomic bomb against one another; suppose they only use it, or the threat of use it, against people who are unable to retaliate. In this case, he concludes, "we are back where we were before, the only difference being that power is concentrated in still fewer hands and that the Outlook for subject peoples and oppressed classes is still more hopeless".

Orwell (1945) goes to the end of his text saying that the atomic bomb maybe completes the process of oppression, by robbing the exploited classes and peoples of all power to revolt, and at the same time putting the possessors of the bomb on a basis of military equality. And saki, Japan by the only country ever to have used them to kill people and destroy cities, viz., the U.S.A. Orwell had written enough about the same (re: A. Bomb) but this particular piece was exceptional for the insights it shared about the world dispensation that lay ahead in the age of atomic weaponry. In addition, it was clear that the groundwork for his novel, Nineteen Eighty-Four had been completed by this writing" (note from the website).

concludes: "Unable to conquer one another, they are likely to continue ruling the world between them [...]. If, as seems to be the case, it is a rare and costly object as difficult to produce as a battleship, it is likelier to put an end to large-scale wars at the cost of prolonging indefinitely a 'peace that is no peace'". Unfortunately, the text is surprisingly of all times: it anticipates, at the same time it authorizes, the proposed analogy to be done to the "September 11th".

Right after the "September 11th", in November of 2001, it is promulgated in the United States a military order that authorizes indefinite detention and the process in the military commissions of non American citizens suspected of being involved to terrorists activities. Before that, it was already approved by American Senate the USA Patriot Act[15], that allows to keep detention the foreign suspect of activities that put in risk national security, and in a term of seven days, the foreign person should have been banished or accused of violation of the migration law or any other crime.

Agamben (2004, pp.38-) had already anticipate, analyzing the juridical nature of the USA Patriot Act, that these moments considered extraordinary give State power beyond the regulations and the State of Exception became the pattern of action of most of the nations.

We admit as a general consensus that the State of Exception became a paradigm of social (re)organization after "September 11th" and it spread a large process of individuals and collectivities control, starting in the US society, with domino effect also in European societies, sparkling on Asian, African and Latin American societies; also, democratic rights acquired from social fights are reduced or eliminated and the juridical, political, military and police controls were increased under individuals, collectivities, organizations and social movements.

It is also admitted that the State of Exception reinforces the concept of absolute sovereignty, which allows, in the name of security, doing anything, inside or in other States territories – in this case, in the territory of that States who were considered humanity enemies. In this case, it is easy to agree to Chomsky (2002, p.24): "Occident is largely ecumenical in its choice of enemies. The criteria are subordination and servility to power and not to religion".

While encouraging fear, disseminating insecurity, limiting rights, centralizing the decision power in the hands of the Executive, the State of Exception appears as a necessary measure, illegal but perfectly juridical and constitutional, that materializes itself with the creation of new rules (or of a new juridical order) (AGAMBEN, 2004, p.44). However, the thesis this paper wants to call the attention is that that the creation of these new rules attends to old purposes – the maintenance of economic hegemony – but with a new "card on the hand": the "war against terrorism".

In other words, the terrorist acts become, because of their atrocities, "a gift to the most inflexible and repressive elements of all factions and they were explored to accelerate the militarization, regimentation and reversion schedule of the democratic social programs, besides to favor the transference of wealth to restrict segments and undermine democracy in all its relevant forms" (CHOMSKY, 2002, pp.21-22).

Here is the interesting point of this debate: the economic side of the "September 11th". If it's true that all "crashes" of real world are related to global capitalism, so the "September 11th" sets wide open the crash of economic and geopolitical concerns of the USA. According to Zizek (2003, pp.58-59), the USA are forced to explicitly recognize the primacy of economics under democracy – that is, the secondary and manipulative character of international interventions – when they affirm to protect democracy and human rights[16].

[16] The following passage translates in figures the fallacy of humanitarian interventions: "Even before September 11, millions of Afghans were being sustained – barely – by international food aid. On September 16, the New York Times reported that Washington had 'demanded [from Pakistan] the elimination of truck convoys that provide much of the food and other supplies to Afghanistan's civilian population'. There was no detectable reaction in the US or Europe to the demand that enormous numbers of destitute people be subjected to starvation and slow death. In subsequent weeks, the world's leading newspaper reported that 'The threat of military strikes forced the removal of international aid workers, crippling assistance programs'; refugees reaching Pakistan 'after arduous journeys from Afghanistan are describing scenes of desperation and fear at home as the threat of American-led military attacks turns their long-running misery into a potential catastrophe'. 'The country was on a lifeline,' one evacuated aid worker reported, 'and we just cut the line'. […] The Food and Agricultural Administration (FAO) had warned in late September that over 7 million people might face starvation unless aid was immediately resumed and the threat of military action terminated. After bombing began, the FAO issued even more grave warnings of humanitarian catastrophe, and advised that the bombing had disrupted planting that provides 80 per cent of the country's grain supplies, so that the effects next year will be even more severe. All unreported. These unreported appeals happened to coincide with World Food Day, which was also

The key-question that it is the intention to foment could be translated (boldly, it can be said) in the following analysis: if a terrorist (the outsider of the manuals against terrorism, defined even before the "September 11th") carries on a weapon it is because there is weapon trade! There is somebody that manufactures, sells and profits this armament. That is, there is a system that (re)produces the means of violence. So, what is the deviation conduct at all?

And more, if the outsider is the one who uses the arms, the result is that the speech of "good combat" is enough to justify continuing with the production of arms, as that production is sustained by the "war against terror" and not its support.

The question is that the "war against terror" and its weapons (between them the State of Exception itself) doesn't discuss who makes the arm and the consequences of this for the "feeding the system". The one thing that justifies the "war" is the terrorist, the one who uses the arm to cause terror.

If the function of terrorism is that one given by the U.S. Code – obtain political, ideological, religious or other aims using intimidation, threat or use of violence – so, looking to the present, in fact, "the international terrorism is openly announced as official plan of action" (CHOMSKY, 2003, p.118).

As consequence, the term terrorism is used by each State, each system of power, to refer to the terrorism "they" conduct against us [in reference to the United States], and not for that one "we" conduct against them (CHOMSKY, 2003, p.121). This is the real definition. Thus there are appropriate and inappropriate ways to respond to terrorism, and the appropriate way are not being contemplated. This is the big power, "we do what we want". In this sense, the war is new, in terms that this time it has a certain kind of pretext. But if the observation is towards the conduction of war, it turns to be so familiar[17].

ignored, along with the charge by the UN Special Report that the rich and powerful easily have the means, though not the will to overcome this 'silent genocide'. The airstrikes have turned cities into 'ghost towns', the press reported, with electrical power and water supplies destroyed, a form of biological warfare. Seventy per cent of the population was reported to have fled Kandahar and Heart, mostly to the country-side, where in ordinary times between 10 and 20 people are killed or crippled every day by land mines. Those conditions are now much worse. UN mine-clearing operations were halted and unexploded US ordnance adds to the torture, particularly the lethal bomblets scattered by cluster bombs, which are much harder to clear" (CHOMSKY, 2002b, pp. 66-68).

[17] In this same direction: "It isn't about to imagine that the terrorist attack provokes a

Orwell, therefore, was right when he said things could remain the way they were in terms of economic exploitation of the stronger in relation to the weaker ones. It is not necessary to notice that the targets of the attacks "in defense of the American people and its honor" are countries that put to the test the Empire[18], but that don't have any condition to react in the same proportion. To the other hand, the military industry maintains itself under the argument that it is necessary to fight the terror, with media support, which explores and sells fear, which convinces that the enemy can be always around.

In general terms – without taking the risk to generalize because there are movements of reaction to the "war against terrorism" – media and governors occupy the "empty space", in terms of critical reflection, that fear provides. According to Agambem (2000, pp.94-95), this means that a general analysis must take into account the fact that capitalism (or any other name that is possible to give to the process of domination of history of the world) not only commands the expropriation of the productive activity, but also and above all commands the alienation of the language itself, of the communicative nature of human beings.

And, at the end of this process of "war against terrorism", in the name of alleged protection of human rights, there isn't any difference between global and universal. The universal globalizes itself; democracy and human rights circulate exactly like any other world product, as oil or capitals ((BAUDRILLARD, 2003, pp.52-53). Therefore, any political, social and economical system, that is not democratic under the eyes of Occident, must be fought.

That way, the occidental governors reserve the categorization of terrorist for the acts of indiscriminate violence done by activists that don't act under a state organization, and refuse themselves to recognize the existence of State terrorism. They take advantage of the fact that the pure terrorism doesn't intend to hidden itself – on the contrary, does kind of right-wing policy of the elites governing, dominant classes, constituted powers and sectors of public opinion. This can be only a superficial impression. What occurs is mostly the revelation and the development of situations and potentialities in certain way already constituted. Something that is in germination which soon manifests and disseminates itself. This right-wing policy has roots in the industry of national and world society, by its inequalities and active and extended tensions, with what it is fermented McCarthyism, fascism and Nazism, since century XX" (IANNI, 2003, pp.15-16).

[18] We highlight here, that the United States – as Empire – are used as allegory, as a representation of a group of sovereign states that adopt in their international politics the realistic posture, by which the authority is in the military power.

all the efforts so that the society knows about its existence – while State terrorism does all it is possible to become "invisible", because it is as efficient as unnoticed it is[19].

This is free market. Weapons are the products. Fear is the bargaining chip. And State (of Exception) guarantees that everything is made under legality. All in the name of security, liberty and peace as human rights to be defended and preserved.

Deconstructing Terrorism
Trauma, perversions and auto-immunities

Augusto Jobim do Amaral[1]

Abstract: This short paper intends, since the radical thought of deconstruction, interferes in the reflection on terrorism, seem as a symptom of an auto-immune crisis that cross through the democratic territory. In this sense, in a way that makes it possible to destabilize the discursive structural properties which commonly keep the debate about this subject, it will be necessary to perceive the viral violence caused by the traumatic experience of what is called September 11th (11S). If after the hit of the economic and military order head symbol, we could, far beyond the physiological point of view, perceive the temporality of trauma produced in the future, it will be possible to touch the auto-evident node of the vicious circle of repression. Such auto-immune perversion that sends forth a threaten of the worse to come, on the one hand, seems to have as the exactly target a kind of self-compassion, (arrogant) vulnerability that becomes a perfect alibi for the committing big atrocities, even worse, in an orgy of power, to extreme the deregulation and disorder logic that feeds the speculative logic in a market scale. The foisted idea of a ´major event´ brings together the abolition of any principle and notion of causality, kidnapping and asphyxiating future itself, in a kind non ending war in which prevention – anticipation as if it was a ´non-war´ state –, perpetuated terror and security obsession take in this order the strategic primacy. As a suction bomb, the higher representation, in democracy, of spontaneous suicide of its own defense mechanisms is placated by the perpetual familiarity state with terror, principle of total insecurity that, far from paying attention to the heteronomy came from the other in its irreducible and non-appropriable difference, fortify the control devices and regenerate exactly what is was supposed to disarm, presenting itself as an universal figure of the power incapable of supporting the diversity spectrum.

Keywords: Deconstruction. Terrorism. Democracy.

Writing based on an extreme thought process such as deconstruction, if such a thing is possible at all, calls less for an analytical method and much more for destabilizing structural properties that bind certain conceptual schemes. It entails strong arguments to suspend hypotheses and assumptions, the diametrically rigid oppositions that identify a conceptual construction. An intervention, under homogenous identities, which does not mean to negotiate with its subject-matter in exchange for some meaning or signification but seeks deconstructive features that detotalize self-inclusive totalities. Hence, thinking about the so-called "terrorism" to some extent requires thinking about a symptom: an invitation to reflect deconstructing something which, beyond the metaphor, had been torn down. In such case, we could seek new criteria to make a distinction between "understanding" and "justifying", condemning and never acquiescing to neutralize the unspeakableness of the deaths. However, we can explain and describe a series of associations the topic raises.

1. First, namely speaking "September 11" means plunging into a mechanic and repetitious pronunciation of a date that betrays the powerlessness of not knowing what we are actually talking about. We repeat it as though to exorcise the thing, conjure it away, deny it – a repetition compulsion as the portrait of a terrifying imperative. To that end, there is the feeling, to a large extent constructed, conditioned and circulated by the media, of an unprecedented major event, an indelible mark erroneously imprinted and which confines any horizons. Regardless of such hermeneutic apparatus, that which had been "threatened" was the credit of American power, the ballast of some world order since the end of the cold war, that is, the discourse that comes to be accredited in the world's public space. However, it should be noted that such monumentalizing through death contains within it a certain logic that regulates an entire process which we can precisely call autoimmunitary: a strange behavior where a living being, in a quasi-suicidal fashion, "itself" works to destroy its own protection, to immunize itself against its "own" immunity. Protecting itself by shedding its self-protection. In and of itself, such implacable law has been quite highly regarded to the extent that the aggression the country suffered "came from within", carried out by immigrants trained and prepared in the US.

A second and even more relevant self immunity reflex is seen as we examine the traumatic event. Extending beyond the trauma only marked as an event by the memory and linked to presence or to the past by the repetition compulsion, this order of temporalization must be rethought. Questioning its chronology means realizing the mark of making the September 11 look like a "major event" exactly in the impression of a wound permanently open in the future – worse than anything that has ever taken place, a sign of an im-presentable to come (à venir) through the lingering threat in which the trauma of aggression is present and effective.

On the other hand, that which leads to the attempt of making such event unique, in addition to the hodgepodge of causes and effects or the barrenness of any explanation of the sort, it is especially a certain liberation from any references that elicits the effect of a suction pump that smothers all future events and, in some sense, encloses it in a self-sufficient totality. Additionally, when absolute evil derives from the enemy's anonymous invisibility, all efforts are directed towards neutralizing it, desperate attempts at movements that feed back the very monstrosity they claim they are trying to defeat. With that, we have the third and most important perverse reflex of autoimmunity per se: the vicious circle of repression. Regenerating the causes of that which they claim to eradicate is the logic of the endless war. However, this time without a distinction between enemy states, or through the identification of rebellion or liberation movements, furthermore in a setting in which the territorial determination of the conflict is inadequate.

It should be said, albeit without much haste, that when compared to the possibilities of destruction in the future, invisible and silently arranged from an "IT bomb" in store on computerized networks across the world, the September 11 will seem like an archaic theater of violence from a distant past. In other words, while today it is technoscience that blurs the difference between war and terrorism, figures that are always contaminative and impossible to tell apart, likewise at any point in history the affirming the differences between State and non-State terrorism, terrorism and national liberation movements, national and international terrorism has been and remains not viable. As is the case with other crucial legal notions, it is this concept's ineffable irreducibility that makes it self-evident and able to be opportunistically appropriated. It is precisely for remaining obscure and dogmatic that it lends itself to being used by hegemonic powers in the manner they see fit. In other words, it is in the semantic instability that we recognize the force strategies of a prevailing power that manages to impose itself and legitimize (and even legalize) the interpretation that best suits it in a given situation.

2. In other words, upon denaturalizing the concept of terrorism we manage to see, among other things, the US interest in exposing their own vulnerability by giving the greatest coverage possible to the aggression from which they wish to protect themselves. Again, the autoimmunitary perversion of a virtual threat stated as a possibility (something that announces itself before becoming something) is enough to impose itself, above all, as the non-eradicable root of terror. That somehow requires certain massive compassion for oneself, the representation of some solicitude that turns everyone into a victim. Lest we forget: the opposite of compassion is arrogance, and given certain moral notion under which we are Good and those who attacked us can only be Evil – we were so good that we have been attacked, the tragedy has finally come to prove we are happy and that others envy our happiness! –, which gives us the right to be the strongest, a sort of "masochism of the strongest", is the fact that from now on we are victims and can speak from a position of authority. The logic of victimization which, instead of snatching the United States from any ideological dreams, is used as a sedative to, besides the ideology returning to its usual state, enable the perfect alibi: unhappiness given credit as ballast that in no way prevents us from continuing to do Good, now unscrupulously.

In view of that, some standard reading should be inverted. The WTC collapse, instead of representing the intrusion of the real that shattered the illusory sphere, was but the destruction of the very reality by the image that invaded it. Something that in fact used to merely inhabit a distant virtual social reality numbed by some informative device finally enters the coordinates of that which we feel is actually real. A dramatic experience deeply lending itself as an artifice to reaffirm the temptations and basic hegemonic coordinates, oblivious, for instance, to any sense of responsibility or guilt towards the third world's plights, because obviously "we are the victims".

In this backdrop, we cannot lose sight of the possibility of some objective complicity between the superpower and that which raises against it abroad/in the motherland. While the goal of said terrorist attacks may include inflicting some instability or deep impact on the world order superpowers, its inherent absurd is the risk that such increase in disorder and disarray may strengthen police and security control devices. The crowning of the globalization process? If, as it seems, all enemy violence is finally an accomplice of the existing order, it is because it makes the speculative system typical of the current capitalist logic go back to the extremes of the general uncertainty principle, which terrorism merely translates as full-blown lack of security. While floating capitals, unpredictable flows, forced mobility and acceleration, and speculative non-places translate the suspended ingredients of the efficient hegemonic violence, it is in the extension of a logic of underlying violence and uncertainty that such phenomena paradoxically contribute to a sort of "power orgy."

The state of endless war commented on above, in which the security order is a strategy on a planetary scale, denotes exactly the virulence and a certain "victory of terrorism" in which the obsession for security is turned into a naturally (not so veiled) manner of perpetual terror under the universal principle of prevention. A sort of global-scale prophylaxis to neutralize stigmatized populations and channel bias-laden differences. Maximum anticipation and dissuasion as references in the search for a criminal ghost, albeit a reality which will concretely haunt the usual disrupting signs of the hegemonic order. A viral violence specter which, out of a chain reaction and in addition to destroying our immunities and any ability to resist, announces some "end of history", obviously excluding the one related to preventative terror as the only possibility of an event.

3. In further closing, a full power, where the disquieting non-war state in which terror is familiar is above all power in its pure state, also carries within it its own weakness, the most extreme of all: its end. It ends up turning on itself to the extent it is no longer able to question itself, given it differs from anything other than its own unveiled totality: however, as an absolute, in its wild state, it also carries the empty bottom of sovereignty – this inescapable inner anguish brought to light by terrorism.

Targeted killings
Legal and ethical justifications

Tomasz Żuradzki[1]

Abstract: The purpose of this paper is the analysis of both legal and ethical ways of justifying targeted killings. I compare two legal models: the law enforcement model vs the rules of armed conflicts; and two ethical ones: retribution vs the right of self-defence. I argue that, if the targeted killing is to be either legally or ethically justified, it would be so due to fulfilling of some criteria common for all acceptable forms of killing, and not because terrorist activity is somehow distinguished and gives special privileges to a state that fights it. The practical implication of my analysis is that one of the most spectacular targeted killings, which was the targeting and killing of Osama bin Laden in May 2011, was not justified, because it was only supposed to be a retribution for the September 11th terrorist attacks.

Keywords: the ethics of war, targeted killings, terrorism

1. Introduction

In the recent years one can observe practices that are morally controversial and often incompatible with international law. The advocates of these practices claim that they are the response to the unprecedented threats to the safety. First and foremost, these practises are based on treating the opponents as "unlawful combatants" (these are the participants of military actions, to whom neither the law of armed conflict nor the criminal law is applied); abductions as well as long-standing detention of people accused of terrorist activity with no right to defence or a court trial; extortion of testimonies through tortures or controversial interrogation techniques; the phenomenon of progressing privatisation of military services; finally, it is a so called targeted killings, applied to those suspected of terrorist actions.

The purpose of this article is the analysis of both legal and ethical acceptability of applying the targeted killing policy. In the field of law the basic dispute on the understanding practices of this kind looks as follows: should they be understood as an extrajudicial execution, or as one of the ways of conducting a war (Kretzmer 2005)? When it comes to the former option, the targeted killing policy should be understood (and at the same time justified) in a way analogical to very rare cases, in which the internal law allows killing somebody without a trial; concerning the latter option - in a way analogical to the cases of killing fighting opponents, acceptable in the law of armed conflict. In turn, the dispute on the justification of the acceptability of the targeted killing policy looks as follows: should this policy be understood in the categories of the dispensation of justice, or as a self-defence action. As I will prove in this text, the theoretical misunderstandings concerning the legal and ethical justification of the targeted killing policy are often caused by utterances of the politicians themselves, who, while seeking the justification for their actions, refer to mutually contradictory legal and ethical paradigms.

Analyses conducted in this text will be based on the main hypothesis of the research project I currently conduct, which assumes that the norms regulating the acceptability and ways of carrying out armed conflicts should be consistent with moral intuitions concerning the use of violence, when it comes to individual cases. Therefore I claim that the effective justification of the legal acceptability of the targeted killing policy should be close to the justification of the acceptability of killing in the armed conflicts. The ethical justification should refer to the necessity of self-defence actions of a given community.

The main problem I would like to emphasise is that when it comes to the targeted killing policy killing is very often the effect of preventive actions, whereas the typical justification of self-defence refers to the necessity of defence from the existing and unexpected threat. The practical implication of the argumentation presented in this article looks as follows: while it could help in legal and ethical justification of many cases of using the targeted killing policy, it could not be applied in the case of one of the most spectacular actions, which was the targeting and killing of Osama bin Laden in May 2011, which, as one can understand, was supposed to deliver justice for the terrorist attacks from the 11th of September 2001.

2. Targeted killing and the war against terrorism

Targeted killing of selected people has probably always been an element of armed conflicts and various wars between states: the leaders of other states were secretly killed, as well as people who worked on new types of weapon, and whose disappearance caused civil unrest, etc. However, in most cases the states or groups using this solution did not speak about it openly, but most often denied any connections with this or that assassination. The new aspect that appeared in the current targeted killing policy is the fact that in the several recent years it was recognized as an official tactics of conducting military action and anti-terrorism action in two important democratic countries: Israel and the USA.

Israel has officially applied the targeted killing policy since 2000, when Hussein Abayat was killed this way in the West Bank. Obviously, it is highly probable that when it comes to Israel, such a proceeding is nothing new, but undoubtedly the public admission of using this policy was something new. Other much publicised assassinations were those of Hammas leaders: Ahmed Yassin and Abdel Aziz al-Rantisi, who were targeted and killed by the Israeli forces in 2004. It is estimated that in the period between November 2000 and October 2012, the Israeli forces have killed 437 people as a result of the targeted killing policy, mostly in the Gaza Strip of whom only 261 people were killed "according to the plan" and others were civilian casualties (B'Tselem 2013).

Similar policy of fighting new threats to public security has recently been adopted by the United States of America. In November 2002 six people were killed in Yemen by a rocket launched by a drone. One of the victims was Qaed Salim Sinan al Hareth, bin Laden's bodyguard, who was supposed to be co-responsible for the attack on the American ship Cole in 2000, in which 17 American soldiers died. One of the most recent examples of how severe legal or moral problems can be caused by the targeted killing policy is a relatively late (September 2011) killing of Anwar al-Awlaki by a rocket launched from an American drone. He was a citizen of the USA, who had lived in Yemen for a couple of years, from where he called for conducting the holy war with the West. The permission for launching the rocket was given by the USA secretary of defence. The problem is that - as the critics of this decision argued - American citizens must not be killed without a trial. In turn, the advocates of the decision made by president Barrack Obama's administration presented two ways of argumentation. First of all, they claimed that, according to the law of armed conflict, in war situations one can be killed without a trial, if they fight on the opposite site, even if they are a citizen of a given country; it is also allowed to execute traitors captured during military action in an enemy's army. Second, they argued that al-Awlaki's assassination is analogical to some actions in the period of peace, e.g. necessary defence that allows police officers or soldiers to kill a given person without a trial, if their actions are a direct threat for other people's lives. In this case one can perfectly see one of the main theoretical problems concerning the justification of the targeted killing policy: if it should be understood in the category of the law of armed conflict or in the category of local law.

The significance of this problem is also proved by the fact that at the time of Barrack Obama's presidency the targeted killing policy became one of the main methods of fighting terrorism. At the time of Obama's rule, American administration issued a permission to conduct many more "target and kill" operations than during the two terms of George W. Bush. According to one of the reports prepared on the basis of the data which appeared in reliable media (both Western and Middle-Eastern), between 2004 and 2013 the USA conducted 422 attacks in Pakistan's and Yemen's territory (including 49 at the time of George W. Bush's presidency), killing from 2426 to 3969 people (New America Foundation 2013; The Bureau Of Investigative Journalism 2013).

The targeted killing policy is commonly recognised as an element of anti-terrorist actions. A model example, to which many authors investigating this problem refer, looks as follows (Blum, Heymann 2010): imagine that American Intelligence Services obtained reliable information about people preparing a terrorist attack against the USA. However, potential terrorists are on the territory of a state, which is not able to enforce the law itself. Obviously, American administration can formally ask the authorities of this state for capturing potential terrorists and judge them on the basis of existing regulations and international obligations of this state. The problem is that the state, where the terrorists are active is weak, the authorities do not control the whole territory effectively or simply refuse to cooperate in this matter - in spite of the obvious international provisions concerning this issue. In such a case - as the supporters of such policy claim - the only effective prevention against the planned terrorist attack is targeting a potential terrorist or their group and striking in an appropriate moment, e.g. by a drone.

However, some authors underline that limiting the targeted killing policy to an anti-terrorist practices is a mistake (Statman 2012). Even if Israel or the USA call every attack on their citizens, territory or property conducted by a group of fighters a "terrorist attack", it is important to differentiate attacking civilian targets (e.g. the WTC attack from the 11th of September 2001) from attacking military targets (e.g. the suicidal attack from the 12th of October, 2000 on American guided missile destroyer USS Cole stationing in Aden, Yemen). According to many popular definitions of terrorism, an attack on military target is not counted as a terrorist attack (Coady 1985, cf Held 1991). What is more, omitting complicated definitional questions concerning the understanding of terrorism, one can imagine using the targeted killing policy during the traditionally understood armed conflicts (e.g. aimed at scientists working on new types of weapon).

Therefore it seems that for the effective justification of targeted killing policy - either ethical or legal - there is no difference if its targets are terrorists (also those potential) or other categories of people. Therefore in this text I will make an assumption that the criteria allowing for justification of killing are the same, no matter the formal classification of the victims, and in this way I will question if there are two different systems regulating the ethical acceptability of killing, depending on whether a given conflict is armed or not (McMahan 2004, Żuradzki 2010a). The criteria allowing for justification of killing are the following: an attack (also a potential one) of the second side has to be unjustified; that killing of a future perpetrator is the only way to stop the attack; that such a killing is proportional to the evil intended by the future perpetrators of the attack etc. Some investigators of international relations or the ethics of war would postulate a requirement that the perpetrator has to be morally responsible for the attack planed by them or a group they belong to (so they would not be only an instrument in somebody's hands). Therefore, if the targeted killing policy has to be ethically justified, it would be so due to fulfilling of some particular criteria, common for all acceptable forms of killing, and not because terrorist activity (also a potential one) is somehow distinguished and gives special privileges to a state that tries to fight it. Therefore the basic rule of the justification of the targeted killing policy has to be that the individuals against whom these methods can be applied, fight in a way that makes this policy the only effective way of fighting, and at the same time killing these individuals is acceptable in the light of the widespread moral intuitions concerning general situations, when killing is allowed at all.

It should also be explained why in this text I write both about legal and ethical justification. By a legal justification I understand such a justification that tries to use the currently existing legal institutions and regulations to justify legality of this policy. Ethical justification is understood as such a justification that uses theories or doctrines in broadly understood normative ethics to justify the fact that at least some cases of targeted killing are morally acceptable. When it comes to the targeted killing policy, the ethical and legal matters are closely bound to each other. Firstly, the authors who criticise targeted killing policy usually perceive it as both ethically and legally unacceptable, whereas those who defend it do it both in terms of ethics and law. Secondly, law - including international law - has its roots in various theories and doctrines of normative ethics. In particular, it refers to human rights and International humanitarian law. Thirdly, illegality of given practices (in particular when it comes to the law of armed conflict) can prove their unethicalness (although it does not work the other way around: many unethical practices are legally acceptable due to various reasons). Of course, it is worth noting that severe differences between legal and ethical normative evaluation of a given situation can exist: law (international law in particular) takes into consideration consequences of a given norm, therefore many fixed ethical norms are not codified in legal codes.

3. Extrajudicial execution or the law of armed conflict

In this chapter I will present the main theoretical problem connected with justification of the targeted killing policy. Although in Israel this policy had been publicly acknowledged even before the 11th of September 2001, in the USA the application of this policy is in close relation to the so called "war on terrorism". In his Address to Congress from the 20th of September 2011, President George W. Bush said:

> We will direct every resource at our command - every means of diplomacy, every tool of intelligence, every instrument of law enforcement, every financial influence, and every necessary weapon of war - to the disruption and to the defeat of the global terror network [...]. We will starve terrorists of funding, turn them one against another, drive them from place to place, until there is no refuge or no rest. And we will pursue nations that provide aid or safe haven to terrorism. Every nation, in every region, now has a decision to make. Either you are with us, or you are with the terrorists. From this day forward, any nation that continues to harbour or support terrorism will be regarded by the United States as a hostile regime (quotation from Ratner 2010, 251).

In this speech one may found the sources of the present theoretical problems connected with understanding the nature of and justifying the targeted killing policy. From this President Bush's utterance one can draw a conclusion that the USA responses to the attacks on WTC will have various shapes: he speaks both of diplomatic and intelligence service's measures, as well as law enforcement (which suggests non-military actions) and military measures (which suggests an armed conflict). On one hand, a response to terrorist attacks through law enforcement, means treating a terrorist act as a criminal - according to both the law of the country on which territory a given act was committed, and international criminal law. In such a case, the actions should be limited to police methods, both the preventive ones and those aiming at punishing the perpetrators, as well as different methods characteristic for criminal proceedings; extradition, cooperation with intelligence services, cooperation at formulating indictment, etc. On the other hand, terrorist attacks are sometimes understood as a part of an armed conflict or its beginning – it is visible in the fragment of President Bush's speech, in which he threatens the states that give shelter to terrorists. Such an understanding does not mean law enforcement, but a regular armed conflict, during which one is allowed to kill the opponents without warnings or any court sentence.

However, it is worth noticing that some aspects of the September 11 attacks were nothing new, when it comes to using the whole spectrum of measures to fight terrorism. Both common criminal measures and military methods have been already used in fighting terrorism. What is more, the type of a response - as one could assume - did not depend on the scale of attack. For example, after very bloody attacks of 1988 (Lockerbie - 270 victims, mostly the USA citizens) and 1989 (UTA 772 flight, 171 victims, mostly citizens of France), governments of the USA, the United Kingdom and France appealed to Libya for an extradition of the terrorists, who were finally extradited after 10 years. Then they were sentenced in regular criminal trials. Also the investigation after the first attack on WTC in 1993 was conducted in accordance with regular criminal procedure. However, sometimes the United States of America, as well as other countries (e.g. Israel) assumed that a terrorist attack (or its threat only) is enough a basis for acting as if they were attacked by foreign countries, which means referring to military methods and not measures of enforcing criminal law. It happened, for example, in 1986, when the USA bombarded Libya in retaliation for the attack on a Berlin club, popular among American soldiers, in which two USA soldiers died (there were three victims altogether). Similar methods were used in 1993, when the USA bombarded Iraq in retaliation for the plan of George H.W. Bush's assassination made by Hussein, or in 1998, when Sudan was bombarded in retaliation for the attacks on American embassies in Africa.

In this part of my article I will compare two paradigms (Ratner 2010). I will begin with understanding terrorist activity as a crime, which is fought on the basis of international norms connected with respecting human rights. According to United Nations Charter, states are not allowed to make any operations on the territory of another state without a permission of this state. What is more, no state is obliged to issue such a permission, it is also not obliged to agree on cooperation with other countries concerning extradition of people suspected of criminal activity. In fact, however, most of countries signed various agreements or treaties concerning extradition, and the United Nations Security Council's resolution adopted after the 11th of September 2001 instructs the states to extradite people suspected of terrorist activity. According to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966, states must not kill its citizens without a court sentence, apart from some rare exceptions (I will investigate them below). This very Covenant includes an obligation of conducting a trial for detainees. There is also a customary rule that states are responsible for human rights violation by non-state parties on their territory, it does not, however, mean that other countries have right to invade territory of a given state.

In turn, the second paradigm which refers to terrorism as a threat fought by methods characteristic for armed conflicts says that states are allowed to conduct military operations only as a self-defence after an attack of an enemy or right before it. They can also conduct such actions with permission of the United Nations Security Council (e.g. humanitarian interventions). Referring to the targeted killing policy, the most problematic is the obscurity of the international law rules concerning defence from aggressors who are not states, but, for instance, terrorist groups. Another problematic issue is the acceptability of attacking in retaliation against a state, from whose territory the attack came. What is not controversial is the fact that in military operations states are allowed to kill the opponent's fighters with no warning. The fighter themselves should differ from civilians, who must not be a target of killing, but it is allowed to conduct military operations, which are assumed to be the reason of civilian deaths. However, damages and death of civilians should not be disproportionate to the military benefits expected from the conduct of a given military operation. Those fighting at the opposite side, after being captured cannot be judged or executed only for the reason that they were fighting. They can be judged only when they are accused of committing a war crime.

The following question is obviously arising: which of these paradigms should be valid in case of the targeted killing policy evaluation? At first glance it seems that if the USA does not conduct an armed conflict with another state currently, the paradigm referring to human rights is the proper one. However, this paradigm would certainly not be the basis for justifying the targeted killing policy. An example may be the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, in which the USA is a party. Article 2 of this Convention says that nobody can be killed, except from the cases of court sentences executions. It also says that it is allowed to kill someone in three exceptional situations: 1) in defence of any person from unlawful violence; 2) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained; 3) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection. Theoretically, only point 1 could be possibly used as a justification for the targeted killing policy, however it is commonly interpreted as a defence from an immediate threat, and not targeting and killing someone long before the attack he is planning.

Therefore the USA itself called the anti-terrorist actions after the 11th of September 2001 a "war on terrorism", and this way qualified it as an armed conflict, during which it is allowed to kill those fighting on the opposite side without a permission or a sentence (even if at a given moment they do not conduct military operations). Basically, during an armed conflict it is allowed to attack only fighters, but also civilians lose their immunity when they actively participate in military operations. American administration deliberately did not specify if the war with terrorism is an international conflict or not, in order to avoid the obligation of applying some rules of ius in bello. It was decided that, on one hand, a so called "war with terrorism" is not an internal conflict, since it is not limited to the borders of one country. On the other hand, it is not international, since it is not waged between any particular states. As a result, the USA assumed that there is a legal gap and the regulations of Geneva Conventions and other regulations of international law concerning e.g. the way of treating war prisoners or other people, which are valid in time of either international or internal conflicts, are not applied during the so called "war on terrorism". This way a category of people was established, called by the USA administration as "unlawful combatants". According to the rules applied by American authorities, those people have neither a status of fighters (so they are not treated as war prisoners), nor the status of civilians. As a result, it was assumed that they are subject to criminal responsibility for the military operations they conduct (in a normal situation the enemy's soldiers cannot be judged for their participation in fight only, as long as they did not commit any war crimes). They are also not restricted by the limits of detention time which are applied to the civilians.

Apparently, the armed conflict paradigm is much more appropriate when it comes to the justification of the targeted killing policy. However, several problems exist. The most important of them is the risk of mistake: I quoted statistics saying that a considerable number of the targeted killing victims are civilian casualties that happened to be next to the actual targets. Somebody might assume that this policy does not meet the requirements of proportionality, which is included in ius in bello regulations, and according to which civilians can be casualties of an attack on a military target, but the sufferings inflicted on the civilians have to be proportional to the scale of the military target attacked in a given operation. However, this accusation would not be characteristic for the targeted killing policy - in many contemporary armed conflicts the casualties comprise a disproportionately big percentage of all victims (Żuradzki 2010b).

4. Retribution or self-defence

After targeting and killing of Osama bin Laden by the American Special Forces on the Pakistan's territory, American president barrack Obama said that "justice took its course". Similarly, at the first anniversary of bin Laden's assassination Obama said that his country managed to "bring justice to a man who killed over 3 thousand citizens". Similar conclusions appear also in scientific articles (David 2003). These statements are surprising, since they mean that a typical example of implementation of targeted killing policy, which was bin Laden's killing, was an act of justice understood in terms of retribution, or as a retaliation for the harm done to a give community. One can conclude from American president's speech that in this case he was the judge himself and the executors of the "sentence" were American soldiers. In this part of my article I will try to prove that the targeted killing policy – if it is possible at all to justify it in the field of ethical theories - it would rather be accomplished through a reference to self-defence and not delivering justice.

Firstly, one has to be a death penalty supporter in order to claim that sometimes "delivering justice" requires killing a man. In contemporary times it is quite controversial, since most of Western countries abolished death penalty. This means that delivery of justice - no matter the scale of the crime - never requires the killing of the perpetrator. Of course, one can argue that even in these countries, in which death penalty was abolished (e.g. Poland), the possibility of its reintroduction is not completely excluded in special cases, e.g. when it comes to armed conflicts - and it is analogical to most cases, of the targeted killing policy application.

Secondly, even if one would agree that delivering justice sometimes requires killing, after targeting the perpetrator should rather be brought into court than killed. Making the decision of bin Laden's killing Obama obviously infringed on the separation of powers characteristic for democratic systems: executive power should not pass sentences and then execute them. In all democratic systems it is widely accepted that it is the independent judiciary power, which can more objectively investigate the guilt of a suspect and adjust the sentence to it. At this point a problem connected with this issue is visible: the targeted killing policy - understood as delivery of justice - would assume only one type of a "punishment", which is killing, while passing sentences in normal conditions always adjusts the punishment's level to a defendant's guilt.

Thirdly, the targeted killing policy is connected with a severe risk for outsiders. The data quoted below suggest that, e.g., in case of Israel, only circa 60 percent of "target and kill" actions' victims are the people, who were supposed to be killed - the remaining 40 percent are random witnesses, accompanying persons, sometimes family, including children. When it comes to justice delivery, it is not widely accepted to allow for such high human costs. Obviously, the work of the administration of justice – like every other institution – is burdened with mistakes, but certainly in no democratic country the percentage of mistakes made when delivering justice is as high as in case of the currently applied targeted killing policy. It is even more outrageous, since in this case the mistakes are killing casualties who happened to be close to a victim at a given time. There is also a different kind of risk connected with the targeted killing policy: capital punishment opponents claim that the fact of the system of justice's fallibility is an argument against applying death penalty, which is irreversible. Similar arguments can be used against the targeted killing policy.

Finally, justification of the targeted killing policy which refers to retributive justice would concern only those people, who have already committed an act of terror. Whereas in bin Laden's case such justification would work, it could not be used to defend many (maybe even most of) cases of using this policy, in which one kills people who only plan a terrorist attack or call for its (e.g. Anwar al-Awlaki).

These are the reasons why a better justification of the targeted killing policy should be found. The basic question that should be answered at this point sounds: why is killing allowed in some circumstances? Various doctrines and ethical theories agree that there are two main ways of justifying the acceptability of taking one's life (McMahan 2012).

Above all, someone can be responsible for threatening other people or just hurting them. If an armed aggressor tells us that they will kill us and there are reasons to believe them that this threat will come true, practically all ethical systems allow us – if only we are able to do it and there is no other way of stopping the aggressor – to kill them in self-defence. In such a case outsiders or we ourselves would be allowed to do it – to defend other people. Some people believe that such an aggressor suspends their right to life or their right no to be killed.

The second way of justification is a bit more controversial. For in this case a given person would not suspend their right to life, or the right to not be killed, but killing them is necessary for certain reasons. One can understand it in two different ways.

From the agent-neutral perspective: in this case killing someone could be justified by the fact that no action would cause a big tragedy - much bigger than killing a given individual. It is worth noting that, although it can be associated with a conventionalist attitude (which is a normative ethics view saying that a moral value of a deed depends on the value of its expected or actual consequences), it does not have to be always this way. Even some people assuming non-conventionalist positions would say that some choices happen to be so tragic that one person's sacrifice is a "lesser evil" than a sacrifice of very many people.

What is more, the necessity of killing can be agent-relative. In this case a subjective perspective of a given agent would be taken into consideration, from whose point of view the situation would be evaluated. Let us provide an example of it: some people claim that when defending the members of one's family, the one is allowed to do the aggressor more harm than the aggressor would do the potential victim. Many normative systems, in example, would allow a parent to kill an innocent person in order to avoid their child's permanent injury. The parent has special relations with their child and a given situation is morally evaluated from the perspective of a worried parent and not a neutral decision-maker whose main task is to minimalise suffering in a given population. However, it could not be justified from the agent-neutral perspective: according to this perspective, since even permanent injury is not as bad as death, it is not allowed to kill an innocent man only to save somebody from injury (as long as the person to be killed is not responsible for the child's injury).

Sometimes the supporters of the traditional ethics of war use this second way to justify the acceptability of killing in armed conflicts. What they claim is that very often private soldiers are not responsible for the fact that they caused a threat and this way they do not suspend their right to life. The most obvious example would be as follows: the Polish soldiers in September 1939 did not suspend their right to life, they did nothing that would suspend this right. However, in the light of the still valid regulations of the armed conflict law German soldiers were allowed to kill them - as long as they conducted military operations in accordance with the law (they did not murder civilians, did not use certain types of weapon, etc.). This is what one of the main assumptions of the traditional just war doctrine is based on - the moral equality of the fighters. Michael Waltzer writes in his book Just and Unjust Wars: "The two sorts of judgement (which are ius in bello and ius ad bellum - TŻ) are logically independent. It is perfectly possible for a just war to be fought unjustly and for an unjust war to be fought in strict accordance with the rules" (Walzer 2006: 21). It means that all the soldiers who participate in the conflict, no matter if they fight for the just cause or not, can be killed by the opponents, no matter if they are anyhow morally responsible for the conflict's outbreak.

This basic assumption of the traditional just war doctrine is increasingly questioned by philosophers dealing with the ethics of war (McMahan 2009). Interestingly, as I have already mentioned, it was also questioned by the American administration, which on one hand says that they fight a just war with terrorism, but, on the other hand, does not agree that their opponents can fight it - therefore they are treated as "unlawful fighters". This is why the American administration questions the assumption fundamental for the just war doctrine, saying that even unjust war can be fought in accordance with rules and the soldiers themselves cannot be morally and legally responsible for it. For this reason it seems that to justify the targeted killing policy it is better to use the first of the types of justifying acceptability of killing, described in this part. It is a justification saying that it is allowed to kill only those, who are causatively responsible for posing a threat for other people or just for planning of posing such a threat.

5. Summary

In this article I presented the possibility of justifying the legal and ethical acceptability of applying the targeted killing policy. To this end I used a modified paradigm of an armed conflict. I decided that it is much better for justifying the policy discussed here than the sometimes quoted paradigm of law enforcement. I also outlined the possibility of modifying the now existing paradigm of an armed conflict in a way that it is allowed to kill only those people who are causally and morally responsible for posing a threat (e.g. political leaders responsible for the conflict) or for the intention to pose a threat (e.g. the leaders of a terrorist organisation who plan an attack). The modification proposed in this article would be important for evaluating the acceptability of the targeted killing policy: it would be allowed to conduct it only in extraordinary circumstances, in which it would be the only possible way to stop the severe threat for safety (e.g. planning a terrorist attack, armed conflict). However, this policy would not be justified by means of retributive justice, which means seeking a just retaliation for the previously committed deeds.

The paradigm of Post-War
The construction of a myth

Lara Freire Bezerra de Sant'Anna[1]

Abstract: With the end of World War II takes force the moralization process of law, in the apparent rapprochement jusnaturalists ideals. This process is explained by the belief that legal positivism, the doctrine of law dominant until then, had not only legitimized the abuses of the dictatorial regimes, which have passed under the scrutiny of legality, as left "defenseless people and lawyers against laws more arbitrary, more cruel and more criminal "(Radbruch, 1945, p. 1). The human being himself responsible for the tragedies, looked away from himself to blame for an event that, if it was terrible in its magnitude, was not the first, nor the last. Starting from this premise, it explores the role of the Nuremberg Tribunal, for exposing its contradictions, media demonstrate the character of their decisions. To make use of contemporary words, this sudgn nothing more than a media trial, not only for having tried and convicted only a few pairs of Nazi Germany, handpicked, leaving the rest of Europe to warm up under the mantle of oblivion, as if anything had cooperated, for not having solved the problem of the Jews in that old continent, where they remained victims of segregation and prejudice (Judt, 2008, p. 790). It is a central concern of this work to deal with the issue of the overcome of legal positivism, because it constitutes the basis for conclusions and implications of the remaining components of the postwar myth: the idea that legal positivism was not only the theory of the Nazi state, but also it was responsible for its success, for preaching a blind and uncritical obedience to the law. This premise is refuted in this work to demonstrate that, far more than revolutionary paradigm, the postwar idea represented, above all, a myth. This rebuttal will be divided into two parts: 1) legal positivism was not the theory of the Nazi state, 2) legal positivism does not preach an absolute and blind obedience to the law. The aim is to demonstrate that an authoritarian state, although it continues to have laws, is not a rule of law itself, because it ignores the most important principles of law, being in fact a exceptional state. It seeks, moreover, emphasize the mistake of proposing critics and a limitation of democracy through undemocratic examples. It's academic work, with a focus on historical and philosophical analysis of law.

Keywords: Post-war paradigm ; legal positivism; Nazi state; illegality .

1 Building a paradigm for the Post-War : a new model of law and democracy

Despite the U.S. praxis of judiciary substantive interpretation and control of law since the late eighteenth century, in world scale is with the end of the Second World War that takes place the process of moralizing force of law, in obvious approach to American model, which has a clear inspiration in natural law. This process is explained by the belief that legal positivism was the dominant doctrine of Law until then, which had not only legitimized the abuses of the dictatorial regimes, which have passed under the scrutiny of legality, but also had left "defenseless people and lawyers against the most arbitrary, cruel and criminal laws" (RADBRUCH, 1945, p. 1) . The human being himself, responsible for the tragedies, looked away from themselves to blame for an event that, if it was terrible in its magnitude, was not the first, nor the last.

Moreover, the Nuremberg Trial, blacklighted with the spotlight of justice, reason and the rule of law, words of the American prosecutor Robert Jackson, in his speech by the beginning of the trial[2], it was actually the imposition of winners force and revenge[3]: for this reason, and for no other, the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, conducted by the United States of America, was never charged, nor tried as a war crime[4] and against humanity[5]. To use contemporary words, it was a media trial, not only for having tried and convicted only a few pairs of Nazi Germany, handpicked, leaving the rest of Europe to bask under the cloak of forgetfulness, as if had not cooperated, but also for not having solved the problem of the Jews in that old continent, where they remained victims of segregation and prejudice (JUDT, 2008, p. 790). The beautiful speech of that promoter, highlighting that moment as a milestone of a new model of international relations, in which barbaric crimes against humanity would no longer be tolerated, proved to be an empty rhetoric.

[3] Tony Judt (2008, p. 68), says: "Many people complains about the trials, defining them as "winner justice", and that's what they really were, in fact." Also in this sense, the words of the own General LeMay, in a interview for the Time Magazine: "I believe that if we had lose the war I would have been hanged as a criminal war. Happily, I'm in the winners side" (apud MOURÃO, 2005, p. 695).

[4] It must be emphazed that war crime means, according to Ronaldo Rogério Fretas Mourão (2005, p. 695), the violation of law and uses of war, usually when one of the parts voluntarily attacks non-military targets. That was the case of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

[5] In the opposite way of the speach of the time, we now know that Japan was about to surrender, what makes sure that the bombing was motivated by the necessity of power demonstration in front of the URSS, as a strategy to avoid its growing (MOURÃO, 2005, p. 683).

That War Tribunal, however, marked the beginning of the process of (re) moralization of Law by resurrecting natural law elements, using them as a validity criterion of law: it was understood that certain provisions of the Nazi State were so injustice that it could not be regarded as rules of law and should fall under the yoke of nullity. Declared void, the floor was opened to punish those who acted in obedience to these laws, both citizens, the authorities (HART, 2009, p. 268-269). The Federal Constitutional Court of Germany also used this jurisprudence to prosecute several relevant cases connected to the Nazi laws:

> Law and justice are not available to legislature ... It was just the time of the National Socialist regime in Germany who taught that the legislature can also establish injustice ... Therefore, the Federal Constitutional Court said the possibility of denying to 'legal' National Socialists rules the validity of law, since they contradict the fundamental principles of justice in a so evident way, that a judge who intended to apply them or recognize their effects would be pronouncing injustice, not a right. (BVerfGE cited ALEXY, 2011, p. 7) (emphasis added)

What would be the " fundamental principles of justice" but his own and unmistakable Natural Law? Radbruch does not hesitate to address the issue of retroactivity of postwar laws with the statement that "the content of these laws belong to a supra law, whatever the label applied: divine law, natural law or law of reason." The condemnation of positivism came to be added to two other ideas, widespread: the discrediting of majority power, due to the perception that the legislature could also come to perpetrate barbaric[6] (BARROSO, 2010, p. 7) and the election of Judiciary Power, which, as the applicator of the new law, gets starring role in this "new world".

This is followed by a reworking of the democratic model, with the adoption of a constitutionalism that breaks viscerally with the popular sovereignty basis, imposing moments of unavailability of the standard, as it occurred in the Middle Ages, and imposing a restructuring of the idea of separation powers. It is proposed, especially the limitation of democracy.

[6] In the same sense, the words of Mireille Delmas-Marty (2001, p. 163): "It has been needed the Second World War to discover that so-called "civilized" nations could produce a law directly opposed to the sense of respect of the human being".

Deserves to be discussed more carefully the proposition about the overcoming of legal positivism, constitute the basis for conclusions and implications of other components of the post-war myth : the idea that positivism was not only the theory of the Nazi state , and was responsible for their success , for preaching one blind and uncritical obedience to the law . This premise is refuted in this work to demonstrate that , far more than the revolutionary paradigm , the idea propagated in postwar represented, above all, a myth . This rebuttal will be divided into two parts : 1) positivism was not the theory of the Nazi state , 2) the positivism preaches an absolute and blind obedience to the law .

We seek to emphasize, moreover, the nonsense of proposing a democracy limitation based on non-democratic experiences.

2 Brief exposure of German History: how legal positivism not represented the ideology of the Nazi state.

Firstly, a clear and obvious observation: any human being, or group of it, furthermore when endowed with power, can perpetrate barbaric. This was nothing new in History or stopped happening because of this supposed model that Nuremberg trial came to draw. The first premise outlined above seems to be based on a false idea: that Nazis have imposed that state of injustice to a population and a community of lawyers, among whom the judges, law enforcers, who were vehemently opposed to the National socialist ideology[7]. That's because we must admit that a State is composed not only by the executive and legislative powers, but also by the judiciary, which, even with no genetic power, has a very important role to solve conflicts led to it and, for some jurists, the important role of saying the meanings of law. From this evidence, we should ask what kind of role has been played by judiciary in that perverse Nazi State: faced with legalized injustice, judiciary resisted or consent? What kind of law was told by judges during the dark period pre-1945?

[7] When we know that the antisemitism was an old problem of Europe. Tony Judt (2008, p. 72) tells the impressive index of Post-War: between 1945 and 1949, the absolute majority of German still believe that Nazi was a good idea, but not well applied; in November of 1946, 37% of the interviewed German expressed the opinion that the "the extermination of Jews, Poles and other non-Aryans was necessary to German security"; still in 1946, one in three German defended the idea that Jews should not have the same rights as the "Aryan race" human being; six years later, in 1952, 37% of German believed was not good to have Jews in his territory; in the same year, 25% of German expressed a positive idea about Hitler. It is also important to emphasize that this was not only a German problem, and the Holocaust project had a high support of all most all Europe (JUDT, 2008, p. 790).

This question is important, even to understand the answer which was formulated: the famous idea expressed in the words of Radbruch[8] (1945, p. 1), above mentioned, according to which positivism had been responsible for "acquiescence" not only by judges, but also by the legal community in general. Under the general belief that, by understanding positivism that legislation coincides with law, and having been the acts of the Nazi state supposedly imposed by the legal form, nothing could make those which had law as a working tool, but obey those legal commands blindly.

Unlike repeats majority doctrine, however, the dominant doctrine in Nazi German was not positivism, but a jusnaturalist slope of free law, who preached the non-submission of Justice to legislation and the existence of a suprapositive law which might be called in cause by judges in specific cases (MAUS, 2000, p. 197). But to demonstrate this idea we must go back a bit in time thought the Empire, under the rule of Bismarck, so we can understand the ideology of Judiciary in the Weimar Republic and later in Hitler's Germany.

The ultimate monarchic period in Germany was marked by the presence of Otto von Bismarck beyond the post of chancellor, on behalf of the king, who remained there until his final days, a period marked by extreme deference of the judiciary to political power. Not without reason: in his condition, Bismarck made a real cleaning in Judiciary, removing and later retiring magistrates with possible progressive and liberal attitudes, which could have received any influence of the revolutions of 1848 (MÜLLER, 1991, p. 6)[9]. During this period, the way to joining judiciary, which involved years of volunteer dedication, had determined only the participation of members of the higher social classes, and the control exercised by the government was crucial for the construction of a group of highly conservative judges and extremely loyal to political authority.

Also important is the fact that the loyalty of this third power of government was inversely proportional to its prestige in that State, according to the fact that judges were classified as mid-level civil servants, below other public servants and military (MÜLLER, 1991 p. 8). Also according to Müller (1991, p. 8), contrary to what it might be expected, that members of judiciary react with protest and disagreement against government, the acquiescence of judges only grew, despite all lack of prestige, maybe to prove that they were worthy of greater trust. This final factor, however, was not based on any theory; on the contrary, despite in theory they were addicted to a strong positivism, whose purity premise also includes the separation between law and politics, judiciary, in that moment of history, was clearly influenced by the politics of its time, also being very loyal to the absolutist regime and have being reacted against the democratic revolutionary ideals (MÜLLER, 1991, p. 8-10). This explains the strength of the judiciary to accept, with the fall of the German Empire and the proclamation of the Weimar Republic, the limiting of its action to the rule of law, since it was now the product of parliament. Also explains their intense struggle for a free-law, from an "expansion of the legal and methodological canon which allowed the Justice to decide in each case whether suited to refer to the law ... or its own views and assumptions" (MAUS, 2000, p. 195).

Allied to this ideological factor, compounds the fact that the period of Weimar Republic was increasing unstable, not only because did not had a majority basis of in government[10], but also as a result of the economic crisis that swept Germany after the 1st Great War, when destroyed and humiliated, suffered several charges of winners. Judiciary was not oblivious to the crisis. H. W. Koch (1989, p. 10) explains that judiciary, which was already in social "descend" process, started having even worst days: "Already underpaid ... their salaries were reduced by as much as 20 per cent, first by inflation and then by the deflation of the Weimar period and by government economic measures." All this constructed a fertile ground which allowed that judiciary became a very susceptible to the National Socialism propaganda.

[9] Ingeborg Maus (2000, p. 193) speaks about the "rude and effective disciplining of Justice by Bismarck".

[10] Koch (1989, p. 9): "After 1920, it was increasingly impossible to form a government based on the majority support of the Reichstag. Minority governments were the order of the day". Tradução livre: Após 1920, era impossível formar um governo baseado na maioria com apoio do Parlamento. Governos de minoria eram a ordem do dia.

Moreover, the sympathy of Judiciary to the National Socialism was very clear from the troubled Weimar Republic, when the newly created National Socialist German Workers Party began its activities: several attempted coups, demonstrations and violent activities of party members were taken to trial and decisions were either mild or totally favorable, although it was against the law (MÜLLER, 1991, p. 14-21). Lenient for the crimes committed by the extreme right, the same Justice was extremely strict with the crimes committed by Communists, even when harmless (Möller, 2012, p. 236). Far from being a simple sympathy, these decisions gave evidence to a clear anti-Semitism, flag already raised by members of the National Socialist party, even with critics about government, due to the existence of important Jews components[11]. This situation have been decisive for victory in 1933, with the Enabling Act, for having encouraged the extreme right and destabilized the trust of those who believed in democracy (MÜLLER, 1991, p. 21-24).

The judge goes through this period, therefore, "the judge of the law ... by investing as priest of a new deity: the suprapositive and unwritten law" (MAUS, 2000, p. 196). The judiciary independence, which is essential in a democratic state, have been, in the view of Horst Möller (2012, p. 236), distorted in a unfortunate way to meet the political aspirations of Judiciary. Signs of erosion of rule of law were already clear with the failure of the Treaty of Versailles, which was part of the body of German law and was above the constitution (MÜLLER, 1991, p. 21). And that's how it comes in Nazi period, whose first months of 1933 already could show the possible overcome of rule of law. In the words of Michael Stolleis (1998, p. 2): "Jewish judges, notaries, and lawyers were dismissed; criminal laws were stiffened; the principle 'no punishment without law' was abolished; political enemies were sent to concentration camps".

[11] Cf. Ingo Müller (1991, p. 18): "The Courts of Weimar era were not characterized solely by favorable treatment meted out to defendants from the radical right and by persecution of supporters of the republic and Communists, however. There was also the occasional but blatant and unmistakable anti-Semite tone of the decisions of various courts, up to and including those at the highest level".

Judiciary, therefore, if not completely, mostly unhappy with democracy installed in Weimar Republic, applauded Hitler's rise to power, and in fact embraced its ideology. And by this time its ideology of Free Law had won the battle, since it coincided with the Nazi State expectations, which saw in that power a big ally, with the emergence of broad Community formulas, of finalistic character, that enabled the suspension of any "legal regulation in favor of ' higher determinations" (MAUS, 2010 , p . 32).

To complete the picture, it was created the Volksgerichtshof, a court whose praxis was based in a fairly broad interpretation of existing penal laws, plus other few laws created based on the Enabling Act, which brought Hitler to power, and whose competence was restricted to issues of betrayal of any kind and offenses related in the "Decree for the Protection of the German People and the State of 28 February 1933" (Koch, 1989, p. 51-53) . This makes clear that judiciary not only acquiesced to the regime, but actively collaborated through a jurisdiction that represented the second hand of Nazi regime and who, as Koch (1989, p. 7) points out, "the proper functioning of the National Socialist People's Court required that a substantial minority, if not the majority, of judges embrace National Socialist ideology as an appropriate instrument of the courtroom". Thus, Müller (1991) says that, despite all attempts to obscure the facts, the vast acquiescence was due to the judges, lawyers and other jurists which have actively cooperated with the draconian regime of Nazism.

It is very important do emphasize that totalitarian States, although producing laws, cannot be considered as a Rechtstatt itself. It is important to think about this assumption. It is a fact that a Rechtstatt is based on the law, whose concept doesn't matter and could be even considered as "unjust". However the rule of law is based on some fundamental principles of legal positivism itself: the strict legality, according to which no one can be compelled to do or refrain from doing something except by virtue of law; the non-retroactivity of laws, particularly in criminal issues; and legal certainty, in other words, the predictability of acts of human conduct. So, a Rechtstatt is a state based on laws, which, although they may have any meaning, must necessarily be existing in the legal system before the facts: the irretroactivity principle is essential to a Rechtstatt. Is it really possible to say that a totalitarian State, as was the Nazi, represented a Rechtsatt? Is it possible to say that Nazi State followed legal positivism as its theory of law?

The truth, as well notes Norberto Bobbio (1995, p. 236), is that legal positivism has nothing to do with the ideology of authoritarian, totalitarian or even tyrannical States: meanwhile positivism, in due to identify the law with legal commands, advocates linking the magistrate to the letter of the law, the legal ideology of Nazism argued that the judge should not decide based on the law, but on the political interest of the State, and should consider criminalizing all acts contrary to the "healthy popular sentiment", even if these crimes were not predicted in law. By these praxis, falls both the positivist idea of restricting judicial action, as the basic principle of all State named as a Rechtsatt: the anteriority of law. Legal Positivism, by contrast, grew up in those authoritarian States, not as a way to legitimize them, but to fight against them: that's how it grew the values of order, formal equality and certainty, flags from Enlightenment movement against the authoritarian rule of Old regime. In Italy, the principle of legality was a positivism flag not to legitimize fascism, but "to oppose an obstacle to its arbitrariness" (Bobbio, 1995, p. 236). With the same view, Montesquieu (2001, p. 38): "In despotic States, there is no law: the judge is himself his own rule.".

Law, therefore, hardly will be strong enough to fight against an objective reality. Again, catching borrowed the words of Alexy: "A relatively successful unjust regime is able to quickly destroy the consensus of legal praxis, intimidating individuals, changing and rewarding people to adapt." Already said the Terlinder promoter, cited by Perelman (1996, p. 549): "A law - constitution or ordinary law - never lays but for normal periods, for those who we can predict it. Man's product, it is subordinated, like all human things, to the force of things, to a stronger force, to the need".

The postwar myth, therefore, is a product of a misconception built in that post-dictatorship period, which, according to Michael Stolleis (1992), results from the fact that until the mid-1960s, the greatest scholars of the subject were judges or administrators of the Nazi era, who were reluctant to study legal history and strove to maintain the idea that law was not influenced by politics, when in fact all legal fields were swallowed up by the reality of National Socialism. The big question, which goes unnoticed in most studies, is that there was not a renewal of German Justice after 1945, and this same Justice, who have worked in the totalitarian period, was called upon to give answers to the past and proposals for the future, which explains the fact that the preparatory work of the Basic Law, and even then, didn't noticed a minimal tendency to recognize the participation of a submissive judiciary, not to say about his active participation in national Socialism (MAUS, 2000, p. 198).

This lack of renewal, or continuation, of both members of Judiciary, as other lawyers, had fundamental consequences for the direction given to Law, not only about the story that was told, but also to the elaboration of a new thesis for the future. From the construction of positivism myth, as the theory of Nazi State, guilty for acquiescence, we constructed the idea of a "new" model of law, anti-positivist, which is in fact a mere continuation of the ideas already defended in that authoritarian state! Deserves literal quotation, the words of Ingeborg Maus (2000, p. 198):

> The uninterrupted permanence of German Justice after 1945 explains the strong influence of old conceptions on the preparatory work of the Basic Law. Their desires had founded place through the broad participation of lawyers from Herrenchiemsee Convention and from Parliamentary Council, as well as the permanent lobby organizations of jurists, among others the resurrected German Association of Judges.

Under the myth of "the injustices committed by the will of National Socialist State", achieved victory an unscrupulous continuity of Nazi State ideas, such as the construction of a "free Justice from all forms of control and binding", despite the attempts of Parliamentary Council to ensure "not only 'the protection of people by having an independent jurisdiction', but also 'the protection of the people against abuses of the independence of the courts'" (MAUS, 2000, p. 198). As for legal positivism, the so opposed doctrine by judges since the Weimar Republic period, and totally rejected on National Socialist State, was then chosen to be the scapegoat, appointed as the major guilty from a supposed submission of Justice to the Nazi regime, and creating fertile ground to fight against it again, continuing judiciary ideas of a Justice deferential to a suprapositive Law[12].

The myth of post-war goes far way from a broader analysis of what happened in that dark period: it is simple to conclude that beyond National Socialist State ideology, citizens and jurists did not resist because of a theory that "tied their hands". It is simplistic, mainly because it fails to question whether these same citizens and jurists wanted to resist. Simplistic, mainly, because don't analyze the context in which Nazi State was constructed and the historical of independence (or not) of Judiciary. As explained above, judiciary, by the time Hitler came to power, already had a history of subservience to political power, although we have some few notice of independence in Weimar Republic period[13]. Again, the myth of post-war implies that judiciary found itself oblivious to these historical events; suggests that their independence was larger than the existing objective reality.

[12] In the words of Ingeborg Maus (2000, p. 198): "For those who taught there, as well to State bureaucracy, was left the power of reconstruct the past, in such way that was possible to call in case the same legal positivist doctrine of interpretation of law, which they had fought against it in the period from 1933 to 1945, accused of destruct governability, and now calling it to be accused, after 1945, as the guilty of Justice submission to Nazi regime".

3 As legal positivism do not mean a blind and uncritical obedience to law

The fundamental peace do post-war myth construction also includes the belief that legal positivism leads to a blind and uncritical obedience to legislation. Already have been refuted, in previous topic, the idea that positivism would have been the dominant law theory, not only in Nazi German, but also in other authoritarian and totalitarian States, which have taken Europe during the twentieth century. Now, it is time to defend the following assertive: even if legal positivism had been the dominant law theory of Nazi German, this doctrine does not imply the submission and acquiescence. Let's think about that.

As a starting point, it seems interesting the following question: what does it means legal positivism? Is there only one meaning?

Positivism, as a law theory, emerges as an initiative to transform law study into a true science, understood as such knowledge which, stripped of judgment, focuses on judgments of fact: in regards to law, studies the law as it is, not as it should be (Bobbio, 1995, p. 135). Value, as finds its denial on the "worthlessness", or on unfair, means qualifying something as "good/bad", "fair/unfair". By undressing of value judgments, excludes a positivist all qualifying of this nature of the law definition, i.e., of validity its criterion. It is valid to a positivist the norm which have been made by the competent authority, regardless of its content. There is, therefore, a clear separation between fact and value, law (should be) and moral (should be of should be) (Bobbio, 1995, p. 136-137).

[13] H. W. Koch (1989, p. 8) explains that, meanwhile Judiciary continuous loyalty to the King, it had some few cases that this power had a liberal position, as in the polish minority case.

This separation between law and moral, postulate of Kelsen purism, does not imply the denial of their reciprocal influence or even of the incorporation by law of many moral precepts: although it is recognized that law can be ahead from morality of a time, it is more usual that follow existing moral (Hart, 2012, p. 259). Indeed, the identification between law and morality is the product of a Manichean vision that assumes the existence of absolute values: good/bad, right/wrong. By opposite, Kelsen undue to defend the purity of law and, more specifically, the separation between law and morality, admits the relativity of moral system, in the meaning that there are many systems, not just one: "But this does not exclude the possibility of claim that the positive law should harmonize with some specific moral system and eventually with it coincided in fact..." (Kelsen, 2003, p. 75).

It is important to note that, by proposing the separation of law of other fields, such as morality, justice and politics, positivism does not deny, nor prohibits, the study of law by these angles: the only difference is that this kind of study will not correspond to a "science of law", also called dogmatic; corresponds, however, to the philosophy of law, sociology of law, and politic science, respectively. The big difference is that a jurist, in the exercise of its activity, must remain in the first one: cannot exclude the validity of a law applying its own criteria of fair or social effectiveness. He cans, however, refuses himself to apply (Hart, 2012, p. 268), in an obvious attitude of disobedience, which is predicted even by conventional positivists, like Hobbes (apus Bobbio, 1995, p. 235). This is the point where we want to go on this topic.

The consequences of separation between law and morality, so as to remove morality from its concept, and, by consequence, remove from its validity criteria any moral content, only carries legal consequences: the legal norm remains valid, even if unjust. Faced with such finding, we could make this question: what if the applicator considers it unjust? This is possible because moral systems remains existing, which is a fundamental requirement so it appears the (dis)obedience problem, since this problem only comes if there is "another standard to order a different behavior" (Bobbio, 1995, p. 226). The disobedience theory, we must emphasize, finds recognition since early Greek thought, with emphasis on the Antigone tragedy, which resists obeying an order of the King, because she believed that specific order went against the natural law. Even Hobbes, as pointed out, who defends a moral duty of obedience, recognizes the possibility of disobedience if laws turned against the social contract (Bobbio, 1995, p. 228). Although some advocate resistance today as a "right", which have been supported in some contemporary constitutions, such as the German and Portuguese, that's not the though we defend here. Resistance is factual, something that occurs, it is a fact: it is in the world of facts, not in the legal world.

There's no place to do long endurance considerations about resistence here, however it is important to point out that she have found space in practically every law theory, including legal positivism. The idea of absolute obedience to law is not a postulate of legal positivism in its traditional version, but of a side of it, which Bobbio (1995, p. 225) gives the name of "ethical positivism", or even juspositivism. It is like an extreme version, which escapes even of the ontological postulate of positivist, i.e., escapes from judgments of fact and enter the field of value judgments, constituting itself as an ideology[14]. Unlike positivism, juspositivism doesn't advocate the separation between law and morality; he identifies them to condition the justice of a rule to its validity. Note the subtlety: while jusnaturalism (morality) deduce the validity of a rule of its justice (it is valid only if just), juspositivism deduce justice from its validity (it is fair because it is valid) (Bobbio, 1995, p. 227). This construction of juspositivism, in fact, brings an absolute obedience postulate to existing norms. Legal positivism, in its traditional version, by pretending a non value study, pretends the extreme opposite of absolute obedience, since when he does not make a value criteria, he doesn't extol the virtues of any norm and does not seek to justify any current legal system or their individual standards (DIMOULIS, 2011, p. 241).

In the extreme opposite position of those positivism critics, however, the moralist idea, or jusnaturalist of law, tends to lead to an uncritical obedience of some legal system. The words of Kelsen (2003, p. 78) deserves to be mentioned:

> The thesis that law is, in its own essence, moral, ie , that only a moral order is law, is rejected by the Pure Theory of Law, not only because it presupposes an absolute moral, but because in its effective implementation by the prevailing jurisprudence on a particular legal community, leads to an uncritical legitimation of the coercive state order which makes some community.

[14] In the same sense, Bobbio (1995, p. 225): "It is obvious that with this assumption we are not in theory field anymore, but in the ideological field, since she doesn't inserts herself in the problem which concerns to the definition of law, but in that one which concerns to what we should do…"

Hart (2012, p. 268) also emphasize this point, noting that the insistence on the separation between the two normative systems (Law and Moral), by those entitled as legal positivists, derives from the fact that, by doing this, it is easier to a lawyer, a citizen or any authority required to apply the law, to distinguish clearly between one and another field, so that they can compare between the right and valid moral norm and reflect on their obedience or disobedience. In his own words:

> The perception that exists, outside official system, something in reference to which the individual must ultimately resolve their problem of obedience, certainly is more likely to stay alive among those who are accustomed to think that sometimes rules of law may be wicked, then among those who think that nothing unjust can have the status of law. (Hart, 2012, p. 272)

So when it comes to resistance possibility, what matters is an attitude of skepticism, in the meaning that we must have in mind that the validity of a rule does not mean your necessary obedience; that a moral examination may be pertinent to note that, even valid, that standard should not be applied. That's because, regardless of the dominant theory, resistance depends, above all, of courage, since in an authoritarian state, based on the legal injustices, any positioning otherwise will be basis of reprimand. So it is that even Alexy (2011, p. 60), which supports the idea of the "extreme injustice", base of the Nuremberg trials, recognizes that "for a judge, in an unjust State, there is no significant difference between turn to Hart's lessons[15], refusing to apply an extremely unjust law for moral reason, or to Radbruch's lessons, using legal reasons": in one way or another he will have to face the possibility of personal sacrifices, what it is not everyone that is willing to do[16]. The only difference is argumentative.

The imposition of guilt to legal positivism, a theory of law, is [15] Hart (2012, p. 271): "In which sense is better, before unmoral requirements, think 'this is not law at all', or, in the other hand, 'this is law, but it is so unjust that does not deserve to be obeyed and applied'? This last point of view couldn't make men more lucid or with more courage to disobey when moral requires?".

[16] It is clear that, although recognizing that, Alexy (2011, p. 62) still comes with a good motive to the adoption of his moral theory of law: the fear of a possible future punition, when the unjust regime fells out. This argument, moreover, seems to be so week, not to say ingenuous. We all know that only goes to trial those unjust cases when that's political interesting to the economic potencies or to the war winners.

actually a "'immense overestimation' of the effects that a theoretical or a philosopher has on the behavior of citizens and lawyers" (HÖESTER apud ALEXY, 2011, p. 55). Theoretical-legal or legal-philosophical definitions are not able to change reality[17].

Moreover, Alexy (2011, p. 54) discusses the argument, even to combat it, that understanding moral as a component of law may lead to the so criticized juspositivism: uncritical obedience. That's because if moral is already a part of law, any law, since positively valued, can be considered as moral, and therefore unquestionable on this same morality. He recognizes the danger, trying to overcome it through the idea that only an extreme injustice legitimizes the nullity of a law on moral grounds. The practical implications of this theory, however, ran into the force of the already mentioned objective reality: in the Nazi period also much of the Judiciary had been swallowed by National Socialist ideology, so that, although it could be assumed that judiciary could apply this idea of an extreme injustice to those laws which made typical treason and disobedience crimes, it is a remote possibility that, in turn, runs into the same issue of courage to resist.

4 Going trough conclusion: the mistake of criticism of democracy from experience not democratic Contemporary constitutionalism theory generally defends itself through the explicitness of totalitarian periods from the first half of the twentieth century, precisely because it lead to the idea that they would have given rise to the breakdown of the democratic tradition of the sovereignty of the elected branches, which have passed to be viewed as potential violators of rights (DIMOULIS, 2009, p. 219) , which sets the ground for the defense of judiciary, not only as the one who must control those popular powers, but as the most qualified for the defense of fundamental rights and, in some situations, the only one able to advance the political and social process (BARROSO, 2011, p. 287).

The postwar discourse is based on the suppose that authoritarian regimes of the first half of the twentieth century would had been the representation of majority, having come to power through democratic means of elections. This, incidentally, is the touchstone of this speech, to the extent that the alternative proposal is precisely the limitation of democracy through judicial review, because of the arbitrariness and injustice allegedly imposed by majority.

In this perspective, the following question is immediately imposed: is it possible to assume that an authoritarian regime can be based in the democratic principle of majority? Would have been barbarism imposed by obeying the rules of the democratic game? This is an obvious nonsense: how a system based on majority principle can legitimize an undemocratic authoritarian regime? Can a majority, which is guided by democratic principles of self-government, use of the self-determination to choose a non-democratic regime?

Well, is the clear that a population can even come to do this. What comes further, however, could hardly be described as democratic. Robert Dahl (2012, p. 270), surfaced with this question, is emphatic on saying that a majority could never do this legitimately, since democracy itself has intrinsic limitations, especially with regard to the democratic process.

Anyway, even though the National Socialist Party, in Germany, and fascism, in Italy, for example, have competed in elections, the electoral process does not end at the ballot box: democracy presupposes a continuous consent. Once in power, breaking ties with what has left of democracy, there is no way to speak of majority government, but the government of a few "competent", undemocratic idea, feature which was basic to the Nazi and Fascist parties (VICENTINO, 2002, p. 380).

Although one might argue, as does Martin Malia (2012, p. 73), that totalitarianism was a product of universal democracy era, it is clear that he only avenged by exterminating her: supplanting the rule of law, democratic legality and everything else that could be presented as an obstacle to the victory of "total government". Democracy has not generated totalitarianism, nor the injustices arising therefrom. Totalitarianism, returning to the question bellow, was not gestated by democracy and emerged victorious momentarily because of an oppressive majority. Totalitarianism can be an example of many things, but it certainly is not an example of the oppression of a minority by a majority. As assumed by Dahl (2012, p. 123), "the experience of the twentieth century is a powerful argument against the guardianship". After all, all these totalitarian regimes were based on the belief of the leadership of a few most able leaders, not the citizens self-government.

Was the majority who ruled and had decisive power in totalitarian states? If we use basic criteria of democracy, such as voting, periodic elections and equal participation, it is possible to quickly discard this idea.

It seems clear, therefore, the mistake of proposing a limitation on democracy based on experiences that couldn't even remotely be named as democratic. Yes, there were politics, parties, government. However these were not accountable to the people. By the very contrary, they were accountable to their leader and his ideology.

A dictatorship necessarily represents the government of a few, a minority. And it was from undemocratic procedures that have been violated the rights of minorities, especially, as already mentioned, through the moralist case law, which did not been limited by law. That's how we can assume that the laws from those authoritarian States had not even the majority genetics, because they, with few exceptions, had not been made by the power who had the competence to legislate, the Congress, but by the Chief of State. Moreover, the few laws from Congress did not authorized the gravest consequences carried out by the courts. Those totalitarian states of the first half of the twentieth century, in fact, are examples that make us remember this same propose of democracy limitation: the fundamental issues should not be relegated to the people, but to a group of qualified people.

Criminal law and cultural diversity
A philosophical approach (from a European Standpoint)

Stefano Biancu

Abstract: Globalization and its related migratory phenomena lead to encounters between different cultures and civilizations. But inevitably they also produce clashes and conflicts. Criminal law is an emblematic locus of the difficulties that result from the assumption of these conflicts at the level of public policies. On this topic, in Europe, the positions of Mireille Delmas-Marty and Otfried Höffe are emblematic and in certain respects opposed. Starting form these two theoretical options, this paper questions the radical nature of the philosophical, ethical and anthropological challenge that cultural diversity poses for criminal law and consequently engages in the search for possible ways forward.

Key Words: Criminal Law, Cultural Diversity, Punishment, Tolerance.

1. The problem

Globalization and its related migratory phenomena lead to encounters, minor or major, between different cultures and civilizations. But inevitably they also produce clashes and conflicts, which are something of a novelty in many Western countries, especially in Europe, traditionally notable for a high degree of homogeneity of language, culture and religion, in keeping with a substantially nineteenth–century model of the nation.

Criminal law is an emblematic locus of the difficulties that result from the assumption of these conflicts at the level of public policies.[1] In many European countries the criminal law in force was originally designed for homogeneous societies, while naturally ensuring a plurality of personal opinions and the secularity of public institutions, but it is inadequate to cope with a plurality of points of view that are irreducible to the merely private sphere: the points of view that are precisely characteristic of different civilizations and cultures.[2] (Here the term "culture" must be understood in its anthropological/ethnological sense: as a symbolic system of beliefs, gestures, representations and experiences of reality, handed down from one generation to another and internalized – in a manner not necessarily reflected – by individuals).

Now, the assumption of such cultural differences by the criminal law is far from simple. Different cultures may favour visions of morality and law that are very different from each other, so that what is considered wrong (in the moral sense) or criminal (in the legal sense) in a given cultural context may not be so in another: a migrant may thus arrive in a country where law and ethics express the values and norms (in the form of precepts and/or prohibitions) opposed to those in force in their country of origin, and sometimes even difficult to understand in terms of their cultural horizon. Hence the debate, now broad and rich,[3] about the desirability and/or the necessity for the criminal law to recognize the possibility of a "cultural defence", understood as a reason for the exclusion or reduction of criminal liability, which can be invoked by a person belonging to an ethnic minority with a culture, customs and usages that differ from, or may even be in conflict with, those of the culture of the host country. This, of course, presupposes that the person is able to demonstrate that the illegal act was performed in good faith and in the reasonable belief that he was acting on the basis of his cultural tradition.[4]

Now, discussion of the possibility of a "cultural defence" entails a rethinking of some basic axioms of classic criminal law. Among these, the principle of legality, which does not admit in any case ignorance of the law, not even by those who come from different cultural horizons (nullum crimen sine poena, nulla poena sine lege), and the principle of equality, which a penal treatment differentiated to allow for the cultural reasons for an action would seem to violate (with regard to both the offenders and the victims).[5]

It is not easy to devise a solution to these problems, so that here it is possible only to offer some general reflections, from a European standpoint.

Before proceeding further, it is necessary to address a basic question: the one concerning the relation between criminal law and cultures. On this topic, in Europe, the positions of Mireille Delmas-Marty and Otfried Höffe are emblematic and in certain respects opposed.

The French jurist has long been engaged in research into the possible conditions for an internationalization of law. She notes that the criminal law is the least universalizable of the systems of law, to the extent that it expresses the representations peculiar to each particular community, in areas such as life and death, power, sex, and the appropriation and sharing of property. Despite this, Delmas-Marty believes it is also possible to work towards the internationalization of criminal law, starting from a fundamental and shared rejection of the "inhuman" (the sphere of crimes against humanity).[6] She regards this rejection of the inhuman as what allows one to "relativize relativism", finding something universal within particular legal systems. Seen in these terms, law may help – holds the French jurist – to build a "human community of values", and it may do this to the extent that there is a circle enclosing morality and law: morality (namely the sphere of values) is certainly productive of law (the sphere of rules), but at the same time law is somehow productive of morality, since it is capable of bringing to reflected awareness the moral values that are not explicitly stated by the widely accepted ethics.[7]

This, in brief, is the position of Delmas-Marty: criminal law is essentially related to a particular cultural horizon since it translates the moral values of a community into rules (and above all prohibitions); but at the same time it is capable of a potentially universal openness, insofar as it can help reveal the values already present – but not yet made explicit – in different cultural communities.

This is in contrast with Höffe's outlook.[8] He is concerned not so much to delineate a transculturally valid criminal law, but rather to verify the transcultural value of the form of criminal law – ultimately based on retribution (Vergeltung) – which is characteristic of advanced liberal democracies. In other words, Höffe's questioning seeks to verify whether the Western structure of criminal law can withstand the challenges posed by the ever-increasing interaction between cultures. His conclusion – fully affirmative – is that this model of criminal law based on retribution has a transcultural value since it is neutral and universalizable, modern and liberal – the two terms have essentially the same value for Höffe. Born in the West, it has a validity that extends beyond the boundaries of the culture that produced it.

Höffe holds therefore that there is no need to study adaptations, and even less to radically rethink, the current approach to the problem of crime in the light of the issues raised (as well as the possibilities offered) by globalization, but rather to verify the viability of the existing, the status quo, in the face of the new challenges.

If Mireille Delmas-Marty therefore admits a structural dependence of criminal law on cultural particularities (as well as the capacity of criminal law to reveal a minimal universal ethic within different horizons), Otfried Höffe by contrast defends the thesis of the independence of modern, liberal criminal law from cultural particularities: born in a particular (cultural) context, it is in fact said to have a universal (transcultural) value.

So, if we place these two major theoretical options concerning the relation between criminal law and cultures in the background, it is now possible to question the radical nature of the philosophical, ethical and anthropological challenge that cultural diversity poses for criminal law and consequently engages in the search for possible ways forward.

2. What paths to follow? Some ideas

2.1. Moving beyond the barbaric paradigm

To formulate the problem correctly we have firstly to deal with some typically European and Western representations of the non-Western immigrant. These representations may be partly influenced by what appears to be a persistent and unconscious "barbaric paradigm".[9] This is a recurrent interpretative scheme in the Western imagination, from antiquity to the present day. Applied to current immigration flows, it suggests an understanding of them in the key of modern "barbarian invasions": the immigrant, therefore, as a modern incarnation of the archetype of the "barbarian", the uncivilized par excellence. He is strong and violent, insensitive to the weakest and has a sturdy body, which makes him closer to the animal world than to the human. He is also dirty and especially prolific, and therefore infesting.

The barbarian is configured as an a priori category: it models a prior understanding of the different, but one that is destined to enter into crisis when subjected to the test of the encounter with the other in the flesh. In fact, the more closely the "residents" come into contact with the immigrant populations, extending their knowledge of them, the less self-evident becomes the application of the category of "barbarian" to them.

In particular, the archetype of the barbarian proves to be more incisive in times of structural crisis: a civilization in decline is likely to see the barbarian invasion and the figure of the barbarian as the reasons for its crisis and the imminent end of history (of all history, not only its own). This is why, when a "void" of civilization occurs, a subject – individual and collective – often makes an appearance on the stage of history, to whom the role of the "barbarian" is attributed.

Now, we need to be aware of the conditioning power of the "barbaric paradigm". Within the ambit of crime policies, it can in fact act implicitly in several directions. It may play a role in the motivations of those who defend the transcultural value of the Western form of criminal law, on the basis of a presumed superiority of civilization over barbarism, but it may also play a role in the motivations of those who are minded to recognize a "cultural defence" that justifies the individual on the basis – ultimately – of the legal and moral inferiority of the culture to which he belongs.

The first step, therefore, when it comes to thinking about the challenges that cultural diversity raises for criminal law, is to be aware that our discourses are easily influenced by a "barbaric paradigm" which is both recurrent and implicit in the West.[10]

2.2. Overcoming a pathological vision of culture

Being aware of the pitfalls associated with such a "barbaric paradigm" is thus a first step. A second step is to overcome a (reductive) vision of culture and of cultures as pathologies of subjectivity or as restrictions on the free will of individuals, which criminal law should take into account in the calculation of individual responsibilities. Cultures in themselves are not pathologies (or limitations) of free will, but rather the conditions for the exercise of this free will. Subjectivity – and therefore free will – is in fact always culturally mediated: the processes through which options and choices become significant for the individual are processes of a cultural nature (notably linguistic and historical).[11] Consequently, cultural membership is a primary asset for the individual and therefore a right that has to be recognized.

Here, quite clearly, there arises the problem of possible conflicts between the right to culture and other fundamental rights (such as the [10] All the more so because the assumption of such a paradigm may prove functional for the protection of certain economic interests, encouraging dangerous identifications – in the name of the security of persons and property – between the immigrant and the criminal. right to life and physical integrity, for example), which a given culture might jeopardize, at least in certain contexts.[12] The question to be asked therefore concerns the extent of tolerance: what cultural differences can be tolerated by the criminal law? If, in fact, every particular criminal law translates, under the form of rules and prohibitions, the heritage of values of a given community, how far can it tolerate cultural diversity, especially if this produces conflicts in the field of the fundamental rights that a given culture recognizes?

The only possible answer to this question is, in my opinion, one that passes through a rethinking, and an enlargement, of tolerance itself.

2.3. A penultimate consideration of tolerance

Now, like other big words that are the offspring of political modernity, tolerance has no value as an ultimate goal, but as a guarantee of something else, hence as a "penultimate" good. In other words, it represents a positive attitude or practice, provided it is placed in the service of principles of a higher rank,[13] which may be many and varied. Certainly social peace plays an important part among these.

Yet tolerance cannot be limited to ensuring social peace, since an exclusive orientation of this type would not be sufficient to eliminate the ambiguity that characterizes it, to the extent that it implies – almost inevitably – a certain superiority of the subject tolerant of the subject tolerated, thereby making any social peace that may be achieved extremely precarious.

The principle of superior rank to which tolerance must therefore aim is that of a shared truth. On the social level, some differences will be tolerated in order to create the conditions for the maturation of what Böckenförde calls a "common pre-juridical basis"[14]: a shared basis which can be drawn on with a view to producing shared rules. On the individual level, and in the specific case of the administration of criminal law, a suitable exercise of tolerance takes the form of a condemnation of the act (the offence) which is not followed by the infliction of a penalty (on the actor). The object of this tolerance should be not, however, be considered as a subject regarded as limited in his accountability because of his membership of a different (and inferior) culture, but because that membership is positively identified as not irrelevant to his personal conformation to the legal order (on the individual level) and for the maturation of a common (social) pre-juridical basis. In other words, the decision to condemn the act but not to punish the actor should aim to foster in the actor a process of rethinking his cultural heritage that will enable him to find in it fundamental values that the positive law is capable of revealing. As noted by Mireille Delmas-Marty,[15] the penal prohibition can have the capacity to bring to awareness moral contents already present, in ways that may not be reflected and not conscious, in different cultural heritages.

[12] For a development of the issue of fundamental rights and of their necessary hierarchization, see FERRAJOLI, L. Principia iuris: teoria del diritto e della democrazia, vol. 1: Teoria del diritto, 2nd ed. Rome-Bari: Laterza, 2012.

[13] See FORST, R. Toleranz im Konflikt: Geschichte, Gehalt und Gegenwart eines umstrittenen Begriffs. Frankfurt a.M.: Suhrkamp, 2003, p. 50 ("Toleranz ist [...] eine positive Haltung oder Praxis, wenn sie zu etwas Gutem dient, d.h. wenn sie um willen der Realisierung höherstufiger Prinzipien oder Werte gefordert und dadurch gerechtfertig ist"). In particular, on the relation between criminal law and tolerance, See FORTI, G. Alla ricerca di un luogo per la laicità: il "potenziale di verità" nelle democrazie liberali. In: S. CANESTRARI and L. STORTONI, eds. Valori e secolarizzazione nel diritto penale. Bologna: Bononia University Press, 2009, pp. 349-395.

The tolerance of which we are speaking should therefore be functional to an extension of the potential for truth that is inherent in any particular tradition[16]: and this with a view, on the social level, to the formation of a common pre-juridical basis (which will allow for the shared production of the positive norm), and with a view to extending, on the part of the individual, the cultural heritage in the direction of values and moral contents already present in it but not yet made explicit.

Tolerance, in other words, makes sense if it does not harden differences, but if it creates the conditions that make agreement and sharing possible on the individual and social levels.

2.4. From the punitive to the narrative

The compliance of the individual with the judicial system that the criminal law seeks to ensure should be understood as a relational bond of sharing, with respect to which a purely coercive approach can only prove inadequate. In some cases, an approach which is partly – though not exclusively – coercive certainly retains a compelling effectiveness in terms of prevention (general and special), as well as an ethical and juridical legitimacy. This, for example, is the case with white-collar crime. But in cases of offences relating to cultural differences, it is a priority to establish a relationship between the individual and the legal system. It is therefore necessary to favour a dialogical approach of a personal and communicative kind, and not simply an impersonal and informative one, as it is typical of classic criminal law.[17] It is essential, in other words, to focus on the possibilities of reparative justice and of mediation, as compared to a purely retributive administration of the public response to the offence.

[14] BÖCKENFÖRDE, E.-W. Der Säkularisierte Staat. Sein Charakter, seine Rechtfertigung und seine Probleme im 21. Jahrhundert. München: Carl Friedrich von Siemens Stiftung, 2007, pp. 11-43.

[15] See DELMAS-MARTY, M. Vers une communauté de valeurs. op. cit.

In this respect three factors prove to be fundamental: interpersonal encounters, speech and time. Once the facts have been ascertained and it has been determined that certain behaviours might be justified in traditional beliefs or practices of various kinds, the encounter between people, the use of speech and time may allow the actor to rediscover – even within his own culture – the reasons for abandoning certain actions contrary to the human person and fundamental rights. There is no such thing as a human culture (in the anthropological sense of the term) that is contrary to human being.

In particular, with regard to the personal encounter, it is certainly essential to valorise the role of the judge who, on behalf of society, has the right and the duty to declare that a particular kind of conduct is not acceptable and therefore constitutes an abuse. But it is also necessary for the victims be given a role, by assigning them, in an adequate and protected formal context, a space for speech and listening. From this it is possible to expect a twofold result. First of all, that victims can obtain recognition and justice: they need to receive authoritative confirmation that domination by others constituted an abuse, an injustice, which has finally been brought to an end. The victim must be formally liberated and returned to himself. Secondly, their testimony will enable the offender to understand the meaning – with a transcultural value – of the violation he is charged with. The offender will also be in fact "liberated", to the extent that he, too, is a prisoner of his evil.

This is not a question of focusing on practical solutions of low [17] As observed by Foucault, the disciplinary prison regimen ensures that the prisoner is the object of information, never a subject of communication: see FOUCAULT, M. Surveiller et punir. Naissance de la prison. Paris: Gallimard, 1975, p. 202.

moral intensity, as compared, for example, with a retributive model whose moral foundations have been authoritatively argued already by Kant and Hegel. Rather, it is matter of recognizing that the foundation of law – of any law – does not lie in a hyperuranian ideal, but in the human person, which constitutes the "subsisting human law: hence also the essence of law".[18]

That compliance of the individual with the legal order that criminal law has to guarantee, thus finds one of its conditions of possibility in the interpersonal encounter: the interpersonal encounter between the offender and the victim, with the indispensable mediation of the judge and within an appropriate context, has the power to show that the foundation of prohibitions and norms (the violation of which is in dispute) does not reside in a certain cultural horizon (to be accepted or rejected), but in a common humanity. The interpersonal encounter can thus foster an experience of the (universal) foundation of each (particular) right. In this light, the renunciation of punishment – certainly applicable in the particular conditions to be determined – takes the form of an exercise of tolerance with a view to something else: namely with a view to a sharing that, by going beyond differences, gives access to a prior and shared datum.

In the case of crimes that are somehow related to ascertained cultural differences, a gradual transition should therefore be made from an exclusively punitive register to one that favours the narrative phase of speaking and listening,[19] through a replacement of the coercive and retributive element of the penalty with an adequate encounter between people.

The time factor is clearly crucial. We must in fact have time for speech and listening, as well as the time needed to enable the defendant to rethink his cultural heritage in the light of that speech and that listening, including the accompaniment of an adequate cultural mediation. But to ensure speech does not represent a summa injuria, it must take into account the fact that not everyone has the same access to the sphere of speech: in this sphere there are also the excluded, to whom justice must

2.5. Healed memory

If the retributive punishment is based on the assumption that evil is erasable and that it is possible to restore the order violated,[21] a relational approach – based on the encounter between people, speech and time – instead relies on the belief that evil not only cannot but must not be erased. If we wish to produce history, and human history, it is important to retain a memory of evil, a memory healed. This is not a memory understood simply as an inability to forget and therefore to erase the debt: this would be a memory that actually arrests personal and collective history, and would eventually produce obsession and psychosis. It is rather an individual and collective memory based on the recognition that the suffering inflicted and endured has been an injustice and an evil that cannot and must not be erased. Responding to evil not merely through the modes of punishment, but also through speech placed within an appropriate official context, surely means giving up an immediate cosmetic claim: the need to restore order, magically erasing the disorder produced by the offence. But it also means creating the conditions of possibility for genuine liberation from the "magic" force of evil and guilt, by healing their memory without erasing their traces.

All this will necessarily lead to a profound rethinking of many criminal policies, which grant a very limited space to relationship: to the personal encounter and to speech uttered and heard. It is access to that sphere of experience that Benjamin defined as a sphere of human understanding inaccessible to violence: "the true sphere of 'understanding one another', of language."[22]

It is an "understanding each other" that, between humans, is always possible: beyond all differences (cultural, individual, social differences), thanks to difference.

Humans rights and national minority rights in the European community plan

Carla Ribeiro Volpini Silva[1]
Ana Marina de Castro[2]

Abstract: With the ratification of Lisbon Treaty on December 1st, 2009, the situation of Human Rights in the European Union reaches a new level: now, the Charter of Human Rights should be legally enforced by its Member Countries and the bloc comes to a consensus on how the European institutions must be reformed, rethinking its structure to embrace with property the motto "Unity in Diversity". This article discusses the history of Human Rights under the European bloc, systematizes the creation of the Charter of Human Rights of the European Union, problematizes the Lisbon Treaty and aligns this discussion to the demands of the European Free Alliance – party of the European Parliament which represents the national minorities. The party has a platform claiming the recognition of national minorities, and proposals in concert with a project of European Union more democratic.

thereafter were designated as the European Union. Also introduced a single currency, enabled a common economic and monetary policy, instituted community citizenship extended to all citizens of member countries; effected and reinvigorated the market for free movement of people, capital, goods and services, abolishing barriers. Gave more political power to the European Parliament, in a process of co-decision procedure for certain legislative matters. Joined Europe into a political, legal and economic unit, linking the States to a Community law, in order to "achieve the common interest and welfare of its citizens" (OLIVEIRA, 2011).

The Treaty of Maastricht establishes the protection of human rights as the foundation and goal of the European Union, and binds all its Member States. Human Rights, thereafter, are recognized under Community law, as well as in the Constitutional Law of the States (Baptist, 1997). The main law sources of Human Rights were: the European Convention on Human Rights, the European Social Charter of 1961 and the Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers of 1989.

Citizens of the European Union have the following list of rights:

1. freedom of movement and residence;
2. political rights, which include voting and being elected to the European Parliament, or in the Member State of residence;
3. the right to diplomatic protection;
4. the right to petition the European Parliament;
5. the right to complain to the Ombudsman appointed by the European Parliament;
6. fundamental rights of EU citizens.

2. the charter of human rights of the European union

Proclaimed in Nice on 7 December 2000, the Charter enshrines a number of rights and freedoms of the individual, and was adopted as a recommendation and reference text since then (European PARLIAMENT, 2012). It was annexed to the Lisbon Treaty as a statement, and since then has binding legal to states of the European Union.

In a context of increasingly integrated dialogue between the EU institutions, the view of the rights and freedoms of European citizens was necessary to continue advancing the integration (LUQUE, 2004).

Rights and freedoms:

1. the first chapter - Dignity (right to life, prohibition of torture and the death penalty, prohibition of slavery, etc.);
2. second Chapter - Freedoms (culture, speech, religion, thought, assembly, work, personal security, asylum);
3. third Chapter - Equality (prohibits any kind of discrimination and ensures equal treatment by the law, and respect for cultural, religious and linguistic diversity)
4. fourth Section - Solidarity (right to collective bargaining, consumer law, social security and other diffuse rights)
5. fifth chapter - Citizenship (right to vote and be voted for, the right of access to official documents, the right to petition and diplomatic and consular protection);
6. sixth Chapter - Justice (right to due process, presumption of innocence, etc.).

The legal binding of this Charter illustrates the new panorama taken by Community law: the idea of a united and diverse European Union essentially passes thought Human Rights.

3. The Lisbon Treaty

The fundamental rights of the Union was strengthened after the legal binding of the Charter, through the Treaty of Lisbon. The importance of the cultural factor has also been enshrined since the Treaty of Lisbon (2007, p. 121-122), when, in Article 167, provides that:

> 1. The Union shall contribute to the development of the cultures of the Member States, while respecting their national and regional diversity, and at the same time bringing the common cultural heritage.
> 2. The Union's action aims at encouraging cooperation between Member States and, if necessary, supporting and supplementing their action in the following areas:
> - Improving the knowledge and dissemination of the culture and history of the European peoples,
> - Conservation and safeguarding of cultural heritage of European significance [...]
> 4. In its action under other provisions of the Treaties, the Union > shall take cultural aspects into account in order to, inter alia, respect and promote the diversity of its cultures.

The Lisbon Treaty also made important contributions in terms of democratization, since strengthened the powers of Parliament. Now the Parliament and the Council vote the budget jointly, and both are responsible for safeguarding the fundamental rights (European PARLIAMENT, 2012B). Parliament since then has legislative power identical to the Council (extended in 40 areas of law). Furthermore, shall also have power to vote the compulsory EU budget (representing 45% of the total budget, and includes agriculture and international agreements). Parliament ensures that the Charter of Rights is implemented, in addition to collecting the right of initiative (legislative proposals of the European citizens). Also safeguards the right of national parliaments to submit legislative proposals they deem relevant. For 50 years the European Parliament had only a consultative role. In 1979 there was first election by universal suffrage. For several decades was appointed as the main democratic deficit in the European Union. With the Lisbon Treaty, the legal binding of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and its protection as a function of Parliament, it is stated more strongly as the legitimate representative of the problems of European citizens, encouraging minorities to also seek representation by the community institution.

4. Minorities and national minorities

Regarding minorities, more exactly, the EU recognizes a number of instruments, in the International Law and Community Law (European PARLIAMENT, 2011). Among the most important are:

1. the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union;
2. in International Law - International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Persons Belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities of 1992;
3. within the European system of human rights protection - the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights, the European Social Charter, the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities and the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages of the Council of Europe .

Moreover, there are several resolutions, directives and regulations issued by different EU institutions that deal on the subject.

5. The European Free Alliance

Since the first elections by direct vote held within the European Union in 1979, the regional and cultural minorities have sought and obtained representation on the block. At that first year, five regionalist parties gained seats in the European Parliament, representing minorities of Northern Ireland, Belgium, Scotland and Italy (European FREE ALLIANCE, 2012).

In 1981 there was officially made a political coalition between European regionalist parties by the European Free Alliance (EFA), and in 1994 the coalition formally became a federation of parties, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of the European Union (European FREE ALLIANCE, 2012). Prior to 1999, the number of seats obtained by the association was not exceeded the number of five. However, from 1999, with the coalition with the Green Party for the parliamentary elections, the ALE got more expressive representation, obtaining 10 seats in parliament (European FREE ALLIANCE, 2012).

The next step was in 2004, with the formalization of ALE as a European political party. Cooperation with the Green Party was held by coalition called "Group of the Greens / European Free Alliance" that lasts until the present day. Today EFA is part of the fourth largest political force in the European Parliament, with 58 members in the current legislature (European PARLIAMENT, 2012a). The party is essentially linked to the defense of minority rights and defends a propose of European Union that transcends the boundaries of national states. Brings together over 40 parties from 17 European Member States, plus 17 observers parties. As stated by the organization itself, are covered nations' parties, nations without parties and territorial entities (ALIANZA LIBRE EUROPEA, 2009). Among minorities represented on the party, we can cite the Basques, Catalonians and Andalusians in Spain, the Scots in Scotland, the Walloons and Flemings in Belgium, the Corsicans in France, the Fresians in Netherlands, the Moravians in the Czech Republic, and the Tyroleans in Italy, among others (ALIANZA LIBRE EUROPEA, 2009).

Among the party claims, few stand out for their bias in tune with the oxygenation of the European Parliament brought by the Lisbon Treaty and the pursuit of a truly pluralistic Europe (ALIANZA LIBRE EUROPEA, 2009), such as:

1. defense of a European Union-inspired Human Rights, less economist, centralist and liberal;
2. recognition of all the languages of the Member Countries of the European Union, the use of minority languages in official documents and media, and making a Declaration of Linguistic Rights;
3. integration and solidarity between different levels of government, including entities which do not have self-government;
4. support for referendums for creating new states in Catalonia, the Basque Country, Scotland, Flanders and Wales;
5. respect for cultural diversity and in particular the stateless nations, since without the state rights and guarantees are without legal support in the classical sense;
6. creation of a "Senate of the Regions", in which minorities have greater political expression.

Catalan, Galician, Welsh and Basque have been recognized as co-official languages of the European Union with the help of the claims of the party (ALIANZA LIBRE EUROPEA, 2009). Moreover, members of the EFA defend commitment to social assistance and use of European funds for social policies, especially for Roma. Henk ten Hoeve, member Fresian National Party (FNP), a party which integrates the European Free Alliance, believes that with the central motes above and strengthening of democracy through the last Treaty, help to reach a more concrete representation in the European Union. The congressman believes that the votes for Parliament elections should be divided by regions and not states, and that citizens could vote for parliamentarians from other countries, because minorities may form more significant European political parties and vote together (as Lapps or Samis , recognized indigenous people in the Nordic countries of Norway, Russia, Finland and Sweden).

Minorities without distinct territory can call for cultural autonomy not specifically regional (As the Lapps that I mentioned, and the Gypsy people). This cultural autonomy would be claimed on the establishment of schools, radio and television with the dialect of the minority, and any other ways found to perpetuate the culture. For the formation of a community will, in terms of legitimacy, the European Parliament should seek heterogeneity, including national, supranational and subnational actors. EFA defends this heterogeneity, and the willingness to build a Europe for people (ALIANZA LIBRE EUROPEA, 2009), not only discursively as palpably

6 Conclusion and debates

With the Lisbon Treaty the demands of minorities can be best embodied in the European Union. The demands of these minorities are in line with an European project based on ties of solidarity and cultural respect mediated by Human Rights. The European Union began its history with purely economic goals, but today the situation is different, and the philosophical perspective of integration should not only be reconsidered, as it has been, but their voices channeled and reflected in the institutions of the Union. The European Parliament affirms itself as the institution of democratic channeling with the Treaty of Lisbon and the reformulations and extensions made. Moreover, since then the Parliament has conditions to have a real clash with the institutions of higher power (Council of the European Union and European Commission).

Europe's wealth is its cultural diversity, and the idea of Europe fortified by the Lisbon Treaty is based on shared values and the Charter of Human Rights. The European Free Alliance and the platform preached by the party indicates the same perspective, going beyond the concept of national state that characterizes Europeans in a more democratic way, placing the motto of "Europe is unity in diversity" in a concrete form.

It is also necessary to say that the European Free Alliance discusses the proper role of the State in regard to minorities. Also, it brings the discussion of the formation of nation states, and the suppression of identities and diversities. The formation of the nation-state is seen in the International Relations, even as the cause of the problem of the minority, since its conception idealizes the identity between the state and the nation, which is not the international reality. The present context evidently discards the state where the minority lives as an object of identification, despite the fact that States promote the idea of "nation" and a collective identity."

The historical formation of the nation-state assumed unification around a national identity. Other possible identities inside the state were suppressed and denied .It was taken as truth that there is a perfect correspondence between nation and territory. In therms of reality, there are relations of greater or lesser conflict between the government and minorities, and correspondence between state and nation is fictional. Therefore, it is natural that this conflict should be mediated by other organisms. The European Union, supported by the Community Law and the shared sovereignty, is a supranational actor with a vocation for the mediation, as shown by the case of the European Free Alliance. The challenge is to achieve and maintain relations between minorities and the state in the lowest possible degree of conflict.

Some Critics to Robert Alexy's "Claim to Correctness"

Edna Felício Torres Câmara, MSc, Phd Candidate[1]
Melanie Merlin de Andrade, MSc[2]

Abstract: This summary intends to investigate the controversy established between positivists and non-positivists, regarding to the Law and morals, presenting the main criticisms to Robert Alexy´s theory, made by Eugenio Bulygin, Joseph Raz and Neil MacCormick, specially concerning to the conception of "claim to correctness". The methodology to be used in this research would be qualitative, consisting of a bibliographic review of the mentioned authors. According to Alexy, this claim to correctness is related both to the real dimension of Law (legal certainty), as to the ideal dimension of Law (which is about justice). It is the result of the author´s strong thesis of the connection between Law and morality, which sustains that Law is connected, necessarily, to a correct moral: when a judge faces a doubtful case, he should decide from moral values rationally justified through the argumentative procedure. In this case, that decision can be considered correct - thesis of Justice as a correction. Therefore, Alexy opposes the positivist theories because they did not admit a necessary relation between law and morality. The philosopher received several criticisms taking into account the fragility of his statement that unfair norms continue to be considered legal, although deficient, provided that the system to which they belong has made a claim to correctness. This statement seems to contradict Alexy's thesis sustaining that legal systems, legal standards and judicial decisions, necessarily formulate a claim of correctness. Bulygin points to the lack of consistent arguments, provided that Law, by its own nature, claims to correctness. Raz argues that classifying theories into positivist or non-positivist is useless, because it is clear that Law has moral properties. He also defends that Alexy failed to support the application of the argument from injustice, given that it is not simple to identify extreme injustices. MacCormick, in turn, argues that Law is not capable of performing speech acts, i.e. it is not possible that law formulates a claim to correctness. At the end of this research, it is concluded that the strength of Alexy's theory is endorsed by the attention and criticism that it still raises. On the other hand, those criticisms show fragilities that require better formulation. Nevertheless, it is undeniable that Alexy's contributions to the refinement of the discussions about the relationship between Law and morals, contribute to highlight the permanent tension between law and justice.

Keywords: claim to correctness, non-positivism, Justice, law, morals

1. Robert Alexy's non-positivist concept of law and the "claim to correctness"

Alexy´s theory is based on a concept of basic norm which includes ethic elements. According to him, if a Constitution is effectively established and socially effective, the behavior in accordance with this constitution is legally ordered, as it is consistent with the claim to correctness, if and to the extent that the norms of this constitution are not extremely unfair.

Unlike Kelsen, Alexy's basic norm contains moral arguments, since there is a necessary connection between law and morality. This relationship is reflected in the need for formulation of claim to correctness in Law (adequacy of law to moral issues through rational justification of statements) and in the application of the argument of injustice (as proposed by Gustav Radbruch: "extremely unjust law is no law ab initio when injustice goes beyond the so-called "threshold of injustice." So Alexy's theory depends on the thesis that Law necessarily promotes a claim to correctness.

Alexy's starting point is J. L. Austin´s speech act theory, which is about the responsibility that stems from a verbal action: communicative interaction has a contractual aspect or a commitment between the parties. Thus, one who establishes statements necessarily raise a claim to correctness - commitment to truth, in the field of general practical reason (moral), and to justice, in the field of Law.

Both speeches are governed by rules, which deal with the rational balance of interests and are object of the argumentation theory proposed by Alexy. Considering the existence of these rules, it can be stated that the identification of a moral right (reasoned) is possible - strong moral thesis defended by Alexy.

The passage from general practice argumentation to legal argumentation takes place as follows: after the general argumentative procedure, two incompatible norms, justified without violating any rules of discourse, may subsist giving rise to the so called "knowledge problem", i.e. two norms subsist and it is not possible to determine a single correct norm. As this limit is reached, there is a need to move to the level of legal discourse, in which procedures regulated by positive Law guarantee reasoning - this is how the legal discourse is institutionalized. Therefore, Alexy asserts that legal discourse is a special case of practical discourse (this is called the special case thesis).

In terms of legal discourse, positivity (legality) is combined with the need for coercion (element connected to the social effectiveness) and the requirements for social organization, considering that many moral demands cannot be observed as well as certain desirable objectives cannot be achieved only through individual actions and spontaneous cooperation. Therefore, the institutionalization of legal discourse allows possible results that would not be obtained with the use of general practical discourse.

Alexy points out, however, that the theory of argumentation does not guarantee certainty: its rational character does not refer to results, but the application of rules and forms of legal argumentation, which offer the criteria of correctness for legal decisions. According to Alexy, this could lead to the false impression that the transition from general practical discourse to legal discourse flows towards legal positivism. This idea can be rejected with the observation that Law, exactly in this transition, shows its dual nature: on the one hand, in the form of correction and discourse, on the other, in the form of legality and effectiveness (thesis of the dual nature of Law).

This dual nature of law derives from two apparently opposing principles: justice and legal certainty. These principles are included in the claim to correctness and should be combined without any disregard. According to Alexy, in jurisdictional claim, the judge says that he has followed the enacted and effective law, but also states that this law and its interpretation are morally correct.

However, the uncertainties inherent to the legal discourse (especially the open texture of language pointed to by H.L.A. Hart) indicate the need to set limits to the content of ordinary law. These limits are the guarantee of fundamental rights and the invalidity of extremely unfair rules (in the latter case, crossed the threshold of extreme injustice, the argument of injustice, pointed out by Alexy as a second level correction, is applied). Moreover, they make it possible to reject Kelsen´s thesis "all content may be law".

In addition to guaranteeing fundamental rights, which implies constitutional jurisdiction, the discourse theory leads to the requirement of deliberative democracy, which implies a discursive rationality, in which all participants seek for a correct political solution from arguments. As Alexy states, whoever wants correction, should want discourses, and whoever wants discourses should want democracy.

In this context, the claim to correctness is promoted by subjects who create, interpret, apply or enforce law (this is called "institutional circle") and by people who inquire and argue among themselves about the obligatory, prohibited, permitted or authorized by the system (non-institutional circle) - this explains the methodological importance of the observer´s perspective in Alexy´s theories.

Regarding the consequences arising from the relation between law and morality, Alexy claims that legal systems that do not formulate a claim to correctness are not legal systems; on the other hand, legal systems that formulate but do not satisfy the claim to correctness are deficient. However, legal norms and individual judicial decisions that do not formulate or do it, but do not satisfy the claim to correctness, are deficient, but they are still legal, provided that they are part of legal systems that have at least formulated the claim to correctness. However, if they are extremely unfair, they are not ab initio law.

Thus, the relevance of the claim to correctness is to distinguish law of brute force, what gives law the ideal necessary dimension, which is reflected in Alexy´s non-positivist concept of law. According to him, Law is a normative system that formulates a claim to correctness and consists of all the norms of a socially effective constitution, that are not extremely unfair, as well as all of the rules established in accordance with this constitution which have a minimum social effectiveness and are not extremely unfair, to which belong the principles and other normative arguments, on which should rely the procedure of law enforcement in order to satisfy the claim to correctness.

It´s important to emphasize that, according to Alexy, the acceptance of the thesis of the separation between law and morality is what allows us to state that a certain current analysis of law is positivist or non-positivist. According to Alexy, when ethical elements are included in a concept, it is a non-positivist concept of law.

2. The debate between Robert Alexy and Eugenio Bulygin

Eugenio Bulygin, professor emeritus at the University of Buenos Aires, is internationally recognized with one of the great philosophers of law today. In a debate that began in 1993, he criticizes various aspects of Alexy´s theory.

According to Bulygin, Alexy's theory central point is the definition of law and the relation between law and morality. For Alexy, all positivist theories defend the Separation Thesis, i.e., there would be no conceptual link between moral laws and the legality and effectiveness would suffice Law. On the other hand, non-positivist theories defend the thesis of the connection, in other words, the concept of law includes moral elements, besides the legality and social effectiveness. Bulygin also says that Alexy's theory is based on the possibility of distinguishing the observer´s points of view (the subject that just describes law without any commitment to following its rules) of the participant´s (the subject who takes part in an argumentation in a legal system of and inquires whether the decision given is correct). The problem, according to Bulygin, is that the distinction between the two points of view is not that clear, and many subjects are, at the same time, participants and observers regarding certain legal system.

For example, the judge acts as an observer when searching for the applicable law to the case and acts as a participant in the formulation and execution of the decision making. Therefore, according to Bulygin it would not be absurd to assure that the judge's opinion would have a significant weight on the decisions.

Even admitting the possibility of distinguishing the observer´s perspective from the participant's perspective, Bulygin criticizes Alexy´s claim that what differentiates a legal system from a gang´s normative system would be the claim to correctness. If so, the rhetoric in formulating the claim would transform a predatory system into a legal system.

Bulygin also questions Alexy´s statement that every creation of a law is conceptually connected with the claim to correctness, thus, normative systems that do not formulate a claim to correctness cannot be considered legal systems; on the other hand, a legal norm or judicial decision taken individually, even though it does not formulate (or formulates, but does not satisfy) the claim to correctness, still remains legal, but in this case, it is legally flawed. In Alexy´s point of view, the notion of deficiency is the evidence that a claim to correctness is required, but Bulygin points out circularity in this reasoning that leads to the following tautology: flawed legal systems are flawed. Bulygin says:

> The claim to correctness is necessary because normative systems that raise it without fulfilling it are faulty. And this faultiness has a special character because it is based on the necessity of the claim. So the necessity of the claim is at the same time a reason and a consequence of this claim (BULYGIN, 2010, p.15).

Bulygin also refers to the need of including moral elements in the concept of Law indicated by Alexy. This could mean that every legal system would contain elements of any moral (but not of the same moral) or that there would be a certain moral that is included in every Law. Alexy calls "poor connection" the first case and "strong connection" the second case, in which the connection is done with a moral justification. Bulygin objects that, in order to demonstrate that the strong connection is correct, it would be necessary to show evidences that everybody has the same idea of correct moral and he considers unlikely that Kant, Hitler, Stalin, Gandhi and Bush have the same understanding about the correct moral (BULYGIN, 2010, p. 16).

Finally, Bulygin comes to a conclusion that, he assumes to be, in some ways, surprising: Alexy´s theory put an end to the debate between positivists and non-positivists, proving the positivist thesis, since Alexy does not deny that the idea of separation between law and moral, from the observer´s perspective, is essentially correct, since positivism is only interested in identifying the law (an observer can describe a system and its rules without using moral values). Alexy refuted Bulygin´s criticism, however, it seems that both two authors remain firm in their theoretical positions. The disagreement is explained by differences in the authors´ theoretical assumptions: Bulygin assumes the formal conception of the analysis of law whereas Alexy assumes the pragmatic conception (ATIENZA, 1999, p.44) and illustrates the thesis that the debate between positivist and non-positivist has not ended with Alexy´s theories.

3. Some Joseph Raz's criticism

According to Gaido (2011, p. 14), Robert Alexy and Joseph Raz are the main contemporary exponents of non-Positivism and Positivism, respectively. In this work, the following divergence will be discussed, in particular: while Alexy considers the idea of claim to correctness essential, the notion of claim to authority constitutes the basis of Raz´s theory. Although divergent, these ideas are the characteristics that distinguish Law from mere coercive power, and approximate it to an ideal type.

Alexy´s critic, Raz says that the classification of theories of law as positivist or non-positivist is useless and illusory, since it is evident that Law has necessarily moral properties that cannot be refuted, not even by the theories of positivist tradition. Furthermore, Alexy fails to distinguish the participant´s perspectives from the observer´s, as well as he would not have justified well enough the assertion that Law necessarily formulates a claim to correctness. From Raz´s point of view, it would be more important to forget labels and consider the various theories within their own terms than Alexy´s failed attempt to contradict Legal Positivism. (RAZ, 2007, p. 17-35).

Raz questions, specifically, Alexy´s assertion that Positivism is an obsolete theory because, if so, "Why flog a dead horse? Why write a book to refute a totally discredited theory? "(RAZ, 2007, p. 17). The author states that Alexy´s assumptions about the supposed obsolescence of Positivism cannot be supported, especially because the term "Positivism" contains different theories within it and the discussions about them remain.

Moreover, Raz states, Alexy was wrong in suggesting that all so-called positivist theories are based on the Separation Thesis (moral elements would not be included in the concept of Law). The author points ou a crucial discussion:

> Many normative and evaluative concepts are common to moral and non-moral discourse. There are moral and non-moral reasons, duties, rights, virtues, offences, rules, laws, and so on. There are difficulties in demarcating the realm of morality, and distinguishing, between it and the non-moral domain (RAZ, 2007, p. 19).

This difficulty in identifying the concepts within the moral realm, lead him to question what benefits would come from the struggle to solve this impasse.

Moreover, Raz highlights, Law formulates a claim not to correction, but to authority - which is undoubtedly a moral appeal, since law affects basic aspects of people's lives and interaction between individuals.

Therefore, Raz affirms that it is clear that the law has got required moral properties because, from the participant´s point of view, i.e., those who understand law as a source of justification of behaviors, Law can only be accepted considering moral beliefs in the normativity of Law. So, Law is a legitimate moral authority structure, because only the valid norms, i.e., those with legitimate authority as a source, motivate people to obey them. (GAIDO, 2011, p.109). However, the idea of legitimate authority refers to the idea that there was a previous solution given by other individuals so that, if a certain fact falls within the scope determined by the authority, any further deliberation is irrelevant (GAIDO, 2011, p.179) .

Thus, according to Gaido (2011, p. 14-19), Raz and Alexy have some points in common. Both support that to explain what Law is, is to explain its nature, and the required properties of both. They also have in common the belief that understanding the nature of Law is only possible if one understands the moral value aimed by Law. However, the authors give different implications to that value.

Raz doubts that the Separation Thesis could be used to define Law, since considering it, his own writings should be considered non-positivist. This is because the concept of authority is related to moral, but the author observes that his writings are usually seen as positivists. The question that arises is: what is the use of such classification?

Just as he did to Bulygin, Alexy rejected Raz´s criticism. However, it shows that the arguments between positivists and non-positivists are still relevant and current.

The last theorist that will be attempted is Neil Maccormick, a scottish legal philosopher and politician.

He defends that the affirmation that the law claims correctness is based on a mistake. For him, to say law claims anything, meaning this literally, is a category mistake, because there is no entity "law" which is capable of performing speech acts of this sort.

Law considered generically is a kind of normative order, specifically, it is institutional normative order. The existence of normative order is a state of affairs, that do not have intentions, do not make claims and are incapable of performing speech acts. States of affairs should be distinguished from entities that can have intentions, can make claims.

Legislatives make laws, by a fairly long drown-out process involving inquiries, amendments, debates, until the final vote. The acts of higher agencies of government - in legislative, executive and judiciary are confined to those that fall whiting the category of "speech acts". Any claim to correctness or authority associated with law will there be forms in the context of these speech.

Thereby, it is a misleading to input claims to the law itself. More obvious contends for such a single point of imputation would, however, surely be "the state" rather than the law itself, at any rate in the case of state law. The state is commonly personified as an acting subject.

In general: all purported acts of legislation involve an implicit claim (or sometimes indeed an express one) on the part of all those participating that each is constitutionally empowered to play the relevant role in the legislature. Purporting to legislative involves the claim: successfully doing it presupposes that the claim is sound or justified.

He agrees with Raz in the proposition that governmental acts-in-law presuppose the authority or the actor, and thus involve an implicit claim by the actor to have appropriate authority.

If the state has a fair and democratic constitution, this fairness and democratic character should be taken seriously even by those who disagree with the particular decision. In legislative politics, there is always some underlying claim about just demands and the demands of justice. That this so indicates that the law is unthinkable without some ascription of value-laden functions to ir. Law is for the securing of civil peace so far as possible; civility requires a common sense of justice, for there is no peace where there is injustice. Certainly, what justice requires may be and often is deeply controversial, diving people sharply into opposing political camps.

MacCormick agree that a well-founded conception of law, has to include a version of the Radbruch Formula. In the contemporary world there arer established human rights instruments that provide a positivised means of establishing in an interpersonal and interstate context an identifiable limit beyond which legislators and governments cannot go, and which all judges ought to respect.

He sustains that it is true that any speech act implicitly carries with a claim of correctness. Therefore, this claim is not of the "law", but that of the law-maker.

Concluding, these are the controversy established between Alexy, Bulygin, Raz and MacCormick specially concerning to the conception of "claim of correctness". The debate is relevant and there's still not a unique answer.

The role of precedent in the rational control of judicial decision from the perspective of the Theory of Legal Argumentation by Robert Alexy

Maira Portes[1]

Abstract: In the context of the democratic constitutional state, the judicial decision is constructed by means of argumentative processes, and must be grounded in the way that the interlocutors be able to knows what were the reasons that led the judge to decide in that way. By the reasoning the plaintiff could knows the premises that led the judge to choose a particular interpretation of the law in its application to that case, which is called the context of justification. The internal justification is sufficient when the argument involves only the analysis of the facts regarding the rules, represented by syllogism. However, it does not include the issues about the content of the constitutional standard, which are the subject of the theory of legal argumentation. Whereas the syllogism is considered a insufficient method to reach all the reasoning contained in the judgment, the use of the argumentation requires some mediations. Which of the arguments must be selected to make a complete decision? Which logical and objective criteria are suitable for choose the winner arguments? Which of these arguments represent the truth of the case? Which concept of truth we are talking about? Based on these questions, Robert Alexy in his "Theory of Legal Argumentation: The Theory of Rational Discourse as Theory of Legal Reasoning" proposes the rational control of judicial decisions by establishing logical and objective criteria for selecting those arguments more likely to reach the truth. The sense of truth, in this context, is about truth as correctness, which is discursively constructed, and can only be achieved by the exercise of argumentation towards consensus, even ideal. In this context, the aim of this paper is to examine, by using as main reference the book referred, the judicial precedent as external justification for correcting the premises used in legal reasoning, and its role in building and maintaining the coherence of the legal discourse within the court decision. The claim to correctness of the statements that compose the judicial decision is sought by empirical and normative elements susceptible of valuation, which starts from the notion that legal discourse is part of the general practical discourse, in other words, that one cannot be completely disconnected from some moral conceptions, which, in a constitutional state, are crystallized in the Constitution. Thus, if the control of rationality consists in imposing limits on reasoning, it can be considered that the precedent is one of these boundary conditions, since it constrains the judge to observe the reasons already stated, thus limiting their argumentative range. In this sense, we will analyze two essential elements to characterize the precedent as a limiting condition to the legal discourse: the principle of universality, by which the present argument taken as the correct interpretation should be applicable to all cases with the same relevant conditions, and the principle of inertia, whereby the removal of a previously established as correct interpretation presupposes a relevant and sufficient reasoning for the interpreter. Both characterize the precedent as an external justification element, and their analysis will serve mainly to investigate the argumentative function of precedent with respect to the divergence of the earlier decision by the two forms of departure of precedent in American law: the distinguishing and overruling. What is sought to demonstrate that it is departure from a precedent is an argumentative procedure, in that the removal of certain reasons considered correct can only be done if the new argument justify the change, and if this new reasoning is applied to similar cases since then. It is quite evident, therefore, that the exception to the universality and inertia must always be grounded, and that this is an argument against the main ways to control the rationality of judicial decision and maintain the pretense of correctness.

Keywords: precedent - legal argumentation - overruling

1. The role of precedent in the control of the rationality of judicial decisions

This paper aims to demonstrate the role of Alexy's theory of legal argumentation to the building of a normative theory of precedent, in the sense that give some reasons to the work with the legal argumentation, in complement of the traditional reasoning method to interpret the law, the syllogism.

According Alexy's theory, syllogism is not sufficient because in some situations like the vagueness of the legal language, the possibility of conflicts between rules, the possible existence of cases not regulated by current rules, as well as the judgment contra legem when the judge faces a hard case, thus incoming in a lack of interpretation. This can be faced by other discursive forms through the argumentative process (ALEXY, 2011, p. 280).

Once the legal argumentation is a more flexible method than syllogism, it is necessary to establish some criteria for controlling the rationality of the premises and the conclusion, which are moral criteria.

The notion of the discursive nature of the legal reasoning has its theoretical roots in the rule of grounding developed by Habermas, which, based on the concept of ideal speech condition, marks its three essential aspects: equal rights, the universality of the arguments and the absence of coercion (ALEXY, 2011, p. 133).

These are ideal criteria, what means that can't be fully realized and otherwise demonstrates the flexible nature of speech, which allows that the evaluation of a normative statement acquires different features according to the variation of these aspects, reaching different results. According Alexy (2011, p.33), the most of standards is only discursively possible, and because of this its reasoning is not definitive, since it remains subjected to the constantly changing of the conditions of an ideal speech.

Among these aspects, Alexy points out the need for the universality of the arguments to characterize the precedent as limiting condition to the legal discourse, and also the need for stability in the arguments of the judicial decision, in order to avoid undue oscillation of arguments, what refer to the principle of inertia formulated by Chaim Perelman.

For Alexy, the role of precedent in rational argumentation can be based on these two principles.

1.1. The principle of universality

The principle of universality to which the author refers is linked to the descriptive meaning of the statement, in the sense of that descriptive assumptions applied to a particular object should be applied to all other objects that have the same material aspects. If a certain proposition is elected as a good one to describe an object, so it must be used to describe all the other objects that have this characteristic (ALEXY, 2011, p. 73).

This is a moral rule that connects the concepts of reason and rule: if "A" is the rule in a given situation, hence "A" is good. These rules are moral principles which are minimally generalizable, and are characterized by the absence of any mention of a particular identification. According Alexy's theory, to realize the claim of correctness depends on if these logical rules were taken as starting point (ALEXY, 2011, p. 74-75).

However, it's not sufficient to classify a specific rule as a good one. It is also necessary that this rule be appropriate. The principle of universality, as a logical criterion of valuation, should be read with the principle of prescriptivity, whereby the judge must be willing to suffer the consequences of the applied rule, and, at the same time, to applying the same rule to all the other cases later. So, to accept a standard should means to accept that this rule is morally justified.

Therefore, for discursive theory of law, to follow the judicial precedent is a practice based on the principle of universality, a rule of general practical discourse in which "[a]ny speaker who applies predicate F to object A must be prepared to apply F to any other object that is similar to A in all relevant aspects." This is an equality predicate, which is, according to Alexy, a notion present in any concept of justice (ALEXY, 2011, p. 267).

One of the main difficulties pointed out by the author is to define which are the relevant circumstances that allows the departure of the argument in the previous case. And even when it is possible to identify the relevant circumstances between a case and its precedent, it may considered necessary to modify the arguments, presenting, therefore, other practical reasons that point to an argument closer to correctness (ALEXY, 2011, p. 268).

To observe the principle of universality as a predicate of the claim of correctness results in the fulfillment of another important predicate which is responsible for the notion of stability claimed to ensure that random arguments will not be regarded: the principle of inertia.

1.2. The principle of inertia

According to the principle of universality, the argument presented in a particular decision must be followed whenever it could be possible to identify the resemblance of the relevant circumstances of a case and the precedent case (ALEXY, 2011, p. 171-172).

When this universal rule is broken, by departure of the arguments contained in the precedent, it is up to the interpreter to justify the reason why he diverges from the arguments made in the precedent, what it calls principle of inertia (CELLA, 2002, p. 26).

According this principle, the argument shall only be changed if given sufficient reasons for the previous arguments are considered less accurate than the current arguments, what is a duty of who makes the further argument.

Does not mean that the argument must be challenged, but the arguments must remain healthy until better arguments are not presented. When a certain argument becomes habitual it becomes a rule, and its departure must be justified, in order to preserve the minimum stability. This intend to avoid the endlessly argumentation and limiting the range of justification to what is put in doubt (ALEXY, 2011, p. 172).

2. The rationality of judicial decision: a requirement of the Constitutional State

The argumentative procedure performed, rather than as an alternative, a complement to the purely formal syllogistic procedure, once enabled the examination of the legal text not only in its semantic plan, but also at the pragmatic level. However, the argumentation does not obviate the syllogism: it remains as the primary method.

So, precedent is a control element of the rationality of judicial decision because it provides means for logical system closure, and logical justification for the argument.

According to the principle of universality, the precedent have a normative claim, not in the sense that should be considered as a general and abstract rule, but in the sense that it is a concrete and specific rule, applicable where the relevant circumstances can be observed.

On the other hand, the principle of inertia is the limitation to the modification of the arguments, since it requires that the modification must be justified. This is due to the need for minimum stability of the system, so that people are not subject to unwarranted modification of the reasons that lead to particular conclusions, and may supposed to guide their behavior in accordance with the understanding currently designed as correct.

Thus, the precedent remains as an external justification to the rule of the decision, to the extent that could provide criteria for correcting the assumptions that are not predetermined in the argumentative dynamics. Also, it is a limitation to the modification of the main arguments in order to promote the distribution of argumentative load between who developed the precedent and who intends to deviate from it.

From this perspective, it is possible to defend the applicability of a normative theory of precedent also to civil law systems, not in the mold of stare decisis, but in order to consider the control of rationality, avoiding perpetuating understandings contrary to the prevailing notion of correctness.

3. The argumentative load in the divergence of precedents. Distinguish and overruling

Departure from judicial precedents has been a thorny problem for the common law judges, because in a context of stare decisis, the precedent's basis of authority restricts the ability to disagree, do not apply and even revoke the standard built in precedent, in the name of maintaining the stability and uniformity of law.

Some issues such as coherence, social congruence and systemic consistency, besides the widespread search for legal certainty, concerns the rational demands of judicial precedent, and in this point, the theories of legal argumentation developed throughout the twentieth century may provide some answers to these questions.

By considering the fact that judicial precedent is a judicial decision, we conclude that it must be justified, once there are consolidated legal rules that should be universal, in a concrete way.

The argumentation in a given judicial decision must remains unless one presents sufficient grounds for departure for it. That argumentation is named by the doctrine as the ratio decidendi of a case (CROSS, 1991, p. 32). Once the court decision is a response to the claim of correctness, the ratio decidendi can be understood as the rule formulated for a given case by applying the law in order to convey the more "correct" solution, or the closest to a given concept of justice.

To define the ratio decidendi of a decision it is important to the control of rationality of judicial precedent. Perhaps it would be even more importantly to defend the possibility of more than one ratio for each case, isolating thus the rules of law of the outcome of the trial, and thus the universal aspect of the particular aspect of judicial precedent (ALEXY, DREIER, 1997, p. 156).

Alexy points out that the argumentative role of the judicial precedent becomes more evident when it comes to the chances of its departure, specially distinguish and overruling. These kind of argumentation depends on the strict interpretation of the ratio decidendi, so that we can identify the underlying standard decision. When is given to the judge to change the ratio decidendi, he reaches the power to change the standard formulated for that context, and this change is justified precisely in a universal criterion, given that a precedent is not exactly suitable for the resolution of this case, requiring the construction of another rule that could be applied in cases with the same specificity. Thus, it satisfies the requirement of universality (ALEXY, 2011, p. 271).

The underlying question about the two techniques of departure from the precedent is the need to support the removal of the arguments contained in judicial precedent. In one hand, the change in argument requires a rational justification in respect of the principle of inertia. In another, justify the changing or overruling of a certain ratio decidendi is also a way to maintaining its universal character, in that the solution offered by the decision can be applied to other cases.

Alexy says, by the way, that by making this control of rationality, ensuring the stability of the argument and the universality of the rule underlying the decision, and therefore electing inertia and universality as logical criteria of rationality, the judge plays a role that is similar to the role of the legislature, as that exercises control over the standard argumentative created for the case (ALEXY, 2003, p.170).

It can be concluded, therefore, that follow precedents can be understood as one of the control criterion of rationality of judgment, by limiting the range of argumentation and demanding justification for the change in the argument. Since the rationality of the decision depends, among other criteria, on the justification of the departure of the previously argument that justify certain decision, and the construction of logical reasoning applies to the other cases, it is an argumentative procedure arising from requirements of a practical and general discourse, as the principle of universality and the distribution of the load argumentative (BUSTAMANTE, 2010, p. 69).

This process is applicable regardless of the admission of precedent as a source of law and the strength of its institutional authority. Of course, the combination of authority with rationality provides more robust subsidies to maintain the coherence of the legal system, but understand that the use of precedent is, above all, a requirement of rationality, leads to conclude that the absence of a doctrine of binding mandatory, as it can be observed in the countries of the civil law tradition, does not prevent to recognize the precedent as an essential element of legal reasoning, having no need to rule the need to follow precedents.

Consensual weighting by arbitration and the Alexy's theory of argumentation

L'Inti Ali Miranda Faiad[2]
Lossian Barbosa Bacelar Miranda[3]

Abstract: We establish links at the level of principles between Antiphon's conjecture about infinite sharing and Robert Alexy's theory of legal argumentation and also a correlated method of consensus assisted by arbiters. Our main problems are: to identify the use of the method of exhaustion in the application of the Alexyan argumentation theory; to construct a method of arriving at consensual weighing through arbitration.

Our goals are: to identify the analogical use of the exhaustion method in the construction of Alexy's theory of legal argumentation and, from there, to establish a multifaceted method of consensual weighting assisted by an arbiter through application of variable parameters and the reiterated use of argumentation techniques.

The proposed method requires, in each phase, fair decisions in accordance with the points of view of the parties involved and allows them to evaluate the process of evolution in each phase. The higher the parties' degree of knowledge of the conflict, the easier will be the application of the method. The fragility of the method derives from the fact that it is only approximate and that the arbitrator becomes indispensable.

1. Introduction.

Unlike the legal knowledge, the constructions made by rule and compass are the safest scientific knowledge of the human being. They are characterized by empiricism, theory, abstraction, realizability by a finite number of procedures, the reproducibility, ability of forecasting, applicability, intuition, deduction and experience. And all of that at a very low level of difficulty. From efforts to square the circle by successive approximations (passage to the limit) from Antiphon's rhetoric technic of enumerative neighborhood inductive of causality, the differential and integral calculus has been developed. This is the second safest form of human knowledge and the basis of current scientific determinism. Here we are studying the legal discourse and division of assets and obligations, according to this ancient tradition.

Among all the legal procedures, the division of assets and obligations is the most general and the best prototype. At the same time, it is also the judicial procedure that has been most objectively studied by professionals usually working outside the legal sphere. Assuming the fact that the unjust man is greedy, Aristotle refers to the acquisition of assets and obligations as the leading problem of the justice (Aristotle, 1872, pp. 4-5).

We share this point of view and understand that the issue of justice, in a sufficiently broad spectrum, coincides with the fair division problem (distribution of assets and obligations). Based on the theory of proportionality, Aristotle defined a conception of justice as equality, proposing that in distributive justice, the benefits should be higher for those with greater political virtues (Aristotle, 1928, III, Chapter XIII).[4]

We believe that each distribution problem has a uniquely correct solution and that the universalizability of Hare is also a question of distribution where, each legal standard, corresponds to a distribution criterion of all the assets and obligations for all parties. We believe that this approach and the method that we presented constitute a pretension of correction from the increase of knowledge and sharing of themselves through rational discourse. We recognize that injustice can be established from a division of assets due to a lack of knowledge, the bad-faith of its members or the inability of the arbitrator. Admitting or not that, for each practical matter, there is only one correct answer, it seems like the knowledge, as well as the sharing of it, both point in the opposite direction at the injustice. However, this is never fully shared among the parties of a dispute. What remains is only an approximation and this is what we are looking for.

2. Antiphon's conjecture and the Alexy's theory of legal argumentation.

The method of exhaustion, and consequently the differential and integral calculus, are based on the following principle of Antiphon, originally formulated within a geometric context to effect the squareness of a circle by approximating it using polygons with a successive increase in the number of sides:

> "Two unequal magnitudes being set out, if from the greater there be subtracted a magnitude greater than its half, and from that which is left a magnitude greater than its half, and if this process be repeated continually, there will be left some magnitude which will be less than the lesser magnitude set out" (Euclid's Elements, 1908, X-1, pp. 14-16).[5]

[5] In place of the half can also consider any number of half-open interval]0,1]. Originally, should be considered half, because the geometric proposed procedure by Antiphon to square the circle (Antiphon's conjecture) pleads that possibility, as Simplicius affirms, In Aristotelis Physica 54.12-55. 24 Diels [B.13 DK/ B.13 U/ F13(e) P], as translation of Luís Felipe Bellintani Ribeiro:

"Pois, enquanto muitos buscam a quadratura do círculo (isto é, estabelecer um quadrado que fosse igual a um círculo), tanto Antifonte quanto Hipócrates de Quios consideram erroneamente tê-la descoberto. Mas o erro de Antifonte, por não partir de princípios geométricos, como aprenderemos, não é próprio do geômetra refutar…

Antifonte desenhou um círculo e inscreveu nele a área de um dos polígonos que podem ser inscritos. Seja, por exemplo, um quadrado o polígono inscrito. Em seguida, cortando cada um dos lados do quadrado em dois, traçava linhas ortogonais desde o ponto do corte até a circunferência, cada uma das quais, evidentemente, dividia em dois o respectivo segmento do círculo. Depois, desde o ponto de corte, ligava com linhas retas as extremidades das linhas do quadrado, de modo a formar quatro triângulos a partir dessas linhas retas, sendo o todo da figura inscrita um octógono. E assim novamente segundo o mesmo método, cortando em dois cada um dos lados do octógono e traçando linhas ortogonais do ponto de corte até a circunferência, ligava os pontos em que linhas traçadas tocavam a circunferência até as extremidades das retas divididas, fazendo da figura inscrita um polígono de dezesseis lados. E cortando de novo, seguindo o mesmo raciocínio, os lados do polígono inscrito de dezesseis lados, ligando com retas, duplicando o polígono inscrito e isso sempre fazendo, achava que, quando estivesse esgotada a superfície, restaria inscrito desse modo no círculo certo polígono, cujos lados, por causa da máxima pequenez, adequar-se-iam à circunferência do círculo. E como podemos estabelecer um quadrado equivalente a todo polígono, como aprendemos nos Elementos (Euclides II 14), por supor o polígono igual ao círculo que a ele corresponde, teremos estabelecido um quadrado equivalente a um círculo" [ANTIFONTE - Testemunhos, Frag-

The logographer Antiphon, who we think was also the sophist, made his persuasive arguments by building sequences of irrefutable propositions which, by verisimilitude, will approach what more closely resembles the truth. It's what linguists call enumerative neighborhood inductive of causality.[6] The biggest philosophical principle inspiring Antiphon's thinking is continuity, in the broad sense, which states that, if something is limit (in the widest sense) of a sequence of some other things, then the limit possesses all the properties of the terms of the sequence from certain order. The major problem is how to minimize this broad sense. The major broad sense could be, in our view, the own identity. The major broad sense could be, in our view, the own identity. A less restrictive principle would define a thing C as the limit (multiplex) of a sequence $\{C_n\}_{\_(n=1,2,3,...)}$ of some other things relative to a set $\{P_\lambda\}_{(\lambda\in\Lambda)}$ of sufficient assumptions for the existence of a certain trait P, then the limit C would have this trait P.

Be a polygon is a sufficient condition to be squareable with ruler and compass. However, never squares approach circumferences, in relation to "be square", because, effectively, they are not squares. In the Antiphon's proposal for the quadrature of the circle, many assumptions concerning the polygons approximate assumptions concerning the circles, but not all. And we do not know which of these assumptions are, together, sufficient to ensure squareness of the circle via ruler and compass. Indeed, very little is known about the figures that support this type of quadrature. Mathematicians have proven that the fruitful Antiphon's proposal concerning the circle's squareness is false. It is analogous to court speeches of Antiphon, since in the same prevail the verisimilitude and the enumerative neighborhood inductive of causality, known to mathematicians as the method of exhaustion.[7]

[7] The technique of squareness of circle formulated by Antiphon was the same used in his court speeches. There is a approximation by verisimilitude in relation to the area, seen that the polygons' areas go approaching the area of the circle. There is a approxi-

The principle of inertia, as elaborated by Galileo Galilei in Giornata Seconda, Opere[8], follows Antiphon's above cited procedure, since it's an ideal result which is limit of irrefutable empirical procedures.[9] The same applies to the classical mechanical and all physical procedures, where ideal standards, the physical laws, are used to get approximated results.

The Alexy's theory of argumentation also fits within the antiphonian's method, because ideal speech is the limit of real speech, which can approximate it, if are obeyed, in successively higher levels, rules like freedom of contradiction, conceptual idiomatic clarity, empirical truth, consideration of the consequences, weighting, role reversal and analysis of the birth of moral convictions.[10] mation by verisimilitude, but more than that, identity, in the construction process of the figures, seen that the circle as the polygons are constructible by ruler and compass. There is a approximation by verisimilitude in relation to the dimensions of the circle and the polygons, because both are bidimensional figures. Also are approximation in relation to the lengths of the respective sides of the polygon (chords) and its circular arcs. However, there isn't approximation by verisimilitude in relation to the dimensions of the points and the dimensions of circular arcs and segments that they converge. (Cf. Loisima Schiess and Lossian Miranda, Op. cit., p. 5).

[8] G. Galilei. Opere: Prima edizione completa, condotta sugli autentici manoscritti Palatini, Tomo I - Soc. Editrice Fiorentina, 1842. pp. 161-164.

9 Based on various experiments done by Galileo Galilei in inclined planes [G. Galilei. Op. cit., pp. 161-164]. Aristotle came close of the principle of inertia in the following quote, where he says if there was a vacuum will exist the principle of inertia:

"Further, no one could say why a thing once set in motion should stop anywhere; for why should it stop here rather than here? So that a thing will either be at rest or must be moved ad infinitum, unless something more powerful get in its way" (ARISTOTLE. Physics, Book IV, Chap. 8. Translated by R. P. Hardie and R. K. Gaye. University of Adelaide, 2013. http://ebooks.adelaide.edu.au/a/aristotle/physics/book4.html).

Aristotle also had great respect for Antiphon's conjecture, as seen in Aristotle, Physica, I-2:

At the same time, however, it is not proper to solve all the arguments, but those only, in which some one, demonstrating from principles, concludes falsely: for such as do not thus conclude are not to be solved. Thus, for instance, with respect to the quadrature of lunulas, that which is effected through segments, it is the business of a geometrician to solve; but it is not the province of a geometrician to solve that of Antiphon (Aristotle, 1806, Op. cit, pp. 23-24).

Still, there is no data in his biography of if he used this method to establish physical results.

[10] ALEXY, Robert. Constitucionalismo discursivo. Tradução Luís Afonso Heck. 3 ed. Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado Editora, 2011, p. 26.

We understand that the approximation between ideal and real discourse is at the root of what Alexy calls the status problem and problem of reasoning. In relation to what he calls the applying problem, this philosopher raises three issues about the rules system in the discourse theory: i) it contains some ideal rules, therefore, it is only approximately realizable; ii) the rules do not contain any guidance concerning the starting points of the procedure (normative beliefs and the interpretation of parties' interests); iii) the rules do not determine all the steps of the argument. As a result of this combination of factors, the above system, such as Antiphon's conjecture, offers no procedure whereby in finite number of operations, arrive to a rigorous result (Alexy, Op. cit., p. 27-28). That situation is generally shared by all physical theories.

Essentially, there is no difference between the procedure used in physical and in legal discourse. There is no real discourse with pretension of correction without ideal discourse, in the same way that there is no physical predictability without physical laws. There is a clear analogy between Alexy's discourse theory and the physical theories. In summary, the rules of discourse are ideals formalizations that approach the reality such as the physical laws. Both use the enumerative neighborhood inductive of causality, as in human inductive procedures which come from real experiences and extrapolate the finite set of the same to build an ideal world, approximated to reality.

3. Consensual weighting by arbitration.

Two parties, P_1 and P_2, are in dispute over the division of a divisible good[11], whose quantity is q. Without loss of generality, in some sections of this article, will assume that this quantity is unity[12]. Let x_1 and x_2 [11] Eventually may also be an indivisible good, in case the conflict refers to the establishment of weights for each of the parties when establishing the right to only one of them. In that case, any infinitesimal can be decisive in establishing the right and, no way, applies the principle of insignificance of quantum.

[12] For the purposes of calculations of proportionalities, which is our case, it is always possible to consider a nonzero among being unitary.

be the variables which represent the amounts to be divided between the parties. The problem consists in determining these quantities fairly and so that the parties are satisfied. There are two different analyses, which are: to make effective the sharing when you already know the quantum belonging to each party; consensual construction of the quantum due to each party.

3.1. Consensual sharing when you already know the quantum belonging to each party.

If there are objective criteria which permit the establishment of fair amounts, videlicet, x_1 for P_1 and $x_2 = 1 - x_1$ for P_2, then the problem will be reduced to make the division, in an analogous situation to Fair Division for Two, or grant the right to the part which fits the largest amount (in this case, the weights x_1 or $1 - x_1$).

The analogy with the Fair Division for Two is as follow. If $x_1 = p/q$ is a rational number, the procedure consists of making P_1 divide the good in n equal portions and P_2 took $q - p$ portions or P_2 divides the good in q portions and P_1 took p portions. This division process can be outstretched to n parties P_i, $(i \in I_n = \{1, 2, ..., n\})$ with respective rational quantities $x_i = p_i/q_i$,[13] in a similar situation established by Brams–Taylor procedure[14].

If x_1 is an irrational number there's no way to do the division without envy, because in that case one party makes division on the good of unit quantity and the other party chooses supposedly higher part relative to other. If x_1 is irrational, there will always be leftovers, and of these, minor portions could have been added to selected portions. Therefore, we can characterize rational numbers as associated to non-envy divisions and irrational numbers to impossibility of that kind of division[15]. In that situation, the solution is to find a rational number p/q such as $x_1 = p/q$ being an insignificant legal amount and immediately replace x_1 to p/q, proceeding as in the rational case.

[13]To achieve this goal, we conjecture that just replace, in Theorem Brams-Taylor, procedures of divisions isonomic by their respective proportional divisions established by quantities fixed $x_i = p_i/q_i$, $i \in I_n$.

3.2. Consensual construction by arbitration of the quantum due to each party.

If the aforementioned criteria don't exist, the division relates to one of the most serious problems of the humanity, the problem of justice. In what follows, we will assume the next principle according to Socrates (Plato, Protagoras, pp. 58-59):

PRINCIPLE (Continuity of justice in relation to knowledge): The closer the knowledge that two rational human beings have about a phenomenon which focuses on the sense of justice (subjective or objective justice), the closer will be this feeling of justice. Moreover, the higher the shared knowledge, the closer will be the sense of justice.

We understand that knowledge allows us to compare the various aspects that may, in allocations, induce us to provide goods for a particular part and not for another. Being the righteous act, in essence, the achievement of equality or balance between various complex aspects that oppose each other in society, shared knowledge at the highest level, in principle, allows the perception of balance or that equality. Through rational discourse and high level of knowledge sharing is possible rapprochement between the consequences that the Kantian categorical imperative requires for the observers of the legal phenomenon in specific cases. In this context, in the following, we will present a method of consensual construction of the quantum due to parties, by arbitration, achieved by applying mathematics and the Alexy's theory of legal argumentation.

Consensual construction by arbitration

Consider two parties, P_1 and P_2 in dispute over the division of a divisible good of quantity with inexistence of liberality of both parties and the nonoccurrence of objective criteria which permit the establishing fair amounts, videlicet, z_1 for P_1 and $z_1 = v - z_1$ for P_2 .

Formalization is the following: considers a segment $\overline{OC}$ which will be divided in another two segments $\overline{OX}$ and $\overline{XC}$ for two parties in conflict.
Being $\Delta = \{(\overline{OX},\overline{XC}) : (\overline{OX},\overline{XC})$ the divison of $\overline{OC}$ in two segments for the parties in conflict$\}$ and $1 = \{(\overline{OX},\overline{XC}) \in \Delta : (\overline{OX},\overline{XC})$ is free from envy $\}$. Then the application $j: \Delta \longrightarrow \mathbb{R}_+ ; (\overline{OX},\overline{XC}) \rightarrow \frac{OX}{XC} = \frac{OX}{OC - OX}$ is bijective and $j(1) = \mathbb{Q}_+$. Is importantly to note that the legal thought often introduces new ways of think mathematics. The biggest example was the method of exhaustion by Antiphon. Toulmin says that logic is the generalization of the science of law (Toulmin. The Uses of Argument, Cambridge, 1958, p. 7).

If the level of pretension of correction of a party is close to the level of pretension of correction of the referee and try this same part prejudicing the other party, then the party that is trying to cause injury will be strongly affected by the method specified above. This part will be able even receive "negative quantity", and the other party to receive the full amount and still stay creditor debt corresponding to this negax_1 and $v - x_1$ the quantities which the arbitrator apportions, respectively, to P_1 and to P_2, initially in secret.

Step 1: Consider the following data:

$\bar{x}_{2,1}$ the amount that P_2 offers to P_1;

$\bar{x}_{1,2}$ the amount that P_1 gives to P_2;

Step 2: We will consider $a(P_1)$ as the quantity that the arbitrator apportions to P_1 and $a(P_2)$ the quantity that the arbitrator apportions to P_2, given by the formulas:

$$a(P_1) = x_1 + (x_1 - \bar{x}_{2,1}) - ((v - x_1) - \bar{x}_{1,2})$$
$$a(P_2) = (v - x_1) + \left((v - x_1) - \bar{x}_{1,2}\right) - (x_1 - \bar{x}_{2,1}) \qquad (1).$$

Note that a simplification gives:

$$a(P_1) = 3x_1 - \bar{x}_{2,1} + \bar{x}_{1,2} - v$$
$$a(P_2) = v - (3x_1 - \bar{x}_{2,1} + \bar{x}_{1,2} - v) \qquad (2).$$

tive quantity. This method forces mutual good faith between the parties, since, in principle, there is no way of knowing whether the claim to fix of any of them is or is not close to the referee. The principle of continuity indicates that they should be close, if the arbitrator and the parties to study the case in detail.

If in a first phase there was not a result that satisfied the arbitrator, then his pretension of correction and that of the other parties are not close enough. From the establishment of an Alexyan discourse, the arbitrator can make progress by increasing the level of mutual understanding of the case. From there, effect new applications for this method. With repeated application, it would be possible to approach consensus. Below we consider briefly the case where there is plurality of parts.

Consider the parties $P_1, P_2, ..., P_n$. Let $x_i (i \in I_n = \{1, 2, ..., n\})$ the quantity that the arbitrator initially gives to P_i, with the hypothesis $\sum^{n}_{i=1} x_i = v$. Let $\ddot{x}_{i,j}$ the quantity P_i that P_j gives to, with the hypothesis $\sum^{n}_{k=1} \ddot{x}_{i,k} = v, \forall i \in I_n$. The analogy with the bipartite case gives us the following results for the quantities finally apportioned by the arbitrator to the parties P_i, $(i \in I_n)$:

$$a(P_i) = x_i + \sum_{k=1}^{n}(x_i - \bar{x}_{k,i}) - \sum_{k=1}^{n}(x_k - \bar{x}_{i,k}), \qquad \forall i \in I_n \qquad (3).$$

Using these hypotheses, a simplification of the above expression gives us:

$$a(P_i) = (n+1)x_i - \sum_{k=1}^{n} \bar{x}_{k,i}, \qquad \forall i \in I_n \qquad (4).$$

From the above hypothesis results $\sum_{i=1}^{n} a(P_i) = v$.

Notice that, being $a(P_i) = x_i - (\bar{x}_{i,i} - x_i) - \sum_{k\neq i,k=1}^{n}(\bar{x}_{k,i} - x_i)$, $\forall i \in I_n$, the greater are the nonnegative number $\bar{x}_{i,i} - x_i$, the lower being $a(P_i)$, meaning that good faith is recommended in order to obtain higher earnings.

Broadly, this method provides for the arbitrator the obligation of, in its claim to correctness, to take from the party P_k what he took from the other party P_s and give to P_k what P_s took from him. Removing from each party an allowance for the damages that have been caused and, giving to it the sum of the earned with the injuries that have caused him. In the general case, with possibility of liberalities, the formula (3) can be generalized to:

In the formula (5), the utilization of the module prevents parties from using liberality for their own benefit. The exposed method induces greater participation of the parties in the trial process. Is common for parties seek unreasonably, showing little responsibility to question the claim of correction (justice). This method points towards this claim.

$$a(P_i) = x_i + \sum_{k=1}^{n}(x_i - \bar{x}_{k,i}) - \sum_{k=1}^{n}|x_k - \bar{x}_{i,k}|, \qquad \forall i \in I_n \qquad (5).$$

4. Conclusion.

Alexy's theory of legal argumentation, as the ideal model of rational discourse approximator of reality, is the natural development of the antiphonian method referred to as enumerative neighborhood inductive of causality (method of exhaustion). Envy-free divisions correspond to rational numbers (total knowledge of decimal places) and envious divisions correspond to irrational numbers (partial knowledge of decimal places). The method of consensual weighting by arbitration is a general mathematical formalization of the golden rule and falls within the spirit of rationality proposed by the Alexy's theory of legal reasoning.

Fair voting in the electronic age

Wade L. Robison

Abstract: There are many barriers in the way to the ideal of a fair vote in elections. An election is fair only if a number of conditions are satisfied, among the most important of which are that a citizen who wishes to vote is able to vote without undue hardship or impediments, that each citizen's vote is counted and is counted for no more and no less than the vote of any other citizen, that citizens are able to determine clearly who is standing for what position and how to vote for one or another, and that the counting of ballots is as perfect procedurally as is possible.

We shall concentrate here on what I call the voting conditions and, in particular, one set of voting conditions, the design of a ballot and of any voting machine in which such a ballot is placed. We shall use as our test case the design of the Palm Beach paper ballot. That design is now famous, or infamous, for misdirecting voters so that even the most intelligent, well-trained and most highly motivated would make mistakes – like voting for Pat Buchanan instead of Al Gore, a mistake apparently made by upwards to 23,000 voters, more than enough to have changed the outcome of the election – and the subsequent history in the United States where, arguably, that ballot design cost Gore the election and opened the way for George W. Bush to become President. That ballot illustrates well what I call an error-provocative design.

Keywords: voting, fair election, procedural justice.

In aiming to achieve the ideal of a fair vote, we should distinguish the following:

Entry conditions – These are whatever conditions are in place to permit someone to vote in an election. Citizenship seems an obvious condition for entry, but some argue that citizenship must be proven by some sort of identification card – a driver's license, for instance, in some states in the United States – and some argued in times we hope are long gone that only those who can pass a test about the Constitution should be permitted entry. It is rather obvious that those who wish to depress the votes of any particular constituency will find adding an entry condition the easiest way to proceed, and the different varieties of conditions is limited only by the human imagination – which means not at all.

Voting conditions – The conditions under which those entitled to vote get to vote are as multitudinous and varied. Can a voter cast a ballot only on a particular day designated as election day? If so, is that a day everyone can make it to the polls? If not, what are the procedures for not voting on a particular day? What are the procedures for absentee ballots? For those who vote at a polling place, a voter has to get to a polling place, gain entry, pass through whatever procedure is in place to ensure one is entitled to vote, vote, and leave. Each point in the procedure can be problematic. Where are the polling places, and, in particular, how convenient are they are voters? Are they well marked? Is there parking nearby, or are they close to bus or subway lines? How long are the lines at polling places? Are the lines orderly? Are voters hassled or intimidated while in line? What procedures must be followed to gain recognition that one has a right to vote? Are those checking well-trained? Is the information they need readily available so that voters do not have to wait too long? Is the voting done in public or private? Is the mechanism for voting easy to use – a machine, a paper ballot in a box, and so on? Can voters readily leave when finished? Must they pass some sort of gauntlet, physical or otherwise, to leave the polling place?

Counting conditions – Once ballots have been cast, they must be gathered together, with the votes for each candidate counted correctly and then properly recorded next to the candidate's name. All sorts of things can go wrong here. The ballots may not be properly gathered together, some being left out entirely. Or once gathered together, those individuals or machines may miscount, leaving out some or adding in others that were, say, rejected as faulty at the polling place but somehow ended up with the acceptable ballots. Or the ballots themselves may be faulty, smudged and so difficult to read, or with too many boxes marked, or with a lack of clarity about which boxes are marked. What can go wrong will depend upon the nature of the ballots, obviously. Think of Florida's 2000 election and the hanging chads, an issue that only arises in a voting machine that punches out a piece of paper when one "marks" the ballot. But even once we get past those problems, we still have to tally the totals and then mark the totals for each candidate. Individuals are as prone to make mistakes in either of these operations as in anything else we do.

Transparency – Because of the various ways in which errors can enter into the electoral process, either intentionally or unintentionally, transparency is an absolute necessity. The process cannot be opaque in any way except which citizen votes for which candidate: that cannot be open for view by anyone. But everything else must be so arranged that any objective observer can double check the process to be sure that no mistakes were made or, if they were, to correct them, something that itself must be transparent and open to correction if another mistake was made. In the best of worlds, the process should be designed to make such transparency easy to accomplish. Think here of Florida's hanging chads, created by a machine that didn't quite punch through the ballots completely, leaving those checking ballots uncertain whether a voter had decided, after depressing a lever part way, to vote for another candidate, had simply failed to depress the lever completely, or had been stymied by a voting machine with dull punches or some other mechanical problem.

These are the four essential areas of concern in ensuring that voting is fair: is the pool of voters biased in any way? Is voting accomplished easily? Are ballots easy to tabulate? Can the results be readily verified? A thorough examination of the requirements to ensure that voting is fair would examine each of these areas. We are only going to examine part of one here, a part that may seem quite minor, but is chosen to illustrate just how minor problems can cause major problems. The aim is to show how very easily the electoral process can go awry and thus how important it is that the process be checked and double-checked and monitored and that everything be as transparent as is possible. Otherwise what may seem to be minor problems, like the one we will examine, will be missed and the process skewed.

We are going to examine a problem with voting machines, but not the usual one that catches our attention, problems with the software. We know we should presume that any software can be hacked, for one thing, and so relying on software alone for voting means trusting that no one has hacked into the system. It also means trusting that the software was properly designed to register and count and maintain votes, that it has no coding mistakes, either unintentionally or intentionally introduced. But this set of problems should not obscure another. In some electoral precincts, the software for voting is on a screen, set within a frame that has the buttons to record votes. It would be easy enough for the screen and the frame to be misaligned – again, either unintentionally or intentionally – so that a voter's choice was not properly registered.

The setting of the mechanism within the screen might seem to fall outside the purview of whoever programs the voting software, but someone needs to pay attention to it, as we shall see, and the person best positioned to do that is whoever designs the software. That person – or company – is obligated to ensure that it works in situ. Otherwise we shall have what I call an error-provocative design, a design solution that provokes mistakes on the part of even the most intelligent, well-trained, and most highly motivated users. It is not enough for a programmer to say, "How they use the stuff is not my business," if, in fact, the program will be set up in such a way as to make its use problematic.

1. Error-provocative designs

We have all had the experience of something's not working the way it appears it ought to work. One way to solve the problem we have in figuring out which knob on a stove controls which burner is to offset the burners, with the ones in the back to the left, say, and the ones in the front to the right. The knobs are then positioned across the front of the stove in the order of the burners. From the left, we would have left back, left front, right back, and right front. My parents' stove has that off-set configuration, but I always mixed up the burners on the left when I visited. I would think I was turning on the left back burner, but would end up turning on the front left burner instead. I thought myself a dunce, and my mother always give me that look only mothers can give wayward children who will not amount to much. After that had happened many times, I took the time to try to figure out what I was doing wrong. I realized that the knobs on the left side has been reversed. The knob controlling the back burner had been placed in front of the front burner, and the knob for the front burner was in front of the back burner. No wonder I kept messing it up! I was not the one at fault: the stove was misleading me.

Such designs are error-provocative: they provoke errors on the part of those who use the artifacts realizing the designs. The worst of the error-provocative designs are those that provoke errors on the part of the most intelligent, most highly trained, and most motivated of operators. We take into account three variables when trying to understand what has gone wrong in an accident:

1. We investigate the circumstances, wondering if there is something awry about the conditions at the time of the accident, black ice, for instance, when the accident is an auto crash;
2. We investigate the training of the operator, wondering if better training would have helped the operator avoid the accident;
3. We investigate whether the operator could have been trained better, whether, that is, the operator is bright enough to handle the artifact in question; and
4. We investigate whether the operator was paying attention or somehow distracted or otherwise acting with diminished capacity – drunk, sleepy, texting, and so on.

We can see how someone on the low side of the bell curve of intelligence might have difficulty with complex machinery. We can understand how distracted someone might become while engaged in something that requires constant attention, and we can understand how someone without sufficient training could be at a loss to know what to do in an emergency situation or do something harmful that seemed the obvious thing to do for someone untrained, but just the wrong thing to do.

The worst of error-provocative designs are those which produce errors for someone on the high side of the bell curve of intelligence who is as highly trained and as highly motivated as anyone can be. Such designs are to be avoided, obviously, but avoiding them can be more difficult than we might imagine.

Software can itself be error-provocative. The software in the autopilot in the Columbia airliner that flew into a mountain side in 1996 was error-provocative. The pilot's job was to key in the initial letter of the beacon for the airport where the plane was to land. The autopilot would then pick the top of the listed five options that would appear and land the plane. The default was that the closest beacon was at the top of the list – unless the pilot keyed in "R," in which case the software selected Bogota. The plane was to land at Cali. Its beacon began with the letter "R", and so when the pilot keyed in "R," the plane turned towards Bogota. The pilots did not figure out that there was a problem until it was too late. 159 people were killed when the plane flew straight into a mountain side near Cali (New York Times, 1996).

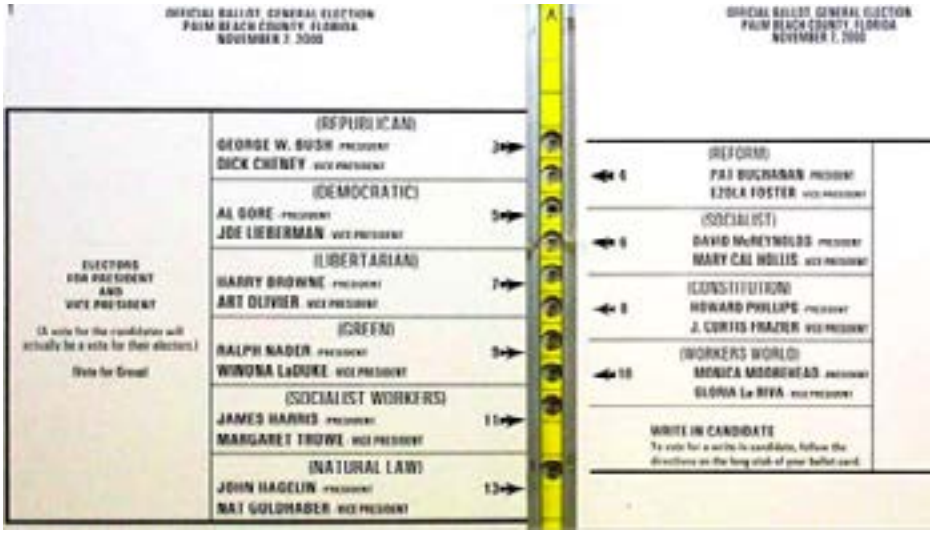
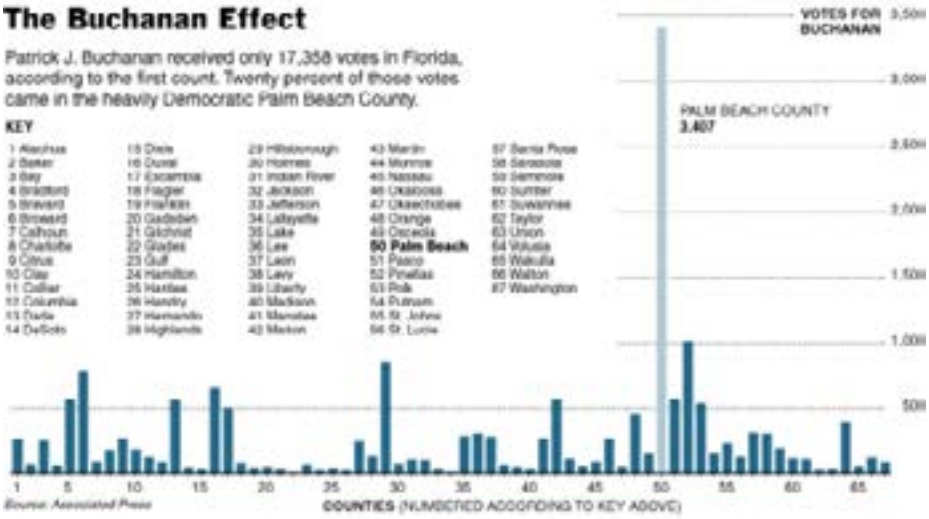
Not even the most intelligent, well-trained, and high motivated of pilots is likely always to avoid the error that led to that disaster. Putting two defaults in the autopilot software was a recipe for disaster. But it was a self-contained recipe. Everything occurred on a screen. We often have the same kind of error-provocative design when an image is produced on a screen set within a frame. The frame has buttons to push, for instance, that trigger the next item on the menu. ATMs often work this way, with the software producing choices – "Checking" or "Savings" – for the operator to choose between by pushing a button to the right of the arrows following "Checking" and "Savings." All too often, the arrows on the screen do not match up directly with the buttons. The software works fine; the buttons on the frame work fine; the two together, however, are error-provocative. One way in which we can produce error-provocative designs, in other words, is to have software encased in a housing which, in combination with the software, misleads. As the ATM example illustrates, this problem of matching the software to the frame in which it appears is a problem that can occur whenever software is married to an artifact. Our concern here is when it happens in voting machines.

2. The Palm Beach Ballot

Among the problems of the 2000 election in the United States (E. J. Dionne Jr. & William Kristol 2001; Cass R. Sunstein & Richard A. Epstein, 2001), few were more significant for the outcome than the ballot design for Palm Beach County in Florida (AIGA.1, 2000):



This ballot has numerous problems. The most obvious is that to vote for the second candidate, Al Gore, a voter punches out the third hole, not the second one. Palm County is heavily Democratic, with many Jewish voters, but Pat Buchanan took 3407 votes there, more than he received in any other county in Florida and twenty percent of the total received in Florida (Laurel Elms & Henry E. Brady, 2001). The following chart shows the anomaly well (STCSIG, 2000):



For those unfamiliar with American politics, this outcome is noteworthy because Buchanan is probably the last candidate any Jewish voter would vote for. Among other things, he has argued that Hitler invaded Poland only because Poland gave him no choice, having refused to negotiate over Danzig. He is also the last candidate any female voter would choose, having claimed, among other things, that women are not suited for politics and that "the rise of feminism spells the death of the nation and end of the West" (Pat Buchanan, 2002). For Buchanan to obtain so many votes in a county so heavily Democratic and Jewish defies explanation unless, somehow, some mistakenly voted for him. The layout of the ballot provides a plausible explanation for how they could have made that mistake.

The image of the ballot is how it would look if it were viewed directly from above. But that is not the image a voter would have seen. When the ballot was loaded into the voting machine, it would look different because the center row of holes were "in a different plane from the two columns of printed names, and the ballot [was] being viewed at an oblique angle" (Wikipedia, 2000). What a voter would have seen is more accurately represented by this view:

"Note in particular the second arrow from the top on the left side, in the section labeled 'Democrat', which appears to be pointing to the second hole from the top. Closer scrutiny reveals that punching that hole actually constitutes a vote for Pat Buchanan, an error which is believed to have been committed by many Florida voters in 2000" (Wikipedia). If you look at the second hole from the top, in other words, it appears next to Al Gore's name. Voting for Gore would mean punching that hole. As it turns out, it is the third hole from the top you need to punch to vote for Al Gore. Punching the second hole is a vote for Pat Buchanan. What is surprising is thus how few voters mistakenly voted for Buchanan.

We should add that this ballot also produced significantly more double votes than usual. One reason is that when viewed head-on and not at the angle seen above, the second hole is next to the Vice Presidential candidate for the Republican party. Some apparently thought that they should also vote for that candidate and so punched a vote for Bush and a vote for Cheney. That invalidated some votes for Bush. Some Democratic supporters apparently had second thoughts about punching the second hole and punched the third as well. That invalided some votes for Gore.

The Palm Beach Post's "reviews of discarded ballots found Gore lost 6,607 votes when voters marked more than one name on the county's 'butterfly ballot'….Voters who marked Gore's name and that of another candidate totaled more than 10 times the winning margin Bush received to claim Florida's 25 electoral votes and the White House." The "review of the overvotes found 5,330 Palm Beach County residents invalidated their ballots by punching chats for Gore and…Pat Buchanan [while]… another 2,908 voters punched Gore and Socialist David McReynolds, whose hold appeared just below Gore's" (CNN).

One other source of double votes for the Palm Beach ballot was that the last item on the right-hand side asks for voters to write in a candidate. Some voters apparently thought this was a request for them to verify that they had voted and so wrote in the name of the candidate they had already voted for. They thus voted twice, and their votes were thrown out.

There were other problems elsewhere in Florida. For instance, in Duval County "an erroneous instruction told voters to 'vote on every page' of a multi-page ballot design with presidential candidates on two pages. That error caused '20 percent of the ballots from African-Americans areas that went heavily for Mr. Gore' to be invalid because 'voters followed instructions to mark a vote on every pages of the ballots,' thus costing Gore...a net margin in Duval County of 1,999" (Philadelphia Lawyer).

It is certainly arguable, that is, that design flaws in the ballots used in Florida and, just as important, the way the butterfly ballots looked to voters in situ cost Gore Florida and so cost him the election, the 25 electoral votes of Florida being decisive. Without Florida, Gore had 267 electoral votes and Bush 246, with 270 needed for election. We need only contemplate the eight years of the Bush administration to understand how much of a difference that apparently minor set of problems made. We do not know whether a President Gore would have paid more attention to the CIA warnings of a potential al Qaeda strike within the United States, but it is not likely that he would have invaded Iraq or watched the free fall of the financial markets without preventive action. In any event, minor problems can produce major effects.

We have found two problems with the Palm Beach County ballot: it was badly designed, and when placed in the voting machine, it was distorted and its crucial fault – the failure of the names to line up with the proper punch holes – was aggravated. So we have learned that

1. We should design the ballot well, keeping in mind guidelines for good design; and
2. We should ensure that the ballot works in situ, works, that is, in the machine in which it is to be placed.

We will consider in §3 some guidelines for designing a ballot well. In §4 we will look at some of the problems we run into when we have a ballot within a framework – like a machine through which the ballot looks distorted.

3. Design matters

The Palm Beach County ballot illustrates well the point that it can make a significant difference how we view something. Seen from above, the ballot can mislead, but we can also figure it out. Seen from the perspective of our using a voting machine, with the ballot at an angle to our vision, we can readily see how we could make a mistake. That ballot design is going to provoke errors even for the most highly motivated of voters at the high end of the bell curve for intelligence. If they had been trained regarding the use of this particular ballot, they may have been trained out of the error the ballot makes natural, but they were not.

Designing a ballot is not easy, and as the Palm Beach County design shows, even with the best of intentions, things can easily go wrong. The person who designed the ballot changed the previous format to make the ballot easier to read for the predominantly older population in Palm Beach County. What are needed are guidelines to ensure that ballot designs are easy to read and will produce accurate results. This is particularly so in the United States where there is no uniform national ballot, elections being run locally and often with local election boards creating the ballots and selecting the voting machines. Just as all politics are local, so all elections are local.

The AIGA is the professional association for design, and it has recommended ten guidelines for those designing ballots. As will be seen from some of the details of these guidelines, they are as relevant for software engineers designing interfaces for ballot machines as they are for those designing paper ballots:

1. Use lowercase letters: mixed-case letters are more legible than ALL CAPITAL LETTERS because they are easier to recognize.
2. Avoid centered type: left-aligned type is more legible than centered type, which forces the eye to stop reading in order to find the start of the next line.
3. Use big enough type: "fine print" is hard to read and may intimidate or alienate voters. Use minimum type sizes: 12-point for optical scan; 25-point for touchscreens. (Following this principle for optical scan ballots may impact printing costs but will be a worthwhile investment in election accuracy.)

4. Pick one sans-serif font: avoid introducing new fonts, which require the eye to stop reading and adjust. Sans-serif fonts with clean strokes (Arial, Univers, Verdana) are recommended for screen and for the quantity and variation of text found on paper ballots. For dual-language materials, use bold text for the primary language, regular text for the secondary language.
5. Support process and navigation: for optical-scan ballots, offer comprehensive instructions and page numbering. For touchscreen ballots, offer language and mode options, continuous access to instructions, consistent and flexible navigation and clear feedback about selections. Post notable wayfinding and instructional materials in and around the polling place.
6. Use clear, simple language: state instructions and options as simply as possible. Summarize referenda in simple language alongside required formats. Do not include more than two languages on any one material.
7. Use accurate instructional illustrations: visual instructions help low-literacy and general-population voters. Photo images, which are difficult to shoot and reproduce well, are not recommended. Illustrations must be accurate in their details to avoid misleading voters.
8. Use informational icons (only): avoid political party icons. Icons that call attention to key information and support navigation are recommended in limited use.
9. Use contrast and color functionally: use color and shading consistently: on optical scan ballots, to differentiate instructions from contents and contests from each other; and on touchscreen ballots, to support navigation, call special attention and provide user feedback. Color cannot be relied on as the only way to communicate important information.

10. Decide what's most important: page and screen layout and text sizes should support information hierarchy. For instance, the ballot title should be more prominent than any one contest, a contest header should be more prominent than its candidates' names and a candidate's name should be bolder than his/her party affiliation. Candidates' names and options should be presented with equal importance (AIGA.2, 2007).

Another source of guidelines for designing ballots is the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law. The list is thorough with the aim of ensuring that each citizen's vote is to count (Norden, 2008). Had these guidelines been followed in Palm Beach County, the ballot would obviously have looked far different: the candidates would all have been in the same column; the ballot would have stated that candidates are not to write in the name of a named candidate; the punch holes would have been consistently placed in front of at the end of the candidate's name; the text would not have been centered, but flush-left; and so on.

Making the ballot clear in those ways may have prevented the problem that occurred when the ballot was placed in the voting machine, but even with a clear ballot, the design choice needs to be examined in the situation in which it is to be used just to be sure that the situation does not change how it is interpreted.

4. Software in situ

My bank's ATM is a wonderful example of how to design software and its frame so that those who use it constantly make mistakes. It works the way most ATMs work. You put in a card and punch in your pin number. Then it asks you a series of questions, the first of which is whether you wish to withdraw or deposit money. Arrows go from the ends of the questions to the right where, outside the window of the display, four buttons are set on the frame for the display. You are to push the button the appropriate arrow points to. But just as in the Palm Beach County ballot, the arrows do not line up exactly with the buttons.

The first question poses an "either/or," and so only two buttons are relevant. The arrow for the first option points to a spot just above the top button and the arrow for the second option points to a spot just above the second button from the top. So it is clear enough, we think, what button to push for which option. We can ignore the bottom two buttons for these questions.

Suppose I push the button for a withdrawal. I then get a second alternative: "Do you want to withdraw your money from your checking account or your savings account?" Again there are arrows pointing to the right, one just below "checking account" and another just below "savings account."I will have the same situation as before except now the arrow for the first alternative points to a spot just above the second button from the top, and the arrow for the second alternative points to a spot just above the third button from the top. The questions and arrows seem to have moved down one notch. So, being now a little uncertain what to do, I push the second button from the top – for my checking account, I hope. And that works. So I have just learned something about how the system operates: the arrows point to a spot just above the relevant button.

I now get a third set of questions about how much money I want to take from your account. Having learned my lesson about how the system operates, and wanting to withdraw the maximum permitted, I follow the arrow for that amount over to the buttons and see that, like the others, it points to a spot just above a button. So I push that button.

The screen then goes blank, and a new message appears informing me that no transaction has occurred and then, oddly enough, thanking me for completing my transaction and asking, "Do you have any more transactions?" At that point, my spouse tells me what I now know, "You pushed the wrong button." I get a receipt with nothing on it except the date and time and name of the bank.

The correct button is the one above where the arrow points – even though the arrow points to a spot much closer to the lower button. Pushing the lower button cancels the transaction.

People must be able to learn how to operate the ATM: I see vehicles going through on a regular basis. But I find using the ATM maddening. No warning is given when the ATM requires a different response than what I have just been trained into, and because I do not use the machine very often, I cannot recall, from one time to the next, where in the menu the change in response is necessary. Just as in the Palm Beach County ballot, a person must guess whether the arrow points above or below what it ought to be pointing at directly.

There are no doubt a variety of fixes for this problem. The Palm Beach County ballot could have been made much clearer with a simple redesign (Tidwell, 2000):

Just so, people would be far less prone to make mistakes at my bank's ATM were the system redesigned.

But note that it is the system that needs to be redesigned – not just the software and not just the frame with its four buttons. It is the combination of the two that causes the difficulty. There is a set of oddities in the software that could be removed so the instructions would be easier to follow. There is no reason for the arrows to jump down a notch in the second set of alternatives. It is disconcerting when that first occurs: we do not know if it means anything and can only experiment to determine its irrelevance. There is no reason for the arrows in the third set of alternatives to point to a spot just above the supposedly parallel buttons when they should be pointing higher, to the buttons above that spot. Straighten up the software – make things consistent – and many of the problems will disappear.

One will not. The arrows do not line up with the buttons, and a software programmer will not know that without looking at how the software interacts with those buttons. That requires looking at the software in situ – at how it is going to look to someone using the software, set in the frame with the buttons placed as they are. Then the programmer will see that the questions and arrows are offset from the buttons and that they all need to be moved down enough so that the arrows point to the center of the correct buttons.

We can look at any complex system to see how errors can readily enter. The electrical blackout of the northeast in 2002 was initiated by a fallen limb and cascaded because of a computer "issue" that operators had failed to result and through the way in which electrical grids are connected together (Barron, 2003). The electrical blackout in the southwest in 2011 was triggered by a workman changing out a piece of defective monitoring equipment in Arizona (Watson, 2011). In complex systems parts are so interconnected that even a minor failure at a single point can reverberate throughout the system.

The example from my bank's ATM involves software in situ. The Florida ballot involves how a piece of paper looks in which choices must be marked and how the paper looks in situ, behind glass, that is, that displays the ballot with some distortion. The examples of the failures of the electrical grid in the northeast and northwest United States involved a kink, as it were, in a causal chain, with a power source at one end and air conditioning, among other things, at the other.

In each of these examples we need to ask, "How does the relevant item work when in place?" What will happen if a branch falls on a power line? What will happen if a monitoring device is removed from a power grid? What will happen when someone tries to use an oddly designed ballot when it is behind a piece of glass that distorts it? In each case, that is, we need to be concerned about how all the pieces of the system work together and how humans, who will make mistakes, interact with them.

5. Summary

I distinguished four different features that need to be examined for a full evaluation of any electoral precess – the entry, voting, and counting conditions, all with transparency. I looked at only one feature of one of those conditions, but we have discovered the following:

a. We are not looking at voting, but at a system of voting.
b. Errors can readily enter, intentionally or accidentally, in any place in any complex system, whether it is in the system itself or in the way in which humans use the system.
c. Even minor problems within a system or because of the way humans interact with something in the system can cascade through the system, causing major disruptions and problems.

The problems we have noted about the American Presidential election of 2000 in Florida are indicative of the way in which what seem to be minor issues can come to have major consequences. Multiply that sort of problem with all the other ways in which things can go wrong within such a complex system as voting, and we can understand why, in every election, we have some problem or other – machines that do not work, polling lines that require much longer waits than voters can readily afford, ballots that somehow disappear.

There are many ways, that is, in which the process of voting can go wrong and so produce unfair results. Indeed, no matter how carefully matters are arranged ahead-of-time, problems are going to occur as an election proceeds. It would seem obvious that systemic problems can only be resolved through changes in the system and that we ought to aim at a system which is fool-proof. Error-provocative designs are at one end of a spectrum of design solutions, with foolproof designs at the other. Aiming for a foolproof design may be a fool's dream. There seem to be too many different kinds of fools in the world to anticipate how someone might misinterpret or misuse an artifact, and it is of the nature of complex entities that they have unintended consequences that even the brightest and best trained will not anticipate. That some of those consequences will impede the end for which the complex entity was designed is obvious. It is also of the nature of complex entities that there are far more likely prospects of breakdowns than there are of perfection. As Aristotle said of virtue, "[I]t is easy to miss the bull's eye and difficult to hit it" (Aristotle). Still, a bull's eye gives us something to aim for, and a foolproof electoral process is thus an ideal worth striving for even for complex systems.

The Presidency and the Executive Branch
A philosophical approach to the parameters for interpretation and decision-making authority[1]

Abstract: Studies of the separation of powers in presidential regimes have suggested a supremacy of the executive branch. In the United States, this supremacy stems from crisis or calamity situations; in Brazil, however, it does not depend on extraordinary events. The supremacy of the Brazilian executive branch stems from the convenience of the other branches, which fail to or are unable to constrain the executive power. Liberal legalism fails, then, when it assumes that the executive is submitted to the rule of law, as long as the Brazilian executive, supported by the convenience of the other branches, dismiss it.

Key-words: Executive Branch; Brazilian Executive; Liberal Legalism; Convenience.

Introduction

Studies of the separation of powers in presidential regimes have suggested a supremacy of the executive branch.[6] Throughout North America, this supremacy stems from crisis or calamity situations;[7] in Brazil, however, it is uninterrupted, and independent of any extraordinary events.[8] The supremacy of the Brazilian executive branch stems from the convenience status of the other branches, which fail to or are unable to constrain the executive expansion. In addition, the historical and political factors, the constitutional design and the proactivity expected of the executive branch add to this inability. Some examples include constitutional amendments (CAs) and provisional measures (PMs), which this study uses to demonstrate that showdowns[9] are avoided for the convenience of the branches, but the consequence of their avoidance is the supremacy of the executive. Progressive CAs produced by the executive with little risk of legislative rejection and judicial control over the provisional measures are political-juridical maneuvers to maintain inter-branch pax while simultaneously promoting constitutional redesign.

Liberal legalism fails when it assumes that the executive will submit to the rule of law. In the case of the American Administrative [6] The dominance of the executive is a particular feature of presidential regimes. From a post-Madisonian perspective, given some of the inter-branch showdowns and economic and political crises, the executive appears to have assumed a "super-activist" status.

[7] The crises are significant because fundamental institutional reforms take place over a brief time even as existing institutions struggle to fulfill their mandate. Sometimes, the existing institutions simply claim more power than they were understood to have. At other times, Congress rouses itself to act, but only to confirm a seizure of power or discretion by the executive, or to impart vast new powers. POSNER, Eric A. VERMEULE, Adrian. The Executive Unbound: After the Madisonian Republic. Oxford University Press: New York, 2010, p. 32.

[8] While Brazil boasts an apparent judicial supremacy, whether through expressions that attempt to reiterate the prominence of the judiciary as "having the last word," the "last guardian of the Constitution," among others—or by statements from various authorities, including the President, in which the executive has shown sufficient capacity to avoid the final decisions of the Supreme Court, specifically in some cases of federal tax matters

[9] Episodes of confrontation between the institutions in a given context.

State, party politics[10] and public opinion[11] clearly play decisive roles in constraining the executive branch. The Brazilian "State of Convenience," however, has not yet fully overcome its nearly two-hundred-year-old authoritarian and interventionist tradition. Even after the adoption of the 1988 Constitution, both the legislature and the judiciary as well as, in some ways, the executive, fail to undertake their minimum required institutional roles.[12]

Moreover, the Brazilian public is apathetic, with no well-defined public opinion, and rarely intervenes in governmental dynamics.

The present study aims to demonstrate that the Brazilian executive is an expanded branch that bypasses the formal distribution of constitutional competences and is supported, at the convenience of the other branches, through the use of constitutional instruments such as constitutional amendments and provisional measures that suit (i) the maintenance of an executive supremacy and governance, (ii) an uninterrupted constitutional redesign and (iii) the prospect of continuous constitutional emergency.

The Redesign of the Constitution: Constitutional Amendments

Despite the fact that amendments to the constitution have a high political cost,[13] in both the Brazilian and American contexts, a significant number have been proposed by the Brazilian executive during the two presidential terms of Fernando Henrique Cardoso (FHC) (1995–2002), a member of the Brazilian Social Democracy Party (Partido da Social Democracia Brasileira - PSDB). However, the number of amendment proposals by the executive branch decreased after the ascension of the Workers Party (Partido dos Trabalhadores - PT)—Lula (2003–2010) and Dilma (2011–2013)—to the presidency. This reduction was due to a decrease in partisan coalescence (internal cohesion) despite an increase in the government base's coalition.

[11] POSNER, E.; VERMEULE, A. op. cit., p. 4.

[12] This problem stems from a failure of the mutual control mechanisms (checks and balances) and, ipso facto, the rule of law.

[13] Art. 60 of the Brazilian Constitution provides for the legitimate proposal of amendments to the Constitution by the following: a) at least one third of either the Chamber of Deputies or the Senate members (the two parliamentary houses at the federal level), b) the President of the Republic, or c) more than half of the legislative assemblies of the federated states. The proposal must be examined by two chamber committees and then by the plenary, undergoing two rounds of voting, each of which requires three fifths of the votes for approval. Once approved in the chamber, the proposal is sent to the Senate, and examined by a committee and by the plenary, undergoing two rounds of voting, each of which requires three fifths of the votes for approval. Once approved by both houses, the proposal is promulgated by the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate Boards (management bodies) and published in the official dissemination media when it comes into force.

Assessing the level of governance largely depends on the presence of coalescence and not just on a partisan coalition. Although the PT governments formally formed coalitions that were numerically superior to those of the opposition, they lacked coalescence, creating a less unified government. Conversely, coalescence was present in the PSDB governments in which the addition of a few independent parties in the Congress was sufficient for approving political programs, creating a more unified government. These changes led to a reduction in the use of formal amendments to the Constitution, the procedures for which are relatively cumbersome.

Therefore, the government base lost its qualified majority in the Congress, transitioning to a less unified government. The governance by the executive branch, however, was not severely impaired because the executive could conveniently dismiss constitutional amendments using lower-cost mechanisms. Legislation initiated by the executive branch peaked in 2004 following the loss of a qualified majority.

Moreover, the executive branch already had the power of provisional measures, which do not require legislative intervention for immediate action. According to this hypothesis, the legislative allocation of provisional measures does not stem from a showdown, crisis or delegation, but from a de jure primary constitutional provision.

The Legal Redesign: Provisional Measures

The Brazilian executive plays an atypical legislative function through regulatory decrees and delegated laws. Both require a priori legislative intervention by issuing legislation that lacks regulation and a posteriori legislative intervention by approving delegated laws. Moreover, the executive has the power to propose laws—which represent 80% of the ordinary Brazilian legislation[14]—and constitutional amendments.

[14] Article 47 of the Constitution stipulates that the deliberations of each house and its committees shall be taken by a majority vote, provided the presence of an absolute majority of its members. Thus, for the approval of an ordinary law in the Senate, which is composed of 81 members, 21 votes in favor are required, highlighting the ease of the procedure as compared with constitutional amendments, which require a three-fifths

However, the provisional measures represent primary normative acts with immediate legal efficacy, submitted for subsequent assessment by the Congress.

The executive plays a role equal to that of the legislators in these cases. The Constitution provides that "[i]n case of relevance and urgency*, the President of the Republic may adopt provisional measures with the force of law, and shall immediately submit them to Congress.*" If examined by the Congress, a simple majority is sufficient to convert a provisional measure into law.[15] If rejected or voided in practice due to a lapse in time,[16] the legal relations both constituted and resulting from any acts performed during its validity shall be governed by them, according to the determinations of the executive.

However, "relevance" and "urgency" are not required of the legislative or judicial examination. The convenience of passing provisional measures is largely justified by the institutional capacities of the executive, which are higher than those of the National Congress. However, this convenience essentially results from the potential risk and burden that might arise from the possible showdown upon rejection of the measures.

majority of the parliamentarians for approval (in the Senate, 49 votes out of the 81 senators).

[15] In agreement with articles 84, subsection XXVI, and 62 and paragraphs of the 1988 Constitution, the President of the republic has the exclusive responsibility to issue provisional measures (PMs). Such norms have the force of ordinary law, upon publication, although the President must immediately submit them to the National Congress for examination. Once sent to the Congress, the PM will be examined by a joint committee of deputies and senators, which shall provide an opinion regarding its constitutionality. Later, the PM will be submitted to a vote by the plenary of each house, starting with the chamber, and will be approved by a simple majority in both plenaries, being thus converted into law. The PMs can be approved and converted into law within a maximum of sixty days, which is extendable for only one equal period. If this limit is exceeded, the PM becomes void dated to its issuing. The Congress can adopt four attitudes when analyzing a PM: (a) approve it without changes; b) approve it with amendments to the text prepared by the presidency of the republic; (c) not examine the PM within the maximum time limit; or d) reject the PM. If the Congress does not examine or rejects the PM, a legislative decree must be promulgated, regulating the legal relations brought about by the PM, for the period in which it was effective. If the parliamentarians do not issue this legislative decree until sixty days after the PM becomes valid, those legal relations will be governed by the unexamined or rejected PM itself, providing the executive with a preponderance of will if the Parliament does not pronounce itself.

Source: author's elaboration from Government Law Database

As shown in the above figure, the legislative branch converted 87% of the provisional measures into law. Moreover, the 32nd constitutional amendment ratified in 2001, though originally conceived to constrain the issuance of provisional measures, was approved after expanding the executive discretion provided therein. The PMs could therefore be considered a constitutional evil that many people regard as necessary or positive, although it is a constitutional imperfection.[17]

The executive has made use of provisional measures even when their consequent constitutional redesigns violate the permitted constitutional limits, which not only violates the separation of powers, but the Constitution itself; art. 62, § 1, I, d, provides that it is forbidden to issue provisional measures on matters related to budgets and additional or supplementary credits, except for, pursuant to art. 167, to meet unforeseeable and urgent expenses, such as those resulting from war, internal commotion or public calamity.

However, as shown in the following figure the values of the aforementioned expenses surpass any concept of extraordinariness.

The path convenient for the branches also has implications with respect to judicial convenience. The Brazilian Supreme Court (Supremo Tribunal Federal - STF) has repeatedly held that it is not competent to assess "relevance" and "urgency,"[18] a pre-requirement for the issuance of PMs. Moreover, when consulted on the opening of extraordinary credits, the STF has stated that "the foreseen credits have either been used or lost their validity, and therefore, no emendable situations subsist at the present time."[19]

In another example, in the judgment of the direct action of unconstitutionality 4029/AM (03/2012), the STF "backed out"[20] one day af-

[18] Thus, the following should be noted: (i) "The understanding of this Court is that examination of urgency and importance requirements can only be submitted to the judiciary when there is abuse of discretion by the head of the executive branch. Regimental appeal that shall be withheld" (AI 489108, 2006); (ii) the "relevance and urgency requirements for issuing provisional measure are a discretionary power of the head of the executive branch, hence should not be examined by the judiciary branch , except in the case of a misuse of power. Understanding decided upon STF jurisprudence. Action dismissed" (ADI 2150, 2002).

[19] ADI nº 4.041, 2011.

[20] "The Switch in Time that Saved Eleven." The radical change in the STF behavior is similar to that of the US Supreme Court in 1937, after the failed court-packing plan of ter a decision that declared the formal unconstitutionality of the provisional measure that created the Chico Mendes Institute (Instituto Chico Mendes) due to a procedural flaw in the examination of the measure by the Congress following a point of order raised by the Attorney General of the Union, a representative of the executive. By sweeping unconstitutionalities under the rug, the STF attributed the potential effects to the decision, which threatened 500 prior provisional measures.[21]

The status quo of a "permanent crisis" and 400 claims of relevance and urgency between 2003 and 2011 have prevented showdowns, eventual crises, higher lawmaking or even judicial doctrine.[22] The Brazilian "state of convenience" thus surpasses the administrative state, though it does not necessarily make the executive more effective. The continuous constitutional emergency, which derives from the executive convenience and connivance, negates all other branches, causing them to be frequently ignored and reserved.

Final Considerations

One can conclude that the supremacy of the Brazilian executive branch also stems from the convenience of the other branches, a condition that avoids institutional crises or confrontations. The present study presented two constitutional instruments, constitutional amendments and provisional measures, that demonstrate those relationships of convenience and the prestige enjoyed by the executive. The executive has progressively and conveniently reduced the number constitutional amendments, given the political burden of a formal constitutional amendment and the loss of a qualified majority in the government base. However, the low-cost political tools remain in use to preserve governance. The other branches rarely interfere with provisional measures to avoid constitutional showdowns. The judiciary does not precisely define relevance and urgency, abstaining itself from examining the constitutionality of most provisional measures, and eventually modulates the effects of its own decisions, making them "more beneficial" to the executive. Likewise, the legislature ratifies the legislative assignment to the executive, converting provisional measures into law and approving executive initiatives. Thus, the Brazilian executive not only enjoys supremacy due to the convenience of the other branches but also conveniently preserves the existence of these branches.

Personified Executive Power and Discredited Legislative Power

Prospects of a failure democratic model

Abstract: Since beginning of nineties crisis of Brazilian Representative Democracies became more apparent. Legitimacy of public agents, in special legislative ones, and their capacity of representing all society´s interests increased questions about democracy model. During the past, citizen was main topic in political decisions unlike nowadays when we are near of institute a "Complex society", where a plurality of interests and groups participate of political decisions. In this context emerges the idea that representative model is not enough for society's needs. Politics no longer incorporate societies' expectations but individuals/corporative interests. This critic is tougher on the legislative power, fact that is observed in Brazilian culture where there is a strong empathy with Executive Power. Popular need for tutelage and the concept of democratic model's incapacity in responding the demands of society still are key components in Brazilian policy ideals. To increase representative capacity and popular participation, the Brazilian legislator created in 1988´s Constitution an all-embracing system. This system promotes an diminishing utilization of participative instruments in all instances of power. The legislator had the freedom to defend his interests reinforcing current idea of the inefficiency of Legislative. In several times, Legislative embodies popular interests but isn't able to rapid resolving issues. As a consequence, this power uses judicialisation of causes in order to guarantee social rights. The possibility of approving emergency or extreme public appeal cases by Legislative instances is more difficult due their conservativeness. 1. Introduction

Brazil lives a unique moment in its history. The 1988's Constitution began a new state paradigm and a new institutional arrangement, fully democratic and participatory. New ways of dialogue with the society were open for more involvement in the Public Administration and for an overcoming of the Representative Democracies crisis.

Since the beginning of the nineties, crisis of Brazilian Representative Democracies became more apparent. Legitimacy of public agents, in special legislative ones, and their capacity of representing all society's interests increased questions about democracy model.

Norberto Bobbio, in his book "The Future of Democracy", writes this: "the democracy of our days it was made to operate in an individualistic society", in other words, the individual interests are always in front of the interests of the collectivity and this it's very bad for the citizen itself.

During the past, the citizen was the main topic in political decisions, unlike nowadays, when we are near to institute a "Complex society", where a plurality of interests and groups participate in political decisions. In this context emerges the idea that representative model isn´t enough for society's needs. Politics no longer incorporate societies' expectations, but individuals/corporative interests. This critic is tougher on the legislative power, fact that is observed in Brazilian culture where there is a strong empathy with Executive Power. The brazilian history had leaders who inspire the ideal of nation and State since its formation, with Dom Pedro II, to the present day, with Lula. The society requests more governmental actions every day and because of that, the Executive Power gets more personification and the Legislative Power gets more discredit of the people. This situation causes the interference of one power in another sphere.

2. The Traditionally Personified Executive Power

We live in the Brazil the post 1988 constitution period, and because of this charter, we have the best democratic means in the country so far, but why is still said that democracy is living a crisis?

Beginning in the 90s, this crisis has become more apparent with the increasing inquiries about the legitimacy of public officials, especially those linked to the Legislative Power and their ability to represent their citizens. In the book "The Future of Democracy", Norberto Bobbio shows that "democracy practiced in the present day is designed to operate in an individualistic society", in other words, the individual interests always come before the collective interest.

Along with this Legislature factor - which will be explained later - we still have a peculiar feature in the Brazilian culture, which is the personification of the Executive Power, which comes from the time of the Empire and continues until the present day. Its origin begins with the classic division of the three powers created by Montesquieu, in which each power is independent and autonomous.

During the Empire the Fourth Power was created, which was the Reserve Power and who held this power was the Emperor, who solved conflicts between the three powers. This caused the image of the "chief of the executive" to be bound with big decisions and control of other powers, which reflected the population a sense of guardianship by the Emperor.

Nowadays, we see in all aspects of the society, a hope that the president is the solution of all problems and that the legislature is unable to do something by population. Thus the chief of the Executive is charged when there is a government problem, or in the executive power or in the legislative power.

The representative crisis makes the executive power more exalted and more personified, which means that the executive power, for most of society, is represented by the image of the president. This happened not only because of historical factors, but also because of society itself, that we are calling today as "complex society", since there are diverse interests of various social groups, which makes the representation of all very difficult. What we see is the representation of minority interests, which includes individual and corporative interests, criticizing the incumbent on the Legislative Power. Vianna and Burgos shows this very well by saying: "In modern societies, this complexity would be present for the emerging phenomenon of the plurality of expressive forms of sovereignty, as evidenced by the processes of affirmation of deliberative democracy and participatory democracy non-governmental organizations, meaning that alongside political citizenship formally linked to rites electoral presence has made a "social citizenship".

3. An Unrepresentative Legislative Power

The discredit of the Legislative power could be divided in two. The first aspect refers to the structural inadequacies of this power in relation to complex society. The second one is related to the structural problems of the division of powers itself.

Nowadays we are about to institute a "Complex society", in which, according with different interests and groups participate of political decisions. In this context emerges the idea that representative model isn´t enough for society's needs. Politics no longer incorporate societies' expectations but individuals and corporative interests.

This complex society show problems in the legislative such as the vulnerability to majority representations, and increasing doubts about the legitimacy of public agents and their capacity of representing all society´s interests. In order to popular participation and direct representation, the Brazilian legislator created in 1988´s a Constitution with an all-embracing system. This system promotes a bigger utilization of participative instruments in all instances of power. The legislator had the freedom to defend his interests reinforcing current idea of the inefficiency of Legislative. In several times, Legislative incorporates popular interests but is not able to resolve issues quickly.

Such aspects along with conservative character of the society reinforce popular sense of inefficiency of the legislative power once discussions of controversial issues are slower. Consequently, we have the discredit of the legislature, a fact that leads to questions about structural problems of the division of powers.

Since the Legislative power shows this low efficacy, judicialisation became one of the most common ways of requiring social rights. This tendency opens space to a danger inference of the Judiciary in the Legislature. Although judicial activism accelerates decisions, it may exceed its role, disrespecting powers division and democrat's devices of checks and balances.

Another way to evade the legislature's problems it's by the executive power. In order to prompt the discussion of controversial issues, the executive makes use of provisional measures, making possible public policies that hardly pass by the legislature without a lengthy discussion. In Brazil, this was the case of the approval of the program "Fome Zero" and the program to expand access to higher education, the "REUNI".

Brazil has progressed in democratic process. Society is still improving the ways of pressuring and interning on Public Administration either by direct participation either by capturing their necessities by institutional ways. In a general way, Public Administration and States' powers doesn't internalized paradigm of Democratic State of Law proposed by the Constitution of 1988 yet. This fact doesn't invalidate the paradigm. There is necessary a bigger opening for the paradigm though radical democratization and wide diffusion of rights.

According to Giorgio Agamben, all these interferences in the power division show us that this model isn't working since First World War, when "states of exception" became the only way for states maintaining its sovereignty. "States of exception", in his definition, is those that suspend, partially or fully their legal systems. All these reflections may us infer that Brazil is a state of exception once there is no harmony between its powers and they are always sabotaging each other to gain more power.

Conclusion

The Brazilian democracy relies on the separation and self-government of its powers, but our reality and new demands don't allow the preservation of a tight system like the proposed by Montesquieu on the 18th century.

By the previous analysis, we believe that Brazil has progressed plenty on its democratic process. The society, in constant modification, is learning the ways to pressure and make entries on the Public Administration, if it did not know that all along. Either by direct participation or by the capture of society's needs by institutional means, like the public prosecutor or the representatives of the Legislative power, rights has been recognized.

The personification of the national hopes on the Executive Power don't stand by the populists molds anymore. That power have interfered on the deliberations of the Legislative Power in cases of emergency or popular appeal. In a political analysis, this maneuver increases the possibilities of approval on the conservative's instances of the Legislature. Provisional measures with social dimensions, like the university programme "ProUni", would take years in progress. The same analysis has been done by the Judiciary on the case of the approval of the homosexual stable union.

The Legislative Power does not exhibit signs of total exhaustion to the social interests. Inside of that power, however, a huge conservatism that extended deliberations in accordance with specific parts of the complex society is noted.

In a general way, Public Administration and States' powers did not internalize paradigm of Democratic State of Law proposed by the Constitution of 1988 yet. This fact does not invalidate the paradigm. It is necessary a bigger opening for the paradigm though radical democratization and wide diffusion of rights.

So, what is the solution to this conflict? We believe that a political reform, including the reviewing of the electoral system and the powers division itself, must be conducted.

O caráter complementar entre retórica, filosofia e direito em Cícero

A concepção de uma totalidade física, ética e política na relação entre a retórica e outros saberes

Fernando Joaquim Ferreira Maia[1]

Resumo: Pretende-se analisar a relação entre retórica, filosofia e direito em Cícero. Segundo Cícero, partindo do cotidiano, a retórica deve conduzir o discurso jurídico na aplicação de soluções racionais para problemas concretos. Aqui, a filosofia deve permitir a abundância de ideias, a boa dicção e a conciliação da sabedoria com a retórica. Busca-se o orador sábio, pois considera-se que o bom orador possui a ciência do filósofo. É na retórica que o saber filosófico mostra relação com a reprodução do poder político, permitindo uma linguagem jurídica articulada e conclusiva, que procure incutir na sociedade a concepção do "fim do homem romano", apresentando os interesses aristocráticos como interesses da sociedade. Cícero vai defender a necessidade de uma profunda formação filosófica no orador e o distanciamento deste de excessos ornamentais no discurso, proclamando uma união da escola dos retores com a academia filosófica na otimização do discurso jurídico. Em Cícero, a retórica é uma praxis.

Palavras-chave: Cícero, retórica, Filosofia do Direito.

1. Introdução: a retórica metodológica de Cícero além de Aristóteles

O objetivo é tentar estabelecer os passos de Cícero na sua teoria da retórica da práxis que, ao partir de Aristóteles, dão originalidade ao seu pensamento.

A tese parte, basicamente, de um problema geral. Consiste no desenvolvimento original da retórica de Cícero frente à de Aristóteles. É importante saber se, ao desenvolver elementos da retórica aristotélica, a retórica ciceroniana se constituiu num paradigma de novo tipo, à base dos condicionantes históricos da Roma daquela época. Esta preocupação serve para questionar se Cícero acaba direcionando os mecanismos retóricos à legitimação de determinados interesses na sociedade. O certo é que a falência dos mecanismos de reprodução da ideologia do Estado pode ter contribuído para a relevância do papel da retórica na eficiência do discurso jurídico. Vale ressaltar que esses mecanismos envolvem os órgãos encarregados de julgar litígios, de produzir leis e de administrar a coisa pública, o rodízio em cargos públicos, a família, a escola, o sufrágio etc, atuando juntamente com a coerção estatal, mecanismos esses que têm papel ativo na disseminação da ideologia do Estado, na constituição e perpetuação do poder político e da hegemonia.

[1] Doutor e Mestre em Direito pela UFPE, Especialista em Direito Processual Civil pela UFPE, membro do Grupo de Pesquisa "As retóricas na história das ideias jurídicas no Brasil: originalidade e continuidade como questões de um pensamento periférico", Professor Adjunto da Universidade Federal Rural de Pernambuco-UFRPE. E-mail: fernandojoaquimmaia@gmail.com

Essa questão geral se reflete no seguinte problema específico que a tese toma para caracterizar a retórica de Cícero.

É relativo à unidade entre a retórica, a filosofia e o direito, com isso se investiga a preocupação de Cícero com o conteúdo e a forma da retórica, os quais têm a ver, respectivamente, com a invenção e a elocução. A primeira significa a construção de argumentos, pelos quais o orador deve encontrar e decidir o que deve ser dito ao auditório. Já a elocução refere-se ao "modo retórico", ou seja, à maneira de se empregarem pensamentos e palavras para descrever o conteúdo da argumentação. É importante saber se Cícero busca unir a invenção com a elocução e qual a repercussão na retórica da práxis.

Cícero coloca o discurso retórico centrado no sujeito retor, na perspectiva da intervenção deste sujeito na defesa da ordem social, política e jurídica, o que só poderia ser assegurado se a retórica se voltasse para a afirmação também de um projeto jurídico-político amplo. Tinha de envolver, por isso, a defesa dos interesses da aristocracia, da essência do Estado romano e do sistema escravista. Busca-se a manutenção de relações de dominação. A formação filosófica do orador é fundamental para a retórica e possibilita canalizar a persuasão e a articulação correta da palavra para os objetivos do Estado.

A base da retórica de Cícero foi construída como uma técnica jurídica discursiva, objetiva, destinada a afirmar o papel ativo do orador na sociedade, considerando sempre o poder político e a formação econômica escravista, bem como os princípios fundamentais do Estado romano. Incorpora elementos da realidade romana no discurso jurídico e direciona-o à universalização de interesses relativos.

Sustenta-se que o Arpinate, ao ligar a retórica com a filosofia e

com o direito, parte de uma teoria do Estado, considera sempre a relação da retórica com a legitimação do poder político em Roma. O jurista romano insere a retórica nas estratégias de agregação humana, ao envolver uma concepção geral de sociedade, Estado e cultura. A transformação de Roma de Cidade-Estado para Estado continental impunha ao orador a defesa da República e a disseminação da ideologia social perante as nacionalidades submetidas. O orador deveria ter amplos conhecimentos, principalmente de filosofia e de direito para guiar a sua ação prática. Esse é o elo entre a retórica e a filosofia transposto dos sofistas por Cícero. Defende-se que o "homem orador" deva ser também o "homem filósofo" e este é também o "homem político", pois, para ele, uma das tarefas da filosofia é ensinar ao homem a virtude, o culto da pátria e da sociedade e a viver somente na moralidade. O direito auxilia nesta tarefa.

A abordagem é feita conforme o modelo desenvolvido por Adeodato. A retórica, como metódica, descreve as estratégias utilizadas por Cícero para mobilizar a opinião do auditório (retórica metodológica). Essas estratégias serão desenvolvidas à base do ambiente material em que o orador, o discurso e o auditório estão inseridos (retórica dos métodos).

No primeiro nível da retórica ocorre um controle público da linguagem, em cima das expectativas do sujeito, pelo qual a realidade só existe para o homem na comunicação; nada acontece fora da linguagem. No segundo nível, o sujeito orador verifica fórmulas para a persuasão e tenta alterar a realidade para atingir objetivos seus. Já no terceiro nível, o orador verifica a relação da retórica dos métodos com a retórica metodológica para desvelar os mecanismos de persuasão empregados, como o próprio conhecimento obtido pelo homem no ambiente comunicativo[2].

Utilizar-se-á a retórica como metódica. Significa situá-la analiticamente e separar os aspectos contrários e positivos da formação do paradigma retórico ciceroniano, à base da projeção da retórica metodológica sobre a dos métodos, ou seja, sobre os condicionantes históricos em que a Roma da época estava inserida, com possíveis influências da retórica aristotélica. Atenta-se aos aspectos quem/o que/onde/quando/por quê[3].

[3] LEACH, Joan. Análise retórica. In: BAUER, Martin W.; GASKELL, George. Pesquisa

Por fim, defende-se que a retórica só encontra sentido prático na filosofia e na sua relação com o direito e que somente a unidade entre retórica e filosofia, por não incluir o direito como forma de controle social, não teria condições de produzir os efeitos esperados. Sustenta-se a unidade entre a retórica e a filosofia e o direito. A ação prática do orador, seguida por Cícero, em Roma, só ocorre junto do fenômeno jurídico.

2. A teoria do Estado em Cícero e a função do orador na sociedade

Assim como Aristóteles já indicava, Cícero vai sustentar o caráter complementar entre a retórica e a filosofia[4]. A filosofia complementa a retórica, pois, sem a filosofia, não se pode discernir o gênero e a espécie de cada matéria, nem explicá-la pela acepção. Tampouco classificá-la, julgar o verdadeiro e o falso, nem perceber as consequências, identificar contradições e ambiguidades, por outro lado, sem a retórica, a filosofia não consegue transmitir o conhecimento[5], pois, além da arte militar, só a retórica pode ser objeto de honraria[6]. Cita-se passagem da obra de Cícero intitulada O orador:

> E não deve só estar instruído na dialética, senão que deve também ter conhecimentos e prática de todos os temas da filosofia. E é que sem esta ciência que acabo de citar não poderá falar nem explicar com profundidade, amplitude e com abundância[...][7].

[7] "Y no debe estar instruido en la dialéctica, sino que debe tener conocimientos y práctica de todos los temas de la filosofía" (CICERÓN, Marco Tulio. El orador. Madrid: Alianza Editorial, 2004, p. 79).

Na retórica da práxis, o orador não discrimina a filosofia, o direito e a política. A religião, a virtude, a nacionalidade, a sociedade e a moral são encaradas pelo orador como um todo harmonioso[8], isso se depreende das palavras seguintes de Cícero: "Fixemos já, em primeiro lugar, -isto depois se entenderá melhor-que, sem filosofia, não se pode conseguir o orador que buscamos, não no sentido, sem embargo, de que a filosofia seja tudo, senão do que ajuda"[...][9].

É por isso que ele define o filósofo como aquele que conhece a natureza e as causas de todas as coisas divinas e humanas, bem como aquele que sabe conviver em sociedade. Denomina orador como aquele filósofo que possui abundância de ideias e boa dicção. O filósofo é o orador que concilia a sabedoria com a retórica[10]. Busca-se o orador sábio, pois se considera que o bom orador possui a ciência do filósofo[11]. Cícero é claro:

> E se alguém quer chamar orador ao filósofo que possui abundância de ideias e riqueza de dicção, eu não me oporei, nem tão pouco a que se chame filósofo ao orador que une a sabedoria com a eloquência [...]. Porém, se buscamos o melhor de todos, deveremos outorgar a palma ao orador sábio. Consintamos em que se o chame de filósofo [...]. [...] o orador perfeito possui a ciência do filósofo [...][12].

A explicação da formulação acima é pragmática. Conforme dito anteriormente, o Arpinate estrutura seu pensamento a partir de uma teoria do Estado. A preocupação aqui é com o dever do cidadão para

Pero si buscamos lo mejor de todo deberemos otorgar la palma al orador sabio. Consintamos en que Le llamen filósofo[...]. com o próximo e com a sociedade, o que leva à construção de uma moral prática e política. A moral política deve ensinar o dever, mas o dever presente, útil ao Estado e à sociedade, nos seguintes termos:

> Pois, embora tenham sido discutidos acurada e abundantemente, na filosofia, diversos assuntos não só graves como úteis, parecem muito amplos aqueles que, a propósito dos deveres, foram transmitidos e prescritos por ela. De fato, parcela alguma da vida, quer nos negócios públicos, quer nos privados, quer nos forenses, quer nos domésticos, quer nos da esfera estritamente pessoal, pode prescindir do dever[13].

Por isto, o mito do orador perfeito envolve a lealdade e a utilidade ao Estado, ou seja, uma função pública, política, social e familiar. Todas culminam no dever para com a manutenção das condições de existência e de vida da Civitas[14], o que só seria possível se o orador dominasse vastos assuntos de interesse social, principalmente jurídicos. Daí também que a filosofia tinha um papel pedagógico, pois era essencial na educação e formação do orador perfeito[15]. Essa função obviamente se estendia ao direito.

Prevalece a retórica dos métodos, pois Cícero começa a desenvolver a sua teoria retórica em cima da realidade romana, com o objetivo de que o orador possa, ao atuar, influenciá-la. Vai apresentar uma descrição universal da história como se fosse a melhor, a mais coerente com os interesses da aristocracia. Não sem razão, a tese considera Cícero um homem do seu tempo, mas que ajudou e ajuda a iluminar o presente.

O raciocínio é que os homens constituem a base do Estado e de que eles precisam se unir para garantir as condições da vida social[16]. Essa congregação é estimulada por alguém ou por alguma força. Seguem suas palavras: [...]"um cidadão (não sabemos quem), sem dúvida grande e sábio, [...] congregou os homens dispersos pelo campo e ocultos na selva, lhes induziu a algo útil e honesto[...], tornando-os mansos e civilizados"[17].

Conclui que no processo de formação do Estado, concorreram dois fatores: a razão e a retórica. A razão não tem, por si mesma, a capacidade de persuadir o indivíduo sobre as verdades descobertas, ou seja, sobre os assuntos da sociedade e os valores sociais, o que exigiria a retórica para viabilizá-la e a própria existência social do homem. Para tanto, a retórica, ao objetivar persuadir os homens a aceitarem as "verdades", mesmo que prováveis, descobertas pela razão, precisa ser dotada de conhecimentos necessários à defesa da Civitas. A filosofia, o direito e a história permitiam justamente ao orador encontrar a utilidade humana universal para a defesa da união social[18].

Saliente-se que a filosofia, desde que em harmonia com o direito civil, dá legitimidade à persuasão no discurso, pois perde toda a força persuasiva quando o orador não conhece a matéria de que trata[19]. O orador precisa de uma instrução universal em ciências e artes, uma cultura geral[20]. São esses os conhecimentos que enriquecem o argumento e dão força persuasiva ao discurso[21]. Como o próprio Cícero afirma, a retórica necessita de muita variedade de ciências e estudos[22]. Diz: "Sem dúvida que é a eloquência algo mais do que imaginam os homens, e que requer muita variedade de ciências e estudos"[23]. E mais: "Deve ser profundo o orador no conhecimento da antiguidade, e não desrespeitar as leis e o direito civil"[24].

A referência ao direito civil não é sem propósito. Cícero entende que este permite a conservação e perpetuação da igualdade e da justiça nas causas e negócios civis[25]. A retórica se relacionava com o direito civil[26]. Observam-se as linhas abaixo:

> [...] A unidade do povo, pelo contrário, e a do Senado, são coisas possíveis, e sua ausência acarreta todos os perigos. Pois bem: vemos que essa dupla concórdia não existe, e sabemos que ao restabelecê-la teríamos mais sabedoria e mais felicidade. Que pensas, pois, Lélio, que devamos aprender para alcançar esse fim? As artes que nos tornam úteis à República, porque esse é o mais glorioso benefício da sabedoria e o maior testemunho da virtude, assim como o maior de seus deveres[27].

E ainda:

> Se alguém é aficionado à ciência política, que Cévola não crê própria do orador, senão de outro gênero de disciplina, nas Doze Tábuas encontrará descritos os interesses e o governos da República. Se o deleita essa prepotente e gloriosa filosofia (me atreveria a dizê-lo), no direito civil e nas leis encontrará as fontes para todas as suas disputas[28].

Ressalte-se que, em Roma, o direito tem grande ligação com a religião. A legitimidade do jurídico não vinha apenas do Estado, mas também do sagrado. Em virtude disto, o direito, enquanto ordem universal, não podia ser discutido. O próprio termo ius expressava a ideia de integridade e perfeição. O direito regulava a área de atividades e pretensões individuais ou coletivas e estabelecia os deveres e as atribuições conforme o lugar que cada indivíduo ocupava na sociedade. O direito devia levar em consideração a ordem do mundo enquanto ordem superior[29].

A justiça e a injustiça provinham da contrariedade da ordem do universo, da natureza. Assim, toda lei que contrariar a natureza deve ser considerada ilegítima.

A ligação entre direito e sagrado acabava por retratar as ideias da aristocracia, para ajustar os interesses dessa classe ao cosmo, dava legitimidade ao controle político, bem como o monopólio para a determinação da legitimidade das leis.

3. Cícero e a instrumentalização da tarefa da filosofia e do direito

Entre o direito e o sagrado, novamente aparece a tarefa da filosofia. O pensamento ciceroniano entende que a filosofia abrange três partes, a primeira refere-se aos segredos naturais; a segunda diz respeito à lógica; já a terceira é relativa aos usos e costumes sociais. Cícero entende que, embora o orador deva considerar as duas primeiras, é justamente sobre a última que deve dar atenção especial[30].

O orador deve concentrar-se nos condicionantes históricos e materiais em que a sua sociedade se situa, pois é aqui que ele encontrará os fatores perceptíveis a todos os cidadãos, os quais serão utilizados para imprimir força persuasiva ao discurso. Para que possa influir nos destinos da sociedade, ele precisa utilizar um discurso fundamentado, saber os valores e o modo de comportamento dos homens no convívio social em que estão inseridos, bem como a mutação desses valores e comportamentos. Quanto à natureza e à lógica, o orador poderá utilizá-las, mas deverá sempre situá-las à base do contexto em que está inserido[31]. Reforça-se com a seguinte passagem:

> Para dar conselhos sobre o negócio da República, o primeiro é conhecê-los; para falar com algum fundamento, é preciso saber os costumes da cidade; e como estes variam a cada momento, que varie também o gênero da oratória. Ainda que sua força seja sempre a mesma, a dignidade do povo, os gravíssimos negócios da República, os tumultuados movimentos da plebe, parecem que exigem um gênero de oratória grande e vigoroso, e a maior parte > do discurso tem de ser empenhada em excitar os ânimos com alguma exortação ou recordação à esperança, ao medo, à ambição, à glória[...][32].

Vê-se que a retórica da práxis é uma retórica metodológica que atua sobre a retórica dos métodos. Existe uma preocupação de Cícero em inserir o orador no exercício do poder político estatal na sociedade e buscar a eficiência no uso desse poder.

Entende que a grande tarefa da filosofia é estabelecer o fim do homem, sendo alcançado mediante o critério da verdade e do fim dos bens, o que só será possível, inclusive, com a lógica, daí a necessidade de o orador também dominar esse saber[33].

A filosofia podia fornecer uma certeza provável, lastreada na prova do senso comum e do consenso de todos os homens, na medida em que estabelecia os critérios que permitiam alcançar essas certezas. Tal formulação ciceroniana era importante para a retórica por dois motivos: em primeiro lugar, permitia que a retórica utilizasse critérios de verossimilhança, ao expor bem os argumentos de forma articulada, conclusiva e universal. Em segundo lugar, atribuía à retórica um papel mais ativo no sistema jurídico-político, ao melhorar a linguagem e possibilitar uma aplicação otimizada do direito na proteção e reprodução das relações sociais. Cícero expõe os argumentos a seguir:

> Portanto, oh Crasso, julgo que não deves estender tanto os limites de tua arte: bastará ele conseguir nos juízos que a causa que defendes pareça melhor e mais provável; que nas disputas e deliberações valha muito tua oração para persuadir ao povo; em suma, que aos prudentes lhes pareçam que tenhas falado com elegância, e aos ignorantes que tenhas falado com verdade[34].

[32] Para dar consejos sobre los negócios de la República, lo primero es conocerlos; para hablar com algún fundamento, es preciso saber las costumbres de la ciudad; y como éstas varían a cada paso, de aqui que varie también el género de oratoria. Aunque su fuerza sea siempre la misma, la dignidad del pueblo, los gravísimos negocios de la República, los alborotados movimentos de la plebe, parecen que exigen um género de oratoria más grande y vigoroso, y la mayor parte del discurso há de emplearse en excitar los ánimos con alguna exhortación o recuerdo a la esperanza, al miedo, a la codicia o a la gloria [...] (CICERÓN, Marco Túlio. Diálogos del orador. Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1943, p. 190).

[34] Por lo tanto, oh Craso, juzgo que no debes extender tanto los limites de tu arte: bastará el conseguir en los juicios que la causa que defiendes parezca la mejor e más probable; que en las arengas e deliberaciones valga mucho tu oración para persuadir al pueblo; en

É, mais precisamente, na sua utilização na retórica, que a lógica mostra relação com a reprodução das relações sociais, ela permite uma linguagem jurídica articulada e conclusiva que procura incutir nas camadas sociais a concepção do "fim do homem romano". Ou melhor:

> E se nos perguntar quem é o cidadão que aplica o seu saber e estudo à direção da República, lhe definiríamos deste modo: deve ter-se por bom administrador e conselheiro da República ao que sabe as coisas em que a utilidade da República consiste e faz bom uso delas[...][35].

As linhas descritas acima devem ser lidas conforme a seguinte passagem:

> Em verdade que tudo o que pertence ao trato social, à vida dos cidadãos, a seus costumes, ao governo da República, ao estado social, ao sentido comum, às inclinações naturais, é matéria própria do orador [...]. E deve falar de coisas como falaram os que constituíram as leis, o direito e as cidades [...][36].

Não se pode negar que tais formulações acabam por apresentar os interesses aristocráticos, relativos, como interesses universais de toda a sociedade.

Ora, Cícero vai sustentar que toda controvérsia se resolve a partir de princípios universais, é necessário reduzir os argumentos também de proposições universais[37]. São esses princípios universais que vão garantir a união social. Aqui, a retórica, com o aporte da filosofia, do direito, da ética, da política e da história, era também o vínculo racional que centrava o homem, associava os indivíduos entre si e os agregava na Civitas[38].

A tese defendida reconhece a similaridade entre Cícero e Aristóteles com formulações para uma retórica destinada à preservação de estruturas jurídicas e estatais de controle social. Entretanto, reconhece também que o Arpinate é mais prático e objetivo na elaboração de uma retórica estratégica. Infere-se que os tais princípios universais se ligam aos interesses do Estado aristocrático romano. O próprio Cícero dá a pista, nas linhas a seguir: "Na verdade as medidas populares nunca foram de meu agrado e considero que a melhor das Repúblicas é a que criou o cônsul aqui presente, ou, por outra, a que está sob o governo dos melhores cidadãos"[39].

Com isso, reforça o caráter complementar entre a retórica, a filosofia e o direito. Esse caráter complementar, como fica claro, só se realiza, na defesa da Civitas, o que passa por dar uma função ao orador na defesa da sociedade civil e do Estado. Vê-se que a união entre a filosofia, o direito e a retórica tinha como intuito colocar a última como instrumento de ação do orador na sociedade[40]. A seguinte passagem da obra de Cícero, intitulada Bruto, é emblemática: "[...] quando se lhe perguntou pela primeira qualidade do orador, respondeu que era a ação; em respeito à segunda e à terceira qualidades, a resposta foi a mesma: a ação"[41]. Transcrevem-se as palavras a abaixo:

> E protegerá todas essas conquistas, como por meio de uma muralha, recorrendo à dialética, ao conhecimento do verdadeiro e do falso, à arte de descobrir as implicações e às contradições das ideias. Uma vez convencido de que está destinado a viver em uma sociedade civil, compreenderá a necessidade de empregar não só a sutil arte da dialética, mas também a arma de maior alcance, de efeito mais duradouro, isto é, a eloquência que governa os povos, a força das leis que castigam os maus, amparam os bons e que exaltam os homens ilustres. E, ainda, na seguinte passagem:

> Porém, a filosofia esteve abandonada até nossa idade, sem receber luz alguma das letras latinas. Por isto, eu me propus a elevá-la e despertá-la, para que se na vida pública fomos de algum proveito para nossos concidadãos, lhes sejamos também úteis no ócio[43].

4. A retórica e a necessidade de uma profunda formação filosófica e jurídica ao orador

O Arpinate, por tudo isso, vai defender a necessidade de uma profunda formação filosófica e jurídica ao orador[44] e o distanciamento deste de excessos ornamentais no discurso. Proclama uma união das escolas dos retores com a academia filosófica. Observa-se pelo próprio Cícero: "[...] creio eu que a eloquência exige o concurso de todas as demais artes que os homens cultos possuem[...]"[45].

Não vai desprezar a contribuição de Aristóteles para a retórica, muito pelo contrário, ele entende que a retórica é a única capaz de mover e persuadir[46], entretanto, aproveita a aproximação que Aristóteles já fazia entre a retórica e a filosofia e vai criticar a rigidez ornamental do filósofo alheio à retórica[47].

Também reforça e amplia a contribuição retórica do Estagirita para a práxis[48]. Existe um enlace entre as concepções retóricas de Aristóteles e de Cícero. Apesar de o primeiro tentar superar a ruptura realizada por Platão entre o saber e o dizer e colocar a retórica na perspectiva da linguagem racional humana, ao admitir que a retórica pode ser usada para o bem e para a ética, insere-a numa concepção geral de sociedade e cultura, com a função de agregação humana. O primado ciceroniano da práxis sobre a teoria[49] não deixa de ser fortemente influenciado por Aristóteles.

Essas ideias escondiam um real objetivo. A radicalização da luta social em Roma, verificada no final do período republicano, bem como o aprofundamento do dissenso entre os diversos extratos da aristocracia, sobretudo entre nobilitas e equestres, impunha a necessidade de aprimoramento na sociedade dos instrumentos de consenso. Não só para tentar disseminar a ideologia da aristocracia no seio da plebe, dos escravos e dos pequenos e médios proprietários de terras e escravos, mas, também, para unificar a própria aristocracia ao redor dos fundamentos do sistema social, político e econômico. O uso da retórica aliada à filosofia e ao direito era uma exigência da própria ideia de humanitas, pela qual o orador deveria ter consciência, mediante instrução e cultura, do seu papel na comunidade mediante a solidariedade com o outro e com a manutenção da ordem[50].

O argumento ciceroniano acaba por se revelar como uma técnica jurídica discursiva, que objetiva, por meio do discurso, a melhor argumentação para o melhor convencimento possível, destinada a assegurar os princípios fundamentais da sociedade romana. A retórica tem como origem a razão, a experiência e a história[51]. Por isso, concebe-a como uma arte, pois a mesma fica na confluência do elemento racional da técnica abstrata com o elemento empírico da experiência e do exercício. A retórica tem natureza histórica e varia no espaço-tempo[52]. Cita-se a sua obra Inventio: "E já que queremos estudar o princípio do que se chama eloquência (seja uma arte, um estudo, um exercício ou uma faculdade natural), veremos nascido de honestíssimas causas e cimentado em perfeitas razões"[53].

Apenas para corroborar a citada passagem, mencionem-se ainda as seguintes linhas: "Parece-me que a sabedoria calada ou pobre de expressão, nunca conseguiu separar os homens subitamente de seus costumes e trazê-los ao novo estilo de vida"[54].

O orador, para Cícero, era, antes de tudo, um político, no sentido de homem da Civitas, homem e cidadão, desempenhando sempre uma função na manutenção do status quo[55]. Cícero supera a ideia de que a retórica está limitada apenas à manipulação da sintaxe e estende a sintaxe à matéria, ao estabelecer relações do homem com a coisa[56]. A citação não deixa dúvidas: [...] "porém o que se arma com a eloquência para defender os interesses da pátria, em vez de menosprezá-los e combatê-los, é, em meu sentir, um homem utilíssimo para os seus e para a República e um verdadeiro cidadão"[57].

Mas, afinal, o que se quer dizer com a citação acima? Que o orador molde o discurso a partir de elementos concretos da realidade romana, direcione-o à universalização das ideias úteis à ordem social.

A retórica da práxis de Cícero resgata Aristóteles para tecer várias orientações ao orador e o transformar num instrumento de defesa social, numa instituição da República romana. Adeodato está correto ao afirmar que a retórica estratégica encontra respaldo na conjuntura do exercício do poder, o que pode envolver desde acordos, passar pela projeção da autoridade perante o auditório indo até a ameaça de violência.

Ratificando: por isso, a retórica deve possibilitar um discurso jurídico objetivo, direcionado ao essencial e que despreze os detalhes. Deve levantar sempre, sobre as questões objetivas, as questões subjetivas e englobar toda a problemática da questão. A retórica deve conduzir o discurso jurídico sempre na aplicação de soluções racionais para problemas concretos e partir sempre da experiência cotidiana[58].

A tese estabelece seis linhas gerais da retórica ciceroniana, principalmente as três primeiras.

A primeira se refere ao caráter complementar entre a retórica, a filosofia e o direito.

A segunda diz respeito à importância do gênero judicial da retórica, Cícero considera que o discurso judicial é o melhor dos gêneros para a técnica retórica.

A terceira linha afirma o ethos do orador, Cícero entende que o ethos deve ser projetado a partir da reputação prévia do orador frente ao auditório.

A quarta diz respeito à tradução dos termos gregos para o latim. Aqui, as quatro partes do discurso passam a ser denominadas de exórdio, de narração, de confirmação e de peroração[59].

A quinta linha refere-se ao discurso, que deve estar baseado nos condicionantes históricos e materiais em que o orador está inserido, significa que o discurso deve ser montado a partir de topoi extraídos da realidade social, de forma a se tornar mais perceptível e mais convincente ao auditório[60]. Cícero diz o que entende por topoi: "o tópico é o lugar fundado nas coisas que tem alguma relação com a que é objeto da controvérsia [...]"[61].

[61] El tópico o lugar fundado en las cosas que tienen alguna relación con la que es objeto

Para facilitar a compreensão, ilustra-se com as suas próprias palavras: "O conhecimento dos tópicos aproveita, portanto, não só aos oradores e filósofos, senão também aos jurisconsultos, para mostrar riqueza de argumentos em suas consultas"[62]. Tal afirmação é suficiente não só para a sustentação do caráter complementar entre retórica e filosofia, mas também para sustentar que ele já fazia uma intersecção entre a retórica, a filosofia e o direito. A invenção filosófica e jurídica e a invenção retórica se aproximam.

Assim, os topoi devem partir de percepções sensíveis e concretas dos cidadãos, facilmente identificáveis[63], pois só a tópica pode possibilitar à retórica a generalização ao todo do corpo social romano da identidade da ordem social e política.

A sexta linha diz respeito à mudança na ordem dos argumentos, pela qual se deve começar pelos últimos, deixar para o fim os primeiros e colocar os mais frágeis ao centro, o que será mais bem tratado em outro tópico.

Isto posto, entende-se que, para o direito, Cícero apresentou-se e tem se apresentado como uma forte presença influenciadora de novas abordagens, tanto na filosofia quanto na retórica. A perspectiva retórica, defendida na tese, foge de qualquer ontologia, de qualquer busca por uma verdade absoluta. Essa negação da ontologia se consegue, segundo João Maurício Adeodato, com argumentos persuasivos sobre os diversos lados contraditórios, para concluir pela relativização da verdade dos argumentos[64]. É o que se denomina de consenso circunstancial[65], o que não deixa de refletir o pensamento ciceroniano, de base eclética.

5. Conclusão: o reconhecimento da unidade intrínseca entre a retórica e a filosofia e o direito na intervenção do orador na sociedade

Aristóteles admite um papel ativo ao orador na sociedade. Entretanto, considera que a atitude reflexiva para o saber e ação é do filósofo. A formação filosófica do orador tem alguma relevância para a boa retórica, mas não é fundamental para que se possibilite a persuasão e a articulação correta da palavra. Assim, Aristóteles sempre acusou os sofistas de desprezarem o discurso deliberativo e o epidíctico. A assembleia permitia a utilização de argumentos científicos. Já os juízos e tribunais eram palcos para argumentos calcados na enganação e na falsidade. Na retórica, dá mais atenção ao desenvolvimento de formas de raciocínio próprias e à análise da psicologia dos diversos tipos de auditório.

Aristóteles entende que a grande utilidade da retórica se dá naquelas situações em que a filosofia não consegue impor a verdade. Reconhece várias situações em que o máximo que o homem pode alcançar é uma probabilidade. Então, a retórica ajudaria na prevalência daquela posição mais provável, desde que se objetivasse a ética, a prática da boa conduta.

Entretanto, pelas palavras citadas de Cícero, fica claro que o fundo do debate entre filosofia, retórica e direito não é a questão da verdade ou da verossimilhança, mas a necessidade de satisfazer expectativas e drenar insatisfações diante das contradições sociais. Prova disto é o fato de Aristóteles não deixar de considerar a perpetuação de relações de dominação social, pois a retórica é concebida como parte do exercício do poder político. O centro do sistema retórico de Aristóteles está na política e tudo gravita ao redor dela.

Infelizmente, não consegue levar esse pensamento até as últimas consequências, pois ele ainda estava ligado às críticas de Platão aos sofistas e porque as condições da ocupação da península grega pela Macedônia não favoreciam.

A divisão do trabalho e da produção gera classes sociais, contradições no processo de produção de riquezas e interesses antagônicos e inconciliáveis entre as diversas camadas na sociedade e até mesmo entre indivíduos no seu ambiente particular. Tal formulação leva a entender que, desde o surgimento da propriedade privada, a proposição, a crítica e a produção do conhecimento envolvem (direta ou indiretamente) relações de dominação. Não importa se a filosofia busca o saber, o exercício da cidadania, se é desinteressada ou contestadora da ordem, o homem sempre, ao refletir sobre as coisas, mesmo inconscientemente, favorece ou reforça determinada relação de dominação de um segmento sobre outro.

A filosofia, por si mesma, para ser útil ao homem numa sociedade de classes, não tem condições de dar conta de relações de dominação. Ela necessita da política e do direito. O exercício do poder político tem por objetivo básico a proteção e reprodução das relações sociais mais benéficas ao setor que dirige o Estado. Não há como o ordenamento jurídico não ser instrumentalização desse exercício.

Para Aristóteles, a atividade retórica deve se preocupar com o bem fazer, pois o homem é a medida de sua intervenção na sociedade. Mesmo considerando a ética na relação entre a filosofia e a retórica, não dá a devida atenção ao direito. A retórica é ética metodológica. Parece que este é o ponto da questão. Em Cícero, o discurso retórico perde toda a sua utilidade e a sua força persuasiva, quando o orador não conhece a matéria de que está tratando. O orador precisa de uma ampla cultura geral que a filosofia oferece, mas não é suficiente quando se trata de proteger e reproduzir as relações sociais. Isso só pode ser realizado pelo exercício do poder político estatal, mediante a instrumentalização do direito. Enquanto técnica de controle social, o direito enriquece o argumento e dá força persuasiva ao discurso. A tese tentou apontar que Cícero, ao conceber que o direito civil permite a conservação e a perpetuação da igualdade e da justiça nas relações sociais, sustenta que o orador necessita de muita variedade de ciências e estudos.

Não poderia ser diferente, pois o desenvolvimento das forças produtivas contribuiu para a transformação de Roma de Cidade-Estado em Estado continental, o que naturalmente pressionou a sociedade em direção a uma maior complexidade social, mas não ao ponto de se negar um papel próprio e independente ao direito, na relação entre retórica e filosofia.

Em Roma, o direito garantia a unidade do território e a hierarquia em relação ao poder central. As leis, os regulamentos administrativos e os costumes sancionados pelo Estado tinham caráter pedagógico, ao ensinarem a população a obedecer ao Estado e aos valores sociais. Cabia ao orador, o orador perfeito almejado por Cícero, incutir no seio do povo, a importância da obediência como condição da virtude e da unidade política de Roma.

Na situação descrita, a missão atribuída ao orador de defesa da República e de disseminação dos valores sociais perante as nacionalidades submetidas, não poderia ser realizada apenas pela unidade entre retórica e filosofia. Ao direito cabia um papel fundamental. Ao que parece, Cícero, ao entender que o orador deveria ter amplos conhecimentos filosóficos, também inseria o direito na união entre retórica e filosofia. Não reduziu o papel do direito nesta relação, pois entendia, como já foi mostrado na tese, que o direito cumpria certa função na perpetuação das relações sociais.

É importante reafirmar que, ao ligar a retórica com a filosofia e com o direito, Cícero parte de uma teoria do Estado, considera sempre o poder político estatal em Roma e insere a retórica nas estratégias de agregação humana, o que envolve uma concepção geral de sociedade, Estado e cultura. A retórica da práxis preconizava a superação da dicotomia entre a retórica e a filosofia. Agora, o universo de ação do orador também se encontrava no direito. A retórica aplicada ao direito permite estabelecer e resolver questões jurídicas, relativas ao poder político, à sociedade e à economia. Pode-se dizer que a retórica estratégica de Cícero, envolve a construção de mecanismos ideológicos que assegurem o consenso na sociedade. Com isso, universaliza-se a ideologia dominante, neutralizam-se e se eliminam ideias que antagonizem o poder estatal. É por tal motivo que a retórica da práxis não se limita à unidade com a filosofia e tenta estabelecer conexão com as bases do direito. O objetivo é estabelecer compromissos com a ação jurídica, política e social do orador na transformação da realidade.

Não sem razão, a tese afirma que o direito natural era o liame político do pensamento ciceroniano, é aqui que ele tenta criar uma absolutização do seu modelo de sociedade, pelo qual o direito à propriedade privada, o uso do trabalho escravo, a acumulação privada da riqueza, os valores helenísticos e a civilização romana, aparecem como construções de topos em qualquer análise.

Cícero concebe a existência de uma lei natural que funda e agrupa a sociedade e define os direitos e os deveres comuns entre as pessoas, isto à base da paz social. Na sua estratégia persuasória, o orador deve entender que o direito parte da lei natural e é comum a todos e decorre da razão. Só assim, perante o auditório, o justo e o injusto conseguem legitimação[66]. Entretanto, esses direitos e deveres comuns confluem para a Civitas, para o Estado, e só pode ser bem gerenciado pelos melhores cidadãos, pelos donos de terras e de escravos, pela aristocracia[67]. A retórica da práxis envolve a arte de influir sobre esses direitos e deveres pelo discurso.

Existe nas suas posições uma instrumentalização das relações de dominação, fundada na consciência jurídica dominante. A retórica metodológica se levanta sobre a retórica dos métodos. Cícero elabora orientações claras; impõe que ideias como lealdade, Estado, glória, honra, dignidade, costumes ancestrais e virtude sejam usadas para reforçar o próprio poder político estatal. A sua retórica projeta-se sobre a retórica dos métodos, como meio de busca, diante de uma situação questionada, não da verdade absoluta, mas de formas de persuasão, mediante um discurso lógico e articulado. Objetiva o consenso na sociedade e a condução à prevalência do tecido social.

Com o Arpinate, a fusão da justiça com a virtude atribui uma ação do orador na defesa dos valores da aristocracia. Aperfeiçoa-se a retórica, cujo resultado é o afastamento do modelo de orador das pretensões das camadas populares. Sem justiça, lei natural ou virtude, o pacto aristocrático preconizado por Cícero, mesmo que estivesse fundado na legalidade, perderia legitimidade. Aqui, a ligação entre direito e sagrado era útil para retratar as ideias da aristocracia e ajustar o cosmo aos interesses dessa classe. Isto dava legitimidade aos controles políticos e jurídicos. Cabia ao orador ajudar na tarefa mencionada. Estavam fora desse projeto as outras classes sociais.

A retórica deve ser utilizada para inserir o discurso jurídico no esforço de aprimoramento das formas de controle social pelo direito. A razão é simples. Se no paradigma de Cícero a filosofia permite ao retor amplo conhecimento para a persuasão do auditório, sendo fundamental para garantir a sobrevivência do tecido social, num ambiente de falência dos instrumentos de disseminação de ideias do Estado, o direito representava um espaço prático para a atuação retórica na proteção/reprodução das relações sociais.

A união entre retórica e filosofia, preconizada pelos sofistas, nas condições romanas, não satisfazia a necessidade de tutela das relações sociais. O bom orador, o modelo defendido por Cícero, não seria viável apenas se a retórica fosse unida à filosofia. A tese mostrou que Cícero, em vários trechos de sua obra, faz menção à necessidade do orador incorporar o direito civil e o conteúdo das leis romanas nas suas posições.

Por outro lado, existe uma pedagogia na sua retórica, pois ela aparece como uma técnica destinada a afirmar o papel ativo do orador na sociedade, mas considerando sempre o poder político e a formação econômica escravista, bem como os princípios fundamentais do Estado romano.

As próprias ideias de justiça, natureza, lei e virtude são levantadas com a preocupação de situá-las à base das contradições que ocorrem na sociedade. Cícero desenvolve estratégias que criam tipos ideais de homem, de lei, de Estado; passa a guiar o discurso em cima desses tipos ideais e tenta mostrar um tipo de sociedade comum, unificada, paradigmática por assim dizer, pela qual as estratégias de persuasão devem se moldar. Os tipos ideais referidos não espelham a sociedade, mas, apenas, uma dada camada, a aristocracia. Mostra alguma afinidade com Platão, para quem, na prática, a lei não regula nada de forma perfeita e universal e sempre vai favorecer um interesse em detrimento de outro interesse.

Desse modo, a tese ressalta que a unidade entre retórica, filosofia e direito tem duas finalidades. Uma imediata, composta pela interação entre os homens e entre o homem e o objeto, persuasão do orador em relação ao auditório, controle da relação social pelo discurso jurídico, justificação das instituições sociais e efetivação do direito. Outra é mediata e equivale à garantia de uma utilização instrumental da retórica. É uma metafinalidade: o reforço do exercício do poder político estatal nas mãos da aristocracia, por meio da retórica, a partir do reconhecimento da inevitabilidade dos instrumentos persuasórios, para a otimização do direito enquanto forma de proteção/reprodução das relações sociais mais vantajosas ao grupo dominante.

De-constructing the modernity in epistemology
Critical analysis of postmodernism

Alex Feitosa de Oliveira[1]
Felipe Meira Marques[2]

Abstract: This work seeks to identity one of the most difficult concepts of contemporaneity: post-modernism. How this context was built, whereas the paradigm of modernity was weakening. It is verified in what modernity consists and its project. Different crises that broke up with the project of modern rationality will be analyzed. Among these, scientific and identity crisis will have special notability. Among the authors, Paul Feyerabend will have special attention. Even though he did not considered himself post-modern, his ideals soon were defended by the ones who followed the movement. Methodological anarchism questions the way rationality is performed. These changes are essential to the development of the contemporary legal epistemology. Thus, plurality is understood within society, showing how the contexts are important to the production of knowledge and rights. Therefore, the mission of uniting universal rights with the peculiarities of every group or culture will be simpler or less embarrassing.

Keywords: Post-modernism. Modernity. Paul Feyerabend. Relativism.

1 Introduction

It is possible to be said that postmodernism is under the highlights nowadays. In scientific or literary debates, it is a recurring theme. However, what this movement means is still far from a consensus. This article will examine the base of the movement, which has been deconstructed.

The term will be analyzed, its concept and which factors led to postmodernism. Conceptualizing postmodernism is one of the toughest tasks that can be done in the contemporary research. There is a variety of meanings, dating back to various fields of knowledge, as well as an extensive temporal boundaries. Some features, however, are common, and they will be introduced in this work.

It must be highlighted that the relationship between capitalism and consumption is a primary theme in postmodern concerns. Nevertheless, the economic question won't be analyzed in this work, only when extremely necessary.

How it can be imagined, the term postmodernism makes an allusion to an overcoming of modernism. Therefore, before postmodernism, it is first necessary to understand what modernism is. A brief analysis of modernity will be made to demonstrate then what was surpassed in postmodernity.

After the analysis, it will be discussed in what constitutes postmodernism. It will be seen that many crises in various fields that permeate the human condition were fundamental in the transformation. Among them, we can mention the crisis of science and identity.

Epistemology, the philosophy of science, must be aware of these changes. The changes that are experienced by the subject must be observed, as the task of epistemology is to enhance knowledge. Also the object and the logical relations are in its field of action, and they also were redimensioned with postmodernity.

It will be confirmed that modernity is declining. New forms of social organization are being prepared, overcoming the rational project of modernity.

2. Brief analysis of modernity

Modernity was a period of time characterized for the belief in the future; for the rediscovery of the individual and their values; also the belief in the progress of civilization. With the lights, the future became a giant project, whereas the previous age became the age of darkness, although projects and discoveries have been made, especially in the Carolingian Empire and in the Renaissance.

With modernity, skepticism is introduced. The truth dogmatically revealed by the Church is questioned, and certainties begin to fade. The individual no longer believes in everything that is said, causing an underlying problem. What to believe in? That is the question.

Then answers which have notably influenced Western societies to the present day have been come to light, especially the rationalism of Descartes. His books were indicated in the Index, list of banned books of the Catholic Church. With it, the scientific revolution is consolidated and a new way of making science emerges.

Descartes was deeply skeptical. This can be observed in his thoughts:

> I was fed with the letters from my childhood, and as they have convinced me that through them one could acquire a clear and secure knowledge about everything that is useful to life, I had an immense desire to learn them. But as I finished this entire course of study, on completion of which is usually accepted in the ranks of scholars, opinion changed completely. For I found myself entangled in so many doubts and errors, I seemed to have taken another advantage when looking to instruct me, than to have discovered increasingly my ignorance. And yet, was one of the most famous schools of Europe, where he thought there must be wise learned men, if there are these men somewhere in the earth.[3]

Some tried to build a different thought, based on doubt. This is the only certainty: I doubt it. If I doubt, I exist, I am. Thus it was released a rationalism based on a reasoned self, through which knowledge could expand. This became known as the Cartesian subject: coherent, logical, rational, clear and objective.

The scientific paradigm of rationality gained strength from the seventeenth century. This period is usually known in the philosophy of science, as modernity. Among its main features, we can highlight the intention to universalize knowledge through reason. In this period, science and its rationality gain great power in society. Objectivity, rationality, neutrality, universality and individualism constitute the main ideas around the philosophy of science.

Through Descartes' thoughts, several thoughts were being founded, including positivism, which also has a strong influence on current thinking, even to challenge it. Boaventura[4] says that the "philosophical consciousness of modern science, which had the Baconian empiricism and Cartesian rationalism as its earliest formulations, condensed itself in nineteenth-century positivism". Moreover, it has some basic features:

[4] SANTOS, Boaventura de Sousa. Um discurso sobre as ciências. 7.ed. São Paulo: Cortez, 2010. p. 33 universalism, rationalism, individualism and autonomy.

Besides that, one also believes in eternal, immutable, natural laws, which therefore does not depend on human action. The role of man would be only discover them neutrally and objectively. The truth was, therefore, unique. As Comte[5] states, "the genuine positive spirit is based on seeing to predict, to study what it is, in order to conclude what it will be, according to the general dogma of the invariability of natural laws".

In addition, any metaphysical thinking must be rejected, once it is not possible of being observed and experimented. The values confused the research. The model to be followed by the social sciences was the one adopted by natural sciences, with its laws and its "perfection". As Figueiredo[6] states, "obedience is necessary for winning, and in order to obey it takes discipline the mind, eliminate all subjectivism. The scientific methodology that has been developed over the last four centuries is exactly the effort to discipline the mind to better conform to nature". It can be stated that there is a scission between object and subject, paying to the first more attention at this point than to the subject itself.

Therefore, it was created in the subject a fragmentation between an external and an internal reality, a subjectivity that was internalized and divided. One should get rid of himself, his passions, his values, in order to meet an external reality outside himself. This duality still causes discussion, and authors such as Gadamer, Hegel and Deleuze offered good answers. Thus,

> Modern science requires a division of the subject itself, and not only a division of the subject in relation to a nature made strange: it is the subject who finds itself strange[7].

Science and its inherent rationality became the hope of solving humanity problems. Science started to be seen as the mean for solving many problems of society. The label of "science" became a mark of quality. While consolidating its hegemony, science also disqualify other forms of knowledge, becoming a model with totalitarian characteristics.

However, scientific thought have not looked deeply - perhaps because of the authoritarian aspect imposed by science - to questions about the role of science in mankind, and whether science, in the way it was being produced, also brought harm to humans.

Trying to demystify many of the rational ideas derived from science, especially in the twentieth century, various criticisms began to be formulated by many scholars of epistemology and other areas of knowledge, in the sense of following the scientific paradigm. One began to object about scientific knowledge and its real value to humanity.

This very brief mention of some characteristics of modernity was necessary in order to better explain postmodernism. One is, however, aware of the brevity and superficiality of the above subject.

4. Postmodernity: de-constructing modernity

Post-modernity is characterized as a crisis of certainty in various fields of humanity: political, scientific, financial and intellectual. The most varied areas such as art, architecture, law and religion are experiencing a new moment, overcoming the previous forms. Lipovetsky[8] claims that:

> Having initially emerged in architectural discourse (in response to international style), it was quickly mobilized to designate the shaking of the foundations of rationality and the absolute failure of the great ideologies of history, and the powerful dynamic of individualization and pluralization of our societies.

No one knows for sure what was the mark of postmodern ideas. In fact, it is impossible to assign a date for the appearance of this thought. As observed:

> It must be recognized, however, by drawing this kind of division in philosophical thought, that such periods and classifications are human creations that are somewhat arbitrary, because reality does not meet the divisions that men make in attempting to better understand it. There are no certain points of beginning and end of each period, and postmodernism, although it has its roots attributed to Nietzsche, has many of its features already identified > in Kant when it recognizes the limits of reason, and even Miguel Cervantes, in a work where fiction and reality are mixed - characteristic attributed to postmodernism in literature[9]

It is a complex phenomenon since it involves so many fields of human action. These references crisis led to a new form of interaction between the subject and the way it is in the world. Irony, deconstruction and skepticism are some of these characteristics.

Metanarratives - still predominant form of knowledge - are being replaced gradually. This is explained by the fact they need a modern subject, beyond objectivity and universality. One of the proposals of postmodernism is to bring knowledge to the local context, sometimes individual, to overcome the metanarratives.

The great question is how to do research without making it arbitrary or even false, as some critics claim. Relativism would become base, and each would speak whatever he wanted.[10] What is proposed, however, is not that kind of relativism. We seek to bring to a community the way that best answers your questions, since grounded. The reasoning and fundamentals of how we arrived at certain results must be taken to avoid charlatans.

Crises can be of identity, scientific, in arts, in politics, in work, in security and many others. It will be analyzed, in the present work, the scientific crisis and of identity.

Contemporary epistemology undergoes changes. The project of modernity is slowly crumbling, although still widely used,. Authors such as Habermas, however, believe in a late modernity reconfigured. This just shows that it is not a new phase but a transition between two moments in history.

According to Machado Segundo[11] "contemporary epistemology no longer considers as characteristics of scientific objectivity the neutrality, clarity and certainty". As one knows, these are typical characteristics of modernism. However, the mere existence of these features does not mean to be postmodern.

The question that arises is what have led to this. You could say that the progress of science has shown that these factors are not possible. According to Boaventura[12],"the identification of the limits, of modern scientific paradigm's structural weaknesses is the result of the great advances in the knowledge it has provided". These have led to changes in research, such as temporality and discontinuity.

Some of these advances will be mentioned as examples: Einstein's relativity, quantum mechanics, Godel's incompleteness theorem, and the theory of Prigogine.

About Prigogine's thought, spreading to other sciences, Santos[13] says:

> Instead of eternity, the history; instead of determinism, unpredictability; instead of the mechanism, the interpenetration, spontaneity and self-organization; instead of reversibility, irreversibility and evolution; instead of order, disorder; and instead of need, creativity and hazard.

All these crises in science led to the breakup of the modern paradigm. Its consequences were inevitable. The rupture of basic concepts such as immutability and universality; Objectivism gives way to an active involvement of the researcher in the construction of knowledge; Rationalism is rethought as well as the continuity and accumulation of knowledge; It is observed that social, cultural, psychological and local issues directly affect knowledge.

In postmodernity, the subject actively participates in the production of knowledge. Its action interferes directly in the research and in the object. This separation, so defined in modernity, becomes more intertwined. The historical question becomes decisively influential. As Bulcão[14] states:

> The idea of building broke with the notion of data in science, showing that what was called "given" it was a result that was obtained in a process of knowledge. With the notion of construction, it seems to us that science does not intend to express the real any> more, but so entering reality, which is clearly demonstrated by the current science.

In postmodernity there is a break with continuity. The discontiguous takes shape, as Kuhn[15], that faces the scientific development "as a succession of tradition-bound periods and punctuated by non-cumulative breaks".

Knowledge was once in modernity taken as linear and progressive, where the last one in a roll of theories was always an evolution of the previous one. Nowadays it is seen through breaks. A new theory could even be minor than its predecessor.

According to Feynman[16] "what we now call scientific knowledge is, therefore, a body of statements of various degrees of certainty. Some are very uncertain, others are almost certain, but none is absolutely certain".

One of the first scholars to question the modern paradigm was Bachelard. He criticized the idea of immutability and accumulation of knowledge. He also believed in discontinuity of knowledge as well as the construction of knowledge by the subject, and not merely capturing the object. In fact, the object does not exist by itself. Bulcão[17] states that "for Bachelard's epistemology, the subject and the scientific city become the builders of own phenomena studied by science, and scientific objectivity itself".

The objectivity of positivism is questioned, once one believes that it should be built. The objectivity of the author is not in the object but in the subject. This should be mindful to develop research consistently. According to Bachelard[18], "therefore, is the effort of rationality and construction that should hold the attention of the epistemologist".

Among the various crises that led to postmodernity, one of them, and essential for epistemology, is the identity crisis of the subject. The new conception of the individual counters the modern subject. However, it is known that epistemology is primarily dependent upon the design of the subject. As example Piaget[19]:

> Every epistemological analysis finds beyond the questions of formal validity, a larger or smaller number of issues of fact relating to the role and to activities of the subject of knowledge. [...] Indeed, if it is true that a formal link remains strange to the subject while we starred at it as logical entity, the epistemological problem of its nature or its use necessarily refers to certain activities of this subject (language, judgment , etc.). In fact, the whole epistemology speaks constantly of the subject from the moment it is no longer pure logic nor the details of expertise.

A reformulation of the concept of knowing or epistemic subject will make epistemology revisit all its operations. In postmodernity, the Cartesian, coherent, rational, one, endowed with an essence subject gives room to a contradictory, fragmented, multiple, mobile and discontinuous subject. Hall mentions five revolutions in thought that showed the identity crisis of the modern subject.

The first one is Marxism. States the author that "Marx changed two key propositions of modern philosophy: that there is a universal essence for men; that this essence is the attribute of each individual, which is its real subject" [20]. In the dialectic of Marx, consciousness is determined by the material conditions of life. The subject is not a logical and coherent subject, there is not an essence. This is determined by historical conditions. Although the authors deny the Marxist theory, it is impossible to deny its impact on society.

A second revolution - strongly contested but also striking - is the Freudian psychoanalysis. Through the unconscious, moved by impulses, libidos and organized in the form of id, ego and superego, the coherence and logic of the modern subject lost space. The unconscious decisions are not always the most "rational", ie, how the mind works is different than thought the Cartesian subject. As Hall[21] says, "psychoanalysis demolishes the concept of rational knowing subject featured with a fixed and unified identity - I think, therefore I am, from the subject of Descartes".

The third is related to language, more precisely refers to Ferdinand de Saussure. It shows that a range of meanings pre-exist the individual, and they are constantly changing. Hall[22] adds:

> The meaning is entirely unstable: it looks for the closing (the identity), but it is constantly disturbed (by the difference). It is constantly slipping away from us. There is always additional meanings over which we have no control, that will emerge and subvert our attempts to create fixed and stable worlds.

The thought of Foucault also modifies the concept of subject. In his theory, he also embraces the multiplicity of roles of the subject and its contradictions. Vaccaro[23] stipulates that "the difference lies in the fact that Foucault and Deleuze have replaced the individual subject - whose sovereignty and substantial unity were not only kept, but carried to the extreme by Stirner and companions - when referring to a multitude of subjects".

Finally, the fifth group is feminism, representing social movements. With these movements, new identities – different from the interior one - are being built. "This is the historical birth of what came to be known as the politics of identity – one identity for each movement"[24].

And what postmodernity proposes is the big question. One could say it fulfilled their role in denouncing some problems o society. But it has not been clearly discussed a suggestion for replace them, neither conclusions were reached. Harvey[25] states that "the modernist feelings may have been undermined, deconstructed, overcome or superseded, but there is little certainty about the meaning or coherence of the thought systems that can have replaced them".

For some authors, postmodernity has been left behind. New arrangements and settings of society redefined and strengthened the plan of modernity. Rationalism was strengthened as well as individualism and universalism. Stands out among them, Lipovetsky.

For the author, postmodernity is in memory. The new logic, grounded in modernity, is based on three factors: technical efficiency, market and individualism. The plan of modernity did not collapse, just was resized up and updated with new ways to impose. He argues that > Far from death of modernity be decreed, we are witnessing its shot, materialized the globalized liberalism, the almost universal commercialization of lifestyles, in exploitation of instrumental reason to its "death", in a rampant individualization[26].

He argues that in this new configuration, the power of questioning has been lost. There are not alternative designs or resistors, because they were disorganized and disjointed. "We had a limited modernity, now the time has come for consummate modernity"[27].

The individualism, expanded and encouraged in the consumer society, the remodeling of capitalism for supercapitalism[28] and the universalism disguised as globalization reinforce Lipovetsky's view. Democracy, which protects the differences, is struggling to be exercised.

The author, however, does not seem totally skeptical. Recognizes the advances in society, as the strengthening of Human Rights. However, he warns to other factors caused by this new modernity, such as precarious employment, fear and insecurity.

Coelho[29] criticizes the attitude of ideas like this because he believes we are in postmodernity:

> In a certain way, this understanding gives reason to the ones who say that there is no postmodernity, but only a new stage of modernity itself. But this understanding in the meantime disallows this belief: yes, there is something new, and this is a new relationship, in contemporary times, between what existed and what is going to exist and that is different from the previous one.

One of the greatest thinkers of postmodernism, even without considering himself as one of them, was Feyerabend. He made severe criticisms on how rationality is exercised in contemporary times. An analysis of his ideas proves helpful to better understand postmodernism.

4. Criticism of postmodernism

Two major critics to the postmodern will be examined: relativism and the one developed by Sokal, who became known as the Sokal affair.

4.1 The "Sokal" affair

An important case occurred in the scientific community that spurred discussion about the post- modern phase is called the Sokal case. Physicist Alan Sokal Sokal[30] submitted a text to a number of Social Text magazine , in 1996 . That exemplar meant oppose the defense of rationality and the ideal of lights organized by the Academy of Sciences in New York in 1995, defense realized through the Congress "The Flight from Sciense and Reason". The journal Social Text would bring contrary postmodern arguments to scientific rationality thoughts. Thus, among the texts published in that issue of the magazine was Alan Sokal 's article "Transgressing the boundaries : towards a transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity" , which intended to make a postmodern study of quantum gravity, using for both several quotes from unscientific postmodern writers and criticizing some characteristics of modern science. The paper was accepted, and later, Sokal admitted that it was a parody, without any scientific contribution, beyond its critical goal. In fact, the real purpose of the paper was to criticize the way postmodern writers used scientific concepts without the proper criteria[31], making references to science and scientific formulas only to legitimize their articles, giving a "scientific" status. Indeed, Sokal intended to criticize many postmodern authors, especially criticizing the way they wrote and use concepts of natural science in social sciences' papers.

This episode, as well as other previous and subsequent discussions were part of the "science wars"[32], that began as a battle between the natural and social sciences and, as matter for this work also involved the debate on post modernism and its ideas. As a result of discussions involving postmodernism, Sokal himself, along with Jean Bricmont, published the book Intellectual impostures[33], which aimed, not only continuing criticism of how postmodern authors wrote (first part), but also of the very postmodern thought, in the second part of the book.

In an interview[34] commenting on the mentioned book, Alan Sokal discusses the criticism made to postmodern thought, particularly when cognitive relativism:

> Ahora bien, la segunda parte del libro 6 me parece más interesante y también mucho más delicada. Se trata de una crítica del relativismo cognitivo, de La idea de que afirmaciones de hecho -ya sean hechos comunes como, por ejemplo, hay un vaso de agua sobre la mesa delante de mı, o afirmaciones históricas o científicas- no pueden ser verdaderas o falsas objetivamente, transculturalmente, sino que sólo pueden ser verdaderas o falsas relativamente a una [32] Boaventura de Sousa Santos, about the war of sciences: "The debates have taken many forms. The latest was known as the science wars and preferably focused on the nature and validity of knowledge that produces and legitimates the transformation of the world through science. It was essentially a debate among scientists, although the scientific status was itself part of a debate, so that if, for some participants was the debate among scientists, for others this was a debate among scientists and intellectual strangers to the world of science (...) Here are some of the issues that dominated the debate: what is the relationship between scientific knowledge and the fact that he claims to know? Scientific knowledge represents, discovers, invents and creates the reality you want to know? What are the criteria by which assesses the suitability or correctness of these relationships? Scientific knowledge aspires to truth, effectiveness, likelihood , consistency , the referentiality? If the scientific truths of a given historical moment have been refuted in later times, there is actually something more than the story of the truth? The way science is organized and how it performs in practice interfere in the type and validity of the knowledge produced? What are the relationships between science and other ways of knowing? What is the real role of scientific knowledge? As scientists should interact with the rest of society in decision-making?" > cultura o a un determinado grupo social. Nosotros queremos criticar esas ideas y tratar también de explicar en parte cómo surgieron. Esas concepciones surgieron partiendo de ideas válidas de la filosofıa de la ciencia contemporanea, pero fueron deslizandose hacia nociones, a nuestro parecer, no válidas, gracias a ambiguedades del lenguaje y a errores de lógica. El propósito de ese largo capíıtulo Del libro es desenredar algunas de las confusiones que nos parecen muy difundidas -no tanto en círculos filosóficos sino en círculos de las ciencias sociales-, por ló menos en Estados Unidos, pero nos parece que ocurre también en otros países.

After this episode, other several discussions about postmodernism and its critique of scientific reason were raised. We can cite for example the book Scientific Impostures[35], published in order to fight against the criticisms of the book Intellectual Impostures. We can also mention the book "The Postmodern discourse against science: Obscurantism and irresponsibility" (Lisbon, Gradiva), written by Antonio Manuel Batista, which criticizes the ideas presented in the book "A Discourse on the sciences" by Boaventura de Sousa Santos.

Boaventura de Sousa Santos thus discusses about the scientific moment nowadays:

> Effectively, were recently published several books whose theme is to go "beyond the science wars": exchanging ideas instead of insults; discovering areas of consensus on the legitimacy and authority of science as a way of understanding the world. Two books may be mentioned by way of example: Úllica Segerstraile (org.), Beyond the Science Wars: The Missing Discourse about Science and Society (Albany NY: State University of New York Press, 2000) e Jay A. Labinger e Harry Collins (orgs.), The One Culture? A Conversation about Science (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001). The general idea is that the last episode of the science wars came to an end , there has been no formal declaration of truce or surrender. It feels like this war is as mysterious as its beginning . Naturally, the major epistemological debates remain, but seem to have ceased to be battlegrounds for receiving the scope and style of academic discussions undoubtedly intense, but peaceful and mutual respect for differences. The explanation, at least for the case of this war of sciences in America, lies, in my view, > in the fact that, despite having been fought between scientists, it had more political and cultural than scientific motivations. I refer to the policy in general, and scientific and cultural policy in particular. Basically, what was the issue were different conceptions of the role of science and the different concepts of science in political transformation of society; there were also differences on the impact of these views on public funding of science, especially when it comes to very substantial funding such as those required by the Big Science, and were still opposing views on the meaning of cultural diversity and therefore the recognition of multiculturalism in higher education[36].

We agree with this thought. All criticism made by the post-modern school may have occurred more because of the problems faced by science than by a solid theoretical foundation with a tendency to create a new paradigm. The criticism arose as a result of the experienced human problems. One wondered why science did not solve such problems. However, the fact that science is not the solution to all problems was forgotten. Other branches of knowledge should work with science to face the current problems of humanity.

Despite the faults in scientific methods based on rationality, there is no way to defend a scientific thought completely relative. That's because, using Susan Haak's ideas, the relativism defended by post-modernists has no theoretical basis[37]. Alan Sokal and Jean Bricmont also share the idea, criticizing Feyerabend, highlighting that despite of arguing in the sense that science does not advance following a defined, he could not develop and justify the falsity of scientific theories.

4.2 Relativism

The relativistic thought, the main characteristic of the postmodern trend called, then arises with greater emphasis, which can be synthesized as a thought based on the denial of scientific rationality (and of the scientific-rational method)[38] and on the relativization of the world.

[37] Susan Haak states that postmodern authors cannot believe in their discoveries, once the postmodernism is so critical.

[38] The cientific paradigma hás its origins in the works of René Descartes and Francis

That thought strikes well defined definitions: male x female, white x black, etc.. For post-modern authors, realities can be plural and relative, depending on the interests and on what these interests consist. They aim to overcome the overconfidence of modernism, which consider the science as absolute owner of truth.

The postmodern subject denies the existence of a universal truth and of an objective reality. The reality would be a conceptual construct, product of human labor. They criticize the metanarrative of modern scientific thought, especially when it intends to be universal[39]. It denies the Cartesian distinction between nature and men, putting away the idea of empiricism.

They strongly criticize the historical question of veneration of science, in relation to the thought that science would solve all the problems of humanity. They question whether alternative models might not be better than science, proclaiming and defending relativism as the consideration of the world as it is.

Bacon. Arnaldo Vasconcelos, about the changing that occurred during the renaissence, says that: "The changing turns irreversible with René Descartes, with his famous Discourse on the Method, published in 1637. His closer antecedent is Francis Bacon's Novum Organum, of 1620, in which the author sought to 'restore sciences'. Both books indicate the begginning of new times of primacy of methodological issue, which Will dominate current philosophy". VASCONCELOS; Arnaldo (Coord). Prefácio à 1ª Edição. In: Temas de Epistemologia Jurídica. Universidade de Fortaleza, Gráfica Unifor, 2008, p. 9-16, v.I, p. 9-10. (Our translation to English).

[39] Paul Sheehan, quoting Lyotard and at the same time inserting his ideas states that "Lyotard also claims to be presenting a "report on knowledge." Knowledge requires legitimation, and it is here that his second argument about narrative takes shape. Two "grand narratives" have determined western selfunderstanding – the Enlightenment story of progress and political emancipation, and the Hegelian narrative of the manifestation of scientific reason. Both of these have foundered, he declares, along with every other metadiscursive attempt at organizing modernity's immense sprawl into something coherent and socially useful. Postmodernity, by contrast, recognizes the impossibility of this undertaking and its need for legitimation, and recoils from it: "Simplifying to the extreme, I define postmodern as incredulity towards metanarratives." In postmodernity, legitimation does not stand outside social practices, but is "plural, local, and immanent." In other words, the language game of narrative has become a model for every kind of legitimation, no longer playing second fiddle to scientific "transcendence." The death of the grand narrative thus heralds the birth of the local narrative, with its emphasis on diversity and heterogeneity. SHEEHAN, Paul. Postmodernism and Philosophy. In: CONNOR, Steven (ed.). The Cambridge companion to postmodernism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004. p. 42-43.

Thus, relativism is a major feature of the postmodern ideology. Postmodernists do not believe in objective truth; they defend relativity also in the epistemological field, defending such relativity starting from the idea that science and its methods are provisional.

Despite the faults in scientific methods based on rationality, there is no way to defend a scientific thought completely relative. That's because, using Susan Haak's ideas, the relativism defended by postmodernists has no theoretical basis. Alan Sokal and Jean Bricmont also share the idea, criticizing Feyerabend, highlighting that despite of arguing in the sense that science does not advance following a defined, he could not develop and justify the falsity of scientific theories.

Paul Feyerabend defends relativism saying:

> Relativism is often attacked not because we find a fault, but because we are afraid of him. Intellectual people fear him because he threatens their role in society as the Enlightenment in once threatened the existence of priests and theologians. And the general public, that is educated, exploited and bullied by intellectual men, learned to identify relativism with cultural decay (social)[40].

Key issue in his work is relativism. It is a complex, highly relevant issue for the understanding of his theory. Rationalists tend not to give credit to relativistic theories, once they contain more than one truth about an object, impossible to reach if they comply with the method properly. Popper says[41]

> While science is the search for truth, there will be critical and rational debate between competing theories and critical and rational discussion of revolutionary theory. This discussion will decide whether the new theory should (or not) be considered better than the old theory: i.e., whether or not be considered a step toward truth.

Feyerabend begins by stating that people are afraid of relativism, that it could lead to chaos. Moreover, he believes that few individuals are prepared to live with different traditions, with different truths from theirs. "For the vast majority - and that includes Christians, rationalists, liberals and a good number of Marxists - there is only one truth and it shall prevail"[42]. Thus, relativism would constitute a threat for accepting that truths coexist with same value.

Another key factor of relativism is anarchy. If each one lived according to what thinks, with each one's truth, no one else would fulfill laws, follow customs or respect the other: chaos would be established in society.

This thought can be illustrated by the movie about Giordano Bruno's life and work, a philosopher and scientist who dared to question the dominant tradition of his time: the Church and its dogmas. The Church had the same fears of rationalism that current individuals have of relativism: chaos.

It should be emphasized that what Church foresaw about the rationalism hasn't happened. The society was restructured under new bases. This new base avoided the chaos because rationalism is objective, it is universal, it is self-critical, autonomous, real and disciplined. The question that arises is whether these rational values are the ones to be followed or are the only ones that would avoid chaos.

Feyerabend does not accept the idea that relativism is to give the same rights to truth and falsehood. Traditions must be respected. Judge them is to put their values as correct instead of other possibilities. Rationalism, because of the mentioned features, believes it can judge certain traditions. It forgets, however, that itself is a tradition that may or may not be followed by the citizen.

Bringing the discussion to the epistemological field, relativism mainly criticizes the attempt of science to be a way of better understanding, even with the flaws it has already committed over the centuries. It also criticizes the way science tries to dominate authoritatively the discipline of knowledge, leaving no room for discussion on the effectiveness of other forms of knowledge[43].

As it turns out, such criticism did not emerge without any foundation. In fact, science and their rationality began to experience problems

[43] Paul Feyerabend asks: "What is so important in science? – what makes science better than the other forms of existence, that, consequently, use different patterns and obtain different results? What makes modern science better than the science of Aristotle or Hopi's Cosmology?" FEYERABEND, Paul. A ciência em uma sociedade livre. Tradução de Vera Joscelyne. during their development. The notion of universality and permanence of scientific discoveries have been replaced by the idea of temporariness[44]. Boaventura de Sousa Santos says, criticizing modernism and the dominant paradigm of that era, that science has come to be questioned due to two problems. The first one results of the decline of the concept of law, once it is considered as something provisional, probabilistic and approximate and, as consequence, the decline of causality, explained more by pragmatism than by ontological or methodological reasons, in favor of finalism. The result is the exchange of this notion of law by notions of system, structure, model and process. In such criticism fit up problems in Newton's classical conceptions of space and time, from the study of astrophysics by Einstein; the impossibility to observe or measure an object without interfering him from the study of microphysics by Heisenberg and Bohr; the conjecture of theorems of incompleteness and impossibility to find in certain circumstances, within a given formal system, proof of its consistency; undermining the rigor of mathematics, which becomes unfounded, as shown by Gödel; advances in knowledge of microphysics, chemistry and biology, for example, with Prigogine and the theory of dissipative structures and irreversibility of open systems, with Haken and synergistic, with Eigen and the hypercycle theory and the origin of life, with Maturana and Varela in the study of autopoiesis[45].

In the second category of problem, the social conditions of the crisis, Bonaventure points the loss of autonomy of science and of disinterested knowledge, with a consequent industrialization of science to the level of application and investigations, which eventually resulted, for illustrative purposes, the tragedies of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, where one can notice the huge gap established between science and morality. The effects are diverse, since the proletarianization of scientists in laboratories to the impossibility of having free access to the equipment, which puts the development of knowledge in the hands of who ends up [44] Temporariness is a result of the ideas of fallibilism, which, according to Karl Popper, is the assertion that scientific truth is not absolute or irrefutable, admitting its counterfeit. Science can remain as conjectures until be distorted. According to Popper, one cannot be sure that scientific theories are true. "Instead, we have good reasons to suspect even of the best of them, which, of course, adds to the countless other endless possibilities of catastrophe". POPPER, Karl. O problema da indução. owning the material conditions of scientific production, making it undesirable to a rationality that separate the progress of knowledge with the progress of morality.

As seen, the postmodern thought did not arise randomly, but rather as a challenge to all the problems science passes. The negative consequences that remaining as fruit of scientific development eventually end up stimulating critical postmodern thinkers[46].

Conclusion

One sought to understand how the ideals of modernity are unraveling. The universalism, rationalism, objectivism are replaced by new ways of thinking. The few questioned Cartesian subject is disfigured in postmodernity.

These changes are essential to the study of epistemology. As a philosophy of science, this should always be updated with the issues relating to knowledge, especially the logic, the subject and the object. In postmodernism, these concepts were modified, causing a revolution and uncertainty in contemporary epistemology.

A new subject arose: contradictory, with multiple identities and roles that sometimes oppose. The rational and coherent cartesian self - foundation of knowledge - finds objections, as Marx's and Freud's selves.

The eternal and immutable laws of positivism proved to have failures. The accumulation of knowledge, which was based on these laws, ie, the more eternal and immutable laws, the more knowledge one has, it was shown to be false. The knowledge shall be temporary and discontinuous.

The advance of modern science itself can be considered the beginning of its end. Theories such as Einstein's and Bachelard's show how subject's participation is crucial in the way of doing science. The knowledge starts to be built and not just extracted from reality.

As highlighted throughout this article, what was called the postmodern thought brought contributions to the epistemological area. The main contribution was the opening of discussions on how current science is performed, by making inquiries that eventually contribute to a better improvement of science. Relativism has its benefits. It allows a larger opening for discussion and enables science to view its mistakes. However, the extreme ideas of postmodernism cannot be sustained. In this work there were also some questions about the existence of a postmodern thought with its own characteristics . Postmodernism was a wave of thoughts that actually sought to criticize modern science without any universal proposal as acceptable solution. Exacerbated relativism is not believable even to those who defend it. However, as widely highlighted throughout the paper, such thought was responsible for making science abandon its authoritarian and unquestionable character, allowing and making room for other life forms than the scientific one, and dialoguing with them seeking solutions to the manhood problem. Indeed, it gave its contribution to the improvement of science, still in progress.

A new time is established, a transition between modernity and contemporaneity. The great challenge consists in establishing what constitute the new times. One knows about deconstructions, the end of certainties, the project that is collapsing. What should replace them is a hard work to define.

Post-positivist Philosophy of Law and a Theory of Judgment of Justice

Kant, Arendt and the contemporary debate

Maria Lucia de Paula Oliveira

Abstract: The post-positivist theory of law contains a moral concept of law, founded on an argumentative dimension. An interesting way to found a theory of just law in a pluralistic world, in constant change, is that which is based on the theory of reflecting judgment. A political theory founded on judgment is based on Kantian philosophy; it was developed by Hannah Arendt and has widely influenced the current debate, as an alternative theory in which the moral basis of law can be more sensible to human contexts; a universalistic theory more adequate in dealing with the tragic dimension of human life. A theory of justice as judgment uses the concept of reflecting judgment and enlarged thought as the main concepts. A theory like this considers as a starting point the singular judgments of justice that each person makes. The background, therefore, isn´t a rational foundation of principles, but the capacity of judgment of rational beings. A post-positivist theory of law, based on judgment, is a critique of the positivist legal theory, but presents itself as an alternative to an idealistic theory of law.

Keywords: Immanuel Kant. Judgment. Justice.

Historical texts on philosophy of law have, for a long while, shown an important dichotomy of natural law and legal positivism. For the greater part of western history, since Greek philosophy, thoughts concerning law have tried to find supra-positive groundwork above the law in practice - established by men in a specific historical moment – that could somehow subordinate it, thereof originating the categories of "natural right" or "natural law". The fundamental thesis of natural law theory was the supra-positive legal existence and the subordination one way or another of positive law to natural law. Nevertheless, the relation natural law - positive law has recently lost its determinate role in the theory of law, turning out to be a "weak dichotomy"[1]. This weakening dichotomy would derive from the perception of the relativity of positive law – always and each day more mutable and circumstantial - and the lost of intrinsic validity, since positive law gets the support from formal validity and social efficiency, which weakens the argument of moral validity of legal principle.[2]

Contemporary philosophy of law face the weakening of this dichotomy which, not so long ago, was still central in the history of philosophy of law. The studies of theory of justice have been brought up in that soil where legal positivist criticism has to defend itself from new paradigms, beyond that of natural law theory. The revival of these studies did not mean a move backwards to any theory of natural law, in which a specific well-being or value is identified to transcendent and, therefore, untouchable. The contemporary theory of justice emerges infiltrated by the paradigm of intersubjectivity and of communication.

The term "post-positivism" has recently been chosen to name a new phase of the theory of law whose intention was to rethink the groundwork of legal science as well as the mechanism of the jurist's reasoning in daily practice[3]. As Antonio Cavalcanti Maia reminds us (in Albert Calsamiglia´s lessons), the first important thesis to identify post-positivism has to do with the recognition of elements distinct from social facts as normative material capable of determining the social behavior - principles, of moral grounds, which function as reasons for decision. Another thesis that differs positivist theories from post-positivist ones has to do with the separation of moral, politics and law. For post-positivist theories, an absolute separation of law and moral would not make sense. Instead, there is an articulation between them, without loss of each one´s own specificity. The pos-positivist theory, be it said, would also recognize the theoretical contributions given by the philosophers affiliated to legal positivism (referring, for instance, to the theory of legal order), but would try to accept the influence of morals in law – especially public law – in contemporary democracies. Close to post-positivism there is neo-constitutionalism, which tries to explain, particularly, the constitutional role changes in nations of constitutional tradition (Italy, Spain, South America), that has led to a need in revising the terms with which legal theory is thought, with the intention to explain a moral conception of law, derived from the theory of principles and legal argumentation.

That which is in common between post-positivist authors, concerning the theory of justice in particular, would be the starting point of their analysis: the language. This new moment of legal theory stands out new challenges to the theory of justice. The first of them refers to its own subsistence: if ethics proceeds itself, not existing transcendent values to social practices, how could we continue talking about justice nowadays? We could possibly point out to an answer that has to do with the viewpoint of the judgment of justice. The relevant question concerning the relation between law and moral is that there is a capacity to moral judgment, which refers to other people and organizations in general, that implies the consideration of the other. If it cannot be said that every action or organization reputed to be unfair is illegitimate, there is a connection between singular judgments of injustice and a political legitimacy. Political organizations in a democratic system assents its legitimacy in public expressing processes named "people´s will"- be them electoral contests, public opinion survey, manifestations of organized civil society, among others. Also, the so called "Will of the Minority" must be preserved to greater or minor degrees by means of organized society movements and instances of judicial actions. Organizations which do not minimally take into consideration the distribution of welfare and social roles to all who are under their jurisdiction, would wound singular judgments of justice.

Another problem, with clear repercussion in the philosophy of law, is the discussion around the "project of modernity", that would have been left incomplete[4]. Man´s emancipation through the freedom of thought, the different kinds of knowledge constituted from the paradigm of man itself (no more God or the cosmos) are marks of the modernity. Foucault´s formula, always mentioned when explaining modernity in philosophy has the following words: "Modern philosophy is the philosophy that tries to respond to the question that so imprudently has been done for centuries: Was ist Alfklärung?"[5] Another characteristic of modernity is the separation of the domains of science, moral and art, and the separation of these kinds of knowledge from the issues of faith, as reminded by Habermas. But that project remains incomplete (to some people) or interrupted by the urgency of the new realities (to post-modernism). The judgment view of justice does not reject the so called "project of the modernity", but it understands that it must be rethought. Therefore, the separation, for instance, between theory of knowledge, theory of moral and theory of aesthetics must be considered relatively without producing an "aesthetic moral" or a reduction of the normative nature of a theory of moral. This way, we would not only be at a resumption of the mentioned "project of modernity", but also at a "rethinking", that means a reading over modernity with new lenses. In this diapason, the non orthodox proximity between aesthetic judgment and political judgment is only possible with a revision, in which the distinctions and separations made in modern philosophy thereafter Kant are not to be taken literally. It obviously does not mean to confuse aesthetics and political theory, but to get hold of the philosophical tradition in a creative and free way, sufficiently enough to shine new light on the questions of political justice or of aesthetics. This way of dealing with what is modern, to rethink it, has, on the other hand, everything to do with Arendt´s modernity and it can be, as Jean-Marc Ferry states, more "modern" than Habermas's, for instance.[6] Being "modern" today means to do as Arendt does: to argue about how to face the rupture oneself from tradition; how to restructure community sense; how to radically rethink history and politics in the name of liberty and equality. It could be a "radical critique to the modern spirit", without intending to supplement or substitute it.

On the other hand, it´s possible to say that the revival of the theory of justice in the late XXth century has as a background the so called "pragmatic-linguistics turnaround" of philosophy. The paradigm change in philosophy of consciousness (grounded on the subject who knows) to the philosophy of language, which considers the intersubjective experience, one mediated by language (the pragmatic one, caring for the usages of language), might be the turning point that made it possible to revive the debate on the Theory of Justice. André Berten and Jacques Lenoble called attention to the fact that the contemporary debate on philosophy of law, political philosophy and philosophy of language had expanded and taken new directions. From the birth of democratic modernity, whose bound-marks actually are the Liberal Revolutions and the philosophy of Kant, modernity gets into an unprecedented crises; therefore, the return to its origins. To those authors, the actual political crises (an issue on the relation of liberty to equality) and the legal crises (identified with the crises on judicial power) which are implicitly understood in the crises of the providential State are signs of a deficiency in the philosophical groundwork based on what our democratic philosophy was thought.[7] Therefore, there is a claim to rethink the "project of modernity"[8], in which the idea of justice is resumed and the underlying need of a moral validity to law, without falling to, one side - the idealism, or an extremely abstract generalization; and, on the other side, the relativism or cynicism of values. This rethinking of the "project of modernity", evidently produces a revision of categories and their articulation, as they were in the philosophical modernity. This way, strict distinctions of thoughts, as the one made between aesthetics and moral are reviewed. Our intention is to keep pace with this actual moment of legal Philosophy, one that could be well summarized in the words of Alessandro Ferrara:

> While Kant himself would have been horrified by the linkage of justice and aesthetics, it is not unreasonable to claim that, under conditions quite different from those under which he lived his intellectual life, in the spirit with which we turn to aesthetics, some seeds survive of the spirit of modest and willingness to learn - with which Kant looked at the accomplishments of modern physics. He sought in Newtonian Physics, that nexus of certainty and experience that pre-modern metaphysics was unable to generate and placed that nexus, reconstructed as theory of the knowing subject, at the centre of his transcendental philosophy. After the linguistic turn, we seek in in aesthetics that nexus of universality and radical pluralism that modern thought in all of its variants seems unable do generate.[9] of the turnaround of the pragmatic linguistics. We might have thereafter, an important interlocutor in the philosophical tradition like Immanuel Kant himself, who gave to modern philosophy its most sophisticated formula and critics. Some questions were resumed and reinterpreted by contemporary theory of justice, and these questions, summarize how the concept of Justice has been discussed throughout history.

The judgment view of justice reverberate in the contemporary philosophy, first of all, as A. Berten and J. Lenoble demonstrate it, for anticipating the substitution of the subjective paradigm by the intersubjective one, concerning moral and legal judgments (judge that which is correct or that which is just in a particular case). Actually, the importance of the theory of judgment has taken in the debate about justice today drives to another important role, that is, to counterbalance universalistic theories by the means of a criterion which, without denying the importance of abstract reasoning, permits to include in the political debate the differences that exist among people, as a relevant fact.

We dare suggest that the great importance of the theory of judgment and that of the underlying discussion on the act of judging is to reinforce the emotional component present in human action, many times totally ignored by the tradition of moral or legal philosophy. The importance of that which is personal, subjective in the judging does not mean or does not want to be translated into a relativism or a turn-back to idealism, in which the search for the ideal and the just is made in a world different from that in which humanity lives. This world in which men live is a world where there is terrorism, misery, violence and unstoppable consumption. If we are to and can have hope, this hope would rise up from the capacity of human freedom and from the capacity that man has to always create something new, to be born again.

It is after the theory of judgment of Immanuel Kant and its interpretation by Hannah Arendt, that a theory of the judgment of justice is proposed. It is a proposed alternative consonant to a post-positivist theory. It is with the Critique of the Power of Judgment that the power of judgment becomes an object of central concern to Kant. The imagination also becomes relevant and turns to be not only reproducer, but also producer, as reminded by Hannah Arendt. That imagination produces concepts of which it is not possible to have knowledge of. There is an activity with "concepts" that does not produce knowledge: it is the aesthetic judgment.

Some important differences are established by Kant in the Critique of the Power of Judgment. Therefore, the judgment of beauty would be distinct from the judgment of agreeable, as well as from the judgment of good (or yet, the useful). In relation to the judgment of agreeable, it is always particular and it does not intend the universalization: when something pleases me, I do not intend it to please everybody. The judgment of beauty is singular, but intends the universalization (for it is from the feelings of pleasure or unpleasure that there is a free play of imagination and understanding, not being submitted to any principle a priori), while the judgment of agreeable is exclusively private. Instead, the moral good (or the useful), for being a judgment interested in the existence of the object, it does not constitute a disinterested representation; reason why, for Kant, moral interest or utility make it impossible for these judgments to be aesthetic judgments. By those distinctions, some of the most important distinctive aspects of the judgment of taste are introduced. The judgment of taste is singular, because it is a reflective judgment. The singularity of the judgment of taste is associated to its own nature of reflective judgment. Moreover, to the pure judgment of taste it is indispensable not to be interested in the existence of the object, be that an interest of knowledge or of morality or of utility of the object. The lack of interest underlying the judgment of taste does not mean an indifference or a contempt for what it is being judged, but that for the aesthetics judgment there is supposed to be a distance of the subject in relation to the object being judged: something is not judged beautiful or sublime, once concerned with its utility, with its measures or its moral correction. For the moral judgment, the complacence of the object must lack interest. Actually, the singularity of aesthetic judgment is the best foreshadowing of the called reflective judgment. A theory of the judgment of justice intends exactly that the judgment of justice can be view as political one: these judgments would bring rationality, but that rationality does not elide the importance of feelings (or emotions), which are essential to the process of judgment. It must be given the adequate importance to emotions or to feelings in man´s activity. There is no way to set apart the rational nature from the emotional nature and reduce the second to natural inclinations to be overcome, as certain interpreters of Kant´s moral philosophy wish to. Moreover, the singularity of the judgment of taste does not exclude the plea for universalization. It is true that the eventual universalization of the judgment in this case is the hope of the one who pronounces it, more than the truth assented on validity based on aprioristic principles. But the intersubjective validity that is founded, even if less "cogent", comes from the effort of the one who judges to use the "communal sense", the "thinking in the position of everyone else". The hope enclosed in the judgment of taste in relation to its universalization derives exactly from this appeal to the "communal sense". It is not, therefore, an utopia or a dream of the one who pronounces the judgment, but a hope based on a communicative activity with the others (how would it be possible to think in the place of the other, if not through the process of communication - the "usage of public reason", as Kant used to say). A theory of justice as a judgment would guide the validity of the judgments of justice by a very similar criterion: that which is judged to be just, it is just for the one who judges; but the one who judges intends it to be for all, and that intention comes from the relationship of the one who judges with other men.

Among Aesthetics judgments, there are, for Kant, the judgment of beauty and the judgment of the sublime. The difference between these two judgments is that the beauty attracts by form, while the sublime attracts by the unrestrainedness of the same object. This lack of restrain makes reason violently powerful over imagination. The judgment of sublime in kantian philosophical system would be closer to the moral experience, because the feeling of the sublime amplifies experience in such a way that it sends man to the practical domain, the super-sensible. The experience of man´s own limits, for example, in comparison to the size or the complexity of the world would be experiences which provoked on man the power towards moral questions. But beauty is also a symbol of good for Kant, since many times, the moral idea is symbolized through something beautiful. The beautiful object is many times a good object: it is here presented the importance of "symbolic representation" to practical philosophy. This aspect of Kant´s thought is resumed today in a more general context of his philosophy, to show the importance of those symbols (empirical experiences of supra-sensible ideas, a way to make the supra-sensible world present in the world of Nature), as explained, for example, by Heiner Bielefeldt.[10]

The notion of sensus communis is of great importance. It implies to "think in the position of everyone else", or to expand the thought. The maxims of the understanding would be three: "to think for oneself", "to think in accord with oneself" and "to think in the position of everyone else". The man who keeps thinking by himself becomes free from prejudice and superstition. A consequent thought supposes a self vigilant watching that man does, when examining inside himself, whereas "enlarged thought" supposes an abstraction of private conditions, with a thoughtful thinking of the judgment from a universal viewpoint. Arendt foresees in such conception one of the most relevant position in the Critique of the Power of Judgment.

It is worthwhile to mention that there are two ways to approach the contribution of the Third Critique to a theory of justice. There is a branch which focuses mainly on the notion of reflective judgment, of which aesthetic judgment is one of the clearest examples. The reflective judgment, in opposition to the determinate judgment, is a "power of thinking the universal as contained in the particular". In the case of the reflective judgment, there would be particular empirical laws, in relation to that which is left undetermined by the universal laws that should be admitted "as if" they could be considered a unit. In the notion of reflective judgment there would be a judgment that is not made from de principals or universal laws: it is according to this conception that Alessandro Ferrara, for example, considers relevant to think a theory of justice "without principles"; one that to be universal does not need to be supported by universal principles. The recall to aesthetic judgment happens exactly because it is the best expression of a reflective judgment. Arendt, though, wants more than that: she proposes a proximity between political judgment and aesthetic judgment, since they take place in a similar form of judgment.

One cannot deny the contribution of Hannah Arendt in calling attention to the importance of the Critique of Power of t Judgment to the political philosophy. One of Kant´s ideas which particularly of Arendt´s interest is the "unsociable sociability" of men: the idea that men should live together, despite all the difficulties brought up with this living. The relationship between philosophy and Politics is one of the themes evidently important to a Political Philosophy. Arendt intends to oppose the tradition which places Philosophy in a privileged position in relation to Politics. In that tradition there would be Plato, Aristotle, Spinoza and even Hobbes, to her evaluation. Concerning Kant, his philosophy would be paradoxal. From one side, kantian melancholy, expressed in the difficulty and dislikes of human life, would demonstrate what could be an "unnoticed proximity" with the Greeks. An overcome of that melancholic disposition in the context of kantian philosophy would take place, at first, through the notion of progress in History - a non individual one, but of the kind (the historical theses of teleology, to which Arendt particularly does not cultivate any admiration). At second place, a mitigation of the mentioned kantian melancholy is grounded on the moral dignity of man as a moral being, which is an end in itself. The freedom of a man, who lives in the world with other talented men with common sense, would be exactly the object of the first part of the Critique of the Power of Judgment. Kant´s position concerning the relationship between philosophy and politics could be inserted in a tradition different from that which defends the superiority of philosophy over politics; and this evidently is of Arendt´s interest.

Against Plato, for instance, true knowledge for Kant supposes sensibility, as he shows in the Critique of Pure Reason. Furthermore, the evaluation of the morality of actions is not exclusive to erudite philosophers, as he presents in his main works in moral philosophy, as the Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals. To him, erudition or formal education, far from facilitating, can complicate the evaluation of the morality of the actions. Philosophy, to Kant, should not be an activity addressed to the elected ones – a privileged minority, but must be (or become) accessible to all. Therefore, the political philosophy of Kant, different from others, does not intend to give principles, based on which, men could organize its life in community; but he intends to investigate the reasons which drive men to get associated and how this association can be made perfect, based on the same given reasons. The core notion to this purpose would be the "public use of reason", where the political freedom would be grounded, according to the author of What is the Enlightenment? The freedom of communication would imply not only communicability between men, but also the willingness to listen and to be listened to. Not only does it mean impartiality in relation to other men, but "enlarged thought" would suppose to be among other men in order to judge: there cannot be a judgment from a privileged viewpoint, from a higher level. It would be, in the beautiful words of Arendt, "to train its own imagination to go visiting". That "enlarged thought" thus, it must be said, would not embrace an extended empathy, by means of which we would want to put ourselves in the place of the others, that is, a passive reception of the thought of the other.

In the context of the Lessons on Political Philosophy of Kant, which summarizes Hannah Arendt lessons on the importance of the theory of judgment of Kant to the political philosophy, we can find the resumption to an analogy from the viewpoint of the spectator. The "citizen of the world" - a viewpoint on which the cosmopolitism of the world was founded, would actually be the spectator of the world. This position is well illustrated in the judgment Kant makes of French Revolution - Arendt reminds us. She mentions Kant's position resistant to the revolutions, to the right of rebellion or the war. But, in relation to these issues, the same Kant expresses himself in a different way when analyzing them through the eyes of the spectator, who judges not morally, but from the viewpoint of the senses underlying the historical process going on. It is necessary, though, in a parallel between the war and the revolution, to establish a distinction: while in the first, Kant can see the sublimity (especially considering the progress that may follow up), in the second case, Kant has a much nicer position, even being able to show admiration for what was going on with French Revolution.

The spectator is always a singular man, and the contemplation is a solitary activity. But, the contemplative activity does not elide the need for publicity, which is inherent to politics both for Kant and Arendt. Turning to Kant´s aesthetic judgment, Arendt resumes his distinction between the genius and the taste, in which she reinforces Kant´s position in favor of the preeminence of the taste over the genius: "The public domain is made of critics and spectators, not of actors and creators." And the power of judging what is right or wrong belongs to the common sense, grounded on the judgment of taste. The communicability of the judgments of taste would assent on imagination, which, by means of reasoning, makes present that what was absent. Therefore, to well judge it is necessary to keep distance: the one who is in the middle of a revolutionary process, for instance, would not be in condition to well judge. The criterion is then a kind of communicability or publicity that brings up a sense common to all.

How then, from the singularity of the spectator´s judgment can one reach the "mysterious" generalization? One of the answers would be in the idea of an original agreement of human kind, that is, the notion of Humanity. The things without finality would be exactly the aesthetic objects and man himself; therefore, there is a confluence of the theory of reflecting judgment also towards the judgment of human actions; towards the political judgment. Another relevant notion would be the one of exemplary validity, constant in the third Critique. The proceeding is to take something judged to be the best possible and make it a model of how things should be. The power of the model (example) comes from its effective existence in the world and its durability, but also its temporality (I can find a better model in some time). Therefrom the "the power of the example", there could be a exemplary universalism, which does not come from a universal principle, but from the contingence of singular judgment concerning what is just that, indeed, suppose a "thinking in the position of everyone´s else", that is, an "enlarged thought'.

The judgment of justice, which is singular, supposes a feeling of justice or injustice in face of something. As a matter of fact, the singularity of the judgment of justice (in the pattern of the judgment of taste, which is reflexive) is not thus an obstacle to the hope or intention for a universalization. That, because when judging something to be just, this is done under the consideration that all the other people could judge it to be just too ("common sense" or "communitarian sense").

Besides it, the viewpoint of the judgment approaches human capacity to think (which is not an appanage of the philosophers, as both Kant and Arendt teaches us) to politics. The judgment of justice supposes the consideration of the common history of everybody involved in the "search for a destiny". This "search for a destiny" does not mean a predetermination of human attitudes, but a search - by man - for a sense to his actions and, this way, the judgment of justice is much more than an overwhelming feeling.

As Alessandro Ferrara well reminds it, the importance of Kant to the XXIst century has to do with his "philosophical attitude": "a certain way to do philosophy in the age of interregnum", in which philosophical certitudes faded away: Kant's reaction was to examine the internal operations and the philosophical presumptions of a practice: the natural Newtonian Science; and therefrom sets his oppositions to metaphysical theories[11]. Today, the practices that would be meaningful models to the conciliation between universalism and pluralism are connected exactly to the aesthetics´ field[12]. The congruence of a piece of art or, as Ferrara proposes, a political identity, cannot be translated into a vocabulary or conceptual scheme, without it being an obstacle to the universality of the judgment. The question about the universality of the judgment obtains a response, to a certain point, non-cognitive and non-naturalist, along the line proposed by Kant. It assents on the circumstances that "independently of the culture we inhabit, and just by virtue of simply existing, in the way humans exist, with a body, a mind, a consciousness of the self and of its finiteness – we all have an intuitive sense of what it means to enhance and further, or to constrain and stifle, our life."[13] The judgment inspires a exemplary action, which is able to have an influence on us, guiding us, not by a schemata, with principles or rules to follow, but with symbols, that is, self-posed instances of congruence, able to educate the discernment by means of exposition to selective instances of a "feeling of a furtherance of our life" (a very fascinating kantian concept, which means "that life must involve not only the capacity to act, but also the consciousness of being acted upon"[14]). A theory of justice that searches universality in such a pluralistic world is much better formulated from the notion of reflecting judgment. Such universalism, though, is different from the universalism based on generalizing principals, which predominate in some political, moral and legal theories.

The theory of justice in the viewpoint of the judgment will drink in these sources to state the possibility of a theory of justice that notices the necessity of the resumption to specific political and historical contexts, but which does not stop trying to drink in the fountain sources of the "project of modernity", betting on the capacity of man (and on his hope) to try and have a world less unfair and under a universalist ethics. The post-positivist theory of law - in which the communicative and argumentative dimensions are so present - can be better understood from the viewpoint of the theory of judgment. As Seyla Benhabib well states it, "There is an essential link between civil education with public participation and the moral quality of the enlarged thought. The enlarged thought, which makes us morally think under the viewpoint of all the others, politically demands a creation of organizations and practices through which, by self-rights, the voice and the perspective of the others - many times unknown to us - can be expressed"[15].

Human Rights between tolerance and hospitality
An essay from the though of Jacques Derrida

Gustavo Oliveira de Lima Pereira[1]

Abstract: This article aims to problematize the philosophical implications that the categories of "tolerance" and "hospitality" may represent grounds for Human Rights in cosmopolitan. At first, attempts to contextualize the interplay between the concept of "tolerance" and "Consensus" as remnants of Enlightenment rationality. It will be explore the idea of "unconditional hospitality" from the "democracy to come" by Jacques Derrida's thought, as one overcome legal barriers that define the traditional foundation of human rights and as a alternative to radical enough construction of a new sense of ethics for international relational plan, beyond the political and beyond the law.

Keywords: Tolerance, hospitality, democracy to come.

1. Introduction

The strange strategy of this article, without a pre-determined purpose or just one purpose on the verge of passivity, is to investigate the collision course that weaves together the categories of "tolerance" and "hospitality" in the tense game of chess involving the ethical-political constructions of the West.

Between the "consensus" and "tolerance", underlies the decisive category for understanding of his merits and also his exhaustion: "freedom". Is by way of understanding of freedom that leaning the tension between the categories suggested. Is the firm ground and quicksand on the ground of this philosophical game.

What moves us in the confrontation of the theme will be the writings of Jacques Derrida, accompanied all the time by your present/absence; that is sometimes cited, other excited. But before starting on the author's thinking, it takes back a little more. The essential point to be explored will be the contrast of the thought of Jacques Derrida hospitality with the consensus, developed by ethical tradition.

I – An ethic beyond politics and beyond the law: hospitality against the tolerance in Jacques Derrida

To Derrida and his the philosophy of hospitality, the search for a consensus, in fact, disrupts the intercultural relationship. From the meeting with a diverse culture emphasizes the search for consensus, even invested in a heartfelt argument, just driving me in the pursuit of equality and not give space to the difference. At most tolerate the difference. The consensus, in this case, germinates in its relational dimension tolerance, circumstance that philosophers of consensus, like Habermas, does not deny. The consensus transits between upon itself ideas contratualists establishing boundary fences on their interrelationship. As a result, we can affirm that the difference, at first glance, shocks. Traumatizes the expectations of all. The open hand of Egomania, on the experience of infinity ethical, enables the date on which the difference can coexist. The meeting takes place, in this sphere of relationship, regardless of consensus, as well as independent of reciprocity.

The consensus, in any democracy, or experience in a sketch of democracy, as a coming, works as an apparatus of procedural legitimacy. Attempts to organize and systematize the social relationships, but never takes the place of singular recognition of difference. The consensus, by the argument proposed here, is heading for a kind of unattainable fantasy or hit greatly reduced, since what is realizes in the field of human relationships are the social rules and discursive rules (impregnated with overcoming strategies on the other) that enclose a discussion. Because the foundations of a society are not consensual.

Habermas's theory of communicative action, seen also as an attempt to solve the ethical barrier by means of tolerance and consensus, brings the possibility of a Dialogic construction of people standing of symmetry of emancipation. There is a dimension of circularity that removes that dialogue which does not present the minimum conditions for dialogue. Who is outside the initial game of the communicative sphere tends to remain not inserted by the logic of construction of ethics of speech. Is vetoed those who do not adhere to the contract that visualises reciprocity. This would be the conception of what is meant by "central fallacy of the ethics of speech" (SOUZA, 1996. -123 120 p), since this doesn't need that enters the earlier communication. In practical terms, "If the skeptic enters somehow at argumentative discourse, with the cynical that dominates in the final analysis the possibilities for establishment of the speech, before and outside of it, presents logical and ontological grandfathering" (SOUZA, 1996. p. 120). In this context, criticism of the ethics of speech bears a sufficiently critical dimension to establish ethical meeting par excellence, because only a philosophical construct that proposes to subvert the limits of intelligibility Western may be able to remove the political thought of enlightenment ideals and ties from the advance in the preparation of a new sense of respect, from the experience of a culture of singularities.

The communicative reason, to integrate the other, assumes something that comes before, which here we be, his own receipt of another, by unconditional hospitality. There's only communicative action with someone if that somebody is understood as others (independent and prior to any speech Act)-exactly as someone who may not agree with me and that can remain not agreeing. More than that: it may not be willing to acknowledge how symmetrical the communicative game. Can shake the pre-originárias structures of communication.

But to understand what Jacques Derrida conceives as displacement of ontological plan for ethical plan, despite their resistance to the use of this term, we should explore how their thinking provides the break with the ideology of "tolerance" and freedom from the solitary focus of tension that exposes its limitations.

The design of agreement, of "tolerance"; to tolerate each other, to establish a good contract connivance with each other, meaning, no doubt, an achievement of humanity. But this is the exact point that we discuss in this text: for more than the conception of "tolerance" is a significant achievement, this does not mean that it constitutes in rational product in such a way over that don't get the deconstruction, because it still remains the desire for a rationale beyond the contractual relational dream, originating in the enlightenment. In fact, apart from the whole idea of law or politics and beyond the idea of State because "his own deconstruction is intertwined with the re-politicization as another political concept" (BERNARDO, 2005, p. 174).

My point is: the philosophical enlightenment construction of the idea of "tolerance" is currently the limit concept in terms of Western political theory. The idea of tolerance cannot be seen as the panacea or the decisive basis for the prism of violence, strife and war, which still leaning in the world. Just tolerate that, in initial headquarters, don't tolerate it. So when I got the last word still tolerate and decide if I'm merciful with the difference that brings discomfort. A judge in the Court of appeal. To tolerate each other assume a level of hierarchy. I'm still Lord of reason and the other to what model my cognitive representation leads. -Prevent him from being another. Torn apart what primarily sets up the possibility of the meeting.

Tolerance thus translates as the "reason for the stronger", i.e. is thought, according to Derrida's insinuations, as a concept still on the hillside of the logocentrism articulated by the West, anxious for the presence, for originality, for the light and a vision. Hospitality already presupposes the multiplicity of origin, as Franz Rosenzweig does, and renunciation (or abandonment) of claim to find the starting point. The original point.

II - The law of hospitality and the laws of hospitality in Jacques Derrida

The law of hospitality claims and represents this disclaimer. Derrida translates the law of hospitality as an unconditional and unlimited law, as offering the home who comes out, abroad of subjectivity. More than that; the law of hospitality offers itself, its own self, "without asking him or his name or return, or fill the minimal condition" (DERRIDA, 2003. p. 69). The law of hospitality is in counterpoint to the laws of hospitality, which address the rights and duties always conditioned and conditionals, the way they treat the treaties and conventions in relations between Nations. The conditional mode view hospitality dates back the whole tradition of Western culture, since its inception, Greek and Roman Antiquities of every law and Hegel's philosophy of right up.

Already the law of hospitality focuses on thinking beyond political politician, from a new internationalism; from a reinvented cosmopolitanism. A cosmopolitanism beyond political cosmopolitanism thought by enlightenment ideals, because this cosmopolitanism is conditioned by the sovereignty of the State. Is structured by the legal-political boundaries (BERNARDO, 2002, p. 437). And this legal cosmopolitanism, guided by the laws of the conditional hospitality, proved and proves to be incapable of responding to the numerous international conflicts involving human beings these days.

The idea of tolerance presupposes a detachment and a cultural barrier that prevents the contact between different cultures; Although it is impossible to think any culture without relation with the other, since no custom originates from solitary. The criticism extends here also the idea conceived "multiculturalism" that despite their goodwill, it remains still in the registry of social contract, because metaphysical assumes the mere peaceful co-existence of cultures or cultural identities in a space of mutual tolerance. Is, according to Fernanda Bernardo, a kind of consensus "reliever or the confident belief (and arrogant!) of a given "identity" or "socio-cultural community" that, generously, opens the other ". In multicultural agreement, there is no room for the shadow (or the "haunting") of actual miscegenation. For the experience of thinking about the question of "foreigner".

Thus, the idea of tolerance, heritage of the enlightenment thought and one of the key concepts of the theoretical construction of the idea of globalization, is still far from being set up as what we understand, in cosmopolitan chain, be the effective reception of the philosophy of hospitality, because that is always on the side of the stronger. "Is a trademark of sovereignty, which speaks to the other on the high position of power, I'm leaving you there, you're not unacceptable, I'm leaving a place in my home, but don't forget that this is my home ..." (DERRIDA, 2003, p. 137).

Tolerance, so for Derrida, is seen as the boundary zone between the law and the laws of hospitality. Is the game of reason alone. Indeed, tolerance becomes a cautious action, enforced; a conditional hospitality on obedience to rules and taxes (DERRIDA, 2003). This conditional hospitality, Derrida contrasts with what he called "pure and unconditional hospitality"-a manifestation of madness and true transgression of the logic of the contract, assuming receipt of otherness; where the doors open for someone who is not expected nor asked for the "absolutely alien to aimlessly or without a country, for the" unpredictable, in short, totally other "(DERRIDA, 2003, p. 137). But the drama translates to this status of hospitality being impossible to legislate or organize institutionally; Although only from that concept is possible if think legally and politically. The possibility of thinking the hospitality is what allows understanding the world of cosmopolitan way.

Let´s see what´s is a Derrida´s point of view (2003, p. 137):

> Without this idea of pure hospitality (...) we wouldn't have even the idea of another, the otherness of the other, i.e. someone who > comes into our lives without having been invited (...) the unconditional hospitality, which is not even legal yet policy is political and legal condition. Precisely for these reasons, I'm not even sure that is unethical, as it does not come to rely on a decision. But what would be the "ethics" without hospitality?

By inciting caused by author, not afraid to say that unconditional hospitality transcends to well beyond the border of the social contract. In fact, breaks down by establishing a new approach of structuring of rationality that does not conform to standards or territorial and political constraints. The possibility of hospitality, as proposed by Derrida, in fact, assumes his own rupture with the solipsistic ideals of freedom, translated by the conception of tolerance.

This is a hospitality of visitation and inviting hospitality. A host who arrives unexpectedly to my house. Remove me from the comfort of my home ontological. A hospitality that reinvents the language and lies in the order pre-moral and even pre-human (BERNARDO, 2005, p. 196).

Conclusion

The entire argument here exposed do not intend destroy the procedimentalism or the liberal democracy, experienced by most Western countries. The review recognises their importance, however denounces their inadequacy. The Democracy for coming and the law of hospitality, in derridian sense, claim the return to the Foundation of democracy, like the crazy by him who assume interrogates himself in a space beyond the democratic, in these terms.

It may seem a claim to the impossible. And Derrida makes it clear that is! But impossible in the sense of a consecration or some universal procedural proposal or for some kind of purism relational ethics. However, it is in perpetual and endless hospitality development without dogmas, without law, without ordering the other or at least your name, - a relationship outside of the rules of procedure is -, that it will be possible to increase the levels of recognition of uniqueness, under procedural and formal. In other words: the magnification of sense of cosmopolitanism is insufficient for via international treaties, constitutions, tolerance among peoples or consensual speech spaces.

The recognition of the law of hospitality may go against the laws of hospitality. Leave your trail. Your shadow. Can haunt your will and the will of solitary and contractual freedom that tolerant liberalism bequeathed us.

Such haunting is only possible in a minimum space of democracy. There's only deconstruction where there is democracy. There's only room for questioning the claim by unconditional and come from a perfect democracy in imperfection of democracies of here and now.

Democracy and Deliberation

Rubens Becak[1]

Abstract: Day to day we are faced with the constant use of the term democracy, a concept which put as a natural system has been perceived like an obviousness in the last two centuries or two centuries and a half. It's conducted us to a misperceiving that in slow evolution became a non-attacked political postulated.
In this path, with the absolutization of the idea and the ideal the real investigation of the correspondence of legitimacy between the representatives and the represented have been lost. It has been said whether that, on one hand the traditional forms of political representation survives, on the other hand its legitimacy has constantly decreased and its effectiveness declined. In this way, the use of the so called "deliberative democracy" has increased substantially. Among the various possibilities in the search for the filling of the space of the legitimacy left opened, many possibilities have been developed and worked on, such as the redesigning of the representation through the electoral process or partidary improvement, proposals for boosting the digital use, the adoption of "digital" democratic model and many others. Without ignoring the value, appropriateness and timeliness of countless strands of discussion of the problem, we prefer to situate it in the field of today's discussion(s) proposal(s) of deliberative democracy, as an increase in what we have for "democratic optimization".

Keywords: Democracy; Legitimacy; Deliberation.

Introduction

This paper, assuming as truthful the rather common assessment in the work criticizing democracy of the need for optimization thereof, does not intend to enter the realms of discussion of the advantages that verify that.

Nor does it intend to discuss the advantages of this form of exercise of power over other regimes, which might be a prerogative of Political Science.

No. Addressing it in a different way, we start from the assumption of excellence thereof, and the unfeasibility and implausibility of its alteration as the ideal system.

In spite of being a relatively recent phenomenon, democracy seems to have achieved a "historical victory over alternative forms of governance," even when giving rise to a series of different types. [2]

The existence of democracy and its glorification as a postulate are sometimes seen as obvious phenomena. Ross Harrison says that "Democracy surrounds us like tables and chairs and the air we breathe, normally totally taken for granted."[3]

However, if democracy is this "obvious", this "natural" system that is expected to be found in the political environment, why then this "strange" sensation when, for example, we find ourselves face to face with Lincoln's historical phrase that concisely defined it as "a government of the people, by the people, for the people?"[4]

The considerations on each of the assurances contained therein certainly give rise to a great deal of questioning, if not contradictions in our cores.

Among critics, some are so categorical that their manifestations are on the verge of acidity: "Contemporaneous democracies seek for a new spirit, new grounds. The classic forms of political representation survive; however, their legitimacy diminishes and their effectiveness declines. The power of the representative institutions is corroded all over, its authority fallen and its capacity of imposing distinct solutions strongly eroded."[5]

By the way, a portion of the questioning tends towards the fact of knowing whether we have ever been in the presence of democracy in modern times.

Jacques Maritain used to say: "The tragedy of modern democracies is that they haven't managed to realize democracy yet."[6] Wouldn't it be "essentially the dream of some 18th century philosophers that was mistakenly transcribed into the western political structures of the 19th century by a class that found therein the synthesis between a very vague idealism and a very accurate interest?"[7]

On the other hand, despite its vicissitudes and notably thanks to the huge diffusion the system experienced worldwide, the critics we are interested in are those that try to debate the possibility of improving it, nearing the intended collective ideal.

It is exactly at this point that a series of authors, producing a great deal of work along the past few years, supports the adoption of the so-called "deliberative democracy."

Extending the debate

As we have previously said, for an important part of the doctrine, we are already experiencing participatory democracy.[8]

In Afonso da Silva's opinion, representative democracy,[9] as the "system of parties, the universal suffrage, and the proportional representation" has become concrete and, has given rise to the "idea of participation."

Even if materialized in the act of voting, participation is expressed. Now, it is a matter of extending it beyond the suffrage, in what is called "participatory principle."[10]

Following this line of thought, the symbiosis of the instruments to check the collective will with representative democracy, the "semi-direct democracy," already constitutes a manifestation of participatory democracy.

In its interpretation, it is the referendum[11] that has a "predominant"[12] role, because, if we exclude the popular initiative, all the instruments posses "characteristics of referendum."

That is why some use the expression "referendum democracy."

Even realizing that, the possibilities contemplated by the semi-direct model, seeking to near the "direct democracy" model, will not pose any obstacle to the exacerbation of the "critical" and, many times, "delegitimizing discourse"[13] of political representation.

This will speed up within the scenario we pictured at the end of the previous chapter.

Most certainly, the receding of the Legislative, losing to the Executive its role of importance,[14] gains significant meaning.

In this respect, we point out that the Executive will assume the role, at least before the public, of that who exercises the supremacy of the representation legitimacy, much easier to be perceived, or even appreciated.[15]

In this challenge one notices basically, the criticism based on some vectors, mainly: 1) the absence of the imperative mandate, especially given its historical supremacy, comes to contribute to the "lack of personal and material relationship between voters and representatives" and 2) there should be a "relationship that ensured" "the coincidence between the interests of the voters and that of the elected."[16]

During the 1960s a new series of experiments will rise to try and solve these challenges.

They constitute practices that were soon called "participatory" which creates a new designation in the political vocabulary, "participatory democracy," which tries to encompass those practices.

The "participation" and democracy

As early as 1970, Carole Pateman, warns us about the crucial importance of participation in the construction of the theory of democracy, tarnished, in his understanding, by the myth and proliferation of the "classic doctrine of democracy".[17]

In this sense, it is worth remembering that at the very beginning of the affirmation of democracy (the "representative government"), Condorcet did not exclude the direct popular participation in the constitutional approval and the declaration of rights.

Edward Mead Earle, in his well known introduction to the 1937 edition of the "Federalist papers",[18] goes the same way, making it clear that the final decision of the Convention, determining the approval of the new constitution by sate conventions,[19] with representatives chosen especially for such purpose, constituted a real "coup d'état", "revolutionary act."[20]

The determination of a popular "endorsement," after approval by the Philadelphian delegates, already denoted the perception of the importance of deliberativeness in the process.

More recently, the issue, as already mentioned, will come back to the agenda.

The discussion on the need of democratic improvement, with the revaluation and reassessment of the deliberation, will rise in a symptomatic manner.[21]

The core issue has been the value and the currentness of the representation. Some understand it has never worked, while others sustain it has fulfilled its historical role.

In this respect, Roberto Gargarella thinks differently, saying that the political system worked "as it was expected."[22]

The representation crisis has to do with the way the political institutions were designed, which means, with the aim of "discouraging" the participation of the citizen in political affairs, instead of promoting it.

The "Founding Fathers" wished to provide the body of representatives with such an enormous autonomy, pushing the citizens away, because they feared the assemblies and the majority discourses.

The opposition to this system would not lead exactly to the populist alternative, as it was feared in the United States by then.

The existence of some peculiar institutions, at least at the beginning – such as the reduced terms of office, the larger forced turnover, the right to revoke the mandate, and the "letters of instruction" – provides fuel to the discussion that the alternative model is already implemented in the birthplace of American constitutionalism.[23]

More than the suffrage

Following a similar reasoning,[24] Joseph Bessette,[25] proposes the term deliberative democracy as a way of explaining the apparent contradiction in the choice made for the constitutional ratification by the American state conventions, already mentioned herein.

Both democratic "parameters" were already foreseen by the "Founding Fathers." On one end, the vote, emanated by the constitutional representatives, following the traditional representation model. On the other end, the idea of deliberation, a possibility to be explained by the debates necessary for the ratifications mentioned.

Samantha Besson and José Luis Martí,[26] are two other authors that follow on the same line. By highlighting the increasing debate on the subject from the 1980s, they noticed the conception as implicit "in some interpretation" by the "Founding Fathers".[27]

The challenge found fertile ground particularly in the USA where, especially after the emblematic 1968 democrat convention[28] the adage "the cure for the ills of democracy is more democracy" was coined.[29]

The increase of pluralism plays a very important role in this whole process, when all sorts of diversities of several different aspects were more and more valued.[30]

In a society where everything was labeled as important, with the exponential exacerbation of individualisms and idiosyncrasies, it is natural the perception that a system founded on the verification of the common wellbeing by the criterion of majority would be challenged.

It is more and more difficult to establish parameters that meet the alleged general interest, when during the "daily routine" the interests of a plural society are (and must be) those valued.

Based on these considerations, the value of what some call "deliberative turn," in the attempt of facing such "difficulties."

Actually, the American and French academic environments have been fecund in the production of specific work on this overcoming, which proves, the preference of the American doctrine for the use of the expression "deliberative democracy," while the French prefers "participatory democracy."

We have to mention here, particularly, the studies and pioneering of Joshua Cohen, who, for part of the doctrine, was the first to coin the expression "deliberative democracy".[31] [32] [33]

We must also point out the studies by[34] Bruce Ackerman, Benjamin Barber, Samantha Besson, John Burnheim, John S. Dryzek, Jon Elster, James S. Fishkin, Amy Gutmann, Alan Hamlin, Peter Laslett, Bernard Manin, José Luis Martí, Philip Pettit, Adam Przeworski, Cass R. Sunstein, Susan C. The deliberativeness

It is worth establishing here an essential semantic issue, namely, the exact meaning of the word "deliberation."

[31]Strongly influenced by an article by Cass Sunstein ("Interest groups in American public law") and the ideas of democracy in a "fair society" by John Rawls. See SCHAEFER, 2012, op. cit.,, p. 85-86.

[32]Cohen, in turn, mentions to have learned about Bessette's article later on. Therefore, he attests the anteriority of the use to the latter... See COHEN, Joshua. Deliberation and democratic legitimacy. In: HAMLIN, Alan; PETTIT Philip. (Eds.). The good polity: normative analysis of the State. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1989. p. 34, NR 1.

[33]COHEN, Joshua. Democracy and liberty. In: ELSTER, Jon. (Ed.). Deliberative democracy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

[34]We did not worry about mentioning all, or even listing the most important and productive thinkers of these two production poles of material on the subject of the thesis, but only, furnishing parameters of those who have pieces of work that most directly influenced the author. By the way, and obviously, the pieces of work by these authors that were deemed essential for the development chosen, are listed in the Bibliography herein.

The word, from Latin "deliberare",[35] in Portuguese popularly means "collectively making a decision," or yet "the decision made by the collectivity."[36]

It is also commonly used (and sometimes preferably used), in the sense of "voting."

In English, "deliberate" kept the meaning as close as possible to the Latin origin, which can be checked by the noun "deliberation."[37]

Considerations made, it is easier to notice why English speaking authors who work on the subject prefer the designation "deliberative" as a complement to democracy in this tendency of improvement.

Therefore, its meaning for the democratic process is the participation in a collective process, in which the free exposition of ideas and their justifications so the decision is made either on one hand or the other, will be freely debated, with equal opportunities.

At the end, presuming reasonable time for these procedures, the deliberation will come with the persuasion provoked in a reciprocated fashion.

[35]deliberare – Latin verb that can be transitive or intransitive, meaning discuss, deliberate, resolve, decide, consult, advise. In turn, the Latin verb comes from the Latin noun libra,ae, which means weight, counterweight, any object or instrument used for weighing and, more commonly, it means scale. See Dicionário latino-português. 3. ed. Francisco Torrinha, Porto: Marânus, 1945., p. 237 e 477. Examples: deliberare de aliqua re (= deliberte on someting); deliberare non adesse (= decide not to participate); deliberare aut cum cupiditate aut cum sapientia (= take advice, either from passion, or from wisdom).

[36]The two dictionaries that are mostly used for Brazilian Portuguese, Houaiss (Dicionário Houaiss da língua portuguesa. Rio de Janeiro: Objetiva, 2009.) and Aurélio (Novo dicionário Aurélio da língua portuguesa. Curitiba: Positivo, 2009.), bring the following definitions, respectively: "deliberation. (...) the act or effect of deliberating 1 debate with the purpose of resolving some deadlock or making a decision 2 questioning, reflection in view of the resolution of a problem or the planning of an attitude 3 action taken after consultation or reflection (...)";"deliberation. (...)1 the act of deliberating; a discussion to study or resolve some subject, issue, or make a decision (...) 2 Internal examination; reflection, meditation. 3 Resolution, decision. (...) 4 Capacity to resolve, decide, deliberate; decision, resolution (...)".

[37]"deliberation 1 careful consideration and discussion; debate (...) 2 being deliberate(2); slowness of movement (...)". see Oxford advanced learner's dictionary of current English, 3. ed. de A. S. Hornby. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1974., p. 228. Or yet "the act of deliberating; mature reflection: calmness: coolness (...)". see Chambers 20th century dictionary., new ed. de E. M. Kirkpatrick. Edinburgh: Chambers, 1983., p. 329. (emphasis ours)

This way, it is agreed that the word "deliberation" must be understood exactly in accordance with its historical dimension in a broader and more open manner than that which reduces it (even if as a perception) to "vote."[38] [39]

This is because the diffusion of the representative government as the expression of democracy in the modern world and, as a consequence, the voting as a form of exercising that, has caused that, in the evolution of the language, a process (the vote) started to be used as an equivalent to its purpose (the deliberation).[40]

In a way, a concept ended up to be equivalent to the other.[41]

For some, deliberation has been described as "a conversation in which the individuals speak and listen in a sequence," before making a collective decision. For others, it would be placed somewhere between the extremes of bargaining, which "involves the exchange of threats and promises" and the "discussion, which may refer to principles or facts and causalities."[42]

The question of definition seems to be so important to everyone that it is the great difficulty (at least initially) of those who are willing to debate the subject. For some authors, better than discussing the subject, is showing "the value of a discussion before making political decisions."[43]

[38]See, in both already mentioned dictionaries: "vote (...) 6 the act or process of exercising the right to this manifestation, and its result (...) 8 favorable opinion; approval (...)"; "vote (...) 1 the act of voting; ballot (...) 8 The way of expressing the will or opinion in an electoral act or assembly. 9 Suffrage, ballot (...)".

[39]Very different from English: "vote 1 (...) expression of opinion or will by persons for or against sb or sth, esp by ballot or by putting up of hands (...)". see Oxford advanced learner's dictionary of current english,3. ed. by A. S. Hornby. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1974., p. 961. Or yet "(...) collective opinion, decision by a majority (...) the right to vote: that by which a choice is expressed, as a ballot (...)". See Chambers 20th century dictionary., new ed. de E. M. Kirkpatrick. Edinburgh: Chambers, 1983., p. 1458-1459. (emphasis ours).

[40]And not only in the political jargon.

[41]That's why it is used constantly in this sense in the Brazilian daily language. Deliberating in a condominium meeting, in an association, a student union is usually equivalent to voting. Also in the elections as a whole: when it is said that "the voters have voted in such or such way," we understand they "have deliberated."

Anyhow, going beyond the question of designation, what can be said for sure is that the idea of deliberative democracy, "making decisions after discussion between free and equal citizens" is being experienced again.[44]

The Habermasian[45] conception that democracy involves the whole process of transformation, and not only the simple aggregation of preferences," is there from deemed one of the best accepted positions within the democratic theory.

Trying to establish requirements

Amy Gutmann and Dennis Thompson,[46] in their attempt to provide fundaments to deliberativeness, establish requirements for the validity thereof.

These would be, first of all, the discussion made in public and their understandability. Add to that the need of the "constructive" discussion for a while, and, finally, a bit of dynamism.[47]

Some values seem to be presupposed in the supporters of deliberativeness, as long as "the deliberative democracy is an ideal of political legitimacy," namely the perception that those who take part in the deliberative processes "are committed with the values of rationality and impartiality" and, those affected by the decision to be actually taken, "may take part thereof in a direct manner or through their representatives."[48] [49]

Also, the willingness of those involved in the processes to be infused with dialogical mentality, as a necessary process for collective argumentation, [50] which allows to presuppose "the willingness to change their thoughts and preferences," if persuaded by the others.[51]

As for the persuasion used in deliberation, it must happen in a way to differentiate it from other communicative processes,[52] which means, trying to transform the preferences of others, in the quest for a "reasonable" consensus, obtained by means of "rational persuasion with strong arguments," supposing that the parties involved will seek "impartiality." This quest for impartiality is not compatible with the existence of "personal interests" or "strategic behaviors."[53]

Despite pointing out the "distinction between deliberation and polling," especially considering the fact that "the rational change of preferences differs from mere aggregation thereof," one must not exclude the possibility that on the course of the process, under certain conditions, the final decision takes place using the vote as well.[54]

This must be seen as a mere procedural factor, pointing out the differences between the two processes. The same observation serves for the occasional use of other methods, such as negotiation.[55]

We must say there are many others communicative theories applied to the political field, such as "roughly" aggregated, the "economic theories of democracy," the "pluralist theories," and also, those called "agonists theories."[56] [57]

Paul Ginsborg gives us examples of experiments of deliberative democracy effectively used worldwide, namely: the German planungszelle (planning cells), the American and English juries, the electronic town meetings, the consensus conferences, the US national deliberation day (as proposed by James Fishkin), the experiments in Chicago regarding the governance of citizens in public education and police patrol, the e-thePeople website and the Danish empowerment of parents in primary schools.[58]

Ginsborg divides the experiments above into two major groups: the first where there is a selection process for the participants in the deliberative process. In this one we would have the German planning cells, the American electronic town meetings and the institution of the Brazilian jury.[59] In the second group, it is attempted to establish greater participation of the population.[60] In this one, the deliberative process is not ancillary or subsidiary, but tries to combine representative and participatory democracies.[61]

Indeed, these are experiments brought by the doctrine that in fact, can be complemented by other experiments around the world, including the Brazilian ones, such as the participatory budgeting and the establishment of communitarian committees in several fields, such as safety, education, health, and public space management.[62]

Conclusion

It is clear, but it is worth saying, that the challenging of democracy and the quest to improve it can run along several ways.

Within the strict scope of this paper, we tried to examine solely the discussion and the theoretical support of the way proposed with the deliberative perspective.

That is what we tried to research and present as a contribution

[58]GINSBORG, Paul. Democracy: crisis and renewal. London: Profile, 2008., p. 65.

[59]As expected, the author refers to the institution of the jury such as it is seen in the United Kingdom, in the USA, and other common law countries, such as Australia. He does not make reference to the institution in other countries, like brazil, but the parallel seemed to be plausible.

Several other possibilities of discussion and presentation of propositions exist in parallel, as for instance, those studies guided to reassessment of the representation upon improvement of the electoral or partisan process.[63]

Also, the proposals to accelerate the use of digital tools as a "quality gain" in the realization of the electoral system,[64] or, going further, the structuring itself of a specific democracy model, the so-called "digital" one.[65]

Particularly, we have been working and seeing how the virtual tools, and specifically, that allowed by the Internet and the social networks, can provide quality gains and increase the democratic decision spectrum.

We would like to reinforce that in this paper , as duly described in the Introduction hereof, these other subjects were not addressed. Apparently, for this purpose, the field is open for researchers that have interest.

We tried to restrict ourselves to the subject proposed, and so this paper is a historical exposition of how the democratic idea evolved, from the Modern Age, exploring its implementation and consecration, until it is perceived as the majority idea in the last century.

Having said that, we started working on what was called "criticism," taking more time with the rise and spread of the "semi-direct" model.

In the last chapter we showed how the use of this model has not closed the debate for unexplored dimensions, some with a historical strain going through revaluation these days.

It has been left far behind the reality expressed in Macpherson final sentence of his well known "The liberal democracy," [66] where he affirmed how rarefied were the "realistic" work on participatory democracy.

The Canadian author pointed out that its supporters tended to merely "proclaim the excellences of direct democracy, sometimes simply aiming at achieving an ideal anarchist society."[67] He made an important exception of Carole Pateman,[68] among other publications.[69]

The following decades revealed that the study and debate about the subject have only increased, becoming even very current.

In this paper we have reinforced this assertive, starting from a necessary digression on democracy of modern times, its slow evolution towards becoming the majority idea, and, for sure, the criticism and models formulated in the intended tendency of the study, as a way of improving it.

The debate resulting from the challenging of the dynamics of the Welfare State enabled what was called "recrudescence" of the criticism to the traditional representative model, resulting in the rise of alternative propositions, sometimes designated participatory, sometimes deliberative.

In all of them, it was clear the need for the establishment of a new paradigm in democracy, which is the increase of participation as a condition for the effective permeation thereof through the society.

This occurs both for those that observe semi-direct democracy and see the need to add new elements to it, and those that already conceptualize that we are going through an evolving participatory democracy.

Anyway, it is now a question, during this metamorphosis of democracy, of seeking solutions that privilege the construction of a plan rich in deliberativeness, under the patterns exposed in the previous chapter.

For this purpose, we noticed that the doctrine worries about the subject, and has sought to establish patterns where deliberativeness should manifest through.

Here, for sure, we must first dissociate from the quotidian language pattern, which, as addressed in the specific chapter, takes deliberation for vote, in a coarse assimilation.

Therefore, we come to some important conclusions listed as follows to make them clear:

a) There is no way we can disregard representative democracy (practiced by the political parties) because, despite all the criticism, no satisfactory system has been invented to replace it;

b) Put together, all the mechanisms to check the popular will through semi-direct tools (which characterizes, according to some people, the presence of another democratic model) have proved not to be sufficient to solve the deficit in the representative system, causing this way, and along the time, the creation of other mechanisms to extend it;

c) Furthermore, the preparation of new models seems to be common place in the doctrine produced along the past few years;

d) From this need arises the view that deliberativeness is a vital element to guide the decision making process; symbolically seen by some as already foreseen at the time of creation of the democratic doctrine;

e) Here arises the need for re-conceptualization of deliberativeness, with the attempt of establishing some requirements to verify it;

f) It is then certainly necessary that the practice subsidizes the construction of a possible unified theoretical model, inexistent so far;

g) The experiments existing in Brazil and other countries come to contribute to this assertive, as a series of mechanisms created along the past years seek to get the decision making end closer to the end that is directly affected thereby;

h) Here, we make a quick reference to the Internet and the social networks, giving the role they might come to play in this sense.

Law And Democracy Between Political Paradigms In Conflict

José Alcebíades de Oliveira Junior[1]

Abstract: The research intends to discuss in this "special workshop" the resulting conflict expressed, on one hand, by liberal doctrines, and on the other hand, by communitarian doctrines in the conformation of sociopolitical order. From this conflict derives a series of questions about cultural pluralism and democracy, as well as it is translated into several controversial issues related to human rights.

Keywords: Law and Deliberative Democracy - Plural Citizenship - Human Rights and Fundamental Rights

Introduction

In this paper, we continue our discussions about the importance of law and democracy - especially deliberative - while essential institutional dimensions for a free social solidarity, therefore, as inherent to the protection of fundamental rights in its various dimensions. However, according to our initial hypothesis for this work, these institutions (law and democracy) are permanently under tension, which are allocated among policy paradigms in conflict, among which stand out Liberalism and Communitarianism.

And this tension has been exacerbated by recent phenomena and expressed by the enormous increase in the share of "social movements", that spontaneous or articulated by internet, express a dissatisfaction that is not yet fully diagnosed, but it indicates broadly about a distrust with the nation - states with representative, democratic or dictatorial systems, and that would be too committed to the international economic and operating systems driven by various elements of corruption[2]. So, indeed, there seems to be a great necessity of civil society participation in the debates inherent to different views on complex issues and decisions and destinies of nations.

Therefore, our academic research has led us by the ways of what Jürgen Habermas has shown as "deliberative democracy" [3] . In his "Law and Democracy, between facticity and validity" (free translation, check the original title), Chapter VII, he shows how he sees the "deliberative politics - as a concept of procedural democracy":

> The analysis of the genesis and legitimacy of law was focused on legislative policy, leaving in the background the political processes. And my theory of law describes this politics as a process that involves negotiations and forms of argument. In addition, the legitimate creation of law depends on demanding conditions, derived from the processes and assumptions of communication, where the ratio, that introduces and examines, assumes a procedural figure [free translation] 4 .

We can see that Habermas' proposal tries - as he emphasizes – to overcome the positions -sometimes radical - of some liberals and communitarians about priority values. It happens especially because in post-traditional or post-metaphysical societies there is an increasing fragmentation of the idea "goodness". This makes necessary, first of all, a 'suitable arena' for confrontation of arguments to be considered a priority.

There are many critical analyzes of Habermas' efforts, who, with his proceduralism, ends up being accused of "liberal" by communitarians. This communitarians, on the other hand, when they try to protect cultural interests of certain excluded groups, turn out to be considered against the idea of freedom.

But the main spot of this kind of democracy – that is the establishment of an effective communication between the state and civil society – more and more must to be thought, although day-by-day it is difficult to achieve.

Social movements, spontaneous or not, from streets' protests and from computers are at least saying that: there is an insufficiency of traditional ideologies, mainly because the official institutions are built by these ideologies and they are speaking from them and their own interests. The guidelines have been expanded …

Undeniably, explanations for the serious institutional worldwide crisis that happens nowadays and that are facing the powers in many countries, according to the movements participants, come from prevailing dissatisfaction with a political system that has aimed solely its self-reproduction. In other words, the crisis of politics and political systems ('flags' of political parties) that were emerged in modernity -and now they serve only as rhetorical arguments to the struggle of power for power - has given opportunity to the most gigantic pit of corruption.

The law itself hasn't a genuine way to survive only on its own fictions and fantasies. In this sense, as I have said in another paper[5], mentioning Professor, Nytamar de Oliveira Junior[6], from PUC-RS,: "jurists were concerned with a constitutional reading of law, aiming only to understand the restricted competence and closed correlation between powers, in order to not defraud a purported social contract 'a priori' of power" (free translation). However, post-traditional societies, that have requirements beyond economic needs, have increasingly placed the importance of civil society participation for the construction of institutional and constitutional legitimacy.

For this reason, it is found in Habermas' book "La necessidad de revisión de la izquierda", a concern for rescue philosophy of law from hands of jurists and give it to philosophers' hands, intending to demonstrate why the right should not be seen solely as a superstructure that serves the government, but that through an expanded political philosophy view it could be understood as a privileged instrument of democracy, and able of realizing the interests both from "right" and "left" political sides, in other words, it means as a structure able to give "vent" to the different interests of plural societies, multicultural and post-metaphysical. Notice that in one of his writings about "Teoría y Política" Habermas says that:

> Otfried Höffe has the merit of regain a kind of ground that, since the days of Hegel, philosophy has been given space almost without fighting against the jurists. With the interruption of the traditional Aristotelian philosophy during the 19th century, with the transition of philosophy of law to society's theory, with the irruption of historicist and hermeneutic approaches in the normative sciences, with the arising of social sciences (...) with the distinction of a legal doctrine that in its oscillations between conceptual jurisprudence and historicisms, between realism and legal positivism, tried to put under control, deeper and deeper, a subject that was becoming more and more complex, The philosophy of law and of the state has been placed in the periphery of the law schools. Criminalists and constitutionalists were made with what has been before field of philosophers, with an additional subject that actually wasn't taken in serious" 7 [Free translation].

This is the kind of dialogue that we need and that we are talking about. It's unbelievable, but theoretical and philosophical disciplines still remain on the periphery of law schools. It remains as a reductionist view of legal science, as if the law could be explained, understood and be self-sufficient in their institutionalized legal rules (rules and principles). Habermas, especially with its proposal for deliberative democracy, tries to put law not only as a way to solve conflicts, but also as a subsystem able to put itself at borders of jurists and social scientists, and at borders of public sphere interests too. He seeks to associate technique to the political and moral construction of a legal science - and this is a key issue that still needs be thorough.

1. Needed Questions For A Deliberative Democracy

The establishment of a political or deliberative democracy, because it is a form of social organization that could safely be deduced from the current constitutions, and as we already said, can be an important addition for effective relationship between the legal authority and authority based on citizenship of individuals and civil society as a whole in democratic states law. Nevertheless, although the supremacy of constitutional orders should be respected, there are many demonstrations for and against the so-called deliberative democracy, both at the theoretical (conceptual) or in practice (empirical and pragmatic). We should go to Professor Leonardo Avritzer[8] that draws attention to the following aspects:

a) At which points deliberative democracy (DD) may represent an overcoming of traditional views of democracy? As Avritzer:

> First, it is an attempt to overcome an aggregative conception of democracy centered in voting (SHUMPTER, 1944 SARTORI, 1994), and secondly, the DD identifies the political rationality with the idea of change and justification for preferences and thirdly, the DD presupposes a principle of inclusion (HABERMAS), and, fourthly, the DD involves the idea of an institution building based on the assumption that the individuals' preferences for large discussion should imply the demand for institutions capable of effecting such preferences (COHEN, 1997) (free translation).

And in the opinion of Avritzer, the last one would be the center of the deliberative democratic canon[9] .

b) Of the various issues surrounding the discussion of deliberative democracy, Angela Cristina Salgueiro Marques[10] highlights a fundamental issue that still needs to be worked on and 'has to do with' the question: 'if a deliberative democracy would (even) able to establish forms of communication that could guarantee the legitimacy of public policies, creating discursive (effective) articulations between "institutional discourse" and "the civic conversation among citizens," thesis proposed by Habermas. In other words, what are the possibilities of effective communication power turn into administrative power?

On the other hand, among the observations about the difficulties in the practical implementation of deliberative democracy, Amy Gutmann and Dennis Thompson studied an interesting case regarding deliberation about health care in the UK, which rightly expressed a conflict between a National Institute of Clinical Excellence, created by the government and whose role was to provide access to treatments and clinical guidelines for use by the National Health Service, that has been criticized, in its deliberations, by a forum also on the same topic created by the House of Commons. It shows that decentralization of decisions can generate additive consequences, in other words, new conflicts between government, legislature and executive in the face of the real concerns of civil society.

Advancing a little more on the questions now emphasized, it is possible to say that in Brazil, since the Constitution of 1988 and especially since the nineties, there were discussions and functioning of Advisory Councils on various topics, in civil, political and social sphere. This is the case about the creation of Ministries of Education, Health, Safety, Environment, Cities and many others, advisory councils to establish public policy interest of the public sphere. Unfortunately, until the moment what we can see is that only a few subjects are taken to the allocation decisions of these councils, getting, in most cases, the most important issues related to infrastructure and these ministries, decisions monocratic with closed doors and carried out by chief executives of ministries.

On the other hand, it is to record that also in the specific field of operation of the judiciary in Brazil, now checks for institutes that also lead to a more effective participation of citizens in the fortunes of his justice, and may be cited as examples "Public Hearings" on complex subjects and reasonable dissent, like abortion, etc., and the figure of "amicus curiae" (friends of the court), that makes themselves represented, thus several important segments interested in the legal decisions of these cases.

Anyway, it is in possession of these assumptions that we intend to advance the debate on the deliberative democracy should go on. In our case, we are in the moment of a deeper contact with the books of some important authors about the theme. With no doubt, Habermas is among them. He is a complex author, but well-known and respected; so we want to see some points about his work.

2. Deliberative dzemocracy between Liberalism and Comunitarians in Habermas' View

As it is in the preceding text, succinctly we can say that Habermas addresses the issue of deliberative politics from a description of a battle (or perhaps a dialectic) between the issues raised by empirical and normativists models of democracy, emphasizing the problem of neutrality as the center of the democratic process, forth discussing a normative position for deliberative politics while overcoming the classical liberal and republican theories of democracy.

Thus, although he is aiming at the construction of an ideal model of communicative and participatory democracy, his proposal wants to talk about issues of empirical relevance for democracy, regarding the nexus between power and right, that can be found "in the pragmatic presuppositions theoretically inevitable that accompany the introduction of the legitimate right" (free translation) , as well as those who express themselves "by institutionalizing the practice of self-determination for the corresponding private persons" [11] (free translation).

It is important to realize that one of the key points of Habermas' deliberative democracy can be found in the need to move from the mere critique of modern reason in crisis (e.g., concern with the unequal distribution of capital), in search of a revitalization of modern reason through dialogic deliberative practices - that would enable us to overcome the liberal and republican radicalism in other aspects (cultural, e.g.). Thus, a theory of discourse is relevant as a tool that allows not only a discussion of the content of rules for strategic purposes, but also as a possibility to increase the capacity for self-reflection and intersubjectivity of subjects. So, Habermas leads his debate with liberal theories, that aim solely to ensure the possibility of a free clash of ideas and that emphasize the economic side, but he also overcomes the communitarian visions that, in trying to rescue the idea of sovereignty community, are overloaded with a "certain political ethics", considered insufficient and problematic in face of complex and fragmented societies. What this societies most need is freedom, in order to enhance "real" integrative processes - and not just "artificial", as well as forms of articulation and sovereign organization, private and public, in addition to an assumption social contract .

In order to synthesize properly, we want to bring a Habermas' quote:

> [...] the theory of discourse assimilates elements from both sides (liberal and communitarian), integrating them into the concept of an ideal procedure for deliberation and decision making . This democratic process establishes a link between internal pragmatic considerations, compromis-> es, discourses of self-understanding and speeches of justice, supporting the assumption that it is possible to get rational and equitable results. In this line, the practice ratio goes from universal human rights or concrete ethics of a certain community to the rules of discourse and forms of argumentation, that draw them normative content of the basis of validity of acting directed by understanding, and ultimately, the structure of linguistic communication and irreplaceable order of communicative socialization. (free translation) [12].

As we have said in other researches, Habermas' discussion helps us to clarify many distinctions of his procedural deliberative democracy in the face of proceduralists classical theories, as Norberto Bobbio's [13] and Robert Dahl's theories, that we intend to continue working . Although Habermas suffers, as we have determined, the charge of be an idealist, the fact is that his starting point, based on empirical's and normativist's theories, notes that "the nexus between law and constitutive power acquires empirical relevance by two ways : "through the pragmatic assumptions inevitable theoretically, that accompanying the establishment of legitimate law, and by institutionalizing the practice of self-determination for private people, adding up, then, a necessary discussion of the ideal of establishing a communicative discourse". Well, by one side, the feeling that things are not good, and on the other hand, the search for symbolical places where things can be possible, as discussions about deliberative democracy participation in all decisions, and pragmatic ways to show to the government.

To conclude this topic, considering the text of Professor Nythamar Fernandes de Oliveira Junior said, it is important to say that:

> Increasingly now, it is procedure to understand the legitimacy of deliberative processes involving participation ever more inclusive and diverse of actors in decision-making processes - not just by voting, by constitutional rights or established procedures and prescribed by legal encodings . By deliberation, the conception of communicative action itself is enlarged and always able to be revisited, innovated and rectified. The same paper, by the media and > by social groups with well-defined interests, also turn to be revisited, as the deliberation remains concurrently in broad and narrow reflective equilibrium , i.e. , not only to translate personal preferences and identity , but also in the conceptions more complex and, in a long term , such as values and moral judgments , religious and historical horizons of self-comprehension [14](free translation).

3. Human And Fundamental Rights And The "Inclusion Of The Other"

As already announced by Leonardo Avritzer[15] , the issue of inclusion is the key to the deliberative democracy. Habermas gives ample attention to this issue, trying to treat it from varied nuances in the book "A Inclusão do Outro" (The Inclusion of the Other, free translation)[16].

In the book "A Inclusão do Outro" Habermas states that his studies, collected and presented immediately after those held in "Direito e Democracia – entre faticidade e validade" (1992), carry a needed deepening of his proposal of deliberative politics . And it is clear that his writings have a special "color" due to his institutional concern with democracy and its relations with the theme of "recognition" in the Rule of Law.

In these texts, which will be further investigated in the sequence of our research and writings, what we can see, beyond the rescue of the theme of theory of discourse as a spot to the deliberative democracy, is an accent is quite significant in contemporary constitutionalism, while an instrumental and a document that expresses the most rational way of law until then. These texts also supports a new discussion about the problematic issue of neutrality procedure of political and legal power that, in times of multiculturalism, should be understood as a concern more located in civil society (or public sphere lato sensu), than a true empirical problem - pragmatic forms of action of the constituted powers (legislators, judges or officials).

However, his ethical proceduralism[17] leads him to critics against one of the fathers of multiculturalism, Charles Taylor, who Habermas accuses of proposing the defense of collective interests or minority groups at the expense and dangerous restrictions of civil liberties recently gained, but this point overpasses our original intention. In fact these collective defenses lead the well-known "affirmative actions" (as job vacancies for some ethnical groups or people with physical limitations), that many times are misunderstood. Although Brazilian National Congress has tried to take part into this discussion, the fact is that this topic is not a consensus in civil society.

4. Critics Against Habermas' Deliberative Democracy

Habermas' theories have been criticized by many authors. One of them is Juan Fernando Segovia[18], Argentinean researcher and professor at the University of Mendoza , and the other is from the Brazilian professor Nythamar Fernandes de Oliveira Junior, from Pontifícia Universidade Católica do Rio Grande do Sul (PUC-RS), who has a specific text about it[19]. We will finish this topic with some sayings about deliberative democracy and law reality in Brazil.

Segovia called Habermas' thesis as "an utopia with pragmatic traces that end in a democratic utilitarianism self-satisfied" (free translation). Among the considerations that he does, he calls the proposal for deliberative democracy as "the utopia of the secular city, the City of God on earth, man's city transformed by men themselves" (free translation).

In other words, would be contained in the proposal of Habermas, an apology for the modern consciousness revolution of men and it would manifest itself in several ways:

> historical consciousness that breaks with the traditionalism of the continuities generated spontaneously; understanding of political [17] See "Dimensões políticas da justiça", organized by Leonardo Avritzer, Newton Bignotto and others, that in "Justiça como procedimento", by Thomas da Rosa Bustamente, it mentions the procedimentalism of Habermas as pure, adding Theory of Justice, by John Rawls as a procedimentalism, but not as pure as Habermas. > praxis under the sign of self- determination; confidence in rational discourse through which should legitimize themselves any form of political domination 20 .

From Segovia's considerations, we could say that deliberative democracy to Habermas crave a "revolution without weapons and without disruption to the existing bourgeois system", unlike other classical sociologists , among which stands out Karl Marx .

Habermas' dream would still for Segovia' thought, as the German author wants to perform a "revolutionary" bourgeois revolution, to overcome the strategic interests of class without confrontation, therefore, as if it were possible to transform the world from within (in an intersubjective way). As the commentator says , "Habermas is dreaming - as before Marx did - in a public structure not dominated by the power, free of domination; the hope recognizes Habermas, does not seem realistic, but properly understood , would not be utopian in the bad sense of the word […] ". The difference with Marx would be obvious: do not think of revolution, Marx understood only way for a free society without domination[21].

On the other hand, the observations of Nythamar Fernandes can be summarized as it follows:

> a. the problem of proceduralism and neutrality in a theory of law and democracy , b . the problem of universalism as opposed to particularistic and communitarian models and, in what I consider an immanent critique of the Rawls' universalism (in particular, in its pure proceduralism) c. the problem of egalitarianism , as opposed to possessive individualism and , in the case of Habermas, as an alternative to models of solipsistic and monological consciousness philosophy or philosophies of the subject . The question of the other concrete, the otherness of the other and their recognition , developed in more recent writings , attest to the importance and the postmodern challenge beyond criticism developed in defense of Enlightenment modernity (...) 22 .

Observe that, in general, the comments of Professor Nythamar circumscribe themes have also treated by Avritzer, Rogério Leal [23], Segovia and ourselves throughout our research. Nevertheless, it is important to keep on discussing the first theme and observe a difficulty that arises from the incessant Habermas' attempted to remain within a deontology rather than teleology, while it cannot be admitted as democracy or any placement no positioning. There exist, unless better judgment, one at least apparent contradiction between formal proceduralism and absence of materiality to be achieved by democracy, or some objective ethical material, as we understand the Nythamar's observations [24].

Also, the second theme is commented by Nythamar in a sense which we agreed and he notes that "Habermas accepts the major premises of communitarian criticism since it does not incur in a naturalistic fallacy or reverse the hermeneutic circle that characterizes our inability to dispense pre-understandings of the world of life, as if the ethics, the social ethos, modus vivendi could justify or socialization in normative terms the empirical data of ordinary life" [25] .

Finally, the third observation deserved a consideration of Nythamar that seems very appropriate:

> Unlike the possessive individualism of the Hobbesian model and different versions of libertarianism, the deliberative democratic conception of justice incorporates a conception of justice as fairness and not as arising from a rule between conflicting interests. Nothing is worse than approaches so liberal models in Rawls and in Habermas to a version neoliberal or libertarian who advocates a minimal state 26 .

And the most interesting in the analysis of Nythamar is his statement - with which we fully agree - that Habermas cannot be inserted into radical egalitarianism mode of communitarians (see the strong criticism that Habermas performs against Charles Taylor), as well as his proposal cannot be seen as a third way social democratic conception that vehemently defends the state of well-being, why is not it that his theory of deliberative democracy is proposed [27].

Final Considerations

The theory of law and democracy, therefore, cannot be confined only to a territory dominated by jurists. Philosophers, sociologists and political scientists also have much to say about the role transcendental intersubjective and especially communicative law and democracy. In this sense, we reproduce some words of Habermas on the subject and that we have already highlighted in our other works:

> the normative self-understanding of deliberative politics demands for the legal community a way of social collectivization, this same mode of social collectivization, however, does not extend to the whole of society in which it lodges the political system consists of state - legal way . Also in itself comprehension, the deliberative politics remains as a constitutive element of a complex society in which every disclaim assume a normative point of view as the theory of law. In this sense, the reading of democracy made according to the theory of discourse can be linked to a distanced approach, from the social sciences, which the political system is neither the top nor the center of society , much less the model that determines its structural mark, but a system of action alongside others 28.

So, as we have already said, some egocentricity has pierced in a dangerous way to the analysis of political and legal dimensions of contemporary societies . As highlights Höffe, the value "justice" cannot distance himself or policy or law. And as he has shown, the jurists s come in a progressive transformation of attitudes, in a gesture of self-understanding of the shortcomings of classical positivism . Without wishing to execrate great thinkers such as Hans Kelsen, for example, one of the masters of constitutional jurisdiction, what has been able to be realized among others works of John Rawls, Herbert Hart and Ronald Dworkin is that science no longer holds legal fictions with auto-sufficiency and transcendent . It is need to seek some sort of version of a "full right" sitting under a normative pragmatics of communication, as says the important thinker Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Junior [29].

It is certain, however, that we live in the era of so-called "linguistic turn" and has placed communication as the road more suitable for human understanding, certainly much more than assumptions values shared by all, especially in the current post- traditional societies in which conceptions of good are fragmented. And this has been the challenge of widening horizons that we have pursued in interesting philosophers with legal interests, as in Otfried Höffe and Jürgen Habermas.

It must be said finally that, when Luigi Bobbio [30], son of Norberto Bobbio , talked at UFRGS in June 7th, 2006, clarified points such as that such proposals are actually considered by many as idealistic, and perhaps as in the fable of " Wolf and the Lamb", we end up being devoured. However, with an important modification in the framework traditionally painted: "we can even be eaten, but not without a serious and compelling argument part of the devourer".

We also believe the Brazilian reality has begun to provide the tools for greater participation by the various advisory councils in the various ministries as well as civil society has begun to show great strength and vehemence with your real desire to discuss paths and decisions that involve them. Therefore, the institutions are under a very critical look and adjudicative, demanding the reform policies such that only appear on paper as concerns.

In this sense, what Frank Cunningham can be approximated Habermas' theory. He said: "institutions and legitimate decisions should be seen as those with which those involved must agree on a democratic procedure 'if they can participate as free and equal in the discursive formation of will'" [31] . The feeling is that we have not reached this condition. Let us consider, however, the fact that the "noise of the streets" is increasingly deafening and we must move quickly to build institutions that enable social participation more effective.

Law, Democracy And Public Reason:
An analysis of constitutional justice from the thought of John Rawls.

Bruno Camilloto Arantes[1]
Vanessa Nunes Kaut[2]

Abstract: The book "The theory of justice" by John Rawls thought influenced the legal, political and philosophical discussion in the contemporary great opportunity Anglo-Saxon world and in major Western countries. The construction of a thought turned to the reasons for a democracy in the midst of a pluralistic society is based on the central theme of justice. For Rawls justice is the first virtue of social institutions by which it is possible to reorganize the society. Therefore, justice is a basic principle of any society. The search for justice in the work of Rawls, is based on the question of the social contract and leads, invariably, the theory of the constitution. This essay aims to present a reading of the theory of the constitution's in light of the theory of justice Rawls trying to assess whether the principles of justice submitted by the American author serve as the basis for a constitutional democracy.

Keywords: Law, democracy, justice

1 Introduction

The American philosopher John Rawls presents in his book A Theory of Justice an understanding of justice, stating that this is the first virtue of social institutions. The author relates the concept of justice to the whole of human life by asserting that one should rest on two core principles: freedom and equality. Rawls defines such principles in an attempt to provide a reflection on the organization of society (RAWLS, 2000b).

Rawls sees society as a cooperative venture where participants choose rationally the principles that will govern the citizens and the basic institutions of society. The author seeks to elucidate on a definitely important question about "How might political philosophy find a shared basis for settling such a fundamental question as that of the most appropriate family of institutions to secure democratic liberty and equality?" (RAWLS, 2005, p. 8), and also, what would be the political-institutional dimension of justice in a democracy.

Later in the book Political Liberalism, the author alludes to the central question that guides his work, which is: "How is it possible that there may exist over time a stable and just society of free and equal citizens profoundly divided by reasonable though incompatible religious, philosophical, and moral doctrines?" (RAWLS, 2005, p. xviii).

In order to answer the question put, Rawls accepts that his theory of justice is a political conception of justice. This reformulation is an argumentative requirement on the need that this theoretical perspective reach stability faced to fact of reasonable pluralism. Such stability is characterized in the liberal figure of reasonable and rational citizens who do not impose the acceptance of a comprehensive doctrine to others. The citizens should get a social cooperation able to structure a well-ordered society where coexist different conceptions of good and where all publicly covenant a political conception of justice.

In a democratic ideal a political conception of justice is formed by the exercise of reason of free and equal citizens that establish a consensus on the founding principles of the constitutional regime. Rawls brings the concept of public reason to the political sphere highlighting that thinking it is thinking about the result of a debate among citizens in the public space about the constitutional foundations and the basic issues of justice. The exercise of public reason makes possible a political view as derived or congruent of the diversity of comprehensive doctrines in a reciprocal relationship.

The integration of the ideal of public reason to the political culture gives the individual[3] the quality of social and political participative being who represents the principles of justice defined and incorporated by the citizens. This participation enables a social agreement about the form of organization of the basic institutions shaped in a constitutional regime.

[3] Individual, in this case, is used as a conceptual category before the concept of the citizen. This one, brings the concept implicit in the very condition of being participating in the formation of the public will.

It is important to point out that the ideal of public reason suggested by the author applies differently to citizens and social institutions. The way it is applied to ordinary citizens happens when they are involved in public forums to defend political positions, like members of parties, candidates and groups supporting them during their campaigns, as well as those who must vote when constitutional essentials and matters of basic justice[4] are at stake (RAWLS, 2005, p. 215). Appliance that differs when it comes to its application on the official forums: Legislative, Executive and Judiciary.

For Rawls the legitimacy of political power presupposes a moral justification of its decisions on matters of essential constitutional questions and basic justice guided by the political values expressed by public reason. In this sense the author highlights the importance of justification of the decisions of state authorities (government) for the configuration of its democratic legitimacy and stresses that this must be based on reasons that are publicly accepted by all reasonable citizens.

The author points out in his presentation that the ideal of public reason applies in a special way to the Judiciary and further, underlines that in a constitutional democracy in which there is judicial review of laws this appliance supervenes at the figure of the Supreme Court. When he addresses the Supreme Court as "exemplar of public reason" Rawls says that in a constitutional regime in which there is a judicial review of laws "public reason is the reason of its supreme court[5]" (RAWLS, 2005, p. 231).

Given the arguments of Rawls seeking to reflect on the Brazilian current political situation and in the case of a country that is constituted politically and legally as a constitutional democracy, this paper proposes an analysis of the articulation of the concept of public reason in the Brazilian political scene in order to highlight its implications in the actions of the Legislative and Judicial Branches. The proposed analysis will combine two variables that are (i) assessing the way the legislative process unfolds in Brazil and (ii) the role played by the Judiciary.

The importance of this analysis stems from the observation of a legitimacy crisis of the Legislature in the exercise of its legislating function. One of the consequences of this crisis is expressed by the expansion of judicial activity that fosters the discussion about the idea of separation of powers envisaged in the Constitution of 1988 as an entrenchment clause. Integrating the concept of public reason is fundamental to the debate about the judicialization of controversial issues involving fundamental rights, in particular in seeking to assess the democratic legitimacy of social institutions.

[4] Constitutional essentials and matters of basic justice match what Rawls conceives as political values to address the fundamental matters inherent to society, for example, voting rights, religious freedom, equality and property (RAWLS 2005, p. 227-230).

[5] Rawls highlights in a footnote that this is not a definition and points out: "I assume that in a well-ordered society the two more or less overlap" (RAWLS, 2005, p 231).

It is understood that the Brazilian political scenario indicates a distortion of the public use of reason in the instances of the legislating body of the country pledging its democratic legitimacy. This same scenario puts the spotlight on the characterization of the Supreme Court as "exemplar of public reason" informing its counter-majoritarian role in support of democracy. It leave us, however, the question about the extent to which judicial review fits democratic constitutionalism and how should we think it strategically in Brazil faced to his historical contours and its political profile.

2 The role of Brazilian legislative and judiciary branches

Brazil is politically and legally organized as a constitutional democracy. The Brazilian Constitution, characterized by its analyticity, largely defines the rights and guarantees to be preserved to the citizens as well as the principles that should govern the Democratic Constitutional State. There are, however, some disparity between the Constitution and the institutional scope of these guaranties in relation to social minorities[6] in view of a current "mischaracterization" of the use of public reason in the legislative instances of the country, which is called on the present work as legitimacy crisis of the Brazilian Legislature.

As known, the country faces too many social inequalities and their citizens live an educational, institutional and political deficit. Brazilian people's discontent with their institutions is explicit, needless to say, however, it is a politically apathetic society given the fact that these same people were responsible for "creating and starting the structure of the Democratic State of Law" (TOLEDO, 2005, p. 22) (free translation).

[6] The concept of minority is not used here in the sense of quantification or even as opposed to a numerical majority. Rather, the concept of minority is linked to the idea of representing social collectivities who suffer discrimination processes. Thus, even when there is a numerical majority of people this collectivity becomes the minority by some mechanism that generates a result of inequality and social exclusion.

It is lived, since 1988, a process of implementation of democracy in the country. In the struggle for effective democracy we see a disbelief of the Brazilian people with regard to the action of the Legislature.

It is not believed that it is possible to say that the people would lack representation given that the country constitutes an institutional model where representatives are elected by the citizens. Although still by a mandatory way, and, subject to the critics about such "law enforcement", voting characterizes the exercise of active positive political rights, having the citizens to assess the candidates and choose to whom cast their votes. It is expected that the principles that they established at the constituent moment are guides of representation as prescribed Rawls.

This institutional configuration - constitutional democracies - assumes voters in the condition of free, equal, rational and reasonable citizens, who delegate to their representatives the role of safeguarding the principles determined by them (RAWLS, 2005). Although the modern notion of parliamentary representation is characterized by a free mandate, which is the presupposition of an autonomous agent (unrelated to the will of the defendant), the absence of binding of wills is offset by an elective mandate, for its transience, and in particular the constitutional duty of the representatives to stick to a political conception of justice.

What is noticeable in Brazilian political activity, however, is that the legislative activity, in its great majority, is being developed without their parliamentarians make use of public reason, albeit as people's representatives, they are acting in accordance with their moral and religious convictions minted in both personal and partisan interests. This situation is evident when one observes that the representatives of the people excuse themselves to put on the agenda for discussion and deliberation controversial issues that do not meet their interests ignoring constitutional principles and depriving social groups to exercise their fundamental rights.

Given this reality, Parliament - originally home of the people - becomes a space in which they debate religious beliefs, agreements and strategic trends as mistaken understanding that the majority will be the ideal way to do justice to the detriment of effective public exercise of the function of legislating in favor of the Brazilian society, considered in its plural aspect. It is confirmed that there is no need to talk about lack of representativeness, but lack of democratic legitimacy.

There should still be mentioned that not only the distortion of the use of public reason demonstrates the bad legislative exercise. It should be noted that there is too much calling by the parties, allies and constituencies for the presentation of bills and proposals of constitutional amendment entailing the excessive bringing of these institutes. Many in the end declared unconstitutional[7].

This scenario of unconstitutionality is presented to portray how the tremendous inquiry for law propositions affects not only the proper functioning of the Legislature, but also the quality of these institutes, resulting in proposals and laws that are not consistent with the Constitution. This result goes against the principles chosen by the citizens, which should be observed by their elected representatives in the scope of its functions.

The acting of the legislature by moving away from constitutional principles, aiming to defend their individual interests, moves itself away from the exercise of public reason losing democratic legitimacy and occasioning a strong but unwanted trend towards injustice of their decisions.

When Rawls, teaches on the "constitutional, legislative and judicial" stages and presents the dynamics of these stages, argues that the injustice of decisions corrupts democratic legitimacy, stating that "legitimacy of legislative enactments depends of the justice of the Constitution" (RAWLS, 2005, p. 429).

It is sought to present the legislative situation in which Brazil currently is, once a legislative democracy presupposes a strong and credible legislature that watches out for its public function looking to guarantee citizens the effectiveness of their rights and legislating to guarantee that this ideal is reached. Once the legislature of a country is weakened, fragile is the democracy in this country, a solution should be sought to restore their prestige and legitimacy.

[7] To illustrate this situation it is reported that there are currently over two thousand proposals of constitutional amendment and about 15.400 bills run in the Parliament (BRASIL, 2013b). The lack of rationality in the legislative activity was also seen in 2011 when it was introduced just to the House of Representatives 3.268 bills. Of this total, this house has approved 337 of these bills, of which 45% were subsequently declared unconstitutional as data measured by the Anuário da Justiça de 2012 shows (the Brazilian Federal Legislature is bicameral and consists of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate). The Anuário da Justiça, made based on the analyzes of actions pertinent to the Brazilian judicial review and appretiated by the Supreme Court in 2011, it also raised the percentage of unconstitutionality of laws, pointing out that eight in every ten state or federal laws of the country submited to the Supreme Court scrutiny are declared unconstitutional. The state uncostitutionality index reaches the level of 90% and the federal 45% summing out na average of unconstitutionality of 83% in the country just in 2011.

It is in this presented scenario that the Judiciary stands out, once that before the current constitutional model in Brazil it is the institution constitutionally responsible for exercising the role of judicial reviewing of laws, as well as the final judge of the demands of society that fall within its skills. The demands that gain special relevance are involved in controversial issues where the legislature omits to legislate for not wanting to, not being allowed to, or not being able to act and where such omission results in the lack of assurance of fundamental right.

The Supreme Court stands out as the figure of an interpreter of the principles, often featuring the Judiciary as a positive legislator, when argumentatively creates legal solutions in specific cases based on the exposure of reasons in the quest for maximum effectiveness of the Constitution. It should be remembered that according to John Rawls these reasons must be publicly accepted by all rational and reasonable citizens endowed with a political conception of justice.

What is meant is that a fundamental right can not depend on the will of a legislator, and when there is unconstitutional legislative omissions, i.e., resulting in the absence of a guarantee of a fundamental right, they must be resolved in the light of constitutional principles in order to prevail these rights and to remedy this omission. Likewise, when there are unconstitutional proposals or laws, they should be evaluated and declared unconstitutional avoiding conflict with the rights of citizens.

It is therefore necessary to see that the Judiciary needs to perform a strong and independent political activity for the protection of fundamental rights, fulfilling a countermajoritarian role, meeting social needs often unmet by the Legislature. This would not be an option to judge, but an obligation to decide, an inevitability, characterized by the complexity of relationships and the constant demand for solutions.

The legitimacy of the decisions of the judiciary must be measured and argumentatively express the public reason of a certain well-ordered society. That is why on the spectrum shown it is understood that the Supreme Court is accentuated as "exemplary case of public reason" being an organ withdrawn from the possibility of using it, but whose public reason should be your reason itself.

It is necessary, however, to observe how far the role of the judiciary ties together with democracy and when will it break it, at the risk of its action also fade legitimacy. It should be noted that when the legislator within his powers and where there isn't a discussion of the fundamental right, make decisions that do not conflict with the Constitution, the Judiciary must respect them.

In such cases should prevail legislator's decision, what suggests a large watershed between "necessary judicialization" of certain issues (which derives from the very Brazilian institutional structure), and the much criticized "judicial activism".

To illustrate the scenario presented is possible to highlight issues recently discussed under these Powers. Regarding the issues involving fundamental rights serve as an example the debate on the termination of pregnancy of anencephalic fetus as well as the discussions that guide the debate on civil marriage between homoaffective couples.

Regarding termination of pregnancy of anencephalic fetus, it was verified a unconstitutional legislative omission, which Parliament by ideological arguments clearly avoided to remedy, violating fundamental rights, and letting to be understood that an religious ideal prevails over an ideal of health and freedom for women. The Supreme Court decided in the end by their legality, thus remedying the legislative omission in defense of the fundamental rights involved.

Likewise this Parliament omitted itself, from treating the equiparation of matrimonial rights of homoaffective couples, a theme that finds no express legislative prevision, on which the National Council of Justice[8] came to decide, recognizing this equiparation and determining that the public registries begin to pronounce these marriages. The constitutionalist Luis Roberto Barroso highlights that "the legislator cannot prohibit a person from exercising his affection the way he wants it" and to "criminalize a homoaffective relationship violates a fundamental right" (BARROSO, 2010b, p.2) (free translation).

On the other hand, when it comes to the demands of society where fundamental rights are not involved, but result from legislative omissions, where there was demand of society to be dealt with, even to leverage the credibility of the Legislature and its democratic legitimacy, should be clear that on these assumptions the choices of the legislator are the ones that should prevail. Since they are being treated by Parliament and in accordance with the Constitution, the debate on this feature only entail additional performance of the Judiciary when the Legislature fails to do so, or when doing it in an unconstitutional manner, by not paying attention to the use of public reason. Thus, it would avoid the over-interference of the Judiciary in the context of legislative activity.

We observe, therefore, that the harmony of powers required by Article 2 of the Brazilian Constitution is not a mere constitutional provision, but a guideline of conduct of the institutions that must exercise their powers in a democratic way in pursuit of the accomplishment of the fundamental objectives that this same norm foresees, using the powers of their reciprocal control mechanisms in order to keep the well-established boundaries between their respective powers, as well as a strengthened systemic character in between these on the constitutional arrangement.

3 Separation of powers and judicial review

Although clear that this relationship of independence and harmony between the powers that was presented is the assumption of a Democratic State, we observe today that there is a clash between the Legislative and Judicial Branches in Brazil, which comes to the criticisms already raised and debated and stands out with greater severity. It is thereafter spoken about an impasse that could compromise the constitutional entrenchment clause of separation of powers (Article 60, § 4 of CRFB/88).

It is, in short, the debate so recurrent in political philosophy on which power should have the last word in interpreting the Constitution and to whom should remain the analysis of compatibility of laws with it, in order to most effectively meet the democratic assumptions and seek the maximum guarantee of fundamental rights.

This debate has been highlighted more specifically in Brazil since the knowledge of the Proposal of Constitutional Amendment no. 3, which suggests an expansion of the supervisory power granted to the Legislative Branch, as provided in art. 49 V of the Constitution, to stop the normative acts of the Executive that surpasses the regulatory power or the limits of legislative delegation, also extending it to apply to the Judiciary.

It is at this point that should be taken over the reflections on the decisions indicated in this work and wonder about what would the results of the demands on the interruption of pregnancy of anencephalic fetus and the possibility of civil marriage between homoaffective couples be if the Parliament had the final decision, and also how guarantor of basic rights would such a decision be. These questions concern to the present discussion for the relationship established between the law, public reason and the own conception of democracy.

In this scenario still stands out the Proposal of Constitutional Amendment no. 33, which proposes to amend the minimum amount of votes of members of the courts to declare the unconstitutionality of laws; the conditioning of the binding effect of súmulas (precedents) approved by the Supreme Court for approval by the Legislative Branch and; the submission to the Parliament of the decision about the unconstitutionality of Constitutional Amendments[9].

In specific, it interests in a particular point of this proposed amendment which suggests that if there is disagreement on the constitutionality of a Constitutional Amendment between the Supreme Court and Parliament, it would pass through the popular scrutiny the question incited, so that citizens can solve the controversy. According to Mr. Nazareno Fonteles (PT-PI), rapporteur of the proposal, the referendum would make the decision more democratic because "the will of the people is the will that is consistent with democracy".

It should be noted that democracy itself does not presuppose a specific separation of powers and that "the assumption that the separation of powers is necessary for public freedom is debatable" (FREEMAN, 1994, p.195) (free translation), but the purpose of the Law in regulate relationships does not characterize a mere formality necessary to order, but justice. This is where a revisional power endowed with reason should have highlighted its role in countermajoritorian acting in pursuit of maximum effectiveness of fundamental rights - basic rights of a constitutional democracy - considered the pluralism inherent in contemporary societies.

It is long known that majority will is not always the most fair and that a democracy is not made of political majorities. It is in this sense that Luis Roberto Barroso teaches (2010a, p. 5) noting that "often the right decision is an unpopular decision. So the Judiciary may not have its merit measured in public research". As for the laws, it should be noted that, as instructed by Freeman, "any laws that have the purpose of violating these basic rights are invalid, even if they are supported by a majority" (1994, p.186) (free translation).

[9] The text still strengthens, that the proposal intends to induce the currently non-existent institutional dialogue among the Branches, which should serve as a mechanism to correct the anomaly that is judicial activism and overcome the belief that the Legislature is not able to deal with minority rights.

The constitutionalist Luis Roberto Barroso also points out that in a society where the Constitution provides an extensive range of general clauses as indeterminate legal concepts and principles brings to the Law and removes from politics these issues allowing the judicialization and enhancing the role of the interpreter in determining the sense of the norm. It is understood that leaving to the scrutiny of the Judiciary to find a legal solution in specific cases does not generate instability between the powers, since these decisions are based on solid reasons that can be publicly accepted by reasonable citizens.

Rawls presents us how public reason "assumes particular relevance in contemporary societies, which have as an indispensable component the existence of the so called reasonable moral disagreement regarding conceptions of decent life, having noted the absence of a substantive consensus on values" (BUNCHAFT, 2011, p. 74) (free translation).

It is at this point that the Constitution should catch the eye of the representative bodies of the country to the political values rooted in its constituent moment by those who have the democratic power to decide which should be the basis to govern the society they inhabit and integrate - its citizens. That the basic institutions come to be governed by these principles and use up publicly and argumentatively these principles in order to have its democratic legitimacy recognized and so that they gain credibility in this society.

For Rawls, by applying public reason, the courts avoid exactly that the law is eroded by the "laws of transient majorities" or by specific interests, contrary to this reason. By integrating the concept of public reason to the political culture of the country, the debate on the legalization of controversial issues involving fundamental rights becomes crucial, enabling the understanding that the jurisdictional action proves itself unavoidable.

Freeman prescribes with great clarity the situation prompted on this work, it is important to highlight that the lessons of this American author is substantially founded on the teachings of John Rawls in the context of his theory of justice announcing that:

> Granting to a non-legislative body, and witch does not justify its actions electorally, the power to review democratically created legislation, the citizens provide themselves with means to protect its sovereignty and independence of the unreasonable exercise of their political rights in the legislative processes. Thus, they freely > limit the range of options open to them in the future. Agreeing with judicial review, they tie themselves to their agreement on the equal basic rights that articulate their sovereignty. The judicial review is, therefore, a way for them to protect their status as equal citizens (1994, p. 190-191) (free translation).

The need for a body of judicial review arises from the absence of a broad and reasonable public agreement, since there is no "assurance that the majority rule is not used, as so often it was to subvert the public interest in justice and to deprive individuals categories from the conditions of democratic equality" (FREEMAN, 1994, p. 192) (free translation). Evaluate, therefore, if judicial review is compatible with democracy is a strategic issue that depends on the factors portrayed by the politics of that certain democracy. It could be said that this explanation fits perfectly to the situation in which it is Brazil, considering the current deviation of legitimacy distinguished to the Parliament, when endowed with behavior uncharacteristic of public reason, interpreting judicial review as a commitment to equality.

About the theme of the "last word", the philosopher Hanna Pitkin explains that there is no last word. This seems to be the most appropriate statement to describe a plural and complex constitutionally modeled as it is the Brazilian society. In this sense, dialogical theories that assume importance predict that the constitutional solutions are constructed and assume a provisional character once that remain they are subject to review by the interaction between the powers[10].

There are, however, in regimes where the powers are separated, as sustained by Freeman:

> The need for final authoritative interpretation of the Constitution, (1) to coordinate these different powers and to solve intractable conflicts, (2) to avoid conflicting demands come to be made to the > conduct of citizens, and (3) to ensure that the constitutional forms are respected and obeyed by ordinary powers of government. Once that the constitution specifies the basic abstract rights of citizens, the clear delineation of constitutional rights and the consistency in the application guaranteed by a final interpretation are essential to the pursuit of their own citizens, as well as well as the validity of fair and effective laws (1994, p. 194) (free translation).

[10] On the need for constitutional dialogue and the idea of deliberative democracy it is important the position of the constitutionalist Virgílio Afonso da Silva prescribing that there is a unexplored potential about the interaction of judicial review with the deliberative practices and that the judicial review should be envisioned not as "mere process" (prosecution), but as "part of the democratic game" and in this sense, it should be discussed on how to improve the interaction between the ministers themselves and the possibilities of dialogue between institutions, learning from the dialogical models already filed in other democracies (such as Canada), but checking the best way to initiate dialogue in Brazil (2009, p. 197-227) (free translation).

Freeman does not argue that the authority of final interpretation should be fixed in the Judiciary, but argues that this also does not require to be located or assigned to the Legislature to have ordinary democratic character, as suggested in the proposed amendments that stood out in this work.

The author believes that the power of judicial review is not a "proper judicial power", but a "power of preservation", which in the hands of whoever it is, should serve the purpose of preserving a democratic constitution (FREEMAN, 1994, p. 196) (free translation).

It is on these reflections that can be concluded that (i) the importance of the review is not because of those who apply but which is applied to preserve constitutional democracy and the basic rights of citizens, (ii) if there is evidence that legislative procedures have not satisfied the requirements of democratic justice, judicial review may be the appropriate way to find support these requirements, and (iii) once used properly the legislative procedures would remain solved the necessary adjustments to democratic legitimacy.

In Brazil it is clear that the Legislature is unable to meet the requirements of democratic justice and therefore a judicial review taken by the Judiciary is necessary since employed in a proper manner and when it does not oppose to majoritarian decisions to preserve power and social privileges of economic elites, but to preserve the protection of minority rights, and empower every citizen to exercise effectively their basic rights.

So, what is understood as the Proposal of Constitutional Amendment no. 3 is that its constitutionality is highly questionable especially before the Brazilian legislative reality which portrays a legitimacy crisis and requires a restructuring in its foundational base in order to restore its democratic legitimacy and deliberative capacity in the important exercise of public reason that should guide it.

We used the theme that circumscribes the debate on those particular proposals of constitutional amendments to bring the discussion to the debate about the boundaries of the separation of powers and its implications for democracy, as well as the controversial question of who owns the last word in the political debate. In addition to evaluating the Brazilian political scenario, the arguments favor the consideration of many other constitutional regimes that are in stages of pursuing the ideal of institutionalization of democracy.

It is reiterated here that the need to integrate the concept of public reason by representative bodies of the society for the configuration its democratic legitimacy, as well as it is underlined that this reason should be preeminent to the courts, suggesting that basic freedoms should be protected by a constitutional regime in all its instances in an harmonic manner under the protection of the principles of justice. It is important to highlight, that the concept of public reason isn't a plastered concept, and may vary within the limits of the principles of justice that may be different from those presented by the author, since deriving from political values on a political conception of justice, accepted by all.

It was intended to demonstrate that democracy is not only characterized by its structure, since the justice of the institutions stem from the action of its representatives and that we are all representatives as sovereign people.

4 Conclusion

The integration of the concept of public reason in the political scene, whose analysis is proposed in this paper, serves to incite the debate over the dichotomy between legislative and judicial action and how the powers – adding also here the Executive, though not mentioned in the debate - in reality should be interrelated in the persecution of the concretization of basic rights.

Rawls tells us that the content of public reason is provided by a political conception of justice, this content is made up of two key components, namely: "substantive principles of justice for the basic structure (the political values of justice); and guidelines of inquiry and conceptions of virtue that make public reason possible (the political values of public reason)" (RAWLS, 2005, p. 253). These components should surround the political scenario in order that legitimacy and stability are granted to it.

It was in this reference that this debate was supported. This effort is about going through a philosophical view over the development of social institutions in a real scenario that presents situations of complexity inherent to contemporary societies. Despite this scenario the reasonable disagreement show itself as indispensable element it is necessary to think of a conception of justice able to overcome it to make fair and stable institutions. The idea of justice, therefore, must be shaped by a political conception properly institutionalized by the Constitution.

However, it is necessary to make clear that in presenting his theory of justice this philosopher did not intend to describe a system of a legitimate government, but to suggest a way to walk to the institutionalization of justice in constitutional democracies which are in constant development.

The discussions made in the present study regarding the expansion of the role of the Judiciary, once observed a distortion of reason in legislative bodies, do not suggest a supremacy of this power, far from it they come to demonstrate that it is required balance in relations between the powers and that public reason must be present at all official forums, instances and moments on which a political conception of justice should be perceived.

Rawls describes on this sense that among the principles of constitutionalism it should be understood that in a constitutional government the supreme power cannot be deposited in the hands of the legislator, not even a supreme court, which is only the "highest judicial interpreter of the constitution" (RAWLS, 2005, p. 232). And as Freeman's reflections shows, his role as a judicial reviewer serves more as power to preserve the political values on that society.

Applying the public reason means that the Supreme Court would be (i) avoiding the law to be eroded by the laws of transient majorities or which represents narrow interests, (ii) serving as an institutional model of this reason and (iii) giving strength and vitality to this reason in the public forum through trials endowed with authority over fundamental politic issues. Rawls does not encourage a view of this Court as one endowed with supreme power, but of court as "center of controversy" (RAWLS, 2005, p. 239).

It was sought in this work to reflect on the articulation of the concept of public reason in the Brazilian political reality, and impairments in this setting, although this reflection refers to the evaluation of many other constitutional democracies that are evolving in the quest to achieve the desired justice relations in a society. For this reason, the verification of the way which the legislative process unfolds in the country and the role played by the judiciary were conjugated.

It was observed that (i) the Brazilian Legislative faces a serious crisis of legitimacy and consequently expands judicial activity and (ii) that as a result of this, impasse regarding the separation of powers are being questioned.

In this political-legal scenario, there is a need to rethink the legitimacy of representative institutions seeking to restructure the political bases as well as deliberative capacity in the exercise of public reason ultimately promoting the adjustments in the system of judicial review.

As demonstrated when the understanding that the last word should not be used to characterize a supreme power, but an organ of preservation of values such as democracy and fundamental rights, it is possible to assume changes in judicial review in a constitutional state without confronting the principle the separation of powers. However, before you even think about the possibility of changing the model of judicial review, it should be reflected how the current configuration of the Brazilian constitutional system provides mechanisms to remedy the situation which the country finds itself without excessive efforts have to be dispensed and without having to shut down too much the constitutional tradition that coined in the country. It seems to me that thinking of an interaction between powers can be a great leading idea.

It should be again noted that the decisions of a Supreme Court should only have a supplementary character to the legislative activity when it fails to exercise its powers. Still, these decisions do not have the power to bind this legislating power, which when legislates may ultimately overcome them, thus promoting the systemic dialogue that the Constituent between institutions foresees.

The Constitutional Court therefore should not even be thought of as "the oracle of the best answers, [...] at the risk of atrophying the representative bodies, throwing them into a vicious circle of irrelevance" (PEREIRA, 2013) (free translation), nor suffer limitations that prevent them from exercising their countermajoritarian role and corrector of the asymmetries in democratic deliberation when involved fundamental rights. It is reiterated that the legitimacy of the decisions of the judiciary must be measured argumentatively and, to comply with democracy, public reason should prevail.

What follows on this brief analysis aided by the teachings of the American philosopher John Rawls on the aspects of public reason and its implications in the Brazilian political scene, although this reflection faces vast problems that can and should be more widely debated, is that it should remain the perception that what is required is to think of re-establishing democratic legitimacy in deliberative bodies in the country and promote effective interaction between the powers that form the basic structure of society in support to citizens and democracy.

It is also estimated that the institution's justice depends on both an exercise of citizenship as a structuring among institutional powers of the State responsible for giving effectiveness to the principles of justice in a society. However, the dynamic between these powers should not be plastered, molding itself to the necessary extent to give effective support to the protection of the principles of justice. If it is found the inexistence of this structuration the realization of justice proposed here will not take place, or even when this condition exists in flaw, say, not corresponding to the public reason of a society, there may occur an imbalance between the institutional powers.

In this sense, it is observed that the Law shaped in the ideal hypotheses of representation would not be characterized as a guarantor of justice, as seems to be the current role of the Supreme Court, but in addition to being the one that enables the expression of the principles reserving their place in Constitution, would also have the role of carrying out justice, ensured to citizens by its action focused on public reason and the establishment of a political conception of justice, taking into account all the stages that present themselves in a democratic society.

It appears, therefore, that the realization of justice depends even more of citizenship when characterized by the active participation of citizens in shaping the political ideal of a society. Thinking about that political participation from the perspective of the historical development of democracies in Western societies, it is observed that countries in which democracy is still recent "get behind" in relation to the more accustomed to it. Given this observation, it would be able to be verified that the civic exercise develops over time, where social realities show the demand for public reasons and citizens accept that the diversity is inherent in societies, and that it should be respected.

Finally, it is in this sense that, it is argued that the Law, Democracy and Public Reason institutes are interdependent, but depend on the same source, which are rational and reasonable citizens, and to achieve what is dealt with here as an ideal, its necessary above all, to invest in people, in education and in the advent of the use of reason.

Media and democracy:
Challenges and dilemmas of media regulation

Gustavo Ferreira Santos[1][2]

Abstract: We cannot discuss democracy in complex societies without questioning the role of the media alongside the limits and possibilities of media accountability. Media regulation involves a huge number of constitutional issues. On the one hand, the form of the constitution provides a set of fundamental rights that protect individuals and groups from the violation of their rights in the way they communicate. This includes freedom of speech and the press. On the other hand, the democratic process calls for a balance between the various political positions that exist and the set of constitutional values, requiring a specific public policy to avoid the violation of this process. In fact, various policies are needed to protect democracy from undesired phenomena such as media concentration, the manipulation of content, the language produced by hate and the exposure of offensive content to children. These problems become weightier when they are broadcasted, with far-reaching consequences. The impact is deepened by the new communication technologies and, more specifically, by resources on the internet. Media regulation requires complex approaches because the debate which considers the media before the state has always tended to be restricted to the concept of freedom; constitutional institutions have almost always been left out of the picture.

Keywords: Democracy. Media Regulation. Accountability.

Introduction

We live in an era which is marked by the highlighted presence of communication media in social life. Alongside the classic means of communication, we are always seeing the emergence of new possibilities for communicating. Their reach poses problems which cannot be resolved by the old parameters invented for times when the press had more modest dimensions. One of the most important questions to be raised involves judging the consequences of constitutional norms which pertain to communication.

Basically, two positions are in dispute in this debate on the constitutional regulation of social communication. On the one hand, there is a position which is mainly worried about individual liberty. The liberals are preoccupied with the individual's autonomy. This position will depend on lessening the role of the State. On the other hand, there are those who are preoccupied with media production - and whose opinions will be presented later – being a space which guarantees opportunities for the diverse groups in the dispute for power. For them, state regulation is justifiable in relation to some problems which have come to exist in the public domain.

There are varying positions in the midst of each group, existing, in both camps, ranging degrees of radicalism.

On the side of those who oppose regulation, there are libertarian positions, such as that of Raoul Vaneigan who defends the end of any kind of limitation for the liberty of expression. Even offensive discourses, traditionally criminalized, such as slander, calumny and defamation should not be restricted. All excesses of discourse would be resolved by more discourse.

Where the defenders of regulation are concerned, there are instrumental and voluntarist positions which see intervention as a way of transforming the media in aid of a struggle for a type of society, and to silence inconvenient positions. This type of positioning is akin to some of leftist positions.

Here I wish to elaborate a moderate position whilst taking in the concerns of both sides which find themselves in the tradition of democratic constitutionalism. Owen Fiss localizes the two propositions in the liberal tradition.

Property

An area which does require state regulation is about who owns the media. The Brazilian Constitution of 1988 did not neglect this matter. The rule on the prohibition of monopolies is one the most important within the forms of state intervention in the treatment given to communication. It is in the fifth item of Article 220:

Art. 220.(...)

§ 5º - Social media cannot, directly or indirectly, be an object of monopoly or oligopoly.

Apparently this is the same regulation which is made for economic activities, seeking to avoid concentration. However, there are fundamental differences between the two forms of intervention which originate from the very motives which justify them. While economic regulation of the competition seeks to guarantee the place of other players in the market, the regulation of the property of media goes further, reaching the ties between the free circulation of information and democracy.

The possibility of concentration is a grave threat to democracy, since a certain political position can gain disproportionate power in the spreading of its own ideas. The more that media property can become distributed, the more institutions will reflect, in theory, the plurality marking society.

In Brazil one notes a lack of rules in this area and a high concentration of power.

Besides the concentration phenomenon there is another serious problem in Brazil which is the intermingling between the media and political agents. A great number of TV and radio transmitters are under the control of those who are linked to electoral mandates, held either by themselves or by family members. This causes serious distortion in electoral processes since these people have clear advantages in putting forth the ideas which characterize campaigns. However, the gravest consequence is that this reduction in perspective harms the prospects for constitutionally adequate legislative reform.

To regulate the ownership of media, avoiding monopolies, does not represent a threat to democracy. Quite to the contrary, it is a condition for its development.

What is called "cross-ownership" needs to be limited with specific rules. A business which holds agencies of communication over all types of media can, combining the action of all of them, manipulate information and determine one's desires and visions of the world.

It is evident that there are arguments in favor of concentration. Especially the ones related to the market place. Strong national businesses in the area of social communication would be able to compete in a supposedly open economic context for the sector to perform for international capital. The might of great media groups would also permit investment to be optimized, enhancing the strengths of teams of journalists, for example, in the variety of media handled by the same business.

Nonetheless, such arguments cannot be all-determining with regard to how public power stands. The posture of the State should consider an ample set of variables, being especially preoccupied with the question of democracy and fundamental rights.

This active role in the control of property is important, especially with regard to the lack, in Brazil, of a policy which respects community broadcasting. Community radio and TV transmissions could come to represent the realization of the principles contained in Article 221 of the Constitution, especially item II, which determines the "promotion of national and regional culture, and the stimulus of independent production which makes their promotion its objective".

Protection of children adolescents

The protection of children and adolescents also requires regulation by the State. Children and adolescents are people forming their identities and are vulnerable to certain types of discourses, needing to be guaranteed the obtaining of quality information.

It is here that the debate faces a dilemma. On the one hand it is necessary to guarantee children and adolescents' access to information. On the other hand, access to discourses incompatible with their level of maturity can harm the process of maturity.

Transmissions pose the problem as to whether or not the content is appropriate for certain age groups. This is especially notable on television. Contents such as sex and violence can, depending on the time they are exhibited, reach the age groups for which they are not recommended.

The Brazilian Constitution foresees that the authorities will classify programming with an informative purpose. The "indicative classification" has become regulated and, nowadays, is applied by a system which combines auto classification, indicating to the authorities, independently, the classification which is understood to be adequate for the program; and classification by the government which detains the power to disagree with the auto classification.

Considering the issue of protection for children, an urgent matter which is by no means adequately treated in Brazil, we stumble upon advertising directed towards children. Children are not empowered in a way which permits them to make contracts. Yet there is a daily rise in the amount of publicity directed towards children.

Studies demonstrate that people under eleven years of age do not have the capacity to differentiate between a true message and advertising. Publicity directed towards children take advantage of fragility and vulnerability. Regulation – or even the banning – of this type of publicity is urgent.

A media which is a great source of worry in terms of the protection of children is the Internet. There it is almost impossible for the state regulation to exist. Criminal law could be one of the few instruments that society has at its disposal, being very limited since the dangerous impacts on children are often the responsibility of those outside of national territory.

Hate speech

Another grave issue is what is called "hate speech", being a discourse which makes individuals, or groups of individuals, inferior, inciting prejudice and violence. Whether or not to regulate this type of discourse is a dilemma faced by constitutional democracies.

In Germany, a country which painfully bore the consequences of a manipulative political discourse, it is easier to justify the prohibition of discourses which cultivate hatred. This has resulted, to cite an example, in the criminalization of the use of the swastika. In the United States it is more difficult for banning to be accepted (BRUGGER, 2002). Nonetheless, the history of jurisdictional assessment on this issue demonstrates a gradual abandon of the position which makes liberty absolute. Decisions on the ceremony which burns the cross, carried out by the Klu Klux Klan, show this.

The discussion on the regulation of discourse connected with inciting hate is only one side of a larger problem which, using an expression by Owen Fiss, is the "silencing effect of the discourse". The discourse can impede other discourses, there being certain forms of discourse which need to be contained in their excesses by the State.

Much of our constitutional debate suffers from the influence of the North American debate on the first amendment, which determines that Congress cannot edit laws limiting freedom of speech and freedom of the press:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of reli> gion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

The difficulty, however, in the regulation of hate speech resides in the task of fixing boundaries between this type of discourse and the type which is merely inconvenient. We need to preserve the space for criticism even when its content makes us uncomfortable. However we must not tolerate the instigation of hate.

In 2001 the United Nations, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the Organization of American States fixed conditions which need to be respected in the regulation of hate speech:

No one should be penalised for statements which are true

No one should be penalised for the dissemination of hate speech unless it has been shown that they did so with the intention of inciting discrimination, hostility or violence

a.The right of journalists to decide how best to communicate information and ideas to the public should be respected, particularly when they are reporting on racism and intolerance

b. No one should be subject to prior censorship

c. Any imposition of sanctions by courts should be in strict conformity with the principle of proportionality.

With the internet we enter into contact with a higher number of hate speeches, raising the urgent matter of a national debate on the reach of the State in order to punish such discourse.

Right of acces

In times of printed media, the mere protection of an individual's freedom of speech, untouched by some form of censorship, was enough. Today, with regard to the media's far reach, the lack of balance between the haves and have-nots in terms of who has access is enormous. It is necessary for the State to have rules and policies to guarantee, for a greater number of people and groups, access to media channels.

In broadcasting there is the weighty problem of the limitation of the electromagnetic spectrum. Few are those who own radio or television channels. For this reason, to reserve spaces in programming for the access of political and social groups who are not owners of communication vehicles is very important.

In Brazil political parties have yearly access to time slots on radio and on television for their messages to be heard. This "right to access" could be extended to other social groups, guaranteeing more pluralism in broadcasting.

In the case of religious groups, the provision of reserved time slots in broadcasting could be an alternative to the current situation. Today, the church that has more money appears the most on radio or television. The State could organize access to times in the programming for the greatest possible number of religious entities, thereby balancing access.

It is also important for there to be a clear policy to grant incentives for community broadcasting. Current Brazilian legislation is excessively restrictive and the handling of administrative processes which evaluate requests for new community radios is slow and shows little transparency. This has led real initiatives for community broadcasting into clandestine ways of operating. State repression and the more powerful media become associated with one another in hunting down non-authorized radio stations. Besides this, the State needs to be active in financing the installation of community broadcasting.

Public television also offers a way to give media access to the greatest number of people. A television station which is not subordinated to the will of the governor, but which is open to social control and can reflect the society's pluralism has a lot to offer to democracy. It can even induce private communication companies to take on a heading for better quality in programming.

Still with regard to the problem of access, it is important to have a public policy for access to broad band. With the increasing importance of internet in people's lives it is fundamental for the individual to have quality access to the web. This question of citizenship will not be resolved by the logic of the market place.

Riks for regulation and the dilemma of auto regulation or hereto regulation

The reasons which justify the imposition of limits for media institutions can, however, sustain state interventions which suffocate the free circulation of information and the free manifestation of thought. There are strategies for the containment of excesses in media which can do without the special powers of the State. In this sense, it is important to highlight the so-called MAS (media accountability systems).

According to Claude-Jean Bertrand (2003) one is able to call MAS "any means to better media services for the public, totally independent of government". Included in this subject are institutions directed towards discussion of media quality – for example, the Press Observatory – the ombudsman, independent agencies of journalism regulation, ethics committees, amongst others.

The discourse of mere auto regulation is characteristic of the group which fears the State. As is convenient for communication businesses, who possess the great power to communicate afar, this position is today the one which is most widespread throughout Brazil. Businesses and business people fuel a discourse which says that to give the State the power to regulate the media will always result in censorship. They use "liberty of expression" as an alibi to achieve their market goals. They act as though they were the owners of the discourse of "liberty of expression".

The enemies of regulation always speak in the name of liberties. However, they fail to recognize that modern constitutional democracies function by looking for equilibrium between "liberal liberties" and "democratic liberties" (BOVERO, 2002). It is not just about guaranteeing, by way of a Constitution, free spaces for the individual, where one can behave without external constraints - the objective of liberties inherited from liberal constitutionalism. It is necessary for there to be a guarantee for the equal participation of these individuals in the formation of the general will, in decisions on public enterprising. A lot of the time, what is most threatening to political autonomy is, in reality, the manipulation of information and opinion, if one compares it to explicit constraint.

A democracy needs to guarantee liberty of expression. This individual power to manifest without external constraints on opinion is linked to the fundamental right to participation in the democratic process. Prohibitions on discourse can mean lack of balance in political dispute. For this reason they should always be looked upon with distrust.

In conclusion, I wish to summarize with these proposals:

a) media regulation is a legitimate activity and there are some reasons to regulate it; they are linked to the promotion of democracy;

b) there should be no conflict between self and state regulation: they should be complementary systems;

c) media ownership regulation needs to avoid monopolies and it also needs to limit cross-ownership;

d) child-protection demands the guarantee that parents can control the contents that children are accessing;

e) the punishment of hate speech needs to separate a dangerous discourse that incites violence from inconvenient opinion, which should be protected;

f) there should be a variety of rules to induce media access and the necessary policies, like access for social organizations in Broadcasting, or making broadband available to the public.
