First of all, literature puts us in deep contact with a language closer to the Poetic Myth and to the logos, not to the ratio, recovers a little of that essential relationship of man with speech. Therefore, provides us with the unveiling of the world different from the one proposed by method and scientific enunciative language. All that because language expresses a world view. As we widen language, we expand the horizon.

Literature presents us to a truth in the sense of the aletheia (covering/uncovering of being) and not in the sense of the roman veritas, which is based at the imperium and adequation (HEIDEGGER, 2008).

Whether discursive speech, which widens our horizon of possibilities, which operates the growth of the world by the representation, whether poetry, which establishes the game between the said and the unsaid and thus works with the ineffable truth.

Literature restores an original look upon the world, making possible that we face the question of identity and of our relationship to the other in a more authentic way, escaping the Anyone and the medianity. As a result, we can exist in the world without ambition to overpower it, or the other.

III – Literature as discourse

Secondly, literature acts as a form of discourse, of action in the free political space, and even as a form of expansion of this space. Considering that the polis is nothing but man's essential dome, were history of truth unfolds as the covering and uncovering of being (HEIDEGGER, 2008). The writer discourses and reveal who he, authentically, is (this happens with authentic literature), by unveiling the world and himself in the public space. Furthermore, literature traverses the spaces and allows the propagation of that discourse.

We can't forget the other side of discourse, which is dialogue. Thus, as literature is only consummated with reading and comprehension, she allows a dialogue between reader and the literary work, with the fusion of horizons, which can come to change the reader.

When Sartre (2006, pp. 20, 39, 41-46, 58) supports engaged literary work, at first we suspect he confers a clearly deliberate bias to literature. Afterwards, we understand that the engagement he has been referring to is nothing but the generosity of the writer toward his reader, since he trusts on the reader's freedom to interpret his work, recognizing, thus, his freedom. The opposite also occurs, since the reader allows himself to be changed by the literary work while setting the dialogue of comprehension.

IV – Literature in time

At last, we must mention the possibility of literature acting as a way to establish a dialogue with tradition that speaks through it. One of the characteristic of literature, which, we must say, cannot be dissociated from the way its content is streamed, in this case the writing, is its temporal way of being.

It means literature is in the temporal flow and not above it, out of it.

When we say a particular literary canon is timeless because surpassed the barrier of the time it was created and can be read at any time, we use the wrong expression, once literature, as the human being, and as a human creation, exists in time.

Therefore, literature doesn't belong to eternity, maybe to a certain immortality that escapes the finite course of human lives[5]. Men are distinct because they do not live the life of the specie, but authentic, different lives within their mortality. Despite their mortality, however, they can produce immortal works, which can act as traces of their former existence and identity.

[5] For the distinction between immortality and eternity see Hannah Arendt`s The Human Condition (2001, pp. 26-30).

Thus, Antonio Candido (2006) defines that literature's utmost role arises when we evaluate a literary works' ability to transcend, endure in time and talk to each present in a current way, as its content spoke to that particular moment.

It is worth saying that these literary works that transcend the occasion and reach other times demand a certain hermeneutic spirit (GADAMER, 2007), especially because the existence of literature is only consummated through reading, with the hermeneutic act of the reader or interpreter.

We are not talking about a reading attentive only to the comprehensive horizon in which the literary work was created, in an attempt to reconstruct the meaning of the work through the historical method. Is about a reading that takes literature-se temporal way of being into account, once it doesn't act as a mere recordation, but speaks as a "you" (tu) to the reader (GADAMER, 2007, pp. 467-468); its own content carries the moment represented through tradition's moving horizon and, each time we plunge more and more into the content, more we get close of the represented, considering the changes suffered in its various interpretations, relating to different contexts in different ways.

The hermeneutical experience causes at the same time a detachment and an appropriation (two moments: the output of ourselves and the return). From the moment we intend to understand a particular literary work, we are getting in contact with the entire tradition that speaks through the literary work and ourselves. Tradition becomes so an interlocutor with whom a dialogue is established (of understanding). In this dialogue, however, we can't intend to anticipate our interlocutor reflexively, becoming masters of tradition. On the contrary, we must recognize then our own historicity.

Opening to tradition, not only we allow us to be changes by it, as we establish with it an authentic relationship of freedom, of mutual belonging, unique and distinct for every relationship set.

Nowadays, it is worth saying that the voices of tradition are not unison, but multiple, both the ones that speak through us and the ones that come from other sources. Thus, address tradition's authority is quite complex.

Tradition's, or a particular tradition's, presence and authority are very relevant for formal education, which establishes with tradition, depending on the education model adopted, a relationship of submission. However, in order for tradition to arise also as a source of freedom, the link established must be also of formation: absolutely neither normative, nor dogmatic, but from the experience we would describe as strangeness, creation and appropriation. Accordingly, man breaks up with the immediate and overcomes the surrounding world, allowing the past to touch him profoundly and coming to project the future in an ingrained way.

Taking a distance from the daily world, occupy yourself with "something that in principle is of strange nature" leads to learning of the validity of what is odd, that starts to be taken in our being. Thus, we start to be determined by the strange that we choose welcome as ours (CALVINO, 2007) - "my classic". The unveiling of what is strange is, at the same time, our unveiling.

Thereby, the understanding and appropriation of literature, of its past and distant sense, carries the possibility of the return to us, of finding our own possibilities. We end up taking a part in the entire tradition as a common universe.

Accordingly, we are forming our memory that also needs to be formed as historical and mortal man's essential trace.

Only through forgetting and rupture with the past we can completely renovate our spirit, seeing everything with new eyes. However, this may bring drastic consequences for our freedom, considering that we may not understand anymore the influence of tradition on our actions and on the world were we have been thrown.

We can only think of freedom when we don't ignore the importance and influence of the past, coming in the form of tradition, in our being. Otherwise, we blindly submit to the authority of tradition.

Literature, that is essentially temporal in its way of being, hanging on time, provides this dialogue with tradition. Thenceforth, the right to memory acquires new meaning, extrapolating the look of historical conscience, and always pointing to an ingrained freedom and to the future.

V - Conclusion

We could conclude that literature acts by its way of being as an event and experience that is incorporated in the existence of writers and readers, as a way: (i) of understanding the world and building authentic personality and human ethics; (ii) of discourse and dialogue with another and with tradition, by the fusion of horizons and sharing of world views. Therefore, literature plays an important role in forming personality, ethics and the way of being of individuals, so that people are able to be-in- the-world and share it in an authentic manner, by allowing the comprehension and understanding of human rights in a familiar way, which makes sense in their existence.

References

ARENDT, H. A Condição humana. 10. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Forense Universitária, 2001.

ARENDT, H. Eichmann in Jerusalem: a report on the banality of evil. London: Penguin UK, 2006.

CALVINO, I. Porque ler os clássicos. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 2007.

CANDIDO, A. O direito à literatura. In: _____. Vários escritos. São Paulo: Duas Cidades, 2004. p. 169-191.

CANDIDO, A. Literatura e Sociedade: estudo de teoria e história literária. 9. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Ouro sobre Azul, 2006.

CHUEIRI, V. K. Shakespeare e o direito. Revista da Faculdade de Direito daUniversidade Federal do Paraná, Curitiba, n. 41, p.59-83, 2004.

COMPARATO, F. K. Ética: direito moral e religião no mundo moderno. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 2006.

GADAMER, H. G. Verdade e método I. 8. ed. Petrópolis, Bragança Paulista: Vozes, Ed. Univ. São Francisco, 2007.

HEIDEGGER, M. Carta sobre o humanismo. São Paulo: Centauro, 2005.

HEIDEGGER, M. Parmênides. Petrópolis: Vozes, 2008.

MAMAN, J. A. Fenomenologia existencial do direito: crítica do pensamento jurídico brasileiro. 2 ed. São Paulo: Quartier Latin, 2003.

MARX, K. A questão judaica. [S. l.]: Lusosofia, 1975. Available from: <http://www.lusosofia.net/textos/marx_questao_judaica.pdf>. Accessed on: 04 April. 2009.

MORSINK, J. The universal declaration of human rights: origins, drafting, and intent. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.

SARTRE, J-P. Que é a literatura? 3. ed. São Paulo: Ática, 2006.

Schlinks's "Der Vorleser" and the concept of Truth

Maria Clara Calheiros[1]

Abstract: Schlink's novel, "Der Vorleser", constitutes the starting point from which the author wishes to examine the recent debate on historical research and writing generated by the law approved by the French parliament that punished denial that the 1915-16 killing of Armenians was genocide. The fact is that nations worldwide, including those having democratic and authoritative governments, appear to be interested in exerting some kind of control on the historical narrative of past events. Therefore, this paper aims to engage in a comparative study of the meaning of the concept of truth used both in the legal and the historical fields.

Keywords: Schlink Truth History Memory Freedom of Speech

I. Introduction

In early 2012, I followed the press coverage of the lawsuit filed against Judge Baltazar Garzón, accused of having initiated a procedure to investigate crimes committed during the Spanish Civil War, covered by an amnesty law, and simultaneously followed the debate on the passing of a law by the French National Assembly on the Armenian genocide perpetrated by Turkish forces in 1915. To an external observer there was some paradox on these two events: while Spanish courts were trying to cope with legally mandatory oblivion, French legislators were ensuring the perennity of past events narrative through legal ruling.

What I found interesting was noticing that, in both events, there were obvious tensions between Law and History, with very different scenarios, motivations and interests. Eventually, I became especially interested in memorial laws and tried to understand its aim. And so, a question emerged, for which I have sought to find an answer: can law legitimately establish a historical truth? And even if it can, is there any benefit to gain from it?

[1] Associate Professor of law. University of Minho (Portugal) Law School. claracc@direito.uminho.pt. Unless otherwise noted, translations are mine.

In my analysis, for the sake of brevity, I will be focusing on the main arguments submitted in the debate around the laws of historical memory, so that I can, at a later stage, approach the issue through the contribution that I believe can be extracted from Schlink's work The Reader. This can be of use for two reasons: one internal, or substantial to the work itself, concerning what it can tell us about the truth of Law and the truth of History; and one external, related to the controversy ultimately generated by the work (revived by its film adaptation a few years ago) and the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the interpretation it proposes of Nazi Germany and, especially, of the issue of managing the problem of guilt by the second post-war generation.

Let us recall, only briefly and in very general terms, the plot of this novel: a teenage boy , Michael Berg falls, in love with a woman, Hanna Schmitz,who is old enough to be his mother, with whom he lives an intense relationship, which is abruptly ended by her, without any explanation. This causes him a certain emotional trauma. Years later, now a law student, the protagonist of this account, told in the first person, discovers, while following the trial of a group of former Nazi guards, that the woman who had been his lover was among those accused of a crime of mass murder of women who were prisoners in a concentration camp. This event generates a set of contradictory feelings in the protagonist, who cannot help loving this woman but simultaneously feels the need to repudiate and distance himself from her.

II. Law, History and Truth

It is after this disturbing discovery and faced with the need to deal with the consequences it entails, on a personal level, that the protagonist is confronted with the need to choose his legal profession. This is a choice that he will postpone for a long time, until indecision becomes unbearable. What I intend to take as a starting point for my analysis of the intersection between History, Law and Truth, are the pages of Chapter 4 of Part III of the book, where Michael describes his thoughts about the choice he has to make, his doubts and anxieties.

> I didn't see myself in any of the roles I had seen lawyers play at Hanna's trial. Prosecution seemed to me as grotesque a simplifica> tion as defence, and judging was the most grotesque oversimplification of all. […] That did not leave many legal careers, and I don't know what I would have done if a professor of legal history had not offered me a research job. Gertrud said it was an evasion, an escape from the challenges and responsibilities of life, and she was right I escaped and was relieved that I could do so. […]

>
> Now escape involves not just running away, but arriving somewhere. And the past I arrived in as a legal historian was no less alive than the present. It is also not true, as outsiders might assume, that one can merely observe the richness of life in the past, whereas one can participate in the present. Being a historian means building bridges between the past and the present, observing both banks of the river, taking an active part on both sides. One of my areas of research was law in the Third Reich, and here it is particularly obvious how the past and present come together in a single reality. Here, escape is not a preoccupation with the past, but a determined focus on the present and the future that is blind to the legacy of the past which brands us and with which we must live."

Thus, in this excerpt, dominated by an intense feeling of guilt and by a pressing need to understand Hanna's actions, we find the protagonist at a crossroads, in which he seems forced to opt between a life in service to the truth of law (which corresponds to a simplification of the truth - especially in what concerns the role played by the judge, as the character concludes) or the truth of history, presented as the perspective of the legal historian, one that he ultimately ends up choosing (perhaps because it liberates him from having to issue a final decision: to not take sides, to not judge? That which he is unable to do?) But surely because it appears to him as broader, more profound, less reductive. But even then, Michael realizes that he will always be too far from any point of arrival on his search for an explanation. After all, is this not an escape again?

Back to the present and to reality, keeping in mind the previous considerations, let us, thus, analyse the issue of memory laws and, in particular, the case of the controversial French law that gave rise to this reflection.

III. Truth and memory laws

States have often shown an interest in establishing an official version of history. This has been an old concern throughout the history of mankind and it has had several manifestations. European monarchies have had official chroniclers and, even before that, the writing of history had already been ordered from certain individuals. Therefore, the State's interest in history is not new and it continues to have different expressions. The Democratic States that emerged in Europe after the Second World War took on different roles as guardians of history: preserving vestiges and historical documents, ensuring the proper teaching of history, promoting historical research.

One of the most peculiar expressions of this guardianship of history by the States took the form of the so-called "historical memory laws." These have been present in different legal systems for decades, born as a result of some peoples' need for reconciliation with dark episodes of their past and the inherent sense of guilt. Not intending to be exhaustive, I recall the cases of Germany, Spain or France.

Despite the good intentions that, one may initially assume, rule these initiatives, the fact is that there is no consensus concerning them. It is true that what is often at stake is the protection of historical truth, in face of all kinds of denial concerning the serious crimes against humanity perpetrated in the twentieth century. However, it is equally evident that the immediate consequence - we should, in fact, say the only consequence - is restrictions on freedom of expression.

One of the disputed aspects of the recent French law of 2011 (which established punishments of one year in prison or a 45,000 euro fine for anyone who denied the Armenian genocide), eventually considered unconstitutional by the Conseil Constitutionelle on 28 February 2012, has to do with the fact that it addresses an issue that did not even relate directly to French history. Historian Gilles Manceron wondered whether France would create a law for every crime in the world, such as those of communism in Russia or the Indian genocide in America. For historians, highly critical of this kind of legislative initiatives, the real reasons that compel these lawmakers fall outside the scope both of historiography and law: it has ties to the political agenda.

Even after the decision of the French Conseil des Sages deeming the new law unconstitutional, although based on arguments related to the issue of separation of powers and disproportionate limitation of freedom of expression, the controversy remains and some have even considered it an opportunity to re-question other historical memory laws, in force in France.

But are all memory laws questionable? The opinions of historians are divided, as some admit that they can make sense in preventing the emergence of dormant anti-Semitic movements, for example, while others go as far as condemning all legislative interference in this field. There is, in the past, at least one example of trial and conviction of an historian (Bernard Lewis, professor at Princeton, tried by a Paris Court in 1995) for a crime of opinion.

The very Gayssot Act, of 1990, had already been subjected to trenchant criticism by historians such as Pierre Vidal-Naquet, condemning attempts to establish official truths and, in 2006, a petition was signed by 19 historians, demanding the repeal of the Gayssot Act, the Taubira Law on slavery and also the law demanding the inclusion of references to the positive aspects of the French colonization into school textbooks.[2]

The adoption of "historical memory laws" that intend to establish certain versions of the past and prevent, or at least restrict, their discussion was the subject of a lively dispute by historians, who prepared a manifesto whose terms are worth remembering:

> History is not a religion. The historian accepts no dogma, respects no prohibition, knows no taboos. […] History is not the moral. The role of the historian is neither to praise nor to condemn but to explain. The historian is not a slave to the present. The historian does not tack onto the past modern ideological formulations or introduce today's sensitivity into bygone events. History is not memory. The historian, in scientific steps, gathers people's memories, compares them with each other, juxtaposes them with documents, objects, traces and establishes facts. History takes memory into account but is not reduced to it. History is not a legal object. In a free state, neither the Parliament nor the judicial courts have the right to define historical truth. State policy – even driven by the best of intentions – is not the policy of history".[3]

But it was not just historians who felt, with discomfort, that a tendency to pass memory laws was emerging. Obviously, the debate goes on (with particular interest to us in this respect) also among jurists.

[2] RAIM; Laura, Génocide Arménien: les historiens ne veulent pas la loi, Le Figaro, 21.12.2011, electronic edition

[3] Available at www.ldh-toulon.net/spip.php?article1086

In fact, 56 legal experts from all over France signed an manifesto against the adoption of memory laws, considering that what is at stake is the free communication of thoughts and opinions. While taking into account the need to punish racist behaviours, it is believed that memory laws go too far, for, in them, under the guise of the indisputable heinous nature of the crime thus recognized, the legislator prevails over the historian in defining historical reality and issuing criminal sanctions based on that definition, which prevents not only the most simple and basic denial but also the very scientific debate around reality, determining the conditions of its development.

More recently, according to BADINTER(2012), in the absence of a judicial ruling with res judicata (as happened in the case of the genocide of the Jews, through the judgments of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg - a jurisdiction created by the London Agreement, of August 1945, and ratified by France), it would not fall to French legislature to replace the action of the courts. On the other hand, it is stated: "le Parlement français n'a pas reçu de la Constitution compétence pour dire l'histoire. C'est aux historiens et à eux seuls qu'il appartient de le faire." ("the French parliament has not been vested by the Constitution with the power to write history. Such is the exclusive role of historians.")[4]

IV. Truth of History and Truth of Law

So far, we have simply summarized the arguments presented within the debate sparked by historical memory laws, largely focused on issues related to freedom and its legitimate or illegitimate restriction. We should now adopt another angle for the analysis, which is that resulting from the ongoing discussion about the truth of law and the truth of history. We thus wonder if there are, after all, many similarities between the roles of lawyers and historians?

In truth, it must be said that the comparison and the search for similarities between the roles of jurists, especially judges, and historians is recurrent in the legal field. Those who have engaged in this endeavour generally emphasized that both these players were tasked with ascertaining the truth of past events through a set of means, clues or evidence, that only provide indirect access to them. A judge would, thus, also be involved in a historical research of bygone events, albeit less free (mainly limited to the contributions of the parties in the proceedings..., and with the leeway permitted by the law of evidence), but still with the same contours, assumptions and goals.

[4] Badinter, Badinter: "le Parlement n'est pas un tribunal", Le Monde, 14/01/2012, electronic edition available at www.lemonde.fr/idees/article/2012/01/14/le-parlement-n-est-pas-un-tribunal-par-robert-badinter_1629753_3232.html,

Criticism of this view seems necessary and obvious and many have expressed it before, so I will also present it here: the goal pursued by the historian is broader and, in truth, of a different nature, as he seeks not only to establish the singular facts, but rather explain them and frame them within their proper context.

In the words of the Portuguese historian José MATTOSO (1997, 38,39):

> In fact, History is no longer, as such, a literary discipline. It does not interpret any texts. The past is not a collection of human facts that memory retains or imagines, but the sum of those that can be deduced from concrete traces, materially imprinted by man on the surface of the Earth. […] Now, without establishing a precondition for the critical objectivity of data and their association in scientific terms, History, made into a mere narrative, is no different from fiction. With the disadvantage, in that case, of violating the rules of the game, that is, denying its fictional nature.
>
> However, the quest for positiveness in History must not lead us to forget that its contact with the past is made through signs and representations that mediate reality, and not by a direct examination of reality itself. Those signs are the marks left by the passage of Man, but they are also the very verbal or mental representations that allow us to choose which of them are considered representative. History is, therefore, a representation of representations. It's not exactly science, but knowledge.
>
> The role of history as knowledge and, consequently, the function performed by its communicability, paves the way for the examination of History as art."[5]

Thus, it seems we must[6] agree with those who advocate that the similarity between the roles of judges and historians is more apparent (and even illusory) than actual. A comparison between the two inevitably leads to an unacceptable simplification of the epistemological and methodological issues inherent to historiography[7] and to the judicial application of law.

5

[6] TARUFFO, M, la prueba de los hechos, 4ed, Madrid: ed. Trotta, 2011, pp. 336-341.

This is the moment to go back and recall the excerpt we have transcribed from "The Reader" and the character´s dilemma pictured there. It seems to us that the above mentioned simplification is precisely what the protagonist wants to avoid by choosing the profession of historian of law.

More than anything, the truth of law is never dissociated from the truth of the lawyer. Therefore, it can never have the same nature as historical truth. As we know, in Law, a fact is never sufficient in itself; instead, they are always hopelessly juridical. Let us recall the lesson of Professor CASTANHEIRA NEVES concerning the relationship between matter of fact and matter of law:

> When considering the matter-of-fact, the matter-of-law is implicitly present and relevant; when considering the matter-of-law, the joint influence of the matter-of-fact is indispensable. Or in a much more expressive formulation: "To tell the truth, "pure fact" and "pure law" are never found in legal affairs: fact does not exist but from the moment it becomes a matter of application of law, and law is moot if there is no application of fact; so when the lawyer thinks of fact, he thinks of it as a matter of law, and when he thinks [7] In fact, historians have been questioning the nature of historical truth for some time. There can be identified three different lines of attack on truth of history. The first one is based on the recognition of the constraints of evidence, meaning that historians have to find evidence which will enable them to draw inferences about the facts that interest them. The second one consists of the acknowledgement of the constraints of culture. In fact, historians have started to question whether their descriptions and inferences were not somewhat tainted by their own cultural circumstances. The last one is based on the constraint of language and was essentially drawn by postmodern philosophers like Roland BARTHES, Jacques DERRIDA and Jean-François LYOTARD. Barthes, for instance, argued that historians' description of past events represent a serious of concepts about the past but not the past itself. As historians don't generally recognize that they are just describing their ideas about the past, they generate a misleading effect on readers, convincing them that they are reading descriptions of reality. Furthermore, words do not refer to things in the world but just to concepts. In that sense, the truthfulness of any description depends on the meaning of the words in a certain culture and time. DERRIDA also pointed out that historical descriptions are in fact based upon others texts, mainly reports of people's experiences. Cfr. MCCULLAGH, C. Behan, The truth of History, London/New York: Routledge, 1998, pp. 13-42.

of law, he thinks of it as the form intended for fact"[8]

Note that we are not addressing the issue of debating the truth of norms, where ontological and epistemological arguments are wielded (is there a normative reality? is normative knowledge possible?), [9]but whether the establishment of a historical truth can legitimately be the object of a law. It seems undeniable that there is a certain historicity in the role of the jurist, especially the judge, inasmuch as legal proceedings recurrently entail a retrospective analysis of legally relevant events (as we have mentioned before). To put it simply, in this case, the goal is to extract certain legal consequences that follow from the establishment that certain events have occurred in the past. And that will make all the difference.

Let us frame the question within the scenario we were initially considering. In the case of historical memory laws, one might rightly argue that it is not only the matter of the knowledge - in and by itself - of the truth that is in question, but rather the establishment of guilt in the production of certain events and crimes against humanity. But, then, should it fall to the legislator or the judge to rule on those same events? Moreover, shouldn't it be up to an international body, rather than a third country, to play the role of arbiter?

Although a legitimate concern over the resurgence of radical movements, with racist, xenophobic and others of an equally discriminatory nature may deserve some understanding, we are forced to objectively recognize that, by giving legislature a say in the establishment of historical truths, we allow Law to invade the field of history and crys-

[8] Castanheira Neves, Questão (...), p. 55-56. In conclusion, the author advocates that: "Law is not an element, but a synthesis; not a premise for validity, but fulfilled validity (...); not prius, but posterius, not data, but a solution; not a starting point, but an outcome; it is not in the beginning, but in the end. (...) Thus, the methodological nonsense of the normative-subsuntive scheme becomes evident. It is not "law" that is set apart from "fact", as law is the normative-material synthesis in which "fact" is also an element, the very synthesis that is critically prepared and supported by the problematic distinction. And if we want to refer law to its previously accomplished objectifications (norms, institutions, precedents), then it must be taken into account that we can only think in juridical terms if we reestablish, within these objectifications of established legislation, that same constitutive problematic (and that same distinction)." Castanheira Neves, Questão (...), p. 586.

[9] On this debate, summarized, PINTORE, Anna, El derecho sin verdad, Madrid: instituto Bartolomé de las Casas, Dykinson, 2005, pp. 40 e seq.

tallize a necessarily simplified version thereof, leaving no room for nuances and deep insights, be it in History itself or in Art (as is also the case of fictional works such as The Reader).

In the case of memory laws, what seems worth pointing out is that legislature fixes an image of the past from which there are no concrete legal consequences, other than the prohibition to deny the interpretation given to the events in question, in the future. The only visible immediate result is produced in the jurisdiction of each individual, imposing restrictions on freedom of expression.

What kind of truth is that? It is certainly not one that is recognized as legal (it's extra-procedural, and oblivious to the adversarial nature of fact-finding in legal procedures contradiction), nor as historical (it is immutable and oblivious to the scrutiny of sources). Truths established by memory laws seem to serve neither Law nor History.

V. Memory laws: misunderstandings and risks

We further insist on the need to approach the issue from a different perspective: is there a protection of History here? Of its incorruptibility?

In our opinion, only apparently. The exercise seems to entail a betrayal or at least a misunderstanding of the very spirit of historiography. Moreover, currently, the real problem of researchers' freedoms and of the boundaries imposed on them seems to reside in much subtler aspects than the protection of official versions of History by legislature. Indeed, the very freedom of research and the ensuing reflection are essential elements for greater historical objectivity. The real problem, once again, has to do with the market. Judith SHULEVITZ tells us that today, in the United States, who decides the topics that students must write about "are the customers of Barnes and Noble".[10] Perhaps it is this market dictatorship, and its harmful effects on investigations, that we (or legislature) should be worried about.

Stiina LOYTOMAKI[11] has correctly pointed out the dangers of

[10] Apud Noiriel, Gérard, Sobre la crisis de la historia, Madrid: Ed. Cátedra, 1997.p.199

[11] Cfr. Law and memory, The Politics of Victimhood, 21 Griffith L. Rev. 1 2012, p. 18. We agree with the author when she states that "legal engagements in memory and identity politics tend to give rise to competition between victims and to heightened tensions concerning identity politics, leading to further polarisation of particular groups against each other and the state". Ibidem, p. 19.

manipulating memory and history through law. "The law turns private memories into public narratives", she says and adds "However, resorting to identity politics through the law is particularly efficient because the law, as noted above, forces particular groups' narratives to be recognized in universal terms. In historical discourse, there is no equivalent universal vocabulary to the one existing within law. Consequently, voices or narratives of particular agents, although celebrated for their particularity, can also be dismissed because of their 'subjectivity' and perspectivity." Law is, therefore, being used in a battle for recognition of past injustices. Memory constitutes often the basis of group identities based on victimhood.

On the other hand, there are obvious risks involved in an attempt to condition or restrict historical readings. One of them is a chance of it leading to aimless control that intends to establish itself as the censor of the very exercises of human creativity, namely Art and, particularly, literature.

Let us return once more to The Reader, this time, to analyse a few external aspects, namely, the controversy that surrounded it.

"The Reader" triggered widespread academic controversy surrounding the issues of guilt and shame. Even refraining from entering the dispute over the true interpretation of the text, and its possible hidden agenda, the work also seems to be easily associated with what some call secondary anti-Semitism. This can be defined as a backlash against the Jews, which feeds on the fact that the German Holocaust reminds the Germans of their guilt and prevents the full assimilation of the German identity[12].

[12] MUELLER, Agnes, Forgiving the Jews for Auschwitz? Guilt and Gender in Bernhard Schlink's Liebesfluchten 2007, 511-513. The summarizes the reasons that sustain current ongoing scholarly debate on Schlink'work: "Bernhard Schlink's international bestseller Der Vorleser (1995) sparked an important scholarly discussion on guilt, shame, and the so-called " Vergangen heitsbewltigung." In this debate, the text received praise for candidly taking on the subject of post-WWII German guilt and shame (Bartov, Niven, and Schmitz), yet was criticized for reintroducing familiar or tainted clichés and for affording Germans an easy way out of their feelings of guilt by turning them into "victims" of the Nazi regime (Schlant, Arnds, Donahue, Metz). These debates have not reached any definite conclusions for two reasons. First, they are intrinsically connected to how we read and how we identify with literary texts, urgent questions when it comes to literature dealing with the Holocaust, as Dominick LaCapra's work on writing trauma reveals convincingly. Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, if we understand literature to be the turf on which important matters of memory and identity are teased out and negotiated, and the interpretation of literature (by scholars and critics) as the field where this nego-

Indeed, once again, The Reader is a good example of a text that was subject to criticism and accused of revisionism or "bleaching" of German guilt. In this sense, Cynthia OZICK published an article (The Rights of History and the Rights of Imagination), addressing the fact that SCHLINK's novel leads us to feel empathy for a Nazi murderer. This author draws a very clear boundary between history and fiction, and the latter does not have to move within the limits of reality. There is, however, in her opinion, an exception: the historical novel, in which the aim is to "embody" history. In this field, there would be an added duty to respect factuality and historical truth. Thus, the author calls into question SCHLINK's true intentions in creating an atypical and inconsistent main character - the guard Hanna, who is an illiterate woman in a nation of educated people. Her conclusion points towards the manipulation of the reader, thus conditioned to feel empathy towards such a character[13].

Not wanting to excuse myself from getting to the bottom of the issue, i.e., whether or not the novel appears to be absolving the action of the German population during the Second World War, what straight away seemed disturbing to me when reading this book was precisely the fact that she leads us (by denying the reader access to Hanna's dark past) into a confrontation of mixed feelings of empathy and revulsion towards that woman. In fact, it seems to me that the work (most likely intentionally, given the author's circumstances) evokes the philosophical debate and controversy surrounding Hannah ARENDT and her book Eichmann in Jerusalem. A report on the banality of evil. In it, ARENDT seeks to address the need to deal with the behaviours of ordinary people

---

tiation is further reflected upon, then the continued debate on guilt and shame in Der Vorleser points to the fact that the difficulties Germans have with their history, memory, and identity are both ongoing and in need of further exploration."p. 511

[13] OZICK says: If virtually universal literacy was the German reality, how can a novel, under the rules of fiction, be faulted for choosing what is atypical? […] Characters come as they will, in whatever form, one by one; and the rights of imagination are not the rights of history. A work of fiction, by definition, cannot betray history. Nor must a novel be expected to perform like a camera. […] It would seem, though, that when a novel comes to us with the claim that it is directed consciously toward history, that the divide between history and the imagination is being purposefully bridged, that the bridging is the very point, and that the design of the novel is to put human flesh on historical notation, then the argument for fictional autonomy collapses, and the rights of history can begin to urge their own force. […] and that the unlettered woman in Schlink's novel is the product, conscious or not, of a desire to divert from the culpability of a normally educated population in a nation famed for Kultur.

(which Hanna is, undoubtedly), who, in different circumstances (other than in a totalitarian society that tolerated and endorsed the most abhorrent crimes) would not commit crimes.

It is generally accepted [14] that Hanna ARENDT failed to explain why some lose their ability to think and judge when in the context of a totalitarian society and others do not. SCHLINK's The Reader certainly does not offer any explanation. That could only come from Hanna, who explains nothing. But the work is effective in causing perplexity due to being confronted with "the banality of evil".

The reader's perception of his empathy towards a woman with a past such as Hannah's is disturbing, not because we are tempted to excuse her, but because we find that the face of someone who is capable of committing the most despicable crimes can be kind, or simply normal.

Personally, I do not think that such reasoning should be repressed or that it constitutes any kind of revisionism (but there is a danger that men without memory who enforce memory laws might think so), but is rather a way to remind us that no society, no civilization is exempt or safe from the possibility of embarking on the same monstrous adventure and, therefore, must be vigilant. In this sense, "The Reader" can be seen as a contribution to the contemporary movement of legal narratology, according to which, knowledge is so intensely personal, that it cannot be communicated through dispassionate reasoning, but only through the telling of stories that are themselves, inspirers of credibility.

Let us return to the philosophy in Hanna ARENDT. The author tells us: "The judges were obviously aware of how it would be comforting to believe that Eichmann was a monster, [...] The problem in Eichmann's case was that there were many like him, and these many were neither wicked nor sadistic, they were, and still are, terribly normal, frighteningly normal. From the point of view of our institutions and our moral values, this normality is much more terrifying than all the atrocities put together, as it implies (as was stated many times at the Nuremberg trials by the defendants and their lawyers) that this new type of criminal, being, in fact a hostis humani generis, commits crimes under circumstances that make it impossible for him/her to know or feel that he/she are acting wrongly."[15]

---

[14] Araújo, António e Nogueira de Brito, M., Arendt in Jerusalem, in Eichmann in Jerusalem. A report on the banality of evil, Portuguese edition, Lisbon: Tenacitas, 2003, pp.26 and 27.

[15] Arendt, H., op. Cit., p. 355 and 356.

VI. Conclusions.

As the main character of Schlink's book struggles with the need to cope with his nation's past and his own feelings towards the former Nazi guard Hanna, he hesitates endlessly about his career. In doing so, the character seems to be particularly aware of the challenge that constitutes establishing truth in the legal world. The paper focus on the character's dilemma as it enlightens the debate on the connection between legal and historical truth.

Indeed, and returning once more to the text of "The Reader", it becomes clear, in my view, that one admits that there is a difference between the positioning of the historian (even that of a historian of law), and that of the judge or lawyer, before the truth. The protagonist's choice of History of Law as a career path (in any case, an uncommon or unlikely choice, as other alternatives would be more attractive economically or even in terms of social prestige - as some exegetes of the book have pointed out[16]) appears to result from the choice of a less "simplistic" or "reductive" conclusion.

Assuming that no one possesses absolute truth, historical truth appears as a truth constructed from the parts of truth held by each individual, almost as if it were a puzzle.[17] That is, as a whole which is constructed by juxtaposing the pieces we can find.

In recent years, collective memory has become the subject of a vivid debate, as it has been used as the basis to establish group identity. Law is recognized as an important tool in this battle. It is certainly true that, due to its specific characteristics, resorting to the legal arena allows to generalize and universalize victimhood experiences. But not without a cost. As LOYTOMAKI says "The cost of playing identity politics through the law is precisely that historical complexity is lost.[18]"

[16] Vd., ROTH, J Reading and misreading The Reader, "Law and Literature", 6: "Choosing his profession after graduation, Michael rejects lawyer, judge, and prosecutor and chooses to become a legal historian. He will delve into thepast to uncover the truth."p.169.

[17] Cf. on this matter, Montoro Ballesteros, Verdad, método y conocimiento práctico, Murcia: DM editor, 2008, p. 18 and 19.

[18] LOYTOMAKI, op.cit., p.19.

The Systemic Effects As A Legitimate Aspect
In Institutional Theory[1]

Maíra Almeida[2]
Henrique Rangel[3]
Viviane A. da Silva[4]

Abstract: This article aims to analyze the systemic effects phenomenon in the institutional theory, mainly in its alleged legitimate aspects. The central democratic difficult of the gap between legal-normative and social reality grounds is presented, arguing that only by the institutions' exercise of their democratic role it is possible to promote a satisfactory bridge. It can be affirmed based on the institutional questions – institutional capacities and systemic effects. Analyzing this perspective, it is possible to urges the hypothesis of the legitimate aspect of systemic effects. The appearance of institutional problems, generally associated to negatives systemic effects, cause resistances to this approach process on legal and political grounds.

Keywords: Institutional Design; Systemic Effects; Legitimacy.

I. Introduction

There is a growing demand on the development of research in

[1] This article was produced in the framework of the Laboratory of Analytical and Theoretical Studies on Behavior of Institutions (LETACI), linked to the National Law School (FND) and the Graduate Program in Law (PPGD), Federal University of Rio de Janeiro (UFRJ), with funding from the Carlos Chagas Filho Foundation for Research Support of the State of Rio de Janeiro (FAPERJ) for competition of Notice No. 9 of 2011 (Case No. E-26/111.832/2011), and Initiation Scholarship -IC (Case No. E-26/102.240/2011), and the National Council for Scientific and Technological Development (CNPq) by the competition of the Call Universal 14/2011 (Case No. 480729/2011-5).
[2] Master in Contemporary Legal Theory at the Graduate Program in Law from the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro. E-mail: almeida.maira.1@gmail.com.
[3] Master in National Law School of the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro. E-mail: henriquerangelc@gmail.com.
[4] Student at National Law School of the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro. E-mail: vivisalmeida@gmail.com.

the field of institutional theory, highlighting the relevance of analyzes sensitive to phenomena such as institutional capacities and mechanisms and democratic values. It is a recent movement, sparked by a renewed perspective that deepens discussions with a bias more pragmatic[5] . The American constitutional theory, given its historical concern about institutional behavior, seems to be the most advanced studies on the topic. It is understandable, that this debate about the American constitutional theory can offer numerous benefits to the Brazilian democratic constitutional experience, and therefore should guide scientific papers sensitive to institutional problems and including this one.

When it is understood as an institutional turn, the problem of constitutional legitimacy is not limited only to the size and more normative- interpretive, based on criteria of theories of interpretation, deliberation and decision of a Constitutional Court. It is necessary today to conceive that the performance of institutional activity, as a whole, represents the possibility of setting and achieving a system efficiency of fundamental rights and thus ensure a new level for understanding the constitutional[6] legitimacy .

---

[5] This paper adopts an institutional positioning corresponding to North American perspective that renewed his studies, in terms of institutions, in the 1990s, with e.g GILLMAN, Howard; CLAYTON, Cornell. The Supreme Court in American Politics: New Institutionalist Perspectives. Lawrence, KA: Kansas University Press, 1999 e GRIFFIN, Stephen. American Constitutionalism: From Theory to Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999. Esta perspectiva recebeu maior definição a partir da publicação do artigo SUNSTEIN, Cass; VERMEULE, Adrian. "Interpretation and Institutions". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 28, 2002. Currently, the following theories are reference for this institution theory, among others: VERMEULE, Adrian. Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small. Cambridge, MA: Oxford University Press, 2007; PILDES, Richard. LEVINSON, Daryl. "Separation of Parties, Not Powers". Harvard Law Review, Vol. 119, 1, 2006; WALDRON, Jeremy. "The Core of the Case Against Judicial Review". The Yale Law Journal, Vol. 115, 1344, 2006; VERMEULE, Adrian. Judging Under Uncertainty: an institutional theory of legal interpretation. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2006; SUNSTEIN, Cass. A Constitution of Many Minds: Why the Founding Document Doens't Means What It Meant Before. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2009; POSNER, Eric; VERMEULE, Adrian. The Executive Unbound: after the madisonian republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2011.

[6] There is no question that in the study of North American institutional behavior, is a new paradigm to the problem of tripartition of powers, judicial review, popular sovereignty, among other topics, that are no longer recognized as absolute principles, but results of a performance of democratic institutions and their institutional designs. The

By recognizing the democratic institutions as responsible for the effectiveness of a normative-constitutional, is crucial to discuss the phenomena that are relevant to them. This proposal is complex and dynamic, not only by the roles and responsibilities constitutionally guaranteed (legal context), but also by the fact that it is guided by an interaction with the human aspect of social (political context) .

In this sense, delimiting the present study the phenomenon of systemic effects, and wonders whether it is possible to present an outline of the methodology and delimitation of this object - systemic effects - with the goal of better reading and analysis of institutional capacities in relation panorama of the democratic constitutional state.

This discussion, which seems to be the most current and critical about the democratic constitutional context should be brought to the debate in the academic and theoretical Brazilians in order to allow a new perspective of research and knowledge about the role of institutions and the legitimacy of its performance .

Nowadays the institutional theory, presents a number of problems and questions about the activity of the basic institutions of the institutional turn that we mention is summarized in the following passage: "In many ways the question of constitutional law is harder, simply because people disagree so sharply about what constitutes a good outcome. Ironically, however, constitutional law has already witnessed a significant if partial institutional turn: Many people emphasize that any approach to the Constitution must take account of the institutional strengths and weaknesses of the judiciary. Even here, however, we have seen that influential voices in constitutional law argue in favor of interpretive strategies in a way that is inadequately attuned to the issue of institutional capacities. Those who emphasize philosophical arguments, or the idea of holistic or intratextual interpretations, seem to us to have given far too little attention to institutional questions. Here as elsewhere, our minimal submission is that a claim about appropriate interpretation is incomplete if it does not pay attention to considerations of administrability, judicial capacities, and systemic effects in addition to the usual imposing claims about legitimacy and constitutional authority. But we have also suggested the possibility that in constitutional law, an assessment of those issues might lead to convergence, on appropriate methods, from those who disagree about what ideal judges should do". SUNSTEIN, Cass; VERMEULE, Adrian. "Interpretation and Institutions". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 28, 2002, p. 48.

---

state[7] vis-à-vis the constitutional[8] reality. Among the main problems, in-

[7] The idea of the basic structure of society is found in the work of John Rawls. He points the necessity of a justice as fairness to be applied directly to the basic structure of society, involving all the fundamental institutions that promote the principles of justice he listed. This basic structure of society would represent the set of political institutions, social and economic responsible for taking care of the essential issues of justice in a dynamic of interinstitutional activities supported by cooperative parameters. The main institutions of the State are given the responsibility of taking care of more substantial questions and that, therefore, attract more attention of citizens. The institutions of the basic structure will be democratic if they promote the principles of justice with the concern to respect the same deliberative parameter in benefit of constitutional order over the generations. The basic idea presented is, therefore, the activity of the institutions involved by a sense of cooperation from parameters already defined in the context of justice as fairness. It is also in this background that Rawls affirms the need of abandonment of comprehensive doctrines for the promotion of the principles of justice in political activity of State, filling-if the content of these principles of justice by means of public reason. Cf. RAWLS, John. Political Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993. Para uma análise nacional sobre o tema das instituições democráticas conforme a teoria rawlsiana, Cf. BOLONHA, Carlos; RANGEL, Henrique; ALMEIDA, Maíra. "A Teoria das Instituições Democráticas em John Rawls". Revista JurisPoiesis, Vol. 13, 89-102, 2011.

[8] In accordance with the Habermasian conception of internal tension in the concept of modern law, is adopted for the understanding of constitutional reality, a dualistic perspective concerning the possibility of the legitimacy be found, at least in principle, in two distinct elements: normativity and facticity. This idea of tension is striking in HABERMAS, Jürgen. Between Facts and Norms. Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy. Translated by Willian Regh. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1996. For a more synthetic passage, Cf: "(...) our understanding of modern law: we consider the validity of a legal norm as equivalent to the explanation that the state can simultaneously guarantee factual enforcement and legitimate enactment – thus it can guarantee, on the one hand, the legality of behavior in the sense of average compliance, which can if necessary be compelled by sanctions; and, on the other hand, the legitimacy of the rule itself, which must always make it possible to comply with the norm out of respect for the law". HABERMAS, Jürgen. The Inclusion of the Other: Studies in Political Theory. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1998, p. 255. In the last instance, which presents itself as central criterion for recognition of legitimacy is the presence of a stabilizing factor of the political order. This way, when you consider the deviation of the sphere of legality in search of legitimacy, it should be understood that the social demands that foster this deviation demonstrate the instability of the social and political order. For this reason, even acting outside the legal sphere, the coping and overcoming these difficulties of factual plan are sensitive issues the order of political legitimacy. In this sense, "Legitimacy is considered a measure for stability, for the legitimacy of the state is objectively measured by de facto recognition on the part of the governed. Such legitimacy can range from mere toleration to free consent (Zustimmung). Here the consent that creates legitimacy stitutional theory argues as one of its main themes, the systemic effects[9]. This is one of the specific aspects of the institutions when they establish repercussions of various kinds, such as legal, political or administrative, between them, for itself and in its relationship with democratic citizens[10]. This phenomenon is the challenge for an institutional theory that directly interacts with a democratic constitutional theory.

It identifies and analyzes the systemic effects on the legal-political dimension that affects the performance of institutional activity and therefore hinders the realization of basic rights and constitutional[11] norms. Contrary to the chains of traditional[12] constitutional theory in is based on subjective reasons that claim to be valid inside the currently accepted 'ideological frames'; but these reasons resist objective assessment. One legitimation is as good as another, so long as it sufficiently contributes to stabilizing a giving political order. According to this view, even a dictatorship must be considered legitimate so long as a socially recognizes framework of legitimation enables the government to remain stable. From this perspective of the theory of power, the quality of the reasons are without empirical significance". HABERMAS, Jürgen. Between Facts and Norms. Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy. Translated by Willian Regh. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1996, p. 290.

---

[9] It is the phenomenon identified in SUNSTEIN, Cass; VERMEULE, Adrian. "Interpretation and Institutions". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 28, 2002,in the framework of democratic institutions and in the legal-political.

[10] GRIFFIN, Stephan. American Constitucionalism: From Theory to Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.

[11] For this understanding, it is possible to recognize the idea of rights system recommended in HABERMAS, Jürgen. Between Facts and Norms. Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy. Translated by Willian Regh. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1996, p. 104/122. As such configuration, there are 5 (five) categories of basic rights. The first three correspond to the rights of free choice and personal autonomy - basic negative liberties, civil rights and procedural guarantees. The first category, however, may not be properly implemented if, previously, is not achieved the fourth category of the system, the rights of political participation. This is because without achieving a good political participation, all fundamental rights of private autonomy are in the field of paternalism, to the detriment of self-governance of the community. The fifth category of basic rights, however, is assumed for the actual realization of all the others. The rights of social well-being form a category that represents the rights concerning the minimum material conditions of existence, indispensable to a full exercise of private autonomy and political participation.

[12] It is, basically, as constitutional theory, the traditional German constitutional theory. In this regard, Cf. KELSEN, Hans. Teoria Pura do Direito. Trad. João Baptista Machado. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 1996; HELLER, Hermann. Teoría del Estado. Buenos Aires: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1992; HESSE, Konrad. Temas Fundamentais do Direito

the second half of the twentieth century, the institutional activity arises from the performance of their capabilities and systemic effects that they cause and suffer in a reflexive dimension. The research which we hereby adopts has the institutionalist perspective on the effects related to systemic institutional capacities. The study of this phenomenon requires a methodological concern to outline your problem, its concept, its classification and its importance as base a legitimate institutional activity. Wanted also to understand the influence of institutional problems on the performance of institutional activity, and how the institutional capacity and the systemic effects can overcome them as legitimate[13] aspects.

The predictability of systemic effects in the institutional sphere can be considered as a new parameter of legitimating democratic constitutional theory, the resulting context of the systemic effects of democratic institutions is the degree - major or minor - the constitutional legitimacy of a state. It is under this thesis argues that the present study in its methodological dimension .

To be taken as a parameter of concrete investigation of the effects of systemic institutional reality of the democratic rule of law , there is a central problem. There is often a mismatch between the formal legal - constitutional - legal - and institutional performance plan - political - because the institutions do not always reconcile with degree of accountability and transparency necessary, the legal provisions and the democratic[14] expectations. In fact, the democratic conduct is consolidated from the performance and behavior of the basic institutions of society,

---

Constitucional. Trad. Carlos dos Santos Almeida, Gilmar Ferreira Mendes e Inocêncio Mártires Coelho. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009; SCHMITT, Carl. O Conceito do Político. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2009; SMEND, Rudolf. Constitucion y Derecho Constitucional. Madrid: Centro de Estudios Constitucionales, 1985.

[13] About the institutional problems Cf. BOLONHA, Carlos; EISENBERG, José; RANGEL, Henrique. "Problemas Institucionais do Constitucionalismo Contemporâneo". Direitos Fundamentais & Justiça, Vol. 17, 288-309, 2011.

[14] Democratic institutions do not boil down to a conception of representative institutions. For more who do not want to, in this work, establish an own idea of democracy or immerse yourself in a deeper discussion about the topic, to be sure, the idea of democracy adopted does not boils down to this plan. The understanding of a democratic institution might involve other criteria, especially the political conception of justice of rawlsiana basis. In accordance with these criteria of evaluation on the exercise of institutional activity, it is possible, even, that a conclusion has been reached a power elected not be democratic and, at the same time, the judiciary being.

beginning with their own powers of State. Discuss performance and institutional behavior is to understand the phenomenon of institutional capacities and systemic effects, since its concept to its practical dimension. This means that the democratic state should know the actual role played by institutions in setting their " constitutional life " . Thus, it is not enough just analyze the dimension of skills formally recognized for their powers and institutions, but especially check the reflective exercise and dynamics between institutions and their consequences, which is generically called institutional[15] dialogues.

[15] The constitutional theory recognizes the beginning of the debate on institutional dialogs to a survey about the relationship maintained between judiciary and legislative in moments of declaration of unconstitutionality in work HOGG, Peter; BUSHELL, Allison. "The Charter dialogue between Courts and Legislatures: or perhaps the Charter of Rights isn't such a bad thing after all". Osgoode Law Review, Vol. 35, 1, 1997. Although the Canadian experience, where it sparked the debate, has not met many practical examples, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides for Clause 33, known as notwithstanding clause. It is a permission to legislative to suppress the effectiveness of a judicial declaration of unconstitutionality. The term "dialog" aims to reassemble the idea of a frequent communication between the two powers to resolve a single issue, but, throughout the debate, other authors have tried to widen the spectrum of this dialog, whereas other situations in addition to the declarations of unconstitutionality, Cf. LECLAIR, Jean. "Réflexions critiques au sujet de la métaphore du dialogue en droit constitutionnel canadien". Revue du Barreau du Québec, avril, 2003. The relationship between judicial and legislative, however, has always been central to the debate, influencing a dualistic perspective under which the dialogical theories are commonly released: institutional dialogs vs. judicial supremacy. This clash elects, as the main criterion, the existence of the power to say the last word in certain constitutional controversy. Thus, if the power belongs to the judiciary, identifies a judicial supremacy. Otherwise, we identify, in general, there are institutional dialogues. Perhaps this view of opposition is not the most appropriate to analyze this phenomenon, as there are other situations able to identify a judicial supremacy - as the political nature of the decisions, the degree of constraint of these decisions, as well as the systemic effects generated by it. It is possible, however, sustain a different perspective of institutional dialogs, displacing the parameter analysis for the idea of cooperation. Instead of restricting this phenomenon to a dimension of consecutive acts practiced between the powers in the solution of a same controversy, institutional dialogs can represent moments in which the performance of institutional activity complies with the other institutions, seeking cohesion between si and stability in democratic constitutional order. With a perspective next to this type of activity on the Supreme Court of the United States, particularly, MCCANN, Michael. "How the Supreme Court Matter for the American Politics: New Institutionalist Perspectives". In: GILLMAN, Howard. CLAYTON, Cornell. The Supreme Court in American Politics: New Institutionalist Interpretation. Lawrence, KA: University of

II . The importance of the theory of institutional and systemic effects

The study of institutional theory assumes, that they examine the systemic effects, consideration of at least three well-defined issues .

Firstly, the constitutional theory of the second half of the twentieth century was consecrated by a tradition of German parent enrolled the reflections of normative order (Hans Kelsen), phenomenological (Konrad Hesse) , interpretive (Peter Häberle), deliberative (Jürgen Habermas) and argumentative (Robert Alexy). This matrix brought the main argument regarding constitutional law and constitutional democracy as an element to be solved before the binomial law and politics. In fact, this proposal was of great value to consecrate the effective role of the constitutional state in the era of the promotion and expansion of fundamental rights. This theory did not bother to investigate the phenomenon in terms of constitutional activity itself democratic institutions. That is, the role of the effectiveness of fundamental rights was restricted to a limited plan of formal exercise of acts and decisions taken in isolation institutions, in particular the Constitutional Court. Undoubtedly, the problems faced by such a theory pose a challenge to the program of contemporary democracy. Here is not treating them. It should be noted, however, that such research methodologies constitutional (theories themselves) did not bring in sufficient clarity, the discussion of the plan of the facts. They did answer how much the norm is instrumentalized in the size of democratic institutions. Missed these theories point with clarity the importance of institutional behavior of those institutions that deal with constitutional effectiveness. Regarding the phenomenon of systemic effects in particular, the theoretical perspective shifts to the behavior of institutional activity. It is argued here that the systemic effects represent a real instrument that can give character to the activity legitimating legal and political institutions when they determine the dynamics and configuration of democratic life in the performance of its duties and functions.

Secondly, the current constitutional theory is still committed to the assumption principiológico of separation of powers, structured on a division of powers and checks and balances mechanisms. This model Madisonian separation has been criticized and demonstrates certain fragility in receiving considerations that the powers should be exercised in a cooperative and deployed in institutional activity as a whole[16]. Perhaps there is no difference of interests, level of expertise, the powers of the State to control, but a difference in the political interests of those who are within the institutions as advocates Richard Pildes[17]. In this case in particular, the central perspective arises analysis of the systemic effects since the performances influenced by expressing claims party ideologies and compromises well defined. It is understandable , therefore, that a new conception of the idea of separation of powers issue is sensitive to systemic effects, since it is at the top of these institutions we observe examples of impact with greater intensity.

---

Kansas Press, 1999.

Thirdly, there is a problem of methodology among theorists investigating institutional behavior and in particular the phenomenon of systemic effects. Authors such as Stephen Griffin, who analyze the judicial supremacy within a dialogic theory are involved with a major concern, but simplified the relationship between the powers, not deepen the analysis of systemic effects[18]. When considering present ourselves in a conceptual dimension without care to elaborate in more detail delimiters and scientific criteria for understanding the institutional dynamics. This weakness in the methodological causes a challenge to contribute to a study aimed at developing such criteria. One can understand that the institutional designs and institutional dynamics depend on a more adequate understanding and classification of the reality of systemic effects, the study of a methodology relevant to their conceptual understanding and their own achievement.

Institutions promote within its capabilities the interpretation of the Constitution and the rules infra. The U.S. debate develops an understanding that this process needs to consider the so-called institutional issues[19]. These divide into it, at least, as already pointed out, institutional capacity and systemic effects. Such understanding is one critical thinking as opposed to current perfectionists, especially in relation to judges, who traditionally hold the legitimate prerogative of interpretation[20]. The

[16] TREMBLAY, Luc. "Le Fondement Normatif du Principe de Proportionnalité en Théorie Constitutionnelle". Mercredi, Vol. 21, 2009.

[17] PILDES, Richard. LEVINSON, Daryl. "Separation of Parties, Not Powers". Harvard Law Review, Vol 119, 1, 2006.

[18] GRIFFIN, Stephen. American Constitutionalism: From Theory to Politics. Princeton University Press, 1996.

[19] SUNSTEIN, Cass; VERMEULE, Adrian. "Interpretation and Institutions". Chicago Law School Public Law & Legal Theory Working Papers Series, No. 28, 2002.

[20] The perfectionist perspective that identifies in large part with the figure of Judge Her-interpretive activity, however is not restricted to the plane of the judiciary, because all institutions covered in normative and functional assignments in a constitutional democracy have a role to play. One way of performing this is precisely the interpretive activity of these institutions and the like that cause effects.

The interpretative and deliberative activities thus should consider the institutional aspects as their own results, as well as how the institution is prepared to meet the social demands they receive[21]. These institutional aspects serve as parameters to define the limits of a legitimate institutional activity. Institutional capacities represent an institutional phenomenon related to the possibilities of the agent to raise resources cules, defined in accordance with the following: "I must try to exhibit that complex structure of legal interpretation, and I shall use for that purpose an imaginary judge of superhuman intellectual Power and patience who accept law as integrity. Call him Hercules". DWORKIN, Ronald. Law's Empire. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1986, p. 239. A harsh criticism, however, is formulated by Cass Sunstein in: "Or consider perfectionism: the view that the Constitution should be construed in a way that makes it best, and in that sense perfects it. Imagine a society—proudly called Olympus—in which the original public meaning of the document does not adequately protect rights, properly understood. Imagine that the text is general enough to be read to provide that protection. Imagine finally that Olympian courts, loosened from Thayerian structures, or from the original understanding, or from minimalism, would generate a far better account of rights and institutions, creating the preconditions for both democracy and autonomy. In Olympus, a perfectionist approach to the Constitution would be entirely appropriate". SUNSTEIN, Cass. "Second-Order Perfeccionism". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 144, 2006, p. 3. It should be stressed, however, that the present study is not limited to a subjective perspective as to which Ronald Dworkin has proposed to do. Despite its importance, the figure of the judge or of the judiciary does not exhaust the limits of this study. The study on systemic effects here developed dates back to the totality of the institutional order in a dynamic perspective and dialogic. Therefore, it is not disputed the legitimacy of normative and formal judge in interpreting the Constitution and other statutes, but the legitimatory aspect existing in resulting from the effects of an institutional performance exercised in practical terms. In summary, the human elements as the judge are taken seriously, but the target of the responsibility to develop its democratic role is necessarily assigned institutions.

---

[21] SUNSTEIN, Cass; VERMEULE, Adrian. "Interpretation and Institutions". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 28, 2002; BOHMAN, James. Public Deliberation: Pluralism, Complexity and Democracy. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1996; and BOHMAN, James; REHG, William. Deliberative Democracy: Essays on Reason and Politics. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1997 are central references adopted for the understanding of interpretation and determination in this study.

and information balizem your understanding[22]. Likewise, specialization is a factor that combines greater institutional capacity for action, an in-depth knowledge about the theoretical and empirical debates about the facts related to its activity . Systemic effects, in turn are related to the prediction of the activity in the first place, will not reach people in a negative way , public and private institutions. Second the systemic effects represent the effects of the activity and institutional capacities which, in turn congregate factors that enable prediction of systemic effects themselves. Therefore according to this perspective, the institutional activity should promote interpretations and propose resolutions, moving away from a strictly normative, when they are accompanied by favorable institutional issues in meeting social[23] demands.

[22] Resources and information are understood as elements of utmost importance for the implementation of institutional capacities, not eliminating the possibility of the existence of other factors with equal function. The resources would be a factor capable of covering some conditions in which it is the institution, such as finance, logistics, or even human. The information, however, has been presented as an issue much more challenging in the study of institutional behavior over the decades. This occurs because the possibility of the agent responsible for performing certain allocation ignoring some information, or even hold incorrect information or with some degree of inaccuracy. Such situations could lead to problems such as the uncertainty and the error in moments of interpretation, deliberation or decision. Information and uncertainty are themes already faced by Robert Dahl and Adrian Vermeule, it seems, however, that there is still no provision for a cognition of these satisfactory matters. Dahl faces these issues when considering the role that the Supreme Court would be exercising in the national policy of the country: "A policy decision might be defined as an effective choice among alternatives about which there is, at least initially, some uncertainty. This uncertainty may arise because of inadequate information as to (a) the alternatives that are thought to be 'open'; (b) the consequences that will probably ensue from choosing a given alternative; (c) the level of probability that these consequences will actually ensue; and (d) the relative value of the different alternatives, that is, an ordering of the alternatives from most preferable to least preferable, given the expected consequences and the expected probability of the consequences actually occurring. An effective choice is a selection of the most preferable alternative accompanied by measures to insure that the alternative selected will be acted upon". DAHL, Robert. "Decision-Making in a Democracy: The Supreme Court as a National Policy-Maker". Journal of Public Law, Vol. 6, 280, 1957. Vermeule, in turn, has directly confronted the issue in VERMEULE, Adrian. Judging Under Uncertainty: an institutional theory of legal interpretation. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2006, strengthening his views by defending mechanism called veil of uncertainty that intends to promote the democratic value of impartiality by excluding the agent's knowledge of certain results of its operations: "A veil rule, I shall say, is a rule that suppresses self-interested behavior on the part of decisionmakers by subjecting the decisionmakers to uncertainty about the distribution of benefits and burdens that will result from a decision (...) Veil rules suppress bias that arises from information. That bias need not to be based on self-interest, although it may be. (…) Bias arising from self-interest is the major worry where government officials are concerned, and will be my focus. To the extent that veil rules suppress both self-interested decisionmaking and other forms of biased decisionmaking, so much the better". VERMEULE, Adrian. Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007, p. 31-32.

This means that, contrary to the claims by the theories perfectionists - the adoption of a democratic trend with the first -best - the institutional activity, in a democratic state, must comply with the second-best model of democracy[24]. Institutions are certain limitations in their activity that perfectionists disregard. Not respecting these constraints can give rise to high severity incidents damaging, inflicting damage on the social and even institutional a reflexive manner. Thus, there are so-

[23] The social demands are understood in a manner associated with the phenomenon of expectations that citizens exert on the institutional activity. These expectations represent important social demands for rights with potential impact on the legitimacy of institutional activity. The existence of great expectations may reveal that many individuals aspire a status of subject of rights, whether by way of innovation, is normative for the desire to execute the plan that this legal-formal had assured him. In summary, the growth of expectations about a given situation, if there is already discipline legal or constitutional, indicates difficulties in enforcement of rights. According to this logic, the expectations may have nature of systemic effects in institutional order. You can consider a case in which the promotion of a right is assigned to an institution, however, it resists to give effectiveness. Among the systemic effects of this case, it is possible to create expectations about other institutions that by prerogative functional can give it attention. The expectations are an instrument for the measurement of a real performance of institutional activity, and it may reflect in a different institution that gave it cause. The assistance to expectations of rights represents a performance by the introduction of an important democratic role, especially when social demands are structured in a more critical socioeconomic context, the example of companies recognized as emerging or peripheral.

[24] The firts best idea comes of economics, and it can be leveraged in law. When an existing limitation precludes the reach of an optimal point, we start from this limitation towards the solution that is closest to this. When we admit these limits, the same reasoning can be applied to institutional activity, discouraging institutions to interpret and act as if they could achieve perfect results. With this, the best output shall be between the ideal and what is achievable by institutional activity. It is the second-best model democracy. VERMEULE, Adrian. "The interaction of democratic mechanisms". Harvard Law School Public Law & Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 09-22, 2009.

cial demands that require a more significant preparation for coping.

The problems that have faced institutional activity can be countered by changes in a reduced dimension of institutional design adopted. Great changes may not be the most democratic solution strategy. Rather, the design of institutional mechanisms in order to meet the democratic values seem more effective measures than changing arrangements of larger scale[25] . Considering the possibility of replacing the separation of powers, severe changes would be required, starting with the Constitution itself, with other factors refractory to such proposal. The approval of a change of this magnitude would find resistance at the political, social and legal repercussions significantly in public life . As much as some institutional arrangements - such as the separation of powers - are having problems, his mangling a task seems difficult to achieve . Therefore, the effort to identify existing mechanisms, or try to design new mechanisms in a sphere smaller institutional design presents itself as a more strategic manner. Ultimately, we discuss solutions for a more efficient institutional activity with science that redesigns must occur on a smaller scale. Systemic effects are presented as an important phenomenon to mark a new perspective of institutional design when they could ensure a dimension of institutional legitimacy of the reflexive and systemic.

The specification of the object of analysis, systemic effects, presented here does not refer to any order passed in the practical activity of the institutions. The aim is to outline a study limited by institutional theory regarding the consequences strictly in a political- legal framework between the institutions themselves in performing their democratic activities that promote a rearrangement of the prevailing institutional design. To do so, you must conceive of how this phenomenon of institutional order is defined conceptually and understand the real plane, the universe of possibilities that present themselves in this sphere. For this analysis exercise that can understand how the systemic effects represent a phenomenon essential constitutional legitimacy, since they embody the constitutional reality while democratic exercise and not simply the democratic formalism.

III . Institutional issues and the characteristics of systemic effects

[25] The present study shares the vision that are democratic values the impartiality, accountability, transparency and the deliberation, Cf. VERMEULE, Adrian. Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007, p. 4.

The democratic state often presents some problems that reflect institutional framework "threatening" the constitutional proposal is founded. These problems involve a dimension of legal content - political and administrative that are not always observable by scholars and can not be confused with the very systemic effects .In fact, the constitutional theories despite all the advances that have brought in terms of institutional design in recent decades, not focused, with due care, institutional problems relevant in order of performance of institutional activity.

Calls institutional issues, long have been neglected by interpretive theories, legally, as always sought to know "what I would do if I were a judge"[26]. With this, institutional issues of significant impact on the juridical and political order were not observed in models and techniques played throughout history and constitutional law. What can be seen today is the indispensable need to identify what an institution in circumstances where you are, and may need to make when confronted with some controversy. This means that the institution, rather than idealize the activity that must hold, need to understand what mechanisms has to perform his activity without producing, for example negative effects on the social order. The study of institutional capacity meets an idea of vices and virtues of formalism that may clarify some institutional[27] phenomena. The formalism is notably restrained behavior without advance predictions against existing standards and regulations. Rather in its Anglo-Saxon tradition seeks gradually establish new standards for deciding as a safe progression of interpretive[28] activity. Institutional theory, however has a distinct understanding of formalism, assigning it a role of strategic action. Formalism in general would be an exit strategy for times when the institution does not have the institutional capacity to address a controversy[29] height. Thus, the safest way not to make big mistakes, or breaking up with the stability of for example important precedents in the matter, for example would be a more strict set of for-

[26] This is the central critique of the interpretive tradition of thought in law formulated in SUNSTEIN, Cass; VERMEULE, Adrian. "Interpretation and Institution". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 28, 2002.

[27] This idea comes from Alexander Bickel and is rescued in the work SUNSTEIN, Cass. One Case at a Time: Judicial Minimalism in the Supreme Court. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

[28] SCHAUER, Frederick. "Formalism". Yale Law Journal, Vol. 97, 4, 1988.

[29] This strategic understanding of formalism is in SUNSTEIN, Cass; VERMEULE, Adrian. "Interpretation and Institutions". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, Np. 28, 2002.

mal terms. According to this strategic understanding, the next vicious behavior presents itself when formalistic institutional capacities allow supply problems that the standard does not identify or can not overcome; when the virtuous side missing institutional capacity and this is cause for a more subdued activity, preserving up and avoiding mistakes.

In this contexto, it is necessary to differentiate which would be institutional problems in this order of performance that would be exactly the systemic effects. Firstly, to understand systemic effects means knowing their positive or negative implications on the institutional order. Second, these negative implications go pari passu with what we call institutional problems.

For a more well-defined systemic effects, it is possible to consider the existence of three characteristics that are central[30]. The first feature of the systemic effects is the dynamic process by which it is driving, involves the entire institutional in that there is a permanent dynamic and continuous development. Thus, the systemic effects are always responsible for bringing successive implications of institutional activity to other institutions or itself.

Institutions when suffering the implications of systemic effects depend on their institutional capacities. This occurs because the second characteristic of systemic effects: the degree of performance of the activity must have its respective institutional support in terms of institutional capacity. When institutional performance in response to the demands of the systemic effects do not reach their level of institutional capacity, institutional problems arise. Thus an institutional problem is the result of the failure of an institution to respond to the consequences of the systemic effects through their institutional capacities. In summary, the second characteristic of systemic effects is its potential to give rise to institutional problems. Evidently, this problem will produce other systemic effects, with the trend that they are negative.

The third characteristic of systemic effects is in a legitimatory-democratic dimension and institutional activity. The relationship between systemic effects and institutional capacities can be adopted as a new approach to the phenomenon of legitimating institutions. As the performance of institutional activity occurs in a more or less problematic and in accordance with its institutional capacity this will entail other effects to the social sphere. This will be the parameter to argue in an institutionalist perspective, there is legitimacy in institutional activity.

[30] These three characteristics are being developed throughout the research, there is not, strictly speaking, prior treatment in institutional theory.

The exercise of institutional activity in ensuring and promoting a rights system should be therefore aware of the practical difficulties this institutional level affecting the very character of legitimating their performance. It is possible to exemplify these institutional problems through situations mentioned here as: (I) reductionism of institutional activity ; (II) isolationism institutions; (iii) institutional ideology of statism; (IV) personalism and (V) conformism[31].

Such situations of institutional order can be observed from a perspective triad between institutional dialogues, institutional capacity and systemic effects. Firstly, the dynamic reality interinstitutional presents the so-called "institutional dialogue" when at the normative and practical level the interaction takes place between institutions, which generally is characterized as institutional design either by prescription normative-constitutional, whether by the exercise of institutional activity. Secondly, the institutional capacity to own dimension of potential intra-institutional performance. And finally, the systemic effects that represent the results of the activity itself institutional rules is not necessarily provided or practically. It is clear that institutional dialogues represent a formal composition or exercise between institutions with a degree of predictability, whereas systemic effects indicate splits isolated or combined to reflect consequential and subsequently results in other institutions, including with degree of unpredictability. It is exactly the composition of factors that would meet the above mentioned situations.

IV. Institutional issues and implications

The democratic constitutional order beyond considering the terms settled normatively, should turn their attention in a reflexive perspective on what has been, in fact, the mobile transformation of social reality: its institutions. While traditional legal theories maintain that the effectiveness of the plans is the norm, it is argued that it is the real guarantee of basic rights and promoting the true meaning of institutional[32] activity. As much as constitutional theory has evolved and surpassed the limits of so-called "democracies" the rule is that institutional problems still present themselves as factors of resistance, or even of a barrier to a satisfactory plan development factual -social. It can be argued that this difficulty remains democratic over the generations as institutional problems are not addressed.

[31] These are institutional problems identified in the present study, without prior treatment in institutional theory.

[32] GRIFFIN, Stephen. American Constitutionalism: From Theory to Politics. Princeton: Princeton, 1999.

The limited experience democratic constitutional Brazilian is possibly one of the main causes of this difficulty democratic. Insufficient parameters guiding the activity of the institutions that are structured according to the constitutional experience. In the subjective performance of the institutional agent, for example it can be seen how difficult and complex performance autonomous and effective when it lacks guidelines. Such situations can lead pipes legalistic character, for example and they do not always promote the democratic role of that institution to the recipients of your activity. As identified above, there are some institutional phenomena that stand out and influence the degree of legitimacy in the dimension of systemic effects.

The phenomenon of reductionism (I) of institutional activity is when the institution does not recognize the political role that has within the democratic order. There are situations that cause institutional activity and should not be answered merely legalistic , and herein lies the problematic nature of this phenomenon. This represents the vice of formalism in which the institution reduces the political dimension that has within a democratic order, recognizing only the normative-legal aspects of its activity.

Isolationism (II) is when the activity is not exercised in cooperative mode. The institutional order, so it can be understood as a system need to watch dialogic mechanisms between institutions. Such mechanisms may increase institutional capacity for matters that are beyond the expertise of an entity now receive support from one who holds the highest[33] level of information. This enables better decisions and actions with more positive results in the factual background.

In times when institutions act through a rationality much more favorable to the interests of the State than to the interests of a public reason in politics, there is what we call statesmanship (III)[34]. The activity of the institutions should follow a public reason and not the reason of state, whether to retain the traditional conception of republican democracy. There are political movements in society which seek to control this activity. A performance so that it is recognized as legitimate must meet the values of this order. In certain aspects it is possible to assert that this is presented as another addiction of formalism, buy it is a question of impartiality[35]. This is because the institution is faced with their cases already pre-determined to defend the interests of the public entity state rather than comply with the democratic role that has to their citizens.

[33] VERMEULE, Adrian. Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007.

[34] The term State reason indicates a tradition of thought of political philosophy influenced by the work of Machiavelli and followed the structuring of political-institutional model of Modern European State. The term was coined first by Giovanni Della Casa, but only at the hands of Giovanni Botero in The Reason of State, in 1589, gained a more rig-

Personalism (IV) is in the moments when the motivations of institutional activity overlap with the reasons of private self-interest, which it operate. It is more a question linked to the value of impartiality, with severe repercussions in the sphere deliberative. The specialization of the institution can not be found in one dimension only subjective, but possess mechanisms that allow a specialized activity with this character.

Among these institutional phenomena, perhaps the most serious is the conformism (V), in most of the cases, when the vices above are known institutions and no action is taken. The formalism can compete viciously for the construction of a comfort zone of the institutional agent.

---

orous conceptualization, representing a sense of self-preservation of the state, indicating the practical needs of if acting in overcoming issues in their opposition. Cf. BOTERO, Giovanni. The Reason of State. Translated by P.J. Waley and D.P. Waley. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1956. On the other hand, the public reason is a concept closely linked to the thought of John Rawls: "The idea of public reason has a definite structure, and if one or more of its aspects are ignored it can seem implausible, as it does when applied to the background culture. It has five different aspects: (1) the fundamental political questions towhich it applies; (2) the persons to whom it applies (government officials and candidates for public office); (3) its content as given by a family of reasonable political conceptions of justice; (4) the application of these conceptions in discussions of coercive norms to be enacted in the form of legitimate law for a democratic people; and (5) citizens' checking that the principles derived from their conceptions of justice satisfy the criterion of reciprocity. Moreover, such reason is public in three ways: as the reason of free and equal citizens, it is the reason of the public; its subject is the public good concerning questions of fundamental political justice, which questions are of two kinds, constitutional essentials and matters of basic justice; and its nature and content are public, being expressed in public reasoning by a family of reasonable conceptions of political justice reasonably thought to satisfy the criterion of reciprocity". RAWLS, John. "The Idea of Public Reason Revisited". The University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 64, 3, 1997, p. 767.

[35] Cf. VERMEULE, Adrian. Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007

It is more a difficulty in terms of impartiality[36], since the own comfort at the expense of a good performance of the activity represents an institutional self-interest of the agent. The conformation with irregular institutional order as listed above results in ensuring the maintenance of these vices , therefore , a phenomenon of great impact on the democratic order.

These institutional problems prevent the achievement of a satisfactory democratic values that stand as pillars of the constitutional order. There are at least four of these values by Adrian Vermeule, which can be recognized publicly, impartiality, transparency, deliberation and responsibility[37]. The institutional phenomena named here are examples of legal and political distortions that reduce the content of the democratic institutional activity. It is therefore necessary to seek democratic mechanisms that can provide legitimate outlets for the benefit of the structure of society, since the removal or alteration of large institutional arrangements usually generates certain strangeness and distrust by citizens[38] themselves. Thus, an institutional activity to understand mechanisms directed to democratic values allow stability and institutional development in accordance with constitutional provisions. Mechanisms, in turn must necessarily have its structure developed based on their own institutional capacities that that entity has.

V. Conclusion

In conclusion, one can say that with the institutional turn promoted within the theory of legal interpretation and constitutional become designed some institutional issues. This fact is of fundamental importance to understand the extent of the constitutional legitimacy of the factual background and experience. This means that the normative-constitutional, so it can be approached from social reality, must recognize the importance of factors such as the systemic effects. This is one of the specific aspects of the institutional dynamics, when observing effects of various kinds, such as legal, political or administrative. This phenomenon is, as it stands, the challenge for an institutional theory that directly interacts with a democratic constitutional theory.

[36] About problems concerning the impartiality, Cf. VERMEULE, Adrian. Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007.

[37] It is adopted in this respect, the prospect of VERMEULE, Adrian. Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2007, p. 4.

[38] Idem.

VI. References

BOLONHA, Carlos; RANGEL, Henrique; ALMEIDA, Maíra. "A Teoria das Instituições Democráticas em John Rawls". Revista JurisPoiesis, Vol. 13, 89-102, 2011.

BOLONHA, Carlos; EISENBERG, José; RANGEL, Henrique. "Problemas Institucionais do Constitucionalismo Contemporâneo". Direitos Fundamentais & Justiça, Vol. 17, 288-309, 2011.

BOHMAN, James. Public Deliberation: Pluralism, Complexity and Democracy. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1996.

BOHMAN, James; REHG, William. Deliberative Democracy: Essays on Reason and Politics. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1997.

BOTERO, Giovanni. The Reason of State. Translated by P.J. Waley and D.P. Waley. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1956.

DWORKIN, Ronald. Law's Empire. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1986.

DAHL, Robert. "Decision-Making in a Democracy: The Supreme Court as a National Policy-Maker". Journal of Public Law, Vol. 6, 280, 1957.

GRIFFIN, Stephen. American Constitutionalism: From Theory to Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.

GILLMAN, Howard; CLAYTON, Cornell. The Supreme Court in American Politics: New Institutionalist Perspectives. Lawrence, KA: Kansas University Press, 1999.

KELSEN, Hans. Teoria Pura do Direito. Trad. João Baptista Machado. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 1996.

HABERMAS, Jürgen. Between Facts and Norms. Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy. Translated by Willian Regh. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1996.

_____. The Inclusion of the Other: Studies in Political Theory. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press, 1998.

HELLER, Hermann. Teoría del Estado. Buenos Aires: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1992.

HESSE, Konrad. Temas Fundamentais do Direito Constitucional. Trad. Carlos

dos Santos Almeida, Gilmar Ferreira Mendes e Inocêncio Mártires Coelho. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009.

HOGG, Peter; BUSHELL, Allison. "The Charter dialogue between Courts and Legislatures: or perhaps the Charter of Rights isn't such a bad thing after all". Osgoode Law Review, Vol. 35, 1, 1997.

LECLAIR, Jean. "Réflexions critiques au sujet de la métaphore du dialogue en droit constitutionnel canadien". Revue du Barreau du Québec, avril, 2003.

MCCANN, Michael. "How the Supreme Court Matter for the American Politics: New Institutionalist Perspectives". In: GILLMAN, Howard. CLAYTON, Cornell. The Supreme Court in American Politics: New Institutionalist Interpretation. Lawrence, KA: University of Kansas Press, 1999.

PILDES, Richard. LEVINSON, Daryl. "Separation of Parties, Not Powers". Harvard Law Review, Vol. 119, 1, 2006.

POSNER, Eric; VERMEULE, Adrian. The Executive Unbound: after the madisonian republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2011.

RAWLS, John. O Liberalismo Político. 2º ed. São Paulo: Ática, 2000.

_____. Political Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.

_____. "The Idea of Public Reason Revisited". The University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 64, 3, 1997

SCHAUER, Frederick. "Formalism". Yale Law Journal, Vol. 97, 4, 1988.

SCHMITT, Carl. O Conceito do Político. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2009; SMEND, Rudolf. Constitucion y Derecho Constitucional. Madrid: Centro de Estudios Constitucionales, 1985.

SUNSTEIN, Cass. A Constitution of Many Minds: Why the Founding Document Doens't Means What It Meant Before. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2009.

_____. "Second-Order Perfeccionism". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 144, 2006.

_____. One Case at a Time: Judicial Minimalism in the Supreme Court. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

SUNSTEIN, Cass; VERMEULE, Adrian. "Interpretation and Institutions". Chicago Public Law and Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 28, 2002.

TREMBLAY, Luc. "Le Fondement Normatif du Principe de Proportionnalité en Théorie Constitutionnelle". Mercredi, Vol. 21, 2009.

VERMEULE, Adrian. Judging Under Uncertainty: an institutional theory of legal interpretation. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2006.

_____. Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small. Cambridge, MA: Oxford University Press, 2007.

_____. "The interaction of democratic mechanisms". Harvard Law School Public Law & Legal Theory Working Paper Series, No. 09-22, 2009.

WALDRON, Jeremy. "The Core of the Case Against Judicial Review". The Yale Law Journal, Vol. 115, 1344, 2006.

Institutional analysis and epistemology of values in Law: an outline

Maciej Pichlak[1]

Abstract: The paper offers an outline of a research programme consisting in cognition of axiological foundations of law through an analysis of institutional settings of legal system. Such approach allows to escape from existing controversies about arbitrary character of axiological reflection, which are still to be found in legal science. Thanks to the process of reconstructing values 'embodied' within given institutional practices and structures, it offers an intersubjective method of recognition of values material for the legal order.

To explain such version of institutional analysis the study refers to methodological postulates of two – in many respects different – philosophers, Paul Ricoeur and Jürgen Habermas. From Ricoeur it takes an idea of such analysis as a 'roundabout route' to ethical reflection, which escapes from a temptation of unconstrained and arbitrary moralizing. With Habermas it shares an aspiration to go beyond a futile conflict between functional approach (which excludes axiological inquiry at all) and aesthetic bias (which places axiological resources solely in dispositions of individual, apart from institutional structures) in social sciences. The works of both authors express and justify a possibility of conjunction of analysis of factual, empirical components of social practices, such as law, with reflection on their ideal, axiological plane.

The paper elaborates epistemological rather than epistemic problematic of cognition of values – which means that it delve into conditions of possibility of such cognition, instead of verifying particular methods of axiological studies.

Key words: Institutional theory of law; axiology of law; factual and ideal.

Introduction

The study aims at elucidate how an analysis of institutional settings of legal order supports a cognition of axiological foundations of law. To say about 'elucidation' may be a bit exaggerating, as all I offer here is a brief and preliminary outline of argumentation that waits for further elaboration. Before I will be able to conduct a more detailed analysis of these problems, let me present a roadmap of such possible inquiry.

[1] Assistant Professor at the Department of Legal Theory and Philosophy of Law at University of Wrocław, Poland. Email adress: mpichlak@prawo.uni.wroc.pl.

The problem of cognition of values might be analysed on two basic levels: epistemological or epistemic one (to use terminology of transcendental philosophy for that sake). At the first level, one asks about necessary (and/or sufficient) conditions of possibility of cognition of values; the second one treats about most plausible methods of such cognition. As the title of this paper suggests, this is an epistemological problematic that will be scrutinized here. A matter of my concern are the chances that institutional analysis creates for reflecting axiological questions, rather than exact methods of such reflection.

Both these questions – about the very possibility, as well as on acceptable methods of axiological cognition in law have been a matter of controversy, where axiological considerations have been accused for irrationality and arbitrariness. Nevertheless, this is the very point where institutional approach proves its own usefulness, for it allows for a rational reconstruction of material values being 'embodied' within given institutional settings. Therefore, analysis of such institutional structures reveals to be a fruitful method of cognition of those values.

In order to justify such version of institutional analysis the study refers to methodological postulates of two – in many respects different – philosophers, Paul Ricoeur and Jürgen Habermas. From Ricoeur it takes an idea of such analysis as a "roundabout, long route" to ethical reflection, which escapes from a temptation of unconstrained and arbitrary moralizing. With Habermas it shares an aspiration to go beyond a futile conflict between two reductivisms in social science: the one of functional approach (which excludes axiological inquiry at all) and another one of aesthetic bias (which places axiological resources solely in dispositions of individuals, apart from institutional structures). Instead of this, the proposed perspective perceives public institutions as 'axiologically saturated' in nature. This proves itself to be a plausible starting point for a study on mutual relations between empirical (factual) and ideal (axiological) components of social practices – law included.

Axiology in the clash

The very possibility, as well as acceptable methods of cognition of legal axiology, have been a matter of dispute since years, including the viewpoints negating such possibility. In particular, the question has been posed whether the reflection on axiology of law is able to liberate itself from subjectivism and arbitrariness.

On another hand, there has always been a need for axiological considerations within legal practice. It doesn't seem that it may be left apart as useless or irrational. From the most fundamental questions on legitimacy and validity of law, to purely practical methods of legal reasoning in everyday practice – the law all the time goes into intimate relations with values, particularly these of moral kind.

This practical need does not necessarily leads to any generally accepted methods of interpreting those values, though. For decades the discourse about axiology of law has been fragmented between legal philosophy of natural law on the one hand, and analytical legal theory (legal positivism) or empirical legal sociology (legal realism) on the other. These competing traditions could hardly find any common point (see e.g.Coyle, Pavlakos, 2005).

In Polish jurisprudence the problem of legal axiology has been conceptualized within the frames of the discussion about so called planes of law. 'Planes' were understood as the most relevant dimensions of the complex reality of law, at the same time determining the main methodological perspectives of analysis of law in legal science. According to the most influential proposals, the following planes have been distinguished: logical-linguistic, psychological, sociological, and axiological. Among these, the axiological plane was the most controversial and problematic one: on the one hand, it was usually recognized as a necessary one, yet on another hand, it was with just the same frequency reduced to others planes. Put it another way, 'values' relevant for law were interpreted as merely linguistic (expressions of agents' evaluations), psychological (emotions of individuals), or sociological (moral beliefs dominating in social group) phenomena (see e.g. Wróblewski, 1969a, Wróblewski, 1969b)[2].

Similar debates and controversies may be found also in other countries, and not only within jurisprudence. In Germany – just to evoke one, yet significant, example, the opposite views on the usefulness and reasonability of axiological reflection have been replacing one another on the dominant position in general jurisprudence during the whole XX century – the process that has been recently described in a persuasive way by Jerzy Zajadło (Zajadło, 2013, see also Klatt, 2007).

[2] Unfortunately, I am not familiar with any easy-to-access survey of that discussion in English. However, practical consequences of a 'multi-plane approach' may be well seen e.g. in the major (and translated into English) book of one of the best-known participants of that debate, which is Judicial Application of Law by Jerzy Wróblewski (1992), where various theoretical models of application of law conforms with different possible planes of law. See particularly Wróblewski's analyses of 'ideology of judicial decision' as an instance of studies on the axiological plane.

One can learn one more thing from the German example: that these methodological debates within legal science reflect more general disputes in social sciences and humanities. Also the state of defragmentation of perspectives – 'objective' and 'neutral' social science vs. 'moralistic' social philosophy – can be observed in here. This rather miserable situation of both social and legal science has been depicted by Jürgen Habermas in his widely recognized book Faktizität und Geltung (Between Facts and Norms – see Habermas, 1998). Habermas writes about two, equally one-sided, versions of bias within social theory: functional reductivism (of system theory's kind) and aesthetic bias.

System theory represents in Habermas'es view these approaches which reduce axiological dimension of social life into some purely descriptive terms – what resembles the aforementioned general attitude of Polish jurisprudence to axiological plane of law. Thus from the point of view of Luhmann's theory, socially relevant values might be described merely as one kind of expectations that social agents share – normative ones, as distinguished from cognitive expectations. By doing this, Habermas claims, such functionalist approach "neutralizes anything that, from the participant perspective, appears obligatory or at all meaningful" (Habermas, 1998, p. 3). Yet this attempt to construct objective explanatory language drives to a paradoxical situation, for system theory lacks an explanatory force in some respects. Particularly it seems to be unable to justify practical commitments of social agents, and these practices which directly depends on such: "If reasons no longer command a force intrinsic to rational motivation – if, as Luhmann formulates it, reasons [Gründe] cannot be justified [begründen] – then the high-priced culture of argumentation developed in the legal system becomes a mystery" (Habermas, 1998, p. 51). Legal scholar might express similar thought with a use of slightly different, Hartian vocabulary: for system theory 'internal point of view' is a mere delusion of a deceived lawyer's mind (cf. Hart, 1961).

In the opposite corner Habermas locates 'aesthetic bias' of political philosophy, offering a role of its most prominent representative to John Rawls. One can hardly find more radical opposition to functionalism of system theory: Rawlsian theory of political justice expresses very clearly the fundamental role of practical commitment of agents. Yet Habermas points that it goes too far this way: eventually, Rawls is said to have nothing more to build on, than moral dispositions of individuals, "political consciousness of a public of citizens"[3] (Habermas, 1998, p. 65). Still such consciousness of individuals is far too weak to ground any effective standpoint for action or critique. By omitting an institutional dimension of political practices, Rawls is accused for building sandcastles. In that light, all the accusations for arbitrariness and subjectivism of moral considerations might be repeated.

There is probably only one way of escaping the theoretical trap of functional or aesthetic reductivism, both of which fail in a plausible depiction of axiological dimension of social practices. This escape is offered by institutional theory, and at least for two reasons. Firstly, such theory proves its own usefulness, for it allows for a reconstruction of values being 'embodied' within given institutional settings – "normative presuppositions of existing legal practices", to use another quotation from Habermas (Habermas, 1998, p. xl). Hence, analysis of legal and/or political institutions allows for a rational, non-arbitrary recognition of values material for the legal order (or, one might add, any other social practice). Secondly, institutional theory reunite once again this what has been split in analyses of the aforementioned perspectives: objective social structures and practical commitments of agents (see Habermas, 1998, p. 66). To put it another way: it shows how axiological beliefs and ideals reflect at the level of institutional setting (or vice versa, as it is mutual, dialectical relation).

I will try to elaborate these two advantages of institutional perspective, with a help of two philosophers: the already evoked Jürgen Habermas and Paul Ricoeur. Such a selection might cause doubts, as their philosophical standpoints differ much from each other, and, moreover, none of them is directly associated with institutional theory. Nonetheless, I will try to show that they might be helpful for our sake. The usefulness and strength of both these projects, when it comes to cross over shortcomings of various opposite theoretical perspectives, has been already proved by John Thompson (see Thompson). Whereas Thompson shows it in the context of a clash between empirical positivism vs.

[3] It is not my ambition to answer a question whether Habermas'es critique does justice to Rawls. Even if it were the case that German philosopher misinterprets his American colleague, his description of 'a threat of aesthetic bias' remains inspiring and fruitful.

analytical theory in social science, it seems to be more universal quality of Habermas'es and Ricoeur's output. For sure this is the quality that brings these two philosophers together: a constant attempt to mediate between opposing viewpoints, to search for a risky equilibrium between differing perspectives, even if as a result one has to face a charge for eclectism. This general inclination may prove its usefulness once more, when we search for a way out from an unprofitable opposition between empty empiricism of (empirical or analytical) legal theory vs. abstract and idealistic moralism of traditional philosophy of law.

Ricoeur – a roundabout route of reflection

One of the most persuasive examples of a fruitful conjunction of 'objectifying' analysis of existing practices with more subtle axiological (and existential) reflection is a methodological programme of Paul Ricoeur, a bit metaphorically described by himself as "a roundabout, arduous […] long route" (Ricœur, 1974, p. 6). Ricoeur employs this strategy mainly to scrutinize problems of subjectivity and self-consciousness. In that context he distinguishes two possible approaches, which are called a 'short' (immediate) and a 'long' (mediate) route. A typical example of the first solution is the classical Cartesian philosophy of subject, which attempts to grasp directly one's own subjectivity, Ego cogito. Nevertheless, Cartesian method meets a serious problem, as it implicitly accepts a false presupposition of an absolute transparency of self-consciousness. Ricoeur claims – and he is seemingly right in that point – that it is never the case. He relies on Freud to state that "consciousness is not immediate, but mediate; it is not source, but a task, the task to become more conscious" (Ricœur, 1974, p. 324). A self-consciousness is always partially a 'false consciousness'; one can never fully and directly understand herself. However, if the consciousness is opaque for itself, the only possible way to grasp it is to go beyond it and to choose the indirect way of analyzing its creations: language, culture, works of art etc. As French philosopher puts it: "Consciousness is only the interiorization of this movement, a movement which must be rediscovered in the objective structures of institutions, monuments, works of art, and culture" (Ricœur, 1974, p. 325). This roundabout route is called by Ricoeur a reflection.

Ricoeur makes an exhaustive use of this method in his analysis of selfhood in one of his best-known book Oneself as Another – originally Soi-même comme un autre (Ricoeur, 1992). Although the method is first and foremost designed and applied to the abovementioned reflection on the selfhood, it seems perfectly possible to engage it analogically for analysis of law's axiological foundations. For one may perceive law's axiology as determining the 'self-consciousness' and 'identity' of legal order. And just as those qualities of human being, which Ricoeur is trying to reach in his studies, it cannot be comprehended through a direct insight, but only on this arduous mediate path of reflection on legal practices and institutions. Hence, even if one can hardly count Ricoeur's philosophy into institutionalism camp, he justifies the need and makes a room for institutional analysis of social world. Such analysis forms a preliminary, yet inescapable stage of any axiological reflection on law.

Habermas - Faktizität und Geltung

Since I have highlighted Habermas as the main authority to argue for a need of conjunction of 'empirical' and 'ideal' elements in institutional analysis of axiological dimension of law, one may fairly expect at least a sketchy reconstruction of the solution of these problems proposed by German philosopher himself. Once again it will be of a great help to read his Between Facts and Norms (Faktizität und Geltung), which treats directly on legal discourse and legal order of modern state.

When compared with the above viewpoint inspired by Ricoeur's philosophy, Habermas may be read as designing an opposite direction of analysis, advancing from abstract and formally characterized communicational reason (the plane of Geltung) towards actual settings of legal order and legal discourse (Faktizität). This is the usual way of reconstructing his philosophical project (not only for law, but for public discourse in general), and admittedly he offers some clues which invite for such interpretation. For instance, it is by no chance a matter of coincidence that in Habermasian reconstruction of the fundamental elements of modern legal order we find numerous recourses to the philosophers of the state of nature – Hobbes and Rousseau (additionally to obvious Kantian inspirations), which suggest a belief in a hypothetical situation of a fully rational, universal and formal activity of 'pure' communicational reason, which establishes foundations of political and legal order (cf. Habermas, 1998, pp. 118–128).

However, that's only one possibility of interpreting the complex relations between 'factual' and 'ideal' – the possibility which focuses on what may be called 'a line of justification'. It is not my intention to neglect the presence of such perspective in the project of Habermas; still one should realize the parallel existence of another line, that of gnosis, that means gaining a knowledge of such foundational ideals (e.g. of the kind of communicative rationality). And the latter, Habermas might state, should always be reconstructed from the actual institutional setting of legal order.

Furthermore, even if these two main lines coexist in Habermas'es work, the priority is given rather to the line of gnosis, proceeding (let me repeat it) from actual institutional practices towards axiological ideals. As Habermas explicitly admits, to introduce theoretically and in abstracto basic ideals of legal order, as for instance fundamental rights, is nothing more but a mere trick, "an artifice" (Habermas, 1998, p. 129). In fact, every such ideal needs to be extracted from actual or past practices. Thus, the real starting point of reflection are the standards stemming from the actual historical development of European legal systems – which, according to Habermas, allow for a "generalizing reconstruction" of the principles of rational discourse and communicational reason.

The dialectics of ideal and practice

The above considerations allow for a conclusion that institutional analysis offers a suitable – and probably even the most plausible – method for reconstructing foundational axiological ideals of legal order. So far, so good. However, this thesis should not be read as a claim about analytical relation between 'empirical' and 'ideal' dimension of institution. Were this relation analytical, it would be possible to infer deductively such ideals from facts at hand. As a result, possible ideals would be – from logical as well as practical point of view – fully dependent on existing practices. This would be a disappointing conclusion, though, as a reception of axiological ideals would be not so different from that of functional reductivism.

The two above-mentioned dimensions of institution should be rather perceived as remaining in more subtle, dialectical relations. Once again, this is the standpoint of Ricoeur and Habermas, who clearly adhere to dialectical thinking in their works. And this is not just a stroke of luck that in these works they illuminate the crucial characteristics of such dialectical relation, which might be named – for the sake of brevity – as inter-independence and criticalness.

Dialectical relation is an inter-independent one, since – as Ricoeur indicates – its components can never be properly understood without each other, yet they are not to be conflated with nor reduced to one another. The most relevant dialectical relation is for Ricoeur probably the one between Oneself and Another, as reflected in the title of his book. According to this viewpoint, Another becomes a necessary part of my own self-understanding, still remaining Another, distinct and independent from myself. Noteworthy, a similar dialectical structure might be noticed in the field of law, between 'legal' and 'non-legal' elements creating an identity of modern legal order (see Pichlak, 2014).

The second specific quality of dialectical relation consist in a fact that it is critical – that means that both components of it form a ground and a yardstick for a mutual criticism. This feature of dialectics is explicitly employed by Habermas in his studies of political and legal institutions. According to his view, the ideals embedded in existing practices may be at the same time understood as counter-factual foundation of actual practice which is able to reflect critically its own results. This possibility of internal critique of social institutions from the point of view of its own inherent ideals may be seen as a common motif of almost the whole output of German philosopher, including his early book The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere – Strukturwandel der Öfetnlichkeit, originally published in 1962 (Habermas, 1989). It has been also in an inspiring way applied to analysis of modern legal order by Kaarlo Tuori; Tuori employs this approach in order to describe relations between various components of legal system (see Tuori, 2002).

***

As one may notice, despite the fact that the study focuses on the issues of epistemology of values, such epistemology (together with the methods of cognition typical of it) requires some ontological presumptions as to the nature of public institutions. These ontological presumptions form an implicit background of the analysis, even if they are not scrutinized here.

References

COYLE, S., and G. PAVLAKOS, eds., 2005. Jurisprudence or legal science? A debate about the nature of legal theory. Oxford: Hart Publishing.

HABERMAS, J., 1989. The structural transformation of the public sphere. An inquiry into a category of bourgeois society. [Cambridge]: Polity.

HABERMAS, J., 1998. Between facts and norms. Contributions to a discourse theory of law and democracy. Cambridge, Mass: MIT Press. Studies in contemporary German social thought.

HART, H., 1961. The concept of law. Oxford: Clarendon Press. Clarendon law series.

KLATT, M., 2007. Contemporary Legal Philosophy in Germany. Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie, 94(4), 519-539.

PICHLAK, M., 2014. Prawa człowieka a dialektyka prawa. In: A. BATOR, M. JABŁOŃSKI, M. MACIEJEWSKI, and K. WÓJTOWICZ, eds. Współczesne koncepcje ochrony wolności i praw podstawowych. Wrocław: Prawnicza i Ekonomiczna Biblioteka Cyfrowa, pp. 23-36.

RICŒUR, P., 1974. The Conflict of Interpretations: Essays in Hermeneutics. Evanston, Ill: Northwestern University Press.

RICOEUR, P., 1992. Oneself as another. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

TUORI, K., 2002. Critical legal positivism. Aldershot: Ashgate. Applied legal philosophy.

WRÓBLEWSKI, J., 1969a. Prawo i płaszczyzny jego badania. Państwo i Prawo, (6), 996-1006.

WRÓBLEWSKI, J., 1969b. Zagadnienie wielopłaszczyznowości w metodologii współczesnej teorii prawa. Studia Prawnicze, 21.

WRÓBLEWSKI, J., 1992. The judicial application of law. Dordrecht: Kluwer Academic Publishers. Law and philosophy library. v. 15.

ZAJADŁO, J., 2013. Philosophy and theory of law in contemporary German jurisprudence. In: A. BATOR AND Z. PULKA, eds. Legal Theory and Philosophy of Law: Towards Contemporary Challenges. Warsaw: Scholar, pp. 67-88.

From Pontes de Miranda to Mireille Delmas-Marty: A journey to review the theory of sources of Law to accommodate the new rights generated by the nanotechnological revolution

Wilson Engelmann[1]

Abstract: There is a revolution on an unprecedented scale in progress: the nanoscale, which can be represented by the scientific notation 10^{-9}. The positive and negative effects of this revolution are still poorly understood. Because of this, the legal frameworks do not exist yet, being a challenge to Law. The Theory of Legal Fact of Pontes de Miranda is a structural model present in all branches of Law, although it has been created especially for Private Law. This theory shows to be inadequate to account for the new rights and duties arising from nanotechnology. It is proposed the adoption of a dialogue between the sources of Law, in which national and international standards can interact to accommodate new situations, giving them constitutionally and conventionally adequate legal effects. The idea of organizing the rules in a pyramidal structure will be replaced by horizontal forms of arrangement of the several sources, which can be handled as if they were open and flexible rings for formatting Law with the use of discretion in a responsible and creative form.

Keywords: Nanotechnology. New Rights. Theory of Legal Fact. Sources of Law.

Introduction

Products of different kinds, which are available to consumers, are already being produced at the nano scale. In laboratories, research continues in an accelerated process of development. Industries invest on these novelties, trying to increase their profit, considering the added value that nanotechnology can provide. Scientists have not yet reached a consensus on the most appropriate methodology for measuring the potential risks that production and commercialization of products at the nano scale may generate for workers, for consumers and for the environment. Also, legal frameworks do not exist yet. There is a global debate on this topic, but considering the lack of the referred methodology and the absence of an inventory of the number of nano particles that already exist, the establishment of regulation probably will not be very simple. Law, as a representative of Human Sciences, seems indifferent to the effects — positive and negative — of the revolution caused by nanotechnology. It is necessary to bring the innovation that is under development in Exact Sciences into Law. Therefore, this article aims to bring some details about nanotechnology and to enhance that nanotechnology requires changes in legal production. Thus, it is necessary to review the Theory of Legal Fact, formulated by Pontes de Miranda, especially in the setting of factual support and in how the incidence and interpretation of legal production are facilitated, in order to accommodate the new rights and duties that are emerging from the discoveries at nanoscale. The theory of sources of law has to be revisited, so that through the dialogue between the sources of law it becomes more flexible. The topic is relevant and necessary considering the need to integrate Law in the innovative and challenging path generated by nanotechnology. Given these objectives and justification, the article also aims to answer the following question: under what conditions the revision of the Theory of Legal Fact, as planned by Pontes de Miranda, may be sufficient and adequate to account for the new rights and duties generated from nanotechnology and bring innovation to the construction of legal structures? This is a problem that shows up to Law as a whole, but it can be examined from the Theory of Legal Fact, formulated by Pontes de Miranda, as a central anchor of his Treaty of Private Law. As Pontes de Miranda admits, its formulation applies not only to private law, but it also supports the construction of Public Law. So, it seems to be a paradigmatic theory to analyze the need to review the way of construction of law as a whole. From this perspective, it is possible to see the importance of this theory and the need for its reformulation in order to ensure a longer and more effective life to law.

[1] UNISINOS

1. Theoretical Foundation

There is a technological and scientific revolution in progress. It is developed on a scale that is poorly known, but that has unprecedented possibilities and potential. It is the construction of things at the nano scale, which is, on the billionth part of a meter (ENGELMANN, 2011).

"Nanotechnology is a [new] field of very recent human knowledge, which is transverse, promising, inter/multi and transdisciplinary, in rapid expansion, with potential for innovation and transformation in the XXI century" (BINSFELD, 2011, p. 90). Here it is possible to see an indication of the necessity of innovation in Law, especially in the way legal effect is attached to social facts: nanotechnology. As nanoscale permeates various technologies, nanotechnology is a new industrial and scientific possibility, with unprecedented benefits and risks, considering the physicochemical interactions with different characteristics from those produced at larger scales, it is not a "scientific breakthrough" that will be linked to an area of knowledge, but it will involve all areas characterized yet, each one with specific contributions and looks; Law will have a relevant role, as legal frameworks are all to be built. There will be influences in all branches of law. This will require an effective (r) evolution in the conformation of legal effects; Law must learn to deal and interact with the other areas of knowledge, especially the "Hard Sciences", to understand the Nanotechnological phenomenon. There is a significant difficulty in developing regulatory frameworks, because not even the exact and/or technological areas know all the possibilities and risks that work at nanoscale may generate. There is no consensus or uniformity regarding the methodology for carrying out these assessments. And more than that:

> "[...] The basic principle of molecular nanotechnology is the construction of nanomaterials (nanowires, nanotubes, nanocoated, quantum dots, fullerenes, dendrimers and nanoporous materials) that are useful to life, from nanoparticles, atoms and natural elements that have physical and chemical properties completely different from natural elements, due to quantum effects" (BINSFELD, 2011, p. 90).

Nanoscale has always existed in nature. However, now, human beings are able to visualize them and reproduce them in laboratory because of the development of special equipment. Therefore, another challenge is the artificial production of nanostructures that, when interacting with the environment and with human beings, can produce toxic effects, many of which are still unknown. Anyway, an effective human intrusion in the creation of things is set up. From Eric Drexler on, the history of nanotechnology is told through the perspective of promises and dreams, visions and expectations:

> "[...] Human beings are very bad, very poor at making things. [...] When we can get good at it, the results will be revolutionary. [...] With precision control at atomic level, physics tells us that we can build computers with a thousand times higher capacity, consuming less than 1/100.000 that energy, with about one millionth of the weight and a tiny fraction of the cost" (DREXLER, 2009, p. 46-7).

However, these possibilities are not built separately and the mastery of this technology is complex and emerging, being operationalized with the participation of various actors, which are networked together and make the effects of globalization even more striking. All this will influence the formatting of the Theory of Legal Fact, as planned by Pontes de Miranda, demanding complex and sophisticated answers, combining internal and external order, in a way that has not yet been seen in the history of Law. What should be observed in the propositions of Drexler is the exclusive focus on "Exact Sciences or Hard Sciences" to outline the path of "technological revolution" called nanotechnology: the need:

> "[...] of global partnership for development, with a partnership that gives increasing attention to molecules, to molecular technologies and to nanoscale machines; and to goals that can be achieved through the coordination of scientists and engineers in order to make components that come together to make systems" (DREXLER, 2009, p. 55).

The challenge for Law seems to have come: it must take place in the construction of this "technological revolution", under the penalty of losing its place in history. A beginning proposed in this article is to review and reconstruct the Theory of Legal Fact of Pontes de Miranda, for the importance it has in Brazilian legal scenario.

In Pontes theory, "legal fact comes from the factual world, but not everything that is part of it is, always, in legal world. [...], legal rule discriminates what can and what, by default, cannot enter. Determining the factual support of each legal rule is a task to be done with care" (PONTES DE MIRANDA, 1977, volume II, p. 183, § 159). The "factual world" is split from "legal world" and the first can only join the second if there is prevision in factual support previously drawn in legal rules. The possibilities generated by nanotechnology (the "new", the "unanticipated") could not enter "legal world" because they have not been preliminary consecrated in factual support, at least so far, of any legal rule. What is not yet defined by "Hard Sciences" will have difficulty to be accommodated by "Humanities", especially in Law. Thus, the prospect of Pontes de Miranda, "[...] due to the lack of attention to both worlds many errors are committed, and what is worse, human intelligence is deprived from understanding, intuiting and mastering Law" (PONTES DE MIRANDA, 1983, volume I, p. 3-4, § 1), proves inadequate for understanding and producing Law in the XXI Century. Although it is a theory forged in the early twentieth century reflecting their epistemological assumptions, it now shows signs of inability to accommodate the rights and duties created by Nanotechnological Revolution.

According to Pontes de Miranda, in the context of the mentioned dichotomy, the notion of "factual support" is central: "[...] what is predicted by it [the rule of law] and on which it focuses is factual support, a concept of the highest relevance for exhibitions and scientific research" (PONTES DE MIRANDA, 1983, Volume I, p. 3, § 1). The facts of life that may enter the world of Law are always drawn previously because "[...] when it comes to legal facts, the substance lies in the essential data that integrates its factual support, as described in legal rules" (MELLO, 2010, p. 117). It is possible to say that what is likely to be legal must have been previously enrolled in the characterization of factual support of the rule of law (to use Pontes language). This generates a final result: "so it is important to stress that it is not possible, for the interpreter, to add or to delete elements to the factual support for configuring the legal fact, under penalty of error" (MELLO, 2010, p. 131). The dynamics of human life in our society — postmodern — does not show symptoms of this predictability, people are not born bringing "conduct manuals". Rather, there are actions and reactions from the movements of other social actors and this is becoming more and more unpredictable. Perhaps because of this, instead of reviewing the Theory of Legal Fact, it is more suitable to reconstruct this theory, in order to promote its effective approach to the unprecedented facts of life, promoting the emergence of new rights and duties, such as: a) juridicization of legal facts: looking specifically to the "act of creation" of things from the nanoscale: it will be possible to attach atoms and molecules and build what humans want, or by the opposite path, starting from larger particles and going down to the lowest, formatting what human inventive ability can plan. Here the notion of legal act-fact should be redesigned; b) the concept of illicit: in which it will be possible to launch, for example, the responsibility without damage, the generation of damage without guilt, the question of limits of scientific ethics in this scenario, the question of damage to future generations; c) juridicization of risk, the actual risk of development; d) reduction to nanoscale changes the characteristics of things, this implies a change in the Theory of Goods, reflecting on the question of ownership, as new "things" can be created in laboratories and factories; e) the concept of rule of law, sheltering the principles. When Pontes de Miranda wrote his Treaty of Private Law, the conception concerning principles did not have the normative force that principles have today. Therefore, instead of the "dialogue of sources", designed by Claudia Lima Marques, a more audacious structural action will be needed: the "dialogue between the sources of law". It is time to appraise the lessons of Introduction to the Study of Law and of General Theory of Law, bringing up the topic and the exercise of Sources of Law. Although it is known for a long time that Law is only the most important source, if it still can be this way, but without the proper valuation of the other sources of Law. The dialogue between the sources of Law intends to leave the echelon or pyramidal form of organization of legal sources. Law is still seen from "the great pyramid", designed by Hans Kelsen, where "[...] a rule, from the point of etymology, is something that is set to provide a pattern (standard) upon which other things are judged; a standard is something to what one must conform" (Riddall, 2008, p. 153-4). If it was just this perspective, one could include all sources of Law. However, Kelsen establishes another condition: "[...] in any legal system, the standards that form it can be considered valid if the validity of the basic and original standard is assumed (Kelsen calls it Grundnorm)". With this, "if the system of rules is displayed in pyramid form, with a Grundnorm situated at the highest point, it would be considered that from this highest point the standards appear less general and more specific". The validity of inferior standards depends on a standard that is superior to them. There is a hierarchy among norms and a dependency on the existence of a superior standard. Because of this, "[...] the validity has no relation with the content of law. A law (or as Kelsen prefers, a norm) is valid, because it was created by a determined process" (Riddall, 2008, p. 157-64). The relation between content and form also appears in the proposal of Pontes de Miranda, from the moment that the production of legal effect depends on the prediction of the characteristics of social fact in factual support. If there is any element missing, the rule cannot be imposed, and juridicization cannot occur. To some extent, this phenomenon happens by the following observation: "precisely because it is legal and formal, modern state Law collapses and is always buried in a text. [...] Law has become an extremely tough and rigid reality; reduced to an admirable system, which is logic, right, clear, therefore inevitable" (Grossi, 2010, p. 80-1). It is precisely because of all these characteristics that Law is unable to cope with the unprecedented movements proposed by nanotechnology. Thus, it is proposed that the dialogue between the sources of Law, with the replacement of the pyramid, in which the standards are arranged vertically, by a figure, still without a more specific name, in which the rules are laid out horizontally. This will make it possible to take advantage of the contributions from several sources simultaneously; and the design of the factual support can be supported from this dialogue, permeated by principles and substantially irrigated by Natural-Human-Fundamental Rights, amalgamated, for example, in the article 5 and its sections of the Constitution of the Republic of Brazil of 1988. In the dialogue between the sources of Law, "international standards", especially treaties and conventions dealing with Human Rights, also receive a new approach.

According to Mireille Delmas-Marty, it is necessary to operate the "restoration of a landscape" (2004, p. 1). The French author will be used to support the structuring of the mentioned dialogue between the sources, and not simply a "dialogue of sources", in which one law is only connected to another in order to solve a case of legal antinomy. It is required to open the stage of "evolutionary sources", which is, "[...] to renounce to the past of customary and to the future of laws to resolutely locate the sources of Law in the present, by unstable nature" (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 65). It will be needed to move and to reframe the role of laws as source of Law, by listening to the voice of tradition, announced, for example, by habits. To keep developing its role of providing the rules (or normative parameters) that should guide the behavior of people in society, Law needs to operate an effective recovery in its panorama, here understood as the Theory of Legal Fact: "[. ..] the panorama still inscribed in our memories did not disappear, but its components dispersed. [...]" (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 4). The "promises and disappointments of legal positivism" are still present in tradition and in legal actions of many jurists. Getting free of these jurists is a difficult task, though many of their features have already shown their weaknesses. Thus a model that starts with a threefold phenomenon arises:

> "[...] (phenomenon) of removal of landmarks, of emergence of new sources that would eventually relegate the state and law to the > category of accessories and of displacement of lines, modifying the composition plan, so that the pyramids, still unfinished, are surrounded of weird rings that mock the old principle of hierarchy" (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 4).

These three movements are on the basis of the dialogue between the sources of Law and will be placed one next to the other, rather than one over the other. Instead of placing the Constitution, which in this model should be read from the interaction with international standards, especially those related to Human Rights, the Constitution comes to occupy a central place, through which all legal responses created by inter-sources dialogue should pass. It (the Constitution) will be the referential for the conformation of factual support. Thus, a control of constitutionality will be made, accompanied by the so-called "conventionality control", drawn from the approach of the legal response to the Universal and Regional Human Rights Declarations, as well as a look to the decisions of International Courts of Human Rights. Movements triggered for structuring the legality of the response may be compared "[...] to the image of the ring [that] introduces the idea of an interaction that does not necessarily entail the disappearance of all hierarchies, but rather the entanglement of these and, therefore, the emergence of new modes of generation of law" (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 98). The vision of the ring triggers the movement itself intended for dialogue, something that can flow between several sources, passing and passing several times through the controls mentioned above. With this, a legal-constitutional-conventional response will be ensured.

2. Methodology

The phenomenological-hermeneutic method will be used, oriented by the contributions of Martin Heidegger and Hans-Georg Gadamer. This method starts from the presupposition of ensuring certain amount of freedom to the researcher in the construction of the structures of their investigation, what enables an approximation between the subject (researcher) and the object of the research. The choice of the object is part of the world where there is the researcher. There is the phenomenon. There is no split between these two components. The choice of the object is due to this aspect, being part of the context of the researcher, who assigns meaning to it. The hermeneutic character: "[...] the word 'phenomenology' expresses a maxim which can be formulated in the phrase: 'the things in themselves!' — by opposition to disconnected constructions, to accidental discoveries, to the admission of concepts only apparently checked, [...]" (Heidegger, 2002, § 7, p. 57). This is the point. The research is oriented by the relevant questions to nanotechnology, which are experienced by the researcher, and their (necessary) interface with Law. They are not detached from their experience and are connected with the world of their life. This experience is projected in the time horizon: "[...] from there, any phenomenological investigation is understood as a research of establishment of units of/in time consciousness, which presuppose, in turn, the constitution of this temporal consciousness. [...]" (GADAMER, 2002, § 249, p. 372). The researcher is inserted in a world where nanotechnological revolution is installing its effects. The researcher is in the world and wants to assign meaning to the movements required for Law to give its best contribution, performing its social function, in possible and adequate standardization, in order to safeguard human beings and the environment. In addition to this method of approach, there will be used, as methods of procedure, the historical, comparative and case study methods. As the main research technique bibliographic research will be used.

3. Development

By the aspects seen, Law will not take the role of sovereign source of Law, having to accept the emergence of other sources. The threefold phenomenon (withdrawal of marks, the emergence of sources and the displacement of lines) is necessary and will serve as a tool to update the proposal built by Pontes de Miranda, through the dialogue between all sources of Law. Nanotechnology will eventually produce a "[...] universe of events that, on the verge of misunderstanding, suggests to be apart from any possibility of control [...]. This finding implies, on legal perspective, understanding that Law needs to reframe in face of all this range of information and demands triggered by rapid changes of the social body" (FACHIN, 2012, p. 41). There is a great variety of aspects that are demanding new forms of regulation of society. The jurists (considered here as all actors of Law) are taking too long to realize this challenge. The various possibilities — positive and negative — brought by nanotechnology are incompatible with the legal structures that are still practiced. It is still operated within the following scenario, which — although has been written just for Private Law and within it to Civil

Law — will serve to reflect on the situation of Law as a whole: "in the last two centuries a supposedly neutral system, trampled on abstract legal categories, designed for an impersonal being, with pretensions to longevity, printed formulation to the project of support of Civil Law" (FACHIN, 2000, p. 324). The construction of the notion of rule of law and of its accommodation in the elements of factual support keeps a close relation with this system, which goes far beyond the area of Civil Law, but it is still the cloak of legality that covers all branches of law. And more: "the right of the human being alone, centered on a hypothetical self-regulation of their private interests, and conducted by formal equality, served to frame the beautifully finished model" (FACHIN, 2000, p. 324). It is talked about an abstract, hypothetical, and preliminary anticipation of everything people will be able to do in society, driven by the notion of formal equality, which is not concerned with the concrete life and everyday reality. Considering the contours brought by nanotechnology, it is clear that this model does no longer fit, showing blatant signs of disability and of loss of space in the regulatory scenario, as almost all areas of knowledge are opining on the regulation related to nanotechnology. This phenomenon would be healthy if Law was leading the process. However, this is not what happens in reality. At this point, it is possible to observe the danger of the loss of space of Law as a field of knowledge, by excellence, of regulation and specification of the means of formatting of legal effects. The symptoms of loss of regulatory space on new issues emerging from new themes generated by society were already denounced by Franz Wieacker, who also gazed at Private Law, but which, on account of the overcome of the dichotomy between contemporary Public Law and Private Law, can be used to analyze the situation of Law brought by advances in nanotechnology. "Without a new grounding for legal convictions there will not exist any future for the history of European private Law. Thus the conditions of this review are the most burning question of the future of private law" (WIEACKER, 1993, p. 716). As already mentioned, the new foundations for legal structuring lie on the dialogue among sources of Law and on the substantial conformation conferred to legal responses by means of fundamental-natural-human rights. These rights bring to light the learning generated by historical tradition of human beings and of their Law. For this, it is done the proposition of "[...] replace the authoritative pyramidal image by a system of rules that are not placed over one another, but at the same time, connected one with the other by a reciprocal interconnection relation" (Grossi, 2010, p. 83). This set, which operates as a network, starts by finding natural rights — marked at the actual passage of the state of nature to civil state, in a Hobbesian conception, through their consecration especially in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, thereafter, in other texts, especially regional ones, until reaching the constitutionalization of these rights, giving rise to fundamental rights. In the case of nanotechnology, due to the difficulties already mentioned, there will not be traditional regulation — legal — the solution that Law will present. Maybe it is time to adopt voluntary "compliance programs" of existing standards, although not directly related to the nanoscale. This means that the dialogue between the sources of Law is projected onto these programs that will ensnare all social actors who may be affected by the effects of nanotechnology. It will be necessary a "normative power", which permeates integration between hard and soft law, without going into the merits of this dichotomy. This "normative power" has to aim to enable a corporate social responsibility, through a change in the mindset of organizations, what means, promoting a code of good practices, settled on a precautionary attitude that takes into account the current and future generations of living beings on Earth (Gorgoni, 2011, p. 371-83). These are some assumptions for the construction of the dialogue between sources of Law, supported by the principle of solidarity, "[...] which is, of responsibility, not only of governments, but also of society and of each of its individual members, for the social existence (and even for well-being) of each of the other members of society" (WIEACKER, 1993, p. 718). Therefore, with this passage it appears that there should be no concern about the dichotomy between public and private, but that everybody is responsible for the alignment of Law, and for the unconditional respect of its guidelines and standards. Other aspect that should be examined differently refers to legitimacy, which will no longer be "[...] in a single supreme source identified in whom holds the political supreme power, but, most often, in a spontaneous way of that varied and mobile reality that is the market" (Grossi, 2010, p. 83-4). It is not thought of defending the simply market matter. It is suggested to read the term "market" as the set of coordinated relations between the various actors operating in society, especially with the contours of globalization. And more: legitimacy will be promoted by the content — the respect for Rights (of) Humans, from its historical origin embedded in the deepest root of its genesis, which is Natural Law — and not by the presence of authority or power, with a simply formalistic bias. It will be necessary to take the challenge here delineated: "today, the jurist lives a fertile and hard moment: fertile, because their role is too active and stimulating; and difficult not only for the serious responsibilities that weigh on their back, but also for the extensive quotient of uncertainty surrounding their cognitive-applicative action" (Grossi, 2010, p. 86). This is the question: it is required to leave the castle of certainty that does not allow full view of the reality that is presented to jurists and to Law in order to launch a space of uncertainty, but with the probability to envision the new and challenging scenario that human creativity is sketching through techno science and that will have to be housed by Law.

Final Considerations

Federal Constitution, in this space, should be considered as a "moral authority", able to support the constitutional validity of responses obtained in the dialogue between the sources, which has the language as condition of possibility. Law and legal production cannot be satisfied with the abstract prediction of legal rules and of assumptions of factual support. It is needed to interact with the social reality that underlies any regulation, considering local and global transformations, foregrounding "human things". So, paraphrasing Carlos María Cárcova, who mentions the opacity of Law, resulting from the unawareness of legal norms, it is intended to insist on the opacity of Law in the sense of unawareness of effective potentialities of the sources of Law. Besides this, the unawareness of the entanglement of sources existing today, many of them specified by the advances of globalization and by the emergence of new production centers of normativity. Law should not be opaque and motionless; on the contrary, it should be colorful and vibrant, opening its arms to embrace the new rights and duties generated by society. It should be observed that:

> "technological development that enables other forms of human communication; communication that accelerates and turns flows, impacting perceptions and cognitive processes; circulation of power and control, risk and possibility, here are other dimensions of complexity in which we are immersed and that imply challenges of very diverse nature, among others, challenges for the familiar institutional structures and for traditional forms of regulation of social relations" (Carcova, 1998, p. 175).

This is the situation of Law today: it is being challenged as a field of knowledge and also in its intrinsic aspect, in the structuration and in the mode of building and listing the ways of attributing legal effects to the new risks and possibilities produced in nanoscale.

Substituting the pyramid by the horizontal arrangement of the sources of Law, connected by means of rings, in which the movements of communication occur in a much more fluid and fast way, and allow appropriate legal responses in tune with the values of a society that is local and global simultaneously. In this figure, there is also no concern to establish factual support elements previously, but, on the contrary, that are tuned with fundamental-natural-human rights. The dialogue between the sources of Law, by the constant ring movement of coming and going of sources, conducted by the thread of social solidarity, which is excited by the consonance between the three levels of rights, can bring the following composition for the generation of Law (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 116-7): a) "predetermination, which refers to the conditions of emission of the standard, to the legislator in the broad sense": it should be observed that it is not thought of a strictly state Law, but of large enough opening for the entrance of other sources of Law and of their actors of creation; b) "co-determination, which results from the margin left to the receiver, who must apply the standard, the judge in the broad sense": the standard will be assigned hermeneutic attribution of meaning, from the confrontation with the characteristics of the concrete case, giving to the applicator, who is not restricted to the judge, a creative and responsible margin of discretion for the construction of legal response; c) "overdetermination, which is, the code of values that is imposed to the legal field, to both the legislator and the judge, the implicit cultural code or 'a law that is expressed in silence'": it is worth saying, a "code" that is in consonance with the principles, values and fundamental-natural-human rights, in a substantial conjugation that must be steeped in constitutional control and in the control of conventionality. This "law which is expressed in silence" carries the screams of tradition and of the learning of experience, showing the relevance of flexibility of rings, to facilitate the movements of various formats until one finds the most suitable solution respecting living beings and the environment. This is the format of a new Theory of Legal Fact, able to respond and ensure a legally acceptable implementation of challenges, risks and possibilities — new rights and duties — generated by nanotechnology. These are the conditions, in a preliminary construction, for Law to be able to account for new rights and obligations generated by scientific-technological revolution wrought by human possibility of accessing the nanoscale. Therefore, it will be necessary to deconstruct the legal fort of certainty, so that Law can follow the path of innovation initiated by Exact Sciences, promoting renewal, even if it is by the path of uncertainty and without the shelter of the fortress of legal precision advocated by legal positivism, notably by the legalistic aspect.

Because of this scenario, which is innovative and challenging at the same time, it is proposed the motion of ideas proposed by Pontes de Miranda to the new figures designed by Mireille Delmas-Marty, especially to enable the construction of a "world statute for scientific expertise, able to work with a "ordained pluralism" (2013, p. 62-3). There is the central point of the dialogue between the sources of Law, envisaged from a resistance to dehumanization, through the responsibility of the authors involved, seeking an anticipation of risks that are arising, for example, from nanotechnology (DELMAS-MARTY, 2013th). It will be necessary to create legal production alternatives that are ethically based on the respect to human beings and on the preservation of the environment. And more: legal mechanisms that can act in preventive or precautionary way, anticipating the likely adverse effects generated by the nanotechnological scientific revolution, changing the profile of juridicization delimitation of social facts: instead of happening after the facts, it should occur concomitantly with them.

Referências

ABDI – AGÊNCIA BRASILEIRA DE DESENVOLVIMENTO INDUSTRIAL. Nanotecnologias: subsídios para a problemática do risco e da regulação. Brasília: ABDI, 2011.

_____. Panorama de Patentes de Nanotecnologia. Brasília: ABDI, 2011a.

_____. Estudo Prospectivo Nanotecnologia. Brasília: ABDI, 2010.

BINSFELD, Pedro Canisio. Nanotecnologia: a interação célula e nanopartícula. IN: MINISTÉRIO DA SAÚDE. ORGANIZAÇÃO PAN-AMERICANA DA SAÚDE. Inovação em Temas Estratégicos de Saúde Pública. Brasília: Ministério da Saúde, 2011. Volume I. Coletânea de Textos.

CÁRCOVA, Carlos María. A Opacidade do Direito. Tradução de Edilson Alkmim Cunha. São Paulo: LTr, 1998.

DELMAS-MARTY, Mireille. Un statut mondial pour l'expertise scientifique, IN: Sciences et Avenir, Paris, n. 794, p. 62-3, avril 2013.

DELMAS-MARTY, Mireille. Résister, Responsabiliser, Anticiper ou comment

humaniser la mondialisation. Paris: Seuil, 2013a.

DIDIER JR., Fredie; EHRHARDT JR., Marcos (Coords.). Revisitando a Teoria do Fato Jurídico: homenagem a Marcos Bernardes de Mello. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2010.

COUTINHO, Luís Pedro Pereira. A Autoridade Moral da Constituição: da fundamentação da validade do Direito Constitucional. Coimbra: Coimbra Editora, 2009.

DELMAS-MARTY, Mireille. Por um Direito comum. Tradução de Maria Ermantina de Almeida Prado Galvão. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2004.

DREXLER, Eric. Os Nanossistemas. Possibilidades e Limites para o Planeta e para a Sociedade. IN: NEUTZLING, Inácio e ANDRADE, Paulo Fernando Carneiro de (Orgs.). Uma Sociedade Pós-Humana: possibilidades e limites das nanotecnologias. São Leopoldo: Unisinos, 2009, p. 41-55.

ENGELMANN, Wilson. Nanotechnology, Law and Innovation. Saarbrücken, Germany: LAP LAMBERT Academic Publishing, 2011.

FACHIN, Luiz Edson. Pessoa, sujeito e objetos: reflexões sobre responsabilidade, risco e hiperconsumo. IN: TEPEDINO, Gustavo e FACHIN, Luiz Edson (Orgs.). Diálogos sobre Direito Civil. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2012, vol. III, p. 25-44.

_____. Teoria Crítica do Direito Civil. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2000.

GADAMER, Hans-Georg. Verdade e Método: traços fundamentais de uma hermenêutica filosófica. 4. ed. Tradução de Flávio Paulo Meurer. Petrópolis: Vozes, 2002.

GORGONI, Guido. Modelli di responsabilità e regolazione delle nanotecnologie nel Diritto Comunitario. IN: GUERRA, Giorgia et al (a Cura di). Forme di Responsabilità, Regolazione e Nanotecnologie. Bologna: Società Editrice il Mulino, 2011, p. 371-95.

GRADY, Wayne. Technology. Groundwork Guides. Toronto: Groundwood Books, House of Anansi Press, 2010.

GROSSI, Paolo. O Direito entre Poder e Ordenamento. Tradução de Arno Dal Ri Júnior. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2010.

HEIDEGGER, Martin. Ser e Tempo. 12 ed. Tradução de Marcia Sá Cavalcante Schuback. Petrópolis: Vozes, 2002, Parte I.

INVERNIZZI, Noela. Nanotechnology between the lab and the shop floor: what are the effects on labor? IN: J Nanopart Res. DOI 10.1007/s11051-011-0333-z, Springer, março 2011.

ISO TC 229 nº 944b. Nanotechnologies – Vocabularies for Science, Technology and Innovation Indicators. Disponível em: http://www.iso.org/iso/iso_technical_committee?commid=381983 Acesso em 06/01/2013.

MARQUES, Cláudia Lima. O "Diálogo das Fontes" como método da nova Teoria Geral do Direito: um tributo a Erik Jayme. IN: MARQUES, Cláudia Lima (Coord.). Diálogo das Fontes: do conflito à coordenação de normas do direito brasileiro. São Paulo: RT, 2012.

MELLO, Marcos Bernardes de. Teoria do Fato Jurídico. Plano da Existência. 16. ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2010.

PONTES DE MIRANDA. Tratado de Direito Privado. 4. ed. 2ª tiragem. São Paulo: RT, 1983, tomo I.

PONTES DE MIRANDA. Tratado de Direito Privado. 4. ed. 2ª tiragem. São Paulo: RT, 1977, tomo II.

RIDDALL, J. G. La gran pirámide. Hans Kelsen. IN: _____. Teoría del Derecho. 3. ed. Tradução de TsEdi, Teleservicios Editoriales, S.L. Barcelona: Gedisa, 2008.

SITE INOVAÇÃO TECNOLÓGICA. Tecnologias emergentes para o século 21. 15/02/2012. Online. Disponível em <www.inovacaotecnologica.com.br/noticias/noticia.php?artigo=tecnologias-emergentes>. Capturado em 05/01/2013.

WIEACKER, Franz. História do Direito Privado Moderno. 2. ed. Tradução de António Manuel Botelho Hespanha. Lisboa: Fundação Calouste Gulbenkian, 1993.

Inferencialist Pragmatism and Dworkin's "Law as Integrity"

Thiago Lopes Decat[1]

Abstract: The paper aims at justifying an interpretation of Dworkin's theory of Law as Integrity that brings it closer to philosophical pragmatism despite his rejection of legal pragmatism. In order to achieve this aim, this work employs a classification of philosophical commitments that define pragmatism in a broad and in a narrow sense, and shows that legal pragmatism follows the main thinkers of pragmatism in the narrow sense in committing to instrumentalism. The attribution of a pragmatist character to Dworkin's theory of law rests on the idea that the adoption of a commitment to instrumentalism is no implicated by its adoption of other pragmatist commitments.

Keywords: Pragmatism; Instrumentalism; Integrity.

1. Introduction

The widely known and historical polysemy of the term "pragmatism", in its philosophical theoretical use, finds a match in its use in the theory of law. Nevertheless, a conception in particular has been standing out and getting more space in discussions in the legal field, namely the one involved in the debates between Ronald Dowrkin (2010, p. 107-148) and self titled pragmatist Richard Posner (1997; 1998). Such a conception of decisionist nature seems to claim as its remote antecedent two tenets of Oliver Wendell Holmes' (1963; 2013) philosophy of law: the rejection of abstract speculation, especially moral ones, as well as the conscious decision to refer the contents of judicial decisions to its predictable social consequences. Its present-day antecedent may be found in Richard Rorty's version of pragmatism that sees anti-theoretical and anti-systematic commitments as necessary consequences of conferring primacy to practice (in the sense of social practices) and of anti-essencialist thought. (Rorty, 2000a, p. 53-92)

[1] Professor of Philosophy and Sociology of Law at Faculdade de Direito Milton Campos, Belo Horizonte, Brazil. E-mail: thiagodecat@gmail.com.

In an article called "The banality of pragmatism and the poetry of justice," Rorty (1999, p. 93-95) predictably restates the affinity between his version of neo-pragmatism and Posner's philosophy of law, but surprises us by also enlisting Dworkin into the ranks of the legal (neo) pragmatism, despite his explicit rejection of what he conceives as legal pragmatism (Dworkin, 2007, p. 212).

This paper intends to make a similar move bringing Dworkin closer to a non rortyan version of contemporary philosophical pragmatism. The argument rests on the idea that Robert Brandom's inferencialist reading of pragmatist theoretical commitments (Brandom, 2011) can serve as the basis for a conception of contemporary philosophical pragmatism which is, simultaneously, anti-essentialist and based on the primacy of practical, without being for this reason anti-theoretical and anti-systematic.

The reasonableness of this effort to bring them closer is justified, among other things, by the similarity between what Brandom calls historical-expressive rationality - a conception of rationality originaly Hegelian but properly stripped of its metaphysical and teleological features by means of the resources of an inferencialist linguistic pragmatics - and the dworkian demand for integrity that guides the decisions of judges as an independent ideal, according to an interpretation of legal social practices that shows them in their best light. (Dworkin, 2007) The affinity between philosophical pragmatism and a rationalist, cognitivist, theory of law such as "Law as Integrity" might perhaps allow the extension of the expression "legal pragmatism" even beyond its already wide and vague limits.

2. Dworkin and legal pragmatism

The main difficulty in devising an argument that brings Dworkin´s law as Integrity closer to philosophical pragmatism, and consequently in developing a sense of legal pragmatism that both fits his theory of law and is conceivable as an extension or application of philosophical pragmatism to the legal field, is Dworkin´s explicit rejection of legal pragmatism. (Dworkin, 2007, p. 185-212) Even recognizing that legal pragmatism shares the merit of being an interpretive theory of law with his own conception, and therefore is superior to semantic theories of law such as legal positivism or conventionalism, he claims that if legal pragmatism is right, his own theory of law is wrong and vice versa, that they are opposite theories. (Dworkin, 2007, p. 186, 212)

The awkwardness of this situation is that, at the same time, it is easy to spot some theoretical commitments typical of philosophical pragmatism in his theory of law and hard to miss the aversion and critical stance adopted towards the instrumentalism characteristic of both legal pragmatism and classical American pragmatism.

The strategy – but in no way the arguments - adopted here is recognizably a Rortyan one: to broaden the scope of philosophical pragmatism in order to include the theoretical commitments of classical pragmatism as well as the accomplishment of other philosophers that share some of these commitments, but not necessarily all of them. It is also Rortyan the strategy of identifying Dworkin's criticism of legal pragmatism with the criticism of its crass instrumentalism. As will be seen ahead, it is this theoretical commitment to instrumentalism that characterizes the distinction between pragmatism in broad and narrow sense.

One cannot agree with Rorty, however, when he claims that:

> Dwokin's polemics against legal realism appear as no more than an attempt to sound a note of Kantian moral rigorism as he continues to do exactly the sort of thing the legal realists wanted done (Rorty, 1999, p. 93) or when, in an attempt to make the interpretation above plausible, he claims that:

> For myself, I find it hard to discern any interesting philosophical differences between Unger, Dworkin and Posner; their differences strike me as entirely political, as differences about how much change and what sort of change American institutions need (Rorty, 1999, p. 94)

Seeing Dworkin's theory of law (2007) as an attenuated or disguised form of legal realism, is to ignore the authority of past over future applications of legal concepts, central to the idea of integrity.

Also, understanding the disagreement between Dworkin and self titled legal pragmatists not as a philosophical difference concerning what the law is – understood as social practice – but as a disagreement about political preferences, however broadly one takes the meaning of the term "political", amounts to acknowledge a radical separation between what the law is and what the law ought to be, something entirely incompatible with Dworkin's criticism of legal positivism. In fact, it is the rejection of this separation what makes both Law as Integrity and legal pragmatism examples of interpretive theories of law, as opposed to legal positivism, understood as victim of the semantic sting (Dworkin, 2007, p. 56)

If the mentioned strategy works, it will be allowed to say that, although Dworkin is not a legal pragmatist in the known and time honored sense of Holmes (2013) or Posner (2010), he is in some sense also a legal pragmatist because his theory may also be seen as an application to law of pragmatist philosophical commitments.

3. Two senses of philosophical pragmatism

The first step, then, is to discern the different philosophical commitments that shape pragmatism in its broader sense and in its narrower, classical American, sense.

Brandom's analytic classification of pragmatist commitments is the point of departure. He distinguishes pragmatism, narrowly thought, "as a philosophical school of thought centered at evaluating beliefs by their tendency to promote success at the satisfaction of wants", whose emblematic adherents are Peirce, James and Dewey, from pragmatism in a broader sense:

> […]a movement centered on the primacy of the practical, initiated already by Kant, whose twentieth century avatar include not only Peirce, James and Dewey, but also the early Heidegger, the latter Wittgenstein, and such figures as Quine, Sellars, Davidson, Rorty and Putnam. (Brandom, 2011, p. 56)

He considers the narrow sense of Pragmatism, and its commitment to an instrumental order of explanation of belief and truth, to be a way of working out the commitments that constitute pragmatism in a broader sense.

Pragmatism, in the broadest possible sense, means to him giving general explanatory pride of place to practices and the practical. (Brandom, 2011, p. 58) This idea unfolds, in a more determinate way, in a corresponding commitment to the explanatory priority of pragmatic theorizing over semantic theorizing. The idea that semantics must answer to pragmatics is a pragmatist one in a distinctive sense. The meaning Brandom attaches to these terms is broad:

> […] pragmatics is the systematic or theoretical study of the use of linguistic expressions, and semantics is the systematic or theoretical study of the contents they express or convey. (Brandom, 2011, p. 57)

According to Brandom, this commitment implies, even for the philosophers that wrote before the linguistic turn, an understanding of language as a kind of doing, as a practice or activity. The primary focus on the order of linguistic explanation is on the activity of saying, as opposed to focusing on what is said, the meaning or content.

To Classical American Pragmatism, this theoretical move was also compatible with, if not required by, their resolute determination to accommodate the discoveries and contributions of Darwinian evolutionism in a naturalist philosophical conception of rational (linguistic) creatures as continuous with the rest of living nature (and even inorganic nature, as in the even more radical reconciliation sought by Peirce in his evolutionary cosmology). (Bbrandom, 2011, p. 6)

Brandom attributes another pragmatist commitment, derived from the previous one, to the philosophers mentioned above: "the point of talking about the content expressed or the meaning possessed by linguistic expressions is to explain at least some features of their use". (Brandom, 2011, p. 58)

This is a commitment to a methodological Pragmatism: seeing semantic theorizing as answering to pragmatics by taking pragmatic theory as it´s explanatory target. Taking the success of the theoretical semantic enterprise to be assessed according pragmatic criteria of adequacy allows the sorting out of genuine semantic theories from others on the basis of it explaining or not a central feature of linguistic practice.

Another pragmatist commitment derived from the explanatory primacy of the practical, another way of making semantics answer to pragmatics, is semantic pragmatism: "[…] the "view that it is the way practitioners use the expressions that makes them mean what they do." (Brandom, 2011, 61) This commitment imposes a methodological requirement on semantic theorizing: when one

> […] associates with expressions some semantic relevant whatsis as its content and meaning, she undertakes un obligation to explain what it is about the use of thet expression that establishes in practice the association between it and the semantically relevant whatsis. (Brandom, 2011, p. 61)

Semantic pragmatism, although related to, is different from methodological pragmatism. But the difference is subtle. The methodological pragmatist

> […] looks at the explanation of the practice of using expressions, the subject of pragmatics, in terms of the contents associated with those expressions, the subject of semantics. The semantic pragmatist looks at the explanation of the association of contents with expressions in terms of the practice of using those expressions. While those explanations may be facets of the same story, they need not be. (Brandom, 2011, p. 63)

A further way in which the primacy of the practical unfolds is the commitment to the explanatory priority of "Knowing how" over "knowing that" named fundamental pragmatism by Brandom. (2011, p. 65) According to it, the intelligibility of explicit theoretical beliefs depends on the existence of a background of implicit practical abilities. It is the opposite of the platonic intellectualist strategy of explaining practical abilities in terms of the grasp of some principles, some privileged bits of "knowing that".

Brandom (2011, p. 65) points out that taking the capacity to entertain beliefs and acquire knowledge as parasitic on capacities to do things more primitive than thinking, believing, and saying, in the sense that it is not yet one of these, is something we find even in the older members of the brief list of philosophers mentioned earlier. The fact that we can find it in the first Heidegger as well as in Dewey, for example, also supports the attribution of this commitment to philosophers on both sides of the analytic-continental gap, reinforcing the idea of a wider sense of pragmatism than the one defined by the theoretical commitments undertaken by the classical American triumvirate.

This fundamental pragmatism take its force, in part, from its ability to present itself simultaneously as a determination and clearer expression of the fundamental pragmatic insight according to which practice takes explanatory precedence.

But its force comes, in part, from its ability to solve the problem of infinite regress characteristic of the attempt to start to explain believing (a dimension of linguistic practice) in terms of explicit "know that" instead of implicit "Know how".

Brandom shows that the heart of the problem is also the indication of its solution: the inferential nature of beliefs. According to him

> Beliefs would be idle unless the believer could at least some times tell what followed from them (what else they committed the believer to) and what was incompatible with them. (Brandom, 2011, p. 66)

However, sorting out among beliefs which ones are compatible or incompatible with some other belief, and which ones are consequences of it, is at the same time something that can be done right or wrong, and something for which a finite explicit regulation cannot be given. For if there are explicit rules to follow in correctly sorting incompatibilities and inferential consequences, these last rules could be rightly or wrongly followed, demanding a new set of explicit rules located at a superior level, and so forth.

The solution to this problem is agreeing with Wittgenstein and the other pragmatists on the inevitable bending of the shovel: "[…] distinguishing the potential beliefs that are incompatible with a given belief, and those that are its inferential consequences is a practical skill or ability: a kind of know how." (Brandom, 2011, p. 66)

This commitment is worked out in different ways by different philosophers. Brandon strategy (2003c) involves the developing a neo-Hegelian account of the expressive function of logic, which encompasses acknowledging the existence of material inferences, transitions and incompatibility relations between propositions and between assertions which are good not in virtue of its form, but of its content.

These material inferences, a kind of content related inferential license, are in turn instituted by the activity of practically assessing the linguistic performances of others, the activity of treating a transition as good or bad, of taking a move in the language game to be good or bad (not of saying that it is).

The fourth and final commitment Brandom (2011, p. 68) attributes to pragmatism in the broad sense is a commitment to specifying linguistic practices in terms of some sort of normative status, to employ normative vocabulary in pragmatic theory. Commitment to this normative pragmatics seems to him unavoidable, if one wants give an account of the practice of using linguistic expressions that

> I) [is] to be explained by semantics, according to methodological pragmatism; II) establish the association of linguistic expressions with semantic interpretants, according to semantic pragmatism; and III) constitute the practical know how against the background of which alone the capacity to know believe or think that can be made intelligible, according to fundamental pragmatism. (Brandom, 2011, p. 68)

This commitment was already undertaken by Kant. Brandom (2011) sees as one of the most fundamental Kantian insights the idea that what distinguishes the activities of rational beings, judgments and actions, from the behavior of non rational creatures is that judgments and actions are things one is responsible for. They involve, in an essential way, the undertaking of commitments. (Brandom, 2011, p. 68)

According to this interpretation, Kant takes judging and acting as discursive activities, since it consists in the applications of concepts, and sees concepts as rules that define to what one has committed oneself in judging and acting the way he did. These rules make possible to assess the correction of judgments and actions in terms of facts and intentions, respectively.

Hence, Brandom (2011, p. 68) takes Kant´s account of conceptual contents as aimed at establishing conditions of correctness to our practical performances of acting and asserting. That makes him a methodological pragmatism whose account of discursive practices employs normative vocabulary.

A contemporary version of that commitment to normative pragmatics can be seen in Frege´s distinction between force and content. As Brandom reads him, for the young Frege, claiming is associating a pragmatic assertional force with a sentence. He also takes assertional force as a kind normative assessment, since he sees asserting a sentence as taking it to be true, and truth to be a form of correctness. (Brandom, 2011, p. 68)

Something along the same lines can be said of the latter Wittgenstein on Brandom's account. (2011, p. 69) One of the central subjects of Philosophical Investigations is the existence of norms implicit in practices. That's why, for Wittgenstein as well (1999, p. 91-92; § 195-199) to take a linguistic performance to have certain meaning is committing oneself to the correctness and incorrectness of some uses of the expression. To grasp a concept or intention is to commit to norms implicit in practice that define the correct use of the first and the fulfillment of the second.

Brandom (2011, p. 69) sees the later Wittgenstein´s version of the regress argument as qualifying him as a fundamental pragmatism, as well as a normative pragmatism. His argument about the necessary end of interpretations (the name he gives to a rule to apply or follow a rule) concludes with the acknowledgement that norms explicit in the form of rules can only be understood against a background of norms implicit in practices.

While the first three commitments that define the three more specific notions of pragmatism above may be easily applied to Classical American Pragmatism, it seems that normative pragmatism can´t be reconciled with their naturalistic approach to semantic and pragmatic theorizing.

But this is not the case. In fact, as Brandom reads the classical American pragmatist movement, this reconciliation is precisely the enterprise in which they were involved. They showed it is possible to acknowledge that the specification of social practices needed to work out the commitments to methodological, semantic and fundamental pragmatism requires the employment of normative vocabularies – talk about commitments and about correctness and incorrectness of performance – while searching for a naturalist strategy to understand the working of normative assessments. (Brandom, 2011, p. 70)

Brandom (2011, p. 70) understands classical pragmatists as pragmatists in all the senses discerned above. The explanatory priority they give to habits, practical skills, and abilities qualifies them as fundamental pragmatists. Their methodological pragmatism is manifest in their taking the point of talking about what we mean or believe –namely, semantic talk about meaning and content – to be the clarification of what we do, of our habits, of our practices of solving problems and seeking goals. They are also semantic pragmatists since they explain the meaning of utterances and the content of beliefs in terms of the roles of those utterances and beliefs play in social practices. Brandom aligns them alongside Kant, Frege, and Wittgenstein as endorsing a normative pragmatics, what in conjunction with their fundamental pragmatism implies their being also normative pragmatists. (Brandom, 2011, p. 71)

What makes it sometimes hard to see is the exclusively instrumental account they give of the norms that structure our cognitive practices. According to Brandom (2011, p. 71), classical pragmatism acknowledges only instrumental norms structuring human cognitive practices. Instrumental norms, in this sense, are assessments of performances as correct or incorrect in terms of their contribution to the successful achievement of goals.

This is the kind of norms they see as implicit in discursive (conceptual) practice and, because of this, they are also the norms their semantic pragmatism treats as the ultimate source of specific semantic explicit normative assessments such as truth assessments. The result is a conception of truth in terms of usefulness and a corresponding understanding of the contents of utterances and intentional states in terms of their contribution in getting what one wants. This line of thought allows Brandom to describe Peirce, Dewey and James as instrumental normative pragmatists. (Brandom, 2011, p. 71)

This description, however, is far from consensual among contemporary pragmatists. Some of them, like Haack (2004) and Putnam (2002, p. 59-65), reject Brandom (2011, p. 70-81) and Rorty's (2000b, p. 34-52) attribution of instrumentalism to classical American pragmatism as an error of interpretation. It must be acknowledged that they are right concerning Peirce. Although his pragmatic maxim is formulated in a way that, if considered apart from his other theoretical concerns, allows an instrumentalist reading, the association of Peirce's conception of truth as idealized justification with his recognition of truth as a goal of inquiry certainly ends the dispute.

Attempts to eschew attributions of instrumentalism to James and Dewey, however, are not so successful. Although some specialists in the classical American pragmatism have been going to some pains to reject the attribution of instrumentalism to James and Dewey, those who accept it are entitled to do it by central passages of important works of these philosophers. The instrumentalist definitions of truth one finds in James' work Pragmatism (1989) are one example. Dewey's explanation of thought and action in terms of inquiry, in his work Logic: the theory of inquiry is another example (1985). Dewey describes inquiry as a normatively structured activity whose norms are produced by generalizations of some specific methods employed in the past: the ones that proved to be, in experience, the best methods for achieving certain results.

The best way to conciliate these perspectives seems to be to attribute to James and Dewey not only the adoption of instrumentalist strategies, but also some degree of awareness that commitment to instrumentalism is only a strategy for working out the other pragmatist commitments, and so should not cloud them. That may as well be what the complaints they made about some instrumentalist interpretations of their work having pushed pragmatism too far are about.

However, this awareness is intermittent. The emphasis placed, by their critics and by the classical pragmatists themselves, on the instrumental aspect of pragmatism has eclipsed, from their critics and from themselves, the four more relevant pragmatist commitments that shape their philosophy, in Brandom´s view (2011, p. 71)

Since the attribution of instrumentalism to Peirce doesn't hold, and since Brandom's analysis of pragmatism ends in a definition of classical pragmatism consisting in the undertaking of all five pragmatist commitments above, from now on when talking about classical pragmatism Peirce should be excluded. The invention of the name "pragmaticism" to differentiate his thought from the thought of the rest of the pragmatists, especially their instrumentalism in matters of inquiry and truth, shows that Peirce would have no problem with this.

From the point of view of classical pragmatists, the great advantage of construing the norms implicit in practices in instrumental terms is the synthesis it allows between normative pragmatics and a Darwinian naturalism, a way to understand human practices as normative that is not mysterious, dualistic, or metaphysical, and that allows to see them as continuous with the rest of nature.

4. Legal pragmatism and instrumentalism

Of the five pragmatist commitments that shape the classical pragmatist movement´s philosophy, the one that was more intensely absorbed, and in some cases solely absorbed, by theoretical applications of pragmatism in the field of law was instrumentalism.

Instrumentalism is what boils behind Posner´s (2010, p. 32-33) resolute anti-theoretical claims that philosophical theory, even pragmatist philosophical theory, is irrelevant to legal pragmatism and legal practice. Such myopic absorption also help understanding Holmes' conception of law as prophecy, and his taking the judges conceptions of social benefit as supreme hermeneutic criteria.

In his The Path of Law, (2013) Holmes presents a series of instrumentalist claims and slogans. About law as object of inquiry, for example, he claims that "[…] the object of our study, then, is prediction, the prediction of the incidence of the public force through the instrumentality of the courts". (Holmes, 2013, p. 2). In the same spirit, he claims that "The prophecies of what the courts will do in fact, and nothing more pretentious, are what I mean by the law." (Holmes, 2013, p. 4)

Sometimes, the instrumentalism in Holmes' conception of law leans towards utilitarianism, when he claims that:

> judges themselves have failed adequately to recognize their duty of weighing considerations of social advantage. The duty is inevitable, and the result of the often proclaimed judicial aversion to deal with such considerations is simply to leave the very ground and foundation of judgments inarticulate, and often unconscious, as I have said. (Holmes, 2013, p. 9)

Holmes (2013, p. 16) also highlights in the same book, that priority should be given, in the shaping of lawyers, to the study of economy, thus anticipating more radical and utilitarian versions of legal pragmatism such as those exhibited by Posner and by the Law and Economics movement.

There certainly are other elements on Holmes (2013) conception of law that seem to follow from those other pragmatist theoretical commitments, shared by pragmatists in broad sense. The more manifest ones are the understanding of law not as a close system of norms, but as a social practice (Holmes, 2013, p. 1) as well as the understanding of the content of law as subjected to a historical process of transformation and improvement (Holmes, 2013, p. 3; 11). Such features, however, play a secondary role when compared with those features following form instrumentalism.

The same thing can be said of the sketch of a pragmatist conception of law that emerges from Dewey's My Philosophy of Law (2008) e Logical Method and Law (1925). Although in the first paper Dewey makes an effort to show the social – in the sense of interactional or intersubjective - origins of law, when it comes down to describing the activities of those involved in legal social practices in the second paper, instrumentalism dominates entirely.

After criticizing the syllogistic conception of legal inquiry and discussing at some length his own proposal of legal inquiry as an instantiation of the active, experimental and empirical process of inquiry that he calls logic - or, more precisely, the logic of discovery - characteristic of the reaching of intelligent decisions by lawyers and judges, Dewey adds to this process an instrumentalist twist. In a fragment resembling Holmes' instrumentalist theses, he claims about the logic of judicial decisions that:

> […] it must be a logic relative to consequences rather than to antecedents, a logic of prediction of probabilities rather than deduction of certainties. For the purposes of a logic of inquiry into probable consequences, general principles can only be tools justified by the work they do. (Dewey, 1925, p. 26)

One is right in attributing to Dewey, therefore, the idea that the real process by means of which legal decisions in general - and judicial decisions in particular - are reached is instrumental in nature. In another passage, the instrumental nature of normative legal patterns becomes even clearer:

> The "universal" stated in the major premise is not outside of and antecedent to particular cases; neither is it a selection of something found in a variety of cases. It is an indication of a single way of treating cases for certain purposes or consequences in spite of their diversity. (Dewey, 1925, p. 22)

If the reading undertaken here is sound, it seems that Dewey, in his sparse writings on law, synthesizes the conception of experience and logic typical of philosophical pragmatism in the narrow sense with an instrumentalism quite similar to the one expressed in Holmes' theses of law as prophecy and in his adoption of efficiency in bringing forth social benefits as supreme hermeneutic criteria.

Theoretical pragmatist conceptions of law can then be seen, apparently, as what happens when the orientation towards consequences that characterizes the pragmatist movement is read through reductive instrumentalist lens before being applied to law.

5. Dworkin's theory of law as a pragmatist interpretation of legal practices

But this is a half truth. There are others theories in the field of law that could be called pragmatist theories due to its absorption of one or more of the other pragmatist commitments, although rejecting instrumentalism. This is the case of Dworkin's Law as Integrity (2007).

This specific theory of law is committed to methodological pragmatism since it takes the point of theorizing about the content of law in general and of rights in particular as explaining some features of the use of legal concepts, of judicial adjudication, in short, of legal practice.

This theoretical guideline is what lies behind Dworkin´s interpretive and non reductionist conception of law according to which to interpret the law is to identify as the contents of rights those that show legal social practices in its best light, running intelligibility and justifiability together.

Law as Integrity is also committed to semantic pragmatism. It rejects the legal positivist strategy of demarcating the realm of law by means of a factual test. In its place stands the acknowledgment that the only thing that can lead us in establishing the propositional content of the doctrinaire concept law - what the law requires in novel cases - is the history of previous political and judicial decisions thought of as continuous and coherent with the current legal practices of adjudication. In short, it's a theory that makes the meaning and content of the legal propositions dependant on its historical and present use.

Differently from the other pragmatist commitments, commitment to fundamental pragmatism does not come to the fore of Dworkin's Law as integrity. However, since there is nothing in Dowrkin's theory of law that precludes commitment to fundamental pragmatism, and since this theory is not compatible with any form of platonist intellectualist order of explanation, this absence may be credited to the relative irrelevance of investigating pre-linguistic know how for achieving its theoretical goals.

The commitment to normative pragmatism, on the other hand, can be clearly seen in the pride of place Dworkin affords to the idea of norms implicit in practices. That idea is in the core of his concept of legal principle and of the distinctive rational process of simultaneously applying the law and developing the law that he calls constructive interpretation.

It is also deserving of notice that this commitment to the existence of norms implicit in practices is one that none of the self titled legal pragmatists undertook. They suggest a kind of skepticism about rights to the judges. It is the strategy of acting "as if" there were rights originating from the norms explicitly codified in the forms of rules. But they see this strategy as just one more way of "interpreting" the law and fixing its meaning aiming at an increase in social benefit. What follows from this is the conditional character of the strategy: it should be employed when and only when it supposedly leads to an increase in social benefit. Consequently, rights derived from rules are a considered a (sometimes) useful fiction. They don't really exist. The opposite of that conception is to recognize norms as real even when they are implicit in practices.

If this is correct, one can start to understand how the employment of Brandom's analysis of philosophical pragmatism equips one to do what this paper set out to do from the beginning: bring Dworkin closer to philosophical pragmatism. It is possible to see now that his conception of law is incompatible not with philosophical pragmatism in the broad sense as defined by the four pragmatist commitments that articulate its theories. On the contrary, Dworkin's theory of law adopts explicitly three of them and is highly compatible with the fourth. Its' incompatibility regards merely the strategy adopted by the classical pragmatists for working out their commitment to normative pragmatism in the context of their darwinian naturalist commitments, namely, instrumentalism about norms, and its legal expression.

But this strategy is entirely optional. Commitment to a naturalist order of explanation is not required by pragmatism in the broad sense. In the same spirit, commitment to instrumentalism is optional even for someone committed to naturalism. Its rejection count as rejecting at most some features of pragmatism as construed in a narrow sense. It is doubtful that committing to a reductive instrumentalism about norms is inevitable even if one wants to give a naturalist account of the norms implicit in practices. Brandom's own account of the emergence of the norms implicit in our discursive practice in the first chapter of Making it Explicit (Brandom, 1998, p. 3-66) can be read as a kind of weak naturalistic explanation of normativity.

Since the conception of law as integrity undertakes at least three of the four theoretical commitments that defines pragmatism in the broad sense, and since legal pragmatism, despite sharing instrumentalist commitments with classical pragmatism, undertakes no more than three of these commitments, we can draw the conclusion that Dworkin's (2007) conception of law is entitled to be understood as an application of philosophical pragmatism to the legal field, at least as much as legal pragmatism is.

References

Brandom, Robert. Analyzing Pragmatism: pragmatics and pragmatisms. In: Brandom, Robert. Perspectives on pragmatism: classical, recent & contemporary. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard, 2011. p. 56-82.

Brandom, Robert. Making it explicit: reasoning, representing and discursive commitment. Harvard U.P: Cambridge Mass., 1998.

Brandom, Robert. Semantic inferentialism and logical expressivism. In: Brandom, Robert. Articulating reasons: an introduction to inferentialism. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard U.P, 2003c. p. 45-78.

Dewey, John. Lógica: a teoria da investigação. Translation Murilo Otávio Rodrigues Paes Leme. São Paulo: Abril Cultural (Os pensadores), 1985.

Dewey, John. Logical method and law. Cornell Law Quarterly. Ithaca, N.Y., v. 10, n. 17, 1914-1925, 1925.

Dewey, John. My philosophy of law. In: Boydston, Jo Ann (Org). John Dewey: The Later Works, 1925-1953. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2008, p. 115-122.

Dworkin, Ronald. A justiça de toga. Translation Jefferson Luiz Camargo. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2010.

Dwokin, Ronald. O império do direito. Translation Jefferson Luiz Camargo. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2007.

Haack, Suzan. Pragmatism, old and new. In Contemporary pragmatism, vol. 1, n.1 (junho 2004), p. 3-41.

Holmes Jr., Oliver Wendel. The path of law. Disponível em: <http://intersci.ss.uci.edu/wiki/eBooks/BOOKS/Holmes/The%20Path%20of%20Law%20Holmes.pdf.> Acesso em: 17/06/2013.

Holmes Jr., Oliver Wendel. O direito comum: as origens do direito anglo-americano. Translation J.L. Melo. Rio de Janeiro: O cruzeiro, 1963.

James, William. Pragmatismo. Translation Jorge Caetano da Silva. São Paulo: Nova Cultural (Os pensadores), 1989.

Posner, Richard. Conceptions of legal theory: a reply to Ronald Dworkin. Arizona State Law Journal. Tucson, n. 29. p. 377-385, 1997.

Posner, Richard. Direito, pragmatismo e democracia. Translation Teresa Dias carneiro. Rio de Janeiro: Gen Forense, 2010.

Posner, Richard. The problematics of moral and legal theory. Harvard Law Review. Cambridge MA, n. 111, p. 1637-1640, 1998.

Putnam. Hilary. Comment on Robert Brandom's paper. In Conant, James, Zeglen, Ursula (Ed). Hillary Putnam: Pagmatism and Realism. Nova York: Routledge, 2002. p. 59-65.

Rorty, Richard. The banality of pragmatism and the poetry of justice. In: Rorty, Richard. Philosophy and social hope. Nova York: Penguin Books, 1999. p. 93-103.

Rorty, Richard. Um mundo sem substâncias ou essências. Translation Cristina

Magro e Antônio Marcos Pereira. In Magro, Cristina. Pereira, Antônio Marcos. (orgs) Pragmatismo: a filosofia da criação e da mudança. Belo Horizonte: Editora UFMG, 2000a. p. 53-92.

Rorty, Richard. Verdade sem correspondência com a realidade. Translation Cristina Magro e Antônio Marcos Pereira. In Magro, Cristina. Pereira, Antônio Marcos. (orgs) Pragmatismo: a filosofia da criação e da mudança. Belo Horizonte: Editora UFMG, 2000b. p. 17-52.

Wittgenstein, Ludwig. Investigações filosóficas. Translation José Carlos Bruni. São Paulo: Nova Cultural, 1999. (Os Pensadores)

Another Pragmatism:
the Scandinavian legal thought

Jean-Baptiste Pointel

Abstract: Nowadays, the Scandinavian classical legal thought is described as "pragmatic". Though, this "pragmatism" is not rooted on Peirce, James or Dewey: the American Pragmatic Maxim was released in 1878. The two first Nordic scholars, considered as "legal pragmatists", Anders Sandøe Ørsted and Anton Schweigaard, died before 1870. Can we label them so, since they never acknowledged this philosophy? Pragmatism is, after all, a method of thinking, not a unified doctrine. As the American one, Scandinavian legal realism might be built on pragmatic precepts, with some variations: the Scandinavian Legal Realism is interested with scientific method for jurisprudence, while the American one focuses itself on practical issues. Nevertheless, there are some links interesting enough (how important are democratic issues for Dewey and the Uppsala School; the fact that William James was convinced by -and converged with- some Kierkegaard's views…)

The result of Nordic reflections is a specific concept of law. Rules are directives for action, not categorical imperatives. They give guidelines for the judges and the officials, but also for every citizen. The implementation of the law depends on the context. Legal norms are not "pure" and neutral. They contain values. That's why the legal language must be studied: its analysis reveals the inherent values. Then, a critical stance can be adopted. To sum up, this legal thought has the following characteristics: anti-foundationalism; anti-formalism; rhetorical analysis of language; moderate skepticism (or fallibilism); pluralism; contextualism.

This paper will look down on the four main Nordic scholars, namely the Danish Anders Sandøe Ørsted and Alf Ross, the Norwegian Anton Martin Schweigaard and the Swedish Karl Olivecrona. I will express how they forged a Pragmatic method. To my mind, they present the following common feature: a sensibility to individual ethic, and its relevance into the law.

Introduction

Since the "pragmatic turn" in philosophy of law[1], there is a trend to reread authors and to consider them as "legal pragmatists", sometimes "despite them". Therefore, young researchers find in the Scandinavian classical legal thoughts the basic elements of "pragmatism"[2]. Such idea may be odd: the American Pragmatic Maxim was released in 1878[3]; the two main Nordic scholars, considered as "legal pragmatists", Anders Sandøe Ørsted and Anton Schweigaard, died before 1870[4]. Their philosophical background cannot be rooted on Peirce, James or Dewey. Can we still label the Nordic "pragmatists", since they never acknowledged this philosophy?[5] May there be any sort of "plagiarism by anticipation"?[6] The only reasonable answer is to assume that pragmatism is not a unified doctrine but a method of thinking[7]. There can be some alternative reflections converging on main topics and on the way of reasoning. It is not needed to trace back roots on the same first authors. It is sufficient to highlight the consistency of their thoughts and the relevance of the answers they had on same topics.

Every legal thought is conducted by philosophical insights. Sometimes, we can only found them in background, sometimes they are explicit[8].For the Nordics, the main influence came from Germany.

[1] Jules L. Coleman, The Practice of Principle. In Defence of a Pragmatist Approach to Legal Theory, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2001.

[2] The more relevant work is : Sverre Blandhol, Nordisk rettspragmatisme: Savigny, Ørsted og Schweigaard. Om vitenskap og metode [Nordic Legal Pragmatism: Savigny, Ørsted and Schweigaard. On science and method], Copenhagen, Jurist-og Økonomforbundets forlag, 2005.

[3] Charles Sanders Peirce, "How to Make Our Ideas Clear", Popular Science Monthly 12, January 1878.

[4] Respectively, the Danish passed away in 1860 and the Norwegian lived until 1870.

[5] Dag Michalsen, "Rettsvitenskapens mange identiteter – Bidrag til den rettsvitenskapshistoriske metode" ["Jurisprudence many identities – Contributions to the Jurisprudence Historical Method"] , in Jukka Kekkonen, Pia Letto-Vanamo, Päivi Paasto and Heikki Pihlajamäki (Ed.), Norden, Rätten, Historia. Festskrift till Lars Björne, Helsinki, Suomalainen Lakimiesyhdistys, 2004.

[6] Pierre Bayard, Le plagiat par anticipation [plagiarism by anticipation], Paris, Minuit, 2009.

[7] Arthur O. Lovejoy, "The Thirteen Pragmatisms", The Journal of Philosophy, Psychology and Scientific Methods, vol. V, no. 1, January 1908.

[8] E. g. Hans Kelsen's theory is linked to the neo-Kantian and the logical positivism, the Ordinary language philosophy innervates H.L.A Hart's jurisprudence… More explicitly,

Though, Schweigaard begins his review of German philosophy by a terrible sentence: "The German philosophy has done much harms, it made lost many great minds; it is time to get off with it."[9] What does it mean? Which scholars is he referring to? Especially Kant, followed by Fichte and Schelling and then Hegel. Apart Kierkegaard, the leaders of the Scandinavian way are the Danish Anders Sandøe Ørsted and the Swedish Axel Hägerström. They are the builder of the pragmatism legal though in Scandinavia[10]. They have the same goal: to reject every metaphysic from law.

At the beginning of the twentieth century begins the Scandinavian realism, following this trend. On the other side of Atlantic, almost at the same time, the American legal realism is considered built on philosophical pragmatism, following the example of Oliver W. Holmes Jr. While they focus themselves on practical issues, the main topics of the Scandinavians were epistemological ones: how to get a scientific method for jurisprudence, without any metaphysics[11]. Nowadays, the pragmatism "revival" is mainly found in epistemology[12]. That is why an inquiry on the Scandinavian Classical Legal Thought up to the Uppsala School is really relevant today, in a comparative perspective[13].

The object of this paper is not to compare American legal pragmatism to the Scandinavian one, nor to highlight links between the two pragmatisms (for example, democratic issues are very important the French Paul Amselek wrote his PhD Thesis about the phenomenological method in jurisprudence.

---

[9] Anton Schweigaard, « De la philosophie allemande » [On German Philosophy], La France littéraire, vol. 16, 1835, p. 106. I translate from the french.

[10] Lars Björne, Brytningstiden. 1814-1870. Den nordiska rättsvetnenskapens historia [The Break time. 1814-1870. The History of Nordic Jurisprudence], t. II, Lund, Nerenius & Santérus förlag, 1998; Id., Realism och skandinavisk realism. 1911-1950.Den nordiska rättsvetenskapens historia [Realism and Scandinavian Realism. 1911-1950. The History of Nordic Jurisprudence],t. IV, Stockholm, Rättshistoriskt bibliotek, n. LXII, 2007.

[11] Michael Martin, Legal Realism: American and Scandinavian, New York, Peter Lang, coll. "American University Studies. Series V, Philosophy", 1997.

[12] Jacques Lenoble, "Beyond the Judge: From Hermeneutic and Pragmatist Approaches to a Genetic Approach to the Concept of Law", European Journal of Legal Studies, vol. 1, n° 2, 2007, p. 2.

[13] Torben Spaak, "Naturalizing Jurisprudence – By Brian Leiter", Theoria, vol. 74, n° 4, 2008, pp. 352-362; Torben Spaak, "Naturalism in Scandinavian and American Realism: Similarities and Differences", in Mattias Dahlberg (ed.), De Lege Uppsala-Minnesota colloquium: Law, Culture and Values, Uppsala, Iustus Förlag, 2009, pp. 33-83.

for Dewey[14] and the Uppsala School[15]; William James was convinced by -and converged with- some Kierkegaard's views[16]…). In this paper, my interest is the main Nordic scholars, in particular the Danish Anders Sandøe Ørsted and Alf Ross, the Norwegian Anton Martin Schweigaard and the Swedish Karl Olivecrona. How did they build a Pragmatic method? What do they intend to react to? And then, I will sum up the characteristics of this legal thought.

I. From empiricism to pragmatism: the foundation of a Scandinavian legal style

In the 19th century, the natural law school was prevalent, especially the German one. Thus, some scholars, like Savigny, broke up with the jus naturalism. In Scandinavia, the lawyers have developed a more practical science of law, based on empiricism. Ørsted and Schweigaard largely ruled the Nordic legal reflections, during this century[17].

a) The Danish founder: Anders Sandøe Ørsted

Anders Sandøe Ørsted (1778-1860) was the most important Danish lawyer of the Nineteenth century – and is only lately overturned by Alf Ross. He was the first one to introduce the Kantian ideas into the [14] Robert B. Westbrook, "Pragmatism and Democracy: Reconstructing the Logic of John Dewey's Faith", in Morris Dickstein (Ed.), The Revival of Pragmatism: New Essays on Social Thought, Law, and Culture, Durham, Duke University Press, 1998.

[15] Karl Olivecrona, Law as fact, Copenhagen, E. Munksgaard, 1939; Alf Ross, Why democracy?, Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952.

[16] William James, "How Two Minds Can Know One Thing", The Journal of Philosophy, Psychology and Scientific Methods, vol. 2, no. 7, 1905, p. 180; J. Michael Tilley, "William James: Living Forward and the Development of Radical Empiricism", in Jon Stewart (Ed.), Kierkegaard's Influence on Philosophy – Anglophone Philosophy, t.3, vol. 11

[17] Lars Björne, Brytningstiden. 1814-1870…, op cit., p. 433; Erik Anners, "Den europeiske rettens historie (utvalgte deler): Europa og Norden" ["The European Legal History (Selected Parts): Europe and Norden"], in Erik Boe (Ed.), Veien mot Rettstudiet [Road to Law Studies], Oslo, Tano Aschehoug, 1996, p. 235; Jens Arup Seip, "A. M. Schweigaard og liberalismens dilemna" [A. M. Schweigaard and the Liberalism Dilemna], Politisk ideologi. Tre lærestykker [Political Ideology. Three Lessons], Oslo, Universitetsforlaget, coll. "Det Blå Bibliotek", 1988, p. 76; Id., Utsikt over Norges historie [Overview of Norwegian History], t.1, Tidsrommet 1814-ca. 1860, Oslo, Gyldendals fakkelbøker, 1974, p. 100.

Danish law[18]. He opposed himself to his friend Fichte, about the inheritage of Kant. The goal of a Pure Theory of Law of his German colleague is denounced as a non-sense. He criticized the excess of theory used to describe reality: all the Danish thought, then, oppose to the will to build a system of certainty the irreducible of science, namely the individual and his subjectivity[19].

Ørsted found his arguments against Kant thanks to a divergent lecture of Christian Garve's translation of Ciceron's De Officiis. Based on his own Ciceronian commentaries[20], he lays stress on the use of language and its effect. We can see here the main opposition between him and Savigny: the German classical legal follows Greek tradition, based on Plato and philosophical systematism; the new Danish one is more roman, based on rhetorical and practical considerations. That is why Ørsted jurisprudence focuses on legal argumentation and empiricism: cognition is linked to language. Linguistic tools (universal) are not sufficient to encompass the diversity of reality (individual). Therefore, all the knowledge of the world is limited. His brother Hans Christian, a famous physicist and chemist, helps him to understand that natural world is composed of an infinite chain of objects. These elements are all different, but there is no clear separation among them, because there is no more than infinite small gradual variation[21]. Every barrier is arbitrary and the criteria used will never be sufficient, because the transition is always fuzzy: "the conceptions and formulas that moral theory is able to deliver, are not sufficient to solve all the tasks that life's multiple vicissitudes bring about."[22] Ørsted's contemporaries call this idea the "continuity of

[18] Anders S. Ørsted, "Over Sammenhængen mellem Dydelærens og Retslærens Princip" [1798], Moralfilosofiske skrifter i udvalg, Copenhague, Gyldendalske boghandel, 1936, pp. 7-237; See also Frantz Dahl, Hovedpunkter af Den danske Retsvidenskabs Historie, Copenhague, Nyt Nordisk Forlag, 1937, p. 47 ff.

[19] Olivier Cauly, Les philosophies scandinaves, Paris, PUF, coll. « Que sais-je ? », n°3308, 1998, p. 56.

[20] Sten Gagnér "Ørsted vetenskap, de tyska kriminalisterna och naturrättsläran" [Ørsted Science, the German Criminology and Natural Law Doctrine], Tidsskrift for Rettsvitenskap 1980, pp. 419-425.

[21] Anders S. Ørsted, "Over Grændserne mellem Theorie og Praxis i Sædelæren", Blandede Skrifter i Udvalg, Copenhague, Gyldendal, 1933 [1811], p. 37, quoted and translated by Sverre Blandhol, "The rhetorical foundations of Nordic jurisprudence", Ideas in History, vol.1, n°1-2, 2006, p. 44.

[22] Ibid., Anders S. Ørsted, p. 65 ; Sverre Blandhol, p. 47.

reality"[23]. The Danish lawyer does not conclude that Kantian categorical imperatives are non-sense. According to Ørsted, we should follow the ideal embodied in categorical imperatives. But, because such goals are too difficult, unreachable, we make do with acting prudently, pragmatically: every individual act corresponds to an area of individual liberty, trying to reach ethical ideals. Thus, a moral theory must be grounded into empirical studies.

Ørsted was also a professional judge. His legal thought is based on his everyday practice. He adapts his reflections on ethics to law: statutes law remains ideal which cannot plan with precision every individual case. We cannot deduce practical application from the mere written provisions. There is always a room left for pragmatic elements, bridging the gap between theory and practice. Thence, it is necessary, according to Ørsted, to observe factual position and social circumstances that drive human attitudes and his motivation. However, cognition flows by language. That is why argumentation is the main topic of legal method. To understand a legal norm, it is useless to refer to a philosophical system. Such ideal construction cannot offer any answer, but it can corrupt positive law with metaphysics. We must use a historical method, in order to apprehend with pragmatism the contextual elements of law: the state of mind of the legislators, morals of a people at a given time, the legal mentality, various applications of the statutes… To sum up, Ørsted refuses any systemic abstract construction[24]. Instead, his answer is to look to the living conditions and social circumstances to which law pertain: law depends on the judge which evaluates contextual elements in order to enforce legal rules[25].

b) The Norwegian successors: Anton Martin Schweigaard & Francis Hagerup

In 1814, Norway became an independent country. Anton Martin Schweigaard (1808-1870) is characteristic of the intellectual revolution that occurred at that time. High-ranking civil servant and professor of law, great Member of Parliament, he has developed an "ideology of action": all his life, he has fought against what he finds wrong or deceptive, especially what he calls the "false prophets"[26]. He traveled around Europa, especially Germany and France. The young Schweigaard got a strong instruction into moral (German) philosophy and Latin education, which he strongly condemned[27]. The objects of these teachings were not to understand how moral works but to inculcate one position: "they put their ideas instead of reality". That is why he confronts Kant's philosophy[28]. Providing Roman law courses, he applied his new methodology, practical-empiricism[29]. For Schweigaard, "Roman law is important, not as norms, but because he found there a jurisprudence in this law."[30] It is not only a mere history of old rules of law; it is the pattern of legal reasoning, still present and important. He used his analytical-descriptive method to bridge Roman law to current issues in Norwegian law.

[23] Ibid., Anders S. Ørsted, p. 37 ; Sverre Blandhol, p. 44.
[24] Olivier Cauly, Les philosophies scandinaves, op cit., p. 71.
[25] Sverre Blandhol, "The rhetorical foundations of Nordic jurisprudence", op cit., pp. 48-49.

He joined Ørsted's thought on many topics, especially, the objection to German jurisprudence[31], the care of language and rhetoric, the porosity of concepts, and the supremacy of argumentation over deduction. According to Schweigaard, legal principles, doctrinal studies and systematic are tools of opportunity, made by humans for practical uses. German philosophers think they are a priori, basic ideas of every law. This understanding leads to erroneous reasoning: it is common to proceed by reductionism, regressive analysis up to the basics that should be universal concepts with empirical proofs. But, this is a logical error claiming infallibility of deduction. Two opposite concepts have, in fact, a fuzzy frontier. Therefore, the only valid reasoning is argumentation. Schweigaard condemned the conceptualism as a whole, the use of mathematics in communication and the law of "excluded middle".

Hence, Schweigaard proposes a pragmatic methodology in law:

---

[26] Jens Arup Seip, "A. M. Schweigaard og liberalismens dilemna", op cit., p. 72.

[27] Ibid., pp. 67-72; Thor Inge Rørvik, "Schweigaard og Filosofien" ["Schweigaard and Philosophy"], in Ola Mestad (Ed.), Anton Martin Schweigaard – Professorpolitikeren [Anton Martin Schweigaard – Professor Politician], Oslo, Akademisk Publisering, 2009, p. 85.

[28] William Fovet, "L' 'affaire Schweigaard'" ["The 'Schweigaard case'"], Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, n° 2, 2002, pp. 47-70.

[29] Dag Michalsen, "Schweigaards romerske rett og den europeiske rettsvitenskap på universitet og storting" ["Schweigaard's Roman Law and the European Legal Science in University and Parliament"], in Ola Mestad (Ed.), Anton Martin Schweigaard…, op cit., pp. 336-337.

[30] Ibid. p. 362.

[31] Schleiermacher is an exception. Schweigaard got a great respect for the precursor of hermeneutics. See: William Fovet, "L' 'affaire Schweigaard'", op cit.

we need to evaluate every consideration, including natural law because frontier between law and moral is also fuzzy. But, there is no transcendental or heritable answers. Every problem is multifaceted, so we have to analyze with rhetoric and argumentation, no hermetical concepts. But the object is the description of norms that are empirically proved in order to understand how law works, not how law should work – that would be normative and no more descriptive.

His successor at the University of Oslo, Francis Hagerup (1853-1921) criticizes the narrow-minded Schweigaard's methodology: it is mere case-law analysis with no depth and no comparison at all with foreign laws[32]. He founded the first Nordic review of jurisprudence, Tidsskrift for Retsvidenskab. Since then, the reflections about jurisprudence have been no more purely domestic but Scandinavian. Following Jhering, Hagerup worked on an autonomous legal science apart from politics and sociology[33]. His methodology is constructive and deploys in three steps: analysis of concepts, systematization, relevant construction[34]. His methodology uses not so much deduction but induction: "Categories of general concepts cannot be deduced a priori, but we have to find them in inductive empiricism, if the object is partly made of rules of positive law, partly of practical forms of legal life."[35] As such, his constructive methodology looks after legal problems as they appear in practical life and not as they appear in the minds of legal theoreticians.

II. Against metaphysics and formalism: the deepening of Scandinavian Pragmatism

[32] Sverre Blandhol and Dag Michalsen, "Perspektiver på Francis Hagerup" ["Perspectives on Francis Hagerup"], in Id. (Ed.), Rettsforsker, politiker, internasjonaliste: Perspektiver på Francis Hagerup [Legal Researcher, Politician, Internationalist: Perspectives on Francis Hagerup], Oslo, Unipax Akademisk Publishering, coll. "Oslo Studies in Legal History", n° 2, p. 9-10; Sverre Blandhol, "Francis Hagerup om juridisk metode" ["Francis Hagerup on legal method"], in Sverre Blandhol and Dag Michalsen (Ed), Rettsforsker, politiker, internasjonaliste…, op cit., p. 44.

[33] Rune Slagstad, "Utilitarisme og naturret: norsk rettstenkning fra Schweigaard til Seip" ["Utilitarism and Natural Law: Norwegian Legal Thought from Schweigaard to Seip"], Rettens ironi [Legal Irony], Oslo, Pax Forlag A/S, 2001, p. 85.

[34] Sverre Blandhol, "Francis Hagerup om juridisk metode", op cit., p. 23.

[35] Francis Hagerup, "Nogle Ord om den nyere Retsvidenskabs Karakter" ["Some words about the newer Jurisprudence Characteristics"], Tidsskrift for Rettsvitenskap 1888, p. 27 quoted by Sverre Blandhol, "Francis Hagerup om juridisk metode", op cit., p. 31.

The turning point of the twentieth century, in Nordic countries, is the emergence of the Uppsala school[36]. The breaking with the traditional philosophy is far stronger than before: Axel Hägerström fought against every value, transcendental or concealed. This thought flows into a flourishing reflection on jurisprudence. Two branches appear: the radical one, with Karl Olivecrona, and the (more) "moderate" one with Alf Ross[37]. The latter offered a sort of synthesis of this trend and the tradition of Ørsted.

a) The Swedish school of legal realism: from Axel Hägerström to Karl Olivecrona

In epistemology, there is a clear shift between two movements: realism considers there is only one world, the reality, to which we are linked by mere sole empirical experience; idealism defends the existence of another world, constituted by values that can be acknowledged by pure reflection. This world is the domain of metaphysics. The conclusion is that idealism considers law as values that need an ethical cognitivism; realism states that law is social facts, empirically cognizable. But, for Axel Hägerström (1868-1939), metaphysics is every combination of words whose epistemological status cannot be determined with accuracy by those who enunciate them[38]. The war cry of Axel Hägerström is well known: death to metaphysics[39]. His task is to establish a scientific [36] Staffan Källström, Värdenihilism och vetenskap – Uppsalafilosofin i forskning och samhällsdebatt under 1920- och 30-talen [Value Nihilism and Science – The Philosophy of Uppsala in Research and in Public Debate in the Speeches of 1920 and 1930], Göteborg, Acta Universitatis Gothoburgensis, 1984 ; Svante Nordin, Från Hägerström till Hedenius – den moderna svenska filosofin [From Hägerström to Hedenius – the Modern Swedish Philosophy], Lund, Doxa, 1983.

[37] Thomas Mautner, "Some Myth about Realism", Ratio Juris, vol. 23, n° 3, 2010, p. 418.

[38] Stig Strömholm and Hans-Heinrich Vogel, Le "Réalisme scandinave" dans la philosophie du droit [The «Scandinavian Realism» in Jurisprudence], Paris, LGDJ, coll. "Bibliothèque de philosophie du droit", vol. XIX, 1975, p. 20.

[39] Ernst Cassirer, Éloge de la métaphysique. Axel Hägerström. Une étude de la philosophie suédoise contemporaine [In Prais of metaphysics. Axel Hägerström. A Swedish Study of Contemporary Philosophy], in Œuvres, Pars, Cerf, 1996, p. 16. To be exact, the motto is "Praeterea censeo metaphysicam esse delendam" ("Furthermore, I consider that metaphysics must be destroyed"). It is a nod to Cato's famous sentence against Carthage.

method for law[40]. The main topic must be the definition of "valid law", in order to contest natural law's dogmas[41]. The bases of "valid law" are some metaphysical ideas that persevere because of habits of thought. From the divine will, positivists operate a translation to monarch, legislators or judges. But it is impossible to find and to determinate such volition with empirical observations[42]: the law is the basis and the limits to power. It is a vicious circle: the law is produced by the State, which is determined by its own creation… The law cannot be coercive by sole duties out of human reach. There must be grounds into empirical facts. The only power able to create duties is a psychological reality and nothing more. Thence, validity of law cannot be found into a descriptive reality, law is a language of action. To the "what", Hägerström commutes the "why" as decisive: a scientific analysis of moral thought by his mere contents is not as relevant as how such ideas are founded[43]. Therefore, the Swedish philosopher develops the axiological nihilism: the values and law are not grounded into material experiences or empirical, but on formal structures of mind. A scientific method cannot affirm that one given value is better than another, but it may explain the formalism used to ascertain this attitude.

Karl Olivecrona (1897-1980) is seen as the most virulent defender of the School of Uppsala[44]. His books Law as fact (1st ed.) is an important milestone for the development of Scandinavian realism[45]. Law cannot be a command, because will theory is metaphysics[46]. Thus, law is an independent imperative, a norm that states a directive, but disconnected to any institution or people. In fact, there is an individual who finally took this act. But, to be valid, the decision making must respect lots of proce-

---

[40] Jes Bjarup, Reason, Emotion and the Law – Studies in the Philosophy of Axel Hägerström, Aarhus, Press of the Faculty of Law, 1982 ; Max Lyles, A Call for Scientific Purity – Axel Hägerström's critique of Legal Science, Stockholm, Rättshistoriskt bibliotek, n° 65.

[41] Thomas Mautner, "Some Myth about Realism", op cit., pp. 413-418.

[42] Axel Hägerström, "Är gällande rätt uttryck av vilja ?" ["Is Valid Law the Expression of Will?], Rätten och viljan, två uppsatser [Law and Will, Two Essays], Lund, Gleerup, 1961, p. 62ff.

[43] Ernst Cassirer, Éloge de la métaphysique…, op cit., pp. 43-44. See also, pp. 94-95.

[44] Patricia Blanc-Gonnet Jonason, "Présentation", in Karl Olivecrona, De la loi et de l'État. Une contribution de l'école scandinave à la théorie réaliste du droit [Almost the same as Law and Facts, 1st ed.], Paris, Dalloz, coll. "Rivages du droit", 2011, pp. 8 & 12.

[45] Lars Björne, Realism och skandinavisk realism 1911-1950..., op cit., p. 321.

[46] Karl Olivecrona, De la loi et de l'État..., op cit., p. 53ff.

dural exigencies. Who is accountable for this command? This is norm of conduct for people, disconnected from a situation of command[47]. There is no specific ordering party; the main goal of such imperative is to imply in the mind a pattern of what is allowed or what is forbidden. Moral and law are closely imbricated and they reinforce each other. To sum up, there is a moral injunction to respect positive law; statutory law forms also the content of moral[48]. The law exists only as the content of representations into the mind of individuals[49]. If some laws seem to be permanent, it is because of the revival of the representations that animate these laws.

Therefore, Olivecrona goes on to establish a real science of law, interested only with neutral cognition of law. The object of a science of law is the content of the independent imperatives, that is to say the norms of conduct. This is still a descriptive study of norms, but not a normative study[50]. In order to understand the content, we have to use various disciplines, as economy, sociology and political sciences. The study of social life contributes to the study of law, because it is a content of ideas belonging to reality. It is an epistemological naturalism: law exists only in relation with natural facts, which is a causal relation, not a logical one[51]. The task of a scholar in law is not to predict what may – neither should – occur, but to describe what is in law, therefore, to explain the representations expressed by law[52]. To sum up, the science of law has three main goals: to put lights on the rules of law and to replace [47] For Olivecrona, the State is a fiction. There is no real power, only positions of power. This position of power permits to exert a psychic influence on people. There is lots of such positions, thus there can't be only one power of states, but various. Karl Olivecrona, De la loi et de l'État..., op cit., pp. 59ff & 106ff.

[48] Ibid., pp. 65-67; see also Karl Olivecrona, "Realism and Idealism: Some Reflexions on the Cardinal Point in Legal Philosophy", New York University Law Review, n° 26, 1951, pp. 124-125 ; Torben Spaak, "Karl Olivecrona's Legal Philosophy. A Critical Appraisal", Ratio Juris, vol. 64, n° 2, 2011,, pp. 165-169.

[49] This made wonder Pierre Brunet whether law is only in the mind or not: "Is Law in the mind? A few thoughts on an essay of Karl Olivecrona ((De la loi et de l'État. Une contribution de l'école scandinave à la théorie réaliste du droit - french translation of Law as Fact (1939))", Jus Politicum n°8 : http://www.juspoliticum.com/Is-Law-in-the-mind-A-few-thoughts.html

[50] Karl Olivecrona, De la loi et de l'État..., op cit., p. 70.

[51] Torben Spaak, "Naturalism in Scandinavian and American Realism: Similarities and Differences", in Mattias Dahlberg (Ed.), De Lege, Uppsala-Minnesota Colloquium: Law, Culture And Values, Uppsala, Iustus Förlag, pp. 33-83.

[52] Karl Olivecrona, De la loi et de l'État..., op cit., p. 73.

them inside of their context; to canalize legal interpretation; to analyze current issues with a legal prism. Thus, doing this, some scholars insert what they think might be good, and no longer describe law. According to Olivecrona, this is still acceptable if, and only if, it is expressly stated and disjoint. There are values; none can be scientifically ascertained as true. But, nothing is worse than to conceal them into pseudo-scientific sentences[53]. The scientific and political argumentations are better if everyone accept to express his value system. No one can abstract himself from it, so the more scientific stance is to assume values, without concealing them by scientific authority[54]. There will be more room for political debates with a really scientific science of law[55].

b) The Internationalist Scandinavian: Alf Ross

The Danish Alf Ross (1899-1979) is the spearhead of the Scandinavian realism in the international debates concerning jurisprudence. Moreover, his legal theory might be seen as the synthesis of the Danish tradition leaded by Ørsted, the newly Swedish movement of Hägerström, and the internationalist stance of the Norwegian Hagerup. His legal thought follows, without any concessions, one rigorous path for a scientific method in law[56].

The basis of his epistemology can be found into his critics of the practical reason[57]. He reformulates "Hume's law": "cognition can never motivate an action, but, assuming a given motive (interest, attitude) it can direct the activity released."[58] Therefore, the science, which role is purely cognitive, cannot establish any imperative neither any valid norm of ac-

[53] Ibid., pp. 75-77.

[54] Ibid., p. 87.

[55] Gregory Alexander, "Comparing the Two Legal Realisms – American and Scandinavian", The American Journal of Comparartive Law, vol. 50, n° 1, 2002, p. 132.

[56] Sverre Blandhol, Juridisk ideologi: Alf Ross' kritikk av naturretten [Legal Ideology: Alf Ross' criticism of Natural Law], Copenhagen, Jurist- og Økonomforbundets Forlag, 1999; Jens Evald, Alf Ross: et liv [Alf Ross: A Life], Copenhagen, Jurist- og Økonomforbundets Forlag, 2010; Knut Waaben, "Alf Ross 1899-1979: A Biographical Sketch", EJIL vol. 14, n°4, 2003, pp. 661-674..

[57] Alf Ross, Kritik der sogenannten praktischen Erkenntnis : zugleich Prolegomena zu einer Kritik der Rechtswissenschaft [Criticism of the so-called Practical Knowledge: with Prolegomena to a criticism of Jurisprudence], Copenhagen, Levin & Munksgaard, 1933.

[58] Alf Ross, On Law and Justice, Berkeley, University of California Press, 1959, p. 299.

tion. One cannot deduce valid norms of action from empirical facts. Science may give directives but only with the support of a hypothetical force, on the assumptions of some given motives. The science remains pure if the motives are brought as explicit presuppositions and are no longer concealed. "The conclusions then acquire a hypothetical-objective character: they are maintained on the presupposition that a certain set of attitudes are accepted."[59] That is why rhetoric and argumentation are so important for scientific demonstrations: relations between actions and facts are causal and not logical[60].

The task of legal scholar is to describe valid law[61]. A scientific approach implies a "mode of procedure" of verification: every assumption must be verifiable. So, what is "valid law", according to this methodological requirement? Law is directive prior to the judge, then to citizens. Hence, is a rule valid law since applied in the practice of the courts? Not exactly. A statement concerning valid law does not refer to the past but to present: the state of the law may change. Moreover, a new legislation is regarded as valid law while no courts have applied it yet. So, the real content of a doctrinal proposition about valid law must be understood as referring to hypothetical future decisions: "if an action should be brought on which the particular rule of law has bearing, and if in the meantime there has been no alteration in the state of the law (that is to say, in the circumstances which condition our assertion that the rule is valid law), the rule will be applied by the courts."[62] If we cannot set the process of verification, such doctrinal statement can however be confirmed or invalidated by relevant facts, when (if) they will occur. Since we cannot verify the assertion about valid law by direct observation, we still can check whether such assumption is coherent with the other well-verified doctrinal propositions[63]. Thus, this realism is half psychological, half behavioristic[64]: the verbal behavior of the judges supplies

[59] Ibid., p. 319.

[60] Henrik Zahle, "Legal Doctrine between Empirical and Rhetorical Truth. A Critical Analysis of Alf Ross' Conception of Legal Doctrine", EJIL vol. 14, n°4, 2003, pp. 801-815.

[61] Riccardo Guastini, "Alf Ross : Une théorie du droit et de la science juridique"["Alf Ross: A Theory of Law and of Legal Science"], in Paul Amselek (Ed.), Théorie du droit et science [Legal Theory and Science], Paris, PUF, 1994, pp. 249-264.

[62] Alf Ross, On Law and Justice, op cit., p. 41.

[63] Henrik Palmer Olsen, "Overraskelser og Prognoser i Retsvidenskaben" ["Surprises and Prognosis in Jurisprudence"], Juristen n°5, 2001, pp. 173-185.

[64] Alf Ross, Towards a realistic jurisprudence. A criticism of the dualism in law, Copenhague, Einar Munksgaard, 1946, p. 147 ff, especially the diagram.

consistency and predictability, but this consistency refers to the mentality of the judge, that is a normative ideology[65].

The mentality of the judges, their beliefs and attitudes that direct their decision, is the subject of the doctrine of the sources of law. It is an ideology that animates the courts[66]. It can be observed only in the actual behavior of the judges. That's why science of law is norm-descriptive. The sources of law are a metaphor of this ideology, stating that every pieces of law flow from a common source of validity. In fact, the sources of law may vary from one legal system to another. Ross builds up a classification, according to the degree of objectification of the type of source: the authoritative formulations (legislation), custom and precedent, and what he calls "reason". However, they are all "reasons" which are more or less explicitly embodied inside rules. These are all pieces of a legal culture that shape legal reasoning[67]. In some systems of law, judges may confer more importance to statute law than precedents, and vice versa. "The judge in the performance of his calling is under the influence of the tradition of culture because he is a human being of flesh and blood, and not an automaton, or rather because he is not merely a biological but also a cultural phenomenon."[68] All these "reasons" constitute the doctrine of the source of law. This ideology is norm-expressive. The object of the science of law is not to express norms, but to describe them. Therefore, the scientific stance is to analyze this ideology[69] – which is psychological –, ascertained by the behavior of the judges[70].

This reflection leads logically to a critic of positivism. Ross rejects jusnaturalism because natural law is based on a priori insights. He also rejects positivism when it is understood as "what is formally established". Thus, he is positivist, in the sense of the empiricism dogma: "what builds on experience": "A realistic doctrine of the sources of law

[65] Torben Spaak, "Naturalism in Scandinavian and American Realism: Similarities and Differences", op cit., pp. 40-51.

[66] Noberto Bobbio, "Être et devoir-être dans la science du droit" ["Is and Ought in Science of Law"], in Essais de Théorie du Droit [Essays in Jurisprudence], Paris, LGDJ, 1998, p. 188.

[67] Alf Ross, Towards a realistic jurisprudence…, op cit., pp. 15-16 ; p. 54 ff ; p. 88, especially the diagram ; p. 92 ff.

[68] Alf Ross, On Law and Justice, op cit.,, p. 99.

[69] Riccardo Guastini, "Alf Ross : Une théorie du droit et de la science juridique", op cit., pp. 263-264.

[70] Svein Eng, "Lost in the System or Lost in Translation? The Exchanges between Hart and Ross", Ratio Juris vol. 24, n° 2, 2011 , pp. 202–203.

builds on experience, but recognizes that not all law is positive in the sense of 'formally established'."[71] Moreover, in social science, predictions might evaluate: it is possible that a prediction was false, but after its enunciation, the beliefs change and fulfill the requirements, making this prediction true afterwards[72]. Thence, the dogma of Ross is neither pure empiricism nor pure "positivism"[73]. He takes great care of pragmatic considerations.

Conclusion

There is a Nordic position on jurisprudence, which can be labeled as "pragmatic" according to Sverre Blandhol[74]. This common thought is well explained by Régis Boyer: there is no real imaginative setback for the Scandinavians; they always look after a balance between dream impetus and hard material requirements[75]. The determining elements – more or less shared – are the following[76]:

Anti-foundationalism: the knowledge does not derive from logical deduction of basic principles. There is a shaping of knowledge under both empirical observation and conceptualization. Ideas and perceptions are simultaneous constructed and may change.

Anti-formalism: the concepts are not self-sufficient to apprehend law. Enforcement of law does not respond to pure logic. The culture of the lawyer is relevant although not expressed by formal law.

Rhetorical analysis of language: it is required to use argumentation and rhetorical analysis in order to justify an interpretation of legal

[71] Ibid., p. 101.

[72] Ibid., p. 47.

[73] Compare with the concepts of positivism, as found in Hart (The Concept of Law), Bobbio (Essais de Théorie du Droit [Essays in Jurisprudence]), Scarpelli (Qu'est-ce que le positivisme juridique ?[What is legal positivism?]); see also, Éric Millard, "Présentation", in Alf Ross, Introduction à l'empirisme juridique [Introduction to legal empiricism], Paris, LGDJ, 2004, p. 8.

[74] Sverre Blandhol, "Hva er pragmatism?" ["What is pragmatism?"], Tidsskrift for Rettsvitenskap 2005, n°04-05, pp. 491-524.

[75] Régis Boyer, Histoire des littératures scandinaves [History of Scandinavian Literatures], Paris, Fayard, 1996, p. 106. The author considers more precisely the Scandinavian literature but encloses also the Nordic mentality.

[76] Compare with Brian Leiter, "Naturalism and Naturalized Jurisprudence", in Brian Bix (Ed.), Analyzing Law: New Essays in Legal Theory, Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1998, pp. 103-104.

texts. There is an open texture of language, to use Hart expression.

Moderate skepticism: to determine the meaning of a text, there must be a choice. This interpretation creates the rule. But this skepticism is not radical, which consider there are no rules but sole acts of powers. The moderate skepticism is a cautious and modest stance. It is the basis of the "normativist realism": norms exist, but textual formalism is not enough for the cognition. We have to go back to the reality and its experience. Therefore, any assertion may be revised in light of new experience.

Pluralism: state law is not the only valid law. It is required to adopt a multifaceted analysis of law to attain full understanding. Law is a kind of human representations.

Contextualism: to reach the real content of a rule, we have to apprehend the context in which it lives. That means every fact, maybe outside the spectrum of law, relevant for the application of a rule. Thence, to separate a decision of courts from the facts, that were determinant for the judges, is non-sense.

Two others common features of these Scandinavians scholars are the importance of Roman law and the individual as the cornerstone of their reflections. First, they founded their analysis in Ciceronian commentaries and in Roman jurisprudence; the study of the Praetor deeply shaped Francis Hagerup's thought; Hägerström's inquiries began with Roman law and its "magical" origin; etc. Second, all the critics about cognition strongly emphasize on individual ethics. This is the starting-point of consideration to contexts and pragmatic elements. Maybe it is linked to Lutheran Protestantism. Whatever, the whole Scandinavian thought remain consistent thanks to the respect of individual reasoning.

Yugoslav Literature under (Il)Legal Censorship: 1945-1990

Dijana Zrnić, M.A.[1]

Abstract: The main aim of this paper is to discuss the legal framework and the actual practices through which the Communist regime attempted to control Yugoslav literary production. Agitprop's role as a "prime censor" of the regime will be examined together with its centralisation of the control system over the publishing industry. The development of legal solutions and the role of judiciary in support of the control of the circulation of ideas in the society and legislative confinement of the influence of writers whose literary creativity was potentially harmful to ruling political ideology, will be exposed to critical review through certain historical timelines.

The paper will also examine the response of major publishing houses and individual authors to the new cultural policies imposed by the Communists. It will discuss a number of examples, ranging from open opposition – as was the case of prof. Mihajlo Đurić's comments on newly proposed Constitutional Amendments or Alija Izetbegovic's Islamic Declaration – to involuntary collaboration - as exemplified by self-censorship of literary majority. It will also provide examples of other means through which the regime exerted pressure on the publishers and authors like granting financial favours, nationalizing the press often supported by the application of illegal means such as direct and indirect threats, informative secret police interviews, etc.

Key words: censorship, author, law, literature, Communist regime, Agitprop, publication, judiciary, prosecution, the Publication Act.

1. Introduction

"There is no such thing as a moral or an immoral book.
Books are well written or badly written. That is all."
(Oscar Wilde, Preface to the Picture of Dorian Gray, 1891)

[1] Assistant in Legal English, Law Faculty in Banja Luka, Banja Luka University, Republic of Srpska, Bosnia and Herzegovina. Email: dijanapetkovic@blic.net.

The struggle for freedom of expression is as ancient as the history of censorship. The first concrete case of censorship occurred with Socrates (c. 469 BC – 399 BC), a classical Greek philosopher, who was sentenced to drink poison for promoting his philosophies. It is believed that the main reason for his execution were his attempts to improve the Athenians' sense of justice.[2] The Greek playwright Euripides (c. 480 BC – 406 BC), much to the consternation of the conservative audiences, defended the true liberty of freeborn men and women, and their right to speak freely. He believed that traditional codes of value needed to be re-examined and scrutinized through reversals of social expectations. These strategic discontinuities between character and social status suggested that status, including slavery, was not the result of natural hierarchies, but imposed by custom or chance.[3]

Thus, the struggle for freedom has throughout history been defined as a struggle against censorship as "official prohibition or restriction of any type of expression believed to threaten the political, social, or moral order imposed by governmental, religious, or local powers"[4]. In other words, censorship consists of any attempt to suppress information, points of view, or method of expression such as art or profanity. The purpose of censorship is to maintain the status quo, to control the development of a society, and to suppress dissidence.

The history of literary censorship in the post-bellum Yugoslavia largely builds on earlier and concurrent traditions of, foremost politically provoked censorship. Namely, the Communist regime believed in ideological homogeneity and universality of thought, whose stability was constantly undermined by guerrilla attacks of literary dissidents and intelligentsia in opposition. To preserve its dominance, however, the ruling regime had never prohibited anything in a vacuum, but had rather tried to control the circulation of literary ideas in the society and confine the influence of those that were potentially harmful to their interests. In order to do so, a variety of procedures was developed, spanning from repressive, such as restrictive legal codification, judicial injustice in the form of stage trials, and police brutality to softer, more sophisticated methods such as exclusions, lists of forbidden books or authors, restricted access, etc.

[2] See: Plato, Apology, trans. by Miloš Đurić, Dereta, Belgrade, 2008;

[3] Op.cit.: Ruby Blondell et al., Women on the Edge-Four plays by Euripides, Routledge, Newyork-London, 2002;

[4] The most detailed study of censorship done by Jonathon Green and Nicholas J. Karolides, Encyclopedia of Censorship, Facts on File, New York, 2005;

The censoring methodology had closely followed the variable political situation in post-war Yugoslavia ranging from the initial settling accounts with pro-Fascist literary and non-literary material published during the war, assassinations of the so-called enemy collaborators, control of printed material through internal decrees and letters containing lists of prohibited books and authors produced by various censoring agencies –Agitprop, editors, typesetters, publishers, etc. (1945-1952), through special engagement of the Office of the Public Prosecutor in censoring a printed word aimed against brotherhood and unity and Titoism, criminal trials instigated by Public Prosecutors against writers charged with "verbal crimes" or ideologically based offences (1952-1971), to unjustly high penalties, ranging from imprisonment to hard labour at the notorious Goli otok (the Barren Island), for those who dared to soil the name of Josip Broz Tito, instigate ethnic hatred and insinuate the eventual fall of Communism (1972-1990).

2. Open war against the past (1945-1952)

"Death to Fascism, Freedom to the People!"
(Partisan slogan)

Having decided to join forces against the Axis powers to put an end to the destruction of humanity, foreign ministers of the four leading countries met in Moscow in November 1943 and sealed their agreement in the form of a Declaration of the Four Nations on General Security, which defined the culpability of "Hitlerite forces in many of the countries they have overrun and from which they are now steadily being expelled."[5] Likewise, the United Nations War Crimes Commission, founded in October 1943, appealed to all anti-Hitlerite coalition member states, including Yugoslavia, to establish their National Commissions that would be tasked to collect evidence against war criminals and to refer them to competent courts for sanctioning. Thus, a National Commission for the Investigation of Crimes of Occupiers and their Supporters was founded in Yugoslavia by the Anti-Fascist Council of the People's Liberation. The Commission was composed of a number of different departments, including the Enemy Property Department and the Survey Commission for Crime Establishing based on the Cultural Collaboration with the Enemy. The initial task of the Survey Commission was "to identify and proclaim as criminals those persons, who placed their intellectual abilities at the service of the enemies and thus helped them enslave and disunite our people, who had been the intellectual originators of the crimes that were subsequently perpetrated by others".[6] Thus, the Communist Party started to get even with its political opponents who were usually intellectuals with bourgeois views, unselectively labelled as those "who had been collaborating with the enemy in the field of culture".[7]

[5] Annex 10 to a "Secret Protocol" signed in Moscow, during the Moscow Conference, on 1 November 1943. Signed by British Prime Minister Winston Churchill, Soviet Premier Joseph Stalin and US President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The main task of the Survey Commission was to draft war crime decisions solely on the grounds of collected data. These decisions contained personal details of the offenders, victims, short descriptions and legal qualifications of the offence, place, time and methodology of crime, a list of collected evidence, and approximation of damages. Decisions were accepted and qualified war criminals were registered almost exclusively on prima facie evidence i.e. reasonable doubt. The legal nature of the decision, otherwise not known to the corresponding case law, was declarative in character. It served as a motion for filing a claim, first in military courts and then District courts. Thence, the respective courts were to decide whether to initiate criminal proceedings or raise criminal charges against the proposed offenders. A generally accepted principle of collective liability was closely related to the position of the suspect. Namely, certain positions automatically assumed some degree of liability. War crimes were broadly conceptualized exposing individuals to the attack of the regime for reasons as simple as contradictory political thinking.[8]

The case of dr. Ljudevit Jurak, university professor, is especially interesting. Professor Jurak was a member of the International Commission for the Investigation of the Mass Slaughter in Vinica (the Ukraine) committed by Soviets over the local population. The results of this research were eventually revealed by professor Jurak in the Hrvatski narod

[6] ZKRZ, HDA, Zagreb, box 685, doc. no. 18/45

[7]Op.cit.: Zoran Kantolić, The Work of the Polling Commission in 1945 in Zagreb: Crime Establishing Based on Cultural Collaboration with the Enemy", Review of Croatian History, I/2005, no.1, p. 323

[8]Op.cit.: dr Martina Grahek-Ravančić, "The Work of the National Commission for the Investigation of the Crimes of Occupiers and their Supporters in Zagreb in the period from 1944 until 1947", doctoral thesis, Filozofski fakultet, Sveučilište u Zagrebu, Zagreb, 21.04.2011.;

(Croatian people) on 25 May 1943 under the title "Mass Graves in Vinica". The Survey Commission accused him of "intentional and malevolent propaganda against the amicable Soviet Russia, and, thus indirectly, against the interests of our people".[9] The Decision was delivered to the Military Court of the Command of the City of Zagreb, with the proposal that the accused should be arrested "because of the possibility of escape". However, the same day the Military Court sent the report stating that professor Jurak had been executed by firing squad on 10 June 1945, two months before the Decision was written.[10]

The same destiny had befallen many fellow-scholars and men-of-letters who were guilty of merely thinking differently and acting in the spirit of common good and humanity. They were all labelled as criminals by the Survey Commission, even before their "guilt" was proven, or before the incriminations they had been charged with were substantiated.

However, a printed word represented the greatest threat to cultural and political stability of the ruling caste, which, in fear of critical thinking and ideological opposition, had declared an open war to "all pro-Ustasha and Fascist literature produced during the war in Croatian, German or Italian language".[11]

On 31 August 1945, The Press Act was promulgated, which guar-

[9] Also see: Decision on determining crime by cultural collaboration with the enemy, no. 17/45 of 9 July 1945;

[10] Op.cit: Zagreb Military court verdict no. 86/45 of 9 June 1945: "Jurak Ljudevit, University professor, Croat, Roman Catholic, son of Stjepan and Amalija (neé Progelhofer), born on 6 October 1861 in Zalug, with permanent address in Zagreb, Gundulićeva St 20, is found guilty of war crimes and sentenced to death by shooting, permanent loss of citizen's honours, and confiscation of property. There is no right of complaint against this verdict. In the course of investigation it has been established that the accused possesses the following property: a three-bedroom flat in Gundulićeva St. no. 20. Death to Fascism – Freedom to the People!"

[11] Op.cit.: "Order of prohibiting the Ustasha and Fascist Literature", Narodne novine, no.3, p.3, 10 August 1945:"It was observed that publications that were released during former NDH are freely sold in bookstores. … the Ministry of Education shall appoint a Commission of experts who shall review all literary works and therewith approve or prohibit the distribution of each individual work. In order to prevent distribution of the Fascist and Ustasha publications , until the Commission has made the final Decision, it is forbidden to sell or distribute literary works released after 10 April 1941 in Croatian, German or Italian language. This Order is effective immediately. Death to Fascism – Freedom to the People!"Ministry of Internal Affairs, no. 1737 – 45, 3 June 1945 (signed by Vicko Krstulović).

anteed freedom of expression and freedom of press to all citizens. However, the right to publish and release the text was but the luxury of the loyal few. This privilege could not be entrusted on those who did not enjoy political or civil rights, who were the Ustasha and Fascist sympathizers and collaborators, editors, publishers and writers of Fascist literature, and finally those who edited and published pornographic material, or who were indulged in other immoral activities.[12]

Thus, the Press Act guaranteed under articles 1 and 3 freedoms of the press and other information media of public expression. This was balanced by article 11, which prohibited the use of such freedoms to attack or undermine the state, to jeopardize the constitution, endanger Yugoslavia's foreign relations, stir up "national, racial or religious hatred or intolerance, or to instigate the commission of penal offences". In other words, no freedom could be used "in a manner offensive to public morals."[13]

There was little overt censorship in Yugoslavia; the control of the media was considered best achieved by the appointment of politically responsible editors and the replacement of any who had fallen into a variety of ideologically unacceptable deviations.[14]

In the context of open/hidden censorship and freedom of expression and free flow of information more important role was played by internal letters and lists of banned authors and books exchanged by various government boards, commissions or agencies, whose existence was repeatedly denied.

One such semi-official letter was sent by Milovan Đilas, the Head of Agitprop (Agency for Information and Propaganda), the first censoring agency in post-war Yugoslavia, to whom it may concern. The letter contained prohibition guidelines, i.e. instructions for the protection of the Party ideology against modern ideas and different opinions, such as "pseudoscientific, provincial or sensational content that could easily contaminate valuable scientific and popular scientific literature; all printed material should be under constant and vigilant control of the Party; in reference to foreign literature, licensed publishers should exclusively distribute books thriving with critical realism and belligerent romanticism produced by English, American or French liberal writers; special attention should be given to Polish, Albanian, Bulgarian, Czech and, to some extent, Romanian literature".[15]

[12]The Press Act, Official Gazette of Democratic Federative Yugoslavia, articles 1-6, no. 65 of 31 August 1945;

[13] Ibid., article 11;

[14] See: The Decree on the Compulsory Delivery of Printed/Published Materials, Official Gazette of Democratic Federative Yugoslavia, no. 52 of 24 July 1954;

The Party's corpus of librorum prohibitorum contained, among others, examples of medieval, dialectal literature, including modernist, expressionist and surrealist literary expressions. Western literature was mainly discouraged as highly dissident, and not best suited for promoting Communist ideology, unlike the works of Socialist writers and Marxists such as Lev Tolstoy, Anton Chekhov, Maxim Gorky, Joseph Stalin, and Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, whose political and social philosophy was highly praised.

However, the 1948 conflict between Yugoslavia and USSR, which resulted in the Yugoslavia's expulsion from the Communist Information Bureau (Cominform), marked the beginning of the Informbureau period. The old practice of copying the Soviet cultural standards was no longer wanted and a new strategy had to be designed. Thus, Agitprop released the "Plan of Combating Cominform in Cultural and Educational Sector", wherewith article 10 elaborated in detail on relations between Agitprop and intellectual and artistic creation, stating, inter alia, that:" Literary workers shall, through newspaper articles, various texts, poems, reviews, etc., combat, unmask and debunk the Cominform campaign. They shall write one-act plays, pantomimes, humoresques in an attempt to ridicule Cominform. Every issue of the Kolo, Kulturni radnik and Izvor should devote an article to Cominform."[16]

Those who dared to comment on or critique the divorce of two former political and ideological allies, differently from what was prescribed, or who remained loyal to pro-Soviet thinking, were soon deported to top secret prisons or gulag-like labour camps on Goli otok. Yugoslav writers Vlado Dijak, Venko Markovski, Dragoslav Mihailović and Igor Torkar, were amongst those liberal thinkers who felt the need to criticize the centralized cultural policy dictated by the Communist Party. The retaliation was soon to follow; their books were banned and they were sentenced to years of hard labour on Goli otok[17].

[15] Op.cit.: Josip Grbelja, "Unknown documents about the relationship between Milovan Đilas and Petar Šegedin", Republic: literary journal, ed. Velimir Visković, no. 11-12, 1998, pp.120-130;

[16] Op.cit. : Josip Grbelja, "Unknown documents about the relationship between Milovan Đilas and Petar Šegedin: censor and his victim", Republic: literary journal, no. 11-12, 1998;

[17] Vlado Dijak, a Bosnian poet and novelist (1925-1988), was sentenced to serve a three-

3. Public Prosecutors as new Censors (1952 – 1971)

"Whenever I meet my censor we (ex) change a few words."
(Aphorism from Politika ekspress)

The conflict with the former Soviet model had also revealed certain new tendencies in culture and arts. This new whiff of fresh cultural ideas was in part initiated by certain internal, but also external tendencies to make culture follow in footsteps of political metamorphoses. Thus, the first ideological assents were marked by cultural openness towards Western influences. The introductory incomprehension in terms of cyclic conflict between ideological concept of the culture and liberal concept of the freedom of expression resulted in unplanned and unwanted derailments. In spite of their highly symbolic and narrow critique of the new society, the regime had promptly reacted by way of bans and launches of synchronized ideological prosecutions of the authors or papers, which published such texts.

Such unexpected premature change in ideological course initially happened to Yugoslav writer, Branko Ćopić in 1950. Till then, Ćopić was an epitome of a political loyalist, a Party confidante, and, foremost, Socialist writer. However, "The Tale of Heresy"[18], exposed him to ill year hard labour sentence on the island of Goli otok due to his political convictions which the government believed had challenged the authority of the state; Venko Markovski, a Bulgarian-Macedonian writer (1915-1988) , was imprisoned in January 1956 and had to serve a five-year hard labour sentence on the island of Goli otok for publishing, what the authorities considered, an anti-Titoist poem "Contemporary Paradoxes" in Serbo-Croatian and for his leanings towards the Soviet Union; Dragoslav Mihailović, Serbian writer (1930-), was sent to serve a hard labour sentence on Goli otok when only 20. He was punished with two years of hard labour for simply defending two fellow-students from the same punishment, as a member of school youth board; Igor Torkar, a Slovenian writer, playwright and poet (1913-2004) was arrested in April 1948 by the Yugoslav Communist authorities on false charges of pro-Nazi activity during World War II. He was put on trial at the Dachau trials together with other 33 survivors from Dachau and Buchenwald concentration camps who were accused of collaborating with the German Gestapo because, according to the prosecution, "only collaboration could explain their survival". In 1949, he was sentenced to six years in prison, which was increased to 12 after the appeal. Torkar spent four years in prison, including two years in solitary confinement. He was released in 1952, and was prohibited from publishing for two more years.

[18] "The Tale of Heresy" was published in Književne novine on 22 August 1950. This paper had already had a similar experience of being banned in September 1949 for publishing fame and to the urgent need for ideological re-education. As a rule, he received the first blows from his closest literary comrades, Skender Kulenović[19], Moša Pijade and Milovan Đilas[20], then Dušan Popović and Velibor Gligorić.[21]But the worst was yet to follow – at the Third Congress of Anti-Fascist Women's Front held on 29 October 1950, in his introductory speech, Tito accused Ćopić of wrongly presenting the socialist realism, which would not be any further tolerated.[22]Branko Ćopić's shot in the dark could not but hasten the weakening and final collapse of monolith forms of literary and artistic expression, which gradually gave way to new cultural winds from the liberal West. The necessary confirmation and acceptance of cultural changes and the return to l'art pour l'art principles came from the Third Congress of Yugoslav Writers held in Ljubljana in October 1952. It was Miroslav Krleža who openly talked about a new course in Yugoslav culture and official rejection of Socialist realism dogma.[23]Krleža's programme speech later served as an overture

---

Moša Pijade's tale "Krilov or Ezop".

[19] On the cover page of the next issue of Književne novine, Kulenović criticized his best friend for distorted and rather narrow vision of reality peculiar of hear-says. See more: Ratko Peković, "Književne novine ili pola vijeka sporenja", Politika, feuilleton, Belgrade, 6 November 1998.

[20]Poisonous arrows of unsigned criticism were let off from the first pages of a most prestigious Communist paper Borba four days after the publication of Ćopić's „The Tale of Heresy". The authors (most probably Moša Pijade and Milovan Đilas) in the article titled „The Heroism of Branko Ćopić" accused Ćopić of deceiving the creators of Socialist Democracy and mucking the whole system through his satires, which were nothing better than an expression of bourgeois views and concepts of freedom. See more: Milan Ristović, „Jedno viđenje prelomne godine jugoslovenske posleratne kulturne politike (1952)", Jugoslovenska kulturna politika 1952. godine, Beograd, pp. 337-352.

[21] Leading Party ideologist, Dušan Popović, described Ćopić in his article "Slanderous Satire", Književne novine, as an example of "disturbing activities" in our literature. For Popović, Ćopić was but a provincial moralist who had diverted from the Party course, and a writer of cheap narrative; Velibor Gligorić amply contributed to the united attack against Ćopić's writing in Književne novine, stating that Ćopić had simply yielded before a blind element of his talent, failed to develop his socialist ideas and thus assumed an anarchistic attitude toward the freedom of literary creation. See more: Ratko Peković, Sudanije Branku Ćopiću (1950-1960), Književni atelje, Beograd, 2000.

[22] Jože Horvat, Croatian writer (1915-2012), later remembered that even in such an unpleasant situation, Ćopić showed the superiority of his mind, by extracting from Tito's speech a quote, "We shall not arrest him (signed Tito)", and placing it on his entrance door to protect himself against dishonest intentions of his Party comrades.

[23] Miroslav Krleža's political-artistic manifesto "On Freedom of Culture" invites the lit-

into the process of political and cultural decentralization of the country proposed at the Sixth Congress of CPY, announcing significant changes in the Party agenda[24]. One of the key decisions made at the Congress, in the context of the control of the media of expression, was dissolution of Agitprop. Thus, the role of the censor was assigned to another capable government agency – Public Prosecution.

At the beginning of fifties Federal Public Prosecutor addressed Republic Public Prosecutors with a memo instructing them on how to best comply with the Press Act. They were requested to make and update a record of all publishing and press agencies. Hence, each press and publishing house had a case file at the Public Prosecutor's Office, which documented any particular breach of the Press Act or the Publishing and Press Agencies Act, including a list of banned publications. The District Public Prosecutor especially enjoyed its newly-established role. This Office had regularly filed annual reports to the Federal PP suggesting sanctions for publishers who failed to submit publishing plans for the following year and defining provisions about the status of a writer/publisher[25]. The PP Offices were particularly obsessed with crime stories and comic books and almost succeeded in banishing them from public circulation.

However, in spite of great efforts of the PP Office to prevent the circulation of non-conformist readings, it could not entirely suppress certain liberalization of the media. Thus, at the end of sixties the public was presented with a variety of new papers and weeklies, such as Start or Pop-express, which carried, to a certain extent, a breath of fresh modernist ideas from the West. The ties were loosened, but not entirely broken. Namely, in 1964 criminal charges were raised against Privreda publishing agency for merely omitting to mention the Sutjeska offensive under letter S in the School Lexicon. Even Pop-Express was admonished for The Problems of soul, heart and body column, which published the questions of readers about sexuality. Promiscuous content was prohibited in erary community to part from the Soviet-like Socialist Realism of the slogan and to promote freedom of literary expression, simultaneity of styles and the principle of free expression of thought.

---

[24] VI Congress of CPY was held from 2-7 November 1952 in Zagreb.

[25] The DPP annual reports represent a cross-section of controlled publications, whose scope was large-scaled: literature, textbooks, brochures, scientific literature, religious publications and gazettes, journals, reviews, picture-books, children literature, dailies, weeklies, etc. Since 1965, PP Office started controlling the state – official gazettes, statutes, court decisions, etc.

Yugoslavia, but certain publishers found the way to increase their paper circulation through introducing pornographic material. Hence, Vjesnik u srijedu (Wednesday News) would regularly borrow the images of naked women from the Western press under the pretext that such content served as a proof of the fall of Western culture.[26]

4. The White Book (1972 – 1990)

"Censors are dead men,
Set up to judge between life and death.
For no live, sunny man would be a censor,
He'd just laugh!
But censors, being dead men,
Have a stern eye on life.
-That thing's alive! It's dangerous. Make away
With it!-
And when the execution is performed
You hear the stertorous, self-righteous heavy Breathing of the dead men,
The censors, breathing with relief."
(Censors, D.H. Lawrence, 1929)

The 1970s in Yugoslavia were marked by a general revival of nationalistic thought, which provoked, despite significant conservative resistances, major political and sociocultural reforms in the country. Things were set in motion when a group of 130 influential Croatian poets and linguists, 80 of whom were Communists, published a Declaration on the Status and Name of the Croatian Standard Language in March 1967. After 1968 the patriotic goals of that document morphed into a generic Croatian movement for more rights for Croatia popularly known as Hrvatsko proljeće (Croatian Spring). Three Croatian linguists, Stjepan Babić, Božidar Finka and Milan Moguš, published a spelling and grammar textbook in 1971 called Hrvatski pravopis (Croatian Ortography), rather than the forced Srpskohrvatski (Srbo-Croatian). It was summarily banned. Even though Yugoslav leadership had interpreted the whole affair as a restoration of Croatian nationalism, dismissed the movement as chauvinistic and had had the police brutally suppress the demonstrations, some of the goals of Hrvatsko proljeće movement influenced the 1971 Federal Constitution

[26] See more: Aleksandar Stipčević, Kako izbjeći cenzora, Hrvatska sveučilišna naklada, Zagreb, 1997.

Amendments that gave more autonomy to the individual republics and provinces. Thus, the provinces of Kosovo and Vojvodina had more rights than the Republic of Serbia, who had lost its constitutionally guaranteed influence within its provinces. Mihajlo Đurić, university professor, strongly criticised such constitutional injustice in his public discussion held at the Law Faculty of Belgrade University and, as a result, was expelled from the University, tried and sentenced to nine months in prison. The law journal Anali (Annals)[27], which published Đurić's speech Smišljene smutnje (Profound intrigues), was soon banned by court order, along with cultural journal Umetnost (Arts)[28], which contained Đurić's article Kamen razdora (The Stone of Discord), a literary defence of Petar Petrović Njegoš's chapel on Lovćen from destruction and replacement by Meštrović's mausoleum. A similar critique of the amendments was offered by Vojislav Koštunica, a lecturer in law at Belgrade University, who had lost his job at the Faculty in 1974 after signing a petition calling for the release of Mihajlo Đurić. His collaborator, Kosta Čavoški, also University professor, had been sentenced to five months in prison in 1973 for criticising the Yugoslav legal system and legislation, including the Prevention of Abuse of Freedom of Press and other Information Media Act of 31 December 1976[29]. This Act primarily served its creator by protecting its totalitarian position from liberal/avant-garde invasions of the literary minority.

After Tito's death in May 1980, the Party was left unprotected and without the rightful successor. The only thing they could do was to try to preserve the unity and stability through glorifying the name of their former leader. The intellectual public was regularly briefed on various cultural and literary affairs instigated by writers who dared to criticise or enquire into the true dimension of Tito's policy. The first recognised defamer of the memory of Josip Broz Tito was Gojko Đogo, Serbian poet, whose collection of poems Vunena vremena (Woolly Times, 1981) had aroused the wrath of the authorities who accused him of having „sought to depreciate the achievements of the peoples and nationalities of this country in the post-war building of socialism, negated the gains of our revolution, and grossly offended the values and symbols of our society".[30]Particularly galling for them was his poem Crnokrug na Trgu Republike (The Viper on the Republic Square) which apparently described Tito as the „old rat from Dedinje". Đogo was tried and jailed in September 1981 for two years, later reduced on appeal to one year, for this alleged offence.

[27] Op.cit.: Mihajlo Đurić, "Smišljene smutnje", Annali, no. 3/1971, Law School, Belgrade University, Belgrade, pp.230-233;

[28] Op.cit.: Mihajlo Đurić, "Kamen razdora", Umetnost, no. 27-28, Turistička štampa, Beograd, 1971, pp. 186-187;

[29] See: the Prevention of Abuse of Freedom of Press and other Information Media Act, Official Gazette of SFRY, 31.12.1976;

Another instance of intolerance of the regime was directed toward the freedom of religious belief. Namely, Communism was openly hostile to religion and was officially atheist; it was not irreligious or unreligious, but took the position that there was no God. Moreover, such atheism translated into a form of vicious anti-religion that included a systematic, often brutal campaign to eliminate belief. When Alija Izetbegović wrote his book Islamska deklaracija (Islamic Declaration) in 1970, he basically verbalised his vision of Islam and modernisation. This book, however, was used against him and other pan-islamists in a trial in Sarajevo in 1983, which resulted in his condemnation to 13 years of penal servitude for an „attack against socialism and williness to build an Islamic state in Bosnia"[31].

As the time passed by, artistic and literary creations were more and more impregnated with „politically unacceptable messages". Particular vigilance and scrutiny was shown by the Centre for Information and Propaganda of the Central Committee of Croatian Leage of Communists who, in March 1984, drafted a document On certain ideas and political tendencies in artistic creation, literary, theatrical and film critique, on public activities of a certain number of artists that contained politically unacceptable messages, colloquially known as The White book. In over 237 pages the document studied „disputable" books (e.g. Tren II (Flash II) by Antonije Isaković; Noć do jutra (Night till Morning) by Branko Hofman; Levitan (Leviathan) by Vitomil Zupan; Strah i hrabrost (Fear and Courage) by Edvard Kocbek; Nož (The Knife) by Vuk Drašković, etc.), theatrical performances (Golubnjača (Pigeon Hole) by Jovan Radulović, Braća Karamazovi (The Brothers Karamazov) by Dušan Jovanović; Kada su cvetale tikve (When the

[30] Op.cit. Robert Thomas, Serbia under Milošević: Politics in the 1990s, C.Hurst and Co., London, 2000, p. 39

[31] District court in Sarajevo, Verdict no. K:212/83 of 20 August 1983; Alija Izetbegović was condemned for instigating ethnic hatred among the peoples of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and for using religious ideology to destabilize Yugoslavia. The author of this paper uses Alija Izetbegović 's case to support the argument about the existence of religious unfreedom in former Communist Yugoslavia. However, Izetbegović's whole political career had been dictated by the idea of creating an Islamic Bosnia and Herzegovina, which, truth be told, is not the subject of this paper.

Pumpkins Blossomed) by Dragoslav Mihailović, etc.)[32], public speeches of certain artists (Antonije Isaković, Milovan Danojlić, Momo Kapor, Vuk Drašković, Igor Mandić, Dimitrije Rupel, etc.), and many other „suspicious" cultural events, with the aim to silence the „other side". According to editor Zvonimir Despot, the White book represented „the Party pursuit of all intellectuals, artists, men-of-letters and others whose work and opinion did not fit into the ideological Party framework".[33]

In spite of all their efforts, the Communists could not prevent the revolutionary wheels from turning. As Jasna Dragović-Soso well put it, „by early 1988 Yugoslavia was in a pre-revolutionary situation".[34]In the eyes of the population Yugoslavia's founding myths, its unique variant of socialism and the Partisan slogan of „brotherhood and unity" had lost their legitimacy. Confidence in the League of Communists was fading, while dissident intellectuals were heavily criticising the regime. Although the Yugoslav regime still issued the occasional ban[35], its response to the July 1988 „Proposal for the Critical Re-Examination of the Historical Role of Josip Broz Tito" presented by the Committee for the Defence of Freedom of Thought and Expression reflected the change in attitude.[36]Softer measures needed to be applied to gain the control of the written word. Thus, Dobrica Ćosić, who gained access to the mass media for the first time since 1968, praised the Socialist leadership, „for granting intellectual freedoms which we have not had until now"[37]while long-standing critics of the regime, like the poet Matija Bećković, accepted prizes from the regime in highly publicised events. Thus, the system had made a strategic compromise with the intellectual opposition by lifting the two absolute political taboos: overt nationalism and the active participation of the masses in politics.

---

[32] Also see: Nick Miller, The Nonconformists: Culture, Politics and Nationalism in a Serbian Intellectual Circle, 1944-1991, Central European University Press, Budapest, 2007;
[33] Stipe Šuvar, Bijela knjiga, ed. Zvonimir Despot, Večernji proizvodi d.o.o., Zagreb, 2010;
[34] Jasna Dragović-Soso, Saviours of the Nation: Serbia's Intellectual Opposition and the Revival of Nationalism, C.Hurst & Co., London, 2002, p.206.
[35] Notably of the July 1988 issue of Književne novine, which contained a contentious text on Goli otok (Dragoslav Mihailović, "Zločinci i žrtve", Književne novine, 757-8, 1-15 July 1988, p. 3) [36] See: South Slav Journal, X/2-3, summer-autumn 1988, pp. 68-72.
[37] Op.cit.: Slavoljub Đukić, Čovek u svom vremenu, p. 314.

5. Conclusion

The concept of cultural identity in post-war Yugoslavia represented an imitation of Stalinist and Marxist interpretation of cultural esthetics. Literary and artistic tendencies which did not interfere with the Party conceptualisation of socialist realism were highly praised and promoted, while the literary and artistic production of its ideological opponents, political enemies or the church was quashed at an early stage. Many books and periodicals with a long historical tradition and rich cultural heritage were banned because they were considered hostile and counter-revolutionary. These rather haste decisions were often made by individuals who were almost entirely uneducated and thus bound to make serious mistakes out of fear of the unknown. After the conflict with the Cominform, the Soviet influence was declining, but the mechanisms of censorship, abundantly applied by the system, still shaped the cultural identity of the society according to the political needs of the regime which was trying to distance itself from the Soviet Union.

The key event that marked the spread of new ideas and views on culture was the Third Congress of Writers of Yugoslavia in 1952, which focused on three important ideas – freedom of thought and expression, critical review of the cultural past and present, and replacement of ideological principles of valuation. At the end of this period, Yugoslav culture began to open toward the Western concept of reality. The publishing policy was no longer segregated between the Soviet and Western literature. However, the watchful eye of the stern socialist dogma could not easily retire from its censoring task.

The print media was nominally free of censorship in the 1980s, but the printed material was reviewed by official publication boards that ensured Party control. Those boards were able to stop publication of some new radical periodicals, but in 1985 their ban of Mladina was overruled by the Supreme Court in Slovenia[38]. Only post-publication censorship was exercised for periodicals, and individual banned issues circulated widely in spite of the system. Over a dozen Croatian magazines and student newspapers were banned because of anti-Serbian positions in the late 1980s. Late in the 1980s, book censorship was loosened and cases of official interference increased. The list of taboo topics for books was similar to that for periodicals. Foreign dissident writings were widely available as were the writings of opposing domestic intelligentsia, such as Matija Bećković, Milovan Đilas, or Antonije Isaković, which were still banned officially in 1990.

[38] Mladina is a Slovenian weekly left-wing current affairs magazine. Since the 1920s, when it was first published, it has become a voice of protest against those in power. Mladina's most controversial period was the spring of 1988 with the Ljubljana trial, also known as Trial Against the Four. Namely, the four defendants, editors of Mladina, were sentenced to between six months and four years imprisonment for "betraying" military secrets, after being involved in writing and publishing articles critical of the Yugoslav People's Army. However, the Supreme court in Slovenia changed the First Instance Decision on appeal and acquitted the appellants.

References

Legal sources

Annex 10 to a Secret Protocol signed in Moscow on 1 November 1943;

Decision on determining crime by cultural collaboration with the enemy, no. 17/45 of 9 July 1945;

The Decree on the Compulsory Delivery of Printed/Published Materials, Official Gazette of Democratic Federative Yugoslavia, no. 52 of 24 July 1954

Order of prohibiting the Ustasha and Fascist Literature, Narodne novine, no.3, p.3, 10 August 1945

The Press Act, Official Gazette of Democratic Federative Yugoslavia, articles 1-6, no. 65 of 31 August 1945;

The Prevention of Abuse of Freedom of Press and other Information Media Act, Official Gazette of SFRY,19 April 1973

Works cited

Blondell, Ruby et al., Women on the Edge-Four Plays by Euripides, Routledge, Newyork-London, 2002;

Ćopić, Branko "Jeretička priča", Književne novine, 22 August 1950;

Grahek-Ravančić, dr Martina, „The Work of the National Commission for the Investigation of the Crimes of Occupiers and Their Supporters in Zagreb in the Period from 1944 until 1947", doctoral thesis, Filozofski Fakultet, Sveučilište u Zagrebu, Zagreb, 21.04.2011;

Green, Jonathon et al., Encyclopedia of Censorship, Facts on File, New York, 2005;

Grbelja, Josip "Unknown Documents About the Relationship Between Milovan

Đilas and Petar Šegedin", Republic: literary journal, ed. Velimir Visković, no. 11-12, 1998, pp.120-130;

Dragović-Soso, Jasna, Saviours of the Nation: Serbia's Intellectual Opposition and the Revival of Nationalism, C.Hurst & Co., London, 2002, p.206.

Đurić, Mihajlo, "Smišljene smutnje", Annali, no. 3/1971, Law School, Belgrade University, Belgrade, pp.230-233;

Đukić, Slavoljub, Čovek u svom vremenu, Filip Višnjić, Beograd, 1989, p. 314;

Đurić, Mihajlo, "Kamen razdora", Umetnost, no. 27-28, Turistička štampa, Beograd, 1971, pp. 186-187;

Kantolić, Zoran, „The Work of the Polling Commission in 1945 in Zagreb: Crime Establishing Based on Cultural Collaboration with the Enemy", Review of Croatian History, I/005, no.1;

Mihailović, Dragoslav, "Zločinci i žrtve", Književne novine, 757-8, 1-15 July 1988, p. 3;

Nick Miller, The Nonconformists: Culture, Politics and Nationalism in a Serbian Intellectual Circle, 1944-1991, Central European University Press, Budapest, 2007;

Peković, Ratko,"Književne novine ili pola vijeka sporenja", Politika, feuilleton, Belgrade, 6 November 1998;

Peković, Ratko, Sudanije Branku Ćopiću (1950-1960), Književni atelje, Beograd, 2000;

Plato, Apology, trans. By Miloš Đurić, Dereta, Belgrade, 2008;

Ristović,Milan, „Jedno viđenje prelomne godine jugoslovenske posleratne kulturne politike (1952)", Jugoslovenska kulturna politika 1952. godine, Beograd, pp. 337-352;

Stipčević, Aleksandar, Kako izbjeći cenzora, Hrvatska sveučilišna naklada, Zagreb, 1997; South Slav Journal, X/2-3, summer-autumn 1988, pp. 68-72.

Šuvar, Stipe, Bijela knjiga, ed. Zvonimir Despot, Večernji proizvodi d.o.o., Zagreb, 2010;

Thomas, Robert, Serbia under Milošević: Politics in the 1990s, C.Hurst and Co., London, 2000;

Incestum: Love or a Criminal Act?

MirjanaBogunović, LL.M.[1]

Abstract: Incest is a psychological phenomenon that is not strange to any society, looking back from ancient times until nowadays. Unevenness in its legal treatment is obvious. Many countries have a criminally prohibited and punished incestuous love, while some countries do not treat the incest as an offence punishable by criminal law if it involves two adults who are capable of reasoning.

The basic concept of incest in literature is illicit love between representatives of two different generations, veiled by confusion and misunderstanding. Sophocles's king Oedipus is a victim of damnation that his father Laius cast on him and his descedents because he abused the hospitality of King Pelops of Elis and raped his youngest son Chrysippus. Although Greek antique awareness was very liberal, it considered incest as the worst punishment of Gods ona human being. Also, there is an incestuous relationship in the Bible, between Lot and his daughters, who made their father drunk and conceived with him. But the destiny didn't collapse on him so strongly like it did on poor Oedipus. Why? Is it possible that Christianity considers Lot as a righteous man of God and his drunkenness and unawareness as an excuse for his act?

In contrast to unaware act of incest, history revealed many a case of a volitional incest that often happened between the same generation, a brother and a sister, born and raised in great separation from the rest of the world. Example for that is Thomas Mann's bookThe Blood of the Walsungs, which describes a perfect union of blood related offspring. In Serbian literature Slobodan Selenić also develops the same concept of incest between Jelena and Jovan in Premeditated Murder, but this case is a less gruesome version of incest since they are not blood related, but rather act as stepsiblings.

The way literature treats the issue of incestuous relation clearly shows that patriarchal society is not ready to talk about the concept of incest. However, it does not mean that it is not happening, and that it should not receive more attention from national legislation.

Key words: incest, law, literature, criminal act, voluntary consent

[1]Assistant in Roman Law, Law Faculty in Banja Luka, Banja Luka University, Republic of Srpska, Bosnia and Herzegovina. Email: mirjanabogunovic86@gmail.com.

1. Introduction

While I was considering the issue of incest as the main theme of my paper and sharing my thoughts with my colleges their reactions on that matter were not encouraging. The standard reaction was that the phenomenon is unnatural and not common to our nation. Such fact made me even more curious and I started wondering whether that was true in which case it would be pointless to explore more on the subject. Reading further about the incest I came across a common explanation of the concept of incest , also called " judgment from stomach" , since it represented a kind of irrational judgment, when value judgment is made without engaging one's cognitive capacities[2]. This way of reasoning is typical of my countrymen when judging about incest and their main argument for rejecting the idea of incest is it an unnatural phenomenon. Is this argument right and is it enough to proclaim incest as a criminal act and to apply the hardest punishments on incestuous lovers ?

Prohibition of incest is worldwide spread and is well known among civilized cultures but every culture has its own special approach that is determined by cultural heritage and mentality[3]. What is very curious is that incest in South-Slavic area is actually not uncommon which is further testified by our folk ballads[4], in spite of a great rejection and resistance this phenomenon produces within my nation. But the legal point of view of incest is always standing on the point of prohibiting incestuous marriage , at least that is the case with Serbian Civil Code-[5]which under article 69, part 10 mention kinship like marriage impedi-

---

[2]http://mindreadingsblog.wordpress.com/2012/11/18/incest-zasto-je-ljubav-izmedu-srodnika-losa-ideja/, accessed on 3.7.2013.

[3] The Incas, Hawaiinas and ancient Egyptians are among most widely referenced exceptions to the incest taboo, referenced by Ray H., Bixler, Sibling Incest in the Royal Families of Egypt, Peru and Hawaii, The Journal of Sex Research 18, 1982., 264.-281.

[4]See futher in Zoja Karanović, The fearful symmetry in South Slavic folk ballads about incest between brother and sister, Annual Review of the Faculty of Philosophy in Novi Sad, Volume XXIX, 2001., 25-40.; Zoja Karanović, Brother- sister incestuous relationship somewhere in between hierogamy and incestuous sin (on example of folk songs who are about intention of Emperor Stefan Dušan to marry his own sister), Literary History, volume 34, number 118, Belgrade, 2002., 293-305.

[5]http://sr.wikisource.org/wiki/%D0%A1%D1%80%D0%BF%D1%81%D0%BA%D0%B8_%D0%B3%D1%80%D0%B0%D1%92%D0%B0%D0%BD%D1%81%D0%BA%D0%B8_%D0%B7%D0%B0%D0%BA%D0%BE%D0%BD%D0%B8%D0%BA_-_%D0-%BE%D1%80%D0%B8%D0%B3%D0%B8%D0%BD%D0%B0%D0%BB, accesed on

ments, while grade of kinship as marriage impediment is prescribed under Canon Law.

Three years ago, in our vicinity, in Croatia, serious discussion was raised on whether to decriminalize the voluntary act of incest between two adults capable of reasoning. Although two university professors in the Department of Criminal Law, Velinka Grozdanić and Ksenija Turković were doing their best to detail the legal nature of incest as a criminal act, and to emphasize that in the case of voluntary consent there was no victim, which is a key element for the for the existence of a criminal offense. "If there is no victim, what is it that we try to protect through criminal sanctioning? Only morality in the society, but do we need to protect the morality through criminal sanctioning, in the first place?",they asked[6]. From this point of view we can understand practical and theoretical legal reasons for decriminalization of voluntary incest, but things that have happened show that we are not ready to talk about incest any differently then as a offence. Publicity that was given to those changes of the Criminal Law was enormous and within the nations it was experienced as a matter of being whole entity. What caused such a strong reaction? If we cannot accept incestuous love as a normal emotion, do we need to judge so strong on people who were victims of a forbidden passion?Public opinion is that in the case of incest,there are no two victims or two perpetrators of crime, but always a perpetrator and a victim. However, during my research I have realized that even if there is no fear of criminal punishment, incest will remain in the minds of people as the worst offence against family, marriage, health and sex. Acceptance or denial of some social appearance is deeply culturally rootedand our society, now in transition, economic as well as moral, cannot or will not release the burden inherited from the indoor patriarchal morality.

2. Incest: a criminal act

Incest is a criminal act according to the Criminal Law of the Republic Srpska and punishable by prison sentence for a time of one year to eight years[7]. Legal description of incest is sexual intercourse between relatives in vertical line unlimited (between ancestors and descendents) and between relatives in collateral line until second grade (between sisters and brothers or between half- sisters and half-brothers)[8]. Incestuous relationship between an adult and a minor is considered as an aggravated form of offense, and a consent given by a child or minor is not relevant to the exclusion of the existence of a criminal offence. Legislator has taken special care to the interests of a child and a minor who are involved in incestuous relationship, so they are not found liable according to article 201 of the Criminal Law in the Republic of Srpska. The main reason for such a criminal political solution is that a consent given by a child or other minor cannot be considered as a voluntary act (volenti non fit iniuria) because the child or minor is always in the position of dependence and subordination against his adult blood relative. But that part of legal regulation of incest is not considered in this paper since I am only considering incest between two adults who are capable of reasoning and are getting involved into a voluntary incestuous relationship. In that case of considered criminal act is doubtful the real nature of this act. If there is an authentic and explicit will to be involve in a sexual intercourse with an other adult who is also showing a free and unforced will for the act, can we say necessary elements that are fulfilled for the existence of the criminal offence? A basic argument that holds this act non-criminalized is an abstract social risk the society will suffer and especially the family as a primary and basic social group. The social risk of a criminal offence is not something that is forever given, indifferent to time and social situation[9]. In our patriarchal society, procreation and sexual intercourse have not been separated. So if we say that we prosecute incestuous relationships because of anticipated mutations in the gene (which is not the rule)[10], we cannot call it a solid argument to criminalize sexual intercourse, because not every incestuous relationship end up with progeny. Our legislator stands on the point of view that with affirmative attitude towards this sexual behavior, our families and progeny will seriously be questioned, so incestuous relationship must remain criminally sanctioned for the sake of the whole commu-

3.6.2013.

[6]http://forum.badnjak.com/viewtopic.php?f=7&t=429, accesed 5.6.2013., More about the problem of legal justification of incrimination of voluntary sexsual intercourse between relatives in Nikola Visković, Sexsuality and Law 1971., Collection of papers Faculty of Law in Split, 45, 3/2008, 641- 658.

[7]Krivični zakon RepublikeSrpske, (" Službeni glasnik Republike Srpske", broj 49\03)

[8] Milos Babic, Ivanka Markovic, Krivično pravo- posebni dio, Banja Luka, 2005., 161-163.

[9]Aleksandar Mihajlovski, Društvena opasnost krivičnog djela, Beograd, 1977., 7.

[10] We also know that if we cross-fertilize some of the best examples of the same species (plants, animals, also human) we can gain the best examples of inbreed species.

nity. Is the cause of such regulation symmetric with the development of human rights, especially with the development of sexual freedom and rights? If our society is not ready to take off stigma from incestuous sexual intercourse, does prison from one to eight years seem like an adequate sanction? Prescribed prison sanction is not the right answer to the goals of special and general prevention because prison sanction will not improve individuals who are involved in incestuous intentions. Individuals who show incestuous intentions (under condition that we are talking about voluntary incest), are not violent, and do not act as to harm another person's life, health or property. Taking into account the fact that incest is a complex phenomenon which involves philosophic, social, anthropological, legal, religious, and genetic elements and also when is about determining sanction, this are circumstances that needs to be taken care of. Thus, it is more appropriate to pronounce a security measure of compulsory medical treatment against a person with incestuous intentions which is more likely to bring a desirable resocialization. When making these suggestions, I only consider cases of voluntary incest between adults. These prepositions which are made de lege ferenda make a very favorable climate to remodify this criminal offence, and to follow the footsteps of our neighbours who have already made some changes[11]. The Croatian Criminal Code has dissolved criminal offence of incest was dissolved and only a relict of it can be traced in article 159, part 2 where it is said that blood or adoptive relative in vertical line of kinship will be sanctioned if involved in a sexual intercourse with child not younger then fifteen [12]. That kind of incrimination of incest is moderate, because the legal norm still protect the target group, and that is minor over fifteen, whose voluntary consent would be doubtful. If we want to protect an adult because of his dependant position or emotional ties to his relative, and as consequence of that, his will to involve in sexual intercourse can't be free from influence that is possible person can have over "dependent person". Dependence is very doubtful if we are talking about persons who are the same age. That is called intragenerational incest, when incest occurs between brothers and sisters. Even if they are tied by kinship, there is no dependence between them the way it exists between a parent and a child. Even if the circumstances of intergenerational incest are doubtful and it is still possible for adults who are financially independent to feel some dependence on their parents or older siblings.

[11] http://www.parlament.gov.rs/%D0%BD%D0%B0%D1%80%D0%BE%D0%B4%-D0%BD%D0%B0-%D1%81%D0%BA%D1%83%D0%BF%D1%88%D1%82%-D0%B8%D0%BD%D0%B0.115.html, accesed 10.6.2013.

[12] http://www.zakon.hr/z/98/, accessed 4.7.2013.

Looking into comparative legislature, we cannot help but notice that in the neighbouring countries, have offered diametrically opposite legal solutions to incest. France is very liberal about this issue and does not prosecute relatives who are in love ever since the time of Napoleon[13]. Spain, Portugal and Belgium have designed the same attitude. This fact is very interesting since Portugal and Spain are domineered by a catholic church, which do not permit marriages if there is doubt that potential spouses are blood related in any degree of the direct line or in the second degree of collateral line[14]. However, Germanyis not likely to overcome the criminal ban on the brother- sister sex[15] and incest remains criminally punishable by fine or jail for up to three years. Even European Court for Human Rights in Strasbourg didn't appreciated the application of a brother in love with his sister, which was based that on his right to private life and his choice of a partner is a private matter. European Court for Human Rights didn't see things in that light and German High Court decision was confirmed. This variable judicial practice on the European continent shows that in some cases is impossible to judge based on the same values, because European countries cannot take a stand on one thing due to different cultural heritage. Thus, it is joint difficult, even impossible to create the unique opinion about incest, because of a great diversity in its understanding and conceptualizing.

3. Incest: a sin

The Bible doesn't recognise the concept of incest. However, if we observe the Biblical story of human creation, we shall notice that it is based on incest, and the principal assignment entrusted on humans is procreation. The realization of this task is only possible through mutual crossing. There are sequentially many cases of incest but they are not to be understood as such but rather as a fact that incest is inseparable from the of phenomenon the genesis of species. Incest was tabooed in pagan, polytheistic religions, which was best shown in the example of Edipus and that taboo was universally accepted in Christianity. There is no phenomenon so controversial as incest. On one side, it was a universal taboo, which the society had established already in second phase of savagery[16] and at the same time a widespread custom among royalty. Thus,how can we call incest a sin when Christian church allowed Incestuous marriages of European rulers[17]? Obviously,different reasons opted the Church for this kind of approach, including the fact that the Church was in great dependence on powerful rulers. There are examples of incestuous marriages in Orthodox church when Aleksije II Komnin entered into a marriage with Irina, his maternal half sister . He used his power of a ruler and forced archibishop from Ohrid to bless the matrimony.

[13] French Napoleonic Code from 1810.
[14] http://www.vatican.va/archive/ENG1104/_P3Y.HTM, accessed 7.6.2013.
[15] http://www.spiegel.de/international/germany/dangerous-love-german-high-court-takes-a-look-at-incest-a-540831.html, accessed 7.6.2013.

Catholic and Orthodox Church share different views of this phenomenon. While Catholic church constitutes a more conciliatory stand, Serbian Orthodox- Christian church has more conservative vision of incestuous relationship between blood relatives, but not without exceptions as we can see below. South- Slavic customs are even more severe in the context of interpreting incest. After reaching independence Serbian church (autocephalous), was very strict in prohibiting marriages in collateral line up to the seventh degree[18]. In 1933, Serbian Orthodox church made some reforms of marital impediments and declared consanguinity in collateral line up to the fourth degree as irremovable impediments and from fifth up to the seventh degree also as removable impediments[19]. Illegitimate kinship was treated as irremovable impediment up to the third degree. Furthermore, Orthodox church recognizes godfather relationship as a marital obstacle and does not accept marriages between godfather and his godchild. That kind of relationship the Church determined as spiritual kinship. Genetics would hardly agree whit such

[16] Djordjo Samardzic, Opšta istorija države I prava, Sarajevo, 1976., 24.

[17]Royal families throughhistory were very fond of incest for many reasons, but one of the most important reasons was the need to produce a high ranking heir, in other words to keep the royal blood pure. Hereditary system also offered an alternative, if there was no heir in male line, then the heir could be male from female line. Hence, it was more secure if ruler's genes stayedin one family. There are other reasons for popularity of royalincest. For example, in polytheistic societies incest was common among Gods and rulers felt like being part of divine order if they practiced incest. In addition they considered legal condemnation of incest applicable only to regular citizens, not to the rulers because of their divine origin.

[18] Stanka Stjepanović, Stepeni srodstva kaogarancija trajnosti braka ,Pravnariječ- časopis za pravnu teoriju I praksu Banja Luka, 2012., 351.

[19] Ibid.

conceptualization, but my nation shows great respect for such religious interpretation, which renders a serious affect on the choice of a future life companion. During the time church rules about spiritual kinship was modified, but nowadays marital rules of our church consider first and second grade of spiritual kinship as irremovable obstacle and it is impossible to join into marriage persons who are in that grade of spiritual kinship. The lineage from the grade to the seventh grade of spiritual kinship, relationship is treated as removable obstacle. This means that is possible to marry a person with whom you are related within the range of mentioned grades of spiritual kinship, providing you acquire the blessing from the Synod and a competent bishop[20].

Religion had played a great role in the regulation of marriage in former Yugoslavia, because first state of Serbs, Croats and Slovenians in 1918, had inherited a diversity of legal rules from different ethnics. Thus, Muslims could conclude marriage under the Sharia Law, which also allowed polygamous matrimony among Islamic population. Croats concluded marriages under the Canon Law of Catholic church, and Serbs concluded marriage under the rules of Orthodox church. Marriages could be joined according to the rules of the church and religion to which the particular people belonged until 1946, when state officials took over the monopoly from priests, after the promulgation of Elementary Marriage Law. Thus, church-established rules were very alive in the antebellum times .Furthermore, in the territory of former Yugoslavia, customary law had a great role in regulating private relations among individuals. True, customary law was not an official source of law but in one particular case had a dominant position over the law. Only when traditional belief and custom approve of matrimony between first cousins, a competent municipal court could allow conclusion of that marriage[21].This procedure was like dispensation, where court could accept conclusion of this kind of marriage. It is interesting to note out that of six republics of former Yugoslavia, only Croatia adopted the rule about dispensation of marital obstacles[22].For the regulation of marriage a great role was played by customs, canonic laws and foremost legal norms of the state. There is a very important legal monument of profane and canonic law, edited by St Savaas "Zakonopravilo", also known as Krmčija in literature. St Sava, the compiler and translator of this work, pointed out, in the opening sentence, that "Zakonopravilo", was a term that indicated that the book contained mostly civil laws and church ordinances[23]. "Zakonopravilo"was often used in Serbia during the time of regulation of the institute of marriage. Marriage law and family law were regulated by customs and canonic law, so there was no need for any specific legal regulation. There were several basic rules about marital impediments that Nomocanon promotes in section 48. of the law and those were taken from the Old Testament:

[20] Patrijarh Pavle, Da nam budu jasnija neka pitanja naše vjere, Beograd, 1998.

[21] Elementary Marriage Law(Službeni list FNRJ, br. 31/ 41, 44/46) but from republic family laws only Marriage Law and family relations of Croatia (Narodnenovine SRH, 11/78) preserved rule about dispensation measures of kinship like marital obstacle.

[22] Could be reffered to the fact that on the Adriactic coast there are a lot of islands which had poor communication with the continent so for generations, they conludedconsaquienes marriages.

1)krvomješateljstvo (perturbatiosanquinis) with the mother24

2)those who have sinned with their stepmother

3) those who have committed debauchery with their daughter and their granddaughter

4) those who have sinned with their sister

5) those who have sinned with their aunt

6) those who have sinned with their daughter in law

7) those who have sinned with brother's wife

8) those who have sinned with their wife'sdaughter (stepdaughter)

9) those who have sinned with their stepmother's daughter

In a more through analysis of "Zakonopravilo" we can see that all of these cases represent blud, which is a criminal offence against morality. Blud was defined as every sexual intercourse outside marriage[25]. Punishment prescribed for those offences have religious connotations. Canonic law theoreticians have considered the essence of a criminal act confronting God's will and his demands regarding one's acts in life[26]. Such definition of a criminal act eventually determines the goals of punishment- atonement from own one's culpability in front of God and mollification of the soul of an offender[27]. Penalties contained crying and praying, listening, depriving of Holy Secret of Communion, denial of access to God's home. From all listed cases of incestuous intercourse, the one between brother and sister is considered the worst offence and

[23]Miodrag Petrovic, Ljubica Štavljanin Đorđević, Zakonopravilo Sv. Save, Beograd, 2005.
[24] Ibid.
[25] RadeMihaljčić, SimaĆirković, Leksikons rpskog srednjeg vijeka, Beograd, 1999., 50.
[26] Aleksandar Mihajlovski, op. cit., 14.
[27] Ibid.

a brother who would dare to commit incest with his sister would be considered liable as if he were a murderer. "Zakonopravilo" differentiates cases where a brother and sister share the same biological parents like he does and it is called prisna (full siblings related), and in case of sexual intercourse between them, prescribed punishment is 20 years of atonement. For sexual intercourse with a sister with whom a brother shares only one common parent (inorodna), punishment is mitigated, so the brother is convicted to 12 years of atonement[28]. In addition, the same punishment is prescribed for fathers who take their daughters- in-law in cohabitation or have sexual intercourse with them[29] and men who have sexual intercourse with their stepmothers. Especially interesting is the case when a man takes two sisters to be his wives, at different times and after the death of the first. Explanation for such prohibition is that a man and woman become united and one through the act of wedding sister becomes a close kin to the husband. " As you wouldn't take your wife's mother or daughter; as you wouldn't take your mother or your daughter, so you wouldn't take sister of your wife, just like you wouldn't take your sister"[30]. This canonic prohibition has been copied into our Family Act[31], because under the law, relations in the first and second grade represent a marital obstacle according to the Family Act of the Republic of Srpska. However, it is possible by way of a extrajudicial procedure to get permission for a conclusion of marriage, e.g. between father and daughter-in-law, or between stepfather and stepdaughter (article 34 of the Family Act).

Based on previously particularized regulation it is obviously that the prohibition of mutual sexual relations between family members was very extensive and precise. Such solution came from the type of family established in medieval Serbia, and which usually included two or more married couples of different generations and their children[32]. In such highly solidary community, blood relation was not treated as a mere

---

[28] MiodragPetrović, Ljubica Štavljanin Đorđević, op. cit., rule number 67.

[29] In southern part of Serbia, in 19th century, there was a custom called " snohačestvo", probably taken from the Greeks or Turks. The custom was that father would marry his underage son (while he is still a boy) to a girl who is 5 to 7 years older then he was. Meanwhile, the father would live in a concubinage with her. That custom is best shown by Borisav Stanković, in Nečista krv (impure blood), which describes degeneration of one age and parting with old customs from Turkish period.

[30]Miodrag Petrović, Ljubica Štavljanin Đorđević, op. cit., 543.

[31]Porodični zakon Republike Srpske (SlužbeniglasnikRepublikeSrpske 54/2002)

[32]Dragoš Jevtić, Dragoljub Popović, Narodna pravna istorija, Beograd, 1997., 55.

conjuction that keeps the family together. The fact of common life of all members insisted upon the respect between relatives who are not exclusively blood related (stepmother, daughter of stepmother, daughter-in-law, stepdaughter). Based on the relicts of cooperative family which were preserved among Serbs until the end of 19th century[33], our tradition shows wide comprehension of kinship. Thus, in Serbian language expressions such as brother (son of mother's sister), sister (daughter of mother's brother), phenomenon quite unknown in other languages where only offspring from same parents are recognized as brothers or sisters. Patriarchal society raises a great wall are around the family and family's values but oral tradition records cases of destruction of those walls. Folk songs, for instance, composite part of the local tradition, reveal that incest wasn't uncommon.

4. Incest in South-Slavic literature

From legal and religious point of view, it is obvious that incest taboo was always present in our tradition, but that doesn't mean that incest was strange in our society . Literature which addresses incest isn't very rich but is very valuable, because it contains psychological, sociological and legal reasons for development of the incest and also its outer manifestations. Customary law about incest was different in certain parts of the Balcan peninsula, but there are testimonies that incest existed in Susak, an island on the Adriatic coast, then in south Serbia, as it will be illustrated in the following pages.

Our folk ballads represent a reflection of the concept of a voluntary brother- sister incest. Besides the story of brother- sister incest, represents a specific family history, our poetic literary tradition revealing a patriarchal environment with disrupted inner structure. The head of patriarchal family is the father, guarantor of stability and soundness of the family, and when such bond is not established, some pathological changes are bound to occur. When the father is dislocated from the assumed traditional picture, the mother or sometimes the eldest son become pillars of the family, but they do not posses the necessary strength to develop healthy family relationships[34]. Incest appears as a result of malfunctions in the family, as a consequence of disorder that emerged in the family. Recognizable image of the mother in a patriarchal family is a sensitive, dedicated woman whose authority is based on great affection and not on the power exerted over family members. She keeps the family together because she promotes the sense of unity, making a closed endogamous environment. A typical scheme of the brother- sister incest considers that brother and sister are only children, born and raised in seclusion from the rest of the world[35]. They have created their own world and that is the point where their relation becomes pathological. If they remain in that socially unacceptable world, they will become lovers. They lose their interest for outer world because they can't find a peer. Their brother or sister represent a role model of a perfect life companion, because they are strongly connected during their childhood and the climax in their inner relations is reached when it is time for someone new (wife or husband) to enter their world. It is very hard for someone new to break into that symmetry that has been developed for the years and resulted in a perfectly shaped and suitable adult persons. In Premeditated murder, the character of Krsman is that external factor who threatens to completely destroy Jovan and Jelena's world. He is not a symbol of any outer world, he is a symbol of a new, incoming world; the world so nauseous to Jovan and Jelena, but a world full of reality. Jelena wants to enter that world, but to keep her noble habits and Krsman is the key to that world. By choosing Krsman as a the shortcut to the new world, she is shutting the door behind her and terminating her romance with Jovan. Jovan is not ready for that radical step, he is not willing to leave their little world. He decides to close the circle between them and recourses to the ultimate resort. He kills Krsman and himself, because it is the last option to save his world, his love and his essence. Jovan and Jelena's romance begins with puberty, but with time they become more and more conscious of wrongful of their act. They know they are doing something wrong, something unlawful, even sinful and they will be duly punished. They are waiting for their punishment, but when it comes, it will be dreadful, and they will pay for enjoying forbidden passion. Jovan at last chooses the punishment for them, but he also punishes Krsman, for entering their world, breaking into pieces and for making to keep a child without a father. (Bugarska narodna poezija i proza, Narodne balade, Sofija, 1982., 369.)

[33] In some areas even longer, like in north part of Bosnia and Herzegovina (called Krajina) where it was kept until World War II

34 How much is deficient family unwanted form of family witnessed Bulgarian folk songs: " Penka remained widow/with son in her arms./Penka was ashamed, sinful was/

[35]"We grew up alone. Completily alone. Just two of us. Entirely connected.Without mother and father."Slobodan Selenić, Premeditated murder, Beograd, 2009.

Jelena and Jovan, once perfect lovers, perfect strangers. They are aware that their relationship is unsustainable in the real world, and it is just a matter of time when it will break.

Interesting point about incest in folk ballads is that although explicit scenes of incest are never verbalized, it is yet incest of desire and words, but love is not consumed, because patriarchal society will not stand that. That unacceptable passion destroys the family and leads them into death. Death is the only possible solution out of a complex situation. Death is the atonement from committed sins and the price to be paid by someone who violated the boundaries between allowed and forbidden. The actors are aware at all time that they have been doing something wrong and they carry that guilt which gives a new dimension to their relation, a pathological dimension. A compromise between the the real world and the world they created is not possible; the conflict is too strong so the real world outgrows their world, thus forcing the illicit love to capitulate.

Our oral poetic tradition has noted an attempt of royal incest in a folk song called " Marriage of Dušan's sister" where Emperor Dušan expresses a will to marry his sister, to keep the wealth in the family[36]. But when he becomes sober he regrets the words that he said, saying that alcohol makes people say words they do not really think, and even him, a great emperor could be influenced by alcohol. Although, the mentioned idea of possible incest in the patriarchal society of the time was unbearable, nothing could stand against the emperor's will. Church dignitaries in the song are representatives and guardians of public morality but they dared not react to this statement. Sister Kandosija was hiding her face behind servant Mijajilo looking for protection and resort from shame that brother's statement has provoked in her. Royal incest is specific because it is a demonstration of the imperial power and there was no need to limit emperor's intentions according to the positive law and good customs. In monarchies, rulers weren't limited by positive law, even in situations when their intentions were in conflict with the existing regulation they would transgress the rules. From this folk song about marriage of Dušan's sister we can only guess whether that were Dušan's true intention or just a legend. But history records cases of serious desires of Serbian rulers to be engaged in incest, such as prince

[36] https://sr.wikisource.org/wiki/%D0%A3%D0%B4%D0%B0%D1%98%D0%B0_%D1%81%D0%B5%D1%81%D1%82%D1%80%D0%B5_%D0%94%D1%83%D1%88%D0%B0%D0%BD%D0%BE%D0%B2%D0%B5, accessed 5.7.2013.

Mihailo who was involved in a relationship with his underaged niece Katarina Konstantinović. Prince Mihailo and Katarina were in the fifth grade of kinship, so the marriage couldn't become official because the church didn't allow marriages between relatives up to the sixth grade, thus metropolitan Mihailo was against that marriage[37]. The Serbian political public was also against that marriage because they weren't fond of western customs integrating into Serbian conservative community. Ilija Garašanin, who stood up against this idea, which was quite usual on French or Spanish royal palaces, was forcefully retired, as punisment. His successor to the throne, king Milan was also in unofficial relation with his cousin Katardži. Hence, incest was not uncommon to Serbian royal dynasty, who obviously suffered from the same disease like their European peers.

Serbian medieval literature, reveals more examples of incestuous relationships such as "Hagiography of Paul Caesarea" or a folk song named „ Foundling Symeon". Both literary works are based on the Greek myth about Oedipus. This pagan motive was adjusted to the feudal and Christian context where the setting is made. Polytheistic conception of incest stipulates that Oedipus must suffer consequences for his deeds. He blinds himself because his desires are the cause of his sins, he receives his punishment and his ancestors are also paying back for his sins. He suffers his doom on earth, enduring their predicaments. In Christian version of the myth of Oedipus, he is closed in a monastery where he devotes himself in praying and denounces everyday life, so he would one day experience enlightenment. The enlightenment comes after years of vegetation, full rejection of life, when Paul and Symeon find their piece in silence and isolation. Incest was a common phenomenon in the medieval times when the struggle for throne was great, and candidates who came from woman's line would be very dangerous. That is why it was so opportune to conclude incestuous marriages, because the royal blood would stay pure and the continuity of dynasty would be undisturbed. For this reason Ahaz and Agaza, Paul's parents who are brother and sister enter into such relationship to keep their wealth. As a result of their incestuous love, Paul is born and although he is legitimate heir to the throne, he is thrown into the sea. Throwing into the water, be it sea or river, represents an act of purification, symbolic throwing a burden of sin into water to clean up the quilt, to eliminate the remains of sin.

[37] Prohibition of conclusion of consaquines marriage was established by decision of Synod of Constantinopole early 997.

South Slavic area was very rich in cultural and national differences, which is the result of a number of conquests throughout history on the Balcan Peninsula. Such cultural influence of the Greeks and Turks, BorisavStanković has described in his famous novel " Nečistakrv" (Tainted blood). The plat is set into the 19th century and describes life in southeastern Serbia and the raise of civil society. Incest is described as a cause of degradation of one great family, but I think that incest is always concomitant with already started degradation. Stanković revives a traditional wealthy family headed by its founder hadži- Trifun who is an energic, strong and skillful tradesman, which brought his great wealth. His progeny was fond of easy life, drinking, carousing, gambling and they cared less for the stability and respect of the family[38]. Enjoying the fruits of the work and exploitation of another causing members of this privileged family to swerwe in many vices, inter alia in incest. The product of such dissolute life was offspring with different disorders and diseases. In another place in the novel incest is mentioned, in the context of degradation of rural environment in the form of "snohačestvo", a custom practiced in southeastern Serbia. This custom provoked incest for reasons different from reasons for incest among Sofka' s ancestry. This custom was a relict of Turkish reign and the right to the first wedding night that belonged to the master. Thus, the right belongs to the father of the groom and as a result of this relation, it was very problematic to define kinship, because the father-in-law could conceive with the daughter in law and a child born could be his son, but officially his grandson. This phenomenon was also noted when the son was absent from home for sometime participating in battles and during that time father would live in concubinage with his son's wife. Reasons for practiced incest between father -in-law and daughter- in- law were hard conditions of life and because of that the father would marry his underage son, sometimes when he was still a child, with an older girl, who was capable of working. Until his son comes of an age and gets prepared to take his marital duties, the father would use his right over his daughter-in- law. In that way sacrosanct construction of the family is broken and roles in the family are now replaced, which ends up in great confusion and disorder. Incest is just a symptom of an already ill family, a symptom that something is not going in a desirable direction. Legal regulation reacts to incest with punishment such as prison or fine but does not correspond to the essential basis of genesis of incest. Realized incest inevitably leads to personality disorder when clinical picture is dominated by a sense of guilt, denial of psychological reality, anxiety, depression with suicidal intentions. From concrete cases of incestuous families it is obvious that incest occurs more likely in families who are already burdened with some of deviance for example, alcoholism, drug addiction. People who have broken the oldest taboo are disoriented and need new social integration. I don't think that is possible to accomplish with state reaction through punishment by either prison or fine.

[38] „And the meaning of their life was the following: every woman from the house was tending and beatifying herself so she could use her powerful beauty to overtake other women and madden all men in the house, regardless of their age or kinship.", Borisav Stanković, Nečista krv, Beograd, 1910., http://www.rastko.rs/knjizevnost/umetnicka/proza/bstankovic-krv.html, accessed 2.7.2013.

Conclusion

Regarding the issue of incest and considering all aspects of incest, it is very hard, almost impossible, to come up with unique conclusions. Conclusions are very controversial because incest is a phenomenon that is very complex and it is impossible to reduce it to one dimension only. In the Balkan area, incest is a socially unacceptable behavior and also punishable by criminal law. Incestuous marriages also are not possible to conclude. Incest is entirely tabooed but our written and oral literature evidence differently. Common Law shows that incest was very common in southeastern parts of Serbia, later maintained with custom of the privilege of the first wedding night. In addition, incest was practiced in many others places in the Balkan, what is witnessed in article of Family Law[39] wherewith it is possible to conclude marriage between first cousins if it is common in that geographic area. It is interesting to see how incest changed from tolerant to very radical even criminally prohibited attitude. Nowadays, convictions based on incest are very rare, one could say that in the Republic of Srpska in the last ten years courts have not heard a case of incest. But strict criminal regulation remains and it seems like untouchable. The main purpose of this paper was to show that incest is usually a consequence and not a cause of disorganization of the family. It is mainly a result of the presence of some already existing pathological factors.

References

Borisav Stanković, Nečista krv, Beograd, 1910., http://www.rastko.rs/

[39] Osnovni zakon o braku (Službeni list FNRJ, br. 31/ 41, 44/46)

Machado de Assis and the struggle for recognition

Hugo Schayer Sabino[1]

Abstract: The paper deals with the struggle for recognition, as presented by Axel Honneth, and connects his considerations to the possibility of recognition as a result of disrespect.

Keywords: Recognition – Disrespect – Literature.

1. Introduction:

Axel Honneth´s The Struggle for Recognition: The Moral Grammar of Social Conflicts (1999) deals with de possibilities of human and social development in contrast with the construction of identities and conflicts.

The book is divided in three parts. The first deals with history and its contents, in a Hegelian perspective. The second part deals with the systematic update of this perspective. The final part deals with morals, social evolution and social philosophy.

This essay focus on the second part and specially on Item 6 of it, which deals with personal identity and disrespect: violation, rights denial and degradation. The paper main objective is to check Honneth's methods mentioned in the chapter are sufficient to match all the hypothesis risen in the chapter.

In order to do so, three short stories by Machado de Assis are use. The disrespect forms mentioned by Honneth will be sought in the short stories and therefore compared with the models he proposes.

In order to do so, a short explanation about the item 6 in the second part of the book is given.

Item 5 in part 2 of Honneth's book is also mentioned, as it deals with the possibility of the possibilities of recognition and ethical requirements.

[1] Ph.D. student at PUC – Minas. Professor at UNA - Betim.

2. The struggle for recognition – Personal Identity and disrespect.

To Axel Honneth (2009, 213) human integrity stands on recognition experiences. The denial of recognition is disrespect or debasement (Honneth, 2009, 213). Disrespect is able to collapse the whole identity of a person (Honneth, 2009, 214/214).

Honneth notices the possibility of disrespect as a pattern to the struggle for recognition, due to its foundations on human subject affections (2009, 214).

To Honneth, the lowest disrespect is the one involving the possibilities denying a individual the freedom to dispose of its own body (2009, 215). This matches the stated on the Art. 5º of the Brazilian constitution, as well as the Brazilian Penal Code, in wich crimes against person are the main offences.

The second form of disrespect acknowledge by Honneth are those which affects self-respect and morals through the denial of certain rights. Difficulties to access health services, public transport, sanitation example rights denied to minorities in Brazil. The individual cannot be taken liable for moral responsibility (Honneth, 2009, 217), that means he cannot recognize himself as a person with rights.

The last form of disrespect applies to those individuals or social groups and their perception as negatives (Honneth, 2009, 217). This sort of disrespect has been applied to women, gays, afro-descendents. These are prejudice and discrimination acts.

Honneth then compares the types of disrespect and rebates applicable to the human body (2009, 218). This comparison has two meanings: calling the subject attention to its condition and extracting a general view over human disrespect (Honneth, 2009, 219).

Honneth argues the way between suffering and an active action against disrespect is bounded by the struggle for recognition (2009, 220) When someone shames itself and denies this shame in this action is found self value (Honneth, 2009, 223).

Honneth therefore mentions disrespect as a starter for the struggle for recognition.

3. Machado de Assis short stories

Shame, disrespect and discrimination experiences are elements in Machado de Assis short stories. Three of these stories are studied in this essay. They are Father against Mother (Pai contra mãe), Secret Reason (A causa secreta) and The stick tale (O Conto da Vara).

Secret Cause has three dead characters: Garcia, Fortunato and Maria Luísa. Garcia was a Medical Graduate. He met Fortunato as a student. They meet again sometimes and end up in a acquaintanceship. Fortunato is considered weird and his wife, Maria Luísa, is a very kind person. Between Maria Luísa and Fortunato there is no sign of companionship. Garcia and Fortunato start a hospital and all the three of them share a social living. Garcia loves Maria Luísa, but he keeps it as a secret, as not to hurt his business partner. Maria Luísa finds out that love, but keeps herself shut. Santiago is found to be a sadist. Illness kills Maria Luísa. Both friends attend the funeral Fortunato goes to rest a little and coming back he finds Garcia kissing his dead wife corpse. Not moving, he quietly stands at the door.

Father against mother tells the story of Cândido Neves. He is a black man who earns his living through rewards paid for capturers of runaway slaves. Living with his pregnant wife and her aunt, he finds himself short of money in a way that even food might be missing in a few days. That would mean also giving away the newborn. On his way to give the child to others he finds a runaway pregnant slave woman. As he captures and delivers her to the owner, she suffers an abortion. Going back home, Cândido Neves thinks: not every child will live.

The Stick tale is about Damião, a seminarian who leaves the convent. Wandering around, he finds shelter in an old lady◎s house. He shows affection for a infant maid. As she performs a small mistake, the old lady ask Damião for a stick to punish the child. He promptly attends her, leaving the child to be severely beaten up.

Machado de Assis works are a reflection of his living years and autobiographic elements are not to be ignored (Coutinho, 1966, 35). Custom description was relevant to him (Teixeira, 1987, 195). As an Afro-American he was only taken as a white-man due to social conventions (Massa, 1971, 47).

4. Machado de Assis short stories and Honneth's ideas.

Machado de Assis short stories tell events in which disrespect did not result in recognition.

Fortunato lies disrespected in his feelings for his wife. But he does not fight the offender. He does not seek recognition as husband. Damião chooses not to help a child. In Father against Mother all sort of disrespect in shown. Cândido Neves deals with all of them and is left defeated.

These short stories show that not all disrespect case ends up in recognition. Sometimes disrespect just ends in pain.

Due to the second possibility, it might be asked: why Honneth does not work with that hypothesis? What might justify Honneth's choice of not doing so?

Considering the first question, Rudolf von Jhering answer in "The Struggle for Law" (1994) might be considered more sophisticate, as the struggle for right is taken as a moral duty. Honneth does not go any further on his considerations on this matter.

5. A new approach

Honneth's option of not dealing with the possibility of a denial to recognition might be taken as a methodological choice, but it is not a explicit one. In another work of his, "Suffering from Indeterminacy: An Attempt at a Reacturalization of Hegel's Philosophy of Right"

References

ASSIS, Machado de. Pai contra Mãe. Disponível em < http://www.dominiopublico.gov.br/pesquisa/DetalheObraDownload.do?select_action=&co_obra=1951&co_midia=2> Consultado em 24 de fevereiro de 2.011.

_____. O caso da vara. Disponível em < http://www.dominiopublico.gov.br/pesquisa/DetalheObraDownload.do?select_action=&co_obra=1927&co_midia=2> Consultado em 24 de fevereiro de 2.011.

_____. A causa secreta. Disponível em < http://www.dominiopublico.gov.br/pesquisa/DetalheObraDownload.do?select_action=&co_obraw=16917&co_midia=2> Consultado em 24 de fevereiro de 2.011.

BRASIL.; CAHALI, Yussef Said (Org.). Código civil ; Código de processo civil

; Código comercial ; Legislação civil ; Processual civil e empresarial ; Constituição Federal. 12. ed. rev., ampl. e atual. até 29.12.2009 São Paulo: Revista dos Tribunais, 2010. 1982 p. (RT Mini Códigos Civil) ISBN 9788520335970

BRASIL.; GOMES, Luiz Flávio (Org.). Código penal: Código de processo penal; Legislação penal e processual penal; Constituição Federal. 12. ed. rev., ampl. e atual. São Paulo: Revista dos Tribunais, 2010. 1387 p. (RT mini códigos) ISBN 9788520335963

COUTINHO, Afrânio. Machado de Assis na literatura brasileira. 2. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Livraria São Jose, 1966. 107p

HONNETH, Axel. Sofrimento de indeterminação: uma reatualização de filosofia do direito de Hegel. São Paulo: Singular, Esfera Pública, 2007. 145 p.

_____ . Luta por reconhecimento: a gramática moral dos conflitos sociais. 2. ed. São Paulo: Ed. 34, 2009. 291 p. ISBN 8573262818

JHERING, Rudolf von. A luta pelo direito. 14. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Forense, 1994. 88p ISBN 8530901924

MASSA, Jean-Michel. A juventude de Machado de Assis 1839-1870: ensaio de biografia intelectual. Edição ilustrada Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1971. 698 p.

PROENÇA, M. Cavalcanti; HOUAISS, Antônio. Estudos literários. Rio de Janeiro: J. Olympio, [1971]. 565 p.

SCHWARZ, Roberto. A viravolta machadiana in NOVOS ESTUDOS CEBRAP. São Paulo: Centro Brasileiro de Análise e Planejamento,1981-. Quadrimestral. Continuação de Estudos CEBRAP. ISSN 0101-3300

SAYERS, Raymond S. O negro na literatura brasileira. Rio de Janeiro: O Cruzeiro, 1958. 458p

TEIXEIRA, Ivan. Apresentação de Machado de Assis. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 1987. 221 p. (Universidade hoje)

Law and literature:
The experience of jus literary discussion introduced in Universidade Federal do Pará, Brasil

Victor Russo Fróes Rodrigues[1]

Abstract: The present work makes an analysis of the experience of introducing the discussion and research in "Law and Literature" in Law's graduation course of Universidade Federal do Pará – UFPa, from the year 2011. Based on the initiative of Prof. Dr. Luiz Otavio Pereira Correa by offering the elective subject named "Law and Literature" (August-2011), pioneer in the course, set up the framework of the first consistent activity on the issue, culminating in the discussion space called "I Colloquy of Law and Literature: reading the images of the Law"(December, 2011). Initially covering an estimated total of thirty undergraduate students, the elective subject applied the methodology of theoretical explanation of the object of study, followed by the choose of themes for each student to develop a work of their desire. By the presentations of studies for the entire group was discussed the angle of approach to the subject and possible interdisciplinary interfaces, usually mediated by the metaphoric language. Secondly, the space of the symposium opened up the opportunity of elaborating and presenting works for all the student community, expanding the imaginative ideas, the universe of participants and the literary spectrum initially approached. The participants themselves examined the fruitfulness yielded, especially by the reason of a different view offered in opposite of dogmatism often applied in the classroom. Ending the paper, it is analyzed the possibility of inclusion and effecting as a obligatory subject in the course curriculum, concluded as uninteresting by the reason of jailing the free initiative that drove the students toward the jus literary studies.

Key-words: Law and Literature, elective subject, interdisciplinary

[1] Undergraduate student at Federal University of Pará (UFPA), Brazil. E-mail: vicrusso_fr@hotmail.com.

1. Introduction

Law and literature are intertwined, related by the historical aspect of legal creation, or merely by the narrative aspect or, more intrinsic, because both are linked by language. Realizing this intermingling, the interdisciplinary studies of these two branches emerged, cataloged since the early twentieth century (Trindade, 2008), giving rise to a series of discussions that have developed and are still being developed both in the legal world and the literary world.

Without considering the historical aspects of the studies called "Law and Literature", we can say that they were initiated and consolidated in the United States (nuclei at several universities), from which influenced the whole world, without forgetting the concomitant European production. Despite its relatively recent onset, such studies have found repercussion in Brazil, where it was driven by intriguing thinkers[2]. Mainly in the south of Brazilians territory, it is formed an exponential production, with several universities that have research centers on that theme.

However, in the North of country, it's realized that there is not such expressive development of studies in "Law and Literature", being virtually undetectable as a set. Noticing it, in 2011, the Professor Dr. Luiz Otavio Pereira[3], along with a group of students under his guidance has decided to introduce some activities in "Law and Literature" at the Federal University of Pará (UFPA).

The Federal University of Pará is located in the Amazon region and is the largest university in the North of Brazil with a student population of over 60,000 people. Its Faculty of Law, at this time, has 112 years, being one of the most prestigious in the country and influencing the training of professionals and prominent politicians in the Brazilian scenario.

In this overview of academic and geographic isolation, as mentioned, from the year 2011 some activities have been developed to stimulate research and production in "Law and Literature". So, the objective of this paper is at first to report the related jusliterary activities that occurred in 2011 and subsequently bring up an important discussion for those who think the legitimacy of the theme: the possibility of inclusion of a discipline in tracks curriculum of undergraduate courses of Law, analyzed from the perspective of the reported activities.

[2] Could list Arnaldo de Moraes Sampaio Godoy, Germano Schwartz, Luis Alberto Warat, Lenio Luiz Streck, Vera Karam de Chueiri, André Karam Trindade, notwithstanding many others.

[3] Doctor in Law by Federal University of Pará (2007) and holder of the same University. Academic profile available at: http://buscatextual.cnpq.br/buscatextual/visualizacv.do?id=K4778468T6 .

2. Activities of "Law and Literature" in UFPA

As already mentioned, the activities of Law and Literature were introduced in UFPA in 2011, and consisted primarily in three areas: the extension project called ""Law in film: literature, art and culture"; the elective course called " Law and literature "; and the "I Colloquy of Law and Literature: reading the images of the Law" Briefly, proposals and results of activities will be reported, also serving as a form of historical record to the memory of the Faculty of Law.

At first, the beginning activity consisted of the extension project named " Law in film: literature, art and culture", designed in 2010 and made effective in 2011. This project proposed the use of films, most of which are grounded in literary works, with the aim to contribute to the expansion of the legal imaginary of students of the Faculty of Law. Running regularly throughout the year, the project consisted of several discussions of carefully selected films with varied audience, from students of law to students of other areas (psychology, social work, history, etc).

The second activity performed, specifically in the month of August, was the offering of optional subject called "Law and Literature", taught by Prof. Dr. Luiz Otavio Pereira on vacation time. This activity involved about 30 graduate students in law, from various semesters. The methodology of the course excelled for the freedom in the choice of the object of study, preceded by a theoretical introduction class, because of the novelty of the topic in that context. In this initial class were presented the most common kinds of research in "Law and Literature", drawn from readings of François Ost (2004).

After that comprehensive theoretical introduction, all students had the opportunity to choose a topic to address in a short presentation by their own. Thus, in two weeks all students presented their works, bringing many literary genres and the most different approaches. A positive point was the use of Amazon literature, relegated to the background by the national literature and which is very close to the cultural reality of the participants.

The third activity developed was the "I Colloquy of Law and Literature: reading the images of the Law ", realized in December. This is a result of the aforementioned elective subject, seen the growing student interest in the subject. Thus, the Colloquy was a open access public event, outside the traditional classroom space and made by the presentation of work and other activities. In this way, allowed greater opportunities for interaction with the theme of "Law and Literature", covering wider range of readings and themes. With the participation of about 80 people, this event marked the end of a prolific year.

3. Including as a compulsory subject, interesting or not?

Reported the experiences in the north Brazilian college, starts from now up to an analysis of the possibility of including Law and Literature as a compulsory subject in the curriculum of the law schools. It is necessary to affirm that such a discussion arose in UFPA effectively, as a practice of the ideas discussed in the activities application. For this reason, it should be clarified that the present article does not attempt to a comprehensive analysis, but from the assumptions measured locally to add elements to the discussion.

As a starting point of analysis, we bring to light a survey realized with participants in the activities offered in 2011, especially the students who participated in the elective subject "Law and Literature" and the I Colloquy. For those involved they were asked what the motivation that had driven the search for that kind of events, as well as to pursue studies in the subject.

As majority response we brought opinions in the sense that the motivation of the participants were attracted by the novelty of the topic, the new possibilities that the object of study could offer them. It was also found that the students observe their daily lives at the Faculty of Law as unattractive, extremely dogmatic and unimaginative, so that the possibility of interaction between law and other areas drew attention and secured the participation of the majority of respondents.

Based on this assumption, it is interesting that many authors rightly confer the characteristic antidogmatic to the interdisciplinary nature of interactions involving law and art. The subversive role of merges between law and art is at the centre of the thought of Luiz Alberto Warat, which developed several proposals in this field in order to break with the traditional methodology.

An important point to note is that Warat (1995) puts the metaphor as a point of inflection between the two knowledge, encouraging the flourishing of legal imagination and the consequent opening of possibilities for legal phenomenon. This metaphor opens cracks in the barriers between science and art, while significance to our reality. We found in Warat and his legacy the critical reasoning thought by the respondents as prevalent.

Similarly, Vera Karam de Chueiri also recognizes the critical role of the blend between law and literature , saying that:

> Direito e literatura é um novo campo de possibilidades para questões formais e materiais que afligem tanto o Direito quanto a Literatura. Porém, no campo da crítica do Direito, incorpora as demandas políticas e éticas de reconstrução de um mundo mais igualitário e justo a sensibilidade estética do gosto literário (CHUEIRI, 2006, pag. 235).

Its noticed that, within the possibilities of interdisciplinary approaches traditionally listed, referenced as "Law of Literature", "Law as literature" and "Law in Literature" (OST, 2004), we think that the objective of "openness" of the legal imaginary is more strongly present in "law in literature", precisely because it is not limited to legal, linguistic and literary theories. It is this last method that we specifically consider, making refer once again to the referential metaphor that opens cracks and creates new realities.

Thus we see that the opinions of event participants join forces to critical - theoretical point of view of "Law and Literature", so we pass to the answer of the central question here.

The inclusion of a discipline that addresses "Law and Literature", even if focused on the perspective of "Law in Literature", as a compulsory subject in the curriculum of a college, firstly could be interesting as a way to mitigate the current dogmatism.

The first point to note is regarding the relative character of the law and literature approach: the possibilities of approach are manifold, and their study can not be considered emancipator by themselves. A sterile, mechanical and uninteresting theme can emasculate supposedly emancipatory character. So this is an important fact to be considered. No one denies, however, the possible use of literary works simply as a tool for positive exemplification of legal phenomena that commonly serves the legal dogmatic strategy.

Still, considering that out of an estimated universe of 1,200 students in law school , only a portion was interested in participating in those activities mentioned, relevance takes the role of free will that led them to the study of the subject . Only those truly interested in the subject attended the activities, printing their commitment to that object, which can be characterized as its object of desire at that time. The desire is the manifestation of artistic and legal center.

Included in curricular path, that is, turned compulsory for all students of a Faculty of Law, would against most primary assumption which we considered: the free will that resulted in the choice of that object of study. Would emasculate the libertarian meaning of its claims, probably resulting in an emptying of meaning.

Therefore, considering this argument as stronger among the ones analyzed, by attacking the premise from which we start , and despite what some scholars might primarily intuit, we consider uninteresting the inclusion of the subject "Law and Literature" into the curriculum route. We believe that such studies should, to maintain its possibly emancipatory and keep the margin of institutionalization, the primary thinking of Warat.

4. As briefly conclusion

Reported the experience of jus literary discussion introduced in Universidade Federal do Pará - Brasil, we reaffirm that they were performed in 2011, thought by the idealism of Professor Dr. Luiz Otavio Pereira and his students, who developed the extension project "law in cinema: literature , art and culture , the elective subject "Law and Literature" and the "I Colloquy of Law and Literature: reading the images of the Law" .

From such activities born the issue of including "Law and Literature" as an obligatory subject at the curriculum of the Faculty of Law. Answered without totalizing pretensions, starting from the local perspective, it was synchronized the speech with the critical theory created on the theme. From Warat and his legacy, it was found to be uninteresting such inclusion, as developed.

Note that the approach used is addressed from the perspective of the perspective of "Law in Literature", which we think is most appropriate for the proposed objectives and referenced by students interested in the topic.

Finally, it will be follow-up activities in the following years as well as theoretical approaches the epistemological specificities of this branch that has the possibility but not the guarantee, to expand the legal imaginary, metaphorically to overcome barriers between Law and art.

References:

CHUEIRI, Vera Karam de. Direito e Literatura. In: Dicionário de Filosofia do Direito. Coord. Vicente de Paulo Barreto. Rio de Janeiro: Editora Renovar, 2006.

OST, François. Contar a lei: as fontes do imaginário jurídico. São Leopoldo: Unisinos, 2004.

TRINDADE, André Karam and GUBERT, Roberta Magalhães. Direito e Literatura: aproximações e perspectivas para se repensar o direito. In: Direito e Literatura: Reflexões teóricas. Porto Alegre: Livraria do advogado, 2008.

WARAT, Luiz Alberto. Metáforas para ciência, arte e subjetividade. Sequência, 1995, nº30, 1 – 10.

The Dworkin's answer to Posner's Economic Analysis of Law on Bush v. Gore Supreme Court decision

Bernardo Gonçalves Fernandes[1]
Raphaela Borges David[2]
Daniel Felipe Paiva[3]

Abstract: This work intends to analyze the Supreme Court decision about the acclaimed case Bush v. Gore through the main arguments present in the Ronald Dworkin's Integrity of Law and in Richard Posner's Economic Analysis of Law. In Posner's arguments the decision was in accordance with the pragmatic approach because it's produced the most efficient allocation of resources. In turn, Dworkin argues against Posner's view, showing that was a badly flawed argument. According to him, emerges the need for Constitution's moral interpretation, to materialize the equity and freedom's rights. It'll be necessary exhibit both theories, through the author's comment, to conclude showing why the arguments presented by Dworkin are more appropriated to a democratic rule-of-law state. At last, and not least, we'll analyze if the main argument was able to influence the judgments following.

Keywords: Bush vs. Gore. Integrity of Law. Economic Analysis of Law.

Ronald Dworkin and Richard Posner are two of the most important exponents of the North American law. Throughout the last decades, they have been showing large contributions to the contemporary philosophy of law, especially on the role of judges in the legal decision. The meaning of this paper is to expose Dworkin's critical reviews over Posner's position, including the last argument in the Bush v. Gore case.

[1] http://lattes.cnpq.br/9044160342461871
[2] http://lattes.cnpq.br/3437755965976884
[3] http://lattes.cnpq.br/2051560120420945

This paper will emphasize two articles. The first published in 1997 by Dworkin in the Arizone Law Review and the second, also published by him, in the Havard Law Review of 1998. Both articles were gathered in the chapters 2 and 3 of the Justice in Robes (2006).

In Dworkin's opinion, there are two ways of answering the question of what is appropriate to reason about the truth of the allegations in law. The first, called "theoretical approach" involves the application of a set of legal or political morality principles to specific legal problems. A second response, called "practical approach", states that a judicial decision is a political event that should be achieved by analyzing the consequences of different responses from an economic evaluation, not being necessary to use a "library of philosophy policy". The latter seems to be more sensible and balanced to American way of thinking, but the author intends to demonstrate its flaws and how the "theoretical approach" can be more appropriate. (Dworkin, 2006, p. 72-73)

The theoretical approach assumes that questions about legal statements veracity are interpretive issues, which must be justified by principles that reflects the best legal practice in the case. It is interpretive, since any legal argument is subject to "justification ascent". When we turn away our eyes from a particular case to a more general examination of the issues there embedded, we must determine if the principle we wish to justify our decision is incompatible or does not accord with the principle that justifies a larger sphere of the law[4] (Dworkin, 2006, p. 76). The "justification ascent" is in Hercules, who, as a judge of extraordinary powers, expresses his arguments not from the inside out, as most lawyers, but from the outside in, trying to seize the more abstract issues to finally decide the case.

> "Before judging his first case, he could develop a gigantic theory of broad scope and appropriate in all situations. He could decide all the fundamental issues of metaphysics, epistemology, and ethics, as well as moral, even political morality. Could decide about what exists in the universe, and why it is justified to think that is what exists, of what justice and fairness require, about what it means freedom of speech, when well understood, and whether and why it is a freedom, particularly worthy of protection, and when and why it is correct to require that persons whose activity is linked to > the loss of others, pay compensation for such damage. He could combine all this and other things to form a wonderfully architectural system. When a new case arises, he would be very well prepared. Departing from outside – starting, perhaps, in intergalactic dimensions of his wonderful intellectual creation - , he could lean quietly on the problem at hand: finding the best justification possible for the law in general, to the American legal and constitutional practice as a branch of law, for constitutional interpretation, for the civil liability and then, finally to the poor woman who took pills in excess and the angry man who set fire to the flag". (Dworkin, 2006, p. 78-79).

[4]In Dworkin's example, where there is the right to claim that a person will suffer damage as a result of use of a medicament deserves to win or lose his cause, we can see that the principle X is not compatible with the principle Y that applies to tort cases.

Further, in touch with a series of interlocutors, Dworkin develops what he calls "the three main criticisms" directed towards the "theoretical approach", by proponents of the "practical approach". The first criticism, metaphysical, is based on the idea that there are no correct answers to legal questions or objective truth about the political morality that can be discovered by legal experts. To such criticism, all our beliefs are simple creations of our language games, in such way that language creates our moral universe instead of expressing it[5].

A second critical perspective of the theoretical approach, also called professional critics, claims that we are just legal experts and not philosophers, therefore we cannot support our legal reasoning on typical arguments based on philosophical investigations.

Finally, we have the pragmatic criticism directly linked to authors like Posner, who said that his view on judicial decisions is independent, since it focuses only in an economic perspective, analyzing and choosing the best consequences for a specific case. Such analysis would be "progressive", if linked to consequential and not deontological arguments, since the deontologist assumes a result that, in certain situations, can generate the worst consequences, while the consequential always searches for a maximum welfare in the decision.

[5]In Justice for Hedgehogs (2011), Dworkin defends the idea of there is truth in moral, against both those who hold what he calls as internal skepticism, ie, the inherent skeptical towards the substantive moral judgments, and either against those who hold the external skepticism, which is based on external statement , 'second-order' about moral. The internal skeptics founded on the moral to denigrate the moral, stating for example that if God does not exist, removes any basis for morality, or morality is empty because all human behavior is causally determined by events beyond the control of any person; the external judge moral from outside and reject any possibility of moral knowledge, stating, for example, that moral judgments are neither true nor false, but the simple expression of feelings. (p. 31-34, 2011).

The theory of integrity defended by Dworkin, raises a diverse consequentialist concern compared to Posner, as it always aims for a general objective which is a law and community structure that ensures equal respect and consideration for all. In other words, consequentialism must exist, but it cannot take the last consequences, in such way that it breaks the necessary limits in the "integrity of the decision". A consequentialism that "takes the right seriously" can only be defended on "weak" terms, Dworkin would say.

> "It is consequential in the details: each interpretive legal argument is intended to safeguard a state of things which, according to the principles embodied in our practice, is superior to the alternatives. It is therefore impossible to consider an objection to the theoretical approach the assertion that it is not sufficiently progressive, in case progressive means consequential". (Dworkin, 2006, p. 89)

Moreover, Dworkin questions the use of the welfare concept as a plausible argument to search for correct answers. A utilitarian states that a legal decision only enhances certain situation, overall or on average, if it brings improvements to the situation under discussion. The Posner's utilitarianism, however, cannot serve as a guide to judicial decision, because our constitutional rights presupposes principles of equality and freedom that will deny in certain situations the argument of best consequence for most. By breaking the code of lawful/unlawful, utilitarianism is concerned only with what works or what might be best for the greatest number of individuals, leaving aside what may be the truth, according to the moral principles accepted by the society.

However, the strongest attack by Richard Posner, against the moral foundation of the legal arguments took place in 1998, with the publication of the entitled article "Against Constitutional Theory," in the New York University Law Review.

Here we demonstrate explicitly that Posner's pragmatism frontally attacks the academics legal theories (academic legal experts[6]). It means that, he is part of what some would call, currently populist anti-theory movement (numerous supporters in the U.S.), which defends that any moral theory can provide solid basis for a moral judgment (no moral theory can make a person, for example, a judge, accept a moral judgment that he initially refused). Furthermore, it also argues that whatever force a moral theory may have in ordinary life, or even in politics, judges should ignore it, because magistrates have better resources to defend your objectives and decisions.

[6] For example: Ronald Dworkin, Charles Fried, Anthony Kronman and Martha Nussbaum.

The main argument exposed here is that judges do not face moral questions in the cases they are placed with, even more, they are not interested and should not be interested in justice issues. According to Posner, when faced with cases that they do not find a simple answer in ordinary sources of guidance (Constitution, laws, precedents), the judges "can do nothing besides appealing to notions of public negotiation conduction, professional and personal values, from institution and opinion (Posner,1999 p. 08).

In a consequentialist perspective, Posner reflects that, in the moment of decision, more important than knowing the moral content (e.g., what is the value of democracy within a community, what means the clause of equal respect, or if it is compatible with the Constitution a law prohibiting physician-assisted suicide), the judge must have knowledge of the economical, social and political issues involved in the matter. He must domain, with the highest predictability, the effects generated by his decision, always adopting a measure that will bring larger benefits or an improvement in the general conditions observed by those involved in the case.

What Dworkin affirms, however, is that Posner may be more attached to a substantive moral theory than he can admit. When he tries to demonstrate that legal experts can move forward without a moral theory, his arguments always resort to this theory, perhaps he cannot make the distinction between moral philosophy on one side and sociology, anthropology and moral psychology in the other side[7]. Posner claims that his studies concerns only questions "about" morality, which Dworkin refutes, since the only way to defend his arguments would be through a moral argument. Thus, Posner says that he is not turning against morality, but against moral theory, what your opponent claims to be a confusing distinction to make, and can be defended only in terms of grades.

[7] "We can put a lot of questions about moral judgments in general, or any particular moral proposition - for example, that clitoridectomy is always a mistake. These questions relate to different intellectual domains. One is the moral sociology. Most people around the world have a common voice on important moral convictions? Otherwise, how great is the diversity of opinion? How many people, for example, find that clitoridectomy is an error, and many think that such practice is morally admissible or even obligatory? A second domain is the moral anthropology. What better explains how humans developed the tendency to make judgments about what is right or wrong from moral point of view? Human beings have the ability to perceive moral particles or fields located 'somewhere' in the Universe? If not, what better explains why people have the opinion that has - why, in some cultures, the majority thinks the opposite way? A third area refers to moral

The moral theory, accordingly to Posner, would have only the privilege to convince the interlocutors about the truth of the speaker. Dworkin replies that this type of process is common: in everyday life and in philosophy, people try to convince each other, without putting into question the credibility of a moral theory, mainly because they think from the inside out, in the sense of "justificatory ascent", described previously.

> "It is impossible to determine beforehand by establishing a priori, any distinction between 'reasoning' and 'theory', to what extent the ascension process should continue: should continue until the puzzles or conflicts who inspired him have been resolved, and this is not something you can know in advance. Therefore, in principle it is impossible to tell where the moral judgment ends and the moral theory begins. Sustaining a point of view that seems unstable or arbitrary after the usual moral reflection, rebuilding its links with principles, concepts or broader ideals, is a component part of moral reasoning, not something different that resolves adding." (Dworkin, 2006, p. 115)

Posner then sustains two thesis: a strong and a weak. The "strong thesis" claims that no moral theory can provide a solid basis for a moral judgment, without realizing that, itself is a moral judgment offered as basis for a question, also, moral. In other words, to defend his "strong thesis" it is needed a substantive moral theory. He stands as a moral "relativistic" arguing that moral statements obey a moral code of the psychology. What causes people to change their moral viewpoints when they are already formed, or acquire others? To what extent, for example, can the arguments or other inducements change people's opinions about whether clitoridectomy is correct or incorrect? A fourth area is the morality itself. The clitoridectomy is morally wrong? It is wrong everywhere, or nowhere? Only in certain traditions or cultures without special needs or circumstances? There are important connections between these areas and issues, but it is crucial to recognize that the fourth domain is conceptually distinct from any of the others." (Dworkin, 2006, p. 109-110) particular culture in which the speaker is inserted[8]. By this argument, he approaches the evolutionary biology, linking moral arguments to local notions that have survived in certain communities. This, however, does not exclude any aspiration of integrity and coherence that it may have. So, to ask yourself, if the moral argument really has the power to change people's minds, is inappropriate and irrelevant, because nobody in healthy conditions can expect good moral arguments to defeat individuals selfishness that prevails in society (Dworkin 2006, p. 116-120).

---

The "weak thesis", however, maintains the idea that judges should ignore the moral theory, regardless of the strength that this may have on the common life or politics, since they have better resources to pursue their goals. It would be a category mistake, like trying to solve an algebra problem with a can opener. Therefore, Posner tries to attempt that judges do not confront themselves with moral issues, rather, they make use of moral terminologies so that their arguments become more accessible to the layman and to be magnanimous. For example, arguments about the proper functioning of a democracy are not moral judgments, but statements about the political or judicial process.

Dworkin then demonstrates how Posner's arguments are bad and unsustainable. So, what explains his violent resistance to the "academic moralism"? The author believes that the statements of the utilitarian can only be maintained if based on a broad and substantive moral theory. It is believed that Posner follows a different stance from which endorses, a moral relativism "adaptationist", that assesses the moral for its contribution to the society survival. Dworkin says that all the mysteries had been undone when he identifies this proposal in the economic analysis of law author.

> "The Darwinian hypothesis explains, above all, the distinction we found so troubling earlier between "ordinary" untutored moral reasoning, on the one hand, and "academic" moralism, on the other. Posner is anxious to protect what strikes him as natural, and "unreflective" means "natural" to him. He is equally anxious to ward off anything that smells not of nature but of the lamp: He thinks that academic theory is unnatural, interventionist, writ> ten by people who haven't really lived, and (however He might protest its innocuousness) in the end dangerous. He calls for the death of moral theory, but, like all of philosophy's whould-be undertakers, He only means the triumph of his own theory. For his arguments show the opposite of what He intended: they show that moral theory cannot be eliminated, and the moral perspective is indispensable, even to moral skepticism or relativism. Posner is himself ruled by an inarticulate, subterranean, unattractive but relentless moral faith." (Dworkin, 2006, p. 94)

[8] Posner denies being nihilistic. Dworkin says that if they put it, would be more justified his theoretical position, since for nihilism nothing is morally right or wrong. And if that relativism were true, we would have the "moral code of a particular culture" would provide a "solid foundation" for moral claims within that community. (Dworkin, 2006, p. 117-118).

The last arguments of Dworkin in this debate with Posner, however, comes with the backdrop of the famous case Bush vs. Gore, in which it is made clear the author fallacy placements. Al Gore, candidate of the United States Presidential Election in 2010, requested a recount of four counties in the state of Florida, suspecting on fraud in the results. The U.S. Supreme Court rejected the request alleging it to be unconstitutional and to avoid the legal uncertainty caused by exceeding the election legal term. Based on this case, Posner affirms that the pragmatic approach adoption by the judges would have better results in general terms. For him, the conservative judges of this case acted as the pragmatic approach would advise them to act (Dworkin 2006, p. 134).

Posner says that judges must balance the benefits of respecting the doctrine with the benefits that may arise by ignoring them. In this case, to the author, the U.S. Supreme Court achieved this balance. The reasoning here involves the already mentioned consequentialist view, once it orients Posner that the best decision for the electoral clash would be the one which sought the best consequences for society, in long term. The worst-case scenarios envisioned by Posner, in this case, is the one in which a recount pointed Gore as winner in Florida. In this scenario, the decision was taken beyond the legal deadline, which would make the accreditation of voters of the state immune to contestation of Congress. Florida's legislative power, mostly Republican, could have chosen their election platform in Bush's favor, once a serious recount could not be completed by December 18, final deadline for voters to deposit their votes. The Congress then would be divided by: the House of Representatives, mostly Republican, allied to Bush platform, and the Senate, controlled by the Vice President Gore, giving vote for his platform. With the Congress divided and unable to reach a consensus, the platform supported by the governor of Florida would have the winning confirmation, and therefore Bush would sworn into office.

What if, hypothetically, the Florida Supreme Court had ordered the governor to confirm the Gore platform, and he refused to do it, in declared disrespect? In other words, if he refused to recount? Posner then, puts the worst-case scenario for him thought, in a exercising required to finding the "best consequence": Gore would have a majority of voters, but not the majority of the total number of votes, in which case the chair would depend on the unresolved question of knowing if he would only need the first one to be the winner. The Supreme Court could refuse to decide because it is a political issue, creating an indefinite prolongation of the matter, leaving the country without a democratically chosen president by his people (Dworkin, 2006, p. 136-137).

What is extracted from the arguments developed by Posner when apply his conception of legal decision theory to a particular case? Here, he takes this mentioned scenario as the most likely to occur, and therefore a pragmatist judge must balance the consequences of such recount at the time of decision. Yes, a pragmatic analysis should consider all possibilities to assert itself as authentic. However, such reasoning must be done in comparative terms, taking into account the severity of each hypothesis and reducing them according to their probability to be possible its defense. Dworkin demonstrates that the reasoning of Posner does not consider this essential aspect of the pragmatic approach, since it takes as common worst-case scenario, disregarding even the real risks of taking position, thus putting in check the credibility of his argumentation theory.

For Dworkin, the judge, in his "theory of integrity", should identify, among the principles accepted by society the one that justifies the decision in the particular case, including the right as part of a linked history and then developing a constructive interpretation based in the consistency of these principles.

So the judges could not impose its decisions in pursuit of collective targets (which benefit only one portion of society against another portion) if individual rights (embodied by legal principles) were in discussion, because - as wildcards in a card game - these hold primacy over collective goals, given its universal character (valid for all members of society).

The judge should act, looking to the past and the future, building a coherent theory that justifies likewise the community of principles that embody social practices. Therefore, in the name of political morality present in a community, the constitutional right defends the inconsistent opinions that may arise, justifying their decisions on laws and institutions that the community presupposes.

This political morality, which serves as a substrate for the integrity decisions, can be explained on the principles of equality and freedom, which are fundamental to Dworkin's theory. The real political community is one which accepts that its members are governed by common principles and not only by rules created from a common political agreement. In this context, the right to integrity is no longer just a theory guide of the judges' actions, to be revealed as a "undertaking to people" the equal respect and concern of all people, so that no group is excluded, guiding so, the achievement of the political community project.

A society that accepts integrity as a virtue becomes, according to Dworkin, in a special type of community that promotes their moral authority to take over and mobilize the monopoly of coercive force. Therefore, Dworkin's theory[9], demonstrates the integrity of the requirement that each case must be understood as part of a linked story, cannot be discarded without a reason based on a consistency principle.

Integrity, therefore, becomes a necessary element, not an option, in the democratic rule of law that appears gifted with legitimacy, allowing judgments are made by the same "collective body", ie, for this community of principles even in the face of reasonable disagreement (of pluralism of lifestyles and dignified living options) are as demanding equal respect and concern for all citizens. So, Dworkin defends that judges, regardless of their personal and moral convictions should be given of responsibility ("political morality") to make the best decision (correctly) for the case that arises as a unique and unrepeatable event.

References

Dworkin, Ronald. 1998. Darwin's New Bulldog. Harvard Law Review 111: 1718-1738.

Dworkin, Ronald. 1986. Law´s Empire. Cambridge, MA: Belknap.

Dworkin, Ronald. 2000. Sovereign Virtue. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Dworkin, Ronald. 2006. Justice in Robes. Cambridge, MA: Belknap.

[9] "No government is legitimate unless it subscribes to reigning principles. First, it must show equal concern for the fate and happiness of every person ear whom it claims dominion. Equal concern is the sovereign virtue of a political community [...]" (Dworkin, 2000, p. 09-10)

Dworkin, Ronald. 2011. Justice for Hedgehogs. Cambridge, MA: Belknap.

Posner, Richard. 1990. The Problems of Jurisprudence. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Posner, Richard. 1999. The Problematics of Moral and Legal Theory. Cambridge, MA. Harvard University Press.

Posner, Richard. 2003. Law, Pragmatism and Democracy. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Derrida on the Death Penalty

Theresa Calvet de Magalhães

> "[…] nous ne sommes ici ni dans un tribunal ou à la barre, ni dans un lieu de culte, ni dans un parlement, ni dans un journal écrit ou radio-télévisé. Nous ne sommes pas non plus dans un vrai théatre. Exclure tous ces lieux, sortir de tous ces lieux, sans exception, c'est la première condition pour penser la peine de mort. Et donc pour espérer y changer quelque chose." (Derrida 2012, 55) ["We are here […] neither in a courtroom or on a witness stand, nor in a place of worship, nor in a parliament, nor in print, radio, or televised news. And neither are we in a real theater. To exclude all these places, to exit from all of these places, without exception, is the first condition for thinking the death penalty. And thus for hoping to change it in some way." (Derrida 2014, 27, trans. Peggy Kamuf)].

Abstract: Reading Derrida's 1999-2000 Death Penalty Seminar, this paper presents a very brief discussion (with long quotations) of how Derrida juxtaposes Kant's defense of the death penalty with Victor Hugo's vote for the pure, simple and definite abolition of the death penalty. If one wants to ask what is the death penalty, one has to reconstitute the history of sovereignty as the hyphen in the expression "theological-political", and try to think the theological-political in its possibility beginning from the death penalty. Deconstruction is thus perhaps, perhaps insists Derrida in this seminar, the deconstruction of the death penalty.

Keywords: Derrida, death penalty, "theological-political", sovereignty, enlightenment, deconstruction.

Introduction

Jacques Derridas's Death Penalty Seminars at the École des hautes études en sciences sociales (EHESS), in 1999-2000 and 2000-2001, three years before he died the 8th of October 2004, belong to a vast research program "Questions de responsabilité" (1991-2003), that was hold from 1995 under the headings "Hostilité/hospitalité" (1995-1997), "Le parjure et le pardon" (1997-1999), "La peine de mort" (1999-2001) and "La bête et le souverain" (in 2001-2002 and 2002-2003, the last year Derrida taught).[1] At the Sorbonne from 1960 to 1964, or the É*cole normale supérieure* (ENS Rue d'Ulm, Paris) from 1964 to 1984, and at the École des hautes études en sciences sociales from 1984 to 2003, Derrida always handwrote first most of his seminars (1960-1969), then typewritten them, with handwritten annotations and corrections (1969-1987), and directly on the computer (1987-2003). So the editors have now the equivalent of some 14000 printed pages, or 43 volumes, one volume for each year of the seminars or courses taught.

The seminar La peine de mort, Volume 1 (1999-2000), published in 2012 (and just recently in English)[2], contains 11 sessions held from December 8, 1999 to March 22, 2000 at the École des hautes études en sciences sociales in Paris, within the frame of its "Philosophy and Epistemology" program. This publication corresponds to the first year of a two-year series on the topic announced by the title. The first double session (December 8, 1999) was the basis of a lecture in Sofia, Bulgaria, followed by a publication titled "Peine de mort et souveraineté (pour une déconstruction de l'onto-théologie politique)" in the journal Divinatio (Derrida 2002a, 13-38). Very little of his own research dedicated to the death penalty was published by Derrida in France. In 1995, four years before the beginning of this seminar, he did write the preface to the French translation of Mumia Abu-Jamal's book Live from Death Row.[3] And Derrida's "Peines de mort" (2001), in De quoi demain, a dialogue with Elisabeth Roudinesco, could also be read as a synthesis of his seminar.

---

[1] Volume 1 of this last seminar, published in French in 2008 (and in English in 2009), was the inaugural volume of the complete [critical] transcription of the seminars taught by Derrida from 1959 to 2003 being published by Editions Galilée (in French) and the University of Chicago Press (in English translation), and edited by Geoffrey Bennington, Marc Crépon, Marguerite Derrida, Thomas Dutoit, Peggy Kamuf, Michel Lisse, Marie-Louise Mallet and Ginette Michaud; all these seminars will be published, at least initially, topic by topic in reverse chronological order. Th. Calvet de Magalhães (retired professor) Philosophy Department, FAFICH, Federal University of Minas Gerais, Belo Horizonte, Brazil. Email: theresa.calvet@gmail.com

[2] Derrida 2014. All our references are to the original French edition, published by Editions Galilee, Paris, in 2012 (to facilitate scholarly reference, the page numbers of the French edition are printed, in the English tranlation, in the margin on the line at which the new page begins)..

[3] Abu-Jamal 1996, 7-13. It was published in English for the first time in Derrida 2002, 125-129.

We will have to wait the publication of the seminar La peine de mort, Volume II (2000-2001), to have a better understanding of Derrida's claim: "La déconstruction [...] est peut-être, peut-être, peut-être la déconstruction de la peine de mort" (Derrida 2012, 50) [Deconstruction (…) is perhaps, perhaps, the deconstruction of the death penalty" (Derrida 2014, 23, trans. Kamuf)]. But is deconstruction the abolition of the death penalty?

The religious and the political basis of the death penalty.

The starting point of Derrida's 1999-2000 Death Penalty Seminar is the religious and political basis of the death penalty. The death penalty is, in these traditions, a guarantee for the dominant religion and for the state. In the first session (December 8, 1999), Derrida remarks that if we want to ask what is the death penalty or what the death penalty means, we have to reconstitute the history of sovereignty as the hyphen in the expression "theological-political". But to ask what is the theological-political requires recognizing that we do not already know what "theological-political" means. The best way to understand the theological-political, Derrida argues, is to analyse the historical scaffolding in which the death penalty is inscribed or prescribed. We must not suppose that we already know what "theological-political" means, and simply apply this concept to a particular case named "death penalty", but one must do just the reverse and try "to think the theological-political in its possibility beginning from the death penalty" (Derrida 2012, 50). To deconstruct the death penalty would be to deconstruct the theological-political, that is, the alliance of religion and the state. Derrida's assumption is that through the analysis of many assumptions behind the death penalty, we can understand what the theological-political means and is. And he relates it to philosophy as such:

> "Let me tell you why. To my knowledge, there have been no philosophers in the Western tradition, until now [December 2001], who have condemned the death penalty in their philosophical discourse. All the philosophers I know are, or have been, in favor of the death penalty. Some of them are against it in their hearts but not in their philosophical system. [A professor in Chicago once asked Derrida after his lecture: "You say that you are against the death penalty and that no philosopher up to now has elaborated a consistent discourse against the death penalty. So it is a mat> ter of the heart – do you think that your heart is better than that of others". Derrida answered: "Yes, probably better than yours"] There is no room in their system for the condemnation of capital punishment.... The question is: Why is philosophy in the West so essentially linked with the possibility and necessity of capital punishment? I have a number of doubts. One of them is that these philosophers from Kant through Hegel and up to us are of indispensable necessity forced to link their ontological and metaphysical system with the State and the authority of the State, because they can not challenge the death penalty without questioning the sovereign and authority of the state." (Derrida, Globalization and Capital Punishment (17 Sept. 2001), in Zhang 2002, 149).

If one then asks: "What is the theological-political?", the answer would be the following for Derrida: "the theological-political is a system, an apparatus of sovereignty in which the death penalty is necessarily inscribed. There is theological-political wherever there is death penalty" (Derrida 2012, 51).[4]

For Derrida, the death penalty is not a problem of death; it is a problem of death decided upon by a sovereign Nation-State:

> "There is no death penalty without the authority of the Nation-State. The death penalty is the execution of a legal murder under the politics of a Nation-State. As such, it has to be public. An execution is always public even if in some cultures and some societies the executions are not in a public place. You can not speak strictly and literally of the death penalty when the Nation-state secretly assassinates or executes people without following its ruling establishment. I don't know whether we can speak seriously of the death penalty whenever a Nation-State puts someone to death. In Europe, the death penalty must be public: the name, the date, and the place should be publicly advertised. Now publicity or being public does not mean simply that the death penalty is visible for everyone. I remind you that Michel Foucault in his Discipline and Punish: Birth of the Prison [Surveiller et punir: Naissance de la prison (1975)] mentioned that maybe in the 18th and 19th centuries, punishment and torture had become less and less visible, less and less theatrical, more and more hidden and invisible. [...] When Dr. Guillotin recommended the use of the Guillotine in the Revolution, he said that this means of execution was equal for everyone: it took only one second, it was painless, and it had even a slight > sense of pleasure, of freshness in it (laughter in audience). It was technical progression in the domain of torture. So, people argue that there was less and less publicity, which is true in a certain sense. But I would object to this. For me, it is not a matter of less or more visibility but of the change in the form of visibility. Today, I think we have more visibility through the media, the cinema, and other ways of communication. So we know better than ever who is executed in the United States. That is the major puzzle in globalization and in the struggle against the death penalty." (Derrida, Globalization and Capital Punishment (17 Sept. 2001), in Zhang 2002, 151-152).

[4] See Bernardo 2005, 477-483.

Every death, insists Derrida, is not the sentence or the application of a death penalty, and does not correspond to what is strictly called a "death penalty", or to the juridical concept of the death penalty: "The concept of death penalty presents itself, in any case, as a concept of law, the concept of a sanction exercised by law in a state of law, even if one may then contest the well-foundedness of this self-presentation" (Derrida 2012, 72).

Near the end of the first session, Derrida announces that his seminar on the death penalty "will be massively turned in the direction of the United States in the year 2000" (Derrida 2012, 73).[5]

[5] [" that is, in the direction of one of the very rare, or even the only and the last large country of so-called European culture [during the session, Derrida adds: "predominantly Christian."] and with a so-called democratic constitution, that maintains - in conditions that we will examine more closely, and in defiance of numerous international conventions that we will also study- the principle of the death penalty and its massive, even growing, application, after a turbulent history, on this subject, from 1972, when the death penalty was judged unconstitutional, to 1976, when the Supreme Court reversed itself on this judgment and when thirty-eight states reinstated the death penalty and twenty-eight began once again to apply it, etc.), well, in the United States, the execution of "capital punishment" shows a great variety, a great technological refinement in cruelty or barbarity, but no longer goes directly, always, and literally after the head, whether one is talking about "decapitation" or hanging (the modality, said to be more or less cruel, of the application of the death penalty is today in the United States a more spectacular and heated debate than the debate over the death penalty itself, as if the essential thing were to maintain, or not, a human "ecology," a good and tolerable death penalty). But naturally, in the figurative sense, and the trope counts here, execution always attacks the head, the central seat of the cerebral and nervous systems, the presumed seat of consciousness and personality: the sign of this is that everywhere a prohibition is observed against executing a sentence on someone who is out of his head, as they say. The condemned man must be "normal," "responsible" and undergo punishment in full consciousness. He

"No philosophy against the death penalty". The categorical imperative of penal justice and Kant's maternal infanticide exception

In "Peines de mort" (2001) Derrida is once more very clear about philosophy's support of the death penalty and speaks of what for a long time was for him this most stupefying fact:

> "Never, to my knowledge, has any philosopher as a philosopher, in his or her strictly and systematically philosophical discourse, never as any philosophy as such contested the legitimacy of the death penalty. From Plato to Hegel, from Rousseau to Kant (who was undoubtably the most rigorous of them all), they expressly, each in his own way, and sometimes not without much hand-wringing ([as in] Rousseau), took a stand for the death penalty." (Derrida and Elisabeth Roudinesco 2001, 235-236).

Derrida discusses Kant's view in his third public lecture in China, given in English on September 17, 2001 at the Chinese University of Hong Kong:

> "Kant disagreed with anyone who justified the death penalty in the name of utility, exemplariness, and social security. He claimed that the death penalty is just in and by principle and not in and by its utility [and Derrida says we need to deconstruct Kant's argument precisely because it is not a utilitarian one, for otherwise abolitionist discourse would be restricted to empirical considerations]. A man who has committed a murder must be punished because he is punishable. He gave an example in his work: imagine a community on an island, Hong Kong for instance (laughter in audience); its members agree that they should leave the island, disperse, and break down the society, but before leaving, they must execute the people condemned to death who are already in jail, because it is just. It is not useful at all, because the society will be dissolved. But in the name of the principle of justice, they have to execute the last guilty one in jail. So for Kant it is a matter of principle. He believed that the justification for the death penalty on the level of its utility is to insult humanity, because the death penalty for him is a sign of humanity. Only the rational man deserves the death penalty while > an animal does not. It is a sign of the dignity of the human being, because only human beings can go beyond life, be above life, and risk their own lives. A human being can lose his life, and that is a sign of human dignity. If we use the death penalty as an article in legislation, it is simply that it structures this institution and represents its human character." (Derrida, "Globalization and Capital Punishment" (17 Sept. 2001), in Zhang 2002, 150).

---

must die awake." (Derrida 2012, 73-74)]

In the fifth session (January 26, 2000) of his Death Penalty Seminar, Derrida introduces Kant's writings that purport to demonstrate the categorical imperative of penal justice (the pure talionic law) through Kant's concession of an exception to this categorical imperative, concerning the impunity of a mother's infanticide (infanticidium maternale)[6]:

"Why is it that only maternal infanticide [...] cannot or must not be punished by death? Maternal infanticide is here understood as the putting to death of a child <born> out of wedlock and it is meant to erase the shame of a maternity outside of marriage and save, Kant says, the honor of the feminine sex. [...] this maternal infanticide is indeed a homicide (homicidium), to be sure, it indeed puts to death a human being, but it is nevertheless not a murder (homicidium dolosum): that is, a putting to death, a killing that implies a wrong, some treachery (dolos, dolus), a crime of malice, a malicious ruse, thus an evil [un mal], an evildoing [une malignité], a cruelty in the sense of wanting-to-make-suffer. [...] Well, says Kant, such maternal infanticide, homicidium but not homicidium dolosum, must not be punished by death. One must not punish it by death and apply the pure talionic law (jus talionis) to it not only because it is a matter of saving sexual honor from an extramarital birth, but because the child born outside of marriage is born outside of the law (the law that is marriage, Kant says) and consequently also outside the protection of the law. And Kant has this extraordinary formulation:

> It [the child born outside of marriage and thus outside of law and thus outside the protection of the law] has, as it were, stolen into the commonwealth [in das gemeine Wesen] (like contraband mer> chandise [wie verbotene Ware]), so that the commonwealth can ignore its existence (since it was not right that it should have come to exist this way), and can therefore also ignore its annihilation [seine Vernichtung]; and no decree can remove the mother's shame when it becomes known that she gave birth without being married [Metaphysische Anfangsgründe der Rechtslehre (1797), in Kant's Gesammelte Schriften, vol. VI, 336; trans. Alain Renaut, 159]

[6] See Kant 1907 [1797], 336-337; "Doctrine du Droit", in Métaphysique des Moeurs II, trans. Alain Renaut (Paris: Flammarion, 1994), 158-160; "Doctrine of Right," in The Metaphysics of Morals, trans. and ed. Mary Gregor (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996), p. 109. And this case (maternal infanticide) is quite interesting in the actual Brazilian context and the recent outrageous substitutive to an alltogether outrageous bill ("Projeto de lei [Proposed Law] 478/2007").

This case [...] is very symptomatic of the logic that Kant puts to work or claims to see at work in the concept of law and penal law. Since the categorical imperative [...] of penal law is the talionic law, the equivalence of the crime and the punishment, thus of murder and the death penalty [...], since, in addition, this civil penal law, that is, the law internal to the state, to the community as a commonwealth, implies that the crime, the criminal, and the victim are all subjects of the state, well, when a mother puts to death an illegitimate child that is not recognized by the state as a legal subject, in that case the act of putting to death is indeed a homicide but not a crime punishable by the law, and the state cannot, by punishing the mother, repair the damage or the shame. The victim is nothing and nobody, in a certain way. It is indeed a human being, and that is why there is homicidium, but this human being is not a citizen, not even the citizen of a foreign and enemy state, like a foreign soldier legitimately killed in combat by an act for which no soldier of my country will ever be punished, but sometimes on the contrary glorified. [...] And one must think about this example historically (it is not a matter only of abortion, which is still a supplementary dimension, and I don't know if Kant would have considered the embryo put to death to be a human person or its death a homicide): it was possible to put to death children already born." (Derrida 2012, 180-183).

The categorical imperative of penal justice still remains and does not disappear in the occasion of this case of exception; it simply awaits the rising of its full coherence:

> "If the categorical imperative—which in any case remains (bleibt)—is one day to be in agreement with customs, then culture, non-barbarity, and civilization are necessary, which is to say: it would be necessary for women no longer to have children out of wedlock [...], for the sense of honor to be respected in fact by morality; then the knot will be untied, there will be an Auflösung dieses Knotens. In other words—and this is one of the great paradoxically interesting things about this Kantian position, which is as rigorous > as it is absurd—when the history of morality and of civil society will have progressed to the point where there is no more discord between the subjective motives and the objective rules, then the categorical imperative that presides over the death penalty will be fully coherent, with neither cruelty nor indulgence, but of course, there will be no more need to sentence to death. But while waiting for that to happen, in order to think the law, the ideal and rational purity of the law, one must maintain the principle of the categorical imperative, that is, the talionic law (a life for a life, a death for a death) and inscribe the death penalty in the law, even if the ideal is to be never obliged to pronounce it in a verdict. In any case, the possibility of the death penalty, that is, of the law as what raises homo noumenon above homo phaenomenon (above its empirical life), belongs to the structure of the law." (Derrida 2012, 184-185)

To ask about the death penalty could then be the best introduction to the question "What is the Enlightenment?" And one can follow what Derrida said in the seventh session (February 9, 2000) of his seminar:

> "[...] in particular through a rereading of Kant's famous "Was ist Aufklärung?," of the question of the relations between religion and Aufklärung, les Lumières, Illuminismo, Enlightenment, of everything that divided the delta of Enlightenment between supporters and adversaries of the death penalty, even as one would not forget that the author of "Was ist Aufklärung?" was a firm adversary of Beccaria, a convinced proponent of the death penalty who nevertheless admitted that the age was not yet enlightened (aufgeklärt) but that it was on the way to enlightenment (Aufklärung) in the historical movement of a progress open to perfectibility. No doubt you remember: "Wenn denn nun gefragt wird: Leben wir jetzt in einem aufgeklärten Zeitalter? so ist die Antwort: Nein, aber wohl in einem Zeitalter der Aufklärung (If it is now asked whether we at present live in an enlightened age, the answer is: No, but we do live in an age of enlightenment)." One would have to privilege this passage when asking oneself whether or not this propagation, this progress of Aufklärung ought to be moving toward an abolition for which Kant was obviously not ready, which he even opposed in the name of human dignity (Würde). In concluding his text, as you know, Kant said that government had an interest in treating man, who is henceforth more than a machine, in a manner appropriate to his dignity. Each word matters for us in this concluding sentence. What is translated as "interest" when it says > that the government has an interest in treating man, who is more, that is, something other than a machine, in a manner appropriate to his dignity, that is, has an interest in treating him beyond calculable interest, as means, and to treat him as an end in-itself beyond any market price and any pathological interest, what is translated as "interest," then, is zuträglich, useful, profitable: government must find it useful, profitable for itself, to treat man, who is henceforth more than a machine, in a manner appropriate to his dignity—which is thus not a price, which is a value beyond values and beyond Marktpreis. There is then, once again, an interest beyond interested interest interest; there is here an interest without interest, a disinterested interest of reason: "auf die Grundsätze der Regierung, die es ihr selbst zuträglich findet, den Menschen, der nun mehr als Maschine ist, seiner Würde gemäss zu handeln"("the principles of governments, which find that they themselves have an interest [that find it useful for themselves] in treating man, who is more than a machine, in a manner appropriate to his dignity")." (Derrida 2012, 252-253).

The essence of the light common to all these enlightenments (the Lumières, or the Aufklärung, or the Enlightenment or the Illuminismo), "the essence of this aube [dawn]", asks Derrida, in the last session (March 22, 2000), "would it not be the twilight of capital punishment"? would it not be "the doubly crepuscular moment in which one begins to think the death penalty, starting from its end, starting from the possibility of its end" ? that is, "starting from the possibility of an end that breaks like day, and already begins to condemn the condemnation to death? " (Derrida 2012, 375). And he concludes: "The age of Enlightenment [siècle des Lumières] would be like the rising, the sunrise, the east or the yeast [le levant ou le levain] of a form of speech diagnosing, prognosticating: the condemnation to death is condemned, in the long run [à échéance]" (Derrida 2012, 375).

In favor of an unconditional, pure, and simple abolition of the death penalty

Derrida began the fourth session (January 19, 2000) by citing Victor's Hugo direct and very powerful line: I vote for the pure, simple and definite abolition of the death penalty (Derrida 2012, 147).[7] Derrida begins with this brief declaration because, he says, "it was made, statutorily, on the floor of a legislative body and of a Constituent Assembly of a revolutionary kind, in an assembly conscious of its inaugural, founding, instituting power." (Derrida 2012, 150).

[7] Before returning to this text, the last sentence of a speech (an intervention) that Hugo

Instead of following Derrida's long detour, at the beginning of this session, I will quote a fragment of the third public lecture he gave, in China, at the University of Hong Kong:

> "I told you that there is no philosopher I know of who condemns the death penalty, but there are a number of writers who are opposed to it, and among them the French writer, Victor Hugo, who was a militant and eloquent writer read all over the world during the 19th century. His opposition to the death penalty had been already globalized because he was sending articles worldwide to help those who were condemned. Hugo asked for a pure and simple abolition of the death penalty, because up until then, there had been sometimes a partial abolition for political charges. He was in favor of an unconditional, pure, and simple abolition. However, he referred to two sources of opposition: one was the Church and the other was the terror of the French Revolution. As you know, at the beginning of the French Revolution, Robespierre was opposed to the death penalty and he wrote against it, following the example of Beccaria (1738-1794), the famous Italian lawyer [man and jurist of the Enlightenment] who produced a discourse against the death penalty.[8] Then he changed his mind during the Revolution, result-gave at the Constituent Assembly, on September 15, 1848, one century before the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), Derrida takes a long detour by way of literature and by way of the question of literature on Christian soil (on French Christian soil), and therefore also a detour by way of the figure of the writer or even of the intellectual in this history of France (of Christian France) – see Derrida 2012, 153-164.

[8] [Cesare Beccaria published the book Dei deletti et delle pene (Of crimes and punishments; Des délits et des peines) in 1764, a comparatively short work in which he argued that the death penalty is neither justifiable nor useful. This argument became a major reference in France for all those who are against the death penalty, from Robespierre to Robert Badinter. But Derrida gave a different reading of Beccaria's book in the third public lecture he gave on September 17, 2001 in China at the invitation of Chung Chi College and the Department of Philosophy of the Chinese University of Hong Kong: "He [Beccaria] was a great man. Nevertheless, he said that the death penalty should be abolished with certain exceptions. The question of the exceptions is also a major issue here; for him the death penalty should be abolished not because it is inhuman, not because it is in principal not provable, but because it is not cruel enough (laughter in audience). He argued that life imprisonment and forced labor are more cruel and, therefore, more con-> ing in the terror of the guillotine. Victor Hugo called for the abolition of the death penalty both in the name of Christianity and in the name of one moment of the French Revolution. Albert Camus was another French author who wrote against the death penalty in his essay "Reflections on the Guillotine." [1957][9] He claimed that in a world in which religion persists, the death penalty will exist; a world without the notions of heaven, promise, and immortality would have no justification for the death penalty. So for him, the end of the death penalty goes along with the end of religion." (Derrida, "Globalization and Capital Punishment" (17 Sept. 2001), in Zhang, 2002, 149).

Derrida quotes, in session four (a session devoted almost entirely to Victor Hugo's various writings against the death penalty), a letter that Hugo during his exile, in 1862, wrote to M. Bost (a pastor in Geneva), on the subject of the death penalty: "Writers of the eighteenth century destroyed torture; writers of the nineteenth, I have no doubt, will destroy the death penalty" (Derrida, 2012, 153). This word "destroys", used with insistence and deliberately twice, remarks Derrida,

> "signifies clearly that it is a question of something other than a simple legislative decision or even of an institutional or constitutional, constituting, act: it is a question, I don't dare say of deconstructing but in any case of destroying, of attacking, through writing, by speaking and by writing publicly, it is a question of attacking the foundations or the presuppositions alleged by the law or by public opinion wherever the bases of this law or the underpinnings of this public opinion, this doxa, or this orthodoxy uphold the death penalty; it is a question of destroying the discursive and other mechanisms, the supports, phantasms, and opinions, the drives, the conscious or semi-conscious or unconscious representations, that work to legitimate the death penalty; and this presupposes a certain type of writing, of public speech, and a certain type of treatment of language (national and international) that has a privileged tie to what in Europe is called literature, as well as to those citizens who have more or less broken with citizenship, who are sometimes ready, as you are going to hear in a moment, to engage in certain acts of civil disobedience, to those citizens of the vincing. We have to be very careful with these arguments. I admire this man, but I have reservations about his arguments." (Zhang, 2002, 150)]. See also Derrida 2012, 291- 295; 355-359.

---

[9] See Camus, "Réflexions sur la guillotine" (1957), 119-170.

world who are called writers." (Derrida, 2012, 153-154).

In session seven (February 9, 2000), he quotes again a letter that Hugo wrote, after the Commune, in 1871, to the attorney for the political prisoners who had been condemned to death:

> "The question that you see as a man of the law, I see as a philosopher. The problem that you elucidate perfectly, and with an eloquent logic, from the point of view of the written law, is illuminated [éclairé] for me with an even higher and more complete light [lumière] by natural law. At a certain level, natural law cannot be distinguished from social law." (Derrida, 2012, 239).[10]

Hugo presents himself, in this letter, as a philosopher, and Derrida will identify with Hugo, the literary writer, surpassing, but as philosopher, Kant.[11]

Derrida concludes the seventh session of his seminar underlining and commenting on several remarks in Hugo's declaration of April 5, 1850, on deportation, to the assembly.[12]

---

[10] Derrida repeats this quotation several times (see Derrida 2012, 197, 201, 239, 241). But how, asks Derrida, "can Hugo both ground his abolitionism in a natural law, an unwritten, non-positive, non-historical law – a philosophical law – that cannot be distinguished from a social law, even as he constantly alleges all the same a kind of evangelical Christinanity? " (Derrida 2012, 239-240).

[11] See Dutoit 2012, 115-121.

[12] ["I believe that we must read this declaration, but I want to put in place first a few historical reminders. One must recall that although abolitionist discourses proliferated in France during the nineteenth century, as they did moreover in the United States—let us never forget this in spite of the dark picture of the United States today (let us not forget that in 1840 the man who founded the New York Tribune had initiated a true abolitionist movement and that in 1845, thus before the French Revolution of 1848, the American Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty was founded. In 1846, Michigan replaces the death penalty by life imprisonment with one exception, once again, and the exception is precisely political treason. In 1852, the state of Rhode Island goes further because it abolishes the death penalty even in the case of treason, which Wisconsin will do a year later. This movement will grow until the end of World War I: North Dakota abolishes the death penalty in 1915; Maine abolishes it in 1876, reinstates it in 1883, abolishes it again in 1887. Six states had abolished it totally by the end of the Great War; others had reduced the sphere of its application, to which one must add a whole history of the modes of execution, from hanging to the electric chair, adopted in 1880 following a campaign organized by General Electric, the "electric chair" already provoking protests, nevertheless, from Thomas Edison among others—and the process is not altogether over.) " (Derrida 2012, 254).] Not a single word about other countries in Europe, no historical

> ["I will underline not only the teleo-theological reconciliation of the Enlightenment of reason or natural law with Christianity, the Christianity of the living and resurrected Christ, of the saved Christ in sum, of the redeemed and redeemer Christ, of the redemption, the simultaneous reconciliation in a Christian Europe of France and of Europe, of the marketplace of interest and of the non-marketplace, of the present and the promise, as "advance" in the sense both of progress and of loan, at the moment Hugo, then, applauds the abolition of the death penalty in political matters by the February Revolution even while he still hopes for the pure and simple abolition he calls for and that is still refused him." (Derrida 2012, 260).]

Hugo describes the decree in 1848 that abolished the death penalty for political crimes :

> "this great thing, this fertile decree that contains the seed of a whole code, this progress which was more than a progress, which was a principle, the Constituent Assembly adopted it and consecrated it. It placed the decree I would almost say at the summit of the Constitution as a magnificent advance[13] made by the spirit of the revolution to the spirit of civilization; like a conquest, but especially like a promise[14]; like a kind of open door that lets penetrate, in the midst of the obscure and incomplete progress of the present, the serene light [lumière] of the future.
>
> And in fact, at a given time, the abolition of capital punishment reminder of Portugal, the first country in Europe to abolish the death penalty in 1867.

---

[13] Derrida comments: ["this word "advance" is magnificent, as always in Hugo, of course, he knows how to write—OK. So the advance is, obviously, progress. It is seduction; revolution seduces civilization. What is one doing when one seduces? One sweeps civilization along. The advance is credit; it makes civilization a loan in advance. "It placed the decree I would almost say at the summit of the Constitution as a magnificent advance made by the spirit of the revolution to the spirit of civilization," and the abolition of the death penalty is always placed on the side of civilization, civilization will progress with the abolition of the death penalty. It is the revolution, it is the spirit of the revolution that can make this advance to the spirit of civilization" (Derrida, 2012, 263).]

[14] Derrida comments: ["The advance is a promise. So Hugo continues to plead so that . . . one more effort, gentlemen republicans, Frenchmen, one more effort, you have abolished the political death penalty, go further. There is here an advance and a promise" (Derrida, 2012, 263).]

> in political matters must bring about and will necessarily bring about[15], by the almightiness of logic[16], the pure and simple abolition of the death penalty! (Yes, yes!)" (Derrida, 2012, 263).

And Derrida ends with this remark: ["It was not yes! yes! at the moment; one will have to wait, yes! yes!; one will have to wait until 1981, that is, a century and a half for this yes! yes! to be consistent with the almightiness of the logic in question." (Derrida 2012, 264).]

In the last session of Derrida's 1999-2000 Death Penalty Seminar, he announces:

> "Without knowing where this seminar is going, one can presume it will always be vain to conclude that the universal abolition of the death penalty, if it comes about one day, means the effective end of any death penalty [...]. Even when the death penalty will have been abolished, when it will have been purely and simply, absolutely and unconditionally, abolished on earth, it will survive; there will still be some death penalty. Other figures will be found for it; other figures will be invented for it, other turns in the condemnation to death, and it is this rhetoric beyond rhetoric that we are taking seriously here. We are taking seriously here all that is condemned, whether it be a life or a door or a window—or whatever or whoever it may be whose end would be promised, announced, prognosticated, decreed, signed like a verdict.
> Let us harbor no illusion on this subject: even when it will have been abolished, the death penalty will survive; it will have other lives in front of it, and other lives to sink its teeth into." (Derrida 2012, 379-380)

This is also our conclusion.

---

[15] Derrida comments: ["here one is going to see the formula that he takes up again elsewhere when he says "I vote for pure and simple abolition"; it already appears in this speech" (Derrida, 2012, 263)],

[16] Derrida comments : [this is not directly the revolution of Christ, it is logic, an irresistible movement of reason, of logos. Implacably, it will take however long it takes; reason will impose it, and between reason and life, there is an alliance here. So, implacable necessity of logic. There is pathos, feeling, heart, etc. In fact, what is almighty in the last instance is logic. No proponent of the death penalty can be in agreement with himself logically, can be in agreement with logic. There is no logic of the death penalty. Thus, the almightiness of logic will end up triumphing. "And in fact, at a given time, the abolition of capital punishment in political matters must bring about and will necessarily bring about by the almightiness of logic" (Derrida, 2012, 263)]

References

Abu-Jamal, Mumia. 1996. En direct du couloir de la mort; translated by Jim Cohen, with a preface by Jacques Derrida. Paris: La Découverte (7-13 for Derrida's preface).

Bernardo, Fernanda. 2005. Souveraineté's – ou la déconstruction de la souveraineté. In Derrida à Coimbra – Derrida em Coimbra. Fernanda Bernardo (ed.). Viseu (Portugal), 441-495.

Camus, Albert. 1957. Réflexions sur la guillotine. In A. Koestler, A. Camus, Réflexions sur la peine capitale. Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 119-170.

Derrida, Jacques. 2001. Globalization and Capital Punishment. September 17, The Chinese University of Hong Kong (in Zhang 2002, 146-152).

_____. 2002. Negotiations. Interventions and Interviews 1971-2001. Elizabeth Rottenberg (trans. and ed.). Stanford Stanford University Press.

_____. 2002a. "Peine de mort et souveraineté (pour une déconstruction de l'onto-théologie politique", Divinatio, No. 15, 13-38.

_____. 2008. Séminaire La bête et le souverain, Volume I (2001-2002). Michel Lisse, Marie-Louise Mallet, and Ginette Michaud (eds.). Paris: Galilée (translated by Geoffrey Bennington: The Beast and the Sovereign, Volume I. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press, 2009).

_____. 2010. Séminaire La bête et le souverain, Volume II (2002-2003. Michel Lisse, Marie-Louise Mallet, and Ginette Michaud (eds.). Paris: Galilée.

_____. 2012 Séminaire La peine de mort. Volume 1 (1999-2000). Geoffrey Bennington, Marc Crépon, Thomas Dutoit (eds.). Paris: Galilée.

_____. 2014. The Death Penalty, Volume 1. Geoffrey Bennington, Marc Crépon, and Thomas Dutoit (eds.); translated by Peggy Kamuf. Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.

Derrida, Jacques and Elisabeth Roudinesco. 2001. Peines de mort. De quoi demain... Dialogue. Paris: Fayard/Galilee, 223-267 (translated by Jeff Fort: Death Penalties. For What Tomorrow ... A Dialogue. Stanford: Stanford University Press (2004), 139-165).

Dutoit, Thomas. 2012. Kant's Retreat, Hugo's Advance, Freud's Erection ; or Derridas's Displacements in his Death Penalty Lectures. The Southern Journal of Philosophy, Volume 50, Spindel Supplement, 107-135.

Kant, Immanuel. 1907 [1797]. Die Metaphysik der Sitten in zwey Theilen. Erster Teil:

Metaphysische Anfangsgründe der Rechtslehre [1797], in Kant's Gesammelte Schriften, vol. VI, ed. Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (Berlin: G. Reimer), 203-373; "Doctrine du Droit", in Métaphysique des Moeurs II, trans. Alain Renaut (Paris: Flammarion, 1994), 7-207; "Doctrine of Right," in The Metaphysics of Morals, trans. and ed. Mary Gregor (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996).

Zhang, Ning. 2002. Jacques Derrida's First Visit to China: A Summary of His Lectures and Seminars. Dao: A Journal of Comparative Philosophy, Vol. II, No. 1 (December), 141-162.

Derrida on Friendship and Sovereignty

For Theresa Calvet de Magalhães

Marcelo Andrade Cattoni de Oliveira[1]

In this explanation, I sketch a deconstruction of the relationship/difference (différance) between law and politics and between politics and democracy, in the sense of a constitutionalism to-come, and this starting with a very symptomatic case: the discussion on the constitutionality of the Proposal of Constitutional Amendment n. 33 (PEC 33), especially about its 3rd article, proposed by Fed. Rep. Nazareno Fonteles (PT-PI) and others.

What I therefore intend to do is not exactly a dialogue with Derrida's considerations about the avenir/future and the possibility of democracy today, especially through the deconstruction that Derrida made of the Schmittian concepts of political and sovereignty, a very open proposal which would allow me to deal specifically with so many questions.

Well, for that, I think I have to begin with a specific issue. I do not want to resume Derrida's considerations in La Bête et le Souverain (2008), in Politiques de l'Amitié (1994) or even in Force de Loi (2005), but somehow show in what sense I propose, along my research on a new history of the Brazilian constitutional process, a dialogue with these considerations and how important they are, from my point of view, to the philosophy of law and the constitutional theory.

The différance between law and justice, between politics and violence, between violence and law, between law and politics, the theme of the foundation - and the constitution - as a promise, the theme of democracy to-come, the deconstruction of the community/fraternity and place of sovereignty, this can all be handled from the ghostly debate on PEC 33, deconstructing the semantics of sovereignty that underlies it.

In this debate on the constitutionality of the PEC 33 therefore the big question is the question of sovereignty in general, of sovereignty of the State in particular - this is what I will try to show below.

[1] Jurisprudence Doctor (UFMG-Brazil). Professor of Constitutional Theory and Legal History (UFMG-Brazil).

With its 3rd article, the PEC 33 wishes to submit decisions of the Supreme Court on the constitutionality of Constitutional Amendments to Congress, and if the Congress will speak out against this decision of the court, it would have to submit such dispute to popular consultation. In other words, what the PEC 33 in its 3rd article proposes, according to the explanatory memorandum that clarifies it, is to submit to Congress and to popular referendums the decisions of the Supreme Court, for the judicial review of Amendments to the Constitution, on the grounds of popular sovereignty.

Some Brazilian Scholars, especially those with eyes fixed on the Canadian experience and the latest critics of authors like Waldron on Dworkin, saw in this proposal the possibility of building a sort of weak judicial review that however would strengthen the democratic experiment. Therefore, for these scholars, if democracy is the expression of self-government, a countermajoritarian institution such as the judicial review would always endanger democracy.

After all, for these authors, is not democracy that form of government whose decisions are taken by majority? However, even where a majority rules, would not the minority have guaranteed rights? If the answer is yes, how, then, to secure rights to minorities, in the face of the decisions of the governing majority? Assigning to an institution, the judiciary, for example, a countermajoritarian power? Thus, every time that majority would hurt rights of the minority, the judiciary would be allowed to protect these rights. But who would authorize, in a democracy, the judiciary, which is not even elected to control the majority decisions that allegedly violate the rights of minorities? Answer: The constitution. But why does a constitution authorize the judiciary to control decisions made by the majority, so that they do not infringe the rights of minorities? The constitution, in these terms, would not be against democracy? Answer: No, if we understand that the constitution has not been established either by the majority or the minority, but by the nation. The nation, therefore, above the majorities and minorities, is the one that sovereignly establishes the state constitution so that, within the state, decisions made by the majority do not violate the rights of minorities. The nation is the foundation of all power and all authority. But who authorizes the nation to establish a constitution, which authorizes the judiciary to control majority decisions so that these decisions do not violate the rights of minorities? The nation itself. Because it would involve a matter of fact, not of law, or at least, not "positive" law, or perhaps "moral" law, since all law is established by the nation? There is no law without nation. But if the nation makes law, who creates the nation? A nation is created. But how as a nation is created? By a fatality of history or does history have an immanent meaning? Anyway, how a "fact" is stated as a nation endowed with sovereignty, to establish a constitution, which authorizes the judiciary to control the majority, which makes its decisions, as long as they do not injure the rights of the minority? A nation imposes itself by its own sovereignty. In the end, that is, in the beginning, is sovereignty itself, i.e., a force that all subjects and does not submit itself to anyone. But why would the nation wants to establish a state constitution in which, on one hand, the decisions were taken by the majority, and, on the other hand, that majorities could be controlled by the judiciary, so that the majority could not violate the rights of minorities? If the nation is sovereign thus decide, it could have decided otherwise, for example, that the minority rules over the majority, i.e., it could have decided by a government of the few or even a government of a single person? The nation would be forced then to decide for democracy? What makes a nation decide for democracy? Would the nation have, in principle, other options? Why not delegate to one person or the few the power of decision making? Is there an ultimate foundation for this option? Or is it always a choice with some degree of arbitrariness? And making that choice, who interprets the decisions of the nation? Who speaks for the nation? The nation speaks for itself? No, the state does this. The state embodies the nation, represents it in the sense of making it present, for itself and for all. The state is the nation's political representation. And if the state is the political representation of the nation, who represents the state? The government represents the state. And in a democracy, it is the majority who governs. If the government of the majority represents the state and the state represents the nation, ultimately, the government represents the nation itself. Re-presents - the government makes present, actualizes, the nation. Now, if the government of the majority re-presents the nation, if it embodies the role of the nation, what for or why speak of rights for minorities against the decisions of the governing majority, and even more so, decisions which would be controlled by the judiciary, even if it was elected by the majority? How to talk about the constitution which guarantees minorities in the face of the majority if the governing majority itself represents the nation? Constitution, justice, rights, minorities, what for or why all this, if the majority itself governs representing the nation, if the majority embodies the nation, if the majority is therefore the nation in government, if the government is the very representation of national sovereignty? Thus, one can only speak of the constitution, the judiciary and rights in a democracy, only in the very terms established by the decisions of the governing majority that always, in any time, re-presents the nation, makes present the nation even to itself, in such a way that, as in a game of "mirrors" (Hobbes), the majority rule is, thus, identified with the national sovereignty that re-presents itself? And from all this follows that certain institutions, such as the constitution, which guarantees the rights of minorities, would be therefore unmanageable and undemocratic, being precisely countermajoritarian? After all, a constitutional democracy would not be thus a paradoxical union of contradictory principles, to be based, ultimately, on a mere tautology? Or, who knows, maybe democracy should not be reduced to a mere political form of government whose decisions are taken by majority? Or maybe constitutionalism and its guarantee of rights should not be merely taken as countermajoritarian? After all, what is democracy? Is the majority rule? Is the politics of the majority? What is a constitution? Is it a limit on the exercise of power? Is democracy incompatible with a constitution that guarantees rights because it limits the government of the majority? How then deconstruct relations/distinctions, the différance between law and politics, between politics and democracy?

Though I have previously written about the unconstitutionality of the PEC 33, also proposed by the same group of congressmen who want to change the 49 article, V, of the Brazilian Constitution, in order to revoke, by legislative enactments, the Supreme Court decisions that, from the perspective of Congress, violate its legislative prerogatives of that, as well as having published an article, coauthored with Alexandre Bahia and Dierle Nunes (2013), on the proper PEC 33, not yet explored sufficiently semantics of judicial review of constitutionality underlying these two proposals for amendment to the constitution.

Namely: that although the explanatory memorandum to the PEC 33 come to criticize the excesses of legalization of political or judicial activism, since such excesses jeopardize the prerogatives of Congress, directly elected by the sovereign people, however, the assumptions underlying the PEC 33, with regard to the tasks and direction of judicial, do not differ from the own position assumed here criticized as "activist". This is because, ultimately, from the perspective of the explanatory memorandum of the PEC. 33, the control of constitutionality, in a constitutional democracy, the task would be "political" and "legislative", even when performed by a constitutional court. In other words, the PEC 33 just wants to reverse the logic of sovereignty from the court to the legislature without, however, breaking with the logic of sovereignty.

In this sense, it is hardly surprising as this discussion on the constitutionality of the PEC 33 resonate distorted and shuffled the positions of Kelsen (2009) and Schmitt (2008), Kelsen primarily a read from Schmitt, as the "great theme" of the guardian or custodian of constitution.

For the explanatory memorandum to the PEC 33, the judicial review is a Kelsenian legislative activity (either the constitutional court treated legislature negative, positive, alternative or competitor), it would Schmittian one, who embodies the sovereignty say the first and last word on the constitution (in a hyperbolic sense of caring, store - for you - the meaning of the Constitution).

Thus, what appears to be a sort of combination extremely inconsistent positions of Kelsen and Schmitt leads to a paradox. After all, on the one hand, Kelsen legislative activity is (also) legal, and, secondly, Schmitt parliament could ever embody the sovereignty and save the constitution (for Schmitt, this task is the Chief of State, who decides on the state of exception, who embodies the unity of sovereignty and who, ultimately distinguish friend and enemy).

After all, what is a democratic constitution? To reflect on this, I propose a very brief dialogue with Luhmann, with Habermas, and especially with Derrida.

The semantic innovation of the concept of modern constitution follows along the process of social modernization law, which might be called temporal displacement on the issue of the validity of the ground right from the past to the future. From the Middle Age's constitution, as a set of legal traditions that conform to the cultural identity of a political society, towards recovery call material constitution, to the modern constitution as "the legal statute of political" and later also as "material measure society" in the sense of Konrad Hesse. But how the modern constitution passes to articulate memory and desire, glimpsing their relationship with time?

Bernard Bailyn, historian of the American Revolution, in The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution (2012), seeks to show how in the course of discussions between the old settlers of North America and the British Parliament on the eve of the break with England, a distinction invented if, between a constitutional right and a right unconstitutional by introducing an asymmetry on the one hand, between a right at the very top right inside, and secondly, the right of others to that top right should undergo under penalty of invalidity/illegality. The colonial laws of Parliament are, from the perspective of the American colonists, unconstitutional because they violate the English constitutional principle of no taxation without representation. A principle of common law that ultimately tell by the way, had taken over the seventeenth century, as well as shows in Maurizio Fioravanti's Costituzione (1999), the jurisprudential justification of the supremacy of the law of the King in Parliament.

The American side of the Atlantic then invented this distinction between a constitutional right and a right that is not right because it is unconstitutional enables therefore the independence process, recognizing on the one hand, the constitution of federalism, as said Hannah Arendt in On Revolution (1963), the institutional basis of a new political society, and secondly, the character of the supremacy of a law is an expression of mutual promise and foundation of a new republic, in other words, the supremacy of this Constitution in face of the legislature at the same time it jurisprudential and traditionally creates - and stresses this constitution federalism - a judicial review of the constitutionality of laws and normative acts of the executive, management, and deployment and the subsequent confirmation of the act foundation, so that the very constitution expressed.

On the French side of the Atlantic the distinction between constituent power and constituted power also seeks to deal with the problem of the absence of an absolute foundation, a tradition that has been lost. The Third Estate is neither constituted nor unconstitutional, is a constituent, says Emmanuel Sieyes. National sovereignty is to introduce a new distinction above all distinctions. A constituent power that expresses the same time, as Luhmann would say, a right and a power paradoxically unlimited self-limit themselves.

This temporal displacement law of the past for the future is seen in Luhmann (2004) as inherent to the positivity of law: the constitution is an evolutionary acquisition, a framework, a structural coupling, which allows a) mutual obligations between law and politics while functionally differentiated systems , b) and thus differentiate politics that is right for politics that is not right, paradoxically reducing complexity and maintaining c) moving the validity issue for the future the extent that any rule of law would be in principle subject to an ex post control of constitutionality. What other words would mean that the foundation of validity of the right moves for the future, for the possibility of a posteriori validation, due to the positivity or recurrence of system operations.

Something, somehow, was already present in the theory of revolution and kelseniana constituent power: in Kelsen, one can only retrospectively, i.e., future talk of the validity of the legal system, since only the future can be seen, condition for assuming the validity of the system, to presuppose the basic norm: condition overall effectiveness.

This temporal displacement of the right, from the past to the future, is reconstructed in Habermas (2005) and the opening of the constitution for the future. In his debate with Frank Michelman on the problem of the foundation, while legal and political, constitutional democracy, which refers to the very plausibility of the historical point of view of the theory of internal relation between the rule of law and democracy, Habermas maintains the position whereby to interpret the search for a moment and constituent own risk in this quest for a return to infinity as the requirement of understanding the character of openness to the future of democratic constitutions, not the pursuit of a closure point in the past , a kind of legal or political fiat. I.e., that they, democratic constitutions, can be interpreted as a political and social process of long-term learning in the course of historical time, subject to stumbling but able to correct itself. What ultimately relativizes the distinction between constituent power and constituted power, since the exercise of their public autonomy, over time, citizens themselves can review the material conditions of fair guarantee of the exercise of their private autonomy without however , she could have because the condition itself public autonomy.

This temporal displacement law of the past for the future is deconstructed by Derrida (2005) as the characterization of the foundation as a promise. And promise unachievable in that paradoxically the right never fully coincide with justice and with it, justice will always be the possibility of deconstructing his own distinction, distance, différance with the right.

However, with the design to come in Derrida radicalized a new perspective on the relationship between law and time, which may well be exploited in the direction of the central concerns of an author as Marramao (2005) in his dialogue with the critical distinction between Koselleck field horizon of experience and expectation: the issue of modern hypertrophy of the future at the expense of reducing the loss of the past and the present - the so-called syndrome hurry. Derrida, as we know, in talking to-come (avenir) - openness - and not in the future (futur) - closed.

For if Luhmann still keeps the concern of a sociological description of the law as must-be - is meant, as the standard generalized expectation of behavior, such as conditional program - a must-be due to shifts from past to future duty, even supposing its contingency. And Habermas is rescued, albeit in a post-Hegelian vision, but not necessarily anti-Hegelian, a becoming law, even though he admits his openness to contingency.

In Derrida already can speak from the perspective of justice as deconstruction or permanent possibility of deconstruction, in justice to-come, in his hyperbolic character hyperbolic. But also, and beyond, Derrida, in what would be the constitutionalism to-come. A constitutionalism to-come that its foundation is not simply shifted from the past to the future, but open to-come without conditions. A constitutionalism out of joint, whose legitimacy has never closes, guard or contemporary coincides himself as presence to self: an absence, not a lack, and that opens to "the other of justice", justice as permanent possibility of deconstruction.

As I stated in the work Constitucionalismo e História do Direito [Constitutionalism and Legal History] (2011), "democratic constitutionalism does not necessarily lack legitimacy lived as an ultimate foundation, as a kind of nostalgia that foundation, such as pain and loss obsession ultimate foundation, sovereign, finally, as if an ultimate foundation did lack the democratic constitutionalism. The ultimate foundation and sovereign no fouls. Rather, democratic constitutionalism casts itself as the here and now, to a to-come, a future-in-open design as fallible, but in the sense that this could be the future of a past that now is redeemed by political action, legal, constitutional, that is. This opening leads to the question of legitimacy itself experienced as empty, no more likely to be filled, and how the absence assimilated - and not lack - the ultimate foundation, the legal and political process of building legitimacy by performing time history internal relationship between the notions of self-government and equal rights of individual freedom, realizes a complex notion of autonomy." (Cattoni de Oliveira, 2011: 234-235)

A key to reading and beyond Derrida, I would say, in the context of what could be considered a constitutionalism to come, that right can never be fully identifies with the requirements of constitutionalism's principles, democratic constitution would be the very expression of différance between law and politics, on the one hand, and politics and democracy on the other... This is because the democratic constitution, the point of view of a coming constitutionalism, law and politics, but politics and democracy, are involved at the same time that differs from each other. Such understanding has therefore implications for the understanding of constitutional democracy: for if this is différance lived as a permanent tension, "the identity of the constitutional subject" (the three-way subject, i.e., subject, subjugated and matter) (Michel Rosenfeld) never be closed: an identity is not identical to itself, does not present himself - it is always to-come...

O mes amis (constitutionalistes et*) démocrates...*

References

Arendt, Hannah. On Revolution. New York: The Viking Press, 1963.

Bailyn, Bernard. The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. 2 ed. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2012.

Cattoni de Oliveira, Marcelo Andrade (org.) Constitucionalismo e História do Direito. Belo Horizonte: Pergamum, 2011.

Cattoni de Oliveira, Marcelo Andrade; Bahia, Alexandre Gustavo Melo Franco; Nunes, Dierle. Controle de constitucionalidade é judicial, não político. http://www.conjur.com.br/2013-abr-30/sistema-controle-constitucionalidade-judicial-nao-politico Derrida, Jacques. Politiques de l'amitié. Paris: Galilée, 1994.

Derrida, Jacques. Force de Loi: Le "fondement mystique" de l'autorité. Paris: Galilée, 2005.

Derrida, Jacques. Séminaire La Bête et le Souverain. Volume 1 (2001-2002), Paris: Galilée, 2008.

Fioravanti, Maurizio. Costituzione. Bologna: Il Mulino, 1999.

Kelsen, Hans. Pure Theory of Law. New Jersey: The Lawbook Exchange, 2009.

Marramao, Giacomo. Potere e secularizzazione: La categorie del tempo. Torino: Bollatti Boringhieri, 2005.

Habermas, Jürgen. Constitutional democracy: a paradoxical union of contradictory principles? In: Sadursky, Wojciecl (ed.). Constitutional Theory. Aldershot: Dartmouth, 2005, 69-84.

Schmitt, Carl. Constitutional Theory. Durham: Duke University Press, 2008.

The concept of person as an emergent phenomenon

Fabio Queiroz Pereira[1]
Jordhana Mª V. V. C. Costa Gomes[2]

Abstract: The definition of person hasn't still been satisfactorily agreed upon in scientific studies or in those of a philosophical nature. In the field of Law the concept is even weaker. However, it appears that person is an elementary concept as well as one of great practical influence. In the field of Jurisprudence, one is able to reflect upon some of the repercussions that a renewed definition could lead to. Questions related to studies on embryos, to the criminalisation of abortion or even euthanasia could have different answers, whose principal variable would be in the determination of the said concept. At the same time, many of the definitions of person are linked to the idea of rationality: the human being is a rational being, which distinguishes it from other animals. Yet this premise can lead to the formulation of a new inquiry: what makes organised material produce thought? Understanding this phenomenon is a quite complex task. Science doesn't offer the necessary subsidies and concepts based purely on metaphysics are of no use at all to those in the field of Law. In seeking definitions and answers, the article shall attempt to bring an important element to the discussion: the understanding of person as an emergent phenomenon. Among other varied aspects, one of the fundamental concerns of some supporters of the theory of emergentism is the elaboration of a new concept of person, based on basic and conceptual assumptions of the phenomenon of emergence. In accordance with such scholars, it is impossible to have a good understanding of the concept of person without having a prior, comprehensive understanding of the emergentist idea and reality. After all, human life itself can be genuinely classified as an emergence. Bearing that in mind, the reasoning of Christian Smith in his work "What is a person?" will be discussed. Its basic fundamentals and its construction of person as an emergent phenomenon will be discussed, aiming to find a suitable outline for the subject. As a result, some of the principles of emergentism will be methodically outlined, detailing its elementary philosophical assumptions, for the subsequent understanding of the concept of person as an emergent phenomenon. For this purpose, the differences between emergentism and reductionism will be highlighted, as well as the relationship between the concept of emergence and the current definition of person.

[1] Ph.D. candidate in Civil Law at Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Holds a Master's degree in Civil Law from Universidade de Coimbra and a Bachelor's degree in Law from Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Professor of Civil Law at IBMEC-MG and Milton Campos Law School. Lawyer.

[2] Master in Civil Law from Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Holds a Bachelor's degree in Law from Milton Campos Law School. Sponsored CNPq researcher. Voluntary Civil Law teacher at the Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Lawyer.

Keywords: Emergence; person; concept of person.

1 Introduction

The definition of what a person is still finds no peaceful understanding in scientific or philosophical studies. In the field of Law, this concept proves to be even more shallow, according to Brunello Stancioli (2010, p. 27):

> The concept of person is one of the most important concepts of western Law. Paradoxically, almost zero legal studies have sought, with appropriate depth, to elucidate historical and successive theoretical increments about the topic. Most scholars consider the idea to be innate, that is, the notion of person would be something given, that has always existed.

It is noted, however, that person is a basic concept of great practical influence. In the sphere of Jurisprudence, it is possible to outline some of the repercussions that could result in a renewed definition. Questions relating to embryo research, the criminalization of abortion or euthanasia could have different answers, which would be the main variable in determining the aforementioned concept.

Many definitions of person are linked to the idea of rationality: the human being is a rational being, which is the main element that differentiates it from other animals. However, this assumption can lead to a new question: what causes organized matter to produce thoughts? Understanding this phenomenon reveals itself as too complex a job. Science does not provide the necessary subsidies for that and the conceptions supported in pure metaphysics are useless for dealing with the Law.

In search of answers and definitions, an important element can be brought into discussion: the understanding of the person as a phenomenon in emergence. Among various other aspects, a key concern of some proponents of emergentist theory is to develop a new concept of personhood, starting from the basic assumptions and conceptual phenomenon of emergence. According to these scholars, it is impossible to understand the concept of person without thoroughly understand the idea and the emergentist reality. After all, human life itself can be classified genuinely as an emergence.

In this article we intend to draw some of the bases of emergentism, its elementary assumptions, for further understanding of the concept of the person as a phenomenon in emergence. In order to do this, we highlighted the differences between emergentism and reductionism, as well as the relationship between the concept of emergence and the current definition of person.

2 The bases of emergentism

Between the mid-nineteenth and early twentieth century, in a context in which the debate about the philosophical framework of evolutionary theory was intensified, a theory directed to the first systematic formulation of physicalism or non-reductive materialism appeared. According to some authors, the first philosophical support about emergence is found in John Stuart Mill's treatise A System of Logic, published in 1843. Although he did not use the term emergence itself, Mill stated that some chemical phenomena and even life were associated to the failure of the principle of Composition of Causes. He thus concluded that the effects of the causes are additive and not just mere junctions (BEDAU, HUMPHREYS, 2008, p. 11).

This was later named emergentism, which, according to Christian Smith (2010, p 23), is an anti-dualistic conception. That is, a strategy or method developed to explain the existence of many different qualities and characteristics in a unified and not dualistic reality.

Also according to the author, an emergence is a process of building a new organization, independent and autonomous from the interaction of features existing in other entities. The phenomenon, however, is not susceptible of explanation by only the entities that originated it, leading to the conclusion that the whole is bigger than the sum of its parts (SMITH, 2010, p. 26).

Following this reasoning, Mark Bedau and Paul Humphreys (2008, p. 1-59, 411-425) say emergence is a result of the interaction of the large number of elements that compose it. It is, therefore, the phenomenon that "arises" and depends on some basic phenomena that are also simultaneously autonomous from the base. Likewise, Mario Bunge (2010), developing an emergentist view about the self, corroborates the idea that emergent properties are those that characterize a system as a whole with properties that are not found in the components when isolated.

From what we can infer that the phenomenon of emergence necessarily presupposes the existence of two or more components interacting with each other and forming a new entity entirely autonomous and peculiar. In fact, this new entity carries characteristics and properties entirely different from those which originated it, so that it is impossible for them to be reduced to the former ones again. And this is precisely because this new entity is not merely a junction of such components but rather the result of the combination that took place between them.

A classic example, repeated among scholars of the subject, as well as simple and quite enlightening, is the one that explains the composition and operation of the water molecule. In fact, the mere observance of its components alone is enough to demonstrate the emergence of this molecule. Isolatedly, hydrogen and oxygen have completely different characteristics from those of water. For example, oxygen and hydrogen, isolatedly, are highly combustible. But, when combined in the ratio of two hydrogen atoms to one oxygen atom (water formula) they are no longer able to generate fire, becoming, to the contrary, very efficient in extinguishing it due to the moisture gain with the mutual interaction. Which, according to Christian Smith (2010, p. 27), means that the key to the understanding of emergence is not to focus on the unfolding of something, but rather in the great potential of something to become something else that it never was.

Thus, it is easy to distinguish the emergentist thinking from the reductionist thinking, since the latter considers everything as simply the sum of its components. Thereby, the molecule of water, for example, depending on the amount of energy involved, cannot acquire totally different properties. However, for the reductionists, water is the sum of hydrogen and oxygen, or, in other words, the identity of something is reduced to the sum of its components, while, according to emergentist theories, isolated analysis of the components of something is just the study of the composition of matter (decay process) and not the definition.

Thus the statement that emergence is not merely descriptive, like reductionism, but rather explanatory and thorough. Emergence therefore presupposes the lack of conditions to explain the completion of the whole from its parts, that is, it is a non ontological tool to understand the result of it.

For Michael Polanyi (apud SMITH, 2010, p. 28), reductionists do not admit what is most extraordinary in reality: the fact that emerging entities are completely autonomous, which is the reason why it is impossible to reduce them to the elements that originated them through their interaction. It explains something very logic and noticeable: nobody derives from vocabulary, for example. According to Polanyi, the correct use of grammar does not influence a good conversational style, nor a good conversational style provides contents for a good "chat" since it is impossible to represent the principles of organization of higher levels by the laws governing its particulars.

In its core, then, what emergentism asserts is the confusion that reductionism makes about basic scientific inquiries. In fact, reductionists confuse the question "what is it?" with the question "what is it made of?". They want to reduce reality to the sum of its components, which is practically impossible when we think of organized matter generating thoughts (a person).

After all, thoughts are not defined simply by the sum of neurons, external environment and personal convictions. They are something much more complex and very difficult to understand.

3 Types of emergence

Some authors intend to present different classifications on the phenomenon of emergentism. Thus, some definitions are brought in dualistic character, performing a contrast between different conceptions of emergence. At this point, the ideas of weak emergence and of strong emergence, as well as the concepts of responsive emergence and proactive emergence all stand out.

On the first form of classification mentioned, the issue is clarified through doctrinal constructions of David Chalmers. The author draws the outline between weak emergence and strong emergence, which, unlike what it seems at first, is not related to intensity, but to quality. About weak emergence Chalmers (2006, p. 244) states:

> We can say that a high-level phenomenon is weakly emergent with > respect to a low-level domain when the high-level phenomenon arises from the low-level domain, but truths concerning that phenomenon are unexpected given the principles governing the low-level domain.

About strong emergence, on the other hand, the author (CHALMERS, 2006, p. 244) explains:

> We can say that a high-level phenomenon is strongly emergent with respect to a low-level domain when the high-level phenomenon arises from the low-level domain, but truths concerning that phenomenon are not deducible even in principle from truths in the low-level domain.

And that is why we conclude that weak emergence presupposes an easy way of understanding the system that created it, while when it comes to strong emergence, one cannot, in any way, explain or understand the phenomenon that created it. It is, therefore, in addition to this, that it can be stated that a leading example of strong emergence is the mind, due to the utter impossibility of understanding the phenomenon of the emergence of thought (CHALMERS, 2006, p. 246).

Another classification of the phenomenon of emergence is presented by Christian Smith and can be added to the duality strong emergence x weak emergence. It is the contrast between responsive emergence and proactive emergence. The first kind is linked to situations in which the object is produced by emerging external forces or agents. The new being or object has in its composition the elements responsible for emergence. A painting, for example, represents this situation, given that the painter is the agent that causes the phenomenon and is external to the emerging object. About responsive emergence, Christian Smith (2010, p.86) assumes that "emergence is responsive insofar as it exists as a response to the operations achieved by another's agency. In short, responsively emergent entities are the objects of emergent processes and outcomes caused and guided by another agency or force". Proactive emergence, in its turn, is qualified by cases in which the agent that produces the phenomenon is part of the composition of the emerging entity. In this case, the agent is the subject of an emergent process, but is also a result. Consequently, human beings could be considered a proactive emergence, considering that the elements that produce them are part of their own composition. In the words of Smith (2010, p. 86), "proactive emergence involves cases in which the agency of the emergent operations resides in the emergent entity. Here the emergent entities are the subjects of the emergent processes and outcomes on which they depend".

After this brief overview about emergentism, we move on to an analysis of this theory related to the concept of person.

4 Person and Emergence

One of the few authors to make the contrast between emergence and personhood was American sociologist Christian Smith. In his work entitled "What is a person?" he deals with some assumptions about emergentism, and then come to his conception of the concept of person.

In carrying out this task, Smith (2010, p. 42) draws up a list of thirty human capacities, which are emergencies arising from the interaction of the human body with the environment in which it is inserted. These capacities would be causal, since they are responsible for providing the human being with peculiar characteristics, causing mental or material phenomena, which, in turn, influence objects and events in the world. Similarly, these human capacities materialize distinguishing factors of our species when contrasted with other animals. A primate, for example, would not hold all the designed total capacities.

Among the capacities identified by the author, some examples can be cited, namely consciousness, mental representation, emotions, ability to perceive causal attributions, creativity, use of language, self-transcendence, abstract reasoning, moral conscience, aesthetic judgment, among many other capacities. Smith tries to deal with each one of these elements, defining them and grouping them according to their dependency from other factors. The thirty human causal capacities are conceived, then, as the bases from which human personhood exists in an emergence. According to Smith (2010, p. 60), it is not possible to specify the exact settings through which human capacities interact to give rise to personhood. Such a specification would not be subject to a mathematical formula or verbal description.

On the other hand, the author tries to present a formulation of the concept of person: "By person I mean a conscious, reflexive, embodied, self-transcending center of subjective experience, durable identity, moral commitment, and social communication who exercises complex capacities for agency and intersubjectivity in order to develop and sustain his or her own incommunicable self in loving relationships with other personal selves and with the non-personal world". (SMITH, 2010, p. 61).

From the definition presented it is possible to point out some criticism about the theoretical construct of Christian Smith.

The first thing that draws attention is the randomness in the choice of thirty human capacities from which personhood would emerge. There is no criteria whatsoever, indicating, in fact, a simple choice of what the author thinks should be the essence of the human person. In addition, some of the elements identified carry in themselves an excessive degree of subjectivity, as the ability to seek the truth, or the ability of interpersonal communion and love, or even the ability to formulate an identity.

Another debatable issue is the fact that Smith's thesis is based on the concept of normality. The author even states that his work is based on the idea of a normal person, meaning a human being who does not have serious psychiatric or mental damage nor any serious deterioration in their functional capabilities (SMITH, 2010, p. 45). Although Smith provides a definition of normality, it seems inconceivable that a scientific study is based on what is normal or not, because of the complete absence of parameter in his conception.

Some elements of his concept of person stand out to the lack of congruence.

The question of durable identity is rather a questionable point in view of the new theoretical constructs about this concept. For example, Derek Parfit (1970), with his conception, believes that personal identity is constructed through permanent interactive relationships around facts that ensure psychological continuity and psychological connectedness, whether of the person with itself or of human individuals in space and time. Thus it would not even be possible to speak of a durable identity, considering the current conceptual renewal which the topic is passing through.

Saying that every person is a central moral commitment is another point that seems to be inappropriate when it comes to scientific research. Qualifying a definition which will serve as the basis for several sciences, connected to morality, denotes some uncertainty of a conceptual standpoint. Judgments guided by the presence or absence of moral commitment do not serve to qualify an entity as a person, especially when this interrelationship is performed in the field of Jurisprudence.

Finally, a person, for Christian Smith, would ultimately be a center of purposes, identified as the development and maintenance of the person's own incommunicable self in loving relationships with other personal selves with the impersonal world. This main purpose is considered without any scientific basis. For the author, everyone would have as their main purposes primary protection and preservation of their individuality from personal relationships. However, the purpose of a person may be one in millions and this assumption of the self preservation is not confirmed by reality.

Thus, Christian Smith's emergentist theory and his definition of person do not hold water. The absence of appropriate parameters and the excessive permeability to morality issues seem to disqualify the theoretical construction.

Despite his doctrine's lack of success, some points should be considered as positive, as, for example, the reflection about the person as a center, which denotes an option for the use of systematic thought. The human being has its own organization, considering whether cells of vital organs, or each of the functions performed by our body. This organization has its center in the human brain, which is responsible for not allowing a dispersion of the parts that form a person. Thus, working from that perspective seems to be essential, and this is achieved by sociologist Christian Smith.

Another important point is the idea that a person is an embodied center, in other words, a person depends on a bodily materiality for its operation. Despite the advances of science, it is still not possible to imagine a person without the existence of any physical support. The material and immaterial duality remain in the conception of the human being, since we still cannot think of a person as something not tangible, not designed as matter.

The qualification of a person while an emerging phenomenon is also a positive point. However, the basis for the phenomenon of emergence should be thought in a different way. There is no reason to assume that thirty capacities can generate a person. In fact, the person is in the higher-level, but the lower-level is not yet identifiable. The idea of emergentism must be kept and explored. Characterizing the person as emergence can bring new solutions to old situations experienced by humans.

5 Conclusion

Considering the emergence as a result of the impossibility of explaining the whole by the parts - as intended by reductionists – it becomes relevant and essential to understand a person as an emergent phenomenon. Based on this reasoning, a reformulation of the concept of person which allows the view of such entity in all its particulars should be thought.

According to the typology first presented, it is possible to qualify the person (higher-level) as a strong emergence, due to the current absolute impossibility of fully understanding the interaction that took place between the components that formed it (lower-level). Likewise, following the second criterion presented, a person can be characterized as a proactive emergence, considering that the elements that originate it form part of its own composition. There is no external agent to the emergent process, which would qualify it as a responsive emergence.

Finally, the concept of person presented by Christian Smith is liable to severe criticism, mainly due to the randomness of the criteria used and the judgments of morality inserted into his speech. However, a few points stand out and should be kept, as the conception of person as a center (system) and as an emergence. From these bases, new concepts can be formulated, helping bring new light to legal issues currently under debate.

References

BEDAU, MA.; HUMPHREYS, P. Emergence: contemporary readings in philosophy and science. Cambridge: M.I.T. Press, 2008.

BUNGE, M. Matter and mind: a philosophical inquiry. Nova York: Springer, 2010.

CHALMERS, DJ. Strong and weak emergence. In: CLAYTON, P.; DAVIES, P. (Org.) The re-emergence of emergence: the emergentist hypothesis from science to religion. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006.

MARÇAL, AC. Posfácio: pessoa e identidade pessoal. In: STANCIOLI, B. Renúncia ao exercício do direito da personalidade ou como alguém se torna o que quiser. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2010.

PARFIT, D. Personal Identity. In: The Philosophical Review, Vol. 80, No. 1, Jan., 1970.

ROMANO, G. Imagens da juventude na era moderna. In: LEVI, G.; SCHMIDT, J. (Org.). História dos jovens 2: a época contemporânea. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1996.

SMITH, C. What is a person? Rethinking humanity, social life, and the moral good from the person up. 1st ed. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 2010.

STANCIOLI, B. Renúncia ao exercício de direitos da personalidade. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2010.

Nicomachean Ethics and the theory of Justice as the centerpiece of thearistotelian anthropology

Marcella Furtado de Magalhães Gomes[1]

Roberto Vasconcelos Novaes[2]

Abstract: The article lies within the philosophy of Law and claims that the Nicomachean Ethics is, indeed, a book in which Aristotle presents us his theory of justice. Justice, according to Aristotle, is the central and architectonic virtue of thepolis. Therefore, it is the mean of realization of the purpose (and, as such, of the good) of the individual and of the whole community, i.e., justice is the virtue that leads men to the achievement of their ends as human beings, the eudaimonia. To do so, we discuss the Aristotelian justice in its concept, its species and its characterization as an ethic virtue, as well as its relationship with the law, with the ethical paideia and the equity. Our conclusion is that men can only fulfill their ends as human beings by internalising the heteronomous good expressed in the ethically constituted nomos, i.e. the virtue of Justice, and by the conscious exteriorization of this good in their own respective praxeis. In short, men may only become complete while ethical beings as they live in ethical communities, i.e., in politically and legally organized communities. Our survey is intrinsically theoretical and hermeneutical and our focus relies on the bibliographical production.

Keywords: Philosophy – Ethics – Aristotle – Justice –Universal Justice – Particular Justice – Distributive Justice – Corrective Justice – law – Paideia – Equity – Polis – raison d'être.

1. Introduction

[1] Doutora e Mestre em Filosofia do Direito pela Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Profa. da Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais, Faculdade de Direito, Dep. de Direito do Trabalho e Introdução ao Estudo do Direito.

[2] Doutor e Mestre em Filosofia do Direito pela Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Prof. do IBMEC Minas Gerais, Curso de Direito.

Following the ethical itinerary of Aristotle, i.e., the understanding of the subject, of the object and of the mechanism of the ethical action, we can glimpse a system that captures and exposes the intelligibility of the ethical action in three different moments.

The first one shows the desire as the principle of the animal movement and thereby does not ignore the animal nature of men. Desire is to want something due to the pleasure that comes from experience.

The second relates to the intervention of the reason by controlling the desire and fixing the right rule of human action which enables its contemplative activity.

At last, the acquisition of the habit by men involves the interaction between the individual reason and the heteronomous good that the law contains. This process of habits development will form in men the principle of the particular action and the consciousness of its virtue.

The universal justice prescribes obedience to the law because the law contains all the ethical virtues. Moreover, the law is a concrete tool of virtuous habit formation because it aims to everyone equally and it has binding force.

The reception of the content of the law does not take place passively. Insofar as the agent internalizes the law he also rationally judges the values that it carries and, therefore, when he decides to act according to its commandments he does so consciously. Thus, consistent obedience to the law is, to the Stagirite, the habit capable of forming in the subject the awareness of his actions.

Therefore, we argue that the Nicomachean Ethics is, indeed, a book on justice (dikaiosunh[3]). The ultimate good of human life is only achievable if we are raised by a just paideia and in a just polis. So, justice is the essential condition to the self-realization of the individual and the polis. And that's what we intend to demonstrate by the explanation of justice as treated by Aristotle on the Nicomachean Ethics.

In short, Justice is a necessary condition for the fulfillment of the human purpose, because: a) self-sufficiency is not achievable by oneself; b) all humans are rational beings and therefore have the equal right to pursue their own purposes; c) no man in this community of equal and rational men that pursue their ends could be submitted to the will of others. Only Justice establishes a social order where all are submitted to the law and not to the will of others and where all the goods and duties are equally distributed among men and this is what allow men to achieve their purposes.

[3] Check BAILLY, 1950, p. 510 (dikaiosunh , dikaio ς).

2. Ethical virtues

Virtue, to the Greeks, is the disposal of the being towards excellence. Etymologically speaking, virtue (areth) means strength, power, power of something, a way to be because it has a capability or ability to be this way, that which perfects something, that which makes something to be what it is or it should be (FERRATER MORA, 2000, p. 3027-3030).

A virtue is not a feeling or a faculty. When we experience an emotion, such as joy or fear, or when we exercise a faculty present in us due to our own constitution and natural conformation - and in this way independent of our decision - we are not judged as good or bad persons for having these feelings or for doing something that we cannot do differently, i.e., these behaviors cannot be judged as good or bad. Feelings and faculties do not require choice, a decision to exercise them. They are sensitive affections or innate abilities that manifest themselves without our intervention.

Virtue is not due to human nature, because we are not born virtuous. Virtue is not contrary to human nature either, since we are able to acquire it. Virtue is a disposition of the soul, the result of the development of a capacity by the performance of this same power, a performance that implies a choice. Virtue is a possibility inherent to men that will manifest itself in our actions in due course. When our actions are the conscious externalization of what is appropriate according to the nature and the purpose of men, and then they could be considered virtuous actions.

In performing the peculiar function of its nature, i.e., the activity of the soul in accordance with reason, men is gifted with virtues. Reason participates in the sensitive faculty of the soul controlling impulses and desires and forming a rational principle of action by assessing the singular conditions of our actions in the real world. Reason also acts by itself revealing the intelligible traits of the existence and creating general concepts about the being. So, Aristotle divides human virtues on ethics and noetic-dianoetics, respectively.

3. Justice

Justice, according to the Stagirite, is the only of the ethical virtues that is practiced in the social relations. What is just is not revealed by the individuality of the action, but it only can be discovered in its consequences, in how it affects another rational being's life, another being that is our equal because it shares our specific feature as beings, reason. Justice realizes the balance among men because it assigns what is appropriate to each one of them in their social relations according to reason.

If we are all rational beings and as such we must act in accordance to our rational nature in order to achieve our purpose, eudaimonia, so we are all entitled to seek suitable means for this end, as well as we are all entitled to do what we believe is necessary to reach this goal. However, in doing so there may be overreaching of some that will harm others and thereby will break the equality between them. Justice is responsible for ordering the reciprocal action of men in the community in order to equally allow all of them achieve virtue. Justice is the guarantee of equality between all rational beings.

The research of justice must answer two questions: a) what is justice, what kind of ethic virtue it is, i.e., it is a rational mean to what appetite?; b) which is the right action towards the other rational being, i.e., how men should act in social life?

Aristotle states that in ordinary language there are two meanings for justice. According to him, when someone disobeys the laws we call him unjust and when someone is wicked or greedy, when someone wants to get more goods than he deserves and by questionable means we call him unjust. Thereby, we can infer two ways by which men are said to be just: when they obey the laws and when they want only their share of the social goods. The first meaning Aristotle calls universal justice, and the second particular justice (NE, V, 1, 1129 a 27 – 1129 b 1).

Justice therefore has two meanings. First it is the establishment of general criteria, to everyone equally mandatory, for the righteousness the individual action in accordance to the collective reason. Second, it is the observance of righteousness of the content of these standards and of the behaviors of the individuals in relation to those standards. Therefore, when we refer to someone or something as fair, we can be emphasizing the compatibility of their actions with the requirements and regulations standing in that community, i.e., one who obeys the law. We can also be highlighting the very content of those laws or the intent embedded in the behavior of the subjects of that community. We are assessing whether the rules of that community effectively represent what is right in the eyes of reason,i.e., if the laws and the individuals of this community are in concrete virtuous (ROSS, 1957, p. 298):

1. To assign to each of its members the right amount of duties and goods.
2. If their subjects effectively want for themselves only their share of the assets (and losses) of the community.

4. Universal justice

Universal justice is the citizen's compliance with the law (nomoi)[4]. It happens when the individual action is in accordance with the law established by the competent authority designated by the social community. Just is to obey the law and unjust is to cross it[5].

It is necessary to emphasize the importance given by the Greeks, and in particular Aristotle, to the role of the legal rules in a community. The social life is essential for the full human development and the only mean of ensuring social solidarity is the imposition of equal limits to individuals in their social relations.

The legal rules of a community are created for the promotion of social harmony, for equitably distribute the goods of the city and as the best way to solve possible conflicts among citizens. The content of these rules stems from the social facts that are rationally evaluated by this community. In a community, what we deem precious must be protected, and what we believe to be vicious spurned. The laws aim to the common good and, in this regard, they order the practice of certain acts and they prohibit the practice of others. Those are not any acts, but those that the community thought, spontaneous or methodically, to be convenient or valuable and ultimately necessary for the proper existence of all. Therefore the law is the vehicle of fulfillment of all the virtues and of prohibition of all vices. The universal justice is the highest virtue, because it represents the actual practice of all other virtues, it is the perfect virtue (NE, V, 1, 1129 b 26 – 35)[6].

[4]The word nomoς covers, beyond the modern legal sense, any existing regulation of human behavior whether it is moral, social or strictly legal. We are referring here to the ordering of human conducts through rules set out by custom or by political power. Check Bailly, 1950, p. 1332.

[5] This is the formulation of legal justice established for the first time by Socrates in the way that Plato tells us in the Crito. On the correlation between Aristotelian thought on justice and the platonic one check out: MACINTYRE, 1991, p. 101-116.

The universal justice identifies itself with the law and with all the other virtues as a whole because for Aristotle the political community exists to foster the fulfillment of its citizens, the eudaimonia. The law, therefore, also aims to promote eudaimonia. Hence the law cannot be established by the whim of its creator. It must be created to enable all men

[6]In our times, the legal science distinguishes between law and moral exactly because of the externality of the first. To the law it doesn't matter the motivation of action but only its accordance with the prescribed one. To moral and also to the Aristotelian theory, a man is virtuous only when he practices the action consciously of his virtue and taking it willingly as an end of his action. However, there is no contradiction between universal justice and the praxis of all ethical virtues. The man who obeys the law unintentionally is in the process of acquiring the ethical habit and by the repeated practice of the law he will make his appetite rectified and tending to the good. The habit is, for Aristotle, the route of acquisition of virtue. Although at first, the conduct of the person is not motivated by his belief in the virtue of the behaviors ordered by the law but only by the social coercion, by doing so, i.e., by continually obeying the law he rectifies his motivation and makes it conscience and will of the good. On the distinction between interiority and exteriority of moral norms and legal rules Bobbio clarifies: "Rispetto al rapporto tra soggeto attivo e passivo, si distinguono gli imperativi autonomi da quelli eteronomi. Si dicono autonomi quegli imperativi in cui colui che pone la norma e colui che la eseguisce sono la stessa persona. Si dicono eteronomi quelli in cui colui che pone la norma e colui che la eseguisce sono due persone diverse. […] La distinzione tra imperativi autonomi ed eteronomi ha importanza per lo studio del diritto, perché ha costituito uno dei tanti criteri con cui si è voluto distinguere la morale dal diritto. Seguendo Kant, si è detto che la morale si risolve sempre in imperativi autonomi e il diritto in imperativi eteronomi, dal momento che il legislatore morale è interno e il legislatore giuridico è esterno. In altre parole, questa distinzione vorrebe suggerire che quando ci comportiamo moralmente, non ubbidiamo ad altri che a noi stessi, quando invece agiamo giuridicamente ubbidiamo a leggi che ci sono imposte da altri." (1958, p. 100-102).

to achieve their excellence. Only the law creates the necessary conditions for the practice of the virtues, ethics and dianoetics. Only the perfect social regulation can allow men to achieve their best as human beings.

5. Particular justice

If universal justice is the synthesis of all ethical virtues in the law, specifically the particular justice is another ethical virtue that also participates in the universal one. We all desire and feel pleasure with the possession of the benefits (and non-participation in the duties) that social life offers us. However there is a fair measure imposed by reason of what each one of us should get. When the individual wants only the proper limit of collective goods, Aristotle calls him just in this particular sense.

His definition of this virtue operates by inversion. Aristotle relies on the specific unjust to bring out the particular just. All vices are unjust acts in a legal sense of breaches of the law, but are also specific addictions (cowardice, lust) in relation to a certain ethical virtue (courage, temperance). Aristotle says that the cause of particular injustice is the pleasure that arises from excessive gain(NE, V, 2, 1130b 19-22).

The unjust act strictly occurs when the practice of actions contrary to the law is driven by an unchecked urge of gain. When a person performs any act for the benefit of gain something that is not due to him by the law,his action is regarded as unfair in the specific sense. Particular injustice is to want more than what you are entitled to, i.e., iniquity[7].

[7]The Greek word used to describe the particular unjust is pleonexia (pl*eonexia)*. Vlastos explains the meaning of the Greek word: "For since pl*eonexia* is 'having more', i.e. more than what is rightfully one's own ('what belongs to one'), to 'have what belongs to others' would be to perpetrate pleonexia, and to 'be deprived of one's own' would be to suffer it." (1981, p. 119-120). The notion is common to all the Greek philosophers however in Aristotle it acquires legal-ethical sense inasmuch as for him the law is which establishes what belongs to each one: "justice is the excellence through which everybody enjoys his own possessions in accordance with the law; its opposite is injustice, through which men enjoy the possessions of others in defiance of the law." (Retoric, I, 9, 1366 b 9 – 11). There are three theoretical approaches about the meaning of pleonexia in Aristotle. Hardie (1980, p. 187) believes that the philosopher has in mind the desire for excessive profits. However, wanting surplus goods is the definition of greed or the vice of liberality. Moreover, if there is something like asking too much of profits there is also it's opposite, i.e., wanting less than due of profits. We could then speak of injustice by excess and deficiency and in this last sense the subject would be unfair to himself. But Aristotle denies

The unjust action in particular is characterized by the lack of limit to desire for gain. It is natural that we want to own property, and it is right that we wish it up to certain boundaries. When we are able to discern these constraints, to grasp that we cannot have it all, our desire is under the rational control. Rather, when we desire boundless earnings, when our will is not disrupted in front of anything or anyone else, our appetite is unjust.

All that is wicked is unlawful. Everything that is unjust in particular is universally unjust too, but not everything that is unlawful is wicked because not all actions of disobedience to the law feature the particular unjust; they may represent other addictions(ROSS, 1957, p. 299).

Aristotle says that the goods that we may want more than what we ought to are: honor, wealth and security[8](NE, V, 2, 1130b 2). On this point are required the explanations of Charles Young:

> "Note that particular justice, in being concerned with honor, wealth, and safety, overlaps with other virtues of character: with magnanimity (NE IV.3) and proper pride (IV.4), which deal with honor; with liberality (IV.1) and magnificence (IV.2), which deal with wealth; and with courage (III.6-9), which deals with safety. However, particular justice has a different concern with honor, that one can be unjust to oneself (NE, V, 11, 1138b16-1138a4) and says there is only one vice that is opposed to justice, the injustice (1133b30-1134a1). Kraut (2002, p. 138-141) states that the unjust do not just want more, but more than that it is due to him causing by his action that another has fewer than he deserves. Inequality is the motivation of the act. Rawls (1999, p. 385-386) contradicts this interpretation claiming it does not make the necessary distinction between the unjust and the evil. Unjust and wicked are willing to take actions that harm others, but the first because they want more than their share and the latter because they want to be superior to others and humiliate them. The unfair loves the goods that the unjust act gives them; the bad love the injustice of his action. Finally, Young (in KRAUT, 2006, p. 191-192) argues that the unjust is not characterized by the amount of desire for gain, but by the absence of certain limitations in this desire. The just do not want to gain when the profits belong to someone else, the unjust has no such restrictions; he continues to desire such goods even when his quest and possession is wrongful. We agree with the position of the last author, because in so reading the philosopher about particular injustice we will not confuse it with any other addiction.

---

[8]Charles Young (in KRAUT, 2006, p. 183) explains: "It is easy to see how justice and injustice are possible with regard to honor and wealth, less easy to see with regard to safety. Aristotle may have in mind cases in which one person avoids risks that others are then forced to assume."

> wealth, and safety from that of the other virtues. Aristotle's idea, for example, is that my cheating on my taxes shows both something about my attitude toward wealth – a concern of liberality – and something about my attitude toward those other citizens who must shoulder the burden I have shirked – a concern of justice." (in KRAUT, 2006, p. 183)

The particular justice is the proper measure according to reason for the allocation of the goods (and the duties) of the city amongst its members. It shall act in two stages: in the equitable distribution of the assets between the citizens and on repairing the particular relationships forged between these citizens that might break the equality accomplished in the allocation of those goods. The particular justice can therefore be split into two species: the distributive one and the corrective one(NE, V, 2, 1130 b 30 – 1131 a 9).

6. Distributive justice

The distributive justice advises us that just is the proportional allocation of goods in accordance with the merits of every citizen. More or less goods should be spread proportionally to higher or lower merits of the individuals. Amongst equals, similar amounts of goods should be delivered, otherwise they will be treated unequally. Amongst unequals, different amounts of goods should be delivered, until they became equals, otherwise they will keep being unequals. Those who have more merits should enjoy more goods in proportion to its merits; those who have less merit should enjoy fewer assets in proportion to its merits(YOUNG in KRAUT, 2006, p. 185).

How can we verify the merits of the citizens? Aristotle says that a praiseworthy citizen is the one who dedicates himself to the goals of the community even more than to his own individual purposes. Therefore in any system of government bound by the community's interests justice can become effective.

Justice can only be carried out in social life[9]. By living in a community we become aware of our equality and inequality as we discover the others. In social life we become aware that we are equal in essence but, in fact, unique[10].

[9]About political justice, Aristotle states that it can be natural or conventional. However, by natural justice he didn't mean what is immutable since justice is a virtue, i.e., a disposition acted upon by human choice and everything that depends upon choice for be actuated is contingent. The distinction lies in what is proper to human nature and what is by convention. In the *polis*there can be rules and decisions that determine the correct conduct in accordance with the end of man and with the end of polis itself; but there

Only the law should rule men because we are all equal and insofar we shall not answer to the order of another man, but only to the orders of an impersonal reason, the law. Says Aristotle: "this is why we do not allow a man to rule, but law[11], because a man behaves thus in his own interests and becomes a tyrant." (NE, V, 6, 1134b 1). It is unjust to treat the ones that are equals in essence in different ways.

Specifically every human being is unique. We have different needs and different ways to contribute to the proper functioning of the group. We should not therefore get the same portions of the same things, but the portions that we deserve of what we need. It is unjust to treat the ones that are in fact different in the same ways.

7. Corrective justice

The social life is not, however, static. Once you have allocated goods proportionally amongst citizens, those goods will move between them through the countless relationships they make with one another daily, like friendship or work relationships. On these transactions one may get undue benefits and,because of that, the equality guaranteed in the distribution may be broken. It is not enough then, that the goods are equally shared; there must be a continuous possibility of correction of the imbalances that may arise from private relationships. Only then, the can also be rules and decisions establishing certain behaviors because it was agreed that determined acts should be practiced. The former, carries out natural justice, and the latter, conventional justice (NE, V, 7, 1134b 18 - 1135th 15). In this respect said Ross: "Aristóteles hace en seguida una doble distinción: […] 2) La segunda distinción es la de la justicia natural y de la justicia convencional. Hay una categoría de derechos y de deberes universalmente reconocidos; pero a éstos se superponen los derechos y los deberes criados por las leyes de los Estados particulares. Aristóteles se opone a la teoría común de los sofistas, según la cual toda justicia es convencional. Sin embargo, hasta la justicia natural, según él, admite excepciones." (1957, p. 305-306). On the relations between justice and polis, check: BODÉÜS, 2007.

---

[10]The distribution of goods according to the proper measure is the act that takes place in the subordinate relationship between rulers and ruled. Therefore the moment of allocation of particular goods is also called public justice. Rulers are responsible for the creation of the legal standards of the community and also for their just content.

[11] The translator Jonathan Barnes (1995) claims that has used logon like nomon.

justice is fully realized and the equality is maintained.

The particular justice in its corrective sense is the one that corrects the particular relationships forged between these citizens, whether voluntary or involuntary, by establishing the middle ground between the losses and the earnings of those involved[12].

The voluntary relationships are those in which the bond formed between the individuals is wanted by them, as in the case of sale, lease or loans. When there is no match between the goods and services exchanged between individuals, a third party, equidistant to the involved, is invoked to restore the balance between them. He must subtract the surplus earned by one and return it to another, restoring equality between them[13].

The unintentional relations are those in which the bonds formed between individuals are not wanted by both sides. They can be subdivided in two types: a) those in which the subject who practices the unjust acts clandestinely, as in thefts and adulteries; b) those in which the subject who practices the unjust acts with violence, as in homicides and assaults.

The third party must apply to the perpetrator of the injustice the proper punishment, and to the one who suffer the injustice he must give the suitable aposteriori compensation for the damages that he endures.

Reparation fostered by the judge in such cases is proportional and not absolute. The justice system cannot allow an evil act be committed in its name, i.e., that an act of vengeance might be considered the just answer towards someone who has damaged another self[14].

---

[12]This is the private justice, i.e, the one that occurs between equal individuals which are linked to the nomos of the polis.

[13]It is important to emphasize the perception of Aristotle regarding the exchange processes that take place in society. According to him, different objects are exchanged, produced by different people and get different evaluations within the community. Thus, currency imposes itself as a mediator, allowing the evaluation of goods in trade (NE, V, 5, 1133b 15-18).

[14] Aristotle discusses also the degree of responsibility of the agent by the injustices committed. For the Stagirite, voluntary are the actions caused by the agent itself, i.e., free of external coercion and to which he knows the circumstances. In these cases, men are liable for the consequences of their actions. In Book V of the Nicomachean Ethics however the philosopher distinguishes three states of mind in which can be unrighteous acts committed: a) when we ignore the possible consequences of our actions, either because we could not anticipate them or because in theory we could, but we didn't do it in concrete. Under these conditions, we made a mistake, but we didn't commit an unjust act

Both in voluntary and in unintentional relationships it will be up to the judge to adjust the abstract commandments of the law to the special circumstances in which the action takes place in order to fully realize justice. Aristotle calls this procedure equity.

Due to the generality of law before the facts is necessary that in the concrete cases the judge can correct it for only thus the law is truly fulfilled(NE, V, 10, 1137b 21-29).

Equity is not the opportunity of noncompliance with the law. It does not endorse the inversion between the roles of the judge and the legislator. By not imposing certain rules, because of equity, the judge is acting as the lawmaker would have done if he had foreseen that circumstance[15](KRAUT, 2002, p. 109-110). Obeying the law entails the noncompliance of a special regulation because of their unsuitability to that specific situation (Rethorics, I, 13, 1374a 18 – 1374b 22).

---

and we are not an unjust person. b) when we know the possible consequences of that specific action, but we do not want to cause them directly. In this case, we practice an unjust act, but we are not necessarily an unfair person. c) when we know the possible consequences of our specific act and chose to practice it motivated by them. In this case, we made a wrongful act and we are an unjust person.

[15]Kraut explains: "Aristotle's approach to equity provides no justification for violating a law merely on the grounds that it is unjust and should never have been adopted in the first place. He assumes that a juror can rightly refuse to enforce the law only when he sees that legislators did not intended it to be applied to the case in hand. But a citizen who refuses to obey a law simply because it is unjust is trying to do something quite different: he concedes that the legislators intended the law to apply to him, but insists that it should not have been adopted in the first place, because of its injustice. He claims that he sees what the legislators do not – that the law is unjust – and this makes his thesis more difficult to sustain than the one Aristotle defends. For the individual violator of the law cannot expect the legislators to agree with him that he is acting properly, whereas this is precisely what Aristotle's equitable judge expects of them. The individual who breaks the law because he takes it to be unjust sets himself up as a rival to the body that has the authority to make the laws. He says that he can see where justice lies and it cannot; and that his actions should be guided by his own judgment rather than theirs. That is a radical challenge to the legal system, not the modest correction that Aristotle calls for with the equity and he has no sympathy for those who seek to undermine the whole legal framework of a city. He holds [in Politics, books III, IV , V e VI] that cities in which citizens seek gradual and modest improvements by lawful means are far better places to live than cities in which warring factions with rival conceptions of justice undermine the legal system rather than accommodate themselves to perceived injustices. When he defends the thesis that at times one must, as a matter of justice, refuse to comply with legislative errors, he is defending a policy that poses no threat to the rule of law." (2002, p. 110-111).

8. Conclusion

We conclude, therefore that justice is par excellence, the essential virtue to the formation of the virtuous man and polis. Justice is the necessary condition for man to become what he should be.

The Aristotelian practical philosophy is teleological and is based on the definition of the human nature. Men, because of the rational conscience of themselves, become free of the natural determination and place themselves as the first and the last cause of their actions. Thus, the reason of their existence is the excellent accomplishment of their natural essence, that is, the virtuous rational action. Only the performance of the last end of acting fulfills men and, in such a way, they reach the eudaimonia.

The eudaimonia possesses successive requirements. First, the individual must have conscience of the virtue of his actions so that they can be considered excellent. Second, the social community must be responsible for planning and giving the virtuous education that makes possible the formation of the ethical habit in the individual. Finally, the constitution of a propitious way to the development of the virtue in the individuals is necessary, that is, the polis also must be virtuous in its political-legal organization to guarantee the formation of the ethical habit in the individual. The individual excellency and the excellency of the polis are necessary to the accomplishment of the eudaimonia of all citizens.

There is a dialectical movement between the ethical conscience of the individual and the excellent political-legal organization of the polis. The man only carries through his end internalizing the heteronomous good expressed in the ethically constituted nomos and consciously externalizing the good in his praxis. The man will only be ethical if he lives in an ethical community.

Justice, through the nomos, is the virtue that organizes the polis ethically, because it promotes the proportional distribution of the goods of the community and the equitable solution of the particular conflicts. Justice, while a virtue of the polis, carries through the social order, that is, the rule of law, promoting the equality of the individuals between themselves and before the law. The law is the synthesis of all the ethical parameters of social community and, therefore, it limits the power of the governor to the accomplishment of the virtues that it brings in itself and it imposes itself to the governed ones as a directive of their actions. Universal justice prescribes the obedience to the law, which is the educational paradigm of the polis in the formation of the habit and the ethical conscience.

Finally, we must emphasize that this is not a necessary path. The polis ruled by just laws is a probable space of just interactions and experiences that enables the harmonization of the separate parts (excessive desire, self-reflection and conscious action) towards the ultimate end of man and polis, self-realization. But this is not absolute assurance. The opposite is less likely to occur, but possible. We are in the field of praxis, in which we can observe constancies and standards, in which we can only state probabilities but never necessary consequences.

References

ARISTOTLE. The complete works of Aristotle. The revised Oxford translation edited by Jonathan Barnes. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1995. 2 V.

------. Aristotle in 23 Volumes. v. 19. Translated by H. Rackham. Cambridge: MA, Harvard University Press; London: William Heinemann Ltda, 1934. In http://www.perseus.tufts.edu/cache/perscoll_Greco-Roman.html.

-----. Ética a Nicômacos. 3ª ed. Tradução de Mário da Gama Kury. Brasília: UnB, 2001. 238 p. Título original: EthikonNikomacheion.

-----. EthicaNicomachea. Edited by J. Bywater. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1894. 215 p. In http://www.perseus.tufts.edu/cache/perscoll_Greco-Roman.html.

-----. Ética Nicomáquea, Ética Eudemia. Traducción y notas por JulioPallíBonet. Madrid: Gredos, 1985. 561 p.

-----. Obras Completas. Retórica. Coordenação de António Pedro Mesquita. Prefácio e introdução de Manuel Alexandre Júnior. Tradução e notas de Manuel Alexandre Júnior, Paulo Farmhouse Alberto e Abel do Nascimento Pena. Lisboa: Imprensa Nacional-Casa da Moeda, 2005. V. VIII, tomo I, 311 p.

-----. Política. Texto grego com tradução ao lado para o português de Antônio Campelo Amaral e Carlos de Carvalho Gomes. Lisboa: Vega, 1998. 664 p.

-----. Política. Tradução de Roberto Leal Ferreira. 2ª ed. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 1998. 321 p.

-----. Política. Introducción, traducción y notas de Manuela García Valdés. Madrid: Gredos, 1988. 490 p.

BAILLY, Anatole. DictionnaireGrec-Français. 7eme ed. Paris: Librairie Hachette, 1950. 2200 p.

BOBBIO, Norberto. Teoria della norma giuridica. Torino: G. GiappichelliEditore, 1958. 245 p.

BODÉÜS, Richard. Aristóteles. A justiça e a cidade. Tradução de Nicolás Nyimi Campanário. São Paulo: Loyola, 2007. 122 p. Título original: Aristote. La justice etlacité.

GUTHRIE, William Keith Chambers. A History of Greek Philosophy. A History of Greek Philosophy. Vol. VI. Aristotle an encounter. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990. 456 p.

HARDIE, W. F. R. Aristotle's Ethical Theory. 2nd ed. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1980. 452 p.

KENNY, Anthony. The Aristotelian Ethics. A study on the relationship between the Eudemian and the Nicomachean Ethics of Aristotle, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1978. 359 p.

KRAUT, Richard. Aristotle. Political Philosophy. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002, 520 p.

------. (Ed.) The Blackwell guide to Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics. Oxford: Blackwell, 2006, 384 p.

MACINTYRE, Alasdair. Justiça de quem? Qual racionalidade? Tradução de Marcelo Pimenta Marques. São Paulo: Loyola, 1991. 438 p. Título original: Whose justice? Which rationality?

MORA, José Ferrater. Dicionário de Filosofia. Tradução de Maria Stela Gonçalves et al. São Paulo : Loyola, 2000. 4 V. Título original: Diccionario de Filosofía.

RAWLS, J. A theory of justice. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1999. 607 p.

RORTY, AmélieOksenberg. (Ed.) Essays on Aristotle's Ethics. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980. 438 p.

ROSS, W. D. Aristóteles. Tradução de Diego F. Pró. Buenos Aires: Editorial Sudamericana, 1957. 421 p. Título original: Aristotle.

VAZ, Henrique Cláudio de Lima. Escritos de Filosofia. 2. ed. São Paulo: Loyola, 1999. 5 V.

VLASTOS, Gregory. Platonic Studies. 2nd ed. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1981. 478 p.

Soft science, hard puzzle:
Can we handle John Roemer´s Justice algorithm?

Nuria López[1]

Abstract: This article analyzes the Theory of Justice by John Roemer, which treats Justice as the outcome of a process that is able to maximize the minimum achievement level of individuals and hold them accountable only for their autonomous choices, excluding the effect of circumstances. In other words, it is a Justice algorithm. However, the results of the application of this algorithm lead to counterintuitive (unfair) outcomes. The article investigates the this algorithm's viability and the philosophic topics that ought to be revised for an approximation with mathematical models, such as the self-reference in social sciences; the need to reformulate the concept of the individual; the variables in decision making and the complexity of life as a totality of games played by a subject in a specific period of time.

Keywords: Theory of Justice; Algorithm; Roemer.

Introduction: John Roemer´s main question

Revisiting the classic theme of Justice as Equality, Yale Professor John E. Roemer concludes that the existing conceptions of equality (of opportunity) always keep the individual, at some point, from achieving a goal, and that it is unfair for a goal to be unreachable to someone. How to make an achievement-position accessible to everyone, then? And how should we judge who has the right to occupy this position?

The decision making of an individual is composed of several vectors. Some of them can be considered as circumstances and others as autonomous choices. Circumstances are characteristics of the environment where the individual lives, which he cannot change (for example, his values derived of nationality, social class etc.). The autonomous choices are choices in the strict sense, for in account of several options, the individual had the autonomy to change the situation. In that picture, Roemer takes as common sense the notion that the individual is responsible for his own acts, however, he should not always be held accountable for them.

[1] PhD Student at Pontifical Catholic University of São Paulo (PUC/SP). Master of Philosophy of Law at Pontifical Catholic University of São Paulo (PUC/SP) with a CNPq Scholarship. Email: nuria.lcs@gmail.com. I would like to gratefully acknowledge Renato Traldi Dias for the careful revision of this paper.

He works with the English terms responsible and accountable – without correspondence in other languages, such as Portuguese, Spanish, or French, and so, it is not an intuitive concept in non-English cultures. Although it is a very interesting distinction for responsibility: it means that despite being responsible for one's own acts, in the sense of an existing causality nexus between individual and act itself, he should not be charged for the vectors that did not depend on him or were even out of his reach to change.

The distributive justice per excellence (the justice that equates the playing field between individuals) should be able to distinguish which vectors of a decision making process are circumstances and which are autonomous choices, and then, give privilege to the autonomous ones, for they demand an effort by the individual to achieve his goal. The effort is a crucial value in John Roemer´s Equity of opportunity for it is the discretion to judge that will occupy a given goal-position. The judgment based on the effort made by an individual in his autonomous choice is a safe path for a Justice rule. According to Roemer, the goal – positions are accessible by those who, in their own context, choose to make an effort to reach them.

But Roemer goes further and makes an interesting personal contribution to Philosophy: he uses statistics analysis to propose a mathematical model of Justice: a Justice algorithm. An algorithm is any well-defined procedure to solve a specific class of problems (ISCID, 2012). So, what Roemer proposes is a well-defined procedure to solve Justice problems as Equity problems. It exposes the relation between Law and Mathematics. It may seem a bit odd to deal with a Justice algorithm, but the oddness ends when we realize Law (even in times of claim of a pure law) is nothing but algorithms (well-defined procedures) made to reach its goals. Thus, which algorithm guarantees the command that leads to the Roemer´s Justice?

1. The algorithm

Fortunately, unlike Fermat, we cannot complain about the lack of paper, and so, will demonstrate this algorithm step by step.

1.1 Circumstances and autonomous choices

First, it is necessary to distinguish which vectors should be considered circumstances and which should be consider autonomous choices. This distinction should be made for society by some political process, for there is no scientific discretion. He says: "I do not have a theory which would enable me to discover exactly what aspects of a person´s environment are beyond his control and affect his revelant behavior in a way that relieves him or her of personal accountability for that behavior. In actual practice, the society in question shall decide through some political process, what it wishes to deem 'circumstances'."(1998, p.08).

1.2 Finding clusters

Then, we should group individuals into clusters of similar circumstances, in a way that a cluster is composed of a group of people with similar circumstantial vectors. The more the number of circumstances in analysis, the more detail is available to establish differences. Roemer warns we should maintain the number of clusters in a manageable amount.

The clusters isolate individuals submitted to the same vectors, for which they should not be accountable. This means separating individuals in clusters by the criterion of circumstances (facts they could not autonomously choose) and, then, comparing them just by what they actually choose in life. With these clusters isolated, we have a clear view of how much effort an individual puts to reach a determinate goal-position. The effort is a central concept in Roemer´s theory, which assumes the individual effort is monotonically related to the outcome.

What Roemer probably meant by "monotonic function" is that the outcome is directly related to the effort the individual spends to achieve his goal. Nevertheless, even if we had a case of "more effort-less outcome", it still could be viewed as a monotonic function (albeit a decreasing one). Therefore, we must conclude that Roemer´s theory needs not only for the effort/outcome to be in a monotonic relation, but also that such a relation should be increasing or at least non-decreasing, for the more effort an individual spends, the bigger (bigger or equal, in the case of non-decreasing functions) is his outcome.

1.3 Statistical analysis of effort levels distribution

This is done with the statistical analysis of effort levels distribution. Roemer observes the effort levels distribution inside the clusters (separated by circumstantial vectors) and reaches with this knowledge the average level of effort of each cluster. For him, the average level of effort is a feature of the cluster and ergo is defined by the circumstantial vectors – for which the individuals could not be accountable. But, if an individual puts in more than the average level of effort of his own cluster, then he deserves to occupy a better position than his fellows, since he spent a higher degree of effort than they did.

2. The algorithm outcome

In other theories of distributive justice, the individual is accountable for his acts in the context they are written in, without an isolation of the circumstances. Roemer´s criticism is based on this point. For him, this individual that puts in higher degrees of effort in comparison to his companions in the cluster, could, in traditional theories of distributive justice, not achieve the goal-position he intended, because he is always hindered by the circumstances that affect him. Separating the individuals in clusters (composed of the same circumstantial vectors) and analyzing the effort levels distribution inside them, Roemer finds a way to correct this unfairness of traditional distributive justices: he divides the inputs equally amongst the clusters (where differences exist in function of circumstantial vectors), but unequally inside them (where the differences exist in function of the effort spent by each individual) (1998,p.07). Inside the clusters, the division of inputs should be proportional to the effort degree where the individual stands – which translates to the amount of effort he spent in comparison to his fellows. The individuals that put more effort in each cluster will have an optimum goal (1998,p.08). For Roemer, to equalize is to*"seek the distribution that maximizes the minimum achievement level of the individuals (…). It is so-called maximin achievement distribution"*(1998, p.08).

3. Interpreting the algorithm

Roemer's proposal brings unfamiliar elements to the justice theories – the statistical analysis of data and the elaboration of a well-defined procedure to equate the opportunities between the individuals that dispute the same goal-position. We can see it as a mathematical model for Roemer´s Justice (for the optimum distribution of goals).

This relation between mathematical models and the Human Sciences is extremely promising, as they are capable of demonstrating with precision some aspects of social complexity. These models' applications caused some to declare this the golden age of human sciences (Abraham et al., 2007). There are some researches, in this line, that have been using dynamic systems in the analysis and projection of consumer relations and stock paper prices.

Roemer´s algorithm, however, has some peculiarities. In a very self-conscious way, he does not compromise himself with social complexity, he delegates to society the hard task of determining what is circumstance and what are autonomous choices.

4. Dealing with counterintuitive outcomes

Dealing with intuition has been a hard task for science. Roemer is not the first – and definitely neither the last one – to encounter this issue in his way. The concept of algorithm itself, used by Roemer, was formalized by Alan Turing (and also for Alonzo Church) in response to the question of David Hilbert, if it is possible to elaborate a method or general procedure able to determine if a mathematical proposition could be proved or not. Turing answered that all mathematical propositions that could be computed by what he called a Turing Machine are computable. A Turing Machine is a model that contains instructions (well defined procedures, algorithms) able to appoint if a proposition could be computed.

Hilbert needed to know if it is possible to prove all mathematical propositions because base mathematical concepts such as equality and difference so far could not be proved – they were taken as given by our intuition.

Just like Justice, trivial relations between finite numbers are intuitive and Hilbert believed these relations could not be reduced to nothing else and neither needed such reduction. For this intent, mathematical concepts should be developed from them as axioms, for no contradiction should accrue from them, as they do not have a logical structure – they are simply intuitive.

The intuition in Hilbert´s work has a clear basis in Kant´s philosophy – it is a reference to the concept of pure intuition (and, for this purpose, we can apply to mathematical epistemology the criticism about Kantian thought).

Hilbert proposed the axiomatization of mathematical concepts and moved on from this problem (although he can often be seen turning to the founding question). Even Turing, in developing his machine, did it in a way that questions if our brain could be a Turing Machine, programmed to rely on states and mental processes (that today the cognitive sciences are able to demonstrate) – and so, wondered, once more, about the role of intuition.

The theory of equality of opportunity is founded on the premise that outcomes in an individual´s life are composed of some factors that he cannot control (the circumstances) and of others, such as ambition and effort, that are controllable.

Roemer himself says his proposal could seem counterintuitive, while justice is intuitive for people, who can judge a determined situation as fair or unfair regardless of their ability to define the concept of justice or even to find reasons for this intuition.

Roemer's formulation of his theory of finding to be unfair that an individual could not reach some goal-position because of the circumstances that affect him also constitutes an intuitive feeling of Justice. With his theory, Roemer does with his feeling what the mathematicians did with their own intuition: axiomatize. He axiomatized the (intuitive) concept of Justice. For him, justice is the distribution that maximizes the conquer level of individuals.

As such, maybe in fields other than Law we could be able to claim that John Roemer´s theory has internal consistency. But why is internal consistency not enough for Justice as was for Hilbert?

Hilbert and Roemer needed a starting point, even if they could not demonstrate why this starting point was the right one. But Hilbert works the science of mathematics, and that science itself is the essence of his works, for they comprehend logical structures without semantic content and, for this reason, all these structures need is internal coherence.

But Roemer has a different mission. His constants and variables have semantic content. And to reach his goal (as he would say) not only internal consistency is needed but also semantic coherence with that feeling of Justice. Axiomatizing this concept, Roemer interprets Justice as an optimum distribution (the outcome of his algorithm), and maintains, this way, the internal coherence of his work. Nevertheless, in philosophy, axiomatization could turn into tautology. The semantic value of Justice is intuitive, as we have been told, but also is a social and historical concept (in continuous development) built and used to attend social needs.

If a proposal of Justice is counterintuitive we can (at least) assert that it is unable to meet the expectations of Justice. It does not have semantic pertinence with the term it wants to match. In this sense, the so-called soft sciences do seem too soft to demand a hard demonstration (eminently hermeneutic) of semantic coherence.

In this matter, it seems important to inquire about the reasons why this responsabilization technique guides us to such counterintuitive outcomes.

5. The responsabilization of individuals – the counterattack of experimental philosophy

Just like Roemer, experimental philosophers use statistical analysis as basis for their work. In a few words, they create philosophy "laboratories": they elaborate hypothetical scenarios and question people about them. The answers compose a database for the philosophical analysis. One of the greatest themes of experimental philosophy is the relation people establish between cause and consequence (and responsibility) in human actions (Experimental Philosophy, 2012).

To create a laboratory in this matter, interviewed people are presented a deterministic scenario, where there are only circumstances and, for this, individuals do not have choices. Then, they are presented a scenario where despite circumstances; individuals have options and choose to act exactly in the same way of the individual in the first (deterministic) scenario.

Although presented the same choices, some people answer differently to the questions. These people are called compatibilists, to maintain the idea of compatibilization between both responsibilities (with and without choice). People that answer both questions equally are called incompabilists for the belief that there is not a compatible responsibility rule for both scenarios.

The collected data varies depending on the presented scenario, but in all analyzed scenarios (listed above), most people are compatibilists and do not hold the individual responsible in the deterministic scenario, but do so in the second one. Most people take the concept of free will as a choice which fulfills an individual's desire and is free of internal or external constraints (Monroe; Malle, 2010).

Thus, we have that most people do not hold the individuals in the deterministic scenario responsible for believing that the circumstances leave them without option to act differently; and, consistently, hold the individuals that act "free of internal or external constrains" responsible merely for fulfilling their desires.

A major goal of these researches (developed in philosophy) is to search integrated questions (and answers as well) to the cognitive sciences, which have been having positive results in explaining behavior from the analysis of interaction of mental states and processes originated from other mental states and processes and ultimately were originated from our genes and our environment (Knobe; Nichols, 2011).

The "real life" scenario reached by the cognitive scientists is much closer to the deterministic scenario described by the experimental philosophers, in which Roemer, as most people, does not think it is fair to hold individuals responsible.

Knowing the relation of cause and effect in mental states and processes caused the cognitive sciences to interpret the world as being much more deterministic, that is, if even our autonomous choices are originated from preexisting mental states, it means there are more circumstances than we can usually perceive.

An integrated answer suggests a non-responsible world. There are more circumstances than people can, at first sight, map. This could explain why Roemer´s outcomes are so counterintuitive, why a Justice algorithm does not lead to a fair situation. Roemer says people should decide what they consider as circumstances. He recognizes there is not a method to accurately precise them. And yet this composes the main data used in his algorithm. The distortion of outcomes in the justice algorithm does not come from a lack of internal coherence. The algorithm is well thought and has a perfect internal logic. But we may not have the correct data to fulfill it.

On one hand, a complete map of circumstances (as the cognitive sciences are able to provide) would lead to a non-responsible world. On the other hand, responsibility is a necessary consequence of Justice. How can we comprehend (and determine) Justice in times of cognitive science and advanced math? Is it possible to handle a Justice algorithm?

To search for an answer I suggest two points to be analyzed. The first one is that, from the dichotomy presented above, emerged a thesis called "the illusion of free will", according to it people believe they are really free to make their choices, but much of this freedom is an illusion. Some of the analysis deals with the importance of this illusion for society (Nadelhoffer, 2007). The destruction of such illusion would have negative consequences for individuals and society as well, because it could prevent responsabilization. This aspect takes responsabilization as an instrument to replace society of an attitude considered undesirable. This analysis brings to responsabilization a purpose other than punishment for a bad choice in exercising free will: a social need.

The second point is in a research of Joshua Knobe and Shaun Nichols that finds most people, when presented to an abstract scenario, deciding, as Roemer, to not hold individuals responsible for attitudes determined exclusively by circumstances (deterministic scenario). Nevertheless, when presented with concrete scenarios people respond to the attitudes without considering if the attitudes were derived exclusively from circumstances. Concrete consequences of human actions cause impacts (of varying levels) in other people´s circumstances: and they certainly will react to these impacts. Responsabilization is a form of answer and it plays this role in our society: being a power vector in response to an action that caused an alteration in someone´s circumstances.

It also explains other data obtained from the same research, that most people hold responsible agents that in a specific scenario act illicitly with physical violence and do not hold responsible agents that, in the same scenario, act illicitly in a manner named by researchers as without affective impact, such as the case of tax evasion. There are answers (data) that cannot be reduced to a single general rule.

According to them, the judgment of individual responsabilization is mostly an intuitive process that has been evolutionarily constructed. Individuals have developed a more accurate sense about more primitive illicit acts, which explains why people had a strong opinion about illicit acts involving physical violence, which cause affective impact, and a less constructed opinion about the responsabilization of an illegality without affective impact.

Therefore, even if society votes, as Roemer proposes, in a political process, about what should be considered as circumstance, it is probable that in most cases the application of the general rule (even an application with perfect internal coherence) leads to counterintuitive outcomes, because people change their answers in a concrete scenario. People would find unfair the application of their own general rule to a concrete scenario.

6. The decision-making problem

6.1 The individual and their circumstances

Roemer considers simple the really complex process of decision making. He distinguishes in a Cartesian way what the circumstances are and what are autonomous choices. He quotes José Ortega y Gasset, "I am: me and my circumstance". Nevertheless, Ortega y Gasset´s philosophy is a vehement criticism of Cartesian philosophy, which distinguishes the res cogitans and the res extensa. For the Spanish philosopher not only are these categories integrated, but they are also so with the environment where they are found (the circumstances) that individuals and their circumstances are the same. A quote was taken from the book "Meditaciones del Quijote" (1914) and it corroborates with his philosophical positions in biology – curiously with the same references that Parsons and Luhmann would use in the fifties. Ortega y Gasset say: "We will search for our circumstance as it is, precisely in its limits, peculiarities, the right place in the immense perspective of the world. (...) In short: the reabsorption of circumstance is men´s concrete destiny. (...) I am me and my circumstance, and if I don´t salve it, I don´t save myself" (Ortega y Gasset, 1997).

In the context of the work of Ortega y Gasset the same quote could be said by the experimental philosophers previously analyzed. Indeed, the conclusions of Joshua Knobe and Shaun Nichols corroborate and, given the current scientific development, complement the thought of the Spanish philosopher: "The thing you are forgetting is that the interaction of these states and processes – this whole complex system described by cognitive science – is simply you. So when you learn that these states and processes control your behavior, all you are learning is that you are controlling your behavior" (Knobe; Nichols, 2011).

6.2 Decision as a move in the game

Like the cognitive sciences, philosophy also evolved since then: not satisfied to enunciate the integration between individual and his circumstance, philosophy goes further and elaborates some models of how this integration occurs. One of these models is the Systemic Conjecture of Law by Márcio Pugliesi, which considers the individual as a semantic atmosphere. Beyond the traditional opposition between conscience and language in philosophy, this individual is a discontinuous and non-stop construction fed by his own circumstances, by elements of his circumstances, that he can interpret anyhow. Pugliesi says (2009, p.185-186): "The individual acts by the rules of the game and by his own knowledge of the circumstances, he corrects his action and tries to confer its effects on the system (subset of the world, considered as his semantic atmosphere and its pollution) and the environment, the totality of possible meanings for him, and then, as it were, retroactive, that is, re-feed his own repertoire of information and redo, when possible, the decision preliminarily assumed, recomposing his theory."

This means the individual is also composed of his circumstances and, for this reason, they compose, necessarily, any choice made by them. So, the choices are not autonomous? If we consider that autonomous is the one who has the faculty of determining his own conduct without others' impositions (Houaiss Dictionary, 2009) we will have that choices could be considered autonomous when they are not imposed directly by others; and that they could not be considered autonomous when, indirectly, all choices are affected by several impositions, from different points of the system (including other individuals).

6.3 One individuals, several games

Another important question we should argue is that Roemer´s algorithm analyses a single game of an individual´s life. But individuals do not have just one game in life. As Pugliesi says: "The members of a society play multiple interactive games and their decisions, followed by pertinent actions, search for triumph in the whole game, that is, the game of life. Loss in some cases is not disastrous, in others, it is fatal" (2009, p.85).

We all have several games, that we play simultaneously, and this simultaneity deeply affects the move possibilities in each one of them. In each game, the individual needs to decide between a number of possibilities of what to do and, at the same time, there are several moves in need of decision. Time is a limiting factor of decision making, it demands a constant trade-off, and is also a circumstance. Although time does not interfere for everyone in the same way – it could play different roles in each game.

7. The right thing to do in a specific moment of time

Roemer skips the time dynamic and his individual is charged even if: (i) he does not have the option pointed as the "right option" for Roemer"; (ii) the "right option" was not "right" in relation to some other game. The algorithm is quite incomplete, as it considers moves in just one game. If we could think of a justice algorithm, we should have in mind that this algorithm needs to consider all the moves and games of life – and life's complexity does not allow it to happen.

8. Ever changing values

And even so, questions about the value of Roemer's privileges would remain. The algorithm computes as "correct" some conducts that lead to the goal-position he intends to open access to. But each one of the concrete cases could originate endless questions about the imposition of these values. All social relations have a semantic charge. Roemer´s algorithm could corroborate or change the values inserted in this semantic pollution, and in this way, change the individuals' strategies in their games.

Changing the playing field as Roemer does is the same as changing the rules of the game – and so is the strategy applied to the players, because it is evident that the individuals will incorporate the new rules of games in their decision making. In consequence, prestige value (as effort) could end discredited if, for example, an individual of a cluster with low effort average, does not need to put in much of his own effort to occupy a specific goal-position.

Moreover, Roemer´s algorithm does not follow the dynamism of society and the effects caused by the algorithm itself in a previous moment in time. An algorithm that intends social application should, at least, be dynamic.

Conclusion: mathematical models in the study of social relations

Each one of the instructions of John E. Roemer´s Justice algorithm have been analyzed step by step here. The application of mathematical models is absolutely desirable in social relations because they are able to make us understand more accurately the dynamic of social systems.

Roemer found in the basic structure of Law – Justice – the same obstacle that Hilbert and Turing found in the basic structure of Mathematics. However, for Roemer this issue had worst consequences (or maybe only a more apparent one) because social sciences should have semantic coherence in their "object". Self-reference is not enough. When social science is applied there is also an external reference to the object of the application. It is a simple – but thoroughly relevant observation. The history of Law has suffered (and still suffers) enough with the appliance of formalities that guarantee a perfect self-reference, a perfect internal logic; but, on the other hand, result in unfair (and even tragic) outcomes.

The main problem in Roemer´s algorithm is the unfair outcomes – the lack of coherence with an external reference. He elaborates this algorithm exactly to correct an unfairness of the traditional theories of Justice to, therefore, fit the concept of Justice, but then, after elaborated, he abandons this concern.

Indeed, it is very hard to deal with the concept of Justice – it is a dynamic, historical and social concept in permanent construction inside each one of the individuals. Roemer had to make some simplistic choices to be able to think about an algorithm with such a purpose. He intended to use the algorithm to make public policy choices, such as in education and health care. But outcomes obtained with this algorithm could seem polemically unfair. In this briefly analysis we pointed some philosophical questions to argue where the math went wrong.

The first one was the axiomatization of the Justice concept, which is a very intuitive concept in people – in permanent construction, with a large sociological and historical background. We pointed the same discussion was central in Mathematics philosophy – how to prove something you just know? Something so simple as equal or different… or Justice. The solution of axiomatizing the concept was used by Mathematicians such as Hilbert and Turing, and Roemer used the same path for his Theory of Justice. Unfortunately, we think, there is a simple (and insurmountable) obstacle for the axiomatization of Justice: its application is always in debt with the semantic content of Justice that exists in every single person. Beyond the internal coherence (the self-reference) demanded in Math, we also need to respect this external reference.

The second point consists of the intention to hold individuals accountable only for what they "autonomously choose", never for the circumstances they are thrown into. Without a method to determine what would be "autonomous choice" and "circumstances" Roemer bases the whole theory in what he assumes to be common sense and says that this distinction should be done by society in some sort of political process. Neither do we have a method for finding such categories. But if the question is what people think, the best way to analyze it might be a statistical study. We approached some papers of experimental philosophy regarding this problem and, in conclusion, they argue that: (i) most people have different perceptions of Justice (as responsabilization for an autonomous choice) when presented with abstract and concrete scenarios of the exact same hypothesis; and (ii) most people have different perceptions of Justice (as responsabilization for an autonomous choice) when presented with illicit acts that cause (or do not cause) an affective impact on them.

Later, we presented the result of a paper on cognitive science and experimental philosophy that blurs the distinction between "autonomous choice" and "circumstances". The knowledge of mental states and processes change the understanding of our world to a much more deterministic world, where the individual's liberal autonomy is an illusion – but a needed illusion. Justice and responsibility for some acts are a social need. So, it is not a matter of finding the right category, but a matter of responding to a societal expectation.

This last question leads us to rebuild the individual in Roemer´s theory – matching the recent studies of cognitive science and recent philosophy – to understand the individual as a semantic construct of their own circumstances and what he (also semantically) carries of his own interpretation of the world around him.

The fourth point on Roemer´s theory that certainly contributed to the odd outcomes of the algorithm is that it "computes" each game separately. That is, the algorithm only comprehends one decision in life at a time, without cross-referencing data with the several decisions people make all the time. It is important to state that each individual has several games composing his life-decisions and that this totality's possible moves are limited by the factor of time. It is a complex dynamic system of endless games (not) being computed by a simple algorithm.

And at last, the effect this algorithm would cause in the values (such as "effort") that Roemer tries to privilege deserves to be pointed out. The application of this algorithm changes the "rules" of the game and it is incorporated in the strategy of the individuals in pursue of their own goals. We try to demonstrate that some values considered important in Roemer´s theory could end up discredited in the new social dynamic.

For a long time now social scientist have been searching for methods – and often borrowing them – in other fields. It is an extremely relevant pursuit, especially in matters where discretion has played a cruel role. Applied social sciences refer not only to their own (or borrowed) methods but, most importantly, also to their reason to be: the external (of science) reference that is the society. There is a double check reference that should not be forgotten. The idea of a Justice Algorithm is an impressive idea – but not an easily conceived one. Formulating such an algorithm demands much more of philosophy than math. Soft sciences could be, after all, a really hard puzzle.

References

ABRAHAM, Ralph; FRIEDMAN, Dan; VIOTTI, Paul. 2007. Complex dynamical systems and the social sciences. 2007.

Experimental Philosophy (X-PHI). In: http://pantheon.yale.edu/~jk762/xphi-page.htm#Papers_on_Causation <Accessed in 06.08.12>

FERRAZ,Tercio Sampaio Junior. 2009. Estudos de Filosofia do Direito – refelxões sobre o poder, a liberdade, a justiça e o direito, 3a ed, Altas, São Paulo, 2009, p.222.

ISCID (International Society for Complexity, Information, and Design) Encyclopedia of Science and Philosophy. In: http://www.iscid.org/encyclopedia/Algorithm <Accessed in 06.08.11>.

KNOBE, Joshua; NICHOLS, Shaun. 2011. Free Will and the Bounds of the Self. In Robert Kane (ed.), Oxford Handbook of Free Will. Oxford.

MONROE, Andrew E.; MALLE, Bertram F. 2010. From Uncaused Will to Conscious Choice: The Need to Study, Not Speculate About People's Folk Concept of Free Will. R*eview of Philosophy and Psychology* 1 (2):211-224.

NADELHOFFER, Thomas. 2007. Folk Intuitions, Slippery Slopes, and Necessary Fictions: An Essay on Saul Smilansky's Free Will Illusionism. In Peter A. French & Howard K. Wettstein (eds.), Philosophy and the Empirical. Blackwell Pub. Inc..

ORTEGA, Y GASSET, Ortega. 1997. Meditaciones del quijote, 1a Ed, Alianza, Madri, 1997.

PUGLIESI, Márcio. 2009. Teoria do Direito. 2a. Ed, Saraiva, São Paulo, 2009

ROEMER, John E. 1998. Equality of opportunity, Harvard University Press, Cambridge (MA)/London, 1998.

Aristotle on Justice and Law:
Koinonia, Justice and Politeia

Giovanni Bombelli

Abstract: Aristotle's theory of law, especially with reference to the idea of justice, can be understood as a 'different' model if compared to contemporary perspectives. Nevertheless, in the light of the complex and globalized societies, the interest for the Aristotelian perspective is based at least on three concepts: koinonia, justice and politeia. Theoretically koinonia (community) represents the ontological model by which Aristotle understands the human relationship and, at the same time, is the conceptual horizon within which the notion of 'justice' and the polarity 'koinonia-dike' emerges. Justice (dike), as a 'virtue' based on the communitarian nomos, represents the 'boundary line' between community and mere alliance, that is to say the condition for eunomia and the political obligation. Furthermore, dike is a 'pragmatic and universal' dimension and community represents the theoretical 'space' for its elaboration: justice is an ideal principle whereas law, including epieikeia and the couple physikon dikaion-nomikon dikaion, represents its historical determination. On a political-constitutional level the central role of politeia emerges: it is a 'just equilibrium', based on the 'proportionality' developed into the communitarian context, and the constitutional articulation of the relation among the citizens. Koinonia and politeia are not to be confused: the latter is an adaptable paradigm, whereas the former is its critical filter. Aristotle's theory is an open model because the flexible notion of justice is adaptable to a variety of human relations and, similarly, the politeia-mesotes evolves as the paradigm of koinonia. Hence the modernity of this perspective: the great flexibility of the circle 'koinonia-justice-politeia' could represent a theoretical model to understand the present complex societies and the issues related to the ongoing globalization, especially in order to endorse the current multiple models of justice.

Keywords: Community - Justice - Politeia

1. Premise

From a legal and philosophical point of view, Aristotle's theory of law (with specific reference to the idea of 'justice') can be understood in some way as a very peculiar conceptual model, especially if it is compared to many contemporary perspectives related to both a liberal perspective (i.e. Rawls' model[1]) and the communitarian movement[2].

Nevertheless, Aristotle's theory of justice still appears very useful in order to understand our social contexts. In fact, due to the complexity of its theoretical structure it constitutes a rich conceptual paradigm, somehow disconnected from its historical reference and, hence, still able to interpret social and political models that are very different compared to the Greek polis[3].

This possible reinterpretation of the Aristotelian perspective is not necessarily (neither only) based on a Rehabilitierung der praktischen Philosophie perspective, classically related to notions as phronesis and virtue and broadly known as a typical aspect of the Aristotle's Renaissance flourished in the last century[4]. On the contrary, in order to understand Aristotle's theory it is necessary to take into account the strict relations between its parts and, then, the entire philosophical model elaborated by the Greek philosopher (not only those aspects concerning ethics and politics).

In this paper I intend to focus only on some aspects of the Aristotelian theory of justice, starting from some selected arguments presented in Politics and in Nicomachean Ethics. More precisely, I argue that the current interest for the Aristotelian perspective, and especially for its notion of 'justice' (dike), should be based at least on the analysis of the relation underlying three complex concepts: a) koinonia, b) justice and c) politeia.

These notions, intrinsically very complicated, are strictly connected to each other, because they trace a sort of theoretical circle: in other words, we can understand the Aristotelian notion of 'justice' only in the [1] John Rawls, A Theory of Justice (Cambridge: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1971).

[2] Alasdair MacIntyre, After Virtue. A Study in Moral Theory (Notre Dame IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1981); Alasdair MacIntyre Whose Justice? Which Rationality? (Notre Dame IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1988); Charles Taylor, Sources of the Self. The Making of the Modern Identity (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); Michael Sandel, Liberalism and the Limits of Justice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982); Michael Walzer, Spheres of Justice. A Defence of Pluralism and Equality (Oxford: Blackwell, 1983).

[3] Enrico Berti, Aristotele nel Novecento (Roma-Bari: Laterza, 1992).

[4] Paradigmatically Manfred Riedel, Rehabilitierung der praktischen Philosophie (Freiburg: Rombach, 1972-1974).

light of the concepts of koinonia and politeia. Finally, I will try to show the relevance of some of its theoretical traits in relation to questions raised by complex and globalized societies.

2. Koinonia and its main articulations

Firstly we have to pay attention to the crucial notion of koinonia, usually translated by (and, in some way, confused with) 'community' in the modern sense of the word, or also, and misleadingly, by 'association'. As is well known, theoretically koinonia represents the basis for the conceptualization of the ontological or, better, ontological-anthropological model by which Aristotle theorizes the human relationship.

So, at the famous opening lines of Politics (*Politic*s, I, 1, 1252a, 1-5) the Greek philosopher can say:

> "We observe that every state (polis) is a certain sort of association (koinonia), and that every association (koinonia) is formed for some good (agathos) purpose; for in all their actions all men aim at what they think good[...]."[5]

This represents a crucial passage, which synthesizes in a way the entire thought of the Stagirite. On a conceptual level, it essentially concerns four elements recurring in a circular way in the entire reasoning: «man», «nature» «community» e «good».

In fact, Aristotle preliminarily establishes a sort of logical sequence centred on a substantial equivalence among these elements: «man» (anthropos), to whom the cited passage implicitly refers, is placed «by nature» (a concept implied within the locution «we observer», orô-

[5] Aristotle, Politics (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995-1999): vol. I, 1. See also Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics (Oxford University Press: New York, 2009): 178 (corresponding to IX, 9, 1170b 8-19): "Now his being [for each man]was seen to be desirable because he perceived his own goodness, and such perception is pleasant in itself. He must, therefore, perceive the existence of his friend together with his own, and this will be realized in their living together and sharing in discussion and thought; for this is what living together would seem to mean in the case of man, and not, as in the case of cattle, feeding in the same place. If, then, being is in itself desirable for the supremely happy man (since it is by its nature good and pleasant), and that of his friend is very much the same, a friend will be one of the things that are desirable. Now that which is desirable for him he must have, or he will be deficient in this respect. The man who is to be happy will therefore need virtuous friends".

men) in a «community» which is provided with a «political» dimension (polis as a community) and so in relation to the constitution of a «good» (or, better, to what «appears as good»: see also below the relation 'koinonia-eudaimonia').

But, in addition to the mention found in Politics, the reference to the notion of koinonia is disseminated in every part of the Aristotelian philosophy, and it is more frequent here than in Plato: not only with regard to the concepts of law and justice[6], but almost in order to define the circular link (or the logical sequence) which characterizes the 'primitive elements' of the communitarian model.

So, on a theoretical level, we have to make reference to some crucial conceptual couples drawn by Aristotle (from the notion of logos to the model of paideia) in order to grasp the richness of the concept of koinonia and the twofold level (empirical-historical-pragmatic and theoretical) of the Aristotelian argumentation[7].

The first couple is the fundamental relation 'koinonia-logos' (Politics, I, 2, 1253a 7-18[8] and De Interpretatione): there is a circular relation between community and language. More precisely, koinonia (that is the polis) represents the sociological and ontological horizon for (natural) language. In this direction, the Aristotelian theory of language, based on the communitarian context, is more similar to the romantic perspective

[6] Hermann Bonitz, Index aristotelicus (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1960): 400; Aristoteles, ed. Roberto Radice (Milano: Biblia, 2005): 623-626.

[7] About this point Charles Howard MacIlwain, The Growth of Political Thought in the West: from the Greeks to the end of the Middle Ages (New York: Mac Millan, 1932): 63: "If we could but see all the shades of meaning in that word koinonia (κοινωνία) and could understand in the sense that Aristotle meant it just what those others are which the political koinonia includes, and the precise way in which it does include them all and is at the same time above them all – if we could do that we should know the basis of Aristotle's whole theory of the state. For the koinonia is the focus of it all, and [the] definition with which the Politics opens furnishes at once the link between ethics and politics."

[8] Aristotle, Politics, vol. I, 3: "The reason why man is an animal fit for a state to a fuller extent than any bee or any herding animal is obvious. Nature, as we say, does nothing pointlessly, and man alone among the animals possesses speech. Now the voice is an indication of pleasure and pain, which is why it is possessed by the other animals also; for their nature does extend this far, to having the sensations of pleasure and pain, and to indicating them to each other. Speech, on the other hand, serves to make clear what is beneficial and what is harmful, and so also what is just and what is unjust. For by contrast with the other animals man has this peculiarity: he alone has sense of good and evil, just and unjust, etc. An association in these matters makes a household and a state".

(as is well known polarized on the couple 'Gemeinschaft-Sprache'[9]) than to the formalist and post-saussurian one[10].

In the same way, koinonia represents a crucial notion for the economic model, which is based on the nexus 'koinonia-oikonomia'. In fact, Aristotle notoriously distinguishes between two levels: real (or true) economics, with the decisive position played by the oikos, and mere trade (or false) economics, namely chrematistics: Politics I, 8 and Nicomachean Ethics V, 5[11].

Once again, we can observe the crucial role of the communitarian context as a criterion to define the economic categories. See, for instance, the relevance of the concept of 'money' as a natural and proportional/just measure (with reference to the long discussion in Nicomachean Ethics, V, 5, 1132b31-1133b28[12]) but also, in a wider perspective, the issue being discussed by Aristotle about what is a 'economic action' (moving from the crucial distinction poiesis-praxis[13]).

The couple 'koinonia-philia' (Nicomachean Ethics, VIII) represents another relevant articulation of the Aristotelian community. First of all, the Greek (Aristotelian) notion of philia should not be confused with the modern concept of 'friendship': the former expresses the ontological origin of a human relationship (maybe similarly to the role played by Eros for nature in Hempedocles), whereas the latter indicates only a senti-

[9] Nuno Coelho, Justice, Society and Diversity in Aristotle, paper presented in XXVI[th] World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy. Human Rights, Rule of Law and the Contemporary Social Challenges in Complex Societies (Belo Horizonte, MG, Brazil, 21 to 26 July 2013).

[10] For this point see Hannah Arendt, The Human Condition (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1958); Hans Arens, Aristotle's Theory of Language and Its Tradition. Texts from 500 to 1750 (Amsterdam-Philadelphia: John Benjamins Publishing Co. 1984); Franco Lo Piparo, Aristotele e il linguaggio. Cosa fa di una lingua una lingua (Roma-Bari: Laterza, 2002).

[11] About this point see, for instance Polis e economia nella Grecia antica, ed. Mario Vegetti (Bologna: Zanichelli, 1986): 96-103, 82-109.

[12] For instance, Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics (New York: Oxford University Press, 2009): 90, where the Greek philosopher states: "Money, then, acting as a measure, makes goods commensurate and equates them; for neither would there have been association if there were not exchange, nor exchange if there were not equality, nor equality if there were not commensurability. Now in truth it is impossible that things differing so much should become commensurate, but with reference to need they may become so sufficiently."

[13] William Lambert Newman, The Politics of Aristotle (Oxford: Clarendon Press 1950): vol. I, 158 ff., 199-204; Arendt, The Human Condition, especially 175-199.

mental or emotive and subjective relation.

From a philosophical-legal point of view we can evaluate the relevance of philia at least in two directions. On the one hand, philia can develop only within a communitarian context (household, oikos, polis): in other words, there is a mutual and circular relation between community and philia (there is no community without philia). On the other hand, philia immediately identifies a political dimension: in fact, philia is the theoretical as well as sociological basis for political obligation (Politics, III, 9, 1280b 30-1281a 11[14] and, more broadly for the nexus 'best koinonia-philia', Politics, IV, 11, 1295a 25-1296a 19).

In this direction, along a theoretical perspective the nexus 'koinonia-eudaimonia' (see for instance: Nicomachean Ethics, I, 4, 1095a 14-20; I, 7, 1097a 30-1097b 11[15]) plays a decisive role, because it marks the conceptu-

[14] Aristotle, Politics, vol. II, 30-31: "[It is]plain that the city is not the sharing of a place, and does not exist to prevent wrong and promote exchange. These are necessary conditions of there being a city. But a city is not just the presence of all of them. It is the community of the households and the clans in the good life, for the sake of perfect ad selfsufficient life. But this will not happen unless they inhabit one and the same place and recognize intermarriages. Hence the origin of family connexions in the cities and brotherhoods and sacrifices and community gatherings. This kind of thing is the work of friendship, since voluntary living together constitutes friendship. The end of a city is the good life, and these things are for the sake of the end. A city is the sharing of clans and villages in a perfect and selfsufficient life. That is, we say, a happy and good life. We must lay it down, therefore, that the purpose of political society is not living together but good actions. Hence those who contribute most to such a society have a larger share in the city than those who are equal or superior in freedom and birth but unequal in political goodness, or those who are superior in wealth but inferior in goodness. It is clear from the above that all those who dispute about the constitutions are asserting some part of justice."

[15] Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics, 5, 10-11: "Let us resume our inquiry and state, in view of the fact that all knowledge and every pursuit aims at some good, what it is that we say political science aims at and what is the highest of all goods achievable by action. Verbally there is very general agreement; for both the general run of men and people of superior refinement say that it his happiness, and identify living well and faring well with being happy; but with regard to what happiness is they differ, and the many do not give the same account as the wise." Similarly: "Now we call that which is in itself worthy of pursuit more final than that which is worthy of pursuit for the sake of something else, and that which is never desirable for the sake of something else, and that which is never desirable for the sake of something else more final than the things that are desirable both in themselves and for the sake of that other thing, and therefore we call final without qualification that which is always desirable in itself and never for the sake of something else. Now such a thing happiness, above all else, is held to be; for this we al continuity between the two profiles of the Aristotelian argumentation as a whole: the attention to the theoretical/anthropological dimension of the relation and, at the same time, its underlying contextual or empirical reference.

In other words, eudaimonia is to be understood as an anthropological (then: ethic, political, ecc.) flourishing and, hence, very differently if compared to the modern notion of 'happiness' as a mere individual right to pursue personal satisfaction (i. e. Declarations of Independence of the United States, 1776). In other words, according to Aristotle eudaimonia represents the universal-anthropological ideal of human perfection and satisfaction, which can develop only within the polis-koinonia.

Finally, we have to consider the relation 'koinonia-paideia' (Politics, VIII).

The pedagogic model drawn by Aristotle in Politics synthesizes the long previous Hellenic tradition (from Homer and Hesiod to Plato) regarding the political role played by education and, most importantly, it represents the logical conclusion of the entire Aristotelian philosophy. In fact, if human relations and their fundamental articulations (language, economics, philia, eudaimonia) can develop only within the polis-koinonia, this latter is philosophically, legally and politically legitimated to elaborate and, to some degree, 'to impose' a public education. Hence (Politics VIII, 1, 1337a 11-22) Aristotle can say:

> "That the legislator should therefore be concerned above all with the education of the young no one would dispute; for in cities where this does not happen, the political systems are harmed. For education must be directed to the particular political system. For the character peculiar to each political system usually safeguards it and establishes that political system in the first place (for example, the democratic character a democratic political system, the oligarchic character an oligarchic political system). And in all cases better character is the cause of a better political system. Fur-choose always from itself and never for the sake of something else, but honour, pleasure, reason, and every virtue we choose indeed for themselves (for if nothing resulted from them we should still choose each of them), but we choose them also for the sake of happiness, judging that through them we shall be happy. Happiness, on the other hand, no one chooses for the sake of these, nor, in general, for anything other than itself. From the point of view of self-sufficiency the same result seems to follow; for the final good is thought to be self-sufficient. Now by self-sufficient we do not mean that which is sufficient for a man by himself, for one who lives a solitary life, but also for parents, children, wife, and in general for his friends and fellow citizens, since man in born for citizenship."

> thermore, in the case of every capacity and craft there are certain things, having to do with the work each is to accomplish, that must be a matter of prior education and prior habits, and so obviously this applies also to the activities of virtue." [16]

This brief survey illustrates the great flexibility of the concept of koinonia. From a theoretical point of view, it appears a very strange formal notion, elaborated within the just mentioned twofold level (empirical and theoretical) of the Aristotelian argumentation. In fact, in the Aristotelian (and, more widely, Greek) model of koinonia we can observe a sort of fluctuation, or better a tension, between historical-empirical dimension and theoretical level.

On the one hand the koinonia is a descriptive model, strictly related to the Greek polis. This means that, in some way, koinonia statically identifies with the historical polis as a whole (hence, according to Aristotle, we can properly talk about the polis-koinonia). But, at the same time, koinonia represents in a dynamic manner a normative form (the community as it ought/should be) and is in turn philosophically based on the fluctuant (and very ambiguous) concepts of phusis and 'being' closely related to each other.

This is a capital aspect in Aristotle's theory, which shines through the above quoted passage from Politics (particularly by the word orômen) and mainly developed in Metaphysics, V, 4, 1014b 16-27[17], wherein phusis or 'being' (once again according to ancient Greek philosophers) means at the same time stagnation and movement, gathering and development,

---

[16] Aristotle, Politics, vol. IV, 35; but see also 35-36 where Aristotle adds: "It is clear, therefore, that one must make laws about education and that one must make this a common project. What kind of education there shall be, and how one should be educated, must not be neglected questions." For this aspect Newman, The Politics of Aristotle, vol. I, 369-374.

[17] Aristotle, Metaphysics, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1993): 32, where he states: "We call Nature, in one sense, the coming to be of things that grow[…]; in another, the first constituent out of which a growing thing grows; again, what makes the primary change in any naturally existing thing a constituent of the thing qua itself. All things are said to grow which gain enlargement through another thing by contact and assimilation or (as with embryos) adhesion. Assimilation differs from contact, for in the latter case there is no necessity for any other thing apart from contact, while in the case of things assimilated there is some one thing, the same in both, which makes them assimilated instead of in contact, and makes them one in respect of continuity and quantity, though not in respect of qualification."

rest and dynamics.[18]

The 'principle of ontological continuity', which characterizes many parts of Aristotle's theory (from Metaphysycs to Politics), allows us to observe also an ontological fluctuation underlying the community. This implies a fundamental corollary: the radical ambiguity of the koinonia.

The communitarian model (maybe not only the Greek one[19]), can be the dynamic ideal political-legal framework to enhance personal and collective identity or freedom: by Aristotelian lexicon, to achieve the complete eudaimonia. But, at the same time, koinonia can develop into a totalitarian structure: just as its ontological legitimateness (the notion of phusis-being), koinonia can turn into a fixed political system, that is to say into a platonic philosophers' republic (remember the mentioned central role played by paideia in Aristotle). This is why only anthropoi can live within the polis: they are neither the beast, nor the god (Politics, I, 2, 1253a 27-29)[20].

In conclusion, we can establish at least two points.

Firstly, according to Aristotle human relations and 'communitarian bonds', including their very complex articulations, are the same thing; in other words, the Stagirite states a sort of superimposition/equation between 'relation' and 'community'.

Secondly, and consequently, Aristotle establishes the equation polis-koinonia, insomuch that legal/political obligation must be involved and justified within community. Only starting from this articulated conceptual framework we can try to grasp the Aristotelian notion of dike and its legal and political implications.

3. Koinonia and Dike

The complex concept of koinonia represents the theoretical ho-

[18] Here I am not concerned with this decisive point. Anyway, as is well known, in Aristotle 'nature' (similarly to 'arké') indicates the inner dynamic of the world, namely the 'beginning' and the 'end' (tèlos) of reality: about this point, for instance, Hans Georg Gadamer, Wahrheit und Methode. Gründzuge einer philosophischen Hermeneutik, Mohr, Tübingen, 1960 (especially Part II, chapter two concerning the Aristotelian perspective); see also Newman, The Politics of Aristotle, vol. I, 18-21, 48.

[19] Giovanni Bombelli, Occidente e 'figure' comunitarie (volume introduttivo) "Comunitarismo" e "comunità": un percorso critico-esplorativo tra filosofia e diritto (Napoli: Jovene, 2010).

[20] Aristotle, Politics, vol. I, 4.

rizon within which the notion of 'justice' (dike) emerges. Obviously we have to understand this relation in the light of the theoretical continuity, which does not imply confusion, between ethics and politics as a typical trait of the Aristotelian perspective (Politics, III, 4, 1276b 17-1277a13).

In this direction, Aristotle's answer to the question: "[A]re we to say that the goodness of a good man and a good citizen are the same, or not?" is that they are not the same: "the citizen needs not to be wise", because only "the good ruler is also a good and wise man".

In fact, Aristotle theorizes the polarity 'koinonia-dike' and, more widely, the relation between the archaic and pre-Socratic notion of nomos (grounded on a community as a spatial perimeter or bounder) and the 'legal order', that is to say what we might call 'positive law'[21].

In other words, justice (dike) evolves only within the polis-koinonia: therefore the Aristotelian notion of 'justice' can be defined a 'communitarian primitive'.

Dike is first and foremost a 'virtue' (pròs eteron: for instance Nicomachean Ethics, II, 6, 1106a 14-24; V, 1, 1129a 32-1129b 19[22]) or, better, a political virtue based on the communitarian nomos and ultimately on the communitarian good. From this point of view, in some way it represents the 'boundary line' which marks the polarity between 'community/nomos' and the mere 'alliance/contract', as Aristotle plainly states in Politics, III, 9, 1280b 6-13 within a long discussion about justice:

> "[A]city must concern itself with goodness if it is to be truly and not merely for convenience called a city. Otherwise the community becomes an alliance, differing from the alliances of separated parties only as regards place; and its law becomes a treaty, and 'a guarantor of reciprocal rights' as Lycophron the sophist said, instead of being what makes the citizens good and just men. That this is so is clear from the fact that, if you brought the place to> gether so that the city of the Megarians and that of the Corinthians touched with their walls, it would still not be one city." [23]

[21] The Politics of Aristotle, ed. Ernest Barker (Oxford: Clarendon Press 1946): XXI ff.; Newman, The Politics of Aristotle, vol. I, 1-11, 41-165 and vol. II, 97 (for the notion of koinonia).

[22] For the first passage see Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics, 29: "We must, however, not only describe virtue as a state of character, but also say what sort of state it is. We may remark, then , that every virtue or excellence both brings into good condition the thing of which it is the excellence and makes the work of that thing be done well[…].Therefore[…]the virtue of man also will be the state of character which makes a man good and which makes him do his own work well." The second passage quoted in the text concerns the nature of justice.

In other words, only 'just communities' (i.e. communities deep-rooted on the virtue of dike) can be understood as true communities: the absence of dike implies a mere 'contract bond' underlying the social relations and, ultimately, the prevalence of a utilitarian model of human relationships.

From this perspective, and more precisely, dike is the condition of possibility for the polis or, better, for eunomia as the typical Greek model of political obligation and then, in a circular way, for the community itself.

In this direction, dike can properly be understood as a 'pragmatic and universal (anthropological)' dimension, in opposition to many contemporary perspectives: not only the Rawlsian one but also, for instance, some philosophical theories lato sensu inspired by Aristotle's reflections (Michael Sandel and, a bit less, Michael Walzer and Charles Taylor). More precisely, on a theoretical level the Aristotelian community (koinonia) represents the conceptual 'space' for the elaboration of justice and, hence, of law.

Note that this point does not imply a confusion among levels (in some way differently, for instance, from the interpretation proposed by Alasdair MacIntyre). In fact, according to Aristotle dike (insofar as dike is strictly connected to the nomos) represents an ideal and rational (but not idealistic) principle, grounded on a communitarian context; similarly, 'law' evolves into a necessary, historical, positive and sometimes misleading determination of dike within the polis-koinonia: what Greeks call nomisma[24], in some way along the later roman pair 'ius-iustitia'.

See, for instance, Nicomachean Ethics, V, 5, 1134a 27-1134b 18, where Aristotle observes (distinguishing 'political justice' from analogous kinds of justice):

> "For justice exists only between men whose mutual relations are governed by law; and law exists for men between whom there is > injustice; for legal justice is the discrimination of the just and the unjust.[…]This is why we do not allow a man to rule, but rational principle, because a man behaves thus in his own interests and becomes a tyrant.[…][Justice or injustice of citizens are]according to law, and between people naturally subject to law[that is to say] people who have an equal share in ruling and being ruled." [25]

[23] Aristotle, Politics, vol. II, 29.

[24] See, for instance, the Aristotelian position concerning the nature of money: The Nicomachean Ethics, IV, 1132b 20-1133b 29 (Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics, 88-90). For this point: Massimo Amato, L'enigma della moneta e l'inizio dell'economia (Milano: Et al. 2010): 183-239, 245-252, 265-266.

Similarly, and beyond the mentioned Politics, III, 9, 1280b 5-13, see also Politics III, 13 1283b 42:

> "A citizen is everywhere he who shares in ruling and being ruled, but how he does so varies with each constitution. In the best constitution he is the man who both can and does rule and obey with the intention of achieving the life of goodness."[26]

Along these lines the Aristotelian distinction between distributive and commutative justice, whereby the fundamental question of the polarity 'isoi-eteroi' emerges[27], seems less relevant and, in some way, related to the specific historical context of the Greek polis. On the contrary, we can understand both the decisive role of the notion of epieikeia and, then, the crucial position played by the dynamic couple physikon dikaion-nomikon dikaion in Aristotle's theory.

Epieikeia (equity: The Nicomachean Ethics, VI, 1143 a 19-1143b 16) represents the equilibrium, or the balance, between justice (as a theoretical model) and the positive disposition or legislation (in order to prevent the unlawful act): in other words, epieikeia is a sort of justice 'in action or situation' within the communitarian horizon[28].

Similarly, on a conceptual level, the couple 'physikon dikaion-nomikon dikaion' (Nicomachean Ehics, V, 7, 1134a 24-1135a 6) is relevant because, among other things, Aristotle says:

> "Of political justice part is natural, part legal, - natural, that which everywhere has the same force and does not exist by people's

[25] Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics, 91-92.

[26] Aristotle, Politics, vol. II, 45.

[27] Coelho, Justice, Society and Diversity in Aristotle.

[28] Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics, 113-114. About this point Francesco D'Agostino, Epieikeia: il tema dell'equità nell'antichità greca (Milano: Giuffrè 1973); Francesco D'Agostino, La tradizione dell'epieikeia nel Medioevo latino: un contributo alla storia dell'idea di equità (Milano: Giuffrè 1976).

> thinking this or that; legal, that which is originally indifferent, but when it has been laid down is not indifferent[...].Now some think that all justice is of this sort, because that which is by nature is unchangeable and has everywhere the same force[...]while they see change in the things recognized as just. This, however, is not true in this unqualified way, but is true in a sense; or rather, with the gods it is perhaps not true at all, while with us there is something that is just even by nature, yet all of it is changeable; but still some is by nature, some not by nature. It is evident which sort of thing, among things capable of being otherwise, is by nature; and which is not but is legal and conventional, given that both are equally changeable. And in all other things the same distinction will apply[...].The things which are just by virtue of convention and expediency are like measures[...]. Similarly, the things which are just not by nature but by human enactment are not everywhere the same, since constitutions also are not the same, though there is but one which is everywhere by nature the best."[29]

This distinction illustrates the two fundamental dimensions (dike-nomikon) underlying the Aristotelian theory of justice and, more generally, his model of legal reasoning. According to this perspective, no 'nomikon' (that is to say: a positive and historical disposition) can be laid down beyond justice (dike), which is ultimately the nomos based on the phusis and developed within the community. This is why in Aristotle there is no scission between 'individual justice' and 'social (collective) justice': in other words, the Hellenic universe, which is synthesized by Aristotle's theory, cannot conceive public justice separated from its personal or individual dimensions[30].

In other words: dike is, at the same time, a communitarian and individual dimension.

4. Politeia

The complex structure composed by the theoretical axis 'koinonia-justice (dike)' is the conceptual framework within which what we today call the political-constitutional level can develop. More precisely, from this point of view it is within the couple 'koinonia-justice' that the central role of politeia or, according to a modern and misleading translation, the concept of 'Constitution' emerges. So in Politics, III, 11, 1282b 8-13:

[29] Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics, 92-93.

[30] For this point see especially Gianfrancesco Zanetti, La nozione di giustizia in Aristotele (Bologna: Il Mulino, 1993).

> "[T]he laws will inevitably be bad or good, and just or unjust, concomitantly with the constitutions. Only this much is clear: the laws should suit the constitution. From this, however, it plainly follows that laws matching the correct constitutions must be just, and those matching the perverted ones not just."[31]

Similarly in Politics III, 13, 1283b 42-1284a 3 (partially just mentioned):

> "Perhaps we should ask what constitutes correctness here. That is correct, perhaps, which is to the advantage of the whole city and to the common advantage of the citizens. A citizen is everywhere he who shares in ruling and being ruled, but how he does so varies with each constitution. In the best constitution he is the man who both can and does rule and obey with the intention of achieving the life of goodness."[32]

As is well known, Aristotle conceptualizes the notion of politeia as a mesotes (or as a equilibrium among social groups), for instance in Politics, IV, 11, 1295a 25-1296a 19 where the question is:

> "What is the best constitution, and what is the best life, for most cities and most men, judging by the standard not of a goodness surpassing ordinary men, nor of an education requiring a fortunate nature and circumstances, nor of an ideal constitution, but of a life that the majority can live in common and a constitution that most cities can share?"

Aristotle answers:

> "Now in all cities the city has three parts, the very prosperous, the very needy, and the third class of those in the middle. Hence, since it is admitted that the moderate and middle is the best, it is clear that the gifts of fortune too are best of all when owned in a > middle amount. For that makes it easiest to obey reason, whereas excessive beauty or strength or birth or wealth, or their opposites, excessive poverty or weakness or great inferiority, make it hard to follow reason.[...][So]the middle classes are least inclined to shun office or pursue it, and these are both harmful to cities.[...]The best constituted city, therefore, must be the one consisting of those whom we hold to make up the natural composition of a city.[...] It is plain that the middle constitution is the best, for it is the only stable one."[33]

[31] Aristotle, Politics, vol. II, 39.

[32] Aristotle, Politics, vol. II, 45. About the nexus 'koinonia-rules' Newman, The Politics of Aristotle, vol. I, 43, 84, 97, 168, 198.

This is why politeia does not represent the best political system as an abstract structure, but only the (relatively) better 'Constitution' adequate, or suited, to the historical and peculiar circumstances (in fact Aristotle adds: "This explains why most constitutions are either democratic or oligarchic"). In other words, the Aristotelian notion of politeia is very articulated.

More precisely, politeia does not represent only the legal or political expression of a sociologically shared dike, in some way according to a modern and immediate acceptance (meaning) of 'Constitution'. Quite the contrary, within the Aristotelian perspective we can distinguish at least two levels strictly connected to each other: a) the relational dimension and b) the political-institutional level.

a) The relational dimension. Firstly, politeia expresses the 'just equilibrium' of community as a whole, similarly, but from a different perspective, to justice (dike). In fact, as previously remarked, justice (being a virtue) is properly placed on a theoretical level, whereas politeia generally concerns the social relations: so, only to a certain degree politeia is a form of justice.

Moreover, politeia is inspired by a principle of proportionality and continuity among the multiple levels (or the multiple communities) of the polis-koinonia: the relation male-female, household, oikos and so on. But this proportionality in turn is grounded on the ontological or metaphysical analogy and, hence, on the mentioned complex concept of nature (phusis), which connotes the entire Aristotelian perspective about the polis.

So, politeia arises only within a community (along the lines of a 'bottom-up' processing) and then, from a Hellenic point of view, starting from the human bonds and relations developed within the polis. In other words, on a conceptual level politeia should be understood as the 'correct model', a sort of dynamic and flexible paradigm, of human relations as they are concretely based on a communitarian horizon.

[33] Aristotle, Politics, vol. II, 95-97.

It takes each time the most appropriate shape according to the changing social contexts (based on the crucial Aristotelian notion of metabolè[34]) and, particularly, in order to prevent the cyclic Greek nightmare (from Hesiod to Aristotle): the possibility of stasis, that is to say the 'civil war' (about this point see, for instance, the following passages: Politics, V, 7, 1307a 5-11[35]; V, 9, 1309a 33-38 and 1309b 10-21[36]; but see also Politics, III, 13, 1283b 43-1284 3 for the relevance of the notion of 'citizen').

This is the main difference between the Greek (and Aristotelian) politeia, including the notion of koinonia as its theoretical premise, and the modern concept of Constitution. Regarding this point, I completely agree with the position well summarized by Charles MacIlwain[37]:

> "There must be a common object of all their lives if citizens are ever truly to «live together» as members of a koinonia instead of merely feeding together like the cattle in one field. That object, Aristotle says, is «the safety of the polity», and by this he means nothing less than a common devotion to the central principle of the community's life, the vital spark that must glow in the breast of every citizen if he is to be a living member of the polis and not like [34] Newman, The Politics of Aristotle, vol. I, 208-218, 283-288, 518-533. For the difference between the classical notion of metabolè and the modern concept of 'revolution' see Hanna Arendt, On Revolution (New York: Viking Press, 1963).

[35] Aristotle, Politics, vol. III, 15: "Polities and aristocracies are overthrown mostly because of a deviation from the just in the constitution itself. For the origin (of overthrow) in a polity is the poor mixture of democracy and oligarchy, and in aristocracy of these two and virtue, but especially of the two."

[36] Aristotle, Politics, vol. III, 20-21: "There are three things that those who are to hold the supreme offices ought to have; first, friendliness toward the established constitution; next, great ability in the tasks of the office; and, thirdly, virtue and justice – in each constitution the kind pertaining to that constitution. (For if what is just is not the same in relation to all constitutions, there must also be differences (in the virtue) of justice). […]Simply put, whatever provisions in the laws we describe as advantageous to constitutions, all these preserve constitutions; and so does the great elementary principle so often mentioned, to take care that the group that wants the constitution shall be stronger than the one that does not."

[37] MacIlwain, The Growth of Political Thought in the West: from the Greeks to the end of the Middle Ages, 73-74. More widely Charles Howard MacIlwain, Constitutionalism. Ancient and Modern (New York: Cornell University Press, 1940).

> a severed finger or a foot of stone, its mere inanimate tool or a positive encumbrance.[...]In this we have Aristotle's conception both of citizenship and of the politeia or «constitution». «The constitution» to him means this principle of unity that makes the citizens one, like the harmony that comes of different tones properly blended. In fact it is nothing less than the soul that animates the whole of the body politic, and a full understanding of its nature is impossible to one who has no knowledge of Aristotle's discussions of the relation of the soul and the body. But to anyone it must be obvious that by politeia Aristotle means something that we never mean by our «constitution» and by citizen (polites) one whose character is almost a stranger to modern political thought."

b) Political-institutional level. Consequently, and at the same time, Aristotle can establish the political and legal dimension of politeia. In this direction, politeia should be understood from a twofold point of view.

On the one hand, it is to be considered as the mutual relation among the 'citizens' (regarded as members of the polis-koinonia): see, in particular, the political and institutional relevance played by the notion of philia, as previously observed, and particularly by the concept of omonoia (concord) in the Aristotelian theory starting from the Nicomachean Ethics, IX, 6, 1167a 22-1167b 16 (also, and especially, in the light of the possibility of stasis):

> "Concord also seems to be characteristics of friendship. For this reason it is not identity of opinion; for that might occur even with people who do not know each other; nor do we say that people who have the same views on any and every subject are in accord, e. g. those who agree about the heavenly bodies (for concord about these is not a characteristic of friendship), but we do say that a city is in accord when men have the same opinion about what is to their interest, and choose the same actions, and do what they have resolved in common. It is about things to be done, therefore, that people are said to be in accord, and, among these, about matters of consequence and in which it is possible for both or all parties to get what they want[…]. Concord seems, then, to be political friendship, as indeed it is commonly said to be; for it is concerned with things that are to our interest and have an influence on our life. Now such concord is found among good men[…]. But bad men cannot be in accord except to a small extent[…][So]if people do not watch it carefully the common well is soon destroyed. The result is > that they are in a state of faction, putting compulsion on each other but unwilling themselves to do what is just."[38]

In other words, by politeia Aristotle means the concrete, somehow pre-political and pre-institutional, relations of a community.

But, on the other hand, this also implies a specifically constitutional moment.

Politeia cannot remain on a relational level, but it necessarily turns into a constitutional (political) articulation: in other words, the fundamental idea is that human relations necessarily imply a political and institutional 'constitution' (or structure). More precisely, and starting from the strict interlacement between individual sphere and communitarian horizon underlying the polis-koinonia, we can understand how the anthropological identity emerging within the koinonia (as its philosophical-ontological basis) and within the politeia (regarded as a ideal paradigm of the concrete relational dimension or as a sociological and a pre-political dimension) must transform into a political framework: in other words, politeia as a political community.

Nevertheless koinonia and politeia are not the same thing and, then, they must not be confused: we have to situate them on different levels.

Politeia is placed on a social-political-institutional level. As just remarked, it is a very adaptable, social, legal and political paradigm which, according to the Aristotelian theory, can have many historical articulations: monarchy, oligarchy, and the others models mentioned by Aristotle.

On the contrary, koinonia represents the philosophical and ontological level of the entire conceptual structure. In fact koinonia concerns human relations as a whole: notice that at the beginning of Politics Aristotle states "every state (polis) is a certain sort of association (koinonia)", but not the contrary, that is to say that 'every koinonia is a polis'[39].

---

[38] Aristotle, The Nicomachean Ethics, 171-172. For this point Gianfrancesco Zanetti, Amicizia, felicità, diritto: due argomenti sul perfezionismo giuridico (Roma: Carocci, 1998): 99, 111-112.

[39] The point is explained in McIlwain, The Growth of Political Thought in the West: from the Greeks to the end of the Middle Ages, 77: "But if the polity or constitution (politeia) is so all-important in fixing the character of the polis we must know exactly what a polity is. Aristotle's central thought on this subject may be expressed in three propositions concerning it, and if we can fully understand their terms, most of his political ideas will be clear to us. They are these. The polity determines the character of the polis. The politeuma

In substance, there is no superimposition between koinonia and polis: this is why koinonia can be considered in a way as the critical filter of each historical form of politeia (and, hence, of koinonia).

5. Aristotle's theory of justice and contemporary sceneries

The previous considerations show how rich and complex is the Aristotelian perspective about justice and law and, more precisely, with reference to the theoretical circle concerning the relation 'koinonia-dike-politeia'.

Now, in conclusion and to sum up, I would like to put forward some brief remarks on a philosophical-legal level about three aspects of Aristotle's theory, trying also to evaluate its relation with the current sceneries. I will focus on the following concepts: circularity, flexibility (openness) and modernity.

The first point concerns the circular nature of the Aristotelian model.

In fact, it could be represented as a sort of 'conceptual Chinese box', whose pivotal ideas trace a theoretical continuum. So, there is a reciprocal and mutual relation among 'koinonia-dike-politeia'. By an image, we have neither a pyramidal scheme (à la Kelsen) nor a linear sequence, but an osmotic circle. In other words: community (koinonia) 'produces' justice (dike), which is to be understood as a 'communitarian/practical universal dimension': but, being a virtue, dike 'produces' in turn politeia (with its many possible articulations) and so on.

In a few words: in the light of the continuity between ethics and politics underlying Aristotle's theory, the three notions (koinonia, dike, politeia) are to be considered as the 'natural forms of moral consciousness'. Considered altogether and circularly, they 'create' dike, as well as, and reciprocally, dike legitimates philosophically and politically the politeia and, then, the polis-koinonia.

These remarks show, and are related to, the second trait of Aristotle's model: its flexibility (or openness).

Aristotle's conceptual architecture is an open model. In other determines the character of the polity. The polity is a certain ordering of the inhabitants of the polis. In modern terms as nearly equivalent as possible we might put the first and second of these thus: the «constitution» makes the state what it is. The nature of the ruling class (politeuma) determines the nature of the constitution" (with also reference to Politics, III, 6). See also Newman, The Politics of Aristotle, 236, 272 ff.

---

words, the flexible notion of dike, elaborated within the multidimensional concept of community and based on the dynamic polarity 'physikon nomikon/physikon dikaion', is adaptable to the wide variety of human relations.

This point is confirmed by Aristotle himself in Politics, where he confers, at least in principle, the same political-legal relevance and legitimateness to many historical forms of 'constitution'. Similarly, the crucial notion of politeia-mesotes, as a balance of the concrete communitarian dynamics, stands for the political and institutional paradigm of koinonia and, consequently, of dike. This is the main reason why Aristotle's theory is 'open': in other words, it takes the shape of a formal paradigm beyond its socio-historical reference to the Greek polis[40].

And it is in the light of these two elements (circularity and flexibility), and despite the cultural distance between Hellenic world and contemporary contexts, that we can grasp (in spite of its ambiguity) the great modernity of the Aristotelian perspective, as proved by some of its recent reinterpretations[41] and, in particular, by the 'rediscovery' of Aristotle's economic theory (including its undeniable communitarian horizon proposed by Amartya Sen and, much earlier, by Karl Polanyi[42]).

The modern trait of Aristotle's theory can be caught in relation both to the concept of community and the model of justice (and, then, of law and politeia). In spite of his historical reference, Aristotle never defines what is concretely (or empirically) a community: thus, his koinonia is undetermined insofar it is human relation as such and, then, formal (but not empty or meaningless).

Similarly, and consequently, Aristotle does not elaborate a definite concept of justice (dike). Distinguishing physikon dikaion and nomikon dikaion, he introduces the idea of multiple levels, forms and degrees of justice: in other words, dike is to be understood as a proportion (as a relation grounded on the analogy of being: see, for instance, Nicomachean Ethics, V, 3 and 4) and, then, as a formal notion.

This flexible conceptual model too could be very useful to interpret the present complex societies, including the contemporary issues related to the ongoing globalization. Contemporary societies are dominated by the presence of many models of community and then, in parallel, of justice: so, from this point of view, the current scenery certainly appears very different if compared to the Greek polis.

[40] Ilya Prigogine and Isabelle Stengers, La nuova alleanza. Metamorfosi della scienza (Torino: Einaudi, 1981): 40, 266-269.

[41] Berti, Aristotele nel Novecento, 221, 253-254, 261.

[42] Amartya Sen, On Ethics and Economics (Oxford: Basil Blackwell 1987) and Karl Polanyi, "Aristotle Discovers Economy", in Primitive, Archaic and Modern Economies. Essays of Karl Polanyi, ed. George Dalton, 2nd ed. (Boston: Beacon Press, 1971): 78-115.

Nevertheless, the formal (and universal) nature of the koinonia enables Aristotelian perspective to be a very flexible theoretical model, which can have a fundamental role in legitimating philosophically, and endorsing politically, the current multiple models of community and justice.

In conclusion, with Aristotle we could say: there is a unique and universal koinonia, that is human relation, and a universal dike as an anthropological dimension, but many (plural) models of community and justice.

References

Amato, Massimo. L'enigma della moneta. Milano: Et Alii Edizioni, 2010.

Arendt, Hannah. On Revolution. New York: Viking Press, 1963.

Arendt, Hannah. The Human Condition. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1958.

Arens, Hans. Aristotle's Theory of Language and its Tradition. Texts from 500 to 1750. Amsterdam-Philadelphia: John Benjamins Publishing Co., 1984.

Aristotle. Metaphysics. 2nd ed. Clarendon Press: Oxford 1993.

Aristotle. Politics. New York-Oxford: University Press, 1995-1999.

Aristotle. The Nicomachean Ethics. Oxford-New York: University Press, 2009.

Barker, Ernest. (ed.) The Politics of Aristotle. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1946.

Berti, Enrico. Aristotele nel Novecento. Roma-Bari: Laterza, 1992.

Bombelli, Giovanni. Occidente e 'figure' comunitarie (volume introduttivo) "Comunitarismo" e "comunità": un percorso critico-esplorativo tra filosofia e diritto. Napoli: Jovene, 2010.

Bonitz, Hermann. Index aristotelicus. Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1960.

Coelho, Nuno. Justice, Society and Diversity in Aristotle. Paper presented in XXVIth World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy Human Rights, Rule of Law and the Contemporary Social Challenges in Complex Societies (Belo Horizonte, MG, Brazil, 21 to 26 July 2013).

D'Agostino, Francesco. La tradizione dell'epieikeia nel Medioevo latino: un contributo alla storia dell'idea di equità. Milano: Giuffrè 1976.

D'Agostino, Francesco. Epieikeia: il tema dell'equità nell'antichità greca. Milano:

Giuffrè 1973.

Gadamer, Hans Georg. Wahrheit und Methode. Gründzuge einer philosophischen Hermeneutik. Tübingen: Mohr, 1960.

Lo Piparo, Franco. Aristotele e il linguaggio. Cosa fa di una lingua una lingua. Roma-Bari: Laterza, 2002.

MacIlwain, Charles. Constitutionalism. Ancient and Modern. New York: Cornell University Press, 1940.

MacIlwain, Charles. The Growth of Political Thought in the West: from the Greeks to the end of the Middle Ages. New York: Mac Millan, 1932.

MacIntyre, Alasdair. After Virtue. A Study in Moral Theory. Notre Dame IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1981.

MacIntyre, Alasdair. Whose Justice? Which Rationality?. Notre Dame IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1988.

Newman, W. L. The Politics of Aristotle. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1950.

Polanyi, Karl. "Aristotle Discovers Economy". In Primitive, Archaic and Modern Economies. Essays of Karl Polanyi, edited by George Dalton, 2nd ed., 78-115. Boston: Beacon Press, 1971.

Prigogine, Ilya and Isabel Stengers. La nuova alleanza. Metamorfosi della scienza. Torino: Einaudi, 1981.

Radice, Roberto. (ed.) Aristoteles. Milano: Biblia, 2005.

Rawls, John. A Theory of Justice. Cambridge MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1971.

Riedel, Manfred. Rehabilitierung der praktischen Philosophie. Freiburg: Rombach, 1972-1974.

Sandel, Michael. Liberalism and the Limits of Justice. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982.

Sen, Amartya. On Ethics and Economics. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1987.

Taylor, Charles. Sources of the Self. The Making of the Modern Identity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Vegetti, Mario. (ed.) Polis e economia nella Grecia antica. Bologna: Zanichelli, 1986.

Walzer, Michael. Spheres of Justice. A Defence of Pluralism and Equality. Oxford: Blackwell, 1983.

Zanetti, Gianfrancesco. Amicizia, felicità, diritto: due argomenti sul perfezionismo giuridico. Roma: Carocci, 1998.

Zanetti, Gianfrancesco. La nozione di giustizia in Aristotele. Bologna: Il Mulino, 1993.

Pensar o Direito em português

Paulo Ferreira da Cunha[1]

Resumo: Cada vez mais se compreende o valor da Língua Portuguesa e, portanto, a importância da Lusofonia. A questão é se há uma lusofonia jurídica, e se pode haver uma reflexão filosófica autónoma em português. Mas mais importante que uma língua considerada como simples meio de comunicação, é pensá-la como também formadora de um espírito. E consequentemente o mais importante a indagar é qual o espírito ou a cultura lusófona que pode existir no seio do Direito. Uma sintonia constitucional entre as constituições federal brasileira e a constituição da república portuguesa pode ser um ponto de partida.

Palavras-chave: Filosofias nacionais - Lusofonia - Filosofia do Direito - Filosofia Luso-Brasileira - Constituições cidadãs

***

Abstract: We increasingly understand the value of the Portuguese language, and therefore the importance of Lusophone studies and realities. The question is whether there is a legal Lusophone reality, and if there may be an autonomous philosophical reflection using Portuguese Language and reflecting its genious. But more important than a language considered as a mere means of communication, is to consider it as well as forming a spirit. And therefore the most important is to ask what is the spirit or Lusophone culture that may exist inside law. The similarities between the Brazilian Constitution and the Portuguese Constitution may be a starting point.

Keywords: National philosophies - Lusophone - Philosophy Law - Philosophy Luso-Brazilian - Constitutions citizens

1. Introdução

Permitam-me que escreva na primeira pessoa, porque o que vou dizer não aspira a ser teoria anónima, mas o estado da questão de uma

[1]Catedrático da Universidade do Porto

pesquisa em curso. E o convite para que, dialeticamente, se juntem a esta demanda. Não vos trarei teorias nem dogmas mas hipóteses, forjadas num percurso. Não hipóteses descarnadas de paixão, mas o que é descarnado de paixão, realmente, no mundo do Direito e da sua Filosofia? Mesmo a mais abstrata das lógicas é certamente animada pela paixão do rigor, e da ausência de paixão... Lembremo-nos, para começar, do *ostinato rig*ore de Leonardo Da Vinci....ou do método "até na loucura" do poeta Antero de Quental...

Sempre suspeitei que na Língua Portuguesa, que exprime o modo de pensar de um um vastíssimo número de falantes no Mundo (quase 300 milhões de falantes, dos quais 250 milhões como língua-mãe ou nativa), haveria de ser o traço de união de alguma cosmovisão. Obviamente com o maior respeito e mesmo amor a outras línguas. Na verdade, pessoalmente gosto de muitas línguas, e bem gostaria de as saber ler e falar na perfeição. Uma delas é o próprio tupi-guarani, que encerra uma filosofia extraordinária, por exemplo com o seu sistema de prefixação e sufixação que nos faz por exemplo saber que ibirapuera é uma floresta que já não o é, ou que abaete é uma onça verdadeira... Como o eminente filósofo e polígrafo Jean Lauand, da USP, tem sugestivamente realçado em vários estudos e palestras.

Pois como seria interessante estudar mais aprofundadamente o sistema de valores - e os que pudessem transmutar-se em valores jurídicos - numa língua tão claramente axiológica como essa...

Mas bebemos a Língua Portuguesa (ou as Línguas Portuguesas – não vamos entrar nessa querela) no leite materno, e com ela será que nos foi veiculado um sistema de valores, ou algumas idiossincrasias ao menos?

Evidentemente que, como diligentes funcionários das universidades, públicas e privadas, submetidos a sistemas de avaliação, cada vez mais sofisticados, e mesmo a avalições internacionais, que muitas vezes se fazem em Inglês, temos tendência a não pensar na radicação nacional e muito menos linguística do nosso Direito (que ainda é escrito em boa medida em português) e a ir buscar fora as principais fontes doutrinais de que nos servimos. Muito boa parte do que nos ocupa é divulgação e exegese de trabalhos em outros idiomas. Mas será que poderemos pensar o Direito em Português, e de uma forma original? Quiçá poderíamos ir mais longe, e contribuir assim para que a nova Idade do Direito (posmodernidade ou outra) que agora se constrói também fale no nosso Idiomaterno? E o espírito da nossa Língua leve a melhor Direito, mais humano e mais fraterno?

Mas será que existe espírito da língua, será que existe uma cosmovisão ou mundividência ainda que reminiscente ou embrionária? E disse cosmovisão ou mundividência propositadamente, para não dizer Weltanschauung que, desde Dilthey, toda a gente em todo o mundo utiliza...

2. A Inspiração Hispanoamericana

Esta suspeita encontrou-se adormecida em mim durante muitos anos, como que uma doença em incubação, até que fui convidado para participar, há quase 22 anos já, em Santiago do Chile, num congresso de História do Direito: "Congreso Internacional 'Protección Juridica de las Personas en la Historia del Viejo y del Nuevo Mundo", organizado pela Faculdade de Direito da Universidade do Chile, em Setembro de 1991. Foi para mim uma maravilhada surpresa ver desfilar conferências sobre direitos do mais variado tipo, inspirados na matriz dos concílios toledanos de Santo Isidoro de Sevilha dizem alguns.

Alguns eram direito antigos, nos forais, com as suas formas concretas de proteção, que contudo já eram do conhecimento geral, embora não ainda interpretados num sistema coerente.

Num plano intermédio surgia desde o direito ao sigilo na correspondência, defendido já por Afonso X, o Sábio, o das Cantigas de Santa Maria, avô do primeiro rei de Portugal. Mas outros eram já direitos de novo tipo, direitos dos peregrinos, dos soldados, e até das mulheres.

E outros ainda, conquanto antigos, configuravam garantias, de índole processual e até de grande relevo, como a instituição do visitador dos cárceres em Castela, com poderes de revisão de processos de presos. E com poderes para mesmo ali os soltar, se acaso o que chamamos hoje due process of law não houvesse sido cumprido. Fiquei com a impressão que o que se passa na ópera Fidelio (aliás uma ópera que pessoalmente considerei enfadonha, salvo a bela ária do carcereiro sobre o oiro), tem algo a ver com esta instituição. Mas seria preciso ir averiguar, e também, o grande Beethoven que me perdoe, ter coragem para de novo ouvir a ópera.

Lamento, é mesmo de lamentar, que o meu redespertar para o tema tenha vindo dos nossos vizinhos. Mas as coisas são como são. A política da Língua castelhana é muito mais ativa que a da Língua Portuguesa. Se um acordo ortográfico que tira meia duzia de letras e dois pontinhos em palavras causa escândalo e comoção de um lado e de outro do Atlântico, como poderemos ter uma política comum da Língua? Fico deveras vexado quando vejo o Instituto Cervantes com pujantes sedes e cursos, e não encontro um Instituto da Língua Portuguesa luso-brasileiro e dos demais países que a têm como sua. O português Instituto Camões afigura-se-me um apêndice de Embaixadas e Consulados, sem verdadeira visibilidade nem mesmo aqui no Brasil. Mas os colegas dirão... Exceção se faça ao Museu da Língua Portuguesa, que é uma catedral sagrada da Língua.

O mundo de língua castelhana já há bastantes anos, pois, procurou averiguar de velhas liberdades e direitos ibéricos (remotamente originários ainda da monarquia visigótica), que teriam passado para os países desse idioma na América Latina. E com o legado de Língua Portuguesa, o que se terá passado? Não só no Brasil, como em África e na Ásia...

3. O Espírito das Leis Lusófonas

Como não colocar uma interrogação: será possível que a Casa do Ser da Língua Portuguesa seja uma casa diferente das demais? E tal no atinente a vários tipos ou "géneros" em que a filosofia do Direito se expressa: não apenas a jurisfilosofia explícita do direito dos professores, mas também a jurisfilosofia implícita, presente na Literatura e nas Artes. E a questão não só se refere ao problema no passado, como no presente, e sobretudo no futuro.

Creio que a filosofia dos professores, explícita, tende normalmente para uma de duas orientações, nos nossos países:

Tradicionalmente, era comum a expressão coimbrã dizer-se que "o que o lente diz, vem de Paris". E recorde-se que Coimbra foi, no mundo de Língua Portuguesa, a única universidade durante séculos: até à independência do Brasil e em Portugal só perderia realmente o monopólio (salvo uma tentativa gorada dos Jesuítas no séc. XVII), depois da implantação da República, em 1910. Bem ao contrário do que ocorria com a língua castelhana: mas há quem pense que a unidade do Brasil, por contraposição à proliferação de estados de língua castelhana no hemisfério sul, se deve precisamente a essa unidade da elite académica, toda formada em Coimbra até à independência.

Por um lado, havia uma dependência grande do conhecimento estrangeiro, que se ia buscar como moda. Mas a isso contrapunha-se uma vontade eclética. Pelo que se colhiam várias modas, e na junção delas (não nos ingredientes, mas no tempero, se diria) algo de pessoal coloca-ria cada Mestre.

Contudo, de há algumas décadas a esta parte, afigura-se-nos que a importação continua, em vários horizontes em que se fala português, contudo o ecletismo tende a diminuir. E não raro os pesquisadores e docentes parecem enquistar-se na lição de um único mestre, ou de uma só escola, que reverenciam como dogma, esquecendo e desprezando tudo o mais em redor.

As exceções são obviamente muito de louvar.

Devo fazer a minha autocrítica. Só agora, uma dúzia de anos após ter chegado ao topo da carreira, a cátedra, é que começo a pensar em publicar autonomamente o que será o meu pensamento sobre Filosofia do Direito. Até agora, os meus manuais, monografias e teses, estão cheios das ideias dos outros. E reconheço que assim tem de ser, porque seria ousada petulância vir dizer o que se pensa sem provar que se sabe o que os outros já disseram. Mas, note-se: refiro-me apenas aos principais dos outros, a começar pelos clássicos. Não um ou outro dos "outros" apenas. E muito menos os "outros" que são capelinha ou moda.

Cremos assim que, humildemente, avanço a hipótese de que não será talvez ainda entre os professores que se encontrarão as mais genuinamente lusófonas teorias do Direito. Penso que mais bem recompensados serão os nossos esforços se nos encaminharmos para a pesquisa sobre o que do Direito pensam os não juristas, ou juristas não agindo enquanto tais (ex-juristas normalmente, se é que um jurista alguma vez se torna ex- de si mesmo) e para o que se poderia chamar "espírito das leis" dos países lusófonos.

Esse "espírito das leis" lusófonas tem um antecedente para Portugal de grande relevo, embora o texto seja esquecidíssimo. Teixeira de Pascoaes (jurista de formação e grande poeta incompreendido e mal interpretado) procurou coligir num livro que dirigia aos estudantes do ensino elementar (mas que nunca seria dotado oficialmente, como é óbvio) um conjunto de singularidades lusas no direito: a começar pela forma pactuada de governo na própria velha monarquia, quando outros povos europeus ainda gemiam ao peso de poderes sanguinários (e até, relembremos nós, faziam sacrifícios humanos).

Não se pode prescindir da citação do mais relevante desse texto, que aliás é também um certo programa, e não apenas uma descrição do passado. Como aliás é sempre a redescoberta da raízes: as raízes servem para fazer asas! Também hoje procuramos a nossa identidade porque acreditamos que ela foi desvirtuada. Pelo menos, olvidada.

Foi o que ocorreu explicitamente com os preâmbulos das constituições veteroliberais do final do séc. XVIII e inícios do séc. XIX, em França, Espanha e Portugal: todas se reclamaram de uma redescoberta de velhos direitos. José Liberato Freire de Carvalho, liberal português exilado em Londres, confessou nas suas memórias que se pediam as Cortes Velhas, não reunidas (como ocorrera também com os Estado Gerais em França: os absolutismos nunca gostaram de assembleias) havia muito, porque se sabia que elas traziam no ventre as Cortes Novas. E citemos um velho blues de outra língua, mas da mesma civilização: "everything old is new again".

Dizia então Pascoaes:

> "É certo que a nossa jurisprudência deriva das leis godas e romanas, e a dos últimos tempos não é mais que uma cópia inferioríssima das leis estrangeiras que desnaturaram por completo o corpo jurídico do Estado.
> Mas há leis na nossa antiga legislação, como as primeiras leis proteccionistas do comércio marítimo (Cortes de Atouguia) e do desenvolvimento da agricultura, que nasceram directamente do instinto que teve Portugal, depois de se fixar como Pátria, de se defender e consolidar. Ele começou por criar a família rural, ligando-a à posse duradoura da terra. Assim, entre nós, o morgadio teve como origem uma lei (lei avoenga, da 1.ª Dinastia).
> Temos ainda os forais e os princípios de direito político estabelecidos nas antigas cortes, revelando o espírito de independência e liberdade que animou sempre a alma popular. Intervinha no governo do País, na sucessão do trono, em todos os actos de interesse geral que o Rei praticasse: a guerra e a paz, lançamento de impostos, etc. E exercia ainda uma esperta vigilância sobre o procedimento dos homens de Estado, alguns dos quais foram acusados e condenados !
> Em plena Idade Média, enquanto outros Povos gemiam sob o peso do poder absoluto, impúnhamos à nossa Monarquia a forma condicional: o Rei governará se for digno de governar, e governará de acordo com a nossa vontade, expressa em cortes gerais reunidas anualmente.
> Temos ainda várias leis antigas emanadas do Costume, as quais receberam dele uma nuance original que também caracteriza o génio português"[2]

Tratar-se-ia então de, com vasta equipa de pesquisadores, nos di-

[2] PASCOAES, Teixeira de – Arte de ser Português, Lisboa, Assírio & Alvim, pp. 78-79.

versos países que falam a nossa língua, procurar traços comuns, e traços diferenciadores dos demais. É uma tarefa hercúlea, mas nada que não se consiga, desde que a torneira dos fundos científicos se abra para este tipo de pesquisas.

Temos a iluminar os nossos esforços esta passagem, algo enigmática, do luso-brasileiro Agostinho da Silva:

> "Mas os Portugueses é que, realmente, levaram o Império Romano até aos seus confins, o Império Romano que ainda hoje dura! Porque aquela história do Império Romano ter acabado quando entraram os Bárbaros, quando entrou o Cristo… coisa nenhuma! O Império veio por aí fora. Hoje, tudo é governado pelo Direito Romano! […] Claro que Portugal tinha o seu próprio Direito! É o drama da Península! O Carlos V, que é um Imperador Alemão, veio para Espanha cheio de Direito Romano. […] As coisas que ele traz para Espanha, traz para a Península. Mas a Península nem era do Direito Romano, nem do mercantilismo capitalista, nem da Contra-Reforma. Também não era da Reforma, era ela, era a Península […] Porque o que os Espanhóis queriam era manter os 'fueros y costumbres', não era a porcaria do Direito Romano, sobretudo do fim do Império, não é?"[3]

Será que no porão das suas caravelas Cabral trouxe, além do tão referido nepotismo da carta de Pero Vaz de Caminha, também algumas sementes de liberdade dos velhos direitos também portugueses das velhas liberdades ibéricas? E como Cabral também Vasco da Gama e outros... No reinado do tão execrado D. João VI (de um e de outro lado do Atlântico) ainda se podem ver alguns vestígios de uma singularidade antropodikeia no direito político? Parece que sim... Mas ocorrerá o mesmo no direito privado e no penal?

Gilberto Freyre, na sua obra-prima Casa Grande & Senzala, alude ao realismo económico e jurídico dos Portugueses na formação do Brasil e liberdade de expressão "falaram sempre grosso aos representantes de El-Rei" [4]), e refere o sistema leve e irregular da administração do Brasil, pelo menos até ao séc. XVIII, e citando Leroy Beaulieu[5]. Mais diante,

---

[3] SILVA, Agostinho da – Ir à Índia sem abandonar Portugal, Lisboa, Assírio & Alvim, 1994pp. 32-34.

[4] FREYRE, Gilberto – Casa Grande & Senzala. Formação da Família Brasileira sob o Regime de Economia Patriarcal, Lisboa, Livros do Brasil, s.d., p. 17.

[5] Ibidem, p. 30.

alude aos "privilégios" de mouros e judeus[6], logo, tratamento não discriminatório das minorias, que era aliás timbre das Ordenações Afonsinas, etc..

O autor não deixa de referir esse momento fundador das liberdades ibéricas que terá sido o dos concílios de Toledo. E comenta: "(...) em Toledo, no concílio celebrado em 633, os bispos tiveram o gosto de ver o rei prostrado a seus pés".

Contudo, o mais importante terão sido mesmo os resultados para o povo em geral, e não uma questão entre realeza e clero. O clero, aí, terá liderado a vanguarda dos direitos.

Limitamo-nos a citar dois trechos, que nos parecem muitíssimo significativos, de Sérgio Buarque de Holanda, em Raízes do Brasil:

> "(...) pela importância particular que atribuem ao valor próprio da pessoa humana, à autonomia de cada um dos homens em relação aos semelhantes no tempo e no espaço, devem os espanhóis e os portugueses muito da sua originalidade nacional "7.
> "E a verdade é que, bem antes de triunfarem no mundo as chamadas ideias revolucionárias, portugueses e espanhóis parecem ter sentido vivamente a irracionalidade específica, a injustiça social de certos privilégios, sobretudo os privilégios hereditários. O prestígio pessoal, independente do nome herdado, manteve-se continuamente nas épocas mais gloriosas da história das nações ibéricas"8.

Também o jusracionalismo luso-brasileiro se nos apresentam com uma faceta tal que em autores e atores jurídicos como Cruz e Silva, Tomás António Gonzaga e Ribeiro dos Santos (estes três com ligação clara ao Brasil) e o (menos brasílico) Melo Freire se nos afigura ficar até em causa a clássica e radical divisão entre jusracionalismo e realismo clássico. Ela tem a seu favor elementos de cor local, cabeleiras empoadas no séc. XVIII, e sobretudo o despotismo iluminado. Mas ao nível jurídico propriamente dito, desde uma peça processual que encontramos em Braga, do punho de Melo Freire, a favor do "Marquesinho" dos Távoras, até à argumentação de Cruz e Silva, na sua polémica com a coroa a propósito da falta dos juízes a uma solenidade de corte, em que haviam sido de antemão preteridos em favor dos militares (para só citar dois exemplos) tudo nos leva a crer que o corte, pelo menos no mundo de língua portuguesa, é político, mas não é metodológico e quiçá nem sequer das grandes ideias filosófico-jurídicas não imediatamente relacionadas com a política.

[6] Ibidem, p. 198.
[7] HOLANDA, Sérgio Buarque de – Raízes do Brasil, 4.ª ed. (1.ª portuguesa), Lisboa, Gradiva, 2000, p. 14.
[8] Ibidem, p. 17.

Tentei que uma tese de doutoramento analisasse a jurisprudência intensivamente para provar ou infirmar esta hipótese, mas a tese fez-se e aprovou-se, com muito interesse, mas o doutorando, hoje doutor, preferiu ficar nas teorias mais doutrinais... Estava no seu direito...

Fala-se ainda, por exemplo, da suavização das penas, do humanitarismo penal: Manuel José de Paiva, obscuro juiz, teria precedido mesmo o Marquês de Beccaria. Mas pouco mais...

É no plano jurídico-político que a invocação do direito e da tradição nacionais é mais frequente, mas para fazer uma contraposição com o constitucionalismo "estrangeiro" ou "estrangeirado". Cremos contudo que há uma confluência e não oposição entre as formas de controlo e liberdade políticas em tese (na prática a teoria seria outra) existentes nas velhas liberdades hispânicas exportadas para o Mundo, e o constitucionalismo moderno, inglês, americano e francês. São facetas diversas da mesma preocupação. Mas a oposição é vital para os que, como diria Teilhard de Chardin, sendo nossos contemporâneos, ainda não são modernos.

Será preciso, pois, calcorrear a História em busca de exemplos, e não tomar a nuvem da exceção pela Juno da regra. A história, como dizia Dioniso de Halicarnasso, não é (e aqui não pretende ser) mais que "filosofia a partir de exemplos". Os exemplos históricos serão um convite aos estudos no sentido de se avaliar da existência, ainda que mítica, de um legado jurídico com eventuais singularidades.

4. A Filosofia Jurídica Implícita

Mas nem só da análise do espírito das leis lusófonas viveríamos.

Devemos tomar ainda em consideração as chamadas filosofia brasileira e filosofia portuguesa, ou mesmo filosofia luso-brasileira, ou, de todo o mundo (independentemente das classificações, que implicam opções), a filosofia que autores brasileiros e portugueses (e dos PALOP e de Timor, etc.) vão fazendo, quer em estudos especificamente filosóficos, quer em textos literários com dimensão jurisfilosófica.

Pessoalmente, do estudo de autores normalmente sobretudo conhecidos como literários como Fernando Pessoa, Teixeira de Pascoaes, Guerra Junqueiro, e até Raul Brandão, e dos mais filosóficos Leonardo Coimbra, Sampaio Bruno, Álvaro Ribeiro, José Marinho, Dalila Pereira da Costa, Afonso Botelho, Delfim Santos, entre outros, há já algumas regularidades que se podem extrair.

A mais importante das quais afigura-se-nos ser, em geral, o pluralismo jurídico. Sem uma necessária vinculação ao direito natural (pelo contrário, em alguns casos, como em Álvaro Ribeiro, até contra ele, ou o que se pensaria ele ser), mas colocando sempre em causa a omnipotência e omnivalidade do mero direito positivo. Colocando sempre, pois, o problema da Justiça.

Leonardo Coimbra será muito claro ao afirmar que a si lhe não importava o código da justiça, se ele tem apenas palavras e não justiça...

Encontrando-se hoje o Direito numa encruzilhada. O que mais nos importa ainda saber será do papel que os juristas, e em especial os amigos da Filosofia do Direito que em ambos os hemisférios falam a Língua Portuguesa, pela particular inventiva, ductilidade, adaptabilidade e particular "génio", serão capazes de desempenhar.

Além da filosofia brasileira propriamente dita (recorde-se que a "Revista Brasileira de Filosofia" tout court tem desde sempre ligação a juristas: recordemos o nome de Miguel Reale), a literatura brasileira está cheia de pérolas sobre o Direito. Quão bela seria uma tese, por exemplo, sobre o Direito e a Ética em Grande Sertão – Veredas, de Guimarães Rosa, cujo original tive a honra de ver e tocar, como relíquia, pelas mãos do saudoso Dr. Mindelin, na sua casa Biblioteca em São Paulo...

Sabemos, pois, que a Língua é mais que um veículo comunicacional vazio e inócuo. Uma "casa do ser molda" o ser ao mesmo tempo que o espelha. Portanto, mais ainda que um elogio do Pensar o Direito em Português, o mais importante parece ser entender o que venha a ser uma Cultura dos Povos de Língua Portuguesa - e como essa Cultura se pode refletir num Direito com elementos comuns.

Já se pode começar por ver, hoje em dia, por exemplo alguns elementos de uma comunidade constitucional lusófona, ou, ao menos, para já, luso-brasileira: as nossas Constituições são, antes de mais, constituições cidadãs... E por isso "incomodam muita gente" (na verdade pouca, mas relevante)... Ora sendo a Constituição o vértice da pirâmide normativa, é natural que todo o edifício jurídico viesse a refletir os seus valores e princípios, e assim o mesmo ar de família impregnasse todas as fontes de direito e o ambiente ou clima jurídico e institucional em geral. Daí seria impossível refletir sobre o Direito sem ver esse ar de família.

Mas a constitucionalidade irradiante que deveria existir e prevalecer ainda precisa, em geral, de maior aprofundamento. No caso português, a Constituição presentemente a ser vítima de um enorme ataque (com grande apoio da comunicação social), a que o Tribunal Constitucional tem resistido, declarando sucessivamente inconstitucionalidade de normas[9]. Mas é em tempos críticos como os presentes que mais agudamente se pode pensar o Direito, na sua mais radical e profunda realidade: sem véus e sem máscaras.

Ora há sempre uma Filosofia Jurídica ínsita nas várias ordens jurídicas (não é Filosofia do Direito, mas Filosofia no Direito). Ora estamos em crer que, como já Gilberto Freyre previra, a nossa cultura se encontra ameaçada "por parte de grupos tecnicamente mais fortes"[10], ou seja, em termos filosóficos, por uma filosofia geral (uma cosmovisão) que se traduz numa filosofia política e este numa ideologia - que tem passado na comunicação social de "neoliberalismo" a "ultraliberalismo" e agora já vai sendo chamada "liberal fascismo"[11] - a qual nada tem a ver com os valores que nos são próprios, antes arranca do individualismo possessivo, normalmente considerado mais próprio de outras latitudes[12].

---

[9] Cf., por todos, FERREIRA DA CUNHA, Paulo – Constituição & Política, Lisboa, Quid Juris, 2012; Idem – Direito Constitucional Geral, nova ed., Lisboa, Quid Juris, 2013.

[10] FREYRE, Gilberto – Uma Cultura Ameaçada: a Luso-Brasileira, apud O Futuro Político da Lusofonia, Lisboa, Verbo, 2002, de Vamireh Chacon.

[11] Cf. algumas aproximações a novas manifestações do fenómeno, v.g. in BOMBIG, Alberto / CORONATO, Marcos – Dilemas da Democracia, "Época", 12 de agosto de 2013, p. 52-54. V. ainda RIEMEN, Rob – De eeuwige terugkeer van het fascisme, trad. port. de Maria Carvalho, O Eterno Retorno do Fascismo, trad. port., Lisboa, Bizâncio, 2012. Explicitamente, no Brasil, ALTMAN, Breno – Neoconservadors são Vanguarda Liberal-Fascista, in: ttp://www.brasil247.com/pt/247/poder/110840/

[12] Cf. o clássico MACPHERSON, C. B. — The Political Theory of Possessive Individualism, Clarendon Press, Oxford University Press, 1962. E ainda, v.g., BOUDON, Raymond —L'Individualisme en Sociologie (Entretien), in «Esprit», n.º 108, nov. 1985, p. 101-110; CAMPS, Victoria — Paradojas del Individualismo, Crítica, 1993, trad. port. de Manuel Alberto, Paradoxos do Individualismo, Lisboa, Relógio D'Água, 1996; DUMONT, Louis — Ensaios sobre o Individualismo. Uma perspectiva antropológica sobre a ideologia moderna, trad. port. de Miguel Serras Pereira, Lisboa, Dom Quixote, 1992; LIPOVETSKY, Gilles — L'Ere du Vide, trad. port. de Miguel Serras Pereira e Ana Luísa Faria, A Era do vazio. Ensaio sobre o Individualismo Contemporâneo, Lisboa, Relógio d 'água, 1988.

A influência de J. C. Salgado na produção científica em Filosofia do Direito na Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais

Laura Souza Lima e Brito[1]

Resumo: O presente artigo defende a existência positiva de uma tradição na pesquisa produzida sob orientação dos docentes da área de Filosofia do Direito na Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Ainda, resta demonstrado que há uma concentração dos trabalhos científicos em torno da produção de Joaquim Carlos Salgado, professor titular de Filosofia do Direito naquela universidade desde 1991, aposentado em 2009. Especificamente, dentro do acima exposto, é apontado que a linha mestra desse núcleo de produção científica é a efetivação do processo histórico das instituições e dos valores jurídicos.

Palavras-chave: Filosofia do Direito. Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Pós-graduação.

1. Considerações Iniciais

O presente artigo foi elaborado para ser apresentado no XXVI World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy, ocorrido na Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais, no grupo de trabalho especial denominado VII Jornada Brasileira de Filosofia do Direito, cuja pretensão temática era: "reunir os trabalhos que representam o estado da arte da Filosofia do Direito no Brasil (e de todas as suas disciplinas, tais como Teoria da Justiça, Teoria do Método Jurídico, Hermenêutica Jurídica, etc)". Diante disso, a proposta ora apresentada é de uma análise da presença dos temas tradicionalmente pesquisados por Joaquim Carlos Salgado nas dissertações e teses na Faculdade de Direito da UFMG como um parâmetro possível de verificação da inter-relação das pesquisas de

[1] Aluna do Programa de Pós-Graduação da Faculdade de Direito da Universidade de São Paulo – nível doutorado. Graduada em Direito na Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Email: lauraslbrito@gmail.com/laurabrito@usp.br.

Filosofia do Direito naquela instituição.

Salgado é Professor Titular de Teoria Geral e Filosofia do Direito na Faculdade de Direito da UFMG desde 1991, tendo se aposentado compulsoriamente em 2009. Desde então, ministra seminários na pós-graduação da faculdade. Durante a carreira docente, ministrou diversas disciplinas na graduação e na pós-graduação e orientou alunos de mestrado e doutorado.

Sua obra tem eixos fundamentais que podem ser entendidos como: (a) teoria da justiça; (b) a experiência da consciência jurídica em Roma; (c) a relação entre a razão e a história do direito e do Estado no ocidente; (d) o idealismo alemão; (e) direitos fundamentais como a justiça concreta no mundo contemporâneo; e (f) fundamentos da hermenêutica[2].

A questão proposta é: do universo de teses e dissertações defendidas na Faculdade de Direito da UFMG, na área de Filosofia do Direito, desde 1991 até a metade de 2013, quantas abordam temas diretamente ligados aos eixos acima apontados?

Os trabalhos defendidos naquela instituição estão disponíveis na internet[3], com possibilidade pesquisa por orientador e ordenação dos resultados por data da defesa. Diante desses dados, serão analisados os trabalhos orientados pelos professores do Departamento de Direito do Trabalho e Introdução ao Estudo do Direito, excetuadas as teses e dissertações orientadas por professores de Direito do Trabalho. Ainda, serão considerados os trabalhos defendidos do ano de 1991 até julho de 2013, ou seja, desde que Salgado tornou-se titular da área de Filosofia do Direito na UFMG até a apresentação da presente pesquisa no XXVI World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy.

O método para verificação da similaridade do tema dos trabalhos obtidos pela pesquisa na plataforma virtual da universidade com os eixos de estudo de Salgado foi a leitura de sumário, resumo, introdução, conclusão e referências bibliográficas, sempre que disponíveis. Aqueles trabalhos que apresentarem a obra de Salgado como bibliografia central para o desenvolvimento ou que a temática abordada seja um de seus eixos fundamentais serão justificadamente apontados como "coerentes com a pesquisa de Salgado". Ao fim, serão confrontados o número de trabalhos analisados e o de estudos que abordam os temas em comento.

[2] Esta é a síntese realizada pela autora deste artigo, de acordo com a sua leitura da obra em análise. Segundo o texto informado por Joaquim Carlos Salgado em seu currículo na Platafoma Lattes, ele "tem experiência na área de Direito, com ênfase em Filosofia do Direito, atuando principalmente nos seguintes temas: direito, direitos fundamentais, filosofia, teoria da justiça e hermenêutica". Disponível em < http://lattes.cnpq.br/2312044112222253>, acessado em 01 de julho de 2013.

[3] Disponível em <http://www.pos.direito.ufmg.br>, acessado em 01 de julho de 2013.

A hipótese deste trabalho é que Joaquim Carlos Salgado conseguiu formar gerações de pesquisadores na UFMG em torno de uma pesquisa alinhada e consistente, com coerência mútua entre eles, como aspecto positivo da produção de conhecimento, nos termos das orientações mais recentes de planejamento de pesquisa no Brasil.

2. Eixos fundamentais da pesquisa desenvolvida por Salgado

Joaquim Carlos Salgado formou-se em Direito (1962) e em Filosofia (1973) na Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. É especialista em Filosofia do Direito pela Universidade de Bonn (1976) e Doutor em Direito pela Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais (1985).

De acordo com as informações contidas no currículo de Salgado na Plataforma Lattes, desde 1980 ele desenvolve o projeto de pesquisa Justiça: teoria e realidade, descrito da seguinte maneira:

> Investigação do percurso histórico da idéia de justiça, em íntima conexão com a demanda pela efetividade do Direito. O projeto encontra-se em desenvolvimento desde os anos 1980 e em seu âmbito produziu-se A Idéia de Justiça em Kant, A Idéia de Justiça em Hegel e o recente A Idéia de Justiça no Mundo Contemporâneo. A investigação desdobra-se na direção da construção de uma Teoria da Justiça conectada ao legado do pensamento ocidental e ao projeto ético do Estado de Direito e apta a servir ao Direito.

Importante, então, salientar que a análise realizada neste artigo acerca das temáticas desenvolvidas por Joaquim Carlos Salgado corrobora, mas vai além das informações por ele prestadas oficialmente, sendo fruto de pesquisa da autora sobre a obra do professor em comento e de sua inteira responsabilidade.

Diante disso, é possível começar a explicitar os principais eixos formados por suas pesquisas desde então a partir de um tronco fundamental que é a história do desenvolvimento dialético da idéia de justiça no mundo ocidental, elaborada em cinco volumes. Na realidade, só a posteridade pôde apresentar sua principal obra como unidade desenvolvida em múltiplas etapas. Explica-se.

O primeiro parte trazida ao público é sua tese de doutorado, publicada originalmente pela Editora UFMG (1986 e 1995) e em versão revista pela Editora Del Rey (2012), intitulada A idéia de justiça em Kant: seu fundamento na liberdade e na igualdade. A referida obra tem como objetivo demonstrar que Kant centraliza seu conceito de justiça na questão da liberdade intrínseca a cada homem: "o primeiro bem que se deve reconhecer a cada um, pelo simples fato de ser humano, é a liberdade" (SALGADO, 1995, p. 20). Segundo Salgado, a tradição antiga e medieval da idéia de justiça como igualdade é conservada em Kant, junto à qual ele destaca o seu elemento eminentemente ético que é a liberdade. Neste caso, a idéia de justiça encontra-se no âmbito da filosofia do sujeito.

A obra A idéia de justiça em Kant já apresenta o posicionamento de Joaquim Carlos Salgado no sentido de

> A idéia de justiça, vista assim do ponto de vista dialético da sua evolução histórica a partir dos momentos concretos de seu aparecimento, embora se mostre também como ideologia na medida em que representa interesses de classe, incorpora-se como valor ao patrimônio espiritual da humanidade civilizada. Como é apenas uma idéia, não pretende efetivar-se mecanicamente, mas de forma dialética, segundo as novas conquistas materiais e espirituais da humanidade. (SALGADO, 1995, p. 20)

O segundo trabalho desse tronco fundamental é A idéia de justiça em Hegel, publicação feita pelas Edições Loyola (1996) da tese para professor titular da Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais. Este livro aborda, por meio da análise da Filosofia do Direito de Hegel, a assimilação de um novo valor à idéia de justiça - ao lado da igualdade (período clássico) e da liberdade (modernidade), agora se tem o trabalho, compondo a idéia de justiça social no Estado democrático contemporâneo. Neste volume, a idéia de justiça está no âmbito da metafísica especulativa.

A terceira obra que compõe o centro da pesquisa de Salgado é A idéia de justiça no mundo contemporâneo: fundamentação e aplicação do direito como maximum ético, publicado pela Editora Del Rey em 2007. Neste livro, há uma perspectiva histórica evidente, vez que, segundo o próprio autor, "este livro trata do resgate da experiência jurídica em Roma para o entendimento da idéia de justiça no mundo contemporâneo" (SALGADO, 2007, p. 1). A processualidade histórica da idéia de justiça, que se revela na atualidade como efetivação de direitos fundamentais universalmente declarados e reconhecidos, é o fio condutor da pesquisa. Em suma:

> A idéia de justiça no mundo contemporâneo é a efetividade de todo o processo histórico, cujo vetor é a racionalidade imanente do ethos ocidental que se desenvolve do conceito de homem (zoon logikón), desdobrado historicamente como cidadão da pólis, pessoa de direito em Roma até ao de sujeito de direito universal, reconhecido formalmente nas constituições dos Estados civilizados do nosso tempo histórico, bem como na Carta das Nações Unidas, como tentativa de síntese da voluntas e do logos na ordenação racional da vida, tarefa do direito (SALGADO, 2007, p. 270).

O quarto livro sobre a idéia de justiça é, na realidade, o primeiro volume do tratado e será lançado sob o título A idéia de justiça no período clássico. A obra está no prelo e seu conteúdo encontra-se no âmbito da metafísica do objeto.

Por fim, o quinto volume do conjunto da obra, em revisão pelo autor, deve receber o título A idéia de justiça no mundo contemporâneo II. Este último aprofundará o desdobramento dos direitos fundamentais no Estado de Direito contemporâneo, na perspectiva do maximum ético, como momento de efetivação do embate historicamente desenvolvido entre poder e liberdade, como anunciado em outros textos de Salgado. Neste volume de conclusão, o autor destaca que o enfrentamento da questão posta − a de como se realiza a justiça como idéia no mundo contemporâneo − exige que o tema seja tratado segundo uma perspectiva interdisciplinar, em que a organização do poder e a ordenação da liberdade tenham consideração epistemológica própria[4].

São também relevantes para o levantamento dos temas que se revelaram como constantes das pesquisas de Joaquim Carlos Salgado os artigos por ele publicados, dentro os quais, devem ser destacados: Os direitos fundamentais (1996); Princípios hermenêuticos dos direitos fundamentais (1996); Fundamentos filosóficos para uma hermenêutica jurídica (1997); Hermenêutica dos direitos fundamentais e o Judiciário (1997); O estado ético e o estado poiético (1998); Contas e ética (1999); Semiótica estrutural e transcendentalidade do discurso sobre a justiça (2000); A experiência da consciência jurídica em Roma (2001); Globalização e justiça universal concreta (2004). Todos eles, de alguma forma, tratam da retomada histórica da idéia de justiça no mundo ocidental, com destaque para a matriz romana e tendo como cumeada os direitos fundamentais no mundo contemporâneo, cuja efetivação depende de um rigoroso estudo hermenêutico.

[4] Referências da obra em revisão me foram gentilmente cedidas pelo Professor Joaquim Carlos Salgado em e-mail de 20 de janeiro de 2014.

Diante disso, é possível afirmar que a obra de Joaquim Carlos Salgado tem eixos fundamentais que podem ser entendidos como: (a) teoria da justiça; (b) a experiência da consciência jurídica em Roma; (c) a relação entre a razão e a história do direito e do Estado no ocidente; (d) o idealismo alemão; (e) direitos fundamentais como a justiça concreta no mundo contemporâneo; e (f) fundamentos da hermenêutica.

3. Os trabalhos defendidos na pós-graduação da Faculdade de Direito da UFMG

Está disponível na página da internet da Pós-Graduação em Direito da Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais um registro das teses e dissertações defendidas no programa daquela instituição[5]. Não é possível identificar se todas as teses e dissertações estão listadas nessa base de dados, mas é possível afirmar que, até julho de 2013, existiam 1.112 trabalhos enumerados, sendo 303 teses e 809 dissertações.

Para fins deste trabalho, do universo acima apontado, foram selecionados os trabalhos orientados pelos professores do Departamento de Direito do Trabalho e Introdução ao Estudo do Direito[6], excetuadas as teses e dissertações orientadas por professores que lecionam Direito do Trabalho. Ainda, foram considerados os trabalhos defendidos a partir do ano de 1991, ou seja, desde que Joaquim Carlos Salgado tornou-se titular da área de Filosofia do Direito na UFMG.

Diante dos critérios acima relacionados, foi possível selecionar 96 trabalhos de pós-graduação, sendo 29 teses e 67 dissertações.

Esses 96 trabalhos previamente selecionados foram analisados por meio da leitura das informações disponíveis no site do PPG – título, linha de pesquisa, resumo, palavras-chave (quando informadas) –, além de dados encontrados em página de busca na internet. Aos referidos trabalhos foram aplicados os seguintes critérios de classificação: são coerentes com as pesquisas do Professor Salgado? Em caso positivo, qual a justificativa?

---

[5] Disponível em: http://www.pos.direito.ufmg.br/tesediss.php. Acessado em 01 de julho de 2013.

[6] Existem trabalhos que poderiam ser identificados como da área de Filosofia e Teoria Geral do Direito que foram orientados por professores de outros departamentos. Nesse caso, não foram considerados neste artigo.

Para responder a essa última pergunta, as respostas possíveis, baseadas no tema e nos marcos teóricos dos trabalhos, eram: (a) teoria da justiça; (b) experiência da consciência jurídica em Roma; (c) relação entre a razão e a história do direito e do Estado no ocidente; (d) idealismo alemão; (e) direitos fundamentais como a justiça concreta no mundo contemporâneo; (f) fundamentos da hermenêutica.

O resultado encontrado foi que, dos 96 trabalhos analisados, 56 tinham, por meio de algum desses critérios acima mencionados, coerência com os eixos de pesquisa de Joaquim Carlos Salgado. Dentre eles, 18 teses e 38 dissertações.

É preciso destacar também que, entre os trabalhos testados, 35 – 18 teses e 17 dissertações – foram de orientação do próprio Salgado, sendo o professor da área que mais orientou no período selecionado. Ou seja, 36,45% dos trabalhos defendidos em Filosofia do Direito entre 1991 e 2013 foram de orientação do professor em comento.

Ainda quanto aos critérios de justificação da classificação como "coerentes com a pesquisa de Joaquim Carlos Salgado", é preciso esclarecer que alguns trabalhos satisfaziam mais de um tópico. Nesses casos, foi indicado somente o de maior adesão. Ainda, em dois casos, por falta de informações, os trabalhos foram indicados como não coerentes.

Dito isso, foi possível encontrar os seguintes resultados:

1. 8 trabalhos sobre "teoria da justiça", sendo 3 teses e 5 dissertações;
2. 4 trabalhos sobre "experiência da consciência jurídica em Roma", sendo 1 teses e 3 dissertações;
3. 12 trabalhos sobre "relação entre a razão e a história do direito e do Estado no ocidente", sendo 5 teses e 7 dissertações;
4. 7 trabalhos sobre "idealismo alemão", sendo 3 teses e 4 dissertações;
5. 7 trabalhos sobre "direitos fundamentais como a justiça concreta no mundo contemporâneo", sendo 3 teses e 4 dissertações;
6. 18 trabalhos sobre "fundamentos da hermenêutica", sendo 3 teses e 15 dissertações.

Interessante notar, nesse sentido, que o tema da hermenêutica teve o maior número de adesões. Esse foi um tema de pesquisa cuja ampla divulgação também foi dada por Salgado, desde estudantes da graduação, já que na "hermenêutica jurídica tem de inserir-se os princípios superiores do direito" (SALGADO, 1996b, p. 29). Ainda, a relevância do tema da hermenêutica dentro do panorama geral da pesquisa de Salgado aparece nos seguintes termos: "todas as suas regras e princípios subalternos convergem para a realização do fim supremo do direito: realizar a liberdade" (SALGADO, 1996b, p. 29).

Ainda, a hermenêutica é o foco da pesquisa da Professora Maria Helena Damasceno e Silva Megale, que sucedeu o Professor Joaquim Carlos Salgado no cargo de titular do Departamento de Direito do Trabalho e Introdução ao Estudo do Direito, e que foi orientada em seu doutorado por Salgado.

Mas entende-se que o maior destaque deve ser dado para a grande adesão ao tema da "relação entre a razão e a história do direito e do Estado no ocidente", que aponta para a hipótese de que o ponto central da pesquisa realizada na área de Filosofia do Direito na Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais tem sido a processualidade histórica do Direito, em outras palavras, a efetivação do processo histórico das instituições e dos valores jurídicos.

Em suma, entre 1991 e julho de 2013, 58% dos trabalhos de pós-graduação stricto sensu defendidos sob orientação dos professores do Departamento de Direito do Trabalho e Introdução ao Estudo do Direito da Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais guardavam coerência com a pesquisa desenvolvida pelo Professor Joaquim Carlos Salgado, titular da área entre 19991 e 2009. Tendo em vista que o departamento em tela teve, nesse período, 12 professores orientadores[7], cada qual com liberdade científica para desenvolver seus projetos de pesquisa, é possível afirmar que a alta concentração de trabalhos com temas coerentes aos aqui apontados demonstra a consolidação de uma tradição de pesquisa na Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais.

[7] Alexandre Travessoni Gomes, Elza Maria Miranda Afonso, Fabiana de Menezes Soares, Gerson de Britto Mello Boson, Joaquim Carlos Salgado, José Luiz Borges Horta, Mariá Aparecida Brochado Ferreira, Maria Helena Damasceno e Silva Megale, Miracy Barbosa de Sousa Gustin, Mônica Sette Lopes, Renato César Cardoso e Ricardo Henrique de Carvalho Salgado.

4. A busca pelo planejamento da pesquisa no Brasil

A primeira experiência de estabelecimento de critérios de avaliação de pós-graduação em Direito ocorreu em 2001, na avaliação referente ao período 1998-2000[8]. Desde então, são critérios de qualificação desses cursos a adequação e abrangência dos projetos e linhas de pesquisa em relação às áreas de concentração e o vínculo entre linhas e projetos de pesquisa.

Nos critérios de avaliação mais recentes disponibilizados pela CAPES, referentes ao triênio 2004-2006, a questão da coerência e consistência das áreas de concentração, linhas de pesquisa e projetos em andamento continua presente, sendo certo que "linhas de pesquisa que não guardam organicidade entre si e ligação com a área indicam incoerência e conseqüente inconsistência da proposta do programa"[9].

Ou seja, há aproximadamente quinze anos, existe uma busca pelo planejamento da pesquisa em direito no Brasil, sendo certo que faz parte desse plano a coesão entre os trabalhos científicos produzidos numa mesma área dentro de determinado programa de pós-graduação. Isso porque o planejamento da pesquisa no Brasil é o "o reconhecimento de que o processo contemporâneo de pesquisa deve ser coletivo e articulado institucionalmente, como forma de garantir sustentabilidade a muitas universidades e outras organizações congêneres" (BORGES-ANDRADE, 2003, p. 163).

Não é demais observar que, à primeira vista, quando do início da instituição do planejamento de pesquisa em direito, a articulação institucional da produção de conhecimento pareceu uma cerceamento da liberdade científica, ou uma espécie de imposição de cima para baixo nas pesquisas desenvolvidas na pós-graduação. Mas, na realidade, mesmo nas ciências sociais aplicadas, como é o caso do direito, "a cooperação na pesquisa, a sinergia, só pode ser obtida com a união efetiva e o trabalho conjunto de pesquisadores da mesma área e dentro de objetivos comuns" (MARRARA, 2004, p. 24-25).

As breves referências acima expostas acerca de critérios de avaliação da pós-graduação em direito servem para reforçar as vantagens da formação de uma tradição em pesquisa nas áreas de concentração dos programas, assim como se pode verificar, a partir de 1991, na Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais.

[8] Disponível em: http://www.capes.gov.br/images/stories/download/avaliacao/Direito2001_2003.pdf. Acessado em: 01 de julho de 2013.

[9] Disponível em: http://www.capes.gov.br/images/stories/download/avaliacao/CA2007_Direito.pdf. Acessado em 01 de julho de 2013.

5. Considerações finais

A hipótese original deste trabalho era a de que seria possível demonstrar que existe coerência na pesquisa desenvolvida pelos docentes da área de Filosofia do Direito no programa de pós-graduação em direito da Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais, sendo certo que o eixo fundamental dessa coesão seria o trabalho articulado por Joaquim Carlos Salgado a partir de 1991, quando se tornou professor titular da mesma área.

Acredita-se que a hipótese mostrou-se fundamentadamente comprovada, já que do universo de 96 teses e dissertações defendidas na Faculdade de Direito da UFMG, na área de Filosofia do Direito, desde 1991, 56 aguardavam coerência com os eixos de pesquisa de Salgado, quais sejam: (a) teoria da justiça; (b) experiência da consciência jurídica em Roma; (c) relação entre a razão e a história do direito e do Estado no ocidente; (d) idealismo alemão; (e) direitos fundamentais como a justiça concreta no mundo contemporâneo; (f) fundamentos da hermenêutica.

Além disso, entende-se que ficou ressaltado que a linha mestra do conjunto de pesquisa em comento pode ser entendida, em suma, como a efetivação do processo histórico das instituições e dos valores jurídicos.

Por fim, também restou demonstrado que existência de uma tradição científica em torno de temas interligados na área de Filosofia do Direito na Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais está positivamente alinhada com as determinações mais atuais sobre o planejamento da pesquisa no Brasil.

Referências bibliográficas

BORGES-ANDRADE, Jairo Eduardo. Em busca do conceito de linha de pesquisa. RAC, v. 7, n. 2, abr./jun. 2003: 157-170.

MARRARA, Thiago. Liberdade científica e planejamento: uma tensão aparente. RBPG, v. 1, n. 2, nov. 2004: 71-80.

SALGADO, Joaquim Carlos. A idéia de justiça em Hegel. São Paulo: Loyola, 1996.

_____. A idéia de justiça em Kant: seu fundamento na liberdade e na igualdade. Belo Horizonte: Editora UFMG, 1986.

_____. A idéia de justiça em Kant: seu fundamento na liberdade e na igualdade. 2. ed. Belo Horizonte: Editora UFMG, 1995.

_____. A idéia de justiça em Kant: seu fundamento na liberdade e na igualdade. 3. ed. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2012.

_____. A idéia de justiça no mundo contemporâneo: fundamentação e aplicação do direito como maximum ético. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2007.

_____. Contas e ética. Revista do Tribunal de Contas de Minas Gerais, 1999.

_____. Os direitos fundamentais. Revista Brasileira de Estudos Políticos, n. 82, jan. 1996a.

_____. O estado ético e o estado poiético. Revista do Tribunal de Contas de Minas Gerais, vol. 27, n. 2, abr./jun. 1998.

_____. A Experiência da Consciência Jurídica em Roma. Revista do Tribunal de Contas de Minas Gerais, 2002.

_____. Fundamentos filosóficos para uma hermenêutica jurídica. Sino de Samuel, 1997.

_____. Globalização e justiça universal concreta. Revista Brasileira de Estudos Políticos, n. 89, jan./jun. 2004.

_____. Hermenêutica dos direitos fundamentais e o Judiciário. Sino de Samuel, 1997.

_____. Princípios Hermenêuticos dos Direitos Fundamentais. Revista do Tribunal de Contas de Minas Gerais, vol 20, n. 3, jul./set. 1996b.

_____. Semiótica estrutural e transcendentalidade do discurso sobre justiça. Revista da Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais, vol. 1, n. 37, 2000: 79-102.

Pode-se prescindir da ideia de contrato social como parâmetro para uma teoria da justiça relevante?

Alguns inconvenientes da abordagem comparativa de Amartya Sen

Fábio Creder

Resumo: Em A ideia de justiça, sua obra de 2009, Sen enuncia uma crítica contundente às teorias políticas modernas alicerçadas sobre a ideia de contrato social, especialmente a de John Rawls, cuja abordagem da justiça distributiva conta-se entre os exemplares mais notáveis desta corrente.

Neste trabalho pretendo analisar a procedência da crítica de Sen ao contratualismo rawlsiano, ao qual opõe uma abordagem supostamente focada não na concepção, ou identificação transcendental, da justiça ideal, mas na comparação dos resultados empíricos das tentativas de combater fenômenos de injustiça remediáveis com os quais nos deparamos quotidianamente.

A crítica de Sen evidentemente possui vários méritos, mas há que se questionar a possibilidade de uma teoria política ou do direito conceber a estrutura básica de uma sociedade prescindindo de alguma concepção mínima de contrato social. A teoria da justiça de Sen, marcada pelo dinamismo característico do pensamento econômico, com seu método comparativo, focado nas realizações efetivamente viáveis nas sociedades tais como se nos apresentam no tempo em que são consideradas, provavelmente carece de elementos que possibilitem a concepção de uma estrutura institucional mínima para um Estado em fase de constituição. Parece-me, ademais, que a doutrina rawlsiana seja essencialmente uma teoria do direito constitucional, e como tal deva ser interpretada.

A hipótese, portanto, que eu gostaria de aventar neste trabalho, sugere que a abordagem de Sen, a despeito do seu louvável pragmatismo, ao invés de afigurar-se uma alternativa à teoria da justiça de Rawls, seria mais bem considerada seu importante, e até mesmo indispensável complemento. Pretendo demonstrar que o contratualismo, designadamente o rawlsiano, cumpre satisfatoriamente a tarefa de ser uma espécie de necessário princípio regulativo da justiça social em determinada sociedade. Mas suas pretensões de "perfeição" (no dizer de Sen) devem ser compensadas por uma análise imparcial e objetiva das situações concretas das sociedades em questão, e das realizações passíveis de serem alcançadas no sentido de um avanço efetivo da justiça, conquanto precário, porque a realidade sempre impõe limites às nossas mais nobres pretensões. O método mais adequado a uma análise deste tipo parece-me, de fato, como quer Sen, ser o comparativo; mas a sua aplicação não dispensa a adoção de um arcabouço teórico mais abstrato, como o proposto por Rawls. Ao contrário, penso que, na verdade, o pressuponha.

1. Em sua obra de 2009, A ideia de justiça, Amartya Sen enuncia uma crítica contundente às teorias políticas modernas alicerçadas sobre a ideia de contrato social, especialmente a de John Rawls, cuja abordagem da justiça distributiva na obra Uma teoria da justiça constituiu-se um novo paradigma entre as teorias contratuais contemporâneas.

Neste trabalho pretendo analisar a procedência da crítica de Sen às teorias do contrato social em geral, e ao contratualismo rawlsiano em particular, às quais opõe uma abordagem supostamente focada não na concepção, ou identificação transcendental, da justiça ideal, mas na comparação dos resultados empíricos das tentativas de combater fenômenos de injustiça remediáveis com os quais nos deparamos quotidianamente.

Conforme veremos, a crítica de Sen evidentemente possui vários méritos, mas há que se questionar a possibilidade de uma teoria política conceber a estrutura básica de uma sociedade prescindindo de alguma concepção mínima de contrato social. A teoria da justiça de Sen, marcada pelo dinamismo característico do pensamento econômico, com seu método comparativo, focado nas realizações efetivamente viáveis nas sociedades tais como se nos apresentam no tempo em que são consideradas, provavelmente carece de elementos que possibilitem a concepção de uma estrutura institucional mínima para um Estado em fase de constituição.

A hipótese, portanto, que eu gostaria de aventar neste trabalho, sugere que a abordagem de Sen, a despeito do seu louvável pragmatismo, ao invés de afigurar-se uma alternativa à teoria da justiça de Rawls, seria melhor considerada seu importante, e até mesmo indispensável complemento.

2. Um mote perpassa a obra em que Sen enuncia a sua teoria da justiça: a ideia segundo a qual o que nos move a agir contra a injustiça não é a constatação de que o mundo fracasse em ser completamente justo, mas o fato de as injustiças que queremos eliminar serem claramente elimináveis. Não é, pois, a frustração de um desejo talvez impossível de ser satisfeito o que nos move à ação, mas o reconhecimento de que existem injustiças cuja abolição é possível.

Eis porque Amartya Sen defende categoricamente a identificação de injustiças corrigíveis como sendo o elemento crucial de uma teoria da justiça. O seu objetivo é, pois, bastante preciso. Não lhe interessa conhecer, ou conceber, a natureza da justiça perfeita. Portanto, certas difíceis questões que se têm colocado sobre este problema, mormente nas teorias da justiça predominantes na filosofia política contemporânea, não lhe parecem merecedoras do esforço de respondê-las. Com efeito, segundo Sen, são outras as questões que devem ser respondidas. Elas não indagam em que consiste a justiça perfeita, mas o que está ao nosso alcance fazermos para promovermos a justiça e eliminarmos a injustiça.

3. Sen enfatiza particularmente três diferenças entre o tipo de teoria da justiça ao qual a sua se filia e aquele ao qual se filiam as demais teorias da justiça ainda predominantes na atualidade (Cf. Sen, 2010 [2009], pp. ix-xi).

A primeira diz respeito à aptidão a servir como base do raciocínio prático. Teorias da justiça que apenas pretendam caracterizar sociedades perfeitamente justas são incapazes de servir a este propósito. Somente uma teoria da justiça que inclua modos de julgar como reduzir a injustiça e promover a justiça pode servir como base do raciocínio prático.

Há, pois, dois exercícios antagônicos subjacentes a cada um desses tipos de teoria. Um consiste em identificar arranjos sociais perfeitamente justos, e o outro em decidir se determinada mudança social promove melhor ou não a justiça.

Sen considera o exercício inerente ao segundo tipo de teoria central à tomada de decisões acerca de instituições, comportamentos e outros determinantes da justiça; e que o processo pelo qual tais decisões são deliberadas seja crucial para uma teoria da justiça que pretenda guiar o raciocínio prático acerca do que deve ser feito. Trata-se de um exercício comparativo, que, segundo Sen, não depende absolutamente de uma identificação prévia das exigências da justiça perfeita.

Em segundo lugar, Sen reconhece que, embora muitas questões comparativas de justiça possam ser efetivamente resolvidas, podendo-se chegar, acerca delas, a um acordo com base em argumentos razoáveis, há comparações nas quais considerações conflitantes não podem ser completamente resolvidas. Sen defende a possibilidade de várias razões de justiça distintas serem capazes de sobreviver a um escrutínio crítico, e, não obstante, produzirem conclusões divergentes[1].

Em terceiro lugar, Sen nota que a presença de uma injustiça remediável pode não estar associada a deficiências institucionais, mas a transgressões comportamentais; uma vez que a ideia de justiça concerne, sobretudo, ao modo como as pessoas vivem, e não meramente à natureza das instituições que compõem a estrutura básica da sua sociedade.

Em contrapartida, as teorias contemporâneas da justiça objetadas por Sen reputam primordial o objetivo de se estabelecerem instituições justas, atribuindo aos aspectos comportamentais um papel meramente subsidiário e derivado.

A abordagem de Rawls da justiça como equidade, por exemplo, produziria um conjunto peculiar de princípios de justiça cujo propósito é estabelecer instituições justas que constituam a estrutura básica da sociedade, presumindo que os comportamentos dos seus membros se adéquem impecavelmente às exigências do funcionamento apropriado dessas instituições.

A teoria da justiça defendida por Sen parece considerar ingênua essa ênfase nas instituições, bem como a presunção de os comportamentos das pessoas serem apropriadamente dóceis às suas exigências. O que, ao contrário, precisa ser enfatizado, segundo ele, são as vidas que as pessoas são capazes de viver. O enfoque da vida real na avaliação da justiça teria, pois, muitas amplas implicações para a natureza e o alcance da ideia de justiça.

O uso da perspectiva comparativa, adotada pela teoria da justiça de Sen, teria o grande mérito de transcender a estrutura limitada e limitante do contrato social, ao comprometer-se na realização de comparações das práticas de promoção da justiça.

4. Sen remonta tanto a sua abordagem da justiça, quanto aquelas às quais se opõe, a duas linhas básicas e divergentes de raciocínio acerca da justiça surgidas no contexto do Iluminismo europeu, às quais denomina, respectivamente, institucionalismo transcendental e abordagem comparativa focada em realizações.

O institucionalismo transcendental assumiria prioritariamente a tarefa de identificar arranjos institucionais justos para a sociedade, e se-

[1] Sen cita Isaiah Berlin e Bernard Williams como exemplos de pensadores que exploraram extensa e poderosamente a importância da pluralidade avaliativa. E cita Michael Walzer, Charles Taylor e Michael Sandel como exemplos de pensadores que discutiram variações de valores entre povos em diferentes comunidades.

ria marcado por duas características básicas. A primeira consistiria justamente no enfoque na identificação da justiça perfeita, e não em comparações relativas de justiça e injustiça; enquanto a segunda concerniria ao fato de, na busca da justiça perfeita, se concentrar principalmente em obter a correção das instituições, não estando diretamente focado nas sociedades reais que acabariam por surgir. De acordo com Sen, ambas as características referem-se ao modo "contratualista" de pensar, inaugurado por Hobbes e desenvolvido por Locke, Rousseau e Kant.

Um "contrato social" hipotético, presumidamente escolhido, está claramente preocupado com uma alternativa ideal para o caos que, de outro modo, poderia caracterizar uma sociedade; e os principais contratos discutidos pelos autores lidavam principalmente com a escolha de instituições. O resultado geral, segundo Sen, teria sido a concepção de teorias da justiça centradas na identificação transcendental de instituições ideais.

Em franco contraste com o institucionalismo transcendental, Sen propõe que outros teóricos do Iluminismo adotaram abordagens comparativas, preocupadas com realizações sociais. Versões desse pensamento comparativo seriam encontradas, sobretudo, nas obras de Adam Smith, Condorcet, Jeremy Bentham, Mary Wollstonecraft, Karl Marx, e John Stuart Mill. Ainda que esses autores, com suas ideias tão diferentes das exigências da justiça, tenham proposto maneiras completamente distintas de se fazerem comparações sociais, Sen supõe que estivessem todos envolvidos em comparações de sociedades que já existiam ou podiam viavelmente surgir. Eles estariam voltados para comparações focadas em realizações, e se interessariam pela remoção de injustiças manifestas no mundo tal como se lhes apresentava.

Para Sen, a distância entre essas duas abordagens é bastante significativa. Teria sido sobre o institucionalismo transcendental que a filosofia política contemporânea se apoiou em sua exploração da teoria da justiça.

5. A abordagem contratualista tem sido pois, segundo Sen, a influência predominante na filosofia política contemporânea, especialmente desde a publicação, em 1958, do artigo de John Rawls, "Justiça como equidade", que precedeu a sua declaração definitiva sobre essa abordagem na obra clássica, Uma teoria da justiça, de 1971.

É por isso que Sen dedica um lugar significativo em sua análise da ideia de justiça a uma compreensão de alguns aspectos fundamentais da obra de Rawls (2010 [2009], pp. 52-74), cuja concepção de que a justiça deve ser considerada segundo as exigências da equidade Sen considera o exemplo mais bem alcançado do que é essencial a uma adequada apreensão do tema (2010 [2009], p. 53).

Com efeito, Sen ressalta o valor da percepção rawlsiana de que a equidade, cuja característica mais evidente seria a imparcialidade, afigurar-se o aspecto crucial da justiça, substanciado na exigência de igual consideração dos interesses de todas as pessoas envolvidas, e, por conseguinte, no zelo em evitar a precedência de quaisquer interesses, prioridades, excentricidades ou preconceitos particulares (2010 [2009], p. 54).

A noção de equidade, em cujo núcleo repousa a necessidade de se evitarem vieses em avaliações e ações, seria para Rawls, como o lembra Sen, ainda mais fundamental do que o desenvolvimento dos princípios de justiça (2010 [2009], p. 54).

A primazia da equidade é manifestada por Rawls através do célebre artifício da posição original, cujo aspecto mais notável é o esforço em conceber uma maneira de os indivíduos, em uma dada sociedade, se disporem a cooperar mutuamente, apesar de anuírem "doutrinas abrangentes" tão díspares quanto razoáveis. Rawls pensava que, a despeito, por exemplo, das suas várias convicções religiosas e visões gerais do que constitui uma vida boa, os cidadãos de um Estado seriam capazes de partilhar uma concepção política mínima de justiça que lhes permitisse eleger, de maneira absolutamente consensual, um conjunto de princípios de justiça, julgado equitativo por todos os membros razoáveis do grupo. Tais princípios orientariam a escolha das instituições sociais elementares que constituiriam a estrutura básica dessa sociedade original, bem como de todos os arranjos sociais subsequentes.

Sen diz-se cético quanto à proposição rawlsiana de uma necessidade de escolha unânime de um conjunto particular de princípios imprescindíveis à constituição de uma sociedade completamente justa (2010 [2009], p. 56-7; 69.).

Segundo Sen há preocupações gerais genuinamente plurais, e por vezes conflitantes, que suportam uma compreensão da justiça em cujo cerne esteja a racionalidade, a imparcialidade e a equidade. Esse fato, segundo Sen, minaria radicalmente a teoria de Rawls e determinaria o seu abandono (2010 [2009], p. 57-8).

Talvez se possa sintetizar a crítica de Sen ao idealismo transcendental em geral, e ao contratualismo rawlsiano em particular, destacando o que ele denomina "o problema do ponto de partida".

Sen pensa que a pergunta do contratualismo contemporâneo, qual seja a que indaga "o que seriam instituições perfeitamente justas?"

é intrinsecamente equivocada. A pergunta que deveria ser colocada em primeiro lugar é "como se promoveria a justiça?".

Partir de uma preocupação pragmática com as realizações efetivamente possíveis, ao invés de apenas instituições e regras, exigiria uma mudança radical na maneira de formular teorias da justiça, mas responderia ao que Sen considera os dois problemas básicos do contratualismo, quais sejam o problema da viabilidade e o problema da redundância da busca de uma solução abstrata ou transcendental.

O problema da viabilidade consiste no fato de que pode não haver absolutamente nenhum acordo arrazoado, mesmo sob rigorosas condições de imparcialidade e análise isenta (por exemplo, como as identificadas por Rawls em sua "posição original") quanto à natureza da "sociedade justa".

Sen insiste em afirmar a possibilidade de haver diferenças sérias entre os princípios concorrentes de justiça capazes de sobreviver a um escrutínio crítico e de ter pretensões de imparcialidade. Segundo ele este é um problema bastante grave, por exemplo, para o pressuposto de Rawls de que haverá uma escolha unânime de um único conjunto de "dois princípios de justiça" em uma situação primordial hipotética de igualdade (posição original), em que as pessoas ignoram os seus próprios interesses subjetivos. Isto pressupõe que haja basicamente apenas um tipo de argumento imparcial capaz de satisfazer as exigências da justiça, despojado de interesses pessoais. Sen acredita que isto possa ser um erro.

Se um diagnóstico de arranjos sociais perfeitamente justos for incuravelmente problemático, diz Sen, então toda a estratégia do contratualismo estará profundamente prejudicada, mesmo se cada alternativa concebível no mundo estivesse disponível. Por exemplo, os dois princípios de justiça na investigação clássica de Rawls da "justiça como equidade" são precisamente sobre instituições perfeitamente justas em um mundo onde todas as alternativas estão disponíveis. No entanto, o que não se poderia saber é se a pluralidade de razões de justiça permitiria que um único conjunto de princípios de justiça surgisse na posição original. A teoria da justiça social de Rawls, que procede passo a passo a partir da identificação e do estabelecimento de instituições justas, estaria então emperrada na própria base.

O problema da redundância, por sua vez, estipula que um exercício da razão prática que envolva uma escolha real exige uma estrutura para a comparação da justiça, sem a qual seria impossível escolher entre alternativas viáveis, e não uma identificação de uma situação perfeita, possivelmente indisponível, que não poderia ser transcendida.

6. A novidade da abordagem de Sen provavelmente ainda levará algum tempo para ser assimilada e devidamente compreendida. Hilary Putnam não exagerou ao dizer que A ideia de justiça é a mais importante contribuição para o tema desde Uma teoria da justiça.

A obra de Rawls inaugurou uma nova fase no contratualismo. As críticas de Sen ao contratualismo, talvez tenham, por muito tempo, um efeito análogo àquele provocado pela crítica outrora formulada por Hume, mas é não é provável que determine o ocaso de uma tradição tão sólida.

Com efeito, para responder-se às inúmeras críticas que lhe têm sido dirigidas ao longo da história, a tradição contratualista passou por importantíssimas transformações que lhe permitiram conservar a relevância. A principal delas foi passar da ênfase no consenso à ênfase no acordo, distinguindo assim a questão do que gera a obrigação política (que era principal preocupação da tradição do consenso no pensamento do contrato social) da questão de quais ordens constitucionais ou instituições sociais são mutuamente benéficas e estáveis ao longo do tempo, ou seja, passou-se a uma ênfase na moralidade pública ou social, ao invés de na obrigação individual.

A ideia central das teorias contemporâneas do contrato social é, portanto, o acordo. E o ato de acordar é uma indicação de quais razões oferecemos. Se os indivíduos são racionais, aquilo sobre o que concordam reflete as razões que têm.

Em teorias contemporâneas do contrato, como a de Rawls, o problema da justificação torna-se, portanto, central. O renascimento da teoria do contrato social por Rawls em Uma teoria da justiça, portanto, não baseia obrigações em consenso, embora o aparato de um "acordo original" persista. O propósito da posição original é, segundo Rawls, resolver "a questão da justificação ... trabalhando o problema da deliberação".

O contrato social na teoria moral e política contemporânea, portanto, é uma tentativa de resolver um problema justificatório convertendo-o em um problema deliberativo. Em seu cerne está a "questão da justificação".

Justificar arranjos sociais requer demonstrar que todos os cidadãos têm razões favoráveis aos arranjos. Este seria uma exigência desnecessária se as razões dos cidadãos convergissem plenamente. É porque os cidadãos têm razões diversas que se faz necessário justificar os arranjos sociais demonstrando que todos os cidadãos idealmente têm razões que favoreçam esses arranjos.

O contrato social é inevitavelmente hipotético, abstrato, ideal (ou, para o usar o termo caro a Sen, transcendental), mas trata-se de uma abstração cujo propósito é ilustrar um argumento, justifica-lo, oferecer razões. O fato de tratar-se de um artifício retórico não o torna irrelevante, mas justamente o contrário: o torna um instrumento precioso na discussão pública.

Parece-me que o contratualismo, designadamente o rawlsiano, funcione como uma espécie de necessário princípio regulativo da justiça social em uma determinada sociedade. Mas as suas pretensões de "perfeição" (no dizer de Sen) devem ser compensadas por uma análise imparcial e objetiva das situações concretas das sociedades em questão, e das realizações passíveis de serem alcançadas no sentido de um avanço efetivo da justiça, conquanto precário, porque a realidade sempre impõe limites às nossas mais nobres pretensões. O método mais adequado a uma análise deste tipo parece-me, de fato, como quer Sen, ser o comparativo; mas a sua aplicação não dispensa a adoção de um arcabouço teórico mais abstrato, como o proposto por Rawls. Ao contrário, penso que, na verdade, o pressuponha.

Solidariedade e deveres fundamentais da pessoa humana[1]

Adriano Sant'Ana Pedra[2]

Resumo: Em muitas situações a atuação estatal não é suficiente para assegurar os direitos fundamentais de uma pessoa, o que só ocorrerá com a prestação de um dever por parte de outra pessoa. O estudo busca responder qual o significado dos deveres fundamentais em uma democracia constitucional. A indagação nuclear a ser perseguida diz respeito aos limites e às condições para serem exigidos deveres fundamentais de uma pessoa a fim de que os direitos fundamentais em geral sejam preservados e promovidos. A partir daí, é possível avaliar em que medida são legítimos os deveres impostos por uma Constituição.

Palavras-chave: deveres fundamentais; direitos fundamentais; solidariedade.

1. Nota introdutória

As constituições geralmente preveem a existência de deveres fundamentais em seu texto. Todavia, durante bastante tempo, os estudos ocuparam-se precipuamente dos direitos fundamentais e houve certo esquecimento das questões relativas aos deveres fundamentais da pessoa humana, e isso ocorreu especialmente em razão da influência liberal, com o desprezo da solidariedade, bem como em razão do temor de que os deveres servissem a regimes autoritários, como forma de reação aos horrores praticados contra a humanidade. No Brasil, o momento

[1] Trabalho apresentado na VII Jornada Brasileira de Filosofia do Direito, realizada durante o "XXVI World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy – Human Rigths, Rule of Law and the Contemporary Social Challenges in Complex Societies", promovido pela International Association for Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy (Internationale Vereinigung für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie – IVR) (2013).

[2] Doutor em Direito Constitucional (Pontifícia Universidade Católica de São Paulo – PUC/SP). Mestre em Direitos e Garantias Fundamentais (Faculdade de Direito de Vitória – FDV). Professor do Curso de Direito e do Programa de Pós-Graduação – Mestrado e Doutorado – em Direitos e Garantias Fundamentais da Faculdade de Direito de Vitória – FDV. Curriculum Vitae na Plataforma Lattes: http://lattes.cnpq.br/0637600349096702. E-mail: adrianopedra@fdv.br

constituinte que sucedeu a ditadura militar fez com que o texto constitucional de 1988 fosse rico na previsão de direitos e pobre na abordagem de deveres.

Não obstante, aos deveres fundamentais é reservado um nobre papel. Em muitas situações, a atuação estatal não é suficiente para assegurar os direitos fundamentais de uma pessoa, o que só ocorrerá com a prestação de um dever por parte de outra pessoa. É o que ocorre, por exemplo, com o dever da coletividade de defender e preservar o meio ambiente ecologicamente equilibrado.

Este estudo busca analisar o papel dos deveres humanos na efetivação de direitos fundamentais. Apesar da menção feita aos deveres humanos, ou seja, aos deveres fundamentais da pessoa humana, o desenvolvimento aqui construído também se aplica aos deveres fundamentais da pessoa jurídica, no que couber. Assim, busca-se avaliar a legitimidade da exigibilidade de deveres impostos aos particulares pela Constituição com o fim de assegurar direitos fundamentais.

A investigação leva em conta uma abordagem do dever fundamental não como uma prestação egoística e individualista, mas, sim, sob uma perspectiva em que se respeita e se inclui o outro. Na perspectiva da solidariedade, o comportamento ético faz com que se coloque a serviço do outro, o que resulta na efetivação dos direitos fundamentais.

2. Direitos e deveres fundamentais em uma sociedade solidária

As constituições contemporâneas geralmente colocam os direitos e as garantias fundamentais logo nos seus primeiros títulos, mostrando que o Estado deve atender ao que está ali preceituado. A Constituição brasileira de 1988 divide o Título II – Dos Direitos e Garantias Fundamentais – em quatro capítulos, quais sejam: direitos e deveres individuais e coletivos (artigo 5º), direitos sociais (artigos 6º a 11), direitos de nacionalidade (artigos 12 e 13), direitos políticos (artigos 14 a 16) e direitos relacionados à existência, organização e participação em partidos políticos (artigo 17). Entretanto, é possível encontrar ainda direitos fundamentais em outras partes da Constituição brasileira. Tal situação não ocorre apenas no texto brasileiro, mas também em outros países.

Pode-se verificar que o rol dos direitos fundamentais tem uma extensão maior nas constituições dos países de democracia recente do que nas constituições dos países de democracia consolidada, o que se dá "pela necessidade da proteção estatal aos bens essenciais à sobrevivência das populações miseráveis"[3]. Entretanto, como adverte Norberto Bobbio, nem sempre pode ser realizado tudo aquilo que é desejável e merecedor de ser perseguido, porque "são frequentemente necessárias condições objetivas que não dependem da boa vontade dos que os proclamam, nem das boas disposições dos que possuem os meios para protegê-los"[4].

Além disso, não se pode olvidar que a satisfação das necessidades essenciais das pessoas depende de atuações de outras pessoas (físicas ou jurídicas), além da atuação do próprio Estado. O direito à educação de uma criança, por exemplo, só será plenamente atendido com o cumprimento do dever dos pais ou responsáveis para com a educação desta, o que se dará com atuações como a realização da matrícula na escola, o acompanhamento da frequência e do rendimento escolar, dentre outras. Não basta que o Estado proporcione escolas, professores, livros, cadernos, transporte e merenda, por exemplo; é preciso que a família participe efetivamente da educação da criança.

O mesmo se dá com o direito à saúde e o combate à dengue, que depende da participação de todos para que não se formem criadouros de mosquitos que possam transmitir essa doença. A exclusiva atuação estatal é, também aqui, insuficiente para acabar com a doença.

Assim, os deveres fundamentais possuem o importante papel de proteger e promover direitos fundamentais; alguns destes dependem daqueles diretamente (v.g. dever de educar os filhos) enquanto outros dependem indiretamente (v.g. dever de pagar tributos).

> Quem possui direitos deve também possuir deveres. Isso se justifica com referência à reciprocidade: o meu vizinho respeita a minha privacidade e deseja que eu respeite a dele. Mas também se justifica com referência à solidariedade: devemos colocar à disposição dos grupos mais fracos recursos que permitam o exercício dos direitos fundamentais de maneira satisfatória, fortalecendo a coesão social. Trata-se de um pensamento que se contrapõe ao liberalismo-individualismo em sua forma absoluta[5].

---

[3] TORRES, Ricardo Lobo. A cidadania multidimensional na era dos direitos. In: TORRES, Ricardo Lobo (Org.). Teoria dos direitos fundamentais. 2. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2001, p. 286.

[4] BOBBIO, Norberto. A era dos direitos. Trad. Carlos Nelson Coutinho. Rio de Janeiro: Campus, 1992, p. 44-45.

[5] DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Leonardo. Deveres fundamentais. In: LEITE, George Salomão; SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; CARBONELL, Miguel. Direitos, deveres e garantias

Daí a razão para que as pessoas sejam solidárias. Uma solidariedade que decorre do ordenamento jurídico e não necessariamente do altruísmo de cada um. A própria Constituição brasileira coloca como objetivo fundamental da República a construção de "uma sociedade livre, justa e solidária" (art. 3º, I). As pessoas devem ser solidárias, e não solitárias, porque, além da atuação estatal, são necessárias condutas positivas e negativas dos indivíduos para a efetivação de direitos fundamentais.

3. Fundamentalidade dos deveres humanos e tutela dos direitos fundamentais

Em decorrência do objetivo de edificação de uma sociedade livre, justa e solidária, os indivíduos dessa sociedade devem ter condutas compatíveis com a concretização desses valores. Daí o estabelecimento, pela Constituição, de deveres fundamentais compatíveis com a promoção desses ideais.

Assim, por um lado, é necessária uma previsão constitucional (fundamentalidade formal) acerca dos deveres fundamentais, pois estes devem ser estabelecidos por normas com força jurídica própria da supremacia constitucional. Segundo Gregorio Peces-Barba Martínez, "o dever jurídico tem que estar reconhecido por uma norma pertencente ao ordenamento"[6]. Esse é um fundamento lógico, de inserção no texto constitucional, criado pelo poder constituinte (originário ou derivado) e decorrente da expressão da soberania popular.

Vale destacar que a Constituição pode estabelecer deveres fundamentais tanto explícitos como implícitos, e também, tal como os direitos, outros decorrentes do regime e dos princípios adotados pela Constituição, bem como dos tratados internacionais[7] em que a República Federativa do Brasil seja parte, nos termos do artigo 5º, § 2º, da Constituição Federal, o que nos remete à ideia de bloco de constitucionalidade[8].

---

fundamentais. Salvador: Juspodivm, 2011, p. 339.

[6] PECES-BARBA MARTÍNEZ, Gregorio. Los deberes fundamentales. Doxa. n. 4. 1987, p. 335.

[7] Vide, por exemplo, o dever de instrução previsto no artigo XXXI da Declaração Americana dos Direitos e Deveres do Homem, aprovada na Nona Conferência Internacional Americana, em Bogotá, no ano de 1948: "Toda a pessoa tem o dever de adquirir, pelo menos, a instrução primária".

[8] VIEIRA, Pedro Gallo; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. O rol de deveres fundamentais na Constituição como numerus apertus. Derecho y Cambio Social. a. X. v. 31. jan./mar. 2013, p. 9.

Por outro lado, a fundamentalidade material leva em conta a relevância do dever no sentido de suprir as necessidades básicas essenciais de uma pessoa – de si, de outrem ou da coletividade – e volta-se à defesa e promoção de direitos fundamentais.

Assim, é possível afirmar que os deveres fundamentais estão diretamente ligados "à necessidade de os homens – seres gregários por natureza – viverem em comunidade, a qual exige a contribuição de todos para que os objetivos comuns sejam alcançados"[9].

De fato, o os autores que se debruçam sobre o tema dos deveres fundamentais destacam que é preciso compreendê-los não como um contraponto ou mitigador de direitos, senão como um promotor destes.

Segundo José Casalta Nabais, > os deveres fundamentais constituem uma categoria jurídico-constitucional própria colocada ao lado e correlativa da dos direitos fundamentais, uma categoria que, como correctivo da liberdade, traduz a mobilização do homem e do cidadão para a realização dos objectivos do bem comum[10].

Embora constitua uma categoria autônoma, os deveres fundamentais são correlacionados com os direitos fundamentais, haja vista que estes são tanto limitados quanto assegurados por aqueles[11]. De fato, é justificável o vínculo entre direitos e deveres fundamentais, pois o direito de um indivíduo leva ao surgimento de pelo menos um dever para os demais[12], seja o de não impedir a realização do direito ou até mesmo o de promovê-lo.

Neste momento, merece ser trazido o conceito de dever fundamental adotado neste estudo:

---

[9] SCHWAN, Felipe Teixeira; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. A democracia brasileira e o dever fundamental de votar. In: BUSSINGUER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo (org.). Direitos fundamentais: pesquisas. Curitiba: CRV, 2011, p. 178.

[10] NABAIS, José Casalta. O dever fundamental de pagar impostos: contributo para a compreensão constitucional do estado fiscal contemporâneo. Coimbra: Almedina, 2009, p. 64.

[11] DUQUE, Bruna Lyra; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Os deveres fundamentais e a solidariedade nas relações privadas. In: BUSSINGER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo. Direitos e deveres fundamentais. Rio de Janeiro: Lumen Juris, 2012, p. 18.

[12] GONÇALVES, Luísa Cortat Simonetti; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Deveres fundamentais: a ressocialização enquanto dever do próprio apenado. In: BUSSINGUER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo. Direitos fundamentais: pesquisas. Curitiba: CRV, 2011, p. 209.

> Dever fundamental é uma categoria jurídico-constitucional, fundada na solidariedade, que impõe condutas ponderadas àqueles submetidos a uma determinada ordem política, passíveis ou não de sanção, com a finalidade de assegurar direitos fundamentais a ele correlacionados[13].

Deve-se enfatizar que o dever imposto a alguém não deve corresponder a um esforço exorbitante para essa pessoa. Mesmo em decorrência da ideia de solidariedade não se pode impor ao sujeito do dever um sacrifício extraordinário – ou desproporcional – com o fim de salvaguardar determinado direito. Somente será possível exigir do sujeito do dever um "sacrifício trivial"[14].

O ônus imposto ao sujeito do dever não pode ser excessivo – exorbitante –, o que é uma vedação relativa e que deve ser aferida no caso concreto, nunca em abstrato, ponderando-se o que se busca alcançar com aquela obrigação imposta.

Em geral, é possível exigir que alguém salve uma criança que esteja se afogando à sua frente, em uma piscina rasa, mas o mesmo não pode ser exigido se o afogamento ocorre em um mar revolto, porque, neste caso, o sujeito do dever seria colocado em risco. O crime de omissão de socorro (artigo 135 do Código Penal) deve ponderar a situação concreta. Da mesma forma, quando houver uma situação de extrema pobreza e ausência de condições para dar cumprimento ao dever fundamental de assegurar a educação dos filhos (artigos 205, 227 e 229 da Constituição), não se poderá condenar criminalmente os pais que deixarem de prover a instrução primária do filho em idade escolar, o que poderia constituir, em situação diversa, crime de abandono intelectual (artigo 246 do Código Penal). No âmbito tributário, o princípio da capacidade contributiva é um corolário que decorre da vedação de onerosidade excessiva – ou exorbitante – do sujeito do dever.

Dessa forma, a trivialidade do esforço dependerá não apenas do sujeito do dever como também do direito fundamental correlacionado que se busca proteger, o que torna possível falar em ponderação subjetiva e em ponderação objetiva, respectivamente. Uma carga tributária poder ser excessiva ou não, a depender da capacidade do sujeito contribuinte (ponderação subjetiva) ou a depender de haver uma situação de guerra ou paz (ponderação objetiva), por exemplo.

---

[13] Conceito cunhado coletivamente pelos membros do Grupo de Pesquisa "Estado, Democracia Constitucional e Direitos Fundamentais", coordenado pelos professores Adriano Sant'Ana Pedra e Daury Cesar Fabriz, do Programa de Pós-Graduação Stricto Sensu – Mestrado e Doutorado – em Direitos e Garantias Fundamentais da Faculdade de Direito de Vitória (FDV).

[14] GARZÓN VALDÉS, Ernesto. Los deberes positivos generales y su fundamentación. Doxa. n. 3. 1986, p. 17.

É necessário haver equidade na onerosidade assumida por cada pessoa. Sobretudo naquelas situações em que o ônus incide especificamente em alguns poucos indivíduos, e tem a coletividade como sua beneficiária, o ordenamento jurídico deve prever, tanto quanto possível, a redistribuição dessa onerosidade para com os demais membros da sociedade[15].

É o que acontece, por exemplo, quando há uma redução da carga tributária nas hipóteses de tombamento (dever fundamental de defender e preservar o patrimônio histórico e cultural, previsto no artigo 216, § 1º, da Constituição) ou ainda nas hipóteses de manutenção de reservas florestais (dever fundamental de defender e preservar o meio ambiente ecologicamente equilibrado, previsto no artigo 225 da Constituição). Tais compensações devem ocorrer para que a sociedade também arque com tais ônus ao financiar a proteção de tais bens constitucionalmente protegidos.

4. A necessidade de atuação do legislador

A abertura do sistema constitucional significa a incompletude e a provisoriedade do conhecimento científico[16]. O jurista, como qualquer cientista, deve estar preparado para colocar em causa o sistema até então elaborado, para alargá-lo ou modificá-lo com base numa melhor consideração. Com este intuito, a textura aberta da linguagem constitui uma vantagem, porque considera tanto a necessidade de certeza quanto a necessidade de deixar certas questões em aberto para que sejam apreciadas no tempo adequado.

[15] A fim de serem proporcionados meios ao indivíduo para que ele cumpra o seu dever, em alguns casos o ônus do sujeito do dever não é dividido com a coletividade, mas com certas pessoas, como, por exemplo, com o seu empregador e a parte em um processo, conforme dispõe o artigo 419 do CPC: "Art. 419. A testemunha pode requerer ao juiz o pagamento da despesa que efetuou para comparecimento à audiência, devendo a parte pagá-la logo que arbitrada, ou depositá-la em cartório dentro de 3 (três) dias. Parágrafo único. O depoimento prestado em juízo é considerado serviço público. A testemunha, quando sujeita ao regime da legislação trabalhista, não sofre, por comparecer à audiência, perda de salário nem desconto no tempo de serviço".

[16] CANARIS, Claus Wilhelm. Pensamento sistemático e conceito de sistema na ciência do direito. 2. ed. Trad. Antonio Menezes Cordeiro. Lisboa: Calouste Gulbenkian, 1996, p. 106.

> As normas que estabelecem deveres autônomos dos particulares costumam ter baixa densidade normativa. No nosso exemplo, a Constituição não indica o que a "família" deve fazer para promover a educação de seus membros, quais integrantes da família devem assumir essa obrigação e como, se a família deve se limitar a cuidar da formação de seus integrantes, se é suficiente matricular os jovens em instituições de ensino ou se a própria família deve lhes propiciar conhecimentos etc[17].

Dimitri Dimoulis e Leonardo Martins ainda trazem os exemplos da Constituição espanhola, que estabelece que "os espanhóis têm o direito e o dever de defender a Espanha" (artigo 31, 1), e da Constituição italiana, que prescreve que "a defesa da Pátria é sagrado dever do cidadão" (artigo 52, I), e indagam: "o que significa 'defender' um país? Defender de quem? E como? Militarmente? Economicamente? Politicamente? Promovendo a arte, a literatura ou – por que não? – a culinária nacional?"[18].

Daí surge a necessidade (relativa) de integração legislativa. Vale dizer, é necessário que o legislador interprete as normas constitucionais que versam sobre deveres fundamentais, mesmo aquelas normas com aparência de clareza.

Os textos normativos necessitam de interpretação não apenas por não serem unívocos ou evidentes, isto é, destituídos de clareza, mas também porque devem ser aplicados a situações concretas[19]. Nesse sentido posiciona-se Karl Larenz:

> Seria um erro aceitar-se que os textos jurídicos só carecem de interpretação quando surgem como particularmente "obscuros", "pouco claros" ou "contraditórios"; pelo contrário, em princípio todos > os textos jurídicos são suscetíveis e carecem de interpretação. Esta sua necessidade de interpretação não é um "defeito" que pudesse remediar-se em definitivo mediante uma redação tão precisa quanto possível[20].

[17] DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Leonardo. Deveres fundamentais. In: LEITE, George Salomão; SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; CARBONELL, Miguel. Direitos, deveres e garantias fundamentais. Salvador: Juspodivm, 2011, p. 330. Vide também: DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Leonardo. Teoria geral dos direitos fundamentais. 4. ed. São Paulo: Atlas, 2012, p. 63.

[18] DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Leonardo. Deveres fundamentais. In: LEITE, George Salomão; SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; CARBONELL, Miguel. Direitos, deveres e garantias fundamentais. Salvador: Juspodivm, 2011, p. 342-343.

[19] GRAU, Eros Roberto. Ensaio e discurso sobre a interpretação/aplicação do direito. 4. ed. São Paulo: Malheiros, 2006, p. 29.

A imprescindibilidade da interpretação ocorre porque o sistema jurídico deixa várias possibilidades em aberto e não contém ainda qualquer decisão sobre qual dos interesses em jogo é o de maior valor, mas deixa a decisão de determinação da posição relativa dos interesses a um ato de produção normativa que ainda será posto.

> A regulamentação genérica desses deveres pela Constituição desempenha uma dupla função. Por um lado, orienta o legislador ordinário para que, no exercício de sua função concretizadora, operacionalize os deveres, caracterizados pela já repetidamente mencionada baixa densidade normativa. Por outro lado, a regulamentação constitucional é um fundamento para examinar a constitucionalidade dessa legislação. Temos assim uma estrutura bifásica do dever fundamental. A Constituição enuncia e a lei concretiza[21].

Convém acrescentar ainda que a suposta clareza não é uma propriedade do texto, mas fruto da interpretação. Ou seja, até para se afirmar que um enunciado normativo é claro faz-se necessário interpretá-lo.

> Evidentemente a previsão desses deveres é sempre genérica o suficiente para sobre eles pairarem as mesmas dificuldades que se opuseram quanto a uma exigibilidade maior em relação ao Estado. Há de ser entendida como uma autorização para que, por meio de lei, se esclareçam e estabeleçam com maior concretude tais deveres[22].

Foi visto que os deveres fundamentais destinam-se a assegurar direitos fundamentais com eles correlacionados. O conteúdo desses di-

---

[20] LARENZ, Karl. Metodologia da ciência do direito. Trad. José Lamego. 3. ed. Lisboa: Calouste Gulbenkian, 1997, p. 283-284.

[21] DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Leonardo. Deveres fundamentais. In: LEITE, George Salomão; SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; CARBONELL, Miguel. Direitos, deveres e garantias fundamentais. Salvador: Juspodivm, 2011, p. 335.

[22] TAVARES, André Ramos. Curso de direito constitucional. 10. ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2012, p. 534.

reitos fundamentais necessita, conforme Robert Alexy[23], de justiciabilidade, isto é, deve tratar de "interesses e carências que, em geral, podem e devem ser protegidos e fomentados pelo Direito". Ademais, as constituições positivam os direitos fundamentais e afirmam assim o seu caráter jurídico, a sua exigibilidade e a sua acionabilidade[24].

Dessa forma, a inércia do legislador para estabelecer os comportamentos obrigatórios que o sujeito do dever deve seguir acaba por prejudicar os direitos fundamentais que deveriam ser protegidos por tais prestações.

Jorge Miranda[25] escreve que ocorrem omissões legislativas quando há situações previstas no programa ordenador global da Constituição, mas faltam as prescrições adequadas a uma imediata exequibilidade. As omissões podem ser especificamente declaradas pelos órgãos de fiscalização da inconstitucionalidade por omissão, e a integração das omissões legislativas ocorre por meio da edição de lei.

Existe, por exemplo, uma omissão inconstitucional do legislador federal, que não institui o imposto sobre grandes fortunas previsto no artigo 153, VII, da Constituição, o que prejudica a realização de inúmeras prestações estatais – pois os recursos públicos são escassos e os direitos têm custos[26] –, bem como faz com que os contribuintes que não possuem "grandes fortunas" fiquem mais onerados do que deveriam. A não criação desse imposto, longe de ser um alívio para o contribuinte, é uma grande injustiça. O legislador só poderia deixar de instituir o mencionado tributo se este fosse desnecessário, o que não é o caso. Mesmo na hipotética e improvável situação em que as receitas públicas fossem suficientes para atender a todas as demandas da sociedade, ainda assim

---

[23] ALEXY, Robert. Direitos fundamentais no Estado constitucional democrático: para a relação entre direitos do homem, direitos fundamentais, democracia e jurisdição constitucional. Revista de Direito Administrativo. n. 217. jul-set 1999. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 1999, p. 61.

[24] Segundo Luís Roberto Barroso, "modernamente, já não cabe indagar o caráter jurídico e, pois, a exigibilidade e acionabilidade dos direitos fundamentais, na sua múltipla tipologia." Cf. BARROSO, Luís Roberto. O direito constitucional e a efetividade de suas normas: limites e possibilidades da Constituição brasileira. 5. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2001, p. 106.

[25] MIRANDA, Jorge. Manual de direito constitucional. 4. ed. Coimbra: Coimbra, 2000, t. II, p. 274.

[26] Cf. HOLMES, Stephen; SUNSTEIN, Cass R. El costo de los derechos: por qué la libertad depende de los impuestos. Trad. Stella Mastrangelo. Buenos Aires: Siglo Veintiuno, 2011.

o imposto sobre grandes fortunas deveria ser instituído a fim de desonerar os contribuintes menos afortunados que pagam impostos sobre o consumo, sobre a renda de trabalho assalariado, etc.

É possível apontar inúmeras outras omissões inconstitucionais do legislador para regulamentar condutas, e até mesmo para estabelecer sanções para o seu descumprimento, que serviriam para proteger e promover direitos fundamentais. Não obstante, apesar de haver vozes destoantes[27], o neoconstitucionalismo indica uma visão de que, mesmo as normas constitucionais que veiculam deveres fundamentais devem ter aplicação direta, sem a intermediação do legislador ordinário, tanto quanto necessário e possível.

Vale trazer o exemplo da construção judicial criativa feita pelo Supremo Tribunal Federal no julgamento da ADPF nº 132/RJ e da ADI nº 4.277/DF, que reconheceu que o regime jurídico das uniões estáveis também se aplica às uniões homoafetivas, promovendo uma nova leitura do artigo 226, § 3º, da Constituição. Além do reconhecimento de direitos inerentes à união estável, houve também a criação de deveres fundamentais – como, por exemplo, deveres conjugais (artigo 226, § 5º, da Constituição) de mútua assistência – para pessoas em união estável homoafetiva, o que não havia até a decisão do STF em maio de 2011.

Entretanto, será necessária a mediação legislativa para imposição de sanção por descumprimento de algum dever[28], pois normalmente tais sanções não são previstas no texto constitucional, o que não poderá operar efeitos retroativos[29]. Vale destacar que a sanção é importante, porque é um elemento coercitivo, mas não é imprescindível para a eficácia de um dever fundamental. Mas, mesmo que não haja sanções, é natural haver consequências jurídicas[30] em decorrência do descumprimento de

---

[27] Cf. CHULVI, Cristina Pauner. El deber constitucional de contribuir al sostenimiento de los gastos públicos. Madri: Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales, 2001, p. 49. Ver também: RUBIO LLORENTE, Francisco. Los deberes constitucionales. Revista Española de Derecho Constitucional. a. 21. n. 62. mai./ago. 2001, p. 21. Cf. ainda: DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Leonardo. Teoria geral dos direitos fundamentais. 4. ed. São Paulo: Atlas, 2012, p. 66.

[28] SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang. A eficácia dos direitos fundamentais. Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado, 2007, p. 244.

[29] BERNARDO SEGUNDO, Ronaldo Louzada; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Limites ao dever de tolerância. In: BUSSINGUER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo. Direitos fundamentais: pesquisas. Curitiba: CRV, 2011, p. 203.

[30] A língua portuguesa é o idioma oficial do Brasil (artigo 13 da Constituição) e há o dever de conhecê-la. O seu desconhecimento poderá levar o sujeito do dever a um dever fundamental, haja vista a sua normatividade.

5. Considerações finais

Para muitas pessoas, o vocábulo "dever" ainda remete à ideia de limitação de direitos, castração de liberdades individuais e autoritarismo estatal[31]. De fato, os deveres fundamentais restringem as liberdades das pessoas a quem o dever é imposto. Contudo, o enfrentamento do tema dos deveres fundamentais tem servido para mostrar o outro lado da moeda: os deveres prestam-se para realizar direitos fundamentais. Ademais, a consolidação dos estudos sobre os deveres fundamentais evidenciam a necessidade de ponderar o sacrifício de cada pessoa para que não haja exorbitância nas prestações positivas ou negativas exigidas do sujeito do dever[32].

O ordenamento jurídico deve prever prestações alternativas para

---

sofrer alguma lesão decorrente v.g. da não observância de avisos de cuidado ou perigo, ou ainda de alergia ou intolerância alimentar de um produto consumido, o que não ocorreria se a informação adequadamente apresentada fosse devidamente compreendida. A pessoa lesada não poderá reclamar indenização caso a advertência tenha sido dada adequadamente em língua portuguesa. Não é por outro motivo que o Código de Defesa do Consumidor determina que mesmo os produtos importados devem ter instruções em língua portuguesa: "Art. 31. A oferta e apresentação de produtos ou serviços devem assegurar informações corretas, claras, precisas, ostensivas e em língua portuguesa sobre suas características, qualidades, quantidade, composição, preço, garantia, prazos de validade e origem, entre outros dados, bem como sobre os riscos que apresentam à saúde e segurança dos consumidores".

[31] TAVARES, Henrique da Cunha; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. As obrigações tributárias acessórias e a proporcionalidade na sua instituição: uma análise a partir da teoria dos deveres fundamentais. Revista Tributária e de Finanças Públicas. a. 21. v. 109. mar./abr. 2013. p. 203-223. Vide também: TAVARES, Henrique da Cunha; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Obrigações tributárias acessórias na perspectiva do dever fundamental de contribuir com os gastos públicos: uma reflexão acerca dos critérios para sua instituição. In: ALLEMAND, Luiz Cláudio da Silva (coord.). Direito tributário: questões atuais. Brasília: OAB, 2012, p. 170.

[32] Vide v.g. os artigos 347 e 406 do Código de Processo Civil: "Art. 347. A parte não é obrigada a depor de fatos: I - criminosos ou torpes, que Ihe forem imputados; II - a cujo respeito, por estado ou profissão, deva guardar sigilo. Parágrafo único. Esta disposição não se aplica às ações de filiação, de desquite e de anulação de casamento". "Art. 406. A testemunha não é obrigada a depor de fatos: I - que Ihe acarretem grave dano, bem como ao seu cônjuge e aos seus parentes consanguíneos ou afins, em linha reta, ou na colateral em segundo grau; II - a cujo respeito, por estado ou profissão, deva guardar sigilo".

aqueles indivíduos que não podem cumprir o comportamento originalmente exigido, quando há uma onerosidade excessiva para a pessoa, como ocorre v.g. nas hipóteses de objeção de consciência decorrente de crença religiosa e de convicção filosófica ou política.

As pessoas cumprem o seu dever e adequam o seu comportamento quando percebem que as prestações que lhe são exigidas são legítimas.

Entretanto, no Brasil, verifica-se a ausência de um sentimento constitucional em razão de um cenário legislativo distante da realidade social e de raízes herdadas do processo de colonização, com a imposição das normas do ordenamento jurídico pelos governantes, sem qualquer interação ou manifestação social, gerando um sentimento de não pertencimento[33].

O exemplo tributário é frequente. Em "terras tupiniquins", a resistência ao dever de contribuir com os gastos públicos dá-se por diversos aspectos, dentre eles a ausência de discussão pública e transparência quanto à destinação dos valores arrecadados, a elevada carga tributária, a má administração dos recursos e a corrupção que assola o país[34].

As pessoas em geral não respeitam a lei se não a reconhecem como legítima. E isso significa que o indivíduo deve perceber que os encargos moderados que lhe são impostos são distribuídos de forma mais ou menos equitativa[35] e contribuem para a realização de direitos fundamentais de si próprio, de seus familiares ou da coletividade da qual faz parte.

Referências

ALEXY, Robert. Direitos fundamentais no Estado constitucional democrático:

[33] SANTOS, André Filipe Pereira Reis dos; FITTIPALDI, Paula Ferraço; BINDA, Rosana Júlia. O problema da legitimidade social do direito e da justiça numa sociedade desigual: considerações sociológicas a partir da realidade brasileira. Revista de Direitos Fundamentais e Democracia. v. 13. n. 13. jan./jun. 2013, p. 248.

[34] MACHADO, Álvaro Augusto Lauff; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. A redução das alíquotas do IPI incidente na comercialização de veículos automotores: uma (in)justificável relativização do dever fundamental de contribuir com os gastos públicos. In: BUSSINGER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo. Direitos e deveres fundamentais. Rio de Janeiro: Lumen Juris, 2012, p. 2-3.

[35] HOLMES, Stephen; SUNSTEIN, Cass R. El costo de los derechos: por qué la libertad depende de los impuestos. Trad. Stella Mastrangelo. Buenos Aires: Siglo Veintiuno, 2011, p. 197.

para a relação entre direitos do homem, direitos fundamentais, democracia e jurisdição constitucional. Revista de Direito Administrativo. n. 217. jul-set 1999. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 1999.

BARROSO, Luís Roberto. O direito constitucional e a efetividade de suas normas: limites e possibilidades da Constituição brasileira. 5. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2001.

BERNARDO SEGUNDO, Ronaldo Louzada; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Limites ao dever de tolerância. In: BUSSINGUER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo. Direitos fundamentais: pesquisas. Curitiba: CRV, 2011.

BOBBIO, Norberto. A era dos direitos. Trad. Carlos Nelson Coutinho. Rio de Janeiro: Campus, 1992.

CANARIS, Claus Wilhelm. Pensamento sistemático e conceito de sistema na ciência do direito. 2. ed. Trad. Antonio Menezes Cordeiro. Lisboa: Calouste Gulbenkian, 1996.

CHULVI, Cristina Pauner. El deber constitucional de contribuir al sostenimiento de los gastos públicos. Madri: Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales, 2001.

DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Leonardo. Deveres fundamentais. In: LEITE, George Salomão; SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; CARBONELL, Miguel. Direitos, deveres e garantias fundamentais. Salvador: Juspodivm, 2011.

DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Leonardo. Teoria geral dos direitos fundamentais. 4. ed. São Paulo: Atlas, 2012.

DUQUE, Bruna Lyra; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Os deveres fundamentais e a solidariedade nas relações privadas. In: BUSSINGER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo. Direitos e deveres fundamentais. Rio de Janeiro: Lumen Juris, 2012.

GARZÓN VALDÉS, Ernesto. Los deberes positivos generales y su fundamentación. Doxa. n. 3. 1986. p. 17-33.

GONÇALVES, Luísa Cortat Simonetti; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Deveres fundamentais: a ressocialização enquanto dever do próprio apenado. In: BUSSINGUER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo. Direitos fundamentais: pesquisas. Curitiba: CRV, 2011.

GRAU, Eros Roberto. Ensaio e discurso sobre a interpretação/aplicação do direito. 4. ed. São Paulo: Malheiros, 2006.

HOLMES, Stephen; SUNSTEIN, Cass R. El costo de los derechos: por qué la libertad depende de los impuestos. Trad. Stella Mastrangelo. Buenos Aires: Siglo Veintiuno, 2011.

LARENZ, Karl. Metodologia da ciência do direito. Trad. José Lamego. 3. ed. Lisboa:

Calouste Gulbenkian, 1997.

MACHADO, Álvaro Augusto Lauff; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. A redução das alíquotas do IPI incidente na comercialização de veículos automotores: uma (in)justificável relativização do dever fundamental de contribuir com os gastos públicos. In: BUSSINGER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo. Direitos e deveres fundamentais. Rio de Janeiro: Lumen Juris, 2012.

MIRANDA, Jorge. Manual de direito constitucional. 4. ed. Coimbra: Coimbra, 2000, t. II.

NABAIS, José Casalta. O dever fundamental de pagar impostos: contributo para a compreensão constitucional do estado fiscal contemporâneo. Coimbra: Almedina, 2009.

PECES-BARBA MARTÍNEZ, Gregório. Los deberes fundamentales. Doxa. n. 4. 1987. p. 329-341.

PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Mutação constitucional: interpretação evolutiva da Constituição na democracia constitucional. Rio de Janeiro: Lumen Juris: 2012.

RUBIO LLORENTE, Francisco. Los deberes constitucionales. Revista Española de Derecho Constitucional. a. 21. n. 62. mai./ago. 2001.

SANTOS, André Filipe Pereira Reis dos; FITTIPALDI, Paula Ferraço; BINDA, Rosana Júlia. O problema da legitimidade social do direito e da justiça numa sociedade desigual: considerações sociológicas a partir da realidade brasileira. Revista de Direitos Fundamentais e Democracia. v. 13. n. 13. jan./jun. 2013. p. 235-249.

SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang. A eficácia dos direitos fundamentais. Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado, 2007.

SCHWAN, Felipe Teixeira; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. A democracia brasileira e o dever fundamental de votar. In: BUSSINGUER, Elda Coelho de Azevedo (org.). Direitos fundamentais: pesquisas. Curitiba: CRV, 2011.

TAVARES, André Ramos. Curso de direito constitucional. 10. ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2012.

TAVARES, Henrique da Cunha; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. As obrigações tributárias acessórias e a proporcionalidade na sua instituição: uma análise a partir da teoria dos deveres fundamentais. Revista Tributária e de Finanças Públicas. a. 21. v. 109. mar./abr. 2013. p. 203-223.

TAVARES, Henrique da Cunha; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. Obrigações tributárias acessórias na perspectiva do dever fundamental de contribuir com os gastos públicos: uma reflexão acerca dos critérios para sua instituição. In: ALLEMAND, Luiz Cláudio da Silva (coord.). Direito tributário: questões atuais.

Brasília: OAB, 2012.

TORRES, Ricardo Lobo. A cidadania multidimensional na era dos direitos. In: TORRES, Ricardo Lobo (Org.). Teoria dos direitos fundamentais. 2. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2001.

VIEIRA, Pedro Gallo; PEDRA, Adriano Sant'Ana. O rol de deveres fundamentais na Constituição como numerus apertus. Derecho y Cambio Social. a. X. v. 31. jan./mar. 2013. p. 1-14.

Por uma retórica construtiva no Direito:
Esclarecimento e completude

Lourenço Torres[1]

Resumo: Este estudo faz um retrospecto do desenvolvimento da Retórica na esfera jurídica. Questiona o conceito jurídico atual de retórica como tópica, argumentação e persuasão. Sugere a retórica como um processo de construção da linguagem a partir da história grega e seus filósofos clássicos, em particular Parmênides e Heráclito, no estabelecimento das tradições filosóficas: ontológica e retórica. Conclui que a Retórica também é um método e uma análise que envolve fatores e níveis complexos na busca da tolerância.

Palavras-chave: Filosofia do Direito. História da Filosofia. Retórica jurídica.

Introdução: Conhecimento e construção retórica.

O meio ambiente significa um espaço vital perfeitamente limitado sobre o qual se estabelece um ser vivo de forma específica. O ser humano não possui essa especialização orgânica como possuem outros animais, então, para sobreviver, o homem tem de compensar esta falta de especialização com uma ação propriamente sua, que lhe permita construir um mundo cultural, um "lugar" onde surjam as mais elevadas realizações espirituais e culturais. Por isso, o homem cria um ambiente na esfera da linguagem com todas as suas incertezas e nessa imprevisibilidade linguística, toda espécie de entendimento, análise ou classificação torna esse ambiente uma adaptação vital. Embora tal adaptação não melhore ou piore valorativamente o ser, quanto melhor seu domínio sobre esse ambiente, mais bem sucedido o ser humano se sentirá ou se afirmará[2]. Daí a importância do entendimento retórico dentro do complexo ambiente da linguagem humana para a compreensão do ser humano.

[1] José Lourenço Torres Neto é advogado; mestrando em Teoria Geral, Sociologia e Filosofia do Direito na UFPE orientado pelo Dr. Torquato Castro Júnior; bacharel em Direito e Pós-Graduado em Direito Processual Constitucional, Civil, Penal e Trabalhista pela UNINASSAU campus Recife/PE; membro pesquisador do Grupo de Pesquisas sobre Retórica na História das Idéias Jurídicas no Brasil da PPGD da UFPE coordenado pelo Prof. Dr. João Maurício Adeodato.

[2] A esse respeito ver GEHLEN, Arnold. Der Mensch. Seine Natur Und Seine Stellung

Além de se desconectar do ambiente, é por meio da linguagem que se apreende o conhecimento. Certamente essa linguagem não consiste apenas de palavras, mas envolve signos e informações que de uma forma ou de outra constroem algum tipo de conhecimento. Dois termos tentam descrever esse conhecimento: gnosiologia, que o dicionário define como um estudo ou uma "teoria do conhecimento" e, epistemologia, definido como um "conjunto de conhecimentos que tem por objeto o conhecimento científico, visando a explicar os seus condicionamentos, sistematizando suas relações, esclarecendo seus vínculos e avaliando seus resultados e aplicações"[3]. Na língua inglesa não há distinção teórica entre gnosiologia e epistemologia como se encontra na língua portuguesa. Epistemologia é uma espécie que pretende mais, pois é um metanível; é um "conhecimento" que se pretende metódico, verdadeiro, sistemático, com um objeto definido. Na gnosiologia se tem o "conhecimento" vulgar, o conhecimento emocional, o conhecimento fragmentário. O Direito faz parte desse tipo de conhecimento gnosiológico. Essa gnosiologia vem da tradição ontológica ocidental iniciada por Parmênides, embora muitos a atribuam a Descartes, que na verdade, é uma extensão e expressão atualizada daquela. Para se entender melhor essa diferença, é preciso adentrar nas origens do conhecimento e do Direito a partir dos gregos antigos que perceberam e inseriram a Retórica para dentro de uma teorização ou conceituação dessas matérias.

Logo, o objetivo deste texto é apresentar de forma resumida o desenvolvimento da Retórica para compreender os paradigmas conceituais sobre Retórica empregados na atualidade e como ela é entendida principalmente por operadores do Direito. Questiona o conceito jurídico atual a respeito do uso da retórica como tópica, argumentação e persuasão. Além disso, analisa o preconceito popularizado onde pessoas consideram a Retórica como uma mera arte de "falar bem" ou de "persuadir", não poucas vezes relacionada às falácias, mentiras e engodos. Para isso, toma como marcos teórico: a retórica "tripartida" de Ottmar

---

in Der Welt. Frankfurt: VK, 1993.

[3] FERREIRA, Aurélio Buarque de Holanda. Novo Dicionário Aurélio da língua portuguesa. 3. ed. Curitiba: 2004. p. 774 e 988.

Ballweg[4] e as dimensões da retórica desenvolvidas por Adeodato[5], aqui denominadas de "níveis", e suas linhagens advindas da filosofia retórica clássica. Perpassa pela história grega e alguns filósofos clássicos, em particular Parmênides, Heráclito e Aristóteles, no estabelecimento das tradições filosóficas, ontológica e retórica. Defende a tese de que a tradição retórica é construtiva no sentido de que possibilita a tolerância e o diálogo, mesmo em áreas de conflito, como ocorre na seara do Direito, e conclui que, com essa finalidade, a Retórica se apresenta como um método construtivo para a análise da linguagem do Direito com suas complexidades.

Esse tipo de análise, repita-se, vai de encontro a um preconceito

[4] Ottmar Ballweg (nascido em 11 de março de 1828 na cidade de Hockenheim na Alemanha) é um jurista e filósofo alemão que substituiu Theodor Viehweg na Universidade Johannes Gutemberg de Mainz nas áreas de Filosofia jurídica e Sociologia jurídica direcionando seus estudos para a "pequena" escola de Retórica Jurídica juntamente com Peter Schneider (1920 – 2002). Sob a influência de Viehweg desenvolveu uma teoria retórica como parte do movimento de filosofia jurídica alemão, teoria esta com raízes também na semiótica de Charles William Morris. Desde 1993 Ballweg está aposentado. Seus principais livros são: Analytische Rhetorik: rhetorik, recht und philosophie (2009); Rhetorische Rechtstheorie (1982); Rechtswissenchaft und jurisprudenz (1970); Zu einer Lehre von der Natur der Sache (1963).

[5] São três as dimensões ou metaníveis de retórica: material, estratégica e analítica. Ballweg faz uma diferenciação entre: as retóricas materiais, com as quais são preenchidas as funções básicas da vida comum e que criam "as realidades em que vivemos"; as retóricas práticas, que ensinam o emprego transcendente dos meios retóricos imanentes à linguagem; e, a retórica analítica. Cf. BALLWEG, Ottmar. Retórica Analítica e Direito. Trad. João Maurício Adeodato. Revista Brasileira de Filosofia, v. XXXIX, fasc. 163, julho-agosto-setembro. São Paulo, 1991, p. 177-179. João Maurício Adeodato descreve essa diferenciação referindo a retórica material, existencial, como sendo as próprias relações humanas, entendidas todas enquanto comunicação, e que constituem o primeiro plano da realidade; a retórica prática ou estratégica, como um primeiro grau de metarretórica sobre a retórica material, que parte dela e a ela retorna para reconstituí-la, e, a retórica analítica, reflexiva, que procura ampliar a semiótica e dá igual atenção aos seus elementos dentro dos sistemas linguísticos, uma metódica. Cf. ADEODATO. Retórica como metódica para estudo do direito. A retórica constitucional (sobre tolerância, direitos humanos e outros fundamentos éticos do direito positivo). São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 32 – 39. Adeodato aplica essa retórica tripartida à sua tese sobre conhecimento e ética na filosofia retórica onde a retórica material é constitutiva da realidade, a retórica estratégica age como ação sobre a retórica material e a retórica analítica faz uma descrição específica do mundo, no caso, o jurídico e sua dogmática. Cf. ADEODATO. Uma teoria retórica da norma jurídica e do direito subjetivo. São Paulo: Noeses, 2011, passim.

popularizado onde um grande número de pessoas, independentemente de educação ou classe social, considera a Retórica como uma mera arte de falar bem ou um artifício para persuadir, relacionando-a positivamente, quando muito, apenas com a oratória e a eloquência, isso quando não a relacionam pejorativamente a discursos falaciosos, mentirosos ou enganadores proferidos por políticos ou advogados inescrupulosos. Contudo, a Retórica além de ser um processo de construção da linguagem, é também a própria estrutura que constitui o significante, o idioma e, especificamente, o discurso, aqui também jurídico, expresso em suas variadas formas e institutos.

Não é muito popular se falar em Retórica, muito mais, descrever seus detalhes e liames. Talvez, porque tanto na Literatura como no Direito onde a retórica é "tudo", quanto menos ela for evidenciada, melhor ela funciona. "A melhor retórica é a que se nega, já que dificilmente se luta contra um inimigo que se não vê"[6]. É parte de sua estratégia: se ocultar. Também é dever do orador fazer que ela seja esquecida pelo receptor. Mas, como todos são concomitantemente receptores, é importante conhecer "as armas do inimigo" sem deixar, também, de "armar-se". Parte da Retórica se presta a isso mesmo, fornecer instrumentos para derrotar o oponente, mas há uma retórica que fornece elementos para a construção do diálogo e a tolerância.

1. Duas tradições na filosofia retórica

A retórica é um instrumento amplamente usado na atualidade pelos meios de comunicação e publicidade e não há dúvidas que ela é também usada na política e na esfera jurídica já de algum tempo. Estudos revelam que a retórica tem sua origem não na literatura ou na política, mas no discurso judiciário[7]. Essa é a razão porque se conecta o Direito e a retórica intrinsecamente. Ballweg afirma que "da retórica nenhum direito escapa"[8]. Mas ela não ficou restrita às questões de Direito, ao discurso jurídico. Contudo, "a retórica não esta associada a uma classe definida de assuntos, ela é universal" (1355b7)[9] e todos os homens fazem uso dela em maior ou menor medida, já dizia Aristóteles. Por isso, não existe uma definição uniforme e consensual acerca de sua acepção. Assim como a retórica tem evoluído, seu conceito indissociavelmente, também evoluiu. Essa "evolução" não significa um desenvolvimento crescente e melhor, mas significa que em determinados momentos foi (ou é) mais abrangente que em outros.

[6] MALATO BORRALHO, Maria Luísa; CUNHA, Paulo Ferreira da. Manual de retórica e direito. Lisboa: Quid Juris, 2007, p. 25.

[7] MALATO BORRALHO, Maria Luísa; CUNHA, Paulo Ferreira da. Manual de retórica e direito. Lisboa: Quid Juris, 2007, p. 41 – 43.

[8] "An der Rhetorik Fürt kein Recht vorbei". In: BALLWEG, Ottmar. Retórica Analítica e Direito. Tradução João Maurício Adeodato. Revista Brasileira de Filosofia, v. XXXIX, fasc. 163, julho-agosto-setembro. São Paulo, 1991. p. 175.

Dependendo em muito da tradição que se siga, a retórica receberá definições descritivas ou pejorativas. Se por um lado for escolhida uma das definições descritivas, como a de que a retórica é uma arte, uma ciência, uma técnica ou um código de poder, ou, por outro, de que a retórica é constituída de artifícios falaciosos e erísticos para provocar contradições, confusões e falsidades nos incautos e assim vencer os debates, a retórica tornar-se-á facilmente uma habilidade fátua, um jogo, um mecanismo ou um moralismo[10].

Mais do que um conceito, a retórica é uma prática construída ao longo de milênios. Para compreendê-la é necessário entender sua história, mesmo que resumidamente como aqui. A retórica como disciplina começa na cultura grega e esta se insere na cultura ocidental. Já existia uma cultura anterior, a cultura oriental, que teve expoentes entre os egípcios, babilônicos e caldeus. Entretanto, a cultura ocidental historicamente teve sua arremetida inicial entre os gregos que difundiram sua cultura principalmente por toda a Europa ao longo do tempo, uma cultura "greco-romano-européia", da qual a cultura brasileira atualmente se situa perifericamente. Assim, colocando intencionalmente a cultura oriental de lado, pode-se afirmar que a retórica começa na Grécia. Há uma narrativa que chama Homero de pai da retórica. Como é incerta a existência do próprio Homero, os preceitos e paradigmas pedagógico-retóricos desse "autor" são atribuídos à Odisseia e à Ilíada[11]. Há uma tradição, referida por Aristóteles, que relaciona as origens da retórica a Empédocles de Agrigento[12]. Outra tradição atribui sua criação a Córax, que era discípulo de Empédocles, e a Tísias, ambos de Siracusa[13]. Inde-

[9] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p. 22.

[10] MALATO BORRALHO, Maria Luísa; CUNHA, Paulo Ferreira da. Manual de retórica e direito. Lisboa: Quid Juris, 2007, p. 18.

[11] ORTEGA, Alfonso. Retorica. El arte de hablar en público. Historia, método y técnicas oratorias. Madrid: Ideas Culturales, Instituto Europeo de Retórica, 1989, p. 20.

[12] ARISTÓTELES. Organon. Refutações sofísticas. IV. 183b31.

[13] GUTHRIE, W.K.C. Historia de la filosofía griega. vol. 3. Madrid: Editorial Gredos, pendentemente de quem a tenha iniciado realmente, se aceita que tenha iniciado regularmente na Grécia.

Entre os gregos são encontrados os filósofos pré-socráticos que tiveram pensamentos radicalmente distintos dentro de uma tradição definitivamente bifurcada. Bipolaridade onde, por um lado são encontrados os que seguiam a obra de Parmênides, e por outro, se encontra a corrente de Heráclito. Destes dois filósofos gregos são bem conhecidas suas posturas radicais. O primeiro partia do princípio de que existe "a unidade e a imobilidade do ser", ou seja, de que "a experiência é uma ilusão e o conhecimento vem de dentro e não do mundo exterior"[14]. Por sua vez, Heráclito dizia que: "tudo está em mudança e nada permanece parado"[15]. Veem-se assim, em outras e poucas palavras, as duas posições extremas: o "nada muda" e o "tudo passa". Posturas que se perpetuaram. Mas, não são a única nem a mais importante síntese de seu pensamento, muito mais amplo e que não se desenvolverá aqui.

1.1 A tradição parmenidiana.

Dos parmenidianos vem a cultura filosófica dominante na tradição ocidental atual que é a cultura ontológica, uma cultura que acredita que é possível uma verdade introjetal. Ou seja, terá razão e facilmente se destacará aquele que tiver um discurso que corresponda ao que é em si. "Verdade que talvez seja mesmo corolário de uma necessidade atávica do ser humano por segurança"[16].

Seguindo o rumo do pensamento de Parmênides se encontram as ontologias de Platão que em sua Academia ensinava que para a ação política, ou para qualquer ação, a base deveria ser a investigação científica, de índole matemática. Ou seja, seus discípulos aprendiam que "a atividade humana, desde que pretendesse ser correta e responsável, não poderia ser norteada por valores instáveis, formulados segundo o

---

1994, p. 181.

[14] IGLÉSIAS, Maura. O que é filosofia e para que serve. In: REZENDE, Antonio. Curso de Filosofia:* para professores e alunos dos cursos de segundo grau e de graduação. 12. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Jorge Zahar Ed., 2004. p. 29-30.

[15] IGLÉSIAS, Maura. O que é filosofia e para que serve. In: REZENDE, Antonio. Curso de Filosofia:* para professores e alunos dos cursos de segundo grau e de graduação. 12. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Jorge Zahar Ed., 2004. p. 29.

[16] ADEODATO, João Maurício. A retórica constitucional (sobre tolerância, direitos humanos e outros fundamentos éticos do direito positivo). São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 18.

relativismo e a diversidade de opiniões"; ela deveria fundar-se sobre os requisitos da episteme, "uma ciência dos fundamentos da realidade na qual aquela ação está inserida" e não sujeita à "arte encantatória e à prestidigitação dos retóricos"[17]. Dando um salto histórico nessa mesma direção se chega ao pensamento de Descartes que com sua célebre frase "penso, logo existo"[18], implementou a "certeza" subjetiva, o acordo consigo mesmo. Para ele, a verdade é imanente; o conhecimento vinha "de dentro". Corrente admiradora das matemáticas, como já fazia Platão. Mais uma vez, nessa tradição também estão incluídas as "verdades eternas" que Platão detectou no mundo das idéias. Um plano além da "palavra-convenção" (nomos) dos sofistas e de Isócrates[19]. Essa é a tradição que prevalece até hoje.

Por outro lado, dentro das variantes dessa tradição existem cientistas e pensadores empiristas que enfatizam o conhecimento do ponto de vista do mundo exterior. Locke dizia em seu empirismo britânico que "somos como uma folha de papel em branco na qual a experiência vai imprimindo o conhecimento"[20]. E também existem os que desprezam o conhecimento empírico e se apegam ao conhecimento "certo" e "imutável", "verdadeiro". Quem dá atenção aos fatos externos tem mais dúvidas sobre o conhecimento em face de que os fatos externos nunca se repetem, tais fatos são individuais. Inclui-se aí o Direito como uma "ciência" empírica. Isso porque, não existem dois homicídios iguais, dois adultérios iguais, duas colisões de carros iguais, etc.; todo fato é único. A tendência de todos os filósofos empiristas, ou seja, daqueles que enfatizam os fatos é achar que o conhecimento é provisório, passageiro e fugitivo. Uma aproximação com a tradição de Heráclito. Talvez por isso algumas enciclopédias e dicionários de filosofia incluam os céticos ao lado dos empiristas[21].

Distintamente, mas seguindo a mesma tradição há a tendência

[17] FLORIDO, Janice (Coord). Aristóteles – vida e obra. Col. Os Pensadores. São Paulo: Nova Cultural, 2004, p. 5 – 6.

[18] DESCARTES, René. O discurso sobre o método. col. Os Pensadores. 2. ed. São Paulo: Abril Cultural, 1979. p. 47.

[19] FLORIDO, Janice (Coord). Aristóteles – vida e obra. Col. Os Pensadores. São Paulo: Nova Cultural, 2004, p. 6.

[20] LOCKE, John. Ensaios Acerca do Entendimento Humano. Trad. Anoar AQiex. São Paulo: Nova Cultural, 2000, passim.

[21] Cf. VITA, Caio Druso de Castro Penalva. Ceticismo. LUCAS, Doglas Cesar. Empirismo. In: BARRETO, Vicente de Paulo (Coord.). Dicionário de Filosofia do Direito. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2006, p. 121 – 124, 264 – 266.

dos racionalistas parmenidianos, que acreditam na imanência do conhecimento, de que o conhecimento correto é imutável, verdadeiro e inquestionável. Se há dúvidas sobre determinado conhecimento é porque se está cometendo algum erro de abordagem. Há uma verdade e quem não a alcança é porque está desviado dela ou tem algum problema no ato do conhecimento, seja por não ter conhecimento dos fatos ou não ter conhecimento das normas, tomando-se, por exemplo, o caso de estudiosos do Direito. Essa tradição ontológica diz que apenas existe uma decisão correta em cada problema jurídico, como afirma Dworkin em seu substancialismo, ele, um dos filósofos mais populares entre os que usam a língua inglesa hoje[22]. Se os juízes decidirem diferentemente é porque algum deles é antiético não querendo decidir corretamente, ou é porque ele é incompetente seja por não conhecer o fato ou a norma, ou ambas as coisas. Cometendo, respectivamente, os chamados: erro ético ou erro gnosiológico. Se não ocorrer nem o erro gnosiológico nem o erro ético, todos os juízes decidirão os casos semelhantes exatamente da mesma maneira, pensam. Daí resultou a teoria da subsunção lógica e a tese silogística, entre outras.

1.2 A tradição heraclitiana

Em contraposição à tradição parmenidiana está a tradição heraclitiana, (embora seus seguidores se denominassem heraclíticos)[23], tão antiga e respeitada quanto a primeira, mas que ao longo da história se tornou marginal e minoritária. Ela diz que toda "verdade" é "um acordo de hábitos e convenções, onde as partes, sem discussão, aceitam-na como correta"[24]. A partir de Heráclito existe uma corrente que inclui a tradição retórica e não acredita que exista uma "verdade" no sentido que lhe dá a ontologia. Para a tradição retórica toda verdade é um consenso autopoiético. Exemplo disso é que, nela, se pode denominar uma parede de preta mesmo que seja branca. Contudo, a humanidade demorou tanto a descobrir isso, e embora tal tradição retórica seja tão antiga, ela tem sido por muito tempo marginal. Na verdade, tudo é uma convenção. Poder-se-ia chamar a uma cor preta de azul, de vermelho ou de qualquer coisa já que as convenções são arbitrárias. Os signos são inteiramente arbitrários.

[22] DWORKIN, Ronald. Taking Rights Seriously. London: Gerald Duckworth, 1977.

[23] LAÊRTIOS, Diógenes. Vidas e doutrinas dos filósofos ilustres. Tradução do grego, introdução e notas Mário da Gama. 2. ed. Reimpressão. Brasília: Editora Universidade de Brasília, 2008. p.252.

[24] LAÊRTIOS, Diógenes. Vidas e doutrinas dos filósofos ilustres. Tradução do grego, introdução e notas Mário da Gama. 2. ed. Reimpressão. Brasília: Editora Universidade de Brasília, 2008. p.268.

Historicamente, os primeiros a chamarem a atenção para isso foram os sofistas. Os sofistas foram os pais do Direito, foram os democratas por excelência, os anti-tirania, já que nada é mais tirânico do que "a verdade". Werner Jaeger chamou os sofistas de "mestres da sabedoria"[25] e de "mestres da arete"[26]. Ele considerou tal "movimento espiritual de incalculável importância para a posteridade"[27] e afirmou que "do ponto de vista histórico, a sofística é um fenômeno tão importante como Sócrates e Platão. Além disso, considerou "impossível concebê-los sem ela" (a sofística)[28]. Em Atenas, sendo contemporânea de Platão, essa outra tradição disputava a preferência dos jovens na escola de Isócrates, que seguia a trilha dos sofistas e se propunha a desenvolver nos seus alunos a arete política, a virtude, a capacidade para lidar com os assuntos relativos à polis e, para isso, lhes transmitiam a arte de "emitir opiniões prováveis sobre coisas úteis"[29].

A atitude dos sofistas era diferente daqueles que não aceitam o diálogo. Parafraseando Kant, em 1874, é possível dizer que é melhor uma sociedade de descerebrados tementes à lei, do que uma sociedade de santos que viram a luz[30]. Para com os que já "viram a luz" não se tem mais o que fazer, pois eles já sabem a diferença entre o certo e o errado. Indivíduos que fazem assim, o fazem para passar uma idéia de certeza e segurança, como se isso fosse superior. Contudo, até a ontologia tradicional religiosa mostra algo distinto, para usar um padrão extremo como é o caso na Bíblia, do exemplo de Adão e Eva. O ato do "casal" mítico ser tentado pela "serpente" com o intuito de distinguirem "o bem

---

[25] JAEGER, Werner. Paidéia – A formação do homem grego. trad. Artur M. Parreira. São Paulo: Martins fontes, 2003, p. 340.

[26] JAEGER, Werner. Paidéia – A formação do homem grego. trad. Artur M. Parreira. São Paulo: Martins fontes, 2003, p. 344.

[27] JAEGER, Werner. Paidéia – A formação do homem grego. trad. Artur M. Parreira. São Paulo: Martins fontes, 2003, p. 335.

[28] JAEGER, Werner. Paidéia – A formação do homem grego. trad. Artur M. Parreira. São Paulo: Martins fontes, 2003, p. 341.

[29] FLORIDO, Janice (Coord). Aristóteles – vida e obra. Col. Os Pensadores. São Paulo: Nova Cultural, 2004, p. 5.

[30] KANT, Immanuel. O que é Esclarecimento? Disponível em: <http://www.espacoacademico.com.br/031/31tc_kant.htm>. Acesso em: 08 abr. 2011.

e o mal" não parece ser algo positivo ou louvável. A retórica pentatêutica parece defender uma dependência às vezes dialética com o divino e condena o processo de se alcançar o "conhecimento do bem e do mal", lamentando a perda da condição "original" do homem, um estado natural original de incerteza e com amplas e variadas possibilidades de insegurança, que passa a esperá-lo num futuro "celeste". Assim, o "natural" para o homem seria não "saber", não ter certeza do que é certo ou errado, isso seria deixado para a divindade. E já que o homem (ou a mulher) "caiu" na "desobediência", segundo o relato bíblico, e se tornou conhecedor do bem e do mal, a salvação restauradora não seria a volta ao relativismo original de valores, como então ensinavam os sofistas?

Retornando aos elementos constitutivos deste conceito tão amplo, está que o primeiro paradigma da retórica é o pensamento dos sofistas que não argumentavam com base na verdade, mas no verossímil[31]. No campo do Direito merece destaque o fato de que quando se lida com questões jurídicas não se analisa o verdadeiro ou falso, mas o mais ou o menos verossímil. Os sofistas diferiam na apreciação de muitas coisas, mas tinham em comum o ideal educativo da retórica e a arete política[32]. Apesar dos esforços, por sinal, bem sucedidos, de Platão para excluí-los da filosofia e de Aristóteles não incluí-los na história da filosofia em sua Metafísica, o mesmo Platão admite uma exceção por meio da crítica da teoria do conhecimento feita por Protágoras[33]. Contudo, a sofística se constituía como um membro orgânico do desenvolvimento filosófico, como reconhecidamente fazem as histórias da filosofia grega, e, as mais recentes histórias da filosofia que os consideram como fundadores do subjetivismo e do relativismo filosófico[34]. Tanto Heráclito como Empédocles de Agrigento (Ácragas) foram filósofos que articularam pensamentos filosóficos entre o homem, o cosmos e seus elementos e outros aspectos da alma e da religião[35]. É certo que a cultura filosófica dominante tentou excluir a sofística de todo movimento científico

---

[31] IORIO FILHO, Rafael Mario. Retórica. In: BARRETO, Vicente de Paulo. (Org.) Dicionário de Filosofia do Direito. 1. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2006, p. 723 e 726.

[32] JAEGER, Werner. Paidéia – A formação do homem grego. trad. Artur M. Parreira. São Paulo: Martins fontes, 2003, p. 343.

[33] PLATÃO, Teeteto, 152, A.

[34] JAEGER, Werner. Paidéia – A formação do homem grego. trad. Artur M. Parreira. São Paulo: Martins fontes, 2003, p. 343 – 344.

[35] LIMA JÚNIOR, Dílson Machado (Coord.). Dicionário bibliográfico e teórico (de) filosofia do direito. Belo Horizonte: Líder, 2007, p. 83, 135.

usando a estratégia de dividir a filosofia da retórica, apesar de paradoxalmente considerá-los também fundadores da ciência da educação. Mas, também é certo que foram os sofistas que propiciaram a inundação do espírito da antiga física e da "história" dos jônicos com problemas pedagógicos e sociais que surgiram em consequência de sua sensibilidade e da transformação do estado econômico e social de então[36].

Entretanto, a retórica não se separou da filosofia. Ela abriu o caminho a uma verdadeira filosofia política e ética, ao lado e mesmo acima da ciência da natureza, como salientou Platão no Hípias Maior (281c) sobre a tendência prática dos sofistas e a antiga filosofia separada da vida. Os sofistas produziram as primeiras especializações e obras particularizadas sobre as várias techne. Uma tendência geral do tempo para dividir a vida inteira numa série de compartimentos separados, concebidos com vistas a uma finalidade e teoricamente fundamentados num saber adequado e transmissível[37].

Essa tendência foi adotada por Aristóteles. Depois de Platão, Aristóteles desenvolveu e sistematizou o estudo da retórica que não teria apenas a função de "somente ser bem-sucedida na persuasão, mas descobrir os meios de alcançar tal sucesso" (1355a-b)[38]. O "descobrir" é uma metalinguagem acerca dos meios como objeto, que dilata a tese da retórica também como um método de "observação" amplo.

A matriz aristotélica do sistema retórico serviu de paradigma para os estudos que se seguiram sobre o assunto e resistiu sem muitas mudanças até o século XIX. Contudo, cabe lembrar que Aristóteles efetuou uma intercessão entre a retórica e a persuasão, pois sendo ele um "continuador" da tradição parmenidiana, apropriou-se da técnica de persuasão sofística, heraclitiana, para lançar seus estudos sobre a retórica. Considerações a respeito são tratadas em outro lugar de forma a destacar a questão da persuasão[39].

2. Os gêneros do discurso retórico

[36] JAEGER, Werner. Paidéia – A formação do homem grego. trad. Artur M. Parreira. São Paulo: Martins fontes, 2003, p. 348.

[37] JAEGER, Werner. Paidéia – A formação do homem grego. trad. Artur M. Parreira. São Paulo: Martins fontes, 2003, p. 349.

[38] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007. p. 23.

[39] TORRES NETO, J. L. Preserved sophistic rhetoric as part of Aristotle legacy to the history of legal persuasion. Saarbrücken, Germany: LAP-Lambert, 2014.

Aristóteles em seu livro Retórica define, analisa e fundamenta três gêneros para a retórica. Antes dessa incursão, ele define a retórica não como os meios de persuasão ou o uso persuasivo da linguagem em si, como comumente se entende quando se refere essa arte para o treinamento de oradores[40]. Embora Aristóteles já percebesse que a maioria dos tratados, já naquele então, se dedicasse a elaborar apenas uma pequena parte dessa arte[41], para ele, ela era algo além.

"A retórica é uma maneira de "experimentar o mundo, com as associações que o verbo acarreta, a exemplo de 'olhar', 'sentir', 'pensar', 'provar', 'julgar'"[42]. Aristóteles já tinha percebido com acuidade que "a retórica pode ser definida como uma faculdade de observar os meios de persuasão disponíveis em qualquer caso dado" (1355b25) e diferentemente de outras ciências que também podem instruir ou persuadir sobre seus próprios objetos de estudo específicos, ele considerava "a retórica como poder de observar os meios de persuasão em quase todos os assuntos que se [...] apresentam" (1355b33)[43]. Note-se que ele usa os termos "faculdade de observar" e "poder de observar". Uma coisa são os meios de persuasão, outra coisa é a observação ou, como diz outra tradução: "faculdade de descobrir especulativamente"[44]. E não só isso, em outra passagem ele aponta que a retórica é também uma "faculdade de demonstrar argumentos" (1356 a33)[45]. O uso de meios de persuasão está em um nível e a observação e a demonstração deles está em outro nível. Esse conjunto, até certo ponto, exterior ao objeto dos argumentos e da persuasão, mas incluindo-os é que é a retórica. De qualquer forma, a retórica a que Aristóteles se refere é uma metarretórica e essa percepção também deve ser captada hodiernamente para não se incorrer em

---

[40] FERREIRA, Aurélio Buarque de Holanda. Novo Dicionário Aurélio da língua portuguesa. 3. ed. Curitiba: 2004, p. 1751.

[41] "Todavia, os autores dos tratados atuais sobre retórica elaboraram uma pequena parte dessa arte" (1354 a). In: ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p. 19.

[42] ADEODATO, João Maurício. A retórica constitucional. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 15.

[43] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p. 23.

[44] «La rhétorique est la faculté de decouvrir spéculativement [...] » In : ARISTOTE. Rhétorique. Tome Premier. Trad. Médéric Dufour. 11. ed. Paris: Société d'Édition Les Belles Lettres, 1960, p. 76.

[45] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p. 24.

limitações e faltas.

A partir desse nível de observação é que Aristóteles distingue três gêneros de discursos retóricos são: "o deliberativo, o judiciário e o demonstrativo"[46]. Em outro lugar os três gêneros de discursos são traduzidos como: "político, jurídico e exibicional ou epidítico" (1358b)[47]. No discurso deliberativo também chamado de político usa-se ou não o conselho, seja em prol de algo particular ou de interesses públicos, isto é, ora se procura persuadir, ora dissuadir apresentando o que é útil ou prejudicial para que, se acolhido, pareça vantajoso e caso seja rechaçado pareça como funesto. Em um discurso judiciário se acusa ou se defende com base principalmente no que é justo ou injusto. O gênero demonstrativo (epidítico ou vitupério) comporta o elogio e a censura.

Aristóteles também destaca que esses gêneros têm por objeto uma parte do tempo que lhe é próprio. Ou seja, o gênero deliberativo para o futuro, pois se delibera aconselhando ou não sobre algo que vai acontecer. O orador tenta persuadir o ouvinte sobre uma coisa boa ou má para o futuro. O gênero judiciário sobre o passado, visto que a acusação ou a defesa incide sobre fatos pretéritos. Ou seja, o orador tenta persuadir o julgador sobre uma coisa justa ou injusta do passado. E o gênero demonstrativo ou "exibicional" sobre o presente, pois para louvar ou censurar sempre se apoia no estado presente das coisas, embora sempre se utilize a lembrança do passado ou se presuma o futuro. É onde o orador tenta comover o ouvinte, que também pode ser um observador que apenas decide sobre a destreza dos oradores, acerca de uma coisa digna, bela ou infame a respeito do tempo presente. Este gênero busca o deleite do auditório[48].

Além disso, naquele livro clássico, argumentos em favor da utilidade da retórica são apresentados bem como uma análise da natureza da prova retórica que é o entimema, um silogismo derivado. Essa utilidade vai aléns dos fins, dos objetivos do discurso, pois busca determinar os significados dos fins, o que Aristóteles mesmo afirma ser "o que é mais útil de se fazer [...] enquanto se tenha condições de prever e des-

---

[46] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Antonio Pinto de Carvalho.17. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Ediouro, 2005, p. 39.

[47] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p.30.

[48] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p. 29 – 30.

truir seus opostos"[49]. Entendido aqui que seja "oposto" aquilo que não é útil ou o que não é bom. Tais argumentos foram discutidos por ele nos capítulos 6 e 7.

3. Bases ou fundamentos filosóficos da retórica

3.1 Ceticismo.

Já foi visto que é na sofistica e nos seus paradigmas que se encontra a origem da retórica. Essa perspectiva retórica possui três bases filosóficas comuns: o ceticismo, o humanismo e o historicismo. No entanto, estas são posturas filosóficas constitutivas complementares.

O ceticismo é a concepção de que o conhecimento certo e definitivo sobre algo pode ser buscado, mas não atingido[50]. Ou seja, são doutrinas que repelem que qualquer idéia tenha uma orientação que seja ideal ou absoluta. Parte desse entendimento pode ser percebido em declarações de sofistas. O primeiro grande sofista, de acordo com a acepção platônica, é Górgias que no seu único fragmento preservado, disse: (1) Nada existe. (2) Mesmo que algo exista não pode ser apreendida pelo homem. (3) Mesmo que alguma coisa pudesse ser apreendida, não poderia com toda a certeza ser expressa e comunicada aos nossos semelhantes [Frag. B_3. 979b20-980a1][51]. Isso fez parte de uma idéia revolucionária pregada por ele.

Contudo, ser cético não quer dizer unicamente que não se acredite em nada absoluto. Entretanto, desde a Antiguidade é assim que são retrados os céticos. Exemplo disso é a narração de Diôgenes Laêrtios em seu livro Vidas e Doutrinas dos Filósofos Ilustres, escrito cerca de 200 d.C., com o conto (fantasioso talvez) sobre o filósofo cético Pirro[52] que, segun-

[49] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p. 39.

[50] HUNNEX, Milton D. Filósofos e correntes filosóficas em gráficos e diagramas. Tradução de Alderi de Souza Matos. São Paulo: Vida, 2003. p. 22.

[51] McCOMISKEY, Bruce. Gorgias, On Non-Existence: Sextus Empiricus, Against the Logicians 1.65-87, Translated from the Grees Text in Hermann Diels's Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker. In: Philosophy and Rhetoric, vol. 30. n. 1. Pennsylvania: Penn State University Press, 1997, p. 45.

[52] Pirro de Élis (ca. 360 a.C. — ca. 270 a.C.) o filósofo grego, nascido na cidade de Élis, considerado o primeiro filósofo cético e fundador da escola que veio a ser conhecida como pirronismo. Suas doutrinas são conhecidas principalmente pelos escritos satíricos de seu pupilo Tímon, o Silógrafo. Seu ceticismo drástico é a primeira e mais completa

do a narrativa, andava com seus alunos e foi alertado por um deles sobre um buraco adiante, ao qual respondeu: "esse buraco não existe". O resultado, segue a narrativa, foi que ele caiu no buraco, quebrou a perna e no 'hospital' onde convalescia ao receber a visita de alguns alunos foi questionado novamente se em face dos fatos o buraco existia. Sua resposta foi mais inusitada ainda: "o buraco não existe, eu não estou aqui, minha perna não esta quebrada e vocês também não estão aqui" (IX, 11, 62)[53]. Essa anedota tipicamente é uma caricatura do ceticismo feita por pessoas que provavelmente também são contra ele. Há também o exemplo do conhecido paradoxo de Zenão que afirmava que ao ser atirada uma flecha ela não sai do lugar e alguns dizem: "Coloca-te diante da flecha, então". Paradoxo que Laêrtios literalmente transcreve como: "um corpo que se move não se move nem no lugar em que está, nem no lugar em que não está" (IX, 11, 72)[54]. Mais uma vez, estes são os gracejos dos prováveis inimigos da retórica e do ceticismo.

Na verdade, a retórica e a sofistica são métodos, métodos de abordagem do objeto[55]. O ceticismo, o humanismo e o historicismo são posições filosóficas que apoiam esses métodos. O retórico não pode analisar nada se já tem uma compreensão pré-concebida. Por isso, ele necessita do ceticismo. Este pode ser chamado de ceticismo genuíno, "segundo o qual não se devem afirmar verdades, mas também não se pode negar que elas existam"[56]. O ceticismo é o conceito de que todas as verdades são provisórias. Como já dito, não é afirmar que o mundo não existe e que ao se colocar a mão no fogo se afirmar que ela não vai queimar, e ela não queimará. Repetindo, ser cético é "acreditar" em verdades provisórias. Contudo, já que não são absolutas serão afastadas ou reiteradas, segundo o resultado que a crença nelas der às pessoas exposição de agnosticismo na história do pensamento. Seus resultados éticos podem ser comparados com a tranquilidade ideal dos estóicos e os epicuristas.

[53] LAÊRTIOS, Diógenes. Vidas e doutrinas dos filósofos ilustres. Tradução do grego, introdução e notas Mário da Gama. 2. ed. Reimpressão. Brasília: Editora Universidade de Brasília, 2008. p.268.

[54] LAÊRTIOS, Diógenes. Vidas e doutrinas dos filósofos ilustres. Tradução do grego, introdução e notas Mário da Gama. 2. ed. Reimpressão. Brasília: Editora Universidade de Brasília, 2008. p.270.

[55] Métodos são caminhos, meios. O próprio Aristóteles incluiu o Tópicos e o Argumentos Sofísticos em seu Organon, e, organon significa "instrumento".

[56] ADEODATO, João Maurício. Ética e Retórica: para uma teoria da dogmática jurídica. 4.ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 407.

sobre o mundo[57].

Também, ser cético nem sempre é ser negativo, mas é principalmente ser estratégico. Os céticos acreditam que os seres humanos agem de forma estratégica. Serve de exemplo até o agir de uma criança que faz uma coisa que dá certo, ela vai repetir aquilo como um hábito até que se torne uma norma de cultura. Ou seja, se a criança chora e obtém o que quer, então ela sempre chorará para obter o que deseja. Contudo, se colocar o dedo numa tomada e levar um choque, ela não mais o fará. Não que essas ações sejam verdades conhecidas; apenas, naquele momento circunstancial, ela (a criança) percebe que determinadas atitudes dão certo e outras não. Isso é estratégia.

Existem muitas estratégias sobre o ser cético: por que ser cético? Porque todas as pessoas veem as coisas de maneiras diferentes. Tudo, certamente, dependendo das variáveis de sentidos, idade, sexo, cultura e etc. Assim é que surgem os tropoi. São, pelo menos, 23 motivos para não se acreditar na objetividade do mundo. Que leva à conclusão de que toda a decepção dos seres humanos depende deles mesmos[58]. Os céticos, na verdade, buscam a eudemonia, a felicidade no cotidiano e na condução da vida até a tranquilidade (a ataraxia).

Kant afirmou que "o maior inimigo do conhecimento é o senso comum" ( ). Se alguém tivesse "o olhar" de um microscópio eletrônico com uma ampliação de quinhentas mil vezes[59], e outrem lhe dissesse que "uma parede não é uma parede", o primeiro não teria dificuldades em aceitar tal afirmação em face de sua alta capacidade de observar minúsculos detalhes do objeto observado. Mais fácil ainda seria acreditar que "os sólidos não são tão sólidos assim". Em relação ao estudo do Direito é difícil afastar totalmente o ceticismo até da dogmática. Até um positivista inclusivista como H. L. A. Hart podia sentir que o Direito é falho quando observou que "o cético quanto às normas às vezes é absolutamente desapontado"[60] principalmente quando associado a questões levantadas pelo realismo jurídico, como a de que "proposições gerais não decidem casos concretos" ou que "a vida do Direito não foi a lógica"[61], questões que uma vez sob reflexão levam à conclusão de que pouco se entende a respeito, o que alarga ainda mais o questionamento.

[57] "Os céticos empenhavam-se constantemente em demolir todos os dogmas das escolas, e nunca se expressavam dogmaticamente. Limitavam-se a apresentar e a expor os dogmas dos outros sem jamais chegar a definições, não afirmando sequer que não faziam qualquer definição. Sendo assim, eliminavam até o não-definir, e, portanto não afirmavam: "Nada definimos", porque se assim não fosse, estariam dessa maneira dando uma definição" (IX, 11, 74) In: LAÊRTIOS, Diógenes. Vidas e doutrinas dos filósofos ilustres. Tradução do grego, introdução e notas Mário da Gama. 2. ed. Reimpressão. Brasília: Editora Universidade de Brasília, 2008. p. 271.

[58] Mais detalhes em: ADEODATO, João Maurício. Ética e Retórica: para uma teoria da dogmática jurídica. 4.ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 391 – 400.

[59] O sistema de lentes de um MEV (Microscópio eletrônico de varredura), situado logo abaixo de um canhão de elétrons, possibilita (de ~10-50 μm no caso das fontes termoiônicas) um tamanho final de 1 nm - 1 μm ao atingir a amostra. Isto representa uma demagnificação da ordem de 500 000 vezes e possibilita que a amostra seja varrida por um feixe muito fino de elétrons. Os elétrons podem ser focados pela ação de um campo eletrostático ou de um campo magnético. As lentes presentes dentro da coluna, na grande maioria dos microscópios, são lentes eletromagnéticas. Essas lentes são as mais usadas pois apresentam menor coeficiente de aberração. Após o feixe de elétrons incidir na amostra isso acarreta a emissão de elétrons com grande espalhamento de energia,

Em suma, o ceticismo é inafastável das observações filosóficas. Existem várias correntes. Entre os filósofos céticos, seja do ceticismo gnosiológico ou do ceticismo ético (do bem e do mal), há os que não acreditam no conhecimento, mas acreditam na ética, como Kant que disse que o conhecimento não existe porque cada pessoa vê o mundo de uma maneira diferente (em sua Critica da Razão Prática, como protestante pietista que era, ele afirmou que "duas coisas me enchem a alma de felicidade – o céu estrelado do universo e a certeza moral em meu coração", contudo, para ele a razão não consegue explicar essa moral)[62]; e há o lado contrário, como se vê em Luhmann, ou num cientificista, ou num construtivista radical, que acreditam no conhecimento do mundo, mas não crêem num conhecimento ético. Afirmam que se fosse possível isolar todas as variáveis da experiência humana se poderiam explicar as coisas mais inusitadas, como preferências e gostos. Resumindo tudo, as reações químicas e a ética seria um conjunto de multi preferênque são coletados e amplificados para fornecer um sinal elétrico que é utilizado para modular a intensidade de um feixe de eletrons num tubo de raios catódicos, assim em uma tela é formada uma imagem de pontos mais ou menos brilhantes (eletromicrografia ou micrografia eletrônica), semelhante à de um televisor em branco e preto. Cf. KESTENBACH, Hans-Jürgen, NOCITE, Nádia C. P., Rinaldo Gregório P, LAOS, Joachim e PETERMANN, Jürgen. Resolução Lamelar num Novo Microscópio Eletrônico de Varredura. Polímeros vol.7 n.1 São Carlos Jan./Mar. 1997.

---

[60] HART, H. L. A. The concept of law. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1961, p. 135.

[61] HOLMES, O. W. O direito comum. Trad. J. L. Melo. Rio de Janeiro: O Cruzeiro, 1967, p. 29.

[62] KANT, Immanuel. Crítica da razão prática. Tradução e prefácio Afonso Bertagnoli. Versão para eBooks eBooksBrasil, 2004. Disponível em <http://www.ebooksbrasil.org/eLibris/razaopratica.html>. Acesso em 14 jul. 2012.

cias, as quais seriam resultado da ignorância humana dos processos causais que os produziram, pois tudo é causal. Entre estes existem os monistas, os dualistas, os monistas espiritualistas que são mais difíceis de entender ainda, cada um com sua visão cética.

3.2 Humanismo.

O humanismo é outra base filosófica de apoio à retórica. Isso porque a retórica se preocupa muito mais com o homem e dá menos atenção à natureza. Segundo esse conceito, os próprios seres humanos, são a verdadeira causa pela qual o mundo existe. Assim, em grande medida, tudo deveria se medido, mensurado, quantificado e conceituado tomando-se por base o ser humano. Essa postura pode ser vista em Protágoras, que junto com Górgias, expressa a melhor potência intelectual daquela primeira época ao dizer: "o homem é a medida de todas as coisas, das que são que elas são, das que não são que elas não são" (Teeteto, 152 a)[63]. Foram os grandes humanistas que inventaram o conceito de "tolerância". Relacionando o humanismo com o ceticismo não há uma total contradição. Embora alguns céticos tenham suas dúvidas sobre a bondade da natureza humana, não significa um pessimismo absoluto para com a humanidade, apenas uma desconfiança para com o ser humano. Numa visão ceticista, o ser humano pode ser alguém bom porque a vida o tratou bem. E talvez alguém é mau em vista de situações negativas pelas quais tenha passado e viveu.

Mais uma vez, o humanismo é essa coisa de que o mais importante é o ser humano. E um paradoxo disso é que um humanista como Nietzsche abominava o humanismo, chegando a criticar Sócrates, um dos pais do humanismo, que causou uma inversão da ética de sua época, já que para os pré-socráticos o ser humano era "um nada", um "verme", e a visão filosófica de Sócrates mudou isso incorporando a importância do homem, seja em sua beleza ou em sua baixeza, pois tudo o que fosse humano seria grandioso.

O humanismo não enfatiza o conhecimento técnico. Ele busca os limites do venha a ser culto ou não, embora isso seja muito difícil de dizer. Visto que muito do veio a ser parte do acervo humanístico da história humana se deveu não às habilidades geniais de alguns, mas de fatores como o sucesso ligado às influências e privilégios providos pela sorte encontrada na existência de alguns.

[63] PLATÃO. Diálogos I: Teeteto (ou do Conhecimento). Tradução, textos complementares e notas Edson Bini. Bauru, SP: EDIPRO, 2007, p. 57.

Definir-se exatamente o que é ser humanista é coisa de cartesianos. E ser retórico é ser nunca "exatamente". Na verdade, segundo Sextus Empiricus, o "é" é uma metáfora. Quando se quer dizer que algo é "isso" significa que "neste momento" ou "da maneira que estou me sentindo e diante deste contexto, pode ser que talvez eu pensasse que viesse a achar que essa coisa fosse assim". Como não se deve falar dessa maneira comum, então isso fica reduzido ao verbo "ser". Porém, o ser não quer dizer o que as pessoas ontologizam, embora o ser humano tenha uma predisposição necessária para as certezas. O humanismo, assim como a retórica, pressupõe a incerteza. Dúvida e precariedade são características do humano. Por isso é que é mais fácil ser ontológico, tomando posições de "isto é assim", "aquilo é daquela forma". É a criação comum de topoi. Contudo, tal comportamento ontologizante dominante produz a intolerância. Ser intolerante é mais fácil. E a partir dele se produzem pensamentos extremos como os conceitos de racismo e sexismo, que desenvolvem intolerâncias por (de)semelhanças físicas que são da mais baixa estirpe. Algo totalmente irracional e absurdo.

3.3 Historicismo.

Por fim, apoiando ainda a perspectiva filosófico-retórica está o historicismo. De maneira geral, o historicismo é a prática de uma História radical, que enfatiza além de sua importância como saber e reflexão, mas impondo sua posição central para uma compreensão do ser humano e da própria realidade. O historicismo moderno tem suas raízes nos escritos de Hegel (1770 – 1831) que considerava que o estudo da história era o método adequado para abordar o estudo da ciência da sociedade, já que revelaria algumas tendências do desenvolvimento histórico. Em sua filosofia, a história não somente oferece a chave para a compreensão da sociedade e das mudanças sociais, como também é considerada tribunal de justiça do mundo. Por causa desta posição, seu historicismo foi fortemente rechaçado, por exemplo, por Arthur Schopenhauer (1788 – 1860).

Contudo, também é inegável que Giambattista Vico (1668 – 1744) foi um dos seus precursores, quando tratou do princípio da causação em sua publicação De Antiquíssima Italorum Sapientia (A Antiga Sabedoria dos Italianos) de 1710 onde observa que a metafísica devia encontrar os fatos que podiam ser convertidos em verdades e descobrir assim um princípio de causação enraizado no senso comum. Em 1694 encontrou Dante ignorado, Ficino e Pico postos de lado e o cartesianismo na vanguarda do debate intelectual. Como influenciado parcialmente, porque apreciava Platão, e influenciador da segunda tradição filosófica, ele olhou para a filosofia cartesiana e imediatamente reconheceu nela as bases das ciências emergentes, mas descobriu em Descartes erro e perigo. Vico passou doze anos elaborando a idéia de que a abordagem histórica da lei como desenvolvida nas diferentes sociedades, aliada à visão metafísica da lei divina imutável, poderia delinear uma ciência que compreendesse as verdades conhecíveis pelo homem. Ou seja, atribuiu ao homem o conhecimento da história[64].

A história sempre foi uma parte da retórica. Até "recentemente", uns quinhentos anos atrás, a História era entendida no meio das artes retóricas, juntamente com outros conhecimentos como a música e a filosofia. Os engenheiros, médicos, físicos e químicos eram considerados nessa época como profissionais inferiores na escala de conhecimento cultural por sua esfera de ação limitada. Quem estudava história estava entre os humanistas, que como já dito, se ocupavam muito mais com o homem, do que com a natureza, e assim, tinha conhecimento de vários fatos ao longo da existência humana, o que permitia uma variedade de visões sobre mesmos fatos. Logo, é ingênuo supor-se "o historicismo como um mero modo de tratar um tema registrando dados cronológicos"[65].

"O historicismo é um modo de pensar [...]". "O homem, como ser histórico, torna obviamente históricas todas as suas obras e requer do filósofo uma perspectiva histórica para entendê-las"[66]. Ser culto é conhecer História. Isso implica em conhecer Literatura e Arte, incluindo a Música. É a História quem dá essa relatividade de visões. "O relativismo, que se impõe ao pensador em uma época saturada e crítica não pode satisfazer-se com os sistemas que ignoram a temporalidade e a concreteza da condição humana"[67]. Ela mostra onde a humanida-

[64] SALDANHA, Nelson. Historicismo. In: BARRETO, Vicente de Paulo (Coord.). Dicionário de Filosofia do Direito. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2006, p. 435 – 436.
[65] SALDANHA, Nelson. Historicismo. In: BARRETO, Vicente de Paulo (Coord.). Dicionário de Filosofia do Direito. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2006, p. 435.
[66] SALDANHA, Nelson. Historicismo. In: BARRETO, Vicente de Paulo (Coord.). Dicionário de Filosofia do Direito. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2006, p. 435.
[67] SALDANHA, Nelson. Historicismo. In: BARRETO, Vicente de Paulo (Coord.). Dicionário de Filosofia do Direito. Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2006, p. 435.

de errou, e como deveria aprender com os próprios erros. É a falta dos conhecimentos da História que suscita novos erros. A História faz conhecer o passado para se poder projetar o futuro. Essas são, em suma, as três vertentes filosóficas nas quais se fundamenta a perspectiva retórica.

4. Diferenças entre sofística e retórica

Embora já se tenha falado da sofística anteriormente, importa observar outros nuances. A sofística foi a primeira grande escola da retórica na cultura ocidental. Retórica é uma espécie de gênero classificatório e nela temos a sofística e uma série de outras escolas, como por exemplo, os atuais desconstrutivismo e o neo-estruturalismo, entre muitas outras, que são todas escolas retóricas. De certa forma, até o positivismo jurídico é uma escola retórica. Por exemplo, na definição da inconstitucionalidade da lei o que se encontra é sem dúvida uma posição retórica. Quando se questiona se o aborto é justo ou injusto, a resposta jurídica certamente será que a questão será resolvida por uma assembleia devidamente constituída e legitimamente designada para decidir o que é justo ou injusto com relação ao aborto. Define-se uma norma como inconstitucional aquela que não obedeceu ao rito de elaboração previsto pelo sistema e não foi elaborada pela autoridade competente para tanto (já que quem estabelece essa competência é o sistema). Todos esses são critérios inteiramente formais. Como disse Luhmman: "O bem e o mal são resultados de um procedimento".

A filosofia subjaz a retórica. Vale lembrar que para Platão, a retórica não era filosofia, porque ele considerava que a filosofia se preocupava unicamente com a "verdade". Quando se aceita essa definição então é correto dizer que retórica não é filosofia. Mas, se a filosofia é o amor ao saber, como leva a crer sua etimologia, então a sofistica é uma forma de filosofia. Embora isso seja irrelevante, o importante é que se possa ter abordagens ou formas de ver o mundo.

Pode-se ver o mundo como filosofia, sofística. Então a sofistica será uma das formas da retórica. Que se subdivide em uma teoria das figuras, ou ornamentos, ou mesmo figuras de estilo, que são importantes no mundo jurídico, embora um tanto desprezadas pelo ensino superior (metáforas, metonímias, sinédoque, estudo de silogismos, etc.) e, a teoria da argumentação, que é tópica, entimemática, consensual, circunstancialmente procedimental. O próprio Robert Alexi e outros ontologistas apenas se apropriaram dessa nomenclatura, mas não se referem à teoria da argumentação descrita aqui. A tópica é procedimental, com a diferença de que os próprios participantes do discurso escolhem o procedimento.

Esclarecendo, na teoria da argumentação de Alexi, as regras de procedimento são impostas de fora para dentro e se você não se submeter a elas não se estará agindo racionalmente. Por exemplo, se usam os vinte e oito meta-códigos, que não são escolhidos por nós que estamos participando do discurso, eles se impõe pela sua própria natureza ou ontologia mais popular. Uma dessas regras é todo aquele que pode falar e quer falar, deverá falar no discurso. Outra regra é a de que todos são iguais. A regra da auto-consistência é a de que quem fala e mente, não está sendo racional.

A argumentação tópica não vê o problema assim. Ela acha que é possível haver discursos em que o procedimento não respeite essas regras, onde, por exemplo, algumas partes sejam proibidas de falar. Uma parte tem a força e a outra não a tem. Usa-se a ação estratégica. Algo como o que um advogado usa em seus discursos. Omitir algumas passagens, enfatizar outras, com o fim de se obter o fim desejado. Assim, a tópica entimemática não se subordina a uma postura ética definida. Embora não seja correto dizer que a retórica é antiética.

A sofística é a primeira das escolas retóricas e a retórica, grosso modo, é a crença na auto-constituição de um discurso circunstancial. Como a filosofia é a "busca pelo saber", em substituição ao mito, ela compreende o mundo não de forma mitológica, mítica. Isto é, a filosofia como linguagem sai das narrativas que retratam tempos fabulosos ou heroicos[68]. Em geral, seus arrazoamentos não se baseiam em seres e acontecimentos imaginários, embora algumas dessas narrativas tentem ser explicadas de forma filosófica. No máximo, ela busca em fatos e personagens reais exagerados pela imaginação popular seu correspondente lógico, visto que é considerado verdadeiro por força da tradição e são passíveis de refutação. Nisso buscaram se especializar os sofistas e ali desenvolveram seu instrumental retórico. Logo, a sofística como filosofia é uma das escolas retóricas, também filosóficas, e, têm na retórica instrumentalidades como as teorias das figuras e da argumentação tópica, entimemática. Existe também a corrente das ontologias que desenvolvem os silogismos racionalistas, como outra forma de pensamento.

Tal bipartição se baseia numa compreensão do ser humano. A retórica tem um conteúdo persuasivo que não é um conteúdo verdadeiro, mas é um conteúdo consensual. Os seres humanos se entendem porque possuem consensos pré-constituídos, que não são discutidos ou questionados a fim de se evitar as literalidades hermenêuticas e se dê algum sentido às ideias, como bem estuda a Teoria da Argumentação tópica que não se baseia em "verdades", mas em consensos sobre qualquer conteúdo.

[68] FERREIRA, Aurélio Buarque de Holanda. Novo Dicionário Aurélio da língua portuguesa. 3. ed. Curitiba: 2004. p. 1340 e 1341.

Essas duas inclinações, ontológicas e retóricas, marcaram toda a cultura ocidental, já que a cultura oriental é mais unicista ou holística. A retórica é uma racionalização. Os sofistas já percebiam que os efeitos das palavras sobre as pessoas têm resultados poderosos. Quem fala bem tem poder. Por isso eles desenvolveram uma técnica de falar bem, e como nem todo mundo consegue falar bem, embora isso possa ser adquirido com o devido treino e prática, eles impuseram uma certa vantagem sobre os outros.

Platão considerava a retórica dos sofistas uma falsidade, porque achava que eles tinham o objetivo de provocar um efeito de submissão sobre a conduta alheia, de forma que o orador, o retor, pudesse se impor, tendo o poder, atitude abominada por ele.

Contudo, Aristóteles percebeu que é impossível se fugir da retórica. Embora fosse ideal, como pensava Platão, que só se trabalhassem silogismo apofânticos e dialéticos para uma busca de verdade, a realidade é que muitos assuntos humanos importantes tornam esse idealismo uma impossibilidade.

Aristóteles, em sua metódica, explica o porquê. Ele diz que certas coisas que podem ser demonstrados, são de tão difícil ou demorada demonstração, que fica difícil demonstrar cada palavra que se diz, até porque o auditório não aguenta tantos detalhes explicativos. Outras questões não são possíveis de demonstração, por mais tempo que se tenha para demonstrar. Ainda tem que se considerar a ignorância do ouvinte. Às vezes o discurso exige tantos pressupostos que o ouvinte não tem, que nunca se poderá incluir o ouvinte na parte apofântica da comunicação. Por isso Aristóteles divide os silogismos em apofânticos, aqueles iluminam sem ser necessário nem pensar, e que se aproximam da verdade, e os dialéticos, os que se chega à verdade, mas que demora a chegar à verdade, como por exemplo, tentar explicar $E=mc^2$, que se acredita, mas é necessário todo um tempo e conhecimento específico, pressupostos para se entender isso, e assim, se chegar a essa conclusão. Ele informa que pouca coisa se consegue apofântico, e alguma coisa se consegue dialética, caso se tenha o conhecimento especial, como o que possuem pessoas muito elitizadas.

Ainda existe o entimema, que é o silogismo retórico, porém do provável, já que há assuntos em que a verdade é possível, e aqueles em que não se pode chegar à verdade. Daí ele separar a retórica do "bem", que são os entimemas, que se baseia em topoi, em probabilidades, e, a retórica do "mal" que são os erismas aqueles que são da "mentira".

Aristóteles é o primeiro da tendência dominante a assumir que a retórica era útil (1355a20)[69]. Mostrando que há uma retórica do lado do "bem" e que é preciso estudar retórica para se poder combater a "má" retórica, a erística, já que os sofistas usam ambas. Portanto, se for possível separa esses elementos, o orador poderá se defender melhor. Aristóteles acreditava que o discurso forense tem mais do erisma do que os outros discursos.

5 Elementos constitutivos da base retórica.

5.1 Os meios técnicos da retórica aristotélica – a tríade retórica

5.1.1 O e*thos*

Sabe-se também que esta classificação foi introduzida por Aristóteles. Essa é a grande importância que se deve conceder a esse grande filósofo, pois mesmo contando entre os filósofos ontológicos, ele percebeu a necessidade do estudo retórico na esfera do ambiente linguístico. Por isso, ele demonstrou que os meios discursivos de persuasão dizem respeito a alguns aspectos técnicos infringidos ao discurso. Daí termos o ethos, o pathos e o logos. O ethos indica o caráter pessoal do orador. Aquilo que do próprio orador dá peso a suas palavras.

O Ethos se refere ao caráter ou a presença do locutor ou escritor que tenta convencer. O autor deve ter - ou parecer ter - um argumento crível e parecer ser uma pessoa confiável. Se o argumento é uma questão técnica ou requer conhecimento especializado, o orador deve estabelecer sua posição de perito. Se o indivíduo não for crível ou de confiança, o público não vai assistir ao seu argumento ou ser persuadido por ele. O orador também deve usar o tom de voz adequado para a situação, se quiser ser eficaz em sua apresentação.

---

[69] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p. 21.

5.1.2 O pathos

O pathos é o que causa no auditório algum tipo estado de espírito, de reação, de emoção. Que é um dos objetivos do orador, controlar a reação do auditório. Controlar o pathos, mas não qualquer pathos, mas aquele que o orador deseja.

O Pathos refere-se ao papel da audiência em uma situação retórica. O argumento deve apelar para as emoções ou valores do público, se quiser ser eficaz. A retórica deve estimular a imaginação do leitor ou ouvinte. O locutor ou autor deve desenvolver empatia com o público. No entanto, o orador deve tomar cuidado para não parecer manipulador ou corre o risco de perder o ethos, sua credibilidade com o público.

5.1.3 O logos

É a prova, ou aparente prova. O conteúdo do discurso, propriamente dito. A argumentação racional objetiva[70].

O logos refere-se à lógica do argumento em si. Um texto retórico deve ser estruturado de forma clara e lógica. Se um argumento for ilógico e confuso, o público não será capaz de segui-lo. Independentemente do carisma do orador, se seu argumento for difícil de entender, é improvável que ele convença seus ouvintes. Um texto lógico e de fácil compreensão é muito mais provável de influenciar o público. Um argumento ilógico pode afetar a percepção do público sobre o orador, diminuindo seu ethos, sua credibilidade com eles.

5.2 Os recursos retóricos

Outros "meios" ou "recursos" discursivos referidos por Aristóteles são os recursos retóricos pertinentes especificamente à retórica persuasiva, argumentativa, e são os por ela construídos através dos princípios da retórica[71]. O gênero que sustentou a classificação aristotélica destes recursos retóricos foi o silogismo. Para fins didáticos, convém ressaltar que, em sua Tópica[72], Aristóteles já havia introduzido o conceito de silogismo dialético [Top., 154a20], fazendo uma distinção entre os silogismos apodíticos, baseados em premissas aceitas indiscutivelmente e de forma evidente e silogismos dialéticos, baseados em premissas aceitas universalmente. Essa sistemática foi uma analogia dos métodos empregados pela ciência e pela dialética, onde ele encontrou também a indução (επαγωγή – epagoge) e a dedução (συλλογίσμός – silogismos).

[70] ADEODATO, João Maurício. A retórica constitucional. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 23.

[71] São princípios gerais da retórica: objetividade, atratividade, concisão, simplicidade, comunicabilidade, adequação ao perfil do auditório e respeito ao idioma.

[72] ARISTÓTELES. Tópicos: dos argumentos sofísticos. 2.ed. São Paulo: Abril Cultural,

Genericamente, o silogismo seria uma dedução formal a partir de duas proposições, chamadas de premissas, das quais, por inferência, se chega a uma terceira, chamada de conclusão[73]. É a definição para o silogismo "perfeito". Mirabete utilizou-se da doutrina jurídica para comparar os requisitos formais da sentença, que são três: a exposição (ou relatório, ou histórico); a motivação (ou fundamentação) e a conclusão (ou decisão) com a exposição esquemática de Noronha que afirmava representar a sentença um silogismo, onde na premissa maior se encontrava a exposição dos fatos apresentados pelas partes; na premissa menor se encontravam os motivos, isto é, as provas e as regras do Direito normativo e, na conclusão, a decisão condenando ou absolvendo o acusado[74]. Porém, esse padrão é comumente quebrado no mundo do Direito, que oculta um dos três elementos formais. É o caso do entimema.

Para tratar das deliberações, o papel mais importante foi atribuído ao entimema ou silogismo retórico, este visto como o corpo da persuasão e o centro da retórica, e constituído principalmente por premissas que enunciam apenas o que é provável (Ret., 1357a 13-14)[75].

O entimema é o recurso dedutivo próprio da oratória retórica consagrado até em texto normativo judicial. Parece um silogismo, mas não é, pois só do ponto de vista formal mantêm semelhanças com o silogismo científico ou demonstrativo. Sua principal diferença reside em que suas premissas, em contrapartida ao que acontece com o silogismo perfeito, não são sempre necessárias (como no exemplo), nem universais, nem verdadeiras.

Ao enumerar os recursos discursivos retóricos Aristóteles usa a mesma sistemática dividindo-os em indutivos e dedutivos, mas com a diferença de que tomam por base a verossimilhança. O recurso indutivo

1978, p. 136.

[73] FERREIRA, Aurélio Buarque de Holanda. Silogismo. Novo Dicionário Aurélio da língua portuguesa. 3. ed. Curitiba: 2004, p. 1846.

[74] MIRABETE, Júlio Fabbrini. Processo penal. 4. ed. rev. e atual. São Paulo: Atlas, 1995, p. 439.

[75] ARISTOTE. Rhétorique. Tome Premier. Trad. Médéric Dufour. 11. ed. Paris: Société d'Édition Les Belles Lettres, 1960, p. 80.

é chamado de paradigma, o exemplo, conhecido como indução retórica. Segundo Adeodato o meio, ou recurso dedutivo é o entimema, conhecido como silogismo retórico[76], já assim classificado por Ferraz Júnior[77], e distinto do erisma ou silogismo erístico. As premissas oriundas dos entimemas são constituídas de probabilidades e signos, e segundo as palavras mesmas de Aristóteles "esse é o meio de persuasão mais efetivo", pois "o homem que faz boas conjecturas acerca da verdade assemelha-se ao fazer boas conjecturas acerca das probabilidades" [Ret., 1355a16][78].

O entimema paradigmático ganha todo o seu conteúdo persuasivo dos exemplos, sendo predominantemente demonstrativo, vez que, apresentados os casos, estes são aceitos pela maioria das pessoas, e em especial pela maioria dos auditórios, enquanto que o silogismo ou entimema retórico tem sua persuasão baseada em sinais ou indícios, onde aparecem apenas algumas premissas e subentendem-se outras. Portanto, o entimema é formalmente definido como uma estrutura silogística à qual falta um dos três elementos formais, possuindo "desdobramentos modais ocultos"[79].

6 A Retórica e seus três níveis ou dimensões.

6.1 A Retórica material.

Ainda para se compreender o que vem a ser a retórica propriamente, é preciso ver seus três sub-níveis. Existe a retórica material, que é aquilo que todo ser humano pratica sem reflexão, ou seja, o próprio ambiente das relações humanas. São nossos diálogos, nossas inter-relações.

O ser humano é um ser que fala. Dessa forma pensamos que somos mais que os animais, tendo a linguagem como o diferencial. O ser humano é um ser pleno porque vive tanto nas regiões árticas como nas florestas, se adaptando a qualquer ambiente sendo assim, inteligente. Para os retóricos, o ser humano não é mais que os outros, pelo contrário,

---

[76] ADEODATO, João Maurício. Ética e retórica: para uma teoria da dogmática jurídica. 4. ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 339.

[77] FERRAZ JÚNIOR, Tércio Sampaio. Introdução ao estudo do Direito: técnica, decisão, dominação. 6. ed. São Paulo: Atlas, 2008, p. 381.

[78] ARISTÓTELES. Retórica. Tradução Marcelo Silvano Madeira. São Paulo: Rideel, 2007, p. 21.

[79] cf. ADEODATO, João Maurício. Ética e retórica: para uma teoria da dogmática jurídica. 4. ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2009, p. 339.

é menos. Se falamos é porque não temos o ambiente do mundo. A capacidade de sobrevivência do ser humano é inferior à maioria dos outros animais. Por exemplo, uma girafa recém-nascida pode correr por léguas fugindo de uma onça. Já o ser humano, demora cem anos para aprender a viver e a maioria não aprende. Os dinossauros viveram cento e cinquenta milhões de anos sobre a terra e nós apenas com pouco mais de trezentos mil anos estamos acabando com ela, e isso porque nos consideramos inteligentes. Será que a humanidade viverá cento e vinte milhões de anos? Isso sem falar que ainda existem os descendentes dos dinossauros, como as aves. O que é viver em metabolismo perfeito e interação com a natureza? O que é ser inteligente? Estes são questionamentos da retórica material.

A retórica material é esse inter-relacionamento das relações humanas por meio da comunicação. Nosso ambiente é a língua. O ser humano sozinho não é nada, ele necessita da comunicação até para ser humano. Prova disso são poucas experiências e constatações através de crianças encontradas perdidas em florestas, que foram criadas por lobas ou gorilas, vivendo como bichos sem desenvolver sua humanidade exatamente por falta da comunicação. Essa é a retórica material natural que faz parte de nossa formação antropológica, resultado da sociabilidade humana. Sem comunicação não somos humanos. É a retórica da matéria ou do primeiro nível.

O primeiro passo para se determinar o nível da retórica material é o contexto histórico, a descrição dos eventos. O que acontece nos debates que o autor observado traçou, qual o relato de suas ideias; isso separado de sua estratégia, o que seria um nível mais acima, chamada de: a argumentação do autor. Na falta de uma palavra melhor, seria a retórica prática ou estratégica. Primeiro é necessário isolar o contexto histórico descrevendo casos. O que tem muito a ver com questões pessoais.

Já vimos que são pressupostos da retórica o ceticismo, o historicismo e o humanismo. Em alguns casos de um estudo, fica muito patente o humanismo demonstrado pelos autores ao manifestarem, por exemplo, raiva. É o exemplo de um autor expressar sempre sua raiva pelo fato de um determinado colaborador ter sido escolhido para uma função jurídica e não ele ou algum de seus colaboradores. Isso é um fator importante para quem estuda a retórica. É o pathos. Observar a raiva de quem foi desprezado pelos historiadores mais ontológicos.

Quase todo grande pensador não é fruto apenas de seu contexto histórico. É o exemplo observado em Nicolai Hartman que escreveu sua Ética de mil páginas no front da Primeira Grande Guerra Mundial em meio a toda aquela confusão. Balas silvando e ele pensando no reino eterno dos valores. Esse pensador conseguiu abstrair-se no contexto histórico, mas nunca totalmente. Contudo, cabe lembrar que contexto histórico não é sinônimo de retórica material, é apenas uma aplicação de método que deve ser observado em um determinado trabalho.

Esse contexto histórico envolve um levantamento bibliográfico. O levantamento bibliográfico é um trabalho diário que abrange: uma bibliografia primária, as obras escritas pelo próprio autor incluindo documentos, jornais e processos e não só obras de doutrina; a bibliografia doxografica que são os escritos de outros observadores sobre o autor. Dela também vão ser construídas as teses do estudo em questão.

Porém, há uma diferença entre a história dos eventos históricos e a história das idéias, como bem o coloca o professor José Antônio Tobias em seu livro História das Idéias no Brasil da editora EPU. [Não é nossa função demonstrar essa diferença, mas precisamos pelo menos perceber e fazer essa diferenciação].

A proporção da ênfase que será dada a cada fase da retórica vai depender do estilo de vida e da obra de cada autor escolhido e analisado. Se o autor teve uma vida intensa e interessante, haverá um destaque maior na questão material e estratégica, ou se mais recluso e introspecto na questão analítica, haja vista sua contextualização histórica ou bibliográfica. Contudo, deve se colocar alguma ênfase em todos os níveis de estudo retórico pretendidos.

6.2 A Retórica estratégica.

Ao se observarem alguns dos fatos comunicativos, percebe-se que algumas estratégias são melhores que outras. Essa observação é um pouco mais difícil de ser feita. Na área do Direito existe uma guerra de estratégias, e é para isso que se passam cerca de cinco anos em uma faculdade estudando. Outras questões da vida humana não necessitam desse aprendizado, porque se utiliza de códigos simples, variáveis e não dogmáticos.

Diferentemente da retórica jurídica onde o Direito tem alguns limites dogmáticos, que na verdade não são uma prisão, mas uma porta para um mundo inteiro, nas palavras de Tércio Ferraz Jr. Porém, é um mundo que não pode tudo. Pode fazer muita coisa, mas não pode tudo. O aluno tem a ilusão ao verem as muitas teorias diferentes do Direito e pensam que poderão criar a sua também, mas não é bem assim. Eles têm uma grande liberdade dentro da dogmática, mas é uma liberdade dogmatizada. Todo argumento tem que se basear em uma fonte válida e pertinente, o sentido e o alcance dos termos tem que ser determinado, a argumentação tem que se dirigir a um objetivo e tem que haver uma sugestão de decisão. Isso é o procedimento dogmático. Tudo isso também é retórica estratégica.

A retórica estratégica é que da observação do mundo visto na retórica material pela comunicação humana, são retiradas algumas orientações normativas que permitem o sucesso estratégico nessa convivência do primeiro nível. Ao passar pelo primeiro nível, observando o que deu certo ou errado ali, se chega ao que se denomina retórica prática ou estratégica.

Isso é visto de forma tópica, ou seja, em cada ambiente é diferente. Por exemplo, nos ambientes marginais a gentileza ou o ato de chorar é uma fraqueza. Em alguns ambientes mais patriarcais, a mulher só pode falar com um homem na companhia de seu irmão, de seu marido ou pai. Houve tempo e em alguns lugares em que a mulher era tutelada relativamente incapaz, contudo, em alguns lugares se deu a emancipação feminina revertendo esse quadro. Tudo isso faz parte das estratégias de linguagem que marcaram o século XX.

6.3 A Retórica analítica.

O último dos três níveis é a retórica analítica ou cientifica. É a tentativa de estudar o resultado de determinadas estratégias nos níveis de retórica material, a fim de que possam ser repetidos e consequentemente, mantido um grau de sucesso. Foram as tentativas de mostrar que determinadas expressões provocam deleite aos ouvintes e outras não. Como o Manual de Retórica de Frei Caneca baseado no pensamento de Quintiliano, que ensina como seduzir os outros. Mas tem que ficar bem claro que isso só vale topicamente. Em ambientes incultos, ambientes agressivos, em ambientes onde não satisfeitas as necessidades básicas isso não funciona. Quem tem fome não é humano. Para ser humano, o lado animal precisa estar satisfeito.

7 Conclusão: Direito, consenso e tolerância por meio da instrumentalidade e metodologia retórica.

Para a Retórica é necessário uma antropologia realista. Sabemos que há sociedades onde apedrejar ou lapidar mulheres adúlteras aceitável, embora o consideremos um comportamento antiético. O uso da ordália (prova sem combate, juízo de Deus) na Idade Média, hoje é considerado um absurdo para a solução de conflitos, ainda mais, se fossem legitimados pelo "estado". Para o retórico se foi tomada uma decisão ética que foi transformada em norma jurídica é porque uma boa parcela da população acredita que isso é o justo. Alexy dizia que os positivistas são adeptos da tese da separação do direito moral e os não positivistas ou pós-positivistas da tese da vinculação, o que parece errado diante de casos como este. Na verdade todo positivismo não crê na vinculação, mas, acredita que todo direito tem um conteúdo ético. Esse conteúdo ético não é determinado por ninguém a não ser pelos próprios seres humanos. Assim, leis como o apedrejamento de mulheres adúlteras, a decepação das mãos de quem furta ou a castração do estuprador provêm de boa parte de uma população que se não é uma maioria democrática, é um grupo mais bem estruturado, armado, solidário ou rico. Este grupo é denominado de vencedores éticos. E são os vencedores éticos que decidem que aquilo se torne uma norma coercitiva, obrigatória. Isso não pode ser chamado de antiético. Pode ser antiético para um ou outro indivíduo ou grupo. Contudo esses mesmo que formularam essa coerção, se submetidos aos horrores de muitos anos de guerra ou de fome contumaz, como acontece em certos países primitivos, quem sabe, mudarão sua opinião completamente. O retórico não é aquele que aceita qualquer dominação, pelo contrário, por desconfiar tanto na natureza humana, acredita que se não se der roupa, comida e condições básicas de sobrevivência às pessoas elas voltam à barbárie. Justamente o contrário do que os anti-retóricos dizem. Terrível também é a doutrina da verdade que é imposta e empurrada "goela abaixo".

O retórico, como visto, é aquele cético, que não será levado ou enganado por um grande salvador da humanidade como Hitler ou Chaves. Somente os famintos e extremamente necessitados é que acompanham esses iluminados que viram a "luz". Os que apoiam ideologias como o racismo é que devem ser considerados marginais. São dominações sem escrúpulos que em face de necessidades extremas, vem dominar os que são ainda mais fracos. A posição cética também não é uma posição imoral. Pelo contrário, ela segue a linha do "bem" sendo cética, humanista e histórica. Onde cada um pode fazer o seu presente.

Os retóricos são muito descrentes sobre os discursos das dominações, onde alguns seres humanos são excluídos do discurso. Não que isso seja verdade. Mas, porque o ser humano excluído do discurso deixa de ser humano. Os retóricos são acusados de aceitarem qualquer tipo de relacionamento social. Perguntaram a Kelsen se o sistema nazista era um sistema jurídico, se era Direito, ao que respondeu que sim. Da mesma forma que em certas sociedades e países apedrejar uma mulher por adultério é direito se visto do ponto de vista do direito positivo. Olhando do ponto de vista humanista e cultural de outras sociedades, isso é considerado um absurdo. Mas para Kelsen, um positivista, é Direito, embora seja um direito ruim, já que ele era democrata, judeu, mas é Direito.

Portanto, pelo simples fato de que no mundo dos fatos é sempre imperfeito, o Direito seja na produção normativa, seja na aplicação decisória, necessita ser construtivo positivamente a fim de que, ao menos, em sua finalidade teleológica sua credibilidade seja reforçada. Não ignoramos que, no mundo do Direito, determinadas construções da linguagem produzem mais injustiça do que equidade. Mas isso se deve, talvez, à ignorância ou ao despreparo de profissionais na boa retórica que, se apegando a um dogmatismo cego, veem escapar por entre os dedos o bom senso e a civilidade.

Percebemos então, que todos esses elementos, que atualmente têm ocupado exaustivamente a análise de vários dos maiores filósofos do Direito e permeiam os gabinetes dos seus operadores, são os resultados do trabalho prático (mesmo que oculto) da Retórica, na busca do consenso e da tolerância.

Natural Law: Classic and Modern?

Paulo Ferreira da Cunha[1]

Abstract: Natural Law was, in its many aspects, the philosophy of Law of the Western World, at least, during centuries. A general change of paradigm is making it a sleeping beauty in a beautiful castle surrounded by high and wild vegetation. If we want to wake up Natural Law from its persistent dream, we must face some myths about it, and deconstruct them. And try to build not a modern Natural law against the past ones, but a more flexible and contemporary vision of it. Let me present to you some basic thesis to what I call a critical neojusnaturalism, an alternative to the present dogmatic theories of a positivist natural law, and the ideological division between classical and modern natural law.

Keywords: Natural Law, Human Rights, Ideology

1. Perfection

The common idea about Natural Law is, as all professors of Jurisprudence know, very far away from what Natural Law really is.

According to many who are by no means learned in the matter, Natural Law would be "the right law", "the just law" or "the perfect law". One of the first indications of a false theory in those philosophical fields is the strong conviction used to assert one's thesis. Those who say that Natural Law is the best, the most perfect law, normally do that emphatically, with no shadow of a doubt, and it seems that things become real or true merely because they say things are as they are.

For those dogmatic iusnaturalists, Natural Law would be plain law, and positive law would be a decayed or maculated law.

But it is quite obvious that Natural Law cannot, by definition, be unjust or even unfair and if it is even more true that there are and there always were all over the world many examples of an unjust and unfair positive law (the machine of making law is mainly in the hands of politicians, sometimes deprived of juridical knowledge and more often without a real sense of justice - either juridical or social), it is undeniable that Natural Law and positive law need each other.

[1] Catedrático da Universidade do Porto.

2. Positive Law

So, against the prejudice that Natural Law is the good law and positive law the bad one, or at least the decayed one, we declare that they need each other. And why? Because Natural Law is not a complete law, and positive law, though positivists like to think otherwise, is in a symmetrical position.

Natural Law cannot determine by itself the colour of official forms, the exact amount of academic fees or the duration of a punishment for this or that crime.

On the other hand, positive law has no detachment from its own reality. And the dura lex sed lex pseudo-principle enables positivists to think of the most important thing in law: justice. In general, without the window of Natural Law, positive law would be the same as a subordinate, more or less mechanical activity. Law would be just another way of force, power and politics. We obviously do not deny the immense importance of those matters to the law, but there are some limits. At a certain point, jurists, the priests of Justice, are allowed by their special legitimacy to say "no" to the simple orders of a power that, even if it is legitimate by title, by doing evil things falls into the darkness of the exercise of illegitimacy. This may be said with other words, but it was formulated approximately in these terms centuries ago. Another common place - also a mistake, but not so serious - considers Natural Law as a set of principles - it is an understandable temptation for a philosopher (even more for a jurist) who is not so demanding and is, let us say, short of time. In fact, the matter is more complex than that. Judging from one of its aspects, we could even say that maybe Natural Law was once (mainly in jusrationalist times and immediately after that) a set of principles, or, better still, a system of principles, but that does not help us a lot, because, first of all, Natural Law was not always seen like that, and - what is even more complicated - it seems that nowadays Natural Law can no longer be conceived as being only principles or mainly certain concrete principles.

Today, with a certain "good will" we would admit a very subtle presence of principles of Natural Law. They should be mainly principles under the commonly accepted ones. A kind of shadow-principles, more difficult to understand and that prevail long term over current ones. Those shadow principles, or "silent principles", are the only justification of the exile and death of the simple principles created by deduction from political fashions or by the decantation of positive laws.

The classical principles "of Natural Law" were in the meanwhile reduced to written norms in the declarations of rights, constitutions and even treaties. So, the main principles and their consequent rules are now positive law. Some even talk about a positive Natural Law.

3. Change

Another very common dogma consists in thinking that Natural Law is eternal, unchangeable and universal, like the commandments of eternal Law engraved in golden letters in everlasting marble tables. Some of the great classic founders, however, do not share this point of view.

On the contrary, many centuries before Stammler, Del Vechio and in a certain sense Gény, they underlined at least a certain changeableness of Natural Law over a sometimes stable ground - but not easy to know in concrete terms.

Even human nature itself is considered changeable by Thomas Aquinas (the concept of human nature was obviously put into question, especially after the existentialism and some arguments issued from the Anthropology). That is what he says many times in his Summa Theologiae.

It is important to deconstruct this alleged immutability of Natural Law. It is either based on a religious dogma or in the universality of Reason – what was behind this stony Law was not often discovered. Certainly, many and many authors and law actors did not realize at their time, and not even after this very egg of Columbus, that we are not talking about an Angels' Law that would be untouchable by its own nature. We are simply talking about a rather important and magnificent construction of human (but only human) mind: Roman law. The spirit of Roman law, apart from some peculiarities is, of course, the natural candidate to serve as a fundamental Paradigm of the juridical episteme, because - may we remind it? - Roman Law was the first really autonomous Law.

Édouard Laboulaye was very acute when he painted the portrait of the theorists before Montesquieu – natural law was at the shape and image of Roman law.

That's why in many cases some scholars were (and still are) talking about Natural Law, but in fact reasoning in terms of Roman Law. But they is not the same.

Nowadays, difficult and dilemmatic questions are shaking the sure answers that are familiar to us. New ways of relationship, consent, responsibility, privacy, cyberspace problems, bioethics, informatics, etc., are just some of the immense set of challenges for jurists. The most "age-elastic" (to use the interesting concept of Rabelais and Rorty) will be certainly lost.

Those topics and problems that certain people call - not without a slight touch of euphemism, at least in some occasions - "civilization questions", the same that show deep ideological frontiers inside the same countries, are for sure part of this context. Of course, the lack of a consensus about those matters does not help seeing the picture without many clouds around it, but those are challenges to be taken seriously on the light of principles, values and concrete situations. The laboratory of reality has never-ending questions about Justice. Jurists and philosophers of law may sleep the sleep of the just: we will always have questions to debate and conflicts to solve.

4. Juridical titles

It is amazing to notice how legal positivism has a psychological ascendant over so many jurists and even imposes itself to those who should refuse it: iusnaturalists. There are some iusnaturalists, in fact, that fall happily into the trap of legal positivism, transforming Natural Law into a certain kind of positive law. This is not the case of the reception of Natural Law by positive law, which is a normal process. This is not even the case of the reception by constitutional and international positive law (constitutions and declarations of rights) of some principles of Natural Law - or conceived as that. This latter case should be treated as "positive Natural Law".

We now mean a kind of a Decalogue syndrome: some jurists want to embrace all Natural Law codifying it, declaring it as universal rules regardless of time, space, and mainly spiritual or mental conditions. This sin of the theory is a kind of "hybris", a Promethean voluntarism.

Those universal rules, considered like the written reason have two different roots:

The religious one tends to identify Natural Law with some faith or moral rules, like the Decalogue of Moses. That version has a curious peculiarity: according to that perspective, Natural Law would be just duties (e.g.: in the thoughts of Álvaro D'Ors), never rights.

In many other cases (the second root) the lists of that defined Natural Law are less ambitious, although written, positive, and, if we see them critically, not so universal. Just to give an example, one of those catalogues prescribes the respect of Sunday as a holiday. Nothing against Sunday, of course, but what about the non- Christian religions, which would prefer to have their holiday on Saturday or on Friday?

Those facts are a blessing to the theory of Natural Law. These kinds of prescriptions arise naturally when one wants to transform Natural Law into a little handbook for scouts. The shock between the Weltanschauung of the theory and the reality of our present is an evidence. In this case, we face the obvious phenomena of religious pluralism.

And once a weakness is revealed in a theory, everything else is contaminated. All those postulates and rules are under suspicion.

5. Ideology

The 18th century is normally considered the turning point of Natural Law – even though we could go back to the nominalism of the 14th century in some aspects, and some authors have seen eventual though not very decisive changes in the previous century. But we may not theoretically mix up what is supposed to have occurred in protestant middle and northern Europe and what happened in the catholic south and in Latin America. A consideration of 18th century's real or sociological situation - not just a theoretical one - of Natural Law is that "peripheral" areas may bring better and more clarifying light over the problem. Even Leo Strauss, who precisely starts a crucial part of his book on the subject, does not hide the problems posed by Locke's position regarding Natural Law. The facts - or data - sometimes really do not help theories. And Locke himself seems to be an obstacle to some rupture theories.

So, it is important to recognise that not everything was alike in that period and it is possible that a better knowledge of the up-to-now neglected cultural area of the Catholic Enlightenment may change the general ideas about the subject. We need more studies, and we specially need comparative ones.

It may be said that it is no more than a detail, but the fact is that when we study important authors of the Luso-Brazilian juridical Enlightenment, such as Tomás António Gonzaga, António Diniz da Cruz e Silva and António Ribeiro dos Santos, as well as the Portuguese jurist Melo Freire we have the feeling that the radical rupture between the so-called modern, jusrationalist Natural Law and the one of classical tradition, based mythically in the trinity Aristotle/ Roman Law /Thomas Aquinas is not an evidence. We cannot see the difference of juridical reasoning apart from some details of "couleur locale", a style of the epoch.

Of course, political questions are involved in the matter. Let us not forget some important historical points in this evolution: we have had the legalism of Francisco Suarez (immediately present in his most well known title: De Legibus ac Deo Legislatore). We have had the voluntarism present in revolutions and in the idea of the changing of society by means of the law. And we have also had the Enlightenment despotism in the political level. All those aspects seem important for a conception of Natural Law.

However, on the methodological ground, even at the level of argumentation, of the great conceptions of law and namely in what concerns Natural Law itself may we say that important changes took place in the 17th and/or in the 18th century by comparing those "modern times" to the classical ages, the Ancient Latin-Greek and the Medieval Renaissance of Thomas Aquinas? Aren't we mainly changing the scenes and the decoration?

One important key to all the mystery is a comparative look to similar situations in historic interpretation. Let us focus on one example, which has many sides.

Some political traditionalists, such as the Iberian ones, claim the transcendent legacy of the so-called old liberties, old right, etc.

Of course such liberties or rights are almost unknown to scholars who are not from the Iberian peninsula or from Latin America. And, of course, because of the imperialism of knowledge, naturally imposing the achievements of more efficient countries in order to export their ideas and values, neither these historical realities nor the Nordic democracy or the old German rights, or eventually the African ways of composing conflicts, or the Chinese Harmony are known sometimes even in their respective countries. A Portuguese or a Mexican student, a Spanish or a Brazilian citizen knows what the American and French Revolutions were – or are at least aware of some common places about those - but normally they have never heard of these Iberian old rights and liberties. Even those countries that are more fond of their national identity are not investing in this knowledge, maybe because of pure absence of marketing from scholars who study those subjects, or perhaps because that legacy could recall something of the colonial past - and the colonial past has a specific mythical place in the historical speech of the new countries. And old countries such as Portugal and Spain still do not pay attention to that matter, maybe because the dominant historians identify themselves more with the Modern way of protecting People than with the old way. A great deal of ideological prejudice is involved in this entire story.

On the other hand, modern defenders of human rights either do not know those old rights or distrust them, assuming that dark ages, medieval ages, even Renaissance times could not have had such a thing as real rights. And normally they mix them with the idea of simple privileges.

Traditionalists, in turn, such as the Marquis of Penalva, consider that modern proclaimed rights, mainly those of the Declarations of Rights, are like a flatu vocis, neither real, nor effective, due to the French Revolution. This author also considers that with the rage of giving many rights to everyone, Modern Times took away every single right from each person who already had them.

This entire quarrel may have some factual basis from one side and from the other, but the debate is mainly political. We have already understood the gap between the system of traditional liberties and the system of modern ones. The latter was not liberal in the beginning, as many liberals or post-liberals (neoliberals) and many traditionalists think. They were republican at first, at least in theory - which is also not very well known; then they were liberal, afterwards democratic, and later all these roots together became a common political and juridical heritage almost universally shared.

It is a pity that new political liberals seem not to recognize that legacy that should be theirs - some even criticise it as a pure Roman Catholic ideology.

The eclecticism of Southern and Catholic countries (and Latin American ambience is also an exception) must be considered when we try to make a general (universal) theory of the 18th century's natural law. After more than a decade of research, we arrived at the conclusion that the theoretical separation between two kinds of iusnaturalism, which are enemies and very different from each other, seems not to make sense in a contextualised view. Some clues to that were already in many disperse doctrinal aspects. For example: the different ways how contemporary authors try to classify perhaps the most important author of the Luso-Brazilian 18th century iusnaturalism, António Ribeiro dos Santos, in political-ideological terms seems to be clarifying. Some do not hesitate to consider him as a traditionalist, others a liberal - classical liberal - some others consider him a liberal avant-la-lettre, but always being cautious about the classification, because of the variety of aspects of this author, who is a kind of "Portuguese Montesquieu".

The separation between the "two" iusnaturalisms seems to be essentially artificial, built by theory and it seems to have its roots in the political ground, not in the juridical one. The magnificence and importance of the Enlightenment on the State level maybe contributed to trouble the analysis. Politics, raison d'Etat, and so on, naturally played an excessive role in the analysis of the sense and specificities of 18th century Natural Law. That observation could, of course, see the political context, but should focus on the law itself, and specifically on the methodology and practice of daily life law in action.

Let us face these intellectual facts in a very direct way. It seems that traditionalists (more than absolutist monarchists, but some pre-absolutist monarchists with some attachments to some old liberties) did not want to be mixed up with those they see as revolutionary: the liberals, even if it is only about an "esoteric" matter such as Natural Law.

In fact, those monarchists who defended the old liberties before absolutism may be confused, in theoretical terms, or in abstract ways, with the old liberals. These were also monarchists, at least in theory and by tradition, and both groups shared the same hate towards the concentration of powers in the crown, the lack of autonomy of local governments, etc.

The Preambles of the French Constitution of 1791, the Spanish Constitution of Cadiz (1812, called "La Pepa"), and also (at least) the first Portuguese written Constitution (1822) make a bridge between the old - and not only the mythical aspect also present - and the new: forgetting or despising the old liberties is considered the root of the disgraces of the nations (absolutist disgraces). So, modern constitutions want to wake up from their secular absolutist nightmare - the constitutional Sleeping Beauty.

The classical division seems to be a very clear case of political territorial dispute transferred to the theoretical field.

6. Human Rights

So, it is also important a Dialogue between Natural Law and Human Rights.

According to Francisco Puy, Human Rights are not only today the contemporary language of Natural Law. This fact implies a certain number of strange and sometimes ridiculous quarrels. The author uses a football metaphor. We will try to translate it properly, because words are ambiguous and he is using the Spanish language, of course: some people like to play ball with their feet, but they hate football; on the other hand, there are fervent adepts of football who cannot stand playing ball with their feet.

How can we interpret this? It is not difficult: people who play ball with their feet are the iusnaturalists, those who believe in Natural Law; the football adepts are the jushumanists (or antropodikeos). Both are very close in many levels, in many aspects, but many of them refuse to shake hands. Fortunately not all of them, of course. Being an adept of both Natural Law and Human Rights is a heroic achievement and a proof of a deeper insight: to see the bridges above the superficial and parochial oppositions.

We have to ask ourselves: why so much opposition between the two groups - or the two groups of groups, to be more precise?

Puy did not go that far, but we can easily detect in many authors the same scope of the theory that opposes the rights to Natural Law: it is always an ideological question.

This repeating situation as we see in different aspects of historical interpretation of juridical facts, movements and institutions has undeniable political connotations and it allows us to ask more and more and to have reasonable doubts about the purely theoretical essence of some perspectives. It seems theory and science are not the main concern of some observers, because they are contemned by a previous and perhaps even not completely realised ideological prejudice.

The definitive wake up kiss to Natural Law princess should have many colours, and those are only the basic. So, our half dozen thesis:

1. Do not to seek or preach absolute perfection,
2. Do not have misunderstandings with positive law,
3. Deal with change not refusing a basic ethical consistency,
4. Resist the positivist temptation of getting in some sense codified,
5. Clarify connections with ideology
6. Be friends with Human Rights.

References

AA. VV., « Dialogue, dialectique en philosophie du droit », in Archives de Philosophie du Droit, Paris, Sirey, 1984, t. XXIX.

Adler, Mortimer, "How to think about truth", édité par Max Weisman, in The Great Ideas, Chicago and La Salle, Open Court, 2000.

Alain, "Le Beau et le Vrai", Propos sur L'Esthétique, 6.ª ed., Paris, P.U.F., 1991 (1.ère éd. 1948).

Althusser, Louis, Idéologie et appareils idéologiques d'Etat, Paris, La Pensée, 1971.

Anouilh, Jean, Antigone, Paris, Didier, La Table Ronde, 1994.

Arnaud, André-Jean, "Présentation" Autour d'un dialogue imaginaire entre Michel Villey et Friedrch A. Hayek, Droit et société, 2009 / 1, n.º 71, p. 9-25.

Atias, Christian, Théorie contre arbitraire, Paris, P.U.F., 1987.

Ayres de Britto, Carlos, Teoria da Constituição, Rio de Janeiro, Forense, 2006.

_____, O Humanismo como Categoria Constitucional, Belo Horizonte, Forum, 2007.

Balera, Wagner Balera / Sayeg, Ricardo, Capitalismo Humanista, Petrópolis, KBR, 2011.

Ballesteros, Jesus, Postmodernidad. Decadência o resitência, Madrid, Tecnos, 1989.

_____, "Razones a favor de una postmodernidad alternativa", in Doxa, n.º 6, 1989, p. 301 et suiv.

Baptista Machado, João, Introdução ao Direito e ao Discurso Legitimador, reimp., Coimbra, Almedina, 1985.

Barret-Kriegel, Blandine, Les droits de l'homme et le droit naturel, Paris, P.U.F., 1989.

Bastit, Michel, Naissance de la Loi Moderne, Paris, P.U.F., 1990.

Bauzon, Stéphane, Le Métier de Juriste. Du droit politique selon Michel Villey, Saint Nicolas, Québec, Les Presses de l'Université Laval, 2003.

Beard, Henri / Cerf, Christopher, Dicionário do Politicamente correto, trad. brés. par Vra Karam et Sérgio Karam, Introduction par Moacyr Scliar, Porto Alegre, L&PM, 1994.

Benoist, Jean-Marie, Tyrannie du Logos, Paris, Minuit, 1975.

Bigotte Chorão, Mário, Introdução ao Direito, I. O Conceito de Direito, Coimbra, Almedina, 1989.

_____, Michel Villey, Paladino do Realismo Jurídico Clássico, « O Direito », 121.º , 1989, IV.

Bittar, Eduardo C. B., O Direito na Pós-Modernidade, Rio de Janeiro, Forense, 2005.

Black, Percy, Mirror Images behind the rhetoric of natural and positive law, in "Vera Lex", New York, vol. XI, n.º 2, p. 36 e 38.

_____, Natural Law and Positive Law: forever irresolvable ? in "Vera Lex", New York, vol. X, n.º 2, 1990, pp. 9-10.

_____, Challenge to Natural Law: The vital law, in "Vera Lex", vol. XIV, n.ºs 1 e 2, 1994, p. 48 ss.

Black, Virginia, Natural Law is not an Ideology, "Vera Lex", vol. 1, n.º 2, May – June, 1980, Editorial, p. 5 et sq.

_____, On connecting natural rights with natural law, in "Persona y Derecho", 1990, n.º 22, p. 183 ss.

Bloch, Ernst, Naturrecht und menschliche Würde, in Gesamtausgabe der Werke, Band 6., Frankfurt am Main, Suhrkamp, 1961.

Bloom, Harold, The Western Canon, The Books and the School of The Ages, trad. port., introd. et notes de Manuel Frias Martins, O Cânone Ocidental, Lisbon, Temas e Debates, 1997.

Bobbio, Norberto, Giusnaturalismo e positivismo giuridico, Milano, Ed. di Comunità, 1984.

Bonavides, Paulo, Curso de Direito Constitucional, 2eme éd., São Paulo, Malheiros, 2011.

_____, Do Estado Liberal ao Estado Social, Do Estado Liberal ao Estado Social, 7.e éd., 2.e impr., São Paulo, Malheiros Editores, 2004.

Brandwein, Pamela, Reconstructing reconstruction: the Supreme Court and the Historical Truth, Durham, North Carolina, Duke University Press, 1999.

Braz Teixeira, António, Sobre os Pressupostos Filosóficos do Código Civil Português de 1867, in "Fides. Direito e Humanidades", III, Porto, Rés, 1994.

Canaris, Claus-Wilhelm, Systemdenken und Systembegriff in der Jurisprudenz, 2.ª ed., Berlim, Duncker und Humblot, 1983.

Gomes Canotilho, José Joaquim, Direito Constitucional, 5.ª ed., Coimbra, Almedina, 1991.

Carducci, Michele, Por um Direito Constitucional Altruísta, trad. port., Porto Alegre, Livraria do Advogado Editora, 2003.

Carneiro, Maria Francisca, Direito, Estética e Arte de Julgar, Núria Fabris Editora, Porto Alegre, 2008.

Carvalho, José Liberato Freire de, Memórias da Vida de ..., 2.e éd., Lisbon, Assírio e Alvim, 1982 [1ère ed., 1855].

Charmont, J., La renaissance du droit naturel, 2.ª ed., Paris, Duchemin, 1927.

Crick, Bernard, The Reform of Parliament, Londres, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964.

Cruz, Sebastião, Ius. Derectum (Directum)…, Relectio, Coimbra, édition de l'auteur, 1971.

Culleton, Alfredo, Ockham e a Lei Natural, Florianópolis, Editora UFSC, 2011.

D'Ors, Álvaro, Derecho y Sentido Común. Siete lecciones de derecho natural como límite del derecho positivo, Madrid, Civitas, 1995.

Davidson, D., Inquires into truth and interpretation, Oxford, Claredon Press, 1985.

Douzinas, Costas Douzinas / Gearey, Adam, Critical Jurisprudence. The Political Philosophy of Justice, Oxford – Portland Oregon, Hart, 2005.

Debray, Régis, À l'ère des people*, je parle du peuple*, entretien avec Alexis Lacroix, in "Le Magazine Littéraire", juillet – aôut 2009, n.º 488.

Dembour, Marie-Bénédicte, Le pluralisme juridique: une démarche parmi d'autres, et non plus innocente, in « Revue Interdisciplianire d 'Études Juridiques » n.º 24, 1990, p. 43 ss..

Droit, Nature, Histoire, IV.me Colloque de l'Association Française de Philosophie du Droit (Université Paris II, 23-24 Novembre 1984*), Michel Villey, Philosophe du Droit*, s.l, Presses Universitaires de Marseille, 1985.

Duarte, Écio Oto Ramos / Pozzolo, Susanna, Neoconstitucionalismo e Positivismo Jurídico. As Faces da Teoria do Direito em Tempos de Interpretação Moral da Constituição, São Paulo, Landy Editora, 2006.

Dufour, Alfred, Droits de 1'Homme, droit naturel et histoire, Paris, PUF, 1991.

Dworkin, Ronald*, Taking Rights Seriously,* Duckworth, London, 1977.

Edelman, Bernard / Hermitte, Marie-Angèle (prés.), L'Homme, la Nature et le Droit, Paris, Christian Bourgeois, 1988.

Ehrhard, Jean, L'Idée de Nature en France a l'Aube des Lumières, Paris, Flammarion, 1970.

Ehrhardt Soares, Rogério, Direito Público e Sociedade Técnica, Coimbra, Atlântida, 1969.

____, Sentido e Limites da Função legislativa no Estado Contemporâneo, in Jorge Miranda / Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa (coord.), A Feitura das Leis, vol. II, Lisbon, Instituto Nacional de Administração, 1986.

Farber, Daniel A. / Sherry, Suzanna Beyond all reason: the radical assault on truth in American Law, New York, Oxford University Press, 1997.

____, Legal Storytelling and Constitutional Law. The Medium and the Message, in Law Stories. Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law, ed. by Peter Brooks / Paul Gewirtz, New Haven and London, Yale University Press, 1996.

Fentress, James / Wichkam, Chris, Remembering. In social memory, Oxford, Blackwell, 1992.

Ferreira da Cunha, Paulo, « A Fundação epistemológica do direito em Roma. Ius redigere in artem" in Instituições de Direito, I. Filosofia e Metodologia, Coimbra, Almedina, 1998, p. 201 et suiv..

_____, Peccata Iuris, Do Direito nos Livros ao Direito em Acção, Lisbon, Edições Universitárias Lusófonas, 1996.

_____, Política Mínima, 2ª. édition, Coimbra, Almedina, 2005.

_____, « Mythe, symbole et rituel aux racines du droit pénal », in Le Droit et les sens, Paris, L'Atelier de l 'Archer, diff. PUF, 2000, p. 46 et suiv..

_____, A natural Natural Law. Michel Villey, in "Vera Lex - International Journal of Natural Law and Right", vol. XI, n.º 1, New York, 1991.

_____, Amor Iuris, Filosofia Contemporânea do Direito e da Política, Lisbon, Cosmos, 1995.

_____, Die Symbole des Rechts. Versuch einer Synthese, Stuttgart, Franz Steiner, 1994, „Archiv fuer Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie", vol. 80, 1994, 1. Quartal, Heft 1.

_____, Direito e Universidade. Do Pensamento juridico-pedagógico em Michel Villey, tiré à part de "Persona y Derecho - Revista de fundamentación de las instituciones Jurídicas y de Derechos Humanos", Pamplona, 1992.

_____, Droit et Récit, Québec, Les Presses de l'Université Laval, 2003.

_____, Filosofia do Direito, Coimbra, Almedina, 2006.

_____, La balance, le glaive et le bandeau. Essay de simbologie juridique, in "Archives de Philosophie du Droit", Paris, Sirey, 1995.

_____, Le Droit et les Sens, Paris, L'Archer, dif. P.U.F., 2000.

_____, Lições de Filosofia Jurídica. Natureza & Arte do Direito, Coimbra, Almedina, 1999.

_____, Michel Villey et la Philosophie juridique au Portugal, in J.-F. Niort/ G. Vannier (coord.), Michel Villey et le Droit Naturel en question, Paris, L'Harmattan, 1994.

_____, Mythe et Constitutionnalisme au Portugal (1778-1826). Originalité ou influence française ?, Paris, thèse de doctorat à l'Université Paris II, 1992 (policóp.).

_____, O Ponto de Arquimedes, Coimbra, Almedina, 2001.

_____, Princípios de Direito, Porto, Rés, 1993.

_____, Questões de Princípios, in "Thèmes", VI, 20011: http://www.philosophiedudroit.org/da%20cunha,%20questoes%20de%20principios.htm

_____, Repensar a Política, 2e édition, Coimbra, Almedina, 2007.

_____, Repensar o Direito. Um Manual de Filosofia Jurídica, en préparation.

_____, Res Publica. Ensaios Constitucionais, Coimbra, Almedina, 1998, p. 119 et suiv..

_____, Traité de droit constitutionnel, Paris, Buenos Books International, 2010.

_____, Verdade, Narração e Judicatura, in Verdad (Narración) Justicia, coord. José Calvo González, Málaga, Univ. Málaga, s/d..

____, O Tímpano das Virtudes, Coimbra, Almedina, 2004.

____, Pensamento Jurídico Luso-Brasileiro, Lisbon, Imprensa Nacional – Casa da Moeda, 2006.

Ferry, Luc / Vincent, Jean-Didier, Qu'est-de que l'homme?, Paris, Odile Jacob, 2000.

Finnis, John, Natural Law and Natural Rights, 7ème reimp., Oxford, Clarendom Press, 1993.

Foucault, Michel, A Verdade e as formas jurídicas, édition brés., Rio de Janeiro, P.U.C., 1974.

Ferreira Filho, Manoel Gonçalves, Notas Sobre o Direito Constitucional Pós-Moderno, em Particular sobre certo Neoconstitucionalismo à Brasileira, in "Systemas. Revista de Ciências Jurídicas e Econômicas", vol. 2, n.º 1, 2010, p. 101 – 118.

Franca Filho, Marcílio Toscano, A Cegueira da Justiça. Diálogo Iconográfico entre Arte e Direito, Porto Alegre, Sergio Fabris Editor, 2011.

Friedrich, C. J., Die Philosophie des Rechts in Historischer Perspektive, Goetingen / Heidelberg, Springer, 1955, trad., cast., La Filosofia del Derecho, 3.ª reimp., Mexico, Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1964, p. 331 et suiv. (= Idem, in Vanderbilt Law Review, XIV, oct. 1961, p. 1027 et suiv.).

Gadamer, Hans-Georg, Wahreit und Methode, 3.ème éd., Tuebingen, J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1973 (1.ère édition - 1960), trad fr. Etienne Sacre, rev. Paul Ricoeur, Vérité et Méthode. Les grandes lignes d'une herméneutique philosophique, Paris, Seuil, 1976.

Garapon, Antoine, L'âne portant des reliques — Essai sur le rituel judiciaire, Paris, Le Centurion, 1985.

Goethem, H. Van / Waelkens, L./ Breugelmans, K. (dir.), Libertés, Pluralisme et Droit, Bruxelles, Bruyllant, 1995.

Gomes, Luís Flávio / Oliveira Mazzuoli, Valerio de, Direito Supraconstitucional, São Paulo, RT - Editora Revista dos Tribunais, 2010.

González Vicén, Felipe, "La Obediencia al Derecho", in Estudios de Filosofía del Derecho, Universidad de la Laguna, Santa Cruz de Tenerife, 1979, p. 365 et sq.

Goodrich, Peter, Reading the Law, Oxford, Basil Blackwell, 1986.

Goody, Jack, The logic of writing and the organisation of society, Cambridge University Press, 1986, trad. port. par Teresa Louro Pérez, A lógica da escrita e a organização da sociedade, Lisbon, Edições 70, 1987.

Gordley, James, The Philosophical Origins of Modern Contract Doctrine, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1992.

Grezegorczyk, Chr. / Troper, M. / Michaut, F., Le Positivisme juridique, Paris, Dalloz, 1974.

Grossi, Paolo, Novecento Giuridico : un Secolo Pos-Moderno, Naples, Università degli Studi Suor Orsola Benincasa, 2011.

Hanefin, Patrick, Constituting Identity, Aldershot et al., Ashgate/Dartmouth, 2001.

Hassemer, Winfried, História das Ideias Penais na Alemanha do Pós-Guerra, seguido de A Segurança Pública no Estado de Direito, trad. port., Lisbon, AAFDL, 1995.

Hayek, F. A., Droit, législation et liberté. I – Règles et ordre, trad. fr., Paris, PUF, 1973.

Hervada, Javier, Historia de la Ciencia del Derecho Natural, Pamplona, EUNSA, 1987.

Hervada, Javier / Muñoz, Juan Andres, Derecho. Guía de los Estudios Universi- tários, Pamplona, EUNSA, 1984.

Holmes Jr., Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Path of Law, 10 "Harvard Law Review", 457, 1897, nouvelle éd., avec une Préface par J. Craig Williams, The Path of Law and the Common Law, New York, Kaplan, 2009.

Hourmant, François, Le désenchantement des clercs, Paris, PUF, 1997.

Huisman, Bruno / Ribes, François, Les Philosophes et la Nature, Paris, Bordas, 1990.

Huissman, Denis, L'Art de la dissertation philosophique, Paris, SEDES, 1958.

Janet, Paul, Introduction to the Esprit des lois, by Montesquieu, Books I-V, 2nd edition, Paris, Librairie Ch. Delagrave, 1892 (electronic edition, Project Guthemberg, 2008).

Kaufmann, Arthur, Naturrecht und Geschichtlichkeit, Tübingen, J. C. B. Mohr, 1957.

Kelsen, Hans, Reine Rechtslehre, Leipzig / Wien, Deuticke, 1934.

Kissel, O. R., Die Iustitia. Reflexionen ueber ein Symbol und seine Darstellung in der bildenden Kunst, Muenchen, Beck, 1984.

Kuhn, Thomas, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, University of Chicago Press, 1962.

Laboulaye, Édouard, Introduction à Esprit des lois, by Montesquieu, in Oeuves Complètes, Paris, Garnier Frères, 1875 (electronic edition).

Lalande, André (dir.), Vocabulaire technique et critique de la Philosophie, ed. Paris, PUF, 1972.

Landowski, Eric, «Vérité et véridiction en droit », in Droit et Société, n.º 8, 1988, Paris, LGDJ/CRIV, p. 45 et suiv.

Le Goff, Jacques, Memória, in Enciclopédia (Einaudi), 1. Memória-História, éd. portugaise, Lisbon, Imprensa Nacional-Casa da Moeda, 1984.

Leclercq, Jacques, Du droit naturel à la sociologie, Paris, Spes, 1960.

Leibholz, Gerhardt, O Pensamento democrático como princípio estruturador na vida dos povos europeus, trad. por., Coimbra, Atlântida, 1974.

Lemieux, Pierre *La force et le droi*t, http://www.quebecoislibre.org/990925-4.htm

Lenoble, Jacques / Ost, François, Droit, Mythe et Raison: essai sur la dérive mytho-logique de la rationalité juridique, Bruxelles, Publ. Facultés Universitaires Saint-Louis, 1980.

Lima Lopes, José Reinaldo de, As Palavras e a Lei. Direito, ordem e justiça na história do pensamento jurídico contemporâneo, São Paulo, EDESP, 2004, máx. p. 267 ss.

Lipovetsky, Gilles, L'empire de l'éphémère, Paris, Gallimard, 1987.

Lombardi Vallauri, Luigi, Corso di filosofia del diritto, Cedam, Padova, 1978, nova ed. 1981.

____, Diritto Naturale e Diritto Libero, in "Persona y Derecho", n.º 23, 1990, p. 25 ss.

____, Terre, Terra del Nulla, Terra degli uomini, Terra dell 'Oltre, Milano, Vita e Pensiero, 1990, p. 177 ss., et passim.

Martínez Yánez, Nora María, La obediencia al Derecho en la España Democrática, Madrid, Dykison, 2000.

McIntyre, Alasdair, After Virtue. A Study in Moral Theory, 2nd Edition, Notre Dame, 1984.

Malato, Maria Luísa, Manual Anti-Tiranos. Retórica, Poder e Literatura, Porto Alegre, Livraria do Advogado, 2009

Maltez, José Adelino, Voegelin e a Procura do Direito Natural, Préface à A Natureza do Direito e outros textos jurídicos, de Eric Voegelin, Lisbon, Vega, 1998.

Mari, Enrique, « Jeremy Bentham: du 'souffle pestilentiel de la fiction' dans le droit à la théorie du droit comme fiction », in Revue Interdisciplinaire d'Études Juridiques, 1985, n.º 15, p. 1 et suiv.

Marinho, José, Teoria do Ser e da Verdade, Lisbon, Guimarães Editores, 1961.

Maritain, Jacques, Natural Law. Reflections on Theory and Practice, édition et introduction par William Sweet, South Bend, Indiana, St. Augustine Press, 2001.

Mauer-Maly, D. / Simons, P. M. (ed.), Das Naturrechtsdenken heute und morgen, Duncker & Humblot, Berlin, 1983.

Maritain, Jacques, Natural Law. Reflections on Theory and Practice, édition et introduction par William Sweet, South Bend, Indiana, St. Augustine Press, 2001.

Mazzacane, Aldo, El jurista y la memoria, in Pasiones del Jurista. Amor, memoria, melancolía, imaginación, ed. Carlos Petit, Madrid, Centro de Estudios Constitucionales, 1997, p. 75 et suiv..

Meese, E., «Promoting Truth in the Courtroom», Vanderbilt Law Review, n.º 40/2, 1987, p. 271 et suiv.

Merêa, Paulo, Divagações sobre a Estabilidade da Norma Jurídica (1923), in Estudos de Filosofia Jurídica e de História das Doutrinas Políticas, Lisbon, Imprensa Nacional – Casa da Moeda, 2004.

Dilsa Mondardo, 20 anos Rebeldes : o direito à luz da proposta filosófico-pedagógica de L. A. Warat, Florianópolis, Editora Diploma Legal, 2000.

Montejano, Bernardino, Poder jurídico y derecho natural, "Ethos. Revista de Filosofía Práctica", n.º 26, Buenos Aires, 2011, p. 39 et sq.

Montoro Ballesteros, Alberto, Iusnaturalismo y Derecho Comparado, in Francisco Puy (org.), El Derecho Natural Hispanico. Actas de las 'Primeras Jornadas Hispánicas de Derecho Natural', Madrid, Escelicer, 1973, p. 403 et sq.

____, Sobre las Razones Éticas de la Obediencia al Derecho, in "Anales de Derecho", Murcia, Universidad de Murcia, 1991, p. 157 et sq.

Moreau, Pierre-François, Le Récit Utopique. Droit naturel et roman de l'Etat, Paris, P.U.F., 1982.

Moreira, José Carlos, Lições de Direito Constitucional, Coimbra, 1959-1960 (polic.), p. 30 et suivs.

Mota de Sousa, Carlos Aurélio / Cury, Munir / Caso, Giovanni, Direito e Fraternidade, LTR, 2008.

Myrdall, Gunnar, Objectivity in social research, New York, Pantheon Books, 1969.

____, The Political Element in the Development of Economic Theory, 3rd ed., Londres, Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1961.

"Natural Law", in The New Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th ed., Chicago *et a*l., Encyclopaedia Britannica Inc., vol. 8, 1997, p. 559.

Niklas, Luhmann, A improbabilidade da Comunicação, trad. port. avec sélection et présentation de João Pissarra, Lisbon, Vega, 1992.

Perelman, Chaim, "Opinions et vérité", in Rhétoriques, Bruxelles, Editions de l'Université de Bruxelles, 1989, p. 425 et suiv..

_____, / Lucie Olbrechts-Tyteca, Traité de l'argumentation, 5.e éd., Bruxelas, Editions de l'Université de Bruxelles, 1988

Perrin, J.-F. (et alii), Pour une théorie de la connaissance juridique, Genève, Droz, 1979.

Perucho, Juan, Las Sombras del Mundo, Madrid, Alianza Editorial, 1995, p. 22.

Peter Degadt, Littératures contemporaines sur la 'Topique Juridique' , Paris, P.U.F., 1981.

Pintore, Anna, Law and hipocrisy, in "International Journal on Law and Semiotics", IV, 11, 1991, pp. 191 ss.

Pizzorni, Reginaldo, Il Diritto Naturale dalle Origine a S. Tommaso d'Aquino, 3.e ed., Bolonha, ESD, 2000.

Podgórecki, Adam et alii (org), Knowledge and opinion about law, Martin Robertson, London, 1973.

Poulantzas, Nicos, Nature des choses et droit, essai sur une dialectique du fait et de la valeur, LGDJ, Paris, 1965.

Puy, Francisco, Derechos Humanos, vol. III. Derechos Politicos, Santiago de Compostela, Imprenta Paredes, 1985.

_____, Teoria Tópica del Derecho Natural, Santiago do Chile, Universidad Santo Tomás, 2004.

_____, Tópica Jurídica, Santiago de Compostela, Imprenta Paredes, 1984.

Quaresma, Regina / Oliveira, Maria Lucia de Paula / Riccio de Oliveira, Farlei Martins (coord.), Neoconstitucionalismo, Rio de Janeiro, Forense, 2009.

Ramos, Elival da Silva, Ativismo Judicial. Parâmetros Dogmáticos, São Paulo, Saraiva, 2010.

Rawls, John, A Theory of Justice, Harvard University Press, 1971.

Reale, Miguel, Lições Preliminares de Direito, Coimbra, Almedina, 1982.

Resta, Eligio, Il Diritto Fraterno, Roma/Bari, Laterza, 2002.

Ribeiro, Álvaro, A Razão Animada, Lisbon, Bertrand, 1956.

(Ribeiro dos Santos, António), "Sobre a Vaidade das Coisas do Mundo", Poesias de Elpino Duriense, Lisbon, Na Impressão Régia, 1812.

Ribeiro Moreira, Eduardo, Neoconstitucionalismo. A Invasão da Constituição, São Paulo, Método, 2008.

Robert, Christian Nils, L'impératif sacrificiel. Justice pénale : au-delà de l'innocence et de la culpabilité, Lausanne, D'en Bas, 1986.

Rocha Pereira, Maria Helena da, Estudos de História da Cultura Clássica. II. Cultura Romana, Lisbon, Fundação Calouste Gulbenkian, 1984.

Roche, Daniel, Histoire des choses banales, Paris, Fayard, 1997.

Roland, Henri / Boyer, Laurent, Adages du droit français, 3.ème éd., Paris, Litec, 1992.

Rorty, Richard, Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1989.

Saint-Exupéry, Antoine de, Le Petit Prince, nouvelle éd., Paris, Gallimard, 1987.

Sandel, Michael J., Justice: What's the Right Thing to Do?, Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2009.

G. L. S. Shackle, What makes an Economist?, The University Press of Liverpool, 1953.

Schmitt, Carl, Die geistesgeschichtliche Lage des heutigen Parlamentarismus, 2.e éd., Berlin, Duncker und Humblot, 1926.

Schoenfeld, Walter Schoenfeld, Vom Problem der Rechtsgeschichte, "Schriften der Koenigsberger Gelehrten Gesellschaft. Geisteswissenschaftliche Klasse", 6, 1927.

Schwarz, Germano, A Constituição, a Literatura e o Direito, Porto Alegre, Livraria do Advogado Editora, 2006.

Sen, Amartya, The Idea of Justice, Harvard University Press / Londres, Allen Lane, 2009.

Sérgio, António, Antígona. Drama em três actos, Porto, República, 1930.

Serres, Michel, Le contrat naturel, François Bourin, Paris, 1990.

Sigmund, Paul E., Natural Law in Political Thought, Lanham, New York, Londres, University Press of America, 1971.

Silva Ramos, Elival da, Ativismo Judicial. Parâmetros Dogmáticos, São Paulo, Saraiva, 2010.

Silva, Agostinho da, "Justiça", Diário de Alcestes, Lisbon, Ulmeiro, 1990.

Sinha, Surya Prakash, "Why has not beeen possible to define Law", in Archiv fuer Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie, 1989, LXXV, Heft 1, 1. Quartal, Stuttgart, Steiner, p. 1 ss.

Skinner, Quentin, Liberty before Liberalism, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1981.

Strauss, Leo, Natural Right and History, Chicago, The Chicago University Press, 1953.

Thelene, Catherine Colliot, Le désenchantement de l'Etat, Paris, Minuit, 1992.

Thomas, Yan, Mommsen et 'l'Isolierung' du Droit (Rome, l'Allemagne et l'État), Paris, Diffusion de Boccard, 1984.

Tierney, Brian, The Idea of Natural Rights: Studies on Natural Rights, Natural Law, and Church Law 1150 1625, Grand Rapids / Cambridge, William B. Eerdmans, 1997, new edition, 2001.

Torres del Moral, Antonio, *Estado de Derecho y Democracia de Partido*s, Madrid, Servicio de Publicaciones de la Facultad de Derecho de la Universidade Complutense, 1991.

Trigeaud, Jean-Marc, « La Théorie du Droit face aux savoirs de substitution », in Persona y Derecho, vol. 32, 1995, p. 23 et sq.

_____, Persona ou la Justice au double visage, Genova, Studio Editoriale di Cultura, 1990.

_____, Ce droit naturel que le positivisme a inventé, in Métaphysique et Éthique au Fondement du Droit, Bordeaux, Biere, 1995, p. 161 ss.

Truyol y Serra, António, Esbozo de una Sociologia del Derecho Natural, in Revista de Estudios Politicos, Madrid, vol. XXIV, 1949, pp. 15 ss..

Tuck, Richard, Natural Rights Theories. Their origin and development, Cambridge, Cambridge Univ. Press, 1979.

Tzitzis, Stamatios, Introduction à la philosophie du droit, Paris, Vuibert, 2011.

_____, La naissance du droit en Grèce, dans l'ouvrage collectif Instituições de Direito, I. Filosofia e Metodologia, Coimbra, Almedina, 1998, p. 191 et suiv..

_____, Le Juge et la Vérité, «Crises», 4, 1994, p. 103 et suiv..

_____, La philosophie pénale, Paris, PUF, 1996.

Vallançon, François, Alceste, Égalité, Fraternité, in «Revue Internationale de Philosophie Pénale et de Criminologie de l'Acte», Paris, n.º 3-4, 1992-1993.

_____, Domaine et Propriété (Glose sur Saint Thomas D'Aquin, Somme Theologique IIA IIAE QU 66 ART 1 et 2), Paris, Université de Droit et Economie et de Sciences Sociales de Paris (Paris II), 1985, 3 vols..

Vallet De Goytisolo, Juan, Derecho y Verdad, separata de "Verbo", Speiro, 1996, série XXXV, n.º 347-348.

Veatch, Henry B., Why I am Pro-Natural Law, "Vera Lex", Vol. I, n.º 3, Sept-Oct. 1980, p. 1-3.

Veyne, Paul, Les Grecs ont-ils cru à leurs mythes?, Paris, Seuil, 1983.

Viehweg, Theodor, Topik und Jurisprudenz, Munique, C. H. Beck, 1964.

Villey, Michel, « Abrégé du Droit Naturel Classique », in Leçons d'Histoire de la Philosophie du Droit, nouvelle éd., Paris, 1962.

_____, Le droit et les droits de l'homme, Paris, PUF, 1983.

_____, Le Droit Romain, 8.ª ed., Paris, P.U.F., 1987.

_____, Jusnaturalisme, essai de définition, in « Revue Interdisciplinaire d'Etudes Juridiques », n.º 17, 1986.

_____, Mobilité, diversité et richesse du droit naturel chez Aristote et St. Thomas, in « Archives de Philosophie du Droit », XXIX, 1984.

_____, Philosophie du Droit, II. Les moyens du droit, 2.e éd., Paris, Dalloz, 1984.

_____, Polémique sur les 'Droits de l'Homme', in "Etudes Philosophiques", n.º 2, 1986, p. 191 ss.

_____, Précis de Philosophie du Droit, I, 3.ème éd., Paris, Dalloz, 1982.

_____, Questions de St. Thomas sur le droit et la politique ou le bon usage des dialogues, Paris, P.U.F., 1987.

_____, Réflexions sur la Philosophie et le Droit. Les Carnets, Paris, PUF , 1995.

_____, Seize essais de Philosophie du Droit dont un sur la crise universitaire, Paris, Dalloz, 1969.

Von Mises, Ludwig, Human Action. A Treatise on Economics, trad. fr. L'Action Humaine. Traité D'Economie, Paris, P.U.F., 1985.

Ward, Ian, Introduction to Critical Legal Theory, 2.ª ed., Milton Park / New Iork, Routledge-Cavendish, 2004.

_____, Law and Literature, in "Law and Critique", IV, 1, 1993.

Wacks, Raymond, Philosophy of Law. A Very Short Introduction, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2006, p. 19 et suiv.

Wagner, Adolf, Lehrbuch der politischen Oekonomie, Leipzig, C. F. Winter, 1879.

Warat, Luis Alberto, Do Paradigma Normativista ao Paradigma da Razão sensível, in Temas Emergentes no Direito, coord. de Marcelino Meleu / Mauro Gaglietti / Thaise Nara Graziottin Costa, Passo Fundo, IMED, 2009, p. 13 et sq.

Weisberg, R., Coming of age some more: 'Law and Literature' beyond the Cradle, in "Nova Law Review, n.º 13, 1988.

_____, Comparative Law in Comparative Literature: the figure of the 'Examining Magistrate' in Dostoievski and Camus, in "Rutgers Law Review", n.º 29, 1986, pp. 237 ss..

_____, Text into Theory: a Literary approach to the Constitution, in "Georgia Law Review", n.º 20, 1986, pp. 939 et sq.

_____, The Law-Literature Enterprise, in "Yale Journal of Law and Humanities", n.º 1,1988, pp. l ss.

Whyte, James Boyd, Law as Language: Reading Law and Reading Literature, in "Texas Law Review", n.º 60, 1982.

_____, The Legal Imagination: studies in the nature of legal thought and expression, Little Brown, Boston, 1973.

Wolff, Eric, Das Problem der Naturrechtslehre. Versuch einer Orientierung, Karlsruhe, C. F. Müller, 1964.

Zbankowski, Z., «The value of truth. Fact scepticism revisited", Legal Studies, n.º 1, 1981, p. 257 et sq.

Zippelius, Reinhold, Rechtsphilosophie: Ein Studienbuch, 5.e éd., Beck, Munich, 2007.

On the concept of subjectivity in the promissory theory of contracts from the perspective of Paul Ricoeur's philosophy

Marcin Pieniążek, LLM, PhD
Andrzej Frycz Modrzewski[1]

Abstract: The presentation outlines one of the crucial questions of private law, i.e. the question of subjectivity of a party to a contract. The analysis will be made on the background of the promissory theory of contracts. This theory assumes that contractual obligations originate as a result of a promise made by a party to the contract. Thus, the legal bond (vinculum iuris) in a contract results from the self-expression of the subject communicating the intention of assuming an obligation. This self-expression is valid to the degree to which the subject is capable of forming a promise. For that reason, the notion of subjectivity is defined in the presentation through the constitutive features of the being, namely a party to the contract. As a result, the main part of the presentation focuses on the ontology and ethics of a party to the contract, referring to the philosophical ideas of Paul Ricoeur.

It should be explained that Ricoeur's philosophy shows a particular compatibility with the promissory theory of contracts. A promise made (much like Kantian imperative) provides a paradigmatic pattern of self-identity within it. In reference to the ontology and ethics of the person proposed by Ricouer, it becomes possible to define the non-positivist notion of subjectivity of a party to the contract, as a being capable of valid formation of a self-bond through a promise. Contrary to Ricoeur's philosophy, it is also possible to point to the source of the law-making authority of that party. In this philosophy, keeping the obligations made is an ethically meaningful way of the subject's being (ipse), contrasted by Ricoeur with the being shaped by the variable features of the human character (idem). Thus, the source of the normative authority of the party to the contract in the light of the proposed concept is the capacity of keeping the promises made (expressed in the pacta sunt servanda principle), i.e. the capacity of continued being oneself in the ipse sense.

Keywords: Ricoeur, contracts, subjectivity

[1]Krakow University

1. The paper outlines one of the crucial questions of private law, i.e. the question of subjectivity of a party to a contract. The analysis will be made on the background of the promissory theory of contracts. This theory assumes that contractual obligations originate as a result of a promise made by a party to the contract. Thus, the legal bond (vinculum iuris) in a contract results from the self-expression of the subject communicating the intention of assuming an obligation. This self-expression is valid to the degree to which the subject is capable of forming a promise. For that reason, the notion of subjectivity is defined in the presentation through the constitutive features of the being, namely a party to the contract. As a result, the main part of the presentation focuses on the ontology and ethics of a party to the contract, referring to the philosophical ideas of French philosopher Paul Ricoeur.

The point of reference here is a relational theory of subjectivity (being oneself – ipseité) developed by Ricoeur. According to him, keeping the obligations is an ethically meaningful way of the subject's being (called ipse), contrasted with the being shaped by the variable features of the human character (called idem). Consequently, a man (so called "the-one-who-is-himself") remains himself, if he is faithful to "the intention of the good life", namely "the plan for oneself", i.e., to the word given. As Ricoeur states, "the promise serves as a paradigmatic model of the identity of oneself". As a result, the person who remains himself is the one who – regardless of the physical and mental changes that take place inside him – remains faithful to the undertaken obligations [also legal ones – M.P.][2]. Additionally, Ricoeur relates the issue of personal identity with the theory of subject's narrativization. The identity preservation project is considered as a narrative developed by the subject who is under the influence of his own imperative, similar to Kantian concept of self-legislation.

It should be noted that the above theory (in particular, the distinction between being oneself in the sense of ipse and in the sense of idem) can provide a satisfactory answer to the key question about the reason of the validity of contractual obligations. This answer is justified in the case of rejecting the separation of law and morals assumed by legal positivism. It can be legitimately claimed that the fact of abiding by all legally relevant agreements stems from the very ontological and ethical essence of the subject who is himself in the sense of ipse. I would like to point out that one of the oldest legal topoi is the ancient Roman principle of pacta sunt servanda ("agreements must be abided by"). In the light of Ricoeur's theory this topos, fundamental for law, is a concise definition of the subject who remains himself, i.e. the one who performs contractual obligations despite changing factual circumstances, the passage of time, changes in the nature, etc.

[2] P. Ricoeur, The Course of Recognition, Wydawnictwo Znak, Kraków 2004, p. 119.

Ricoeur writes: (..) It seems that keeping promises (…) represents a challenge to time, a denial of change: even if my desire changed, even if I changed my mind or my preferences, I "shall keep my word". (..) It is sufficient to provide a strictly ethical justification of the promise that we can draw from the obligation to protect the institution of language and of reciprocal trust of another in my fidelity[3].

Another element of the theory of the subject of law, crucial from the legal perspective, is the reflexive relationship which combines the subject of law and Another, interpreted as the relationship of equal subjects of law.

It concerns in particular the recognition of the subjectivity of Another as a prerequisite for establishing the ontologically rooted principle of reciprocity, crucial for some branches of law, especially for law of obligations.

Ricoeur - inspired by dialogical "philosophy of the face" of E. Levinas - states that obligation is always carried out vis-à-vis Another. In other words, the "ethical narrative" of oneself is always addressed to the one vis-à-vis whom we realize ourselves. It follows that, for Ricoeur, recognition of Another's subjectivity constitutes a primordial source of validity (also legal, I presume) and complies with the assumed obligations.

Ricoeur writes that: "Preserving one's self is, in the case of a person, such a pattern of behaviour that another person can count on us. Since someone is counting on me, I am accountable, I can be held to account (je suis comptable) in my actions vis-à-vis Another. The concept of responsibility combines both meanings: to count on …, to be accountable for … This concept connects them by adding to them the principle of answering the question: 'Where are you?', raised by Another who is calling me. The answer to that is: 'Here I am!' (Me voici!) – the answer in which preserving one's self is manifested. (...) The nagging question of 'Who am I' (...) can be incorporated into a proud statement 'That's what I hold on to!' The question is: 'Who am I, unstable, so that you could still count on me?'"[4]

The ethical acceptance of one's actions is a derivative of recognition which is expressed in complying with the commitment assumed vis-à-vis Another. Ricoeur takes another step and develops on this basis the dialectic of reciprocity, in which the substitutability of the roles of "oneself" and "another" coincides with the irreplaceability of the entities as such.

[3] P. Ricoeur, Soi –même comme un autre, Éditions du Seuil, Paris, 1990. p. 207.

[4] P. Ricoeur, Soi – même comme un autre, Éditions du Seuil, op. cit., pp. 197–198.

He writes that: "(...) I cannot respect myself without respecting another as I respect myself ... Thus, respecting another as yourself and respecting yourself as another become equally fundamental and crucial"[5]. That is the way in which Ricoeur constitutes the principle of reciprocity, according to which "one should treat oneself as Another" and "Another as oneself". This equalization goes as far as recognizing Another as the onto-ethical basis of legal validity. Ricoeur makes here also certain references to Aristotle's philosophy, in particular to his concept of friendship (philia) as a symmetrical relationship between equals. This element confirms the accuracy of this theory in the field of obligation law, in which reciprocity assumes the form of granting equal rights and duties to the contracting parties.

These remarks allow to draw an outline of Ricoeur's theory which enables us to construct a coherent non-positivist theory of (at least) the law of contracts, the central question of which remains the issue of the nature of the bond that connects the parties to reciprocal agreements. The theory which most closely connects compliance with the contracts with the subject that assumes the commitment comes to the aid of the legal notion of obligation. It should be underlined that the conceptual background of Ricoeur's theory is coherent with so called promissory theory of contracts as developed by the Anglo – Saxon legal thought (it will be mentioned below).

2. Now I would like to introduce the possible application of the above-mentioned elements of Ricoeur's philosophy in the dogma of reciprocal agreements. As I indicated before, it is of particular convergence with the Anglo-Saxon theory of contract law, with a particular emphasis on the so-called theory of a promise.

The Anglo-Saxon theory of contract law (contract theory)[6] developed three main positions, which attempt to clarify the nature of the bond between the contracting parties and which at the same time aim at identifying the reasons why law provides protection of that bond[7]. These theories are developed under the assumption of a necessary connection between law and morality. These are: the reliance theory[8], the transfer theory[9], and the promissory theory[10]. From the perspective of the continental science of civil law[11], the same issues are raised by the theories of the declaration of intent, with the greatest impact of the theory of will and the theory of the declaration[12].

[5] Ibidem, pp. 225–226.

[6] As for the concept of contract theory see P. S. Atiyah, S. A. Smith, Atiyah's Introduction to the Law of Contracts, Clarendon Press, Oxford 2005, pp. 28 – 31; G. Samuel, Law of Obligations, Edward Elgar Publishing, Inc., Cheltenham, UK, Northampton, MA, USA, 2010, pp. 70 – 72. P. S. Atiyah, The Modern Role of Contract Law (in:) Essays on Contracts, Clarendon Press, Oxford 2001, pp. 1- 9.

The crux of the promissory theory is the assumption that the obligation arises not so much as a result of an intentional act, but rather as a result of a self-expression of the entity expressing (communicating) the intention to assume the obligation. Communication (or narrative – as I propose to put it in Ricoeur's language) is considered as a prerequisite to express the intent which shows, among others, what the entity knows about the very concept of promise. Thus, the communicated intent cannot be only the intent to take a specific action, but the intent to assume

[7] S. A. Smith, Towards a Theory of Contract, (in:) Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence. Fourth Series, (ed.) J. Horder, Oxford University Press, New York 2000, pp. 107ff.

[8] L. L. Fuller, W. Purdue, The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages, Yale Law Journal 1936, Vol. 46.

[9] R. E. Barnett, A Consent Theory of Contract, Columbia Law Review, March 1986, Vol. 86, No. 2, pp. 291ff.

[10] Ch. Fried, Contract as Promise. A Theory of Contractual Obligations, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts and London, England, 1981, pp. 7 – 27; T. M. Scalon, Promises and Contracts, (in:) The Theory of Contract Law. New Essays, (ed.) P. Benson, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2007, 86 – 117; W. Lucy, Philosophy of Private Law, Oxford University Press, New York, 2007, p. 238; critically from the perspective of reliance theory: P. S. Atiyah, Contracts, Promises and the Law of Obligations, (in:) idem, Essays on Contracts, ibidem, pp. 10 – 56.

[11] G. Samuel presents a comprehensive comparative analysis of contract law, including reciprocal contracts in the legal culture of civil law and common law. See G. Samuel, Law of Obligations, op. cit., p. 358. Cf. J. Gordley, Enforceability of Promises in European Contract Law, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 2001, pp. 2-20; R. Zimmermann, The Law of Obligations. Roman Foundations of the Civilian Tradition, Oxford University Press, New York 1996, pp. 1-31.

[12] Cf. A. Jędrzejewska, Koncepcja oświadczenia woli w prawie cywilnym [The Concept of the Declaration of Intent in the Civil Law], PAN Instytut Nauk Prawnych, Warszawa 1992, pp. 10 -55; Z. Radwański, Teoria umów [The Theory of Contracts], PWN Warszawa1977, pp. 37 – 61.

certain liabilities[13]. Therefore, it is emphasised in the Anglo-Saxon literature that the fact of making a legally relevant promise is not merely an additional factor that influences the decision on the performance / non-performance of obligations. A decision to perform the obligation is in fact made at the time of making the promise, while the promise itself is the first and primary source of the action on the part of the obligor[14].

The objections against the promissory theory concern, among others, the bilateral nature of reciprocal agreements in which the formation of a legal bond results from the promise given to the other party (promisee), and not only from the fact of the promisor being bound by its promise. Having in mind the theory at issue, there arises a fundamental question: what it means that the promise "is binding" in some way and what constitutes the basis of "being bound" by such a promise. The answer to these questions is provided by the promissory theory which refers to the analysed topics drawn from the philosophical achievements of Paul Ricoeur[15]. The said achievements demonstrate particular applicability in the promissory theory of contracts, combining the issue of one's own subjectivity and the subjectivity of Another man with the issue of reciprocity in the context of onto-ethics of the entity who remains himself in the sense of ipse[16].

---

[13] S. A. Smith, Contract Theory, op. cit., p. 57.

[14] The following example can be provided in reference to S. A. Smith: I made a commitment to paint the roof of my neighbour's house next week, but then I changed my mind and came to the conclusion that this work is not profitable for me. I feel to some extent bound by my promise, yet my final decision is determined on the basis of another important factor, namely purely economic calculation. From the perspective of the promissory theory my reasoning is wrong, since I already made a decision when I made a promise, therefore I am obliged to perform my obligation. See S. A. Smith, Contract Theory, op. cit., p 58.

[15] It should be noted that the analysis of philosophical and legal issues constitutes an important component of Ricoeur's philosophy. A prominent place is taken here by the issue of law as "a grand narrative", developed on the level of just social institutions as well as the issue of the relations between legal interpretation and argumentation. Cf. P. Ricoeur, Reflections on the Just, The University of Chicago Press, Chicago, London 2007; P. Ricoeur, Drogi rozpoznania [The Course of Recognition], op.cit., pp. 194 – 200; P. Ricoeur, Krytyka i przekonanie [Critique and Conviction], Wydawnictwo KR, Warszawa 2003, pp. 167 – 181. Cf. also D. M. Kaplan, Ricoeur Critique Theory, State University of New York Press, New York 2003, pp. 69 – 74.; G.H. Taylor, Ricoeur and Law: the Distinctiveness of Legal Hermeneutics (in:) Ricoeur Across Disciplines, (ed.) S. Davidson, The Continuum International Publishing Group Inc., London 2010, pp. 84 – 101.

[16] The above issue was presented in the work O sobie samym jako innym (Soi-même

Most importantly, on the basis of Ricoeur's theory every promise is made by the subject of law vis-à-vis "oneself as Another", which means that the promise is perceived as ethically significant way of being the subject of law, self-determined by the rule of reciprocity[17]. I would like to emphasize that the concept of the subject of law (the one-who-is-himself[18]), derived from Ricoeur, unifies the problem of the promise and the problem of reciprocity on the onto-ethical level of the party who makes the promise. The phenomenon of abiding by agreements thus gains the basis in the very existence of the subject of law (ipse) – the contracting party.

Consequently, in the light of Ricoeur's views, undertaking the promise by the legal subject is equal to determining the subject itself as the party to the contract. What constitutes a prerequisite here is a primordial recognition of one's own subjectivity as well as the subjectivity of the other, as a party to the contract under reciprocity rule. The following activity, undertaken by the party to a contract, is the action which – from the perspective of the contract – constitutes an affirmation of the party's responsibility for complying with the obligation.

The opponents of the promissory theory point out that under the theory of the Anglo-Saxon law a promise is perceived as a unilateral act, while agreements are essentially bilateral in nature. Both the act of making an offer by one of the parties as well as its acceptance by the other party is necessary in order to conclude the contract; in addition, in the standard contracts the responsibilities refer to both contracting parties[19]. In other words, as indicated by Smith, the reciprocity of rights and obligations in the contract is not strictly related to a unilateral nature of the comme un autre) which synthesizes a number of topics analysed by Ricoeur at the earlier stages of the development of his ideas. Cf. P. Ricoeur, Soi-même comme un autre, op. cit.

---

[17] Ricoeur writes: "Preserving one's self is, in the case of a person, such a pattern of behaviour that another person can count on us. Since someone is counting on me, I am accountable, I can be held to account (je suis comptable) in my actions vis-à-vis Another. The concept of responsibility combines both meanings: to count on …, to be accountable for … This concept connects them by adding to them the principle of answering the question: 'Where are you?', raised by Another who is calling me. The answer to that is: 'Here I am!' (Me voici!) – the answer in which preserving one's self is manifested. (...) The nagging question of 'Who am I' (...) can be incorporated into a proud statement 'That's what I hold on to!' The question is: 'Who am I, unstable, so that you could still count on me?'". P. Ricoeur, O sobie samym, ibidem, pp. 277 – 278.

[18] Cf. P. Ricoeur, O sobie samym, ibidem, research VI and VII.

[19] S. A. Smith, Contract Theory, op. cit., p. 63.

promise (binding the legal subject). The promissory theory, referring to Ricoeur's philosophy, provides the instrument that allows to eliminate the signalled problem, in particular through the relational conception of the person, according to which every promise, also the one made by the legal subject merely vis-à-vis himself, treats as an example the act of the promise made vis-à-vis another person[20].

3. The issue of the promise and reciprocity, though crucial for the law of reciprocal agreements, constitutes a part of Ricoeur's theory which is of a more extensive importance for the theory of law. It is notable from the perspective of the definition of ethical aspirations, as proposed by Ricoeur: "intention of good life with another and for another in just institutions". If promise and reciprocity are placed in the micro scale of the ontology of the legal subject, at the same time are perceived as the foundation of interpersonal relationship. If we recognize a promise and reciprocity as the elements of a specific contract inter partes, they will be considered as the properties of "meso" level, referred to in the definition of ethical aspiration by means of the phrase "with another and for another". At the same time, promise and reciprocity underpin the macro scale of just institutions, among which Ricoeur places positive law. So, if promise and reciprocity in law are considered as universal rules of a formal nature, being the properties of agreements in the sphere of private law, they will be placed on the third level of the quoted definition of ethical aspiration within Ricoeur's meaning, as a part of "the grand narrative" of law[21].

The definition of ethical aspiration thus unifies onto-ethical aspect of the subject, interpersonal relationships, typical for the law of reciprocal agreements and the fair institution of positive law. Since the ethical aspiration is implemented by the subject of law simultaneously on three levels, it becomes possible to justify the individualized protection that the statutory law provides for the promise made by a contracting party. This is due to the fact that the level of just institutions becomes the basis of model and codified patterns of reciprocal agreements which are considered as typification of the common situations of making a promise.

To sum up, Ricoeur's philosophy shows a particular compatibility with the promissory theory of contracts. A promise made (much like Kantian imperative) provides a paradigmatic pattern of self-identity within it. In reference to the ontology and ethics of the person proposed by Ricouer, it becomes possible to define the non-positivist notion of subjectivity of a party to the contract, as a being capable of valid formation of a self-bond through a promise. Moreover, it is possible to point to the source of the law-making authority of that party since keeping the obligations made is an ethically meaningful way of the subject's being (ipse - contrasted by Ricoeur with the being shaped by the variable features of the human character, i.e. idem). Thus, the source of the normative authority of the party to the contract in the light of the proposed concept is the capacity of keeping the promises made (expressed in the pacta sunt servanda principle), i.e. the capacity of continued being oneself in the sense of ipse.

[20] P. Ricoeur,., Soi –même comme un autre, op. cit., pp. 277-278; p. 310; p. 321.
[21] P. Ricoeur, , Soi –même comme un autre, op. cit., pp. 322 – 336.

The use of Scientific Arguments
Thinking like an expert

Margarida Lacombe Camargo[1]

Abstract: This article aims to show the problem of the use of scientific arguments by the Judiciary. The centerpiece is the Brazilian Supreme Court, which has adopted the practice of public hearings, facing the hearing of experts.

Keywords: Public Hearings, STF, Law and Science.

My goal, in this short period of time, is to bring partial results of the research I have been developing about public hearings in Brazil. They constitute a new practice in Brazilian Judiciary, but one that has been growing consistently over the past few years, according to the data attached.[2].

The implementation of public hearings in the Brazilian Supreme Court is regulated by law number 9868/99 and by the Court´s internal rules of procedure. They establish that a public hearing can take place when the chief justice or the reporter of the case believe that it is necessary to hear people with experience and authority in the area to clarify matters of fact and to understand in more detail the matter put to the court .[3]

The summon is made through a public edict, though some government authorities are personally invited. However, contrary to what happens in the United States, where in order to allow the applicants to participate, there is extensive criteria to analyze the validity of the ar-

[1] Professor at the UFRJ and Research at Casa Rui Barbosa.

[2]Some important informations can be highlighted from the graphics available in Annex 1. Firstly, with the exception of Justice Luiz Fux, any other Justice had summon a public hearing over a year. Secondly, we can notice that from 2008 to 2011 there was a progressive decrease in the number of public hearings held by the Court two to zero, while in the period 2011 to 2013, there was a steep increase from zero to five.

[3] The articles 13, XVII e XVII and 21, XVI from the STF rules enable the realization of a public hearing to hear "people with experience and authority in certain matters" to clarify "issues or factual circumstances" with repercussions or public interest.

guments brought to court, such as judicial evidence (Federal Law Rule 702 , Daubert Case and Kumho[4] Case), in Brazil this problem has not yet been raised.[5]. (by validity I understand the formal criteria for accepting evidence, experts in the matter, regardless of the evaluation of their content).

From the start, it is important to differentiate amicus curiae and public hearings. According to the Supreme Courts dictionary, amicus curiae corresponds to the intervention to assist in cases regarding the constitutionality of rules brought to court by entities that are representative of society in the matter being discussed in the case, interventions that can be relevant to the solution of the constitutional controversy.[6]

The speech of the justices responsible for implementing the public hearings, as well as the specific terms of the summons edicts, show that the legal, political and scientific points of view do not differ to a degree that would allow us to distinguish, objectively, and with as much certainty as it would be expected, the nature of public hearings: whether legal, political, or scientific.

By political aspects we understand the search for legitimacy to decide, which would demand verifying the political representative aspect of the entities that are participating. By legal aspects, we understand the arguments that relate to the appropriate interpretation and enforcement of the law in a specific case; a problem mainly of interpretation. And by scientific aspects, we understand the information obtained from experts about matters that are not legal, and that help to solve the case brought to trial.

Mapping the matter, we can distinguish two models of public hearings, that have been taking place at the Brazilian Supreme Court: the Gilmar Mendes[7] model, that comprises acceptance of legal theses, and the Luiz Fux[8] model, that avoids the presentation of legal theses.

---

[4] Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, 509 U.S. 579 (1993) e Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137 (1999).

[5] In relation to the selection criterias, the article 154 of the Regiment estabilishes that "proponents and opponents" must be represented in public hearings, ensuring the "various currents of opinion", but saying nothing about the qualifications of these participants.

[6] http://www.stf.jus.br/portal/glossario/verVerbete.asp?letra=A&id=533

[7] Justice Gilmar Mendes called two public hearings until this moment involving public policies: the imprisonment system and the Judicialization of Health, especially about the Public Health System, called "SUS".

[8]Justice Luiz Fux summoned four public hearings on the following topics: (i) the financ-

The edicts indicate the matters under discussion, but in the second model they are presented in a very specific way. For example: in the case discussing the burning of the sugarcane plantations, one of the questions posed concerned the relationship between cogeneration (generation of energy through the burning of biomass) and mechanic harvesting.

In the United States, even though Brown was based on research developed by the North Side Center for Child Development, the discussion about the independent validity of the scientific arguments focused mainly on the evidence obtained in the case. In Brazil, this discussion is also held by specialists in Procedural Law, as they discuss what truly happened, and define the competence of courts to discuss facts and to discuss strictly legal matters[9]. However, the institution of public hearings has been calling our attention to the move of this discussion to constitutional law, where one usually discusses abstract law. Notwithstanding the selective effect of law, as noted by Schauer[10], we believe that an investigation on the relationship between law and science focused on the Supreme Court is justified, as a way of showing the limits of legal dogmatic.

Traditionally, legal doctrine takes the role, at least in Civil law countries, of discussing what the law is, based on the legal text, on courts interpretation and on legal tradition that creates the bases for legal institutions. They create concepts that standardize legal interpretation, so that law professionals may use the law.[11] According to Kelsen, the law serves as a pattern of interpretation.[12] It qualifies a fact as a legal fact. In this way the judge, when applying the law, acts on something that has already happened. He analyses facts that are in the past, and solves them according to what the previously established law dictates. Notwithstanding the universal character of the Law, very well demonstrated by MacCormick[13], even though pointing to a future perspective, the problems of evidence, and of truth, are actually in the past.

---

ing of political campaign; (ii) the practice of fires in the sugar cane plantation; (iii) the Cable TV sistem in Brazil (free enterprise vs. freedom of expression and pluralism) and (iv) the ban on the sale of alcoholic beverages in federal highways.

[9] On the problematic question involving unity of facts and norms, Cf Castanheira Neves, A. Legal Methodology: fundamental problems. Coimbra: Coimbra Publishing, 1993, p. 163-165.

[10] Thinking like a lawyer, item 2.2

[11] Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Jr. Law Science and Introduction to the study of Law.

[12] Hans Kelsen, Pure Theory of Law, Charpter I, number 4. a [13] Neil MacCormick in Rethoric and the Rule of Law.

In Brazil, however, the most fruitful area for one to perceive the relationship between Law and Science is the Supreme Court. Our system for using expert evidence is not adversarial. Judges name experts who they trust to present technical reports, and the parties may appoint technical assistants to present a critical opinion on the technical report.[14]

That is different from what happens at the Supreme Court, where the distinction between judicial making and judicial application is not clear. The empowerment of constitutional jurisdiction in Brazil, which can be seen from the promulgation of the 1988 constitution, brought an increase in the number of ways one can bring cases to the Supreme Court, this court that has assumed the role of final interpreter of the Constitution. The great number of Direct Unconstitutionality Actions and of Claims of Breach of Fundamental Precept as well as the general repercussion mechanism[15], shows the extension of cases in which the Court acts in a normative function, when it revises the actions taken by the legislator (judicial review). Additionally, it is important to consider how centralized our federative system is, and the strengthening of the constitutional supremacy theory, that contributes to the strengthening of the objective dimension of fundamental rights.

Up to this day, there have been 12 public hearings, where experts were heard, for example, to explain the problem of the use of stem cells for scientific research of abortion of anencephalic fetuses, or of the practice of burning sugar cane plantations, or still of the exploration and commercialization of products that contain asbestos, etc. The goal, according to Justice Ayres Britto, is to have some empirical datas that can be accepted as truth, due to help judge to solve problems in a safe way.

---

[14] The system of proofs is treated in Section VII, arts. 420-439, of the Brazilian Code of Civil Procedure. The credibility of responsible of the judical experts, in terms of bias and impartiality, is provided as follows: Art. 422, "The expert scrupulously fulfill the task that has been committed, regardless terms of engagement. The TAs are reliable parts, not subject to impediment or suspicion. "

[15] In portuguese, "general repercussion" is called "repercussão geral", which is an institute similar to discretionary review of the writ of certiorari. The difference is that the inadmissibility of the writ called "Recurso Extraordinário" requires, under Article 102, §3º by The Brazilian Constitution and by article 543-A of Civil Procedure Code, the justification of the Court that there is no "relevance" in economic, social, political and legal perspective, as well as the absence of "transcendence", which means the case is not representative of one group of other cases and, therefore, the judgment of this case does not go beyond the subjective interests involved. So, only if two thirds of justices decided in this way the appeal can be not hear.

The question posed is always if the constitution allows a certain conduct or not. A typical legal question: what does the law allow and what does forbid? This is relevant both to the parties, at a concrete case, and to the legislator´s action.

We can see that the content knowledge of the constitutional legal rule depends on knowing the specific facts, be them social, physical or natural (hard sciences). The evidence, however, means to show not what has happened, as occurs when a law is applied to a particular case, but to show what is real, what only scientific techniques and specific experts can do.[16]

Although it is not rare for the Justices to highlight the value of public consultation in public hearings, during the hearings they insist on the neutral, impartial character of the arguments presented. However, we can say that the judicial form of arguing, whether on purpose or not, contaminates the scientific arguments. The public hearing serves to solve a specific legal matter and helps to interpret the rule, which deals with values.[17] Not only does the law that regulates public hearings predicts that opposite opinions should be presented, when they exist, but the participants[18] speech clearly takes a position. It seems noteworthy to us that the report, in a case like the one on asbestos, shows in its text the arguments presented in the public hearing. The Justice who was reporting the case thanked publicly the participants of the hearing.

In Brazil, the Supreme Court trials are broadcast live on TV, and they stay permanently on Youtube.[19] I say this because this research is based strongly on these videos, where important obter dictae can be seen. For example, Justice Gilmar Mendes in the asbestos case, when the Court was about to suspend the trial for lack of Justices present, says that he does not want to miss the opportunity to speak about the increasing importance of scientific arguments in judicial decisions.

Justice Marco Aurélio, the reporter, expresses gratitude to the experts in the public hearing. He is the first to vote and, when presenting the matter, and from the beginning he highlights the balance between the benefits and the drawbacks of the use of asbestos. He stresses that [16] See Scott Brewer, Scientific Expert Testimony and Intellectual Due Process. The Yale Law Journal, vol.107, 1998.

[17] It is value here the Kelsen disntiguish between what "is" and what "ought to be".

[18] That's how the experts, present in the audience, are called.

[19] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HPAhCpN-J38 first part; http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=21pY9yfs8-c second part; http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YVTgd4mQReE third part.

during the public hearing some participants argued for of the complete ban of the use of asbestos, while others argued for the controlled use of the substance. What calls our attention is the term "argued for", in a normative way. The first group based their arguments on medical data, on the malignancy of asbestos, a carcinogenic substance, while the opposite point of view was brought by economists, who highlight the loss that this substance's substitution would bring. I believe that this example, which does not diverge from the other public hearings, shows how scientific data can serve as a basis for legal reasoning, especially when they can help the judge to evaluate the consequences of the measure, and then decide. Justice Marco Aurélio stresses that the virtue is in the middle ground, and Justice Gilmar Mendes tries to analyse the practical effects of the decision, so that he can decide more confident.[20]

In an environment where truth is sustained by the investigation method, when neutrality is expected, it is pertinent to question the possibility of there being "contrary opinions" based on values, (benefits and drawbacks), when the consequences of the measure are considered.

Justice Ellen Gracie, in the ADI 3510 (Embryonic Stem Cells), says that the act of judging is, first and foremost, a great exercise of humility.[21] When the beginning of life was being discussed at the court, she highlights a phrase that became famous: "we are not a science academy". Justice Gilmar Mendes, as previously mentioned, in the asbestos trial stresses to the Court the importance of expert knowledge, to avoid opinions without grounds. He says that, contrary to the legislator, who can review his positions when the results of a decision are not adequate, the Court can make no mistakes.

This way, we can conclude that: 1) the Supreme Court shows a strong tendency to seek the public consultation of experts in non-legal areas; 2) the data brought by the experts allow the justices to know reality and to guide their decision considering the practical consequences it might have; 3) the profile and nature of public hearings in Brazil is still being shaped in a way it may be better understood. I also take the opportunity to announce the hypothesis, to be analyzed at a different moment,

[20] As Stephen Breyer , Justice from the United States Supreme Court, says , "the Law must seek decisions tha fall within the bounderies of scientifically sound knowledge and approximately reflect the scientific state of the art." The Interdependence of Science and Law, in Science and Technology Policy Yearbook, 1999. The American Association for the Advancement of Science. http://www.aaas.org/spp/yearbook/chap9.htm that, considering the proportionality analysis made by Robert Alexy, the reliability of empirical arguments prevails in the end, leading to a more pragmatic rather than moral Reading of the constitution.

[21] By the way see the paper of John Hardwig, Toward an Ethics of Expertise. http://web.utk.edu/~jhardwig/expertis.htm

References

BREWER, Scott Brewer, Scientific Expert Testimony and Intellectual Due Process. The Yale Law Journal, vol.107, 1998.

BREYER, Stephen. The Interdependence of Science and Law, in Science and Technology Policy Yearbook, 1999. The American Association for the Advancement of Science. http://www.aaas.org/spp/yearbook/chap9.htm

FERRAZ Jr., Tércio Sampaio. The Science of Law. 2. ed., São Paulo:Atlas, 1980.

_____ Introduction to the study of Law. São Paulo: Atlas, 1988.

HARDWIG, John Toward an Ethics of Expertise. http://web.utk.edu/~-jhardwig/expertis.htm

KELSEN, Hans Pure Theory of Law. [Trad. João Baptista Machado] São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2006.

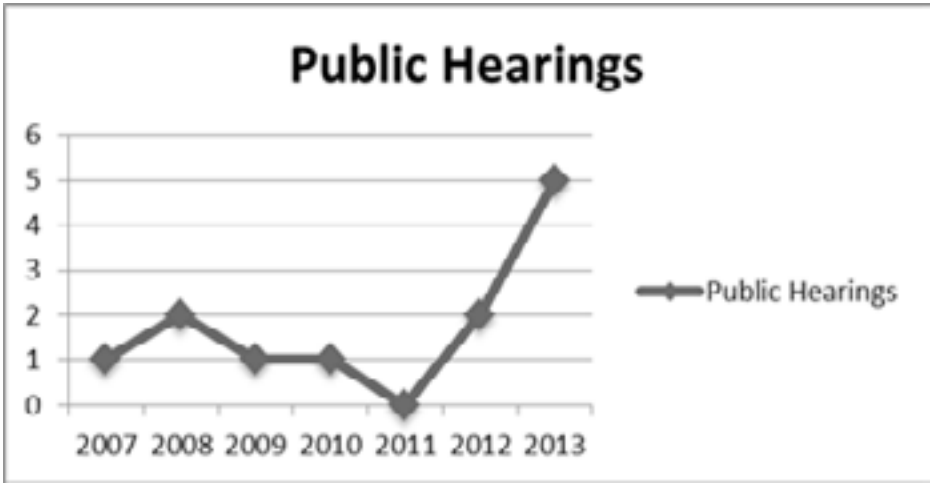
MAcCORMICK, Neil. Rethoric and the Rule of Law. [Trad. Conrado Hübner Mendes e Marcos Paulo Veríssimo] São Paulo: Campus Elsevier, 2008.

NEVES, A. Castanheira. Legal Methodology: fundamental problems. Coimbra: Coimbra Publishing, 1993.

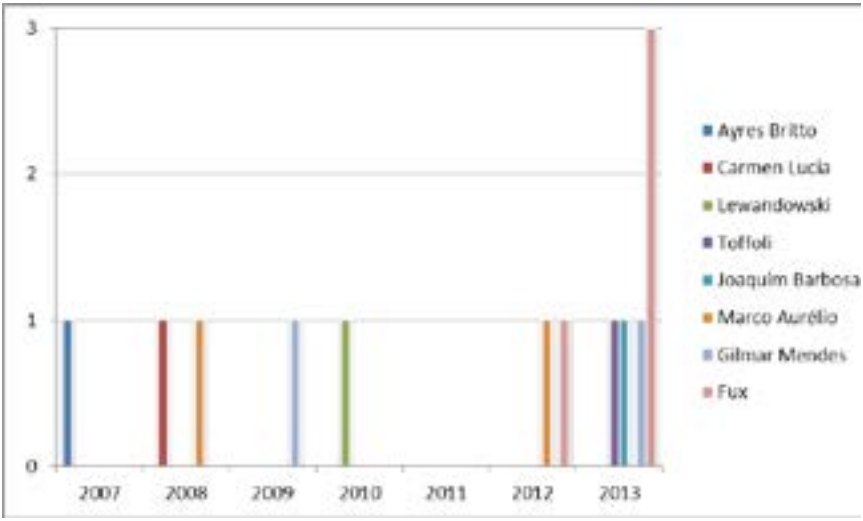
SCHAUER, Frederick. Thinking like a lawyer. Cambridge: Harvard Universtity Press, 2009.

ANEXO 1

ANEXO 1



Public Hearings
6
5
4
3
2
1
0
2007 2008 2009 2010 2011 2012 2013
Public Hearings



3
2
1
0
2007 2008 2009 2010 2011 2012 2013
Ayres Britto
Carmen Lucia
Lewandowski
Toffoli
Joaquim Barbosa
Marco Aurélio
Gilmar Mendes
Fux

Analogical reasoning, deductive reasoning and their relationship with the enquiry of the facts of the case[1]

Carlos Magno de Abreu Neiva

Abstract: In the majority of judicial cases judges hold enquiries in order to find out the facts of the case. Judicial enquiries are a special kind of enquiry, limited and marked by the context in which they are held and by legal tradition. In Western legal systems judges justify their decisions in two typical ways: analogical reasoning (usually associated to common law systems) and deductive reasoning (usually associated to civil law systems). Although these models concern to the moment of justification and, as such, become visible after the enquiry that leads to the ascertainment of facts is finished, each one impose different constraints on the enquiry as a whole. Deductive reasoning is related to rule-based enquiries, those in which factual hypothesis is the source for the questions that conduct the enquiry. Analogical reasoning is related to narrative-based enquiries, those in which allegations of parties are the source for the questions. Narrative-based enquiries favor a better approach to the singular facts of the case and should become a pattern for every judge.

Keywords: judicial decision, facts, factual hypothesis, narrative, judicial enquiry.

1. Subject and premises

Judicial decision is the act by which a judge proclaims that according to a rule of law someone has/hasn't a right/a duty or shall/shall not be punished. Sometimes it is possible to conclude it just by interpretation of a statute or a contract, the result being normally a declaratory

[1] The original title was "ANALOGICAL REASONING, DEDUCTIVE REASONING AND THEIR EFFECTS ON THE ENQUIRY OF THE FACTS OF THE CASE". Commentaries made after my presentation and further reflection led me to replace the idea of "effect" (and of cause) for the idea of a relationship qualified by the aspects I analyze, which makes this relationship more complex and subtle than that of cause-effect.

judgment which provides legal certainty about the meaning of a specific provision that is binding to the parties. In this sense, declaratory judgments are future oriented. This article doesn't refer to such species of judgment but to what we may call past oriented judgments, those which deals with facts happened in the past and, consequently, judgments that are preceded by an enquiry[2].

Given the context in which the enquiry of the facts of the case is performed by the judge, it is justified to name it judicial enquiry. The central claim of this article is that judicial enquiries differ according to the type of reasoning that the judge is supposed to, or has the intention to, use to justify his or her decision. I will also sustain that one type of enquiry is more appropriate to the task of finding the facts of the case.

It is important to disclose the main premise on which this article is written, which plays an essential role in the argument: it is a requirement of justice that rights, duties and punishments are declared in correspondence to the action actually performed by the agents before they become parties of a lawsuit. For reasons that will be object of the next topic, the emphasis in this premise falls on the word 'action'.

It is also important to set the context in which I think my analysis might be valid: (i) the judge I'm writing about is a professional one who is responsible both to find the facts and to decide the case. Although some of the statements I make might apply to the finding of facts committed to jurors, it is essential to the analysis that the same person conceives the enquiry, conduct it and, in the end of the lawsuit, have the obligation of making explicit the reasons why one version about the facts and not other is taken as the true version; (ii) I suppose that the procedure is at least in some degree inquisitorial, meaning that the judge has the power, for example, to determine that parties present documents, to require documents to other authorities and to formulate questions to be answered by parties and testimonies. Consequently, the words 'judge' and 'enquirer' will be used as synonyms.

I'll start the analysis by explaining why the word 'action' is so important in the premise declared above and for the whole article. After this I will show that judicial enquiry has features that differentiate it from other sorts of enquiries, especially scientific ones. The difference that imports for the discussion is that there are two different grounds on which the questions may be formulated that give rise to two ways of enquiry, which I will call rule-based enquiry and narrative-based enquiry. I follow by affirming that the two classical types of legal reasoning that appear in the justification of judicial decisions have something to do with these two styles of enquiry. Finally I'll sustain that one of those types of enquiry is superior to grasp the actions of the case.

[2] The borders between the two referred types of judgment may sometimes not be clear. It is possible, for example, that before proclaiming a declaratory judgment about the meaning of a provision in a contract the judge wants to know which actual intentions of the parties were, a task that can only be well done after some kind of enquiry. For the modest aims of this article, however, I think the proposed distinction works well.

2. Action terms

Excluded cases in which litigation is about the meaning of a statute or contract, what is at stake in lawsuits is always one or more actions performed or omitted by one or both parties. It is the action (or the lack of action when the agent was obliged to act) that is judged to be according or contrary to provisions of law.

Translating it into the language that interests to this article, any judicial decision presupposes a comparison between two kinds of statements that have action terms as their core:

i. The first kind is represented by rules of law, which are statements about actions previously selected as legally relevant. In these statements, actions terms may be of two types: they are whether typical, in the sense that the term is an abstract model represented by its definition, or exemplary, that is, the term is a previously concrete occurred action which, as a whole (or "in all its aspects"), is considered as a model. In both cases, the relevance derives from the fact that there is a legal consequence connected to the occurrence of the action.
ii. The second is a statement about the concrete actions of the parties of a lawsuit, which is a result of judicial enquiry.

There is no difficulty concerning the logical possibility of comparison, because both terms of comparison are statements. But there is an aspect that distinguishes the two kinds of statements: the rule-of-law statement, in its two types, is about a model; the facts-of-the-case statement is about a singular, an unique action which may, by definition, be distinguished of any other action that has ever happened or that will happen in the future. For now it is enough to enunciate this problem, which will be tackled later.

Action terms are then the core of the statements that the judge is supposed to compare, so it is necessary to know what they are about.

Action terms are essentially verbs. If the work of precising the meaning of any word is hard, this is much harder when the word is a verb, and even more difficult when this verb is stated in a rule of law. These difficulties have two main causes. First, they are related to the many implicit or explicit conditions and qualifiers of actions that are part of rule-of-law statements:

i. First, in a rule of law intention is usually a matter in question. Acting with or without intention is, most of the times, the issue that leads the judge to consider the agent liable or not. So judges are required to say whether the action was intentional or not;
ii. Second, the circumstances under which the action is performed are essential in at least three aspects: (a) many times they are what allows us to distinguish one legal type of action from other, either because the statute puts the circumstance as part of the definition or because the judge sees it as an important distinction; (b) many times the analysis of circumstances is the best way an essential to access the intentionality of the action; (c) they are also the more important instrument by which it becomes possible to qualify the action as reasonable, cautious, cruel and all the other different ways that someone may perform an action;
iii. Third, the motives of the action (the reasons that justify it) can also be important to determine if the action is legally authorized or not. Self-defense is only the most obvious case: injuring someone with a knife may be a criminal conduct or not depending on the existence or not of an actual menace.

I assume that the importance of intention, circumstances and motives for judicial decisions is not disputed. If I am right, it is not possible to avoid the challenges that these aspects of action terms bring up to the task of finding out the facts of the case. First, they give rise to problems about the kind of evidence to be taken into account. This problem is pervasive, but more important when the issue is about intention and motives: excluded confession – which is not the most reliable kind of evidence and in the majority of cases doesn't exist – judges don't conclude anything about intention and motives thanks to direct evidence.

The second source of difficulties derives from one feature of what Hart called the defeasibility of legal concepts[3]. Hart sustains that in a lawsuit

[3] HART, H.L.A. (1948-1949), The Ascription of Responsibility and Rights. Proceedings

> [...] the accusations or claims upon which law courts adjudicate can usually be challenged or opposed in two ways. First, by a denial of the facts upon which they are based (technically called a traverse or joinder of issue) and secondly by something quite different, namely, a plea that although all the circumstances are present on which a claim could succeed, yet in the particular case, the claim or accusation should not succeed because other circumstances are present which brings the case under some recognised head of exception, the effect of which is either to defeat the claim or accusation altogether or to "reduce" it, so that only a weaker claim can be sustained. [...] In consequence, it is usually not possible to define a legal concept such as "trespass" or "contract" by specifying the necessary and sufficient conditions for its application. For any set of conditions may be adequate in some cases but not in others and such concepts can only be explained with the aid of a list of exceptions or negative examples showing where the concept may not be applied or may only be applied in a weakened form. [4]

According to d'Almeida[5], Hart presents two different claims about defeasibility, "one regarding the logical behavior of defeating conditions, and another concerning the structure of judicial argument". The second is the relevant one for my purposes: depending on the defenses of fact argued by the defendant, the judgment may have to consider alternative rules to that/those declared by the plaintiff or inferred by the judge in the beginning of the lawsuit. Think, for instance, of a Tenancy case where the plaintiff, who is a landlord, says that the defendant didn't pay the rent in time and so must be removed from the house. In this case, the applicable rule would be the one (existent, for example, in a Brazilian statute) that establishes that tenants have the obligation of paying the rent on pain of being removed from the house. In his response the defendant, although admitting that he really didn't pay, affirms that he had talked about this with the plaintiff who had agreed with two months without pay, because the defendant had spent a lot of money to replace the two centuries old water tubes for new ones. In this case, the judge needs to use more specific rules (for example, one that distributes of the Aristotelian Society, New Series, 49: 171-194.

---

[4] Op. cit., p. 174.

[5] D'ALMEIDA, L. D. (2007), Description, Ascription, and Action in the Criminal Law. Ratio Juris, 20: 170–195.

the duty to pay for repairs of tubes) and, still, rules about the making of agreements orally, good faith and so on. In cases like this it is possible to say that the complexity of alleged actions gives rise to a correspondent complexity of potential applicable rules.

The importance of the term 'action' in the premise declared in the beginning of this article is now easy to understand: if action is what counts for a judgment and if concepts of actions are complex and defeasible in the way mentioned above, the enquiry that precedes the judgment must be as comprehensive as possible, on pain of judging without considering everything that is relevant. Let's see how judicial enquiry may tackle this issue.

3. Judicial enquiry

In a broad sense, the word enquiry refers to any quest performed in order to obtain knowledge about something that is not already known or to find something that has been forgotten or lost. In this sense, the possible object of an enquiry includes an uncountable variety of things, like the place where something is hidden, the reason for the existence of the universe, the time when I first noticed that I had fell in love and so on. Judicial enquiry belongs to the genus of enquiries held to set a version about facts of the past. Before we say something about it, it may be useful to say a few words about other enquiries that belong to the same genus.

Natural sciences normally work with facts of the past and do it with two distinguishable but related aims. First, scientists who approach an existent phenomenon as a problem for the first time (an earthquake, human life in the earth, the shining of the sun) hold enquiries to find causes that explain it. In this case, the phenomenon is seen as something singular and the causes eventually found refer to and explain exclusively that phenomenon. But scientists, after having made a certain number of enquiries of the first kind, hold broader enquiries that allow them to build theories and models able to explain the genus to which the singular phenomenon belongs. Singular causes are replaced by laws. In this case all earthquakes, all forms of life or the shining of all kinds of stars may be explained by the model, which is then used to understand other singular instances of the phenomenon. The existence of the model is a great achievement for many reasons, but for our discussion what is important is that using a model simplifies following enquiries establishing previously what is relevant to be known and, consequently, providing the terms in which questions are formulated.

Similar enquiries about facts of the past are made by human sciences specialists. History is the obvious case: Historians relate a singular event (French Revolution, Military Dictatorship in Brazil) and try to apprehend it in terms of its more immediate or remote causes. It is also usual that an ensemble of studies on the same subject allows historians to build models about the possible causes, for example, of all revolutions and dictatorships, which helps them to understand and explain the rising of a new revolution or dictatorship.

In Law, some enquiries about facts of the past are similar to those made by natural and human sciences. Historians of Law, for example, may proceed like historians in general if their aim is to explain an event or a sequence of events. It is in this way, for example, that the origin of the distinction between systems of common law and civil law is explained. There is also the possibility that sociologists hold enquiries to know why some policies regulated by law work properly or not (for example, criminal policies concerning to rehabilitation of convicted criminals). In both cases, the understanding of singular cases will provide the sciences with elements to build models that can be used by new enquiries. Some of the results of these studies may serve as grounds for the improvement of policies and for the formulation of new rules of law. Part of what is found will probably become part of the legal culture that will be shared by legal professionals and even by citizens. This kind of enquiry is made, however, from what is known as the external point of view, that is, they are not part of the practice of Law. Our discussion is about a more specific kind of enquiry performed within law system, which is part of its ordinary and daily practice and, as such, is made from the internal point of view. When compared with scientific enquiries, this enquiry is made on different grounds, with special method and has limits that don't apply to scientific studies. This is what we call judicial enquiry.

Judicial enquiry has a very specific purpose: finding the truth about the facts of each particular case led to the scrutiny of judiciary. It differs from scientific enquiries in many features. First, it is carried out by many different agents, some of which, like scientists, act in spirit of cooperation (police, judges, clerks), but there are also some that act in competition (the parties and the scientific testimonies they indicate). Second, judicial enquiry must end in reasonable time, that is, the judge cannot postpone the conclusion until he or she is sure that all efforts to find the truth were made. Third, contrary to what is up to scientists, it is not possible for the judge to say 'I don't know what happened' and declare the end of the lawsuit without solution. Forth, the responsibility of conclusion is committed to jurors or to a judge who are not specialists in the object of enquiry, and although they may receive help from experts, they are guaranteed some autonomy to decide contrary to these experts' opinion. Fifth, there are limits concerning the information that may be used, like the prohibition of use of illicit evidence.

All these differences are relevant but for our purposes the most crucial difference between judicial enquiry and scientific enquiries are their different starting points for the formulation of questions. Scientific enquiries formulate questions based on the true propositions of the time, normally coordinated in theories and models. In judicial enquiry the candidates to play this role are of a different kind, and this is the subject of next topic.

4. Two types of judicial enquiry, two types of reasoning

Questions are the instruments through which enquiries are held. No enquiry is a wide-open investigation without limits: the enquirer formulates questions to set the borders of the enquiry according to criteria of relevance. In judicial enquiries judges, like any enquirer, normally find out only what the terms of the questions allow coming to light. The problem is that formulating questions is not a task performed in a "natural" or a "free" manner, it depends at least on previous knowledge about the subject and on the point of view the enquirer adopts. In this topic I sustain that there are two sources of questions available to judges and that they differ both over the previous knowledge they offer and the point of view from which they are formulated.

The first source of questions is the part of rules of law known as factual hypothesis: in a rule stating that "one who kills other human being shall be imprisoned", the factual hypothesis is the act of killing a human being. Because a rule of law is the source of questions, I will call the related enquiry of rule-based enquiry.

Factual hypothesis is a strong candidate to serve as basis for judicial enquiry, first because in the very beginning of a lawsuit, just after reading or listening to the pleading, the judge is able to think of the applicable rule and its respective factual hypothesis. Second, because the terms of the factual hypothesis have normally been scrutinized by former judicial decisions and scholars, simplifying the task of formulating questions. The results of this scrutiny are part of the previous knowledge available for a rule-based enquiry, which also includes ordinary knowledge. It is important to understand how it works.

Take the example of the act of killing. The first and most obvious question would be: "has the defendant killed the victim?" Of course this would never be the only question formulated by any enquirer, let alone by a judicial enquirer. Thanks to previous knowledge about the subject, issues about intention and motives, at least, are always present in any judicial enquiry about killing, and so are, usually, questions about the circumstances in which the action was performed. But when the terms of the factual hypothesis are the source of such questions, they will normally be open questions or, even when yes or no questions are possible, they will be formulated in general terms. Besides the already mentioned and principal question ("has the defendant killed the victim?"), we may figure out some other examples of questions: "Which were the circumstances of the crime?" "Had the defendant motives to kill?" "Has the defendant acted intentionally?" The problem is that such questions limit the results of the enquiry in a very important way: the expected answers are the ones related to the meaning that the enquirer ascribes to these terms (intention, motives, killing etc.). So every element of fact that is unexpected as an instance of the terms of the question tends to be discarded by the enquirer as irrelevant, even when they are supported by some kind of evidence. Another example: truth of exceptions and defenses, which have their own factual hypothesis, may be in principle investigated through questions derived from the terms in which they are enunciated. Think of a hypothetical enunciation of self-defense, as "justified and reasonable use of physical force upon another person who is about to hit me or so": it gives rise to questions like "Were the reaction justified/reasonable?" This offers a better example about the referred limits of factual hypothesis as a ground for the formulation of questions: the meanings of "justified" and "reasonable" are so abstract that they are not of much help as terms of a question, only the details of the facts of the case will furnish material to analyze it and these details don't come from this kind of question, but from questions derived from the second source of questions.

The second possible source of questions for the enquiry are allegations of parties, which set the basic elements of fact of a singular controversy. The plaintiff presents the pleading, the defendant responds and in some places, like Brazil, the plaintiff is allowed to comment the defendant's response. Both the pleading and the defense have a narrative of what each party sees as the relevant events. If parties don't disagree about this matter some legal systems allow the judge to decide immediately, at least in civil cases; so no enquiry is needed. When there is disagreement, the judge has both narratives as potential grounds on which the questions may be formulated.

It is important to remark the word narrative. Allegations of parties come indeed in this form, that is, they tell a story developed in time, during which one or more agents perform one or more actions under certain circumstances. These narratives are not necessarily complete, that is, they normally don't cover the whole relationship among the parties, but only what they consider relevant for the case. That is why, in principle, all information provided by parties are potentially relevant to the solution of the case, what recommends that each detail referred in their allegations must be, until the end of the enquiry, presumed as relevant.

The use of allegations of parties as source to judicial enquiry gives rise to what we may call narrative-based enquiry.

Contrary to factual hypotheses, which have abstract concepts as their material, narratives bring definite information about actual persons and their actions and, as we have seen above, it is precisely the truthiness of these actions that must be the object of judicial enquiries. The questions are formulated in a concrete manner: instead of asking "has the defendant killed the victim?" the enquirer asks "has Smith intentionally shot Johnson in the corner of X Street on 14th of May around 10 pm?" and "has Johnson first menaced to hit Smith?" These questions are, of course, related to the terms of the rules (the first with "killing", the second with "self-defense") but they are specific and allow the enquirer to go straight to the relevant question of fact.

Allegations of parties are a better source of questions than the factual hypotheses that appear in rules of law because the previous knowledge they offer is richer, specific, and mainly because if I search for the truth about a fact, the best point of departure is a statement about facts, which may or may not be confirmed after the enquiry. I am convinced that many judges formulate specific questions inspirated by allegations of parties, without thinking about the logical issues that are behind it. But my point is that many judges are led to adopt the other way by a powerful logical instrument, named deductive reasoning.

Deductive reasoning, especially modus ponens, is the logical side of rule-based enquiries. Considered as a classical mode of justification of judicial decisions, the formula if p, q, where p is our well known factual hypothesis, has potential to constrain judges to use rule-based enquiry, being enough for this constraint to operate that the judge thinks that his task in a lawsuit is only to find out if the rule was or not violated. If this is his or her perspective the enquiry will be held to confirm or not the factual hypothesis, what means that details of the case that are out of the terms in which it is enunciated may be discarded as irrelevant. In other words, the enquiry is made from the point of view of the rule.

I am not sustaining that judges have not, as one of their tasks, to find out if the rule was or not violated. I am only saying that this is one of their tasks, indeed it is their final task, which must necessarily be preceded by the end of his first task, which is to arrive at a conclusion about what happened. In other words, the enquiry must not be contaminated by the terms of the rule.

Again, it is useful to skip for the alternative model in order to fully understand what has just been said about deductive reasoning. Analogical reasoning is the alternative and it adopts the point of view of the facts. To reason analogically in a judicial decision is to make a comparison between the facts of the present case and those of a paradigmatic case to justify the application of the rule used in the latter. The paradigmatic case of analogical reasoning contains an example of an action that may be, in relevant features, analogue to the case that is about to be judged. The first aspect that favors the use of analogy is the fact that both terms of comparison are stated in narrative form. It means that the comparison is not between the terms of a definition and a statement about facts, but between two narratives that can be approximated by the similarity of their elements.

Contrary to what happens with deductive reasoning, where the facts of the present case are compared with the factual hypothesis of the applicable rule, in analogical reasoning facts are compared with facts. It is because the facts of the two cases, by definition, can't be the same – actions always being singular – that the only way of comparing them is by similarity, using analogy. Only after finding and demonstrating the similarity the judge is authorized to say that some facts are relevant, that others are not, and only then will he or she apply the rule of the paradigmatic case to the present case.

Analogical reasoning, then, is a way of justifying decisions that puts the facts as the core of the enquiry: it adopts the point of view of the facts, not of the rule. It demands an effort of the judge to know as much as possible about the facts of the present case, and as the applicable rule is not previously known, narrative-based enquiry is the natural option.

Conclusion: Superiority of narrative-based enquiries

At first sight it would seem sensible to conclude that once both factual hypothesis and the narratives are useful to the enquiry the best that the judge can do is using the two of them. This Solomonic suggestion, however, disregards both the problems with the rule-based enquiry and the qualities of narrative-based enquiry. I sustain that the last is superior and should be taken as a pattern by judges

If we let the decision about the kind of enquiry to be held open to the discretion of the judge, two dangers would emerge. First, the concrete judge may be of the type who wants to find a shortcut for a quick solution of all cases. If this is the case, the rule that in the beginning of the lawsuit seems to be the applicable offers the perfect recipe: taking it as the basis for the enquiry the judge won't have many questions to answer and, after answering them, he or she will present the solution of the case with the appearance of a good decision, once the facts found will surely reproduce the factual hypothesis in a perfect modus ponens reasoning.

Second, even if the judge is not of the rushed species, he or she may be tricked by the perfection of the same modus ponens reasoning and sincerely think that the best solution can't be other than the one in which the facts fit exactly in the factual hypothesis of a single rule that initially seemed to be applicable.

The problem, then, is that the judge succumbs to one of these two temptations related to deductive reasoning: the temptation of speed and of perfection (as a practical lawyer, I am sure that in my country they often succumb to both, usually to the detriment of the defendant). One has to agree that these are not exactly weak temptations; and they are far from being a joke. In fact, they are very powerful in civil law systems, where legal professionals are not trained one single day to deal with facts, but spend all their lives studying rules. This is the reason why any sample of judicial decisions would show that the discussion about the meaning of rules is what really counts for the courts, the facts being referred only in a fragmented way.

But someone could argue that fear of temptations is not sufficient reason to say that the rule-based enquiry is not a good method. I agree. The inferiority of rule-based enquiry only becomes clear when we consider the virtues of the alternative method, narrative-based enquiry. Its principal virtue consists to give the chance that everything that the parties allege becomes object of enquiry, taking seriously what seems to be a good rule: 'if parties say something about an event or action, this must be presumed as relevant'. The second virtue is that actual facts are the subject of narratives, contrary to what occurs with rules, where the facts are abstract hypothesis. Third, narrative-based enquiry is plainly compatible with the application of a rule in deductive mode: after the enquiry, the judge will know which facts are true and certainly will find one or more rules under which those facts can be subsumed. So, even for those who believe that deductive reasoning is a necessary part of the justification of judicial decisions – issue that is out of the limits of this article – I would say that the right time to use it is after the enquiry. Enquiries deal with facts and must be facts-based, what narrative-based enquiries guarantee.

Multicultural character of Brazilian constitutionalism

Self-determination of peoples in the 1988 Constitution and the legacy of José Bonifácio

Renata Anatólio Loureiro[1]
Danyele da Silva Machado[2]

Abstract: Asleep in the deepest roots of our country's history we find the elements needed to understand all that surrounds us today, including in relation to the legal world. As well accentuates Ricardo Marcelo Fonseca "only if comprises the Law effectively when it connects with what preceded us and what we have inherited from the past." [3] Thus, it is never awfully avail ourselves of the birthplace of Brazilian thought in its most diverse aspects, the intention to seek the intellection of contemporary Brazil, especially from the standpoint of political-legal.

The "intense dream" [4] of seeing a country free from shackles oppressors and colonizers messed with many Brazilians, especially Jose Bonifácio de Andrada e Silva, who received the nickname Patriarch of Independence and had the main objective to form an independent nation, sovereign and cohesive after the decolonization process, based on liberal principles and adhering to the wave of Western constitutionalism, creating a sense of unity and belonging that would avoid the breakup of the country and the consequent formation of several small republics.

The objective of this study is to analyze the legal and political thought of Brazil in the imperial period from the perspective of Jose Bonifácio, especially in his character integrationist widely exploited in the construction of the Brazilian State, which had to overcome the barriers imposed by extensive territorial dimension and multiculturalism, to the point of being required to sacrifice self mainly indigenous and black people.

From this integrationist much as multicultural heritage we will draw

[1] Master's in law from Universidade Federal de Minas Gerais
[2] Graduate Student from Centro Universitário Newton Paiva
[3] FONSECA, Ricardo Marcelo. Introdução Teórica à História do Direito. Curitiba:Juruá Editora, 2010. p. 6
[4] ESTRADA, Joaquim Osório Duque. Hino Nacional Brasileiro

a parallel with the Constitution of 1988, seeking a critical analysis concerning the development of the idea of self-determination, a breakthrough that still faces formal and informal mishaps, at the same time has great influence in society and is influenced by it.

Keyword: Multiculturalism - Self-Determination - Constitution - Imperial José Bonifacio - 1988 Constitution

Introduction

Analyze and write about the present moment is undoubtedly revive and rethink the past, reflecting the brands that events have left previous history in the construction of society, especially in the field of political and legal thought. The history of Brazil current is a reflection of events that profoundly marked their institutional construction, referring us back to the image of the Olympic torch that to keep up on, needs to pass from hand to hand. Experiences beyond the time barrier as an affront to the laws of physics, making it reverberate in the present. Observing the evolution constitutionalist notably Brazil, the main focus of our reflections, we identified its genesis in the imperial period, a time when the nation holds their first independent steps and aims to organize a sovereign National State.

It is imperative to observe the Karine Salgado notes that "the right is the result of human work and therefore built gradually through the objectification of certain values in a given historical moment." [5] This work will be developed addressing the vision of many historians and jurists about the imperial period, analyzing their observations on the main features of the economic perspective, social, political and anthropological, reflecting on these situations in the formation of the constitutional subject of the National State, mirroring in the work of Jose Bonifacio de Andrada e Silva.

The unit of the Brazilian state was structured on various aspects presented in the 1824 Constitution, especially the constitutional monarchy, the maintenance of the slavery and the insertion of the moderating power. The Brazilian Liberalism was based on the Portuguese movement, not only because the wealthier citizens studied on Lisbon land, but also because the Portuguese Crown moved to the colony Latin, bringing forth the remnants monarchists who eventually create deep roots.

[5] SALGADO, Karine. História, Direito e Razão. In: http://www.conpedi.org.br/manaus/arquivos/anais/manaus/direito_racion_democ_karine_salgado.pdf. Date:22/07/ 2013.

Within a context organismic world, the independence movement in Brazil, as well as the development of its first Constitutional Charter that, in the words of Afonso Arinos, [6] confuses in the same historical process, is part of the liberal wave that struck Europe eighteenth century, which sought earnestly to get rid of absolutism.

Peculiarities permeate the situation of the metropolis, because the liberal movement there is not structured in the republic, which other European countries, but under the gauntlet of the monarchy. [7] That is, in this way, the monarchy was largely responsible for the development of Portuguese illustration, developing the form of the constitutional division of powers, justifying its maintenance for such a long period, in antagonism to the rest of the European continent, which aimed to end of the ancien régime.

What interests us most and will be the subject of consideration in this article is the unit based in the national identity, since the majority of the population of the newly freed colony was formed by slaves and freedmen, those without right to exercise political rights, these without the condition proper establish themselves as citizens. [8]

---

[6]. This author believes that together the political freedom of the people, following the European liberal movement, in Brazil the situation took contours of building "own national personality", consisting of the rationalization of political theory adopted. FRANCO, Afonso Arinos de Melo. Curso de Direito Constitucional Brasileiro vol II. Rio de Janeiro: Forense, 1960.p 9-10.

[7] In this sense Note that the reflections of Illuminist political thought echoed later in the Iberian peninsula, emphasizing understanding of the Vicente Barreto and Afonso Arinos justify this situation by "narrow monarchical absolutism and the strong influence of the church on society and the State", exerting strong censorship .ARINOS, Afonso. O constitucionalismo de D. Pedro I no Brasil e em Portugal. Brasília: Ministério da Justiça, 1994. p. 10. e BARRETTO, Vicente, Ideologia e Política no pensamento de José Bonifácio de Andrada e Silva. Rio de Janeiro: Zahar Editores, 1977.p, 83

[8] Census taken in 1872 showed that the Brazilian population in this period amounted to 9,930,478 inhabitants, divided about social status in 8419672 free (84.78%) and 1.510,806 slaves (15.21%). As for the races, was 38,13% White, 19.68% black, 38.28% of mixed race and 3.89% of Indians. Black and brown together, including both free and freed as slaves, came to 5.756,234, or 57,96% of the total population. Excluding slaves, came to a free colored population of 4.245,428, in other words, 42,75% of the inhabitants of the country were free people of color, so egress of slavery and their descendants, blacks and browns. CHALHOUB, Sidney. Precariedade estrutural: o problema da liberdade no Brasil. In: Revista Eletrônica História Social. São Paulo: 2010. p. 34-35. Disponível em http://www.ifch.unicamp.br/ojs/index.php/rhs/article/view/315/271. Date: 09/07/2013. In the same

The maintenance of slavery came into vehement discussion, behold the purity of liberalism did not allow slavery, nor the most cruel trafficking. Other hand, those responsible intellectuals and supporters of the liberation of the country made fortune using the exploitation of slave labor.

Brief outline of cultural and ethnic composition Brazilian

In the early nineteenth century - "the condition of colonial Brazil ceased with the arrival of the royal family in 1808" [9] and the steps taken to extinguish Portuguese domination of Brazilian trade - introducing an autonomy that previously was not known by the government national ex vi the opening of the ports to friendly nations, permission to industrialization, creation of the Bank of Brazil, and the elevation of Brazil to the rank of United Kingdom of Portugal and the Algarves, among others.

The economy at this time, was founded by the plantation system, based on the use of "monoculture estates and the exploration of slave labor" [10] impacting the construction and consolidation of the character of the local society and directly influencing the formation and development of social classes.

The territory was integrated by provinces - old captaincies - that contained a society quite heterogeneous, composed of white Europeans - mostly Portuguese, African blacks and mulattos - those arising from miscegenation - and Indians.

The white Portuguese and their descendants, forming the Brazilian elite held power political-economic-social due to the positions they occupied in the performance of these sectors, such as landowners, mer-direction information provided by Mr Henriques de Rezende, made at the meeting of August 02, 1823, when evaluated project dealing about the possibility of naturalization of Portuguese living in Brazil: "(...) But, Mr. President, which serves us so much vegetation, so much wealth in mines, if so vast continent is poorly tinted by a population of only four or five million inhabitants, and this whole heterogeneous and largely slave " In: Annaes do Parlamento Brazileiro – Assembleia Constituinte de 1823 – Tomo Quarto. Rio de Janeiro:Typographia de Hyppolito José Pinto & Cia, 1876. p. 07.

---

[9] ANJOS, João Alfredo dos. José Bonifácio, primeiro Chanceler do Brasil. Brasília: Fundação Alexandre de Gusmão, 2007, p. 52.

[10] SPAREMBERGER, Raquel Fabiana Lopes. Antropologia e Diferença: quilombolas e indígenas na luta pelo reconhecimento do seu lugar no Brasil dos (des)iguais. Cap. 6. p.126. In: COLAÇO, Thais (org). Elementos de Antropologia Jurídica. Florianópolis: Conceito Editorial, 2008.

chants, civil servants in the service of the Portuguese court, politicians, etc.

The black people were brought to Brazil from Africa to be slaves, setting the workforce longer used at that time. Emilia Viotti, talking about African slavery, states that:

> "Wherever the economy was organized to supply the international market with raw materials, and whenever there was difficulty in recruiting native labor, Africans provided the necessary work. There was a precise correlation between the accumulation of capital and the use of African slaves. "[11]

The Brazilian slavery was a system of exploitation of labor based on the possession of the employee, in which the slave was treated as a thing, property of his master. [12] The cultural identity of negro was discarded, as well as their values, traditions and beliefs totally ignored, disqualifying them as citizens of the society to which they belonged. The African race was considered immoral, not human [13], treated as a single

[11] COSTA, Emília Viotti da. Da Monarquia à República: momentos decisivos. 3ed. Editora Brasiliense, 1985.p.236

[12] Jose Bonifacio did not agree with the thingification of the slave, stripped of all their natural rights, arguing that the right to property has been sanctioned "for the good of all," it is not lawful for any person to subtract the human condition and liberties of others, condemning them to a "vileness and misery without end." In: SILVA, José Bonifácio de. Projetos para o Brasil. Organização: Miriam Dolhnikoff, São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1998. p.61. Other hand the reason coupled with common sense pointed to him the necessity of developing a performance of inclusion. Aware of barriers political, economic and social implications for an immediate freeing of slaves, granting him the privileges of citizens, planned a gradual emancipation while they envisioned the gradual entry of the ex - slave market economics, teaching him to deal with finances. As an incentive, advocated the establishment of banks in the provinces in order to save income received. In: SILVA, José Bonifácio de. Projetos para o Brasil. Organização: Miriam Dolhnikoff, São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1998. p.48-49

[13] In the legislative session of the day September 30, 1823 Congressman France opined favorably to the gradual release of slaves, remained opposed to the abolition by considers it an offense to the supreme law of the "salvation of the state" by understanding that conduct an affront to property private third party, as much as it presented an obstacle to the expansion of agriculture. Adds to the delicate situation in understanding the deputy, the fact insert in society "a bunch of men who have left the captivity, barely may be guided by the principles of freedom and understood" In: Annaes do Parlamento Brazileiro – Assembleia Constituinte de 1823 – Tomo Quinto. Rio de Janeiro:Typographia de object of sale. "The great argument of the slave was property rights, was the 'partus sequitur ventrem' of livestock. The humanity of the slave disappeared: he was animalistic as any other animal that the owner is entitled to offspring." [14]

This appropriation of the slave as something that can be sold - degraded condition his human nature - exceeded the economic sector and linked, reflexively, the social context. In this, the slaves were heavily marginalized, excluded from social circle ascending at the time, responsible for the organization of national political life. "Negros was naturally segregated in a social system that offered them few economic opportunities, excluded them from political participation and where the rise in the social scale was possible only when authorized by the white elite."[15]

Justified this conduct in the alleged immorality, irrationality and bestiality race as purposely appointed, whose coexistence with whites would grant civility required, especially on the moral point of view. Considered a race devoid of the minimum required for a healthy living and devoid of intelligence and knowledge, formed a separate segment in society.

To explain about the mulattos, Emilia Viotti [16] inserts them into a category other than those of blacks, explaining its origin miscegenation between whites and blacks formed mostly by the sons of masters to slaves. "The Brazilian elite had a tolerant attitude opposite to miscegenation, and the owner of slaves rarely Brazilian ashamed to acknowledge their descendants mulatto and ensure them manumission." Thus, the mulattos reached more easily upward mobility, but this mobility was within the boundaries imposed by the dominant group, "through a system of patronage and clientele."

Analyzing the condition of the Indians noticed your reality widely conflicting therefore raised a critical issue for national sovereignty: land ownership. The territory for this race is their livelihood and self-determination, a mechanism for transmission of affirmation and habits, religious beliefs and socio-political rules, hence, their physical and cultural survival depends on the locus in which they live. The indigenous population in 1500 was estimated at between 800.000 to 10 million in-

---

Hyppolito José Pinto & Cia, 1876. p. 205.

[14] PEREIRA, Batista. Figuras do Império e outros Ensaios. 3ed. São Paulo. Editora Nacional, vol. I. p.51

[15] COSTA, Emília Viotti da. Op. Cit. 1985.p.240.

[16] Ibidem

dividuals. After three centuries, these companies have lost significant amount of members [17] due to forced colonization of the tribes beyond the hegemonic appropriation of their lands.

The Portuguese did not respect their identity, their different mode of existence, or the authority before their land. There was great indigenous resistance during the period, however, they were defeated by both the military and by the Portuguese and unknown diseases brought by indigenous immune system. The remaining indigenous slavery remained, and this labor was dispensed after the arrival of the black African.

European elite, imprisoned blacks, Indians extinct or marginalized. It is worth noting the coexistence of these peoples as distinct within the same territory. Stigmatized as above, the multicultural training of Brazilian identity was extremely unevenly. We determined that since the beginning of colonization "the imposition and oppression of a culture that wanted hegemonic"[18] materialized as it was imposed the cultural homogenization process in Brazil. Indians and blacks were seen - by white Europeans - as barbarians, impure, inferior, a regression of human civilization. This ethnocentric view that underlay slavery black and indigenous, served as a vector for assimilationist policy that prevailed between society evolved and the backward people, mainly promoting cultural integration between the Indians and the other segments of society. Several justifications were found to legitimize this ownership policy, one of the most widespread is the patriarch of independence Jose Bonifácio de Andrada e Silva.

Plural society of José Bonifácio De Andrada E Silva

> "Man sows a thought and reap an action, sow an act and reap a habit. Sow a habit and reap character. Sow a character and reap a destiny. "[19]

[17] "It is worth mentioning that there was not only reduced the population of these people, but also, and primarily, a significant decrease in cultural diversity, and hence, beliefs, cultures, traditions, customs, resulting in significant injury to these populations". SPAREMBERGER, Raquel Fabiana Lopes. Op. Cit. p.128.

[18] KRETZMANN, Carolina Giordani; SPAREMBERGER, Raquel Fabiana Lopes. Antropologia, Multiculturalismo e Direito: o reconhecimento da identidade das comunidades tradicionais no Brasil. Cap. 5. p.97. In: COLAÇO, Thais (org). Elementos de Antropologia Jurídica. Florianópolis: Conceito Editorial, 2008.

[19] SIVANANDA, Swami. Concentração e Meditação. Tradução Zilda H. Schild Silva.

Unravel the work of Jose Bonifácio[20] and its rich contribution to the historical setting - Brazilian politician, representing the rescue anthology of ideas that took root over the years, whose reverberate today. His iconic figure is the reference when it proposes to examine the independence of Brazil. [21]The political emancipation of this country was formally on September 7, 1822 [22] and had the strongly influence the Andrada that, this time, witnessed each resolution policy rising.

The cornerstone of their ideology and political action was the conservation of the Brazilian territory [23] tied to a culturally homogeneous society, which would guarantee a reduction in internal disparities.

The dichotomous character of Bonifacio can be quickly unveiled having in mind your goals. Its relevance permeated the conservative defense of constitutional monarchy and hereditary form of government, "under the pretext that the monarchical power was unifying par excellence and only able to save the national unity in a country divided by infighting and threatened secession." [24] The patriarch of independence disliked the extremes of the republic - the writings of French heritage

---

11ª edição. Pensamento, 2001.

[20] In the words of historian Emilia Viotti Jose Bonifacio was "the son of one of the most representative families of Santos (the fortune of his father was considered the second city), and, like most young people of his time, completed his studies in Portugal, returning to Brazil with 56 (fifty six) years of age, bringing all your ideal liberal / conservative, who managed the balance required for the maturation of a sovereign nation that was beginning to develop. In: Costa, Emilia Viotti da. Op. Cit. 1985.p.56.

[21] "Our independence was due undoubtedly to Jose Bonifacio de Andrada e Silva [...] honored in the cultural world as the land of the crib and was undeniably who transformed the colony in a sovereign nation." In: PEREIRA, Batista. Figures Empire and other Essays. 3ed. São Paulo. Editora Nacional, vol. I. p.103.

[22] It is unison among historians understanding that brazilian emancipation began with the arrival of the Portuguese crown to its American colony, because to allow her stay with minimal infrastructure and comfort, was forced to break the shackles of colonial servitude, bringing administrative and political expansion to Brazilian soil, generating economic development that would become "incompatible with the colonial status". In: JÚNIOR, Caio Prado. Evolução política do Brasil e outros estudos. São Paulo: Editora Brasiliense, 1980.p.48.

[23] "It can be similarly credited to the action of Jose Bonifacio part of the effort that would result in the consolidation of the Brazilian territory as we know it today." ANJOS, João Alfredo dos. José Bonifácio, primeiro Chanceler do Brasil. Brasília: Fundação Alexandre de Gusmão, 2007.p.21.

[24] COSTA, Emília Viotti da. Op. Cit.,1985.p.132

Benjamin Constant[25] - as universal suffrage, considering that national representation should be coming from the good choice, never the quality coming from the mass population. This European liberal, belonging to the Brazilian elite doubted the intellectual capacities of Indians, Negros[26] - whether slave or free - and mestizos uncivilized, targeting a government of men endowed with wisdom and honesty, which is: a constitutional monarchy with representative exclusion popular vote.[27]

His liberal facet is evidenced mainly by the insistence on structuring a constitution which braked the excesses of absolutism, ensuring the balance of government and their struggle for gradual emancipation of slaves and the assimilation of Indians.

His conviction form the Brazilian nation has found significant impediment to the existence of different people within the same territory[28], dealing from the outset, with a plural and no tradition absorption differences for the formation of the personality of the citizen society.

---

[25] Benjamin Constant was recognized by considering democracy when exercised distorted becomes the object of despotism. Having suffered direct influence of the French Revolution, developed his theory by analyzing the performance of Robespierre in his ontological work policy principles applicable to all governments. In: CONSTANT. Benjamin. Princípios de política aplicáveis a todos os governos. Tradução: Joubert de Oliveira Brízida. Rio de Janeiro: Topbooks, 2007, p.104.

[26] Bonifacio regarded the slave "ignorant, lazy, proud and rebellious" and enslaving an expensive undertaking, because the expenses of land acquisition, instruments, maintenance of the slave with clothing, food, diseases and countless trails for Quilombo, ended up encumber the cost of crop reducing their profit. Pondered, however, the inability to remove them from captivity and immediately insert them in the society, for which he defended in his representation to the General Constituent and Legislative Assembly of the Empire of Brazil on Slavery, emancipation gradual, creating conditions assimilates him, instructing him, providing conditions for adaptability and civilizing him through contact with whites. In: SILVA, José Bonifácio de. Op. Cit.,1998. p.58.

[27] COSTA, Emília Viotti da. Op. Cit.,1985.p.70. In a passage of this book Boniface asserts: "It had been the first to thunder against the perfidy of the Portuguese Courts, the first to preach the" Independence and freedom from Brazil ", but a fair and sensible freedom, under the tutelage of forms" Constitutional Monarchy "single system, he said," t*hat could save united and solid and unbroken this majestic piece of social architecture, from the Silver to the Amazon"* p. 92.

[28] As a legacy of the colonial period, Brazil had before him, in the speech of a Santista statesman, great racial and cultural heterogeneity, formed by a largely ignorant population composed mostly of blacks and mestizos, the largest slave party and whites Europeans and Jews, in addition to the indigenous. SILVA, José Bonifácio de Andrada. Op. Cit.,1988. p. 20-21.

The territorial unit depended on certain homogeneity that implied the perpetuation of a nation within the same territory, a people with the same culture[29]. It was necessary to adapt the models to other peoples of the more evolved, in other words, the parameters of the Brazilian elite that sported the necessary configuration as idealized Brazilian citizen virtues. Nabuco in his book The Abolition asserts that "the vision of Bonifácio - and revolutionaries of 1817 - was the social integration of independent Brazil, which could only occur with the abolition of slavery [...]"[30], and the integration of indigenous. [31]

The first chancellor of Brazil [32] clearly segregated the Portuguese culture of black and indigenous cultures - a reasonable thought at the time. The difference in their policy, which had a mention in this matter, understand how to deal with these disparities - which must be interpreted in light of their concerns with the territorial unity and cultural heterogeneity.

His vision of the slave coincided with other contemporary opinions, what is the perception that they were "brutal and immoral" things [...] "miserable captives", however this condition - in the opinion of Andrada - was arising from slavery, which is constituted in both cancer ravaged Brazil, moreover, this did not remove the human nature of the existence of black. [33] Bonifacio, protecting order and territorial [29] The construction of Brazilian identity followed the same steps as the formation of Occidental universality, fruit of the Greco-Roman influence, which absorbed the Jewish and Christian culture that did not accept cultural diversity. More about the universal vision of universality in JULIEN, François. O diálogo entre as culturas. Trad. André Telles. Rio de Janeiro: Zahar, 2010.

[30] Nabuco, Joaquim (1988). O Abolicionismo. Recife. Editora Massangana.p.55 a 57.

[31] Bonifacio recognized the challenge he met ahead, considering it "easier to propagate the lights and increasing wealth in Brazil to tackle the difficulties that oppose because of race and slavery, its residents are social with each other, and look like brothers and fellow citizens". In: SILVA, José Bonifácio de. Op. Cit., 1998. p.184.

[32] To João Alfredo dos Anjos, "rare are those who realize that Jose Bonifacio de Andrada e Silva was the first Chancellor of Brazil". ANJOS, João Alfredo dos. Op. Cit..p.15 unit, feared a revolution or turmoil these people could result in "future political convulsions" [34] and / or breakdown of the territory, a threat to the status quo. Then suggest a slow and gradual emancipation[35] these in order to convert them peacefully in free, fair and virtuous men, through the gradual abolition of catechisms, education, through contact with whites, among others. For Andrada, the human nature of black existed, however, should be liberated and emancipated in order to obtain a civilized people, adequate templates for the season.

[33] "But say perhaps that favor freedom of the slaves will attack property. Do not deceive yourselves, gentlemen, the property was passed for the good of all, and what the good that he takes the slave to lose all their rights natives, and become one of the thing, in the phrase of Jurists? Not because he property law, who want to defend, he's right force, because the man cannot be thing, could not be owned. If the law should defend property, much must defend personal liberty of men, which cannot be owned by anyone without attack rights of Providence, which made them free men, not slaves; attack without the moral order of society that he the strict enforcement of all duties prescribed by nature, religion, and by

Concerning the Indians the same policy was adopted. The document "Notes for the civilization of the wild Indians of the Empire of Brazil" written in 1823, portrays this theme. "It is, in short, a program of assimilation and socialization of the 'angry' indigenous population through methods 'soft'. [36]

Bonifacio corroborates in this document, the 'savage' indigenous state, but - as in the case of blacks - he strongly said that even before this early stage, these men were equipped with the "natural heat of reason"[37], in other words, the ability to emancipate itself. Therefore, the duty would deploy a civilizational project that approached the appropriate parameters at the time, which they are the modes of the elite, that way, indigenous peoples should be socialized in the same way that blacks would be: "by using the method 'soft', which included a very wide range of actions, such as education, labor, agriculture, commerce, socializing with whites, intermarriage among others."[38]

Again, human nature is recognized, but the acceptance of differ-

---

intact policy. " SILVA, José Bonifácio de Andrada e. Representação Geral Constituinte e Legislativa do Império do Brasil sobre a Escravatura. 1823.

[34] UEMORI, Celso Noboru. Escravidão, nacionalidade e "mestiços políticos". In: < www.pucsp.br/ neils/ downloads/v11_12_Celso.pdf> Date: 08/06/2013.p.2

[35] "The adoption of measures, effective immediately, to end slavery could lead to the reaction of slaveholding elites and possible social and territorial disintegration. Hence his protection of adopting measures for the gradual abolition of the slave trade and slavery. "ANJOS, João Alfredo dos. Op. Cit..295.

[36] MOREIRA, Vânia. Indianidade, territorialidade e cidadania no período pós-Independência – Vila de Itaguaí – 1822- 1836. In: <www.ufrrj.br/graduacao/PEThistoria/arquivos_PET/seminarios/Indianidade, territorialidade e cidadania no período pós-Independência - Vila de Itaguaí, 1822-1836.pdf>. Date: 08/06/2013.p.4.

[37] SILVA, José Bonifácio de Andrada e. Apontamentos para a civilização dos índios bravos do Império do Brasil. In: CALDEIRA, Jorge (org.), José Bonifácio de Andrada e Silva. São Paulo: Ed. 34.p. 183-199.

[38] MOREIRA, Vânia. Op. Cit..p.5

ence is ignored and subjugated. The innovation presented by andradino program is directed to the indigenous, in other words, the rights of the Indians, especially the territorial rights that belonged to them, what disliked much of the ambitious agrarian elite.

It is clear, in this context, that the scenario envisioned by Bonifacio is based on a widespread ideal at the time: the theme about the evolution of civilizations along time. His persistence in the assimilation of blacks and indigenous people by European culture - civilized - demonstrates a denial of the rights of these people, the non-acceptance of their identities. Equality emphasized by the proposed pervaded the consideration of ethnic diversity as inferiority to be overcome through the emancipation of these ethnic groups, the integration into the national community. This is clearly the affirmation of integration paradigm that dominated this period, especially about the Indians.[39] This model affirms the inferior condition of the Indian and the need to emancipate them, or better, civilize them. The conclusion that can be expected is that after completion of the integration, the Indians would not be recognized as inferior, but also would not be considered Indians. In this perspective, to be considered civilized and able to participate in the national sociopolitical scenario should relinquish its historical-cultural identity and to accept and internalize a new culture, which showed hegemonic, the only effective solution to a future worthy of a men human. [40]

Until then these communities would not get the privilege to be a part of the population who actively participated in the national political scene, thus, to evolve, would not be recognized as citizens.

---

[39] Bonifácio Bonifacio advocated as the primary form of inclusion of Indian miscegenation, seeking consecration of "cultural homogeneity", using the white race as "civilizing instrument."In: SILVA, José Bonifácio de. Op. Cit., 1998. p.23

[40] According to the Representation of Civilization wild Indians of Brazil, Andrada betting on catechesis as more fruitful integration of the Indian middle therefore confer a sense of morality through a Christian education, enjoying the good temper of the Jesuits. Because of the intense appeal of this evangelizing figure, took painstaking care to have selection criteria and training of missionaries who, in turn, relied on military aid to make themselves respected, settling in the vicinity of villages "small military prisons" also advocated the establishment of "cash sink economy" so they could save money perhaps gain work done. Humanitarian tonic bonifacianos permeated the writings that bothered even with questions about hygiene and feeding time. SILVA, José Bonifácio de. Op. Cit. 1998.

Formation of identity of the constitutional subject in Brazilian constitutionalism

> "Before ask us what we do to the discovery of this diversity of cultures, it is important to understand what it means and you capture the multiple roots. And it's not as easy as it looks unreservedly accept the assertion that, in the backdrop of our modernity, in the layers that underlie our culture, there is a competition, one primordial controversy, which conditions any consciousness of what history has made of us. The story generated in multiple and diverse: this awareness should be increased to the extent that it becomes extreme embarrassment, no apparent output." [41]

Preliminarily fit placement Maria Fernanda Salcedo Repolês that the construction of the identity of the constitutional subject is a process that requires maturity, especially when we are dealing with a democratic state, "in which the 'space' of identity presents counterfactually empty and where the incompleteness is no longer seen as a problem but as a guarantee of recognition of pluralism "[42] as part of a dialogical movement.

Analyzing the formation of that national identity in the European and Latin perspective, José Luiz Quadros de Magalhaes reports that she should legitimize the exercise of sovereign power, may not allow the exclusion and sealing the exclusive identification of that with an internal ethnic group. In the case of Brazil, we talked about the impossibility of an inclusive identification of white Europeans and local aristocracy over the natives and Africans. QUADROS [43] warns that "different groups of pre-existing national state to identify conflicts or may not create insurmountable barriers of communication, as threaten the continued recognition of the power and territory of this new sovereign state." However, in Brazil there was no acceptance of multiculturalism, ethnic diversity to the consolidation of their identity which, even in the words of the author, the creation of a "nationality (set of identity values)" was forged "over identities (or we can talk even nationalities) pre - existing "common values indiscriminately imposing, overwhelming self-determination of others and generating ideology of intolerance and" denial of diversity. "

[41] RICOUER, Paul. As culturas e o tempo. Tradução Gentil Titton.Petrópolis: Vozes, 1975.p.15

[42] REPOLÊS, Maria Fernanda Salcedo. Quem deve ser o guardião da Constituição? Do Poder moderador ao Supremo Tribunal Federal. Belo Horizonte: Mandamentos, 2008. p. 30.

[43] MAGALHÃES, José Luiz Quadros de. O Estado plurinacional na América latina. In: http://joseluizquadrosdemagalhaes.blogspot.com.br/2011/04/302-artigos-o-estado-plurinacional-na.html. Date: 19/07/2013.

The Brazilian Constitution of 1824 was who corroborated with the most widespread beliefs about this time the Indians and slaves. In truth, its omission with respect to this group revealed that the political positioning apparatus adhered, generating deep gap on the recognition of citizenship of minorities, forgetting the fruitful discussions of the Constituent 1823 on the entry of those as subjects of rights.

The concept of citizenship in the constitution was used polysemous, both assigned to what is known today as national citizenship itself. Speeches presented in the legislative sessions of the Constituent 1823 on Article 5 of the Constitution Project are precious teachings on the rights arising nationality in that sense, encompassing both the situation of foreign residents in the country after independence, the slaves and natives.

In this context, understanding transcribed by Congressman Mr. France, expressing the thinking of most political presents:

> "We can not fail to make this difference or division of Brazilian and Brazilian citizens. According to the quality of our people, the children of blacks, Creoles captives, are born in the territory of Brazil, but Brazilians are not yet citizens. We should make this difference: the Brazilian is born in Brazil, and Brazilian citizen is one who has civil rights. The Indians who live in the woods are Brazilian, and yet are not Brazilian citizens, while not embracing our civilization". [44]

The two ethnic groups were framed "in the condition of Brazilians, born in Brazil" [45], however the treatment of black citizens were denied to the ground purposely exposed, namely, the perception of the constituents, as well as the majority of the active population in politics , that slaves were property, properties, for which it was not for the will itself, in other words, self-determination, beyond the certainty that they were unprepared for the exercise of legal acts of life - were not civilized. This excuse especially tied freedmen.

[44] Annaes do Parlamento Brazileiro – Assembleia Constituinte de 1823 – Tomo Quinto. Rio de Janeiro:Typographia de Hyppolito José Pinto & Cia, 1876. p. 166. Discussões mais aprofundadas podem ser observadas nos anais da Constituinte, em especial os tomos quinto e sexto.

[45] Ibidem

Regarding the non-recognition of Indians as citizens ranged before the reason given for the black slaves and can be better identified in politics developed in the First Reign. Maria Hilda states that "[...] there was a pre-condition to pass the simple condition for Brazilian citizens: to cease to forestry, in the narrower sense of the term, in other words, residents of the jungles, and 'embrace our civilization. '"[46]

It follows from this statement the distinction made by the constituents in the state among the Indians 'savage' and now 'civilized'. The causes found to motivate such differentiation were that primitive natives did not recognize the authority of the Brazilian government, were not connected to society nor shared degree of civility of said Brazilian citizens before it, could not be recognized as such. [47]

The Aboriginals already emancipated, or rather civilized, remained the recognition of citizenship[48], this was ensured with the corresponding charges, as the payment of "jurisdiction to remain in the lands of the imperial farm, like everyone else in the same position and quality." [49]

---

[46] Ibidem

[47] Again we employ the rich arguments of liberals 1823, highlighting the speech by congresses Montesuma in the session on Sept. 23: "(...) I take care of but they do not treat here are the Brazilian society, we speak of subjects of the Empire of Brazil, the only ones who enjoy the cozy of our society, and suffer his troublesome, they have rights and obligations in the social pact, the state constitution. But the Indians are outside the pale of our society. are not subjects of the empire, not recognize, nor by consequence its authorities from the first to the last, living in open war with us, they cannot possibly have rights because they have neither recognize even the simplest duties (I speak of not domesticated) as follows: consider them as Brazilian citizens? How considers them political and own sense of a constitution? ".In: Annaes do Parlamento Brazileiro – Assembleia Constituinte de 1823 – Tomo Quinto. Rio de Janeiro:Typographia de Hyppolito José Pinto & Cia, 1876. p. 166.

[48] The Indian policy of the First Empire demonstrates a clear willingness to consider the Indians 'citizens', since they were classified as civilized. PARAISO, Maria Hilda. Construindo o Estado da Exclusão: os índios brasileiros e a Constituição de 1824. In: Revista CLIO_ Revista de Pesquisa Histórica. Volume 28.2. ISSN 0102-9487. In: www.revista.ufpe.br/revistaclio/index.php/revista/article/viewfile/122/89>. Date: 08/06/2013.p.10

[49] Ordinance, 9th September,1824, In: Joaquim Norberto de Souza e Silva (1854: 413).

Is worth noting that besides the individualistic concept of citizenship in this period was linked directly to the right of property, which also represented the rights to liberty and equality, and maintaining close connection with legal status, in other words, the exercise of rights under the law, which did not include factual situations or the preservation of collective interests.

In this perspective, analyzing the 1824 Constitution, shall see that the condition of civilized was not the only one that prevented the Indians from exercising its active and passive citizenship. The most representative was the obstacle character census to vote and be voted. This indeed was the greatest instrument found to marginalize populations, which would be appropriate not to the standards imposed by the definition of a citizen at the time. By this criterion, actively participated in the political scene those who had equal or greater equity to the constitutionally provided for. Thus, even though the Indians were already adapted to social life, they would have no means to achieve such fortune, since social mobility was subject to the trainees and excesses of the elite.

The identity of the constitutional subject was forged within the social exclusion of minorities, on the argument regimentation of a nation that could not rely on men or wild recently - coming out of the political wilderness to form their cores. They knew, however, that these individuals should be absorbed gradually, under penalty of future breakup.

Although jettisoned citizenship rights, they would fit the silent cultural influence, the intellectual awakening the inconvenience caused by slavery and economic embarrassment generated by freedmen. Forming large population segment, looked slowly from involving themselves in the society that mitigated them, and made themselves heard.

Wolkmer reminds us that the constitution should be a resultant of forces that battled in a particular historical moment, should express plurality, materializing "a form of power that is legitimized by cohabitation and coexistence of divergent views, diverse and participatory." [50]

In this context, a new formulation of national identity, respecting the open pluralism and reworking the progress, was the answer to prophesy voices that the abolition of slavery would lead to the disman-

---

Maria Hilda, citing Joaquim Norberto emphasizes that he considered it more of a low blow against the Indians, their heritage and their rights, as they were being forced to pay for the land received from King John VI. PARAISO, Maria Hilda. Op. Cit.10

[50]WOLKMER, Antônio Carlos. Pluralismo e Crítica do Constitucionalismo na América Latina". Anais do IX Simpósio Nacional de Direito Constitucional.p.144

tling of a nation. The Brazilian Constitutionalist movement gained new momentum with the opening to the rereading of citizenship and needs to be formally recast.

As seen, beyond the integrationist character which pervaded thinking about cultural differences, the monetary criterion also concerned as an obstacle to the widespread reach of the nascent political participation. To erase the discriminatory past, the Brazilian constitutionalism suffered major changes over time, adapting to the most persistent demands in society. The retrograde paradigms were dismantled, and instead, shone forth new thoughts, which mainly mark the beginning of the respect and praise of cultural differences. This means that multiculturalism was not analyzed only from the ethnocentric criteria, is also recognized in the sense of otherness, of difference.

Ethnic groups, in the words of Adriana Biller Aparicio [51], formerly subjugated by hegemonic community today plead for the right to be different, "the recognition of its otherness and the right to live it freely." Author advocates said that "the new social movements in Brazil have historically been to bring 'depreciated' public scene by subject slave and elitist social order." These voices began simmering in the twentieth century, reverberating in the 1934 Constitution with political and ideological pluralism, were heard by the current Constitution, in other words the Citizen Constitution.[52]

After centuries of oppression and subjugation cultural movements decided to fight for recognition of their identities[53], publicly exposing claims that permeated the assertion of ethnic and cultural pluralism, popular participation in the political sector and equal rights as collateral for the difference, because as Aparicio "[...] the struggle of ethnic-cultural identity movements there is a demand that does not necessarily require a change in the cultural identity of 'the other'."[54]

---

[51] APARÍCIO, Op. Cit. p.80.

[52] To Menelick de Carvalho Netto "the legitimacy of the 1988 comes from its process of democratic, open and participatory drafting the Constitution," noting that supervening changes should observe the same procedure as a way of maintaining such popular acceptance. In: CATTONI, Marcelo. Poder Constituinte e Patriotismo Constitucional. Belo Horizonte: Mandamento, 2006. p.25.

[53] Emphasizes Wolkmer not be tradition in Latin America producing constitutions of liberal imprint, given rigorously "the needs of its major social groups, such as indigenous nations, african-American populations, the masses of peasants and agrarian Multiple urban movements". WOLKMER, Op. Cit. p.147.

[54] APARÍCIO. Op. Cit. p.81.

The performance of these social groups gained strength and solidity in the period of drafting the current constitution. Aparicio confirms that:

> "The ethnic-cultural movements were united in the popular movements called 'democratic reinvention'. Obtained, in turn, the success of crowning the Federal Constitution ethnic-cultural pluralism in the formation of the Brazilian government, which had hitherto operated with the 'myth of racial democracy' legislatively. "[55]

The 1988 Constitution has met formally to the demands of these groups, and ethnic aspect, indigenous peoples and african descent gained prominence. In this area, guaranteed "the full exercise of cultural rights" and protected "the expressions of popular, indigenous and african-Brazilian cultures, and other groups participating in the national civilizing process" (art. 215), and recognize the goods immaterial nature - as the identity, the action, the memory of the various groups of Brazilian society - as constituents of Brazilian cultural heritage (art.216).

To black people - abolished slavery in 1888 - had guaranteed ownership of the lands they possessed, locus of physical and cultural existence of these people - maroon remaining in article 68 of the Temporary Constitutional Provisions Act.

To the Indians had been destined a whole chapter - Chapter VIII - recognizing these peoples' social organization, customs, languages, beliefs and traditions, and the rights to the lands they traditionally occupy "(art.231).

In this perspective, officially become the new definition of citizenship, which will guarantee individual rights, now ensures the inclusion of new groups in the sociopolitical context.

So, based on what was stated here, in this period there was a break with the integrative paradigm - that both excludes these people - and gave rise to the paradigm is called interaction, which advocates self-determination of peoples, abandoning the domination of those considered inferior; ensures respect for difference and promotes the recognition of customs, languages, beliefs and traditions of these groups, in addition to ensuring the legitimacy of their identities. In this sense, it is an instrument of awareness of the true meaning of seeing and understanding the other. In the beautiful sayings of Sparemberger:

[55] Ibidem, p.85.

> "In a world of constant challenges and institutions, legislation and, especially, individuals need to overcome intolerance, prejudice and live with diversity. Accept such realities is to know our own history, because we are her fruit, and there is no way not to consider it. " [56]

States where minorities are perceived in the formation of citizen identity, with its sheltered effected in the constitution and civil rights, build a democracy not only representative, but participatory and especially dialogue [57]. The ideal, however, need to be realized, and this is one of the major challenges in Letter 88: provide "answers to the height of the text, which satisfy the unmistakable gaps ranging from formal constitution the full experience of the democratic rule of law" [58], including regarding the implementation of the inclusion of minorities in all levels.

We bring forth reflection if the formal devices of the 1988 Constitution allowed the formation of a plurinational state [59], entering in this context, including legal pluralism in the sources of law are not only extracted the state, but rather "a complex and diffuse of powers system, emanating dialectically society " [60], in the event screen, Indians and black people.

In Brazil we mention, by way of example, the judgment of the Indian Benkaroty Kayapo, known as Paulinho Paiakan, accused along with his wife for committing a rape [61]. At the time, the crime that brought

---

[56] SPAREMBERGER, Raquel Fabiana Lopes. Op. Cit., p.152.

[57] MAGALHÃES, José Luis Quadros. In: http://joseluizquadrosdemagalhaes.blogspot.com.br/2010/08/teoria-do-estado-10.html. Date: 18/07/2013.

[58] HORTA, José Luiz B. História, Constituições e Reconstitucionalização do Brasil. Revista Brasileira de Estudos Políticos, v. 94, p. 121-155, 2006.

[59] Wolkmer makes interesting placement that beyond the creation of a multidimensional state, must think of a design for a multicultural society, with practices of "judicial egalitarian pluralism (coexistence of various statutory bodies in the same hierarchy)", culminating in the so-called Andean or indigenous constitutionalism. Highlights that the Constitution of 1988, by establishing political pluralism in its article 1, section V, raised the level of understanding previously thought about the conceptualization of this plural society, because it was based on "coexistence and interdependence of various social groups (special minority , social movements, non-governmental organizations, etc..), despite their differences and their diversity as the beliefs, values and practices.WOLKMER, Antônio Carlos. Pluralismo e Crítica do Constitucionalismo na América Latina". Anais do IX Simpósio Nacional de Direito Constitucional p. 145 e 151.

[60]WOLKMER, Antônio Carlos. Op. Cit., p 145.

[61] HC 9403 (1999/0040887-0 - 18/10/1999) – Superior Tribunal de Justiça

the discussion about the proper legislation to be adopted in casu the Statute of the Indian - also blowing the controversy over a probable indigenous jurisdiction, when they were questioned about their integration into civilized society.[62]

Conclusion

The construction of the identity of Brazilian constitutional subject dates back to the dawn of civilization of our country, when the Indians who lived here have developed their culture, forming habits within their own needs, populating the territorial vastness with the simplicity and rusticity peculiar to indigenous. The first culture shock came through contact with other customs from other shores, more developed, currently interested in the Portuguese, the Spanish, the British and the French. Permeates across the habits developed by other people and their traditions, as European, Jewish, African, etc.., Which through the period of territorial expansion in Europe, crossed the Brazilian soil in this period for the colonization.

Thus, the results of this syncretism, new values were aggregated into Brazilian society still in training. The form of colonization of Brazil led to an individualist scenario, both from a political and anthropological perspective, which only worsened the diversity, whose context was only subject to firm when assessing the independence of the Portuguese yoke and construction of the National State, which had as pillars of their identity formation of the constitutional subject.

In such circumstances we point out the figure of the statesman of the city of Santos, Jose Bonifacio de Andrada e Silva, along with his brothers, had great influence on political thought of the Empire of Brazil. The Patriarch of Independence, with its liberal ideas of the European School of revolutionary dies and even Republicans, brought the ideal of reconciliation of crops in order to state unity, however disrespecting differences and imposing racial ethos of the European way of life. Proposed a gradual emancipation of African slaves, so he could go through the acculturation process; already the Indian, since civilized, might have secured the minimum rights to exercise their citizenship.

[62] Why consider it fully integrated "to white culture being elected, with license to drive a motor vehicle operator with financial institutions, etc.. demonstrating unequivocally perfect understanding of the facts ", was tried by ordinary courts, according dichotomy of Precedent 140 from STJ. In: HC 9403 (1999/0040887-0 - 18/10/1999) – Superior Tribunal de Justiça.

Needless to say that the Constitution of 1824, serving particularistic interests, not allowed to release, even partially black people, because their labor was still needed on the farms of those who have subsidized independence. However, had been the civilized Indian citizen guaranteed certain rights. The paradigm of Bonifacio was born retrograde, but met the temporary demands of the nation. As soon as these needs have suffered arising mutation of time, the model proposed by Andrada was overcome, and since then trend, mainly in Latin - American countries, forging the identity of the constitutional subject in an integrated manner, however, in antagonism to the format designed by Bonifacio, make possible and encourages the coexistence of cultural diversities without overpowering.

Although still have a long way to go, the 1988 Constitution has in its framework respect the self-determination of peoples, with special treatment to Indian, enabling the free cultural event and the safeguarding of essential rights, also dispensing special care to communities quilombolas. Some Latin countries, whose most prominent lies with to Bolivia, see the model of the Plurinational State the effectiveness of this format that recognizes the multicultural identities within a legal-political order.

References

ANJOS, João Alfredo dos. José Bonifácio, primeiro Chanceler do Brasil. Brasília: Fundação Alexandre de Gusmão, 2007. 424p.

Annaes do Parlamento Brazileiro – Assembleia Constituinte de 1823 – Tomo Quarto. Rio de Janeiro:Typographia de Hyppolito José Pinto & Cia, 1876.

Annaes do Parlamento Brazileiro – Assembleia Constituinte de 1823 – Tomo Quinto. Rio de Janeiro:Typographia de Hyppolito José Pinto & Cia, 1876.

APARÍCIO, Adriana Biller. Novos Atores e Movimentos étnico-culturais: Antropologia Jurídica na rota das identidades. Cap. 4. In: COLAÇO, Thais (org). Elementos de Antropologia Jurídica. Florianópolis: Conceito Editorial, 2008.

BARRETTO, Vicente, Ideologia e Política no pensamento de José Bonifácio de Andrada e Silva. Rio de Janeiro: Zahar Editores, 1977.

CARVALHO, André; AHOUAGI, Eliana. OS índios do Brasil. 2ed. Editora Lê. Belo Horizonte, 1991.

CATTONI, Marcelo. Poder Constituinte e Patriotismo Constitucional. Belo Horizonte:Mandamento, 2006.

CHALHOUB, Sidney. Precariedade estrutural: o problema da liberdade no Brasil. In: Revista Eletrônica História Social. São Paulo: 2010.

CONSTANT. Benjamin. Princípios de política aplicáveis a todos os governos. Tradução: Joubert de Oliveira Brízida. Rio de Janeiro: Topbooks, 2007.

COSTA, Emília Viotti da. Da Monarquia à República: momentos decisivos. 3ed. Editora Brasiliense, 1985.

ESTRADA, Joaquim Osório Duque. Hino Nacional Brasileiro.

FONSECA, Ricardo Marcelo. Introdução Teórica à História do Direito. Curitiba:Juruá Editora, 2010.

FRANCO, Afonso Arinos de Melo. Curso de Direito Constitucional Brasileiro vol II. Rio de Janeiro: Forense, 1960.

FRANCO, Afonso Arinos de Melo. O constitucionalismo de D. Pedro I no Brasil e em Portugal. Brasília: Ministério da Justiça, 1994.

HC 9403 (1999/0040887-0 - 18/10/1999) – Superior Tribunal de Justiça

HORTA, José Luiz B. História, Constituições e Reconstitucionalização do Brasil. Revista Brasileira de Estudos Políticos, v. 94.

JULIEN, François. O diálogo entre as culturas. Trad. André Telles. Rio de Janeiro: Zahar, 2010.

KRETZMANN, Carolina Giordani; SPAREMBERGER, Raquel Fabiana Lopes. Antropologia, Multiculturalismo e Direito: o reconhecimento da identidade das comunidades tradicionais no Brasil. Cap. 5. In: COLAÇO, Thais (org). Elementos de Antropologia Jurídica. Florianópolis: Conceito Editorial, 2008.

MAGALHÃES, José Luis Quadros de. http://joseluizquadrosdemagalhaes.blogspot.com.br/2010/08/teoria-do-estado-10.html.

MAGALHÃES, José Luiz Quadros de; AFONSO, Henrique Weil. O Estado Plurinacional da Bolívia e do Equador: matrizes para uma releitura do direito internacional moderno. Revista Brasileira de Direito Constitucional – RBDC n. 17 – jan./jun.2001. p. 263-276.

MAGALHÃES, José Luiz Quadros de. O Estado plurinacional na América latina. Artigo publicado em http://joseluizquadrosdemagalhaes.blogspot.com.br/2011/04/302-artigos-o-estado-plurinacional-na.html.

MARTINS, José de Souza. O Cativeiro da Terra. 4ed. Editora Hucitec. São Paulo, 1990.

MOREIRA, Vânia. Indianidade, territorialidade e cidadania no período pós-Independência – Vila de Itaguaí – 1822- 1836. Disponível em: <www.ufrrj.br/graduacao/PEThistoria/arquivos_PET/seminarios/Indianidade, territorialidade e cidadania no período pós-Independência - Vila de Itaguaí, 1822-1836.pdf

NABUCO, Joaquim (1988). O Abolicionismo. Recife. Editora Massangana.

PARAISO, Maria Hilda. Construindo o Estado da Exclusão: os índios brasileiros e a Constituição de 1824. In: Revista CLIO_ Revista de Pesquisa Histórica. Volume 28.2. ISSN 0102-9487. Disponível em:

www.revista.ufpe.br/revistaclio/index.php/revista/article/viewfile/122/89>.

PEREIRA, Batista. Figuras do Império e outros Ensaios. 3ed. São Paulo. Editora Nacional, vol. I.

REPOLÊS,, Maria Fernanda Salcedo. Quem deve ser o guardião da Constituição? Do Poder moderador ao Supremo Tribunal Federal. Belo Horizonte: Mandamentos, 2008.

RICOUER, Paul. As culturas e o tempo. Tradução Gentil Titton.Petrópolis: Vozes, 1975.

SALGADO, Karine. História, Direito e Razão. In: http://www.conpedi.org.br/manaus/arquivos/anais/manaus/direito_racion_democ_karine_salgado.pdf.

SILVA, José Bonifácio de. Projetos para o Brasil. Organização: Miriam Dolhnikoff, São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1998.

SILVA, José Bonifácio de Andrada e. (2002[1823]). Apontamentos para a civilização dos índios bravos do Império do Brasil. In: CALDEIRA, Jorge (org.), José Bonifácio de Andrada e Silva. São Paulo: Ed. 34

SIVANANDA, Swami. Concentração e Meditação. Tradução Zilda H. Schild Silva. 11ª edição. Pensamento, 2001.

SOLSONA, Gonçal Mayos. Conocimineto cultural e histórico. In: Teoría del Conocimiento, F. Núñez (coord.). Barcelona: UOC, 2007. pp.1-64.

SPAREMBERGER, Raquel Fabiana Lopes. Antropologia e Diferença: quilombolas e indígenas na luta pelo reconhecimento do seu lugar no Brasil dos (des) iguais. Cap. 6. In: COLAÇO, Thais (org). Elementos de Antropologia Jurídica. Florianópolis: Conceito Editorial, 2008.

UEMORI, Celso Noboru. Escravidão, nacionalidade e "mestiços políticos". Disponível em: < www.pucsp.br/ neils/ downloads/v11_12_Celso.pdf>

WOLKMER, Antônio Carlos. Pluralismo e Crítica do Constitucionalismo na América Latina. Anais do IX Simpósio Nacional de Direito Constitucional.

Culturalism and Fundamental Rights

Raoni Bielschowsky

Abstract: This paper has as objective consider about the theoretical basis of fundamentality of fundamental rights. Therefore, first is observed some common answers about the theoretical buildings to insert an right at de dogmatic category of fundamental right. After that, the text defends an axiological-cultural basis, considering the demand to an material and substantive fundamentality.

Keywords: Fundamentality of fundamental rights, substantive fundamentality, anthropological cultural premise.

1. Introduction

Since the end of the II World War the "Constitutional World" has searched for the concepts, arrangements and, principally, for the essence of the constitutional frame that comprehends, represents and answers all the issues and fears that the Terror had made emerge and the Mankind would like to purge.

The major constitutional topics since the 2nd post-War can be basically resumed in two inter-related issues. One regarding the necessity to recognize an unconditional and unavoidable respect to everyone's Human Dignity, by everyone; and another concerning the mechanisms and structures to control and limit the Power. Indeed, these two issues can be well represented by the matters about Fundamental Rights and Democracy; in turn, these two aspects are what the Constitutional Theory calls fundamental principles or essential content or, even, material Constitution. For no other reason, Loewenstein (1976) affirms that the Constitution is the fundamental dispositive to control the Power process.

According to Kägi (2005), recognize the difference between material constitution and formal constitution is an important topic to overcome the juspositivism standpoint – his formalism and his supposed scientificism – by a desirable material constitutional theory. And just with this overcome we can have a more comprehensive and trustworthy Constitutional Theory adequate to the ethical and axiological nowadays State's demands.

It is true this new axiological approach to the Right isn't uniform. Moreover, this moment receives several nomenclatures and is related to a lot of different streams of thoughts and "movements", as the juridical post-positivism, neo-constitutionalism, legal moralism, juridical Culturalism among others. However, this new constitutional moment and status demands a revisit to the basis of this axiological and material essence that fulfills the Right, the Constitutional Right and, particularly, the Fundamental Rights. In this paper, it will be defended all this substance and meanings are grounded on Cultural basis, characterizing the juridical Culturalism, which is inserted in a whole Culturalist standpoint.

A last introductory comment seems necessary. I consider is needed to make an observation considering the English idiom, which the text is written. The issues and considerations here exposed are concerning a Roman-Germanic legal system[1] (continental law, civil law). Some concepts, ideas, definitions and, even, world concepts cannot be precisely described in English as well as would be delineate in continental mother languages, because the common law and the civil law juridical-political reality are quite different. For example, we do not agree that the translation of Rechtsstaat, l'Etat du Droit, Stato di Dirito, Estado de Derecho or Estado de Direito has precisely the same meaning of Rule of Law, the usual translation. They are to different experiences – cultural experiences – truly differents. In fact, the Rechtsstaat's definition is one of the most difficult civil law institutions/experience to translate to English. On this order, "The Rechtsstaat, whether used by Heller or Schmitt, remains the 'state based on the rule of law,' even though Heller and Schmitt bring to it vastly different attitudes and meanings. It is precisely consistency that allows one to map variations in attitude that Weimar theorist had toward their common legal and theoretical heritage" (JACOBSON; SCHILINK 2002). Because that, sometimes it will be use the German term – Rechtsstaat – sometimes it will be used the literally translate in commons – "State of Law".

2. Four questions about the Fundamental Rights

What does make a right a fundamental right? Can be this conditions well answered by its structure/formal establishing? In other words, is the fact that the competent legislator define a right as fundamental that defines the jusfundamentality? Or does this recognition, necessarily, happen on material-axiological basis? Or, in other words, is the content protected by a fundamental right that defines its jusfundamentality? In this order, is there a mandatory relation between the fundamental rights and any objective value? And, following this issue: what means considering jusfundamental a right? Which implications of includes a right in this dogmatic category? Indeed, the answers for all this questions are closely connected and, even, inseparable.

[1] Indeed, even at this point, for example, we would prefer the precise literally meaning of the expression: system of Eight.

There are a lot of responses for all this matters, for example, concerning the fundamental rights Luigi Ferrajoli (2011) proposes four different questions: a) "Which rights shall be (or to be fair) established as fundamental?"; b) "Which rights are stipulated as fundamental norms by a particular juridical order?"; c) "Which rights, for which reasons, through which processes and with which effectiveness degree is stated and are really guaranteed as fundamental in a particular space and at a specified time?"; d) "What is the meaning of legal theory fundamental rights concept?".

According Ferrajoli the answer for any of these questions just considers one particularly aspect. For the first one – "which rights shall be (or to be fair) established as fundamental?" – it is consider only an "axiological point of view of external political philosophy", therefore, it's a normative response. Because of that, the author understands this is not capable to identify a fundamental validation to the Constitutional Theory, much less to the legal dogmatic.

The second answer – to the inquiry "which rights are stipulated as fundamental norms by a particular juridical order?" – just concerns a "legal internal point, binding to the legal science", by a "positive source or legal fundament". In the same way, for Ferrajoli, it would not be enough to the legal theory.

The response to the third question neither regards the legal dogmatic. It looks for a "factually external historiography and sociology viewpoint of law", so, the "point of view of effectiveness", hence, it is an empirical assertive, considering historical background and sociological grounds. From this point, the reasons that determine a right as fundamental are its "historical origin or sociological basis, those civilization's achievements that are consider as fundamental"; its historical affirmation; from struggles and revolutions; and the consequent recognition in many jurisdictions. However, apparently, this perspective would not be enough for the legal doctrine.

At last, the answer to the interrogation: "what is the meaning of legal theory fundamental rights concept?" related to fundamental rights' basis, reason and the theoretical fundament of the definition the concept of "fundamental rights". For Ferrajoli, in his intended ideological neutrality, this is the issue of the legal theory and Theory of Fundamental Rights. Since this point of view, the fundamental rights are all the rights universally attributed to everyone and to each one as person, as citizen, as person capable to acting (FERRAJOLI 2011). To the author, this designation is stipulated or conventional, as other institutes and definitions of legal theory as "subjective right", for instance. Thus, this is also a structural/formal definition because only articulates 'what is the fundamental rights', but not 'which are fundamental rights' or 'what should be the fundamental rights' or 'how the fundamental rights are guaranteed as well'.

3. Culturalist standpoint

Really, these are four questions that, apparently, demand answers from quite different paradigms, but, indeed, only can be well worked and comprehended interdisciplinary.

Actually, the positivism always tends to radically split the known areas, and to isolate the "Legal Science" (Judicial Science, Science of Right, iurisprudentia) from the history, the sociology, the philosophy etc. However, considering the Law (the Right) as a human phenomenon – complex and dynamic – his truly comprehension demands a macro perspective, embracing interdisciplinary approach, as complex as this experience, this object itself.

Undoubtedly, the Fundamental Rights dogmatic category is characterized by a greater juridical-political protection, through a tougher normative authority, generally, marked by an immediate effectiveness, binding the constituted powers. Therefore, these rights tend to generate a harder due legislative processes, even, as entrenchment clauses.

The protections levels and models are not completely uniform in the various constitutional frames, but these elevated defense degrees are typical and, even, characterize of the constitutional model itself.

Bearing this in mid, the important question for the Constitution Philosophy and Theory is: to the Constitutionalism, any good or value can be inserted in the Fundamental Rights dogmatic category?

The juspositivism will respond affirmatively. To this stream, there isn't any pre-state compromise, no axiological or anthropological necessity to the jusfundamentality. A formal structure and a "legitimate" imposition are enough to say that a Right is fundamental, admitting that "any right can be a fundamental right", paraphrasing Kelsen.

However, the fundamental rights dogmatic category concept requires some exclusiveness, some selectivity. After all, if anything can be considered fundamental, indeed, nothing is truly fundamental. Besides that, a merely formal definition is not really capable to comprehend the complex and holistic essence of the juridical order (PEREIRA COUTINHO 2009).

In this line, defending a strictly material basis to the jusfundamentality definition, Paulo Otero (2008) comprehends that by a merely formal and quantitative vision about the fundamental right – in contraposition of a substantive and qualitative dimension – necessarily, it will occur a deflation of the concept of "State of Fundamental Rights"[2]. According the author, if the legislator (constituent or ordinary) was the only competent to recognize a right as fundamental, in thesis, without any compromise or bounding with an axiological north, it would exist the risk to recognize fundamental rights without any link with the "State of Fundamental Rights" essential root: the Human Dignity. Therefore, strict formal definitions could subvert the own fundamental rights' logic, making ta hypothetical fundamental right could have any content, since formally adequate.

Following Paulo Otero, in some ways – at least about the existence of an axiological bound between people will and the human dignity – I understand the legislator is always linked to the constitutionalism's cultural-axiological background, especially important to enunciate the fundamental rights list. In de Rechtsstaat this background is fulfilled by the anthropological ground: the Human Dignity (HÄBERLE 2008).

With this position I am not aligning myself to liberal theory of fundamental rights, as describes Böckenförde (1993). I neither agree with perspectives that intent to fundament the axiological basis on the/a natural law. Indeed, build this validation based on the authority of a dogma, like the jusnaturalist dogma, perhaps – and just perhaps – can justify the content of the Fundamental Rights. However, for sure, this explanation doesn't comprehend the essence of the Right as a human cultural experience[3]. Precisely because the jusnaturalisms – and their transcendental answers – inclines to congeal the values, while the human experience, specially the contemporary society, increasingly complex and dynamic, each day presents new scientific, technological, cultural transformations, which shows more and more goods and needs of different areas of protection (VIEIRA DE ANDRADE 2011).

[2] Estado de direitos fundamentais (OTERO 2008).

[3] To a definition of culture REALE (2002).

Indeed, I comprehend there is an axiological root that identifies and fundaments the fundamental rights on cultural basis, in a historical and dialectical development. It's a dialectical process between constitutional culture and positive law, inherent to the Rechtsstaat existence. In this way, to better understand the fundamental rights SALGADO (1996b) establishes it is necessary observe their development obey a historical process with three moments: a) first, the birth of the historical known of these rights in specifically historical conditions; b) second, the positive declaration of these rights in the constitutional order, representing the formal assenting of all community members; c) and, at last, the concretization and effectiveness of these rights.

Concerning this, we recognize that the Right is the maximum ethical, more precisely, the Right is the maximum ethical from a culture (SALGADO 2007). On this order, it is mandatory comprehend the basis of the Fundamental Rights since and into the Cultural turn and the Culturalism.

The fundamental rights are the apex of the Rechtsstaat's history life and culture. In this same path, Smend defines: "the fundamental rights are the representatives of a concrete value system, of a cultural system that sums the meaning of the State life contained in the Constitution" (SMEND 1985)[4].

And, consisting these Fundamental Rights are the summarize of a State life, in other words, the Fundamental Rights are, exactly, what are vital to a Constitutional Culture, so, they must have a special treatment and a special protection. On this way, they are truly entrenchment clauses to the entire Constitutionalism Culture, and even, a necessary aspect that characterize and recognize a Constitutionalist Normative System. Because it is the material constitution respect that represents a truly Constitutional System, and not the formal constitution.

[4] It's curious that in Constitutional Theory Schmitt follows Smend in this viewpoint, besides has different posterior developments: "Significación histórica y jurídica de la Declaración solemne de derechos fundamentales. La Declaración solemne de derechos fundamentales significa el estabelecimiento de principios sobre los cuales se apoya la unidad política de un pueblo y cuya vigencia se reconoce como el supuesto más importante del surgimiento y formación incesante de esa unidad; el supuesto que – según la expresión de Rudolf Smend – da lugar a la integración de la unidad estatal" (SCHMITT 2011).

So, the respect to the fundamental rights culture is the essence of the Loewenstein's (1976) "ontological" classification of Constitutions, that lists: normative Constitutions; nominative Constitutions; semantic Constitutions. To Loewenstein the classification criterion is de concordance between the constitutional norms and the powers processes' reality. With this, the author affirms the written Constitution doesn't works/happens by itself, but just when its addressees (holders of power and recipients of power) make it for real.

Therefore, the normative Constitution is the one that is the formal and material (axiological) constitutional. While it is alive, lived and defended by the community (LOEWENSTEIN 1976); in other words, when the juridical Constitution has normative force; hence, when a community has a Constitution and is in Constitution (LUCAS VERDÚ 1998).

It is necessary to recognize there is a bunch of values that even the constituent legislator cannot ignore (ALEXY 2009); but, also, it is from the recognition and normative concretization of these values[5] in the normative parameter, by the fundamental rights political identification, it is possible to base the authority and validate/legitimacy of the order that presumes itself constitutional (PEREIRA COUTINHO 2010). In other words, for a "legitimate constitutional order", the normative parameter must be the positivation of this anthropological cultural premise of Rechtsstaat's prototype: the Human Dignity.

This premise is also the axiological base that justifies the democratic frame, considering it the typical political model of the constitutionalism culture. From this ground, it derives the comprehension that the equal freedom (liberty) is the Constitutional Democracy axiological center, as well as, it is its telos. It's an inflexible dimension of good life concept of this culture's ideological plan that fulfill the "Democratic State of Law" (BIELSCHOWSKY 2013). Thus, it is properly to the Constitutionalism's coherence itself, hence the Constitutional Democracy's consistency, that the reasons of a Constitution – maximally, the fundamental rights' motives – do not get on a purely decision or by a blank standard. But, to understand that the base (and/or the Apex) of this structure there is a normative parameter, culturally established and committed to a concrete freedom (SALGADO 1996a). So, it is a needed cultural premise that characterizes the culture of the Constitution itself.

[5] Values that emanate from the moral (cultural) parameter, subjacent to the community.

Therefore, there is a limit of impossible and necessary (ALEXY 2008) to any fundamental right. It must be materially found in the "protection of human dignity against the dangers arising from power structures in society" (VIEIRA DE ANDRADE 2011). And, if in one hand, it is inevitable and necessary to expand the formal-positive list of fundamental rights because the dynamic society processes, in the other hand, the excessive expansion offers the risk of generating a "jusfundamentalism", when the fundamental right concept loses its special characteristics (VIEIRA DE ANDRADE 2011).

Furthermore, a Fundamental Rights' Theory is necessarily linked to a State conception/Theory of Constitution (BÖCKEFÖRDE 1993), which is a culture formulation/projection. Ergo, a Fundamental Rights' Theory also is connected to the community's cultural roots, in its turns, normatively concretized as valid legal norm in/for the State, ruled for its Constitution.

Hence, the fundamental rights are an immediate emanation of the typical occident culture (HORTA 2011). And its jusfundamentality comes from the closeness with the normative parameter, as well, and consequently, because they are necessary and guarantors of the constitutional model. In this line, Salgado (1996b) affirms that the fundamental rights are background to the others; they are rights which without we cannot exercise a lot of other rights; the fundamental rights are the fundament of all the other rights.

Thus, it is understood that the culture of the Rechtsstaat is the culture of freedom (HÄBERLE 2003). To be considered not an atomistic freedom, particularized, selfish or individual, but rather, a concrete and universal freedom (STRECK 2002). A freedom just possible together, in community, recognized as legal norm with validity and in constantly concretization in and by the State. Hence, a freedom parameterized in the equality of all human beings in a common mankind. So, the "Democratic State of Law" in its way to its destiny, which is the Freedom – consequently, a concretely free community –, completes the revolutionary French triad, finding in fraternity the link that allows the concatenation, connection, and especially mutual complementation of the symbols of the Rechtsstaat values: freedom and equality (BIELSCHOWSKY 2013).

In such a way, the fundamental rights must promote and maintain the basic conditions to ensure a quality of life to all equally worthy (CANOSA USERA 2006). And these conditions just can be maintained when the freedom of life in society results guaranteed in equal measure to individual freedom. Both are inseparability correlated. The individual's freedom can only take in a free community, as well the contrary. This freedom presupposes human beings and citizens able and willing to decide for themselves about their own affairs and to work responsibly in society publicly constituted as a community. These are the structure and function of fundamental rights: guarantee the subjective rights of individuals, but also being objective basic principles of the democratic constitutional order and the Rechtsstaat; principles of the rule, constituted by the rights and their order (HESSE 2001).

Thus, we believe the very understanding of the theory and categorization of fundamental rights cannot face them from a highly subjective perspective. It's properly for an axiological theory of fundamental rights understands theirs objective dimension (BÖCKENFÖRDE 1993). As a result, the impossibility of identifying immediate subjectivity of a fundamental right and the fact that it apparently only presents an objective dimension, is not consistent with the nowadays Democratic Constitutionalism frame.

Actually, the values that appear in the protection of materially jusfundamental goods, hence, closely related to the required normative parameter of "Democratic State of Law" – the Human Dignity – are immediately (subjective dimension) or mediately (objective dimension) linked to the very existence condition of the citizen, consequently, the community condition itself.

As a complement, we can say that materially fundamental goods shall be classified in the dogmatic category of fundamental rights, even when they are only protected by sets that determines State tasks – prescriptive meaning. In other words, it will be easy identify the jusfundamentality of this rights protected by this normative format, even when they cannot be clearly identified in its exclusively subjective dimension.

This happens because the basis of jusfundamentality cannot be simply found in a formal decision of the competent legislator, but, in the material bond that a fundamental right (and materially fundamental good protected) has with the normative parameter of the "Democratic State of Law", that concretizes normatively its own anthropological cultural premise.

Therefore, it must be recognize a fundamental rights' objective dimension, split from its subjective dimension (SARLET 2009), and do not identify a necessary relationship between individualization and atomization of the protected goods, frames of protection and legal norms that protect goods materially jusfundamental.

Conclusion

The Fundamental Rights question about their nature, fundaments and category, as indicates Alexy, is inserted in a bigger dichotomy: positivistics point of views Vs. non-positivistics point of view. These both standpoints are not homogeneous, and there are a lot of positivistics streams, in one hand, and a bunch of non-positivistics perceptions in the other.

Included in this second group, the juridical culturalism, attends to positivistims demands, as the legal certainty, formal structure and, even, integrity. But, it binds the formal norms to axiological basis. To this stream, these bases are not founded on a natural, transcendental, universal argument. On the contrary, it is a rational cultural argument.

Considering the fundamental right's normative force, hence, the recognition of their immediate effectiveness and their importance in the Constitutional frame, this link between the cultural and legal content is more necessary. Indeed, the very definition of a fundamental right, therefore, the jusfundamentality definition, depends of this content.

References

ALEXY, R. 2009. Conceito e validade do direito. São Paulo, Martins Fontes.

ALEXY, R. 2008. Teoria dos direitos fundamentais. São Paulo: Malheiros.

VIEIRA DE ANDRADE, J. C. 2009. Os direitos fundamentais na Constituição portuguesa de 1976. 4 ed. Coimbra: Almedina.

BIELSCHOWSKY, R. M. 2013. Democracia Constitucional. São Paulo: Saraiva.

BÖCKENFÖRDE, E.-W. 1993. Escritos sobre Derechos Fundamentales.. Baden-Baden: Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft.

CANOSA USERA, R. 2006. "¿Existe un verdadero derecho constitucional a disfrutar del medio ambiente?" Anuario de Derechos Humano. Nueva Época, vol. 72, pp.151 – 216.

FERRAJOLI, L. 2009. Los fundamentos de los derechos fundamentales. 4 ed., Madrid: Editorial Trotta.

FERRAJOLI, L. 2011. Por uma teoria dos direitos de bens fundamentais. Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado Editora.

HÄBERLE, P. 2003. La garantía del contenido esencial de los derechos fundamentales.

Madrid: Dykynson.

HÄBERLE, P. 2008. Os problemas da verdade no Estado Constitucional. Porto Alegre: Sérgio Antônio Fabris Editor.

HESSE, K. 2001. "Significado de los derechos fundamentales", in BENDA, Ernst et all (org.). Manual de derecho constitucional. 2 ed. Madrid: Marcial Pons.

HORTA, J. L. B. 2011. História do Estado de Direito. São Paulo: Alameda.

HORTA, J. L. B. 2006. "Teoria da Constituição: contornos epistemológicos". Revista Brasileira de Direito Constitucional, vol. 6, p. 346-357.

KÄGI, W. 2005. La Constitución Como Ordenamiento Jurídico Fundamental del Estado: investigaciones sobre las tendencias desarrolladas en el moderno Derecho Constitucional. Madrid: Dykinson.

LOEWENSTEIN, K. 1976. Teoria de la constitución. 2ª ed. Barcelona: Ariel.

LUCAS VERDÚ, P. 1998. Teoría de la Constituición como ciência cultural. Madrid, Dykinson.

OTERO, Paulo. 2008. Instituições Políticas e Constitucionais I. Coimbra: Editora Almedina.

PEREIRA COUTINHO, L. P. 2009. Autoridade moral da Constituição: da fundamentação da validade do Direito Constitucional. Coimbra: Coimbra Editora.

PEREIRA COUTINHO, L. P. 2010. "Do que é a República: uma república baseada na dignidade da pessoa humana". Disponível em: http://www.icjp.pt/system/files/Do%20que%20a%20Rep%C3%BAblica%20%C3%A9_1.pdf

REALE, M. 2002. Filosofia do Direito. 20 ed. São Paulo: Saraiva.

SALGADO, J. C. 1996a. A Idéia de Justiça em Hegel. São Paulo: Loyola.

SALGADO, J. C. , 2007. A ideia de Justiça no mundo contemporâneo: fundamentação e aplicação do Direito como maximum ético. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey.

SALGADO, J. C. 1998. "O Estado Ético e o Estado Poiético". Revista do Tribunal de Contas do Estado de Minas Gerais, vol. 27, n. 2, abr./jun, pp. 1-10.

SALGADO, J. C. 1996b. "Os Direitos Fundamentais". Revista Brasileira de Estudos Políticos, vol.82, p.15 – 69.

SARLET, I. W. 2009. A eficácia dos direitos fundamentais: uma teoria geral dos direitos fundamentais na perspectiva constitucional. 10 ed. Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado Editora.

SARLET, I. W. 2010. Dignidade da Pessoa Humana e Direitos Fundamentais na Con- stituição Federal de 1988. 8 ed., Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado Editora.

SCHLINK, B.; PIEROTH, B. 2008. Direitos Fundamentais: Direito Estadual II.. Lisboa: Universidade Lusíada Editora.

SCHMITT, C. 2011. Teoría de la Constitución. Madrid: Alianza Editorial.

SCHNEIDER, H.-P. 1979. "Peculiaridad y función de los derechos fundamentales en lo estado constitucional democrático". Revista de Estudios Politicos, n.7, pp. 7-35.

SMEND, R. 1985. Constitución y Derecho Constitucional. Madrid: Centro de Estudios Constitucionales.

STRECK. L. L. 2002. Jurisdição Constitucional e Hermenêutica: uma nova crítica do Direito. Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado.

Communitarianism and the rescue of Hegel's conception of freedom[6] [7]

Rodrigo Antonio Calixto Mello[8]

1. Introduction

The communitarianism, thought that emerged in the 1980s and that was developed in constant controversy with liberalism in general and egalitarian liberalism in particular, rescued the classic philosophical debate between Kant and Hegel. In fact, communitarianism takes some criticism that Hegel does to Kant: while Kant mentions the existence of certain universal obligations, Hegel reverses this formulation to give priority to community ties. So, instead of valuing the ideal of an "autonomous" subject, Hegel argues that the full realization of the human being derives from the fuller integration of individuals in their community.[9]

This study specifically aims to relate the communitarianism to the Hegelian conception of freedom, because in Hegel, the concept of freedom is its concrete totality, in which there is unity between the subjective freedom of the individual freedom and the objective freedom in society.[10]

So, after a description of the basic ideas of communitarianism, it will be presented an overview of the way that is treated the idea of freedom in Hegel's philosophy.

---

[6] Paper presented at the Special Workshop Cultural Turn and Philosophy of Law and State of the XXVI World Congress of Law Philosophy and Social Philosophy held at the Federal University of Minas Gerais between July 21st and 26th of the year 2013.

[7] The direct quotations in the text are free translations done by the author to the English language according to the language contained in the reference.

[8] Student of Master in Law of the Federal University of Minas Gerais.

[9] GARGARELLA, Roberto. As teorias da justiça depois de Rawls; um breve manual de filosofia política. Trad. Alonso Reis Freira. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2008. p. 137.

[10] RAMOS, Marcelo Maciel. A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel. In: SALGADO, Joaquim Carlos; HORTA, José Luiz Borges (orgs). Hegel, Liberdade e Estado. Belo Horizonte: Fórum, 2010. p. 149.

2. Communitarianism

After resuming how the ideas of the French Revolution were treated by the great ideologies of the eighteenth and nineteenth century, Will Kymlicka argues that in the second half of the twentieth century, the ideal of community seems to have been set aside.[11] He says:

> Most contemporary liberal philosophers have little to say about the ideal of community. When this is mentioned, it is usually derived from the freedom and equality: a society honors the ideal of community if its members are treated as free and equal persons. Liberal conceptions of political do not include any autonomous principle of community, as the community of nationality, of language, of culture, of religion, of history or way of life. [12]

The communitarianism brings the ideal of community to the fore, as it has as a central thesis the "need to be concerned with the community the same way to freedom and equality, even giving it the priority".[13]

Also according to Kymlicka, this concern to the community it is also found in Marxism and enters in the definition of the communist ideal. It is, however, of a "communitarianism" that want to remake the world, while the current, closer to Hegel, has the ambition to reconcile man to his world.[14] For Will Kymlicka:

> There are indeed many similarities between the communitarian criticism to the modern liberalism and the critique done by Hegel to the classical liberal theory. Classical liberals like Locke and Kant tried to identify a universal conception of human needs or the human rationality and then invoke this ahistorical conception of the human being to evaluate the social and political organization that exists. According to Hegel, this kind of conception - which he called Moralität [morality] - is too abstract to be useful, but too individualistic, because it overlooks the fact that humans are inserted, inevitably, on historical practices and private relations. The other perspective – that Hegel called Sittlichkeit [ethics] - empha-

[11] KYMLICKA, Will. Comunitarismo. In: CANTO-SPERBER, Monique (org.). Dicionário de ética e filosofia moral – v. 1. Trad. Paulo Neves. São Leopoldo: Unisinos, 2003. p. 291-292.

[12] KYMLICKA, Comunitarismo, p. 292.

[13] KYMLICKA, Comunitarismo, p. 292.

[14] KYMLICKA, Comunitarismo, p. 292.

> sizes that the right of individuals - indeed, their very identity and their capacity for moral action - is closely linked to the communities to which they belong, as well as the particular political and social roles occupy in them.[1]

One of the books that in some way, most contributed to the task of communitarian "open fire" against liberalism was Hegel and modern society, authored by Canadian philosopher Charles Taylor and published in 1979. In this work, Taylor seeks to continue the counterpoint to the work of Kant done by Hegel, presented to the criticisms of the concept of purely formal grounds used by Kant; and criticism of the concept of "autonomy" also proposed by Kant, a concept that precisely rejects what Hegel considers of particular importance: the "immersion" of the individual in his community.[2]

The argentine professor Carlos Santiago Nino presents the contribution of Taylor to the emergence of communitarianism as follows:

> For Hegel [...] morality reaches its fullness in a community, the right is realized when society as a whole meets the demands of reason. According to Taylor, this is the point at which Hegel objects the basic intuitions of liberalism: these intuitions imply that universal obligations prevail over those that are contingent to our membership in a particular community; Hegel reversed that order, since for him the complete realization of freedom requires a society because this is the least self-sufficient human reality, our highest and most complete moral existence is that we can reach as members of one community. Hegel rejects the utilitarian Enlightenment idea that the state has only an instrumental function: to serve the purposes of individuals. Explicitly says that the state is not an abstract thing that stands opposite to the individuals, but that one is the other parts of an organic life in which no one is a mean and no one is an end. According to Taylor this implies that the identity of individuals is partly determined by their belonging to a certain community. It seems mysterious, he says, only because we have a atomistic point of view of men who do not take into account that [...] we are what we are because we are in a cultural community.[3]

---

[1] KYMLICKA, Comunitarismo, p. 292-293.

[2] GARGARELLA, As teorias da justiça depois de Rawls, p. 138-139.

[3] NINO, Carlos Santiago. El nuevo desafío comunitarista al liberalismo kantiano. In: _____. Ética y derechos humanos; un ensayo de fundamentación. Barcelona: Ariel,

Contrary to Rawls' idea that individuals have the ability to question and even to break its relations with any group, category, entity or community that he belongs, the communitarian group comes to defend that the identity identity as people, at least in part, is deeply marked by the fact of belonging to certain groups: "we were born inserted in certain communities and practices in which without them we would no longer be who we are".[4]

The best known critical among those made by the communitarianism against the liberal view about the conception of the person is held by Michael Sandel to John Rawls in his study called Liberalism and the limits of justice. Sandel contests, especially the Rawls' assumption in which the people choose their purposes, their vital goals. For the communitarian author, this possibility of choice involves setting aside a better view of the person, who recognizes the importance that he has, for each one, the knowledge of the eigenvalues of their community - values that people find looking "backwards" to the practices of the groups that they belong to.[5]

It is also emphasized that the battle waged by the communitarian to the liberal ideal of neutrality to the state. Such an ideal states a posture of neutrality of the state on the different conceptions of the good that arise in a given community, thus allowing that a public life is the spontaneous result of free agreements performed by the individuals. Conversely, the communitarianism declares that "the state must be essentially activist, committed to certain plans of life and certain organization of public life.[6]

3. Hegel's conception of freedom

It will be presented now the specific study of Hegel's conception of freedom. According to Marcelo Maciel Ramos:

> Although freedom has been studied by virtually all modern thinkers, it is Hegel, contemporary of the French Revolution, who will, in his grand philosophical system, encompass the entire Western 1989. p. 130-131.

[4] GARGARELLA, As teorias da justiça depois de Rawls, p. 140.

[5] GARGARELLA, As teorias da justiça depois de Rawls, p. 140-141. Also see: NINO, El nuevo desafío comunitarista al liberalismo kantiano, p. 131-135.

[6] GARGARELLA, As teorias da justiça depois de Rawls, p. 141.

> philosophical tradition that preceded it, including there the moderns.
>
> We found in Hegel the development of an idea of freedom that seeks to be faithful expression of all its stages of manifestation in the world.[7]

Hegel sees freedom as a fact of the human world that is developed in history. What he seeks is his manifest in the world, considering it not as a static object, but as a concrete movement, endowed with rationality.[8]

Being the purview of philosophy to take the history only from the point where rationality pass to manifest in life, not as a mere possibility, but as will and action, the history begins to the philosophy, according to Hegel, with the emergence of the state, truly human order, established and justified by the authority of the own human reason. Hegel has as initial reference of state the Greek polis, because only there the man truly released of nature, in that it has had to determine his will and his destiny, from the criteria of their own reason.[9] "Just then the man became able to know and want universal objects, that is, rational objects".[10]

In the Greek world, teaches Salgado, "there was no distinction between public and private life and, although there was no subjective freedom, there was the freedom existed understood as autonomy, whereby citizens created their own laws".[11] The individual will of the subject was immediately adapted to the objective will of the polis. However, at this time the objective morality had not yet been conquered in the struggle for subjective freedom. It is the Instant Spirit Moment, the moment in which freedom is the immediate unity of objective and subjective freedom.[12] This is an Immediate moment because this distinction between objective and subjective freedom "had not yet been introduced in the Spirit (world of culture), and without this split would not be possible the mutual denial of the various aspects of freedom.[13] It is important to

[7] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 141.
[8] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 143.
[9] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 143-144.
[10] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 144.
[11] SALGADO, Joaquim Carlos. A ideia de justiça em Hegel. São Paulo: Loyola, 1996. p. 392.
[12] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 144-145.
[13] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 145.

mention that for Hegel, even if "the freedom appears in the world at the moment which the thinking is released from external determinations, it will only become effective in its concept, in its entirety, in the post-revolutionary contemporary state."[14]

With the disappearance of this freedom as autonomy, freedom for which citizens participated in the decisions on the city destiny, the man needed to fetch itself the reason of its moral actions.[15]

> […] have been alienated its entire outer freedom to another one, to the lord of the Empire, it remained only to find itself an aspect of liberty that had not yet manifested, the inner freedom (thought freedom). Freedom is at the moment, so abstract, it appears only as part of freedom, although apparently is seen as an entirely freedom and to counteract the outer freedom. So, it is established the conflict between the outer and inner freedom.[16]

Faced with the impossibility of finding in itself the whole truth (the absolute or the essence), the man refers to the addition, alienating it to someone else, to a gentleman who totally submits (Moment of the stranger Spirit to himself).[17] This is the deepest cleavage of the Spirit, which becomes a stranger to his own essence, abandoning her to a transcendent 'being', which assigns all things.[18]

However, it is precisely to reach this extreme of alienation, attributing everything, including his own essence to the transcendent, that the Spirit discovers that all this is himself.

This discovery occurs through the recognition process, a process in which the self-consciousness turns reflexively to itself, knowing itself as such, and that is done "dialectically in two phases: 1) at the life and death struggle, in which inequality is established and 2) at work, by which it recovers the equality of consciousness itself.[19] "It is the Lord and slave dialetic, used by Hegel to illustrate the logical moments of the dialectic of freedom.[20]

It is possible to notice, therefore, that "the consciousness itself is

[14] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 145.
[15] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 146.
[16] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 146.
[17] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 146.
[18] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 147.
[19] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 147.
[20] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 147.

only in and of itself (ie, free), when it is for both of them, (another self-consciousness) that recognizes it as such and claims to itself such recognition.[21] "It's the Time of Mediate Spirit, where" the Spirit (the self-consciousness) after passing through the demerger, the denial (mediation) of itself, reaches the knowledge of itself (of its freedom), while total moments of the process (denied, given and elevated to the concept - to know yourself)."[22]

Thereby, teaches Ramos:

> Although the freedom appears at the time when the Spirit born (the world of culture), it will only be effective, will only achieve the concept itself after operated the internal split of its aspects, the mutual denial of them and, finally, recognition in the contradiction (another of itself) of the need for each of its successive moments and their supersession in the unity of unity and multiplicity. The concept of freedom is therefore taken as the effective appearance of the Free Spirit in the world, which after facing the split itself, finally knows about his freedom.[23]

In Hegel, the concept of freedom is its concrete totality, in which there is unity between the subjective freedom of the individual and the objective freedom in society. It is the moment in which the individual will becomes universal will, that is, time at which it comes to identify with the objective will, with the ethos of which it is both work and craftsman. It is also the time when the social ethos, expressed in rules and institutions, identifies with the subjective freedom and performs it.[24]

Marcelo Maciel Ramos closes his study dedicated to freedom in Hegel's thought saying:

> Freedom is the knowledge historically effected that all human beings are free. In other words, it is the result of the historical process in which man reaches the self-consciousness as being able to rationally self-determine their own will and action, materializing by political institutions such autonomy.
>
> However, it is not a purely individual knowledge, but a dialectically constructed knowledge that from the chock between several

[21] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 148.
[22] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 148.
[23] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 148-149.
[24] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 149.

> individuals, recognizes the other as free and also understands the common sense of reason which is, at the same time, product and producer. Thus, it builds up a sense goal of freedom, that assumes and assures that, through standards and institutions, the various individual freedoms, including their renewed contradictions, to constantly rebuild the objectively common sense established.[25]

Final remarks

The rescue of key aspects of Hegel's political philosophy and, in particular, the rescue of the Hegel's conception of freedom by contemporary authors who see in interpersonal relations and community ties that are essential for the formation of individuality, such as Charles Taylor and Axel Honneth, denotes dissatisfaction with the prestige achieved in recent decades by liberal Kantian doctrines (Rawls and Habermas) and reaffirms the greatness of Hegel's philosophy as a solid ground on which you can rely even today, almost two centuries after its construction.

References

BRUGGER, Winfried. O comunitarismo como teoria social e jurídica por trás da Constituição alemã. Trad. Felipe de Melo Fonte e Paola Enham Dias. Revista de Direito do Estado, n. 11, jul./set. 2008, Rio de Janeiro. p. 55-84.

GARGARELLA, Roberto. As teorias da justiça depois de Rawls; um breve manual de filosofia política. Trad. Alonso Reis Freira. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2008.

KYMLICKA, Will. Comunitarismo. In: CANTO-SPERBER, Monique (org.). Dicionário de ética e filosofia moral – v. 1. Trad. Paulo Neves. São Leopoldo: Unisinos, 2003. p. 292-298.

NINO, Carlos Santiago. El nuevo desafío comunitarista al liberalismo kantiano. In: _____. Ética y derechos humanos; un ensayo de fundamentación. Barcelona: Ariel, 1989. p. 129-196.

RAMOS, Marcelo Maciel. A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel. In: SALGADO, Joaquim Carlos; HORTA, José Luiz Borges (orgs). Hegel, Liberdade e Estado. Belo Horizonte: Fórum, 2010. p. 139-152.

SALGADO, Joaquim Carlos. A ideia de justiça em Hegel. São Paulo: Loyola, 1996.

[25] RAMOS, A liberdade no pensamento de Hegel, p. 151.

Discussion, conflict and exception
Carl Schmitt and the not quite new paradigm of lawmaking

Eduardo Carone Costa Júnior[1]

Abstract: When Carl Schmitt pronounced that "openness and discussion are the two principles on which constitutional thought and parliamentarism depend in a thoroughly logical and comprehensive system", he was aiming at the liberal modus operandi of creating law within a state's border that is still presented as an integral part of our democratic way of being. Nevertheless, the gap between the contemporary discourse of democracy and the everyday practice of parliamentary lawmaking – one that already existed under the Weimar Constitution that inspired Schmitt to write his critic of the parliament – keeps growing. Openness and discussion have a distinct way of impacting the legislative process that cannot be measured, yet is constantly perceived – often in a not so generous way – by the common citizen. What the modern constitutions do to avoid the deepening of this crisis is trade democratic legitimacy for celerity in a way that can be considered a response to an undesired intervention of time in the making of the law. Schmitt's point is twofold. First, that this trade off should represent the exception when the creation of the law is concerned, not the rule. Second, that there is a paradox concerning the modern liberal state's praise for democracy and it's acceptance that what should be considered the exception in the state created after the liberal revolutions is – again - becoming the normal way of creating the law.

Keywords: Lawmaking; crisis; publicity; discussion; time intervention; exception.

1. Lawmaking in crisis

It doesn't take a scholar to realize that lawmaking is facing a crisis. The average citizen knows that this crisis - even though he can't pinpoint the moment it started or it's causes – concerns the amount and complexity of laws that impact his everyday life. He also notice that these laws are not always effective in fixing the problems politicians state as the reason for their production. These critics, almost universal, are dully reproduced by the press and have caught jurisprudence's attention for quite some time2.

[1] Bacharel em Direito pela Faculdade de Direito da UFMG. Especialista em Controle Externo pela PUC/MG. Mestre e Doutorando em Filosofia do Direito pela Faculdade de Direito da UFMG.

To understand this situation one must remember that the legislative function bestowed upon parliament is a fairly recent development of man's evolution[3]. Only the lower middle ages put in march a series of events that culminate with the liberal revolutions and the rise of parliament to the prominent position it holds today in democratic discourse. As Kelsen noted[4], these revolutions and the fight against authoritarianism happened above all to advance the cause of parliamentarism. Unfortunately, the moment of birth for the modern parliamentary democracy is also the starting moment of parliament's crisis. Since the creation of law was put in charge of the parliament, the ever increasing intensity and complexity of social relations have only exacerbated the consequences of this crisis.

2. Discussion and openness

In recent years interest in Carl Schmitt and his vast work was revived. Even though a conservative jurist, this renewed interest in Schmitt's thought came also from the left[5] and the thinkers that have been left behind by the collapse of the Soviet Union. One could argue that, after the fall of the communist experiment, the most formidable counterpoint to the liberal democracy in the western hemisphere, Schmitt's rediscovered critique of parliamentarism and the liberal thought would be a fit substitute.

In fact, one need not accept most of Schmitt's ideas, especially those concerning dictatorship, to realize that he's got a point when he states in his Parlamentarismus that "openness and discussion are the two

[2] CARNELUTTI, Francesco. A Morte do Direito. Belo Horizonte: Líder, 2004. In 1951, The Author warned that, for some time already, the law was loosing it's double function of certainty and justice.

[3] FERREIRA FILHO, Manoel Gonçalves, 1995. The Author reminds that in the beginning there was not a proper parliament, but only an assembly whose job was to advice the governing body.

[4] KELSEN, Hans, 1993.

[5] As can be seen in TELOS. Special Issue. Carl Schmitt: Enemy or Foe?. Nova York: Telos, 1987.

principles on which constitutional thought and parliamentarism depend in a thoroughly logical and comprehensive system"[6].

Democracy presupposes more than just the ability to vote and choose one's representatives. In it's internal tension between equality and freedom, a duality that Schmitt was always keen to point out, democracy needs to warrant the citizen at least the right to be informed about the decisions that are to be taken and the right to form his own private opinion about these decisions and endeavor to make his own private opinion the accepted public opinion about the matter.

In the ancient, i.e. direct democracy of the Athenians, the citizen[7] - the male, non-slave, human beings that possessed material goods – would gather at the Agora, to discuss and take decisions. No more direct means of participation in the state's affairs ever existed.

The advance of civilization, the growing complexity of society, put an end to prospects of direct democracy's use in any modern state. In fact, the twilight of this form of democracy happened even before Plato had written his Republic. As the number of citizens grew, the opportunities for being heard at the Agora diminished[8]. There's a reason why Plato starts the Republic with a descent to the Piraeus, the aging port from which Athens begins to grow. There lays a metaphor concerning the need to return to older, better times and the origins of democracy. On their way back, when the dialogue truly begins, Socrates and Glaucon are constrained by Polemarchus and his friends to return with them to Polemarchus' house. If one considers that Polemarchus is a noun formed by polemos (war) e arkhon (leader), Strauss's commentary[9] that "ballots are convincing only as long as bullets are remembered", concerning the dangers to the democratic equality that unchecked freedom represents, is one that Schmitt would certainly agree with.

Representative democracy, many centuries after Pericles' golden age, still relies on need of discussion and openness. The citizen no longer takes active part in the making of each and every decision that affects the community but he chooses who should represent him and decide

[6] SCHMITT, Carl., 1988. P. 48. In this most excellent translation, Professor Ellen Kennedy opted to translate the original öffentlichkeit as openness but it could also be translated as publicity. Both words are correct and are pertinent to Schmitt's ideas on the matter.

[7] One must not confuse the Athenian citizens with the demos, a noun that was used to indicate to entirety of the population living at the polis, including, women, children and slaves.

[8] DAHL, Robert A,2000, p. 106.

[9] STRAUSS, Leo, 1964.

for him. To choose well – itself a grave decision – he should be able to discuss the merits of candidates as well as how they have behaved in the past if it's not their first time representing the majority that cannot – or will not[10] – get involved in the actual lawmaking.

If nothing else, representative democracy demands more discussion that direct democracy, since first there must be the possibility of discussion among the citizens previous to choosing their representatives and then there must be discussion, and a public discussion, notes Schmitt, among the representatives when deciding on behalf of the formers. Not to mention the necessity of discussion – and that may be the most relevant one – between state representatives and society as a mean to guarantee not only democratic accountability but also that the common citizen understands why some decisions – often unpopular ones – had to be taken.

3. Not just openness and discussion but also time

After establishing that these, discussion and publicity, are the two core values of a parliamentary democracy, Schmitt puts forward his own perception of how they were not respected in the Weimar Republic. His words[11] deserve a literal transcription as they can be attributed to virtually any contemporary parliament:

> The reality of parliamentary and party political life and public convictions are today far removed from such beliefs. Great political and economic decisions on which the fate of mankind rests no longer result today (if they ever did) from the balancing opinions in public debate and counterdebate. Such decisions are no longer the outcome of parliamentary debate. The participation of popular representatives in government –parliamentary government – has proven the most effective means of abolishing the division of powers, and with it the old concept of parliamentarism. As things stand today, it is of course practically impossible not to work with committees, and increasingly smaller committees; in this way the parliamentary plenum gradually drifts away from its purpose (that is, from its public), and as a result it necessarily becomes a mere façade. It may be that there is no other practical alternative.

[10] Gutmann, Amy. Democracy. In: GOODIN, Robert E; PETTIT, Philip; POGGE, Thomas, 2007, p. 524.

[11] SCHMITT, Carl, 1988, pp.49-50.

> But one must then at least have enough awareness of the historical situation to see that parliamentarism thus abandons its intellectual foundation and that the whole system of freedom of speech, assembly, and the press, of public meetings, parliamentary immunities and privileges, is losing its rationale. Small and exclusive committees of parties or of party coalitions make their decisions behind closed doors, and what representatives of the big capitalist interest groups agree to in the smallest committees is more important for the fate of millions of people, perhaps, than any political decision. The idea of modern parliamentarism, the demand for checks, and the belief in openness and publicity were born in the struggle against the secret politics of absolute princes […]

Is Schmitt's view relevant in the twentieth first century? It could be argued that Schmitt's writing was about the tumultuous reality of the 1920's Germany and that what's good – or bad - for the Weimar Republic does not automatic apply to other ages and places. It could also be said that he was describing a parliamentary government, where the cabinet is a delegation of the parliament and the president is merely the head of state but not head of government and, therefore, Schmitt's opinion is not pertinent to the modern presidential regime many countries adopt.

Both are valid points but are not enough to infirm the necessity of openness and discussion in a democratic government, regardless of it's peculiarities, the existence of a prime minister and a cabinet or an elected president.

What Schmitt's diagnosis of the way discussion and openness were put aside in the Weimar Republic fail to stress - even though the Author were well aware of - is that these two core values of democracy imply a way of taking decisions that subjects the modern liberal democratic state to a lot of pressure once the amount of decisions to be taken and the ever decreasing available time to take them are considered.

One can say, paraphrasing François Ost[12], that the origins of Schmitt's critique of parliamentarism lays in the way time intervenes, not only in law but also in politics.

Democratic lawmaking takes time; more time than it takes to create law in a non-democratic state. The essence of democracy demands enough discussion and openness as a mean to achieve a reasonable majority on each and every subject that is examined by the parliament. By contrast, lawmaking in the absolute state that preceded the liberal revolutions of the eighteenth century, would be considered swift since it was not the result of a public discussion – auctoritas, non veritas, facit leggem. Schmitt knew that and wrote[13]:

[12] OST, François, 2005.

> The idea of modern parliamentarism, the demand for checks, and the belief in openness and publicity were born in the struggle against the secret politics of absolute princes. The popular sense of freedom and justice was outraged by arcane practices that decided the fate of nations in secret resolutions.

From a democratic point of view, the way law was created, before the liberal revolutions and the raise of parliament, despite being swift, could never be considered legitimate. On the other hand, parliamentarism gains legitimacy at the expense of celerity, which causes the risk of a delay in the creation of the law that threatens it's very own legitimacy and effectiveness. As such, the crisis that affects lawmaking and parliament was embedded from the start.

4. Legislative delegation: a consequence of time constraints upon lawmaking

The fact that creating law in a democratic and legitimate way, i.e., by means of a public discussion, demands a considerable amount of time, if the parliament is not to be a mere façade[14], as Schmitt put it, was surely noted by those involved in the quotidian decisions any modern state must make.

As time went by and the driving spirit behind liberal revolutions subdued, the impossibility of having statutory law created solely by the parliament presented itself in a clear way. The Administrative Law expert for one knows that urgent problems cannot be left unresolved, pending a discussion in parliament that might reach a compromise, genuine or not[15]. When the administration cannot afford to way for a decision created by the legislative branch, the exact boundaries between statute and bylaw becomes a pressing matter.

[13] SCHMITT, Carl, 1988, p. 50.

[14] SCHMITT, Carl, 1988, pp.49-50.

[15] SCHMITT, Carl, 2008, pp.82-88. In the chapter dedicated to the study of the positive concept of constitution, Schmitt exams the compromise character of Weimar Constitution and distinguished between the authentic, genuine compromise and the dilatory formal one.

Practical difficulties such as this have contributed for the creation of legislative delegations in most modern constitutional regimes. Parliamentarism itself implies a delegation[16], that is, voluntary transference of power to others; the cabinet is a delegate from parliament and its powers are granted because there is mutual trust between these two institutions. Presidential regimes also present other forms of delegation, such as the creation of norms by agencies.

There are two main reasons why delegations occur, say Strøm[17]: capacity and competence. Capacity is inextricably connected to time and is behind every delegation that happened ever since direct democracy gave way to representative democracy as a mean to make sure that the time consuming decisions, that citizens were unwilling to devote themselves to take, due to the enormous amount of discussion involved, could be made. Ever since Plato`s Republic, lack of competence, in the sense of knowledge and skills, is also a reason behind delegation. Ironically, the core of the most formidable philosophical theory against democracy[18] is also the reason why citizens opt to leave professional politicians discuss and take decisions on their behalf in a representative democracy.

What the widespread use of delegations implies is that the monopoly of creation of laws in a parliament formed by representatives of the people, that the mentors of the liberal revolutions prescribed as a mean to keep in check the power of the constitutional monarch[19], is no more. Reality dictates that it is not the parliament but the executive branch that has the capacity and the competence to take decisions concerning most of the themes that need state intervention these days, from the limits of the citizen's phone bill to how should obsolete TVs be disposed of. Most of these decisions are not made by elected representatives but rather by a modern officialdom[20], appointed bureaucrats that are deemed more competent to take technical decisions than professional, elected politicians[21].

---

[16] STRØM, Kaare, Parliamentary democracy and delegation. In: STRØM, Kaare; MÜLLER, Wolfgang C.; BERGMAN, Torbjörm, 2006, p. 56.

[17] Op. Cit. P. 57.

[18] DAHL, Robert A, 1989.

[19] As Cabral de Moncada puts it, the principal of legality and the antinomies that surround it as a consequence of the – not natural – alliance of two principles that draw legitimacy from different sources, the monarchical and the democratic principles. CABRAL DE MONCADA, 2002, p. 8.

[20] WEBER, Max, Bureaucracy. In: WEBER, Max, 2009, p.196.

[21] For merits of elected and appointed oficials, WEBER, Max, 2009, p. 201.

5. Legislative delegation: the exception or a return to the status quo ante?

In order to preserve representative democracy`s relevance one must view legislative delegations as the exception; not the rule. The rule must be the creation of abstract and general norms by public discussion, taking place on a parliament formed by elected representatives of the people. The exception, this other category that Schmitt highlights in his early work about sovereignty[22], should be the creation of such norms by non-elected officials in the executive branch.

In an ideal world, the limit between rule and exception when it comes to the creation of abstract and general rules should be established by a constitution so that Schmitt`s remarkable opening statement from Political Theology[23] could represent that sovereignty is exercised, at least indirectly, by the people.

Schmitt uses the exception as a political or economic situation that puts in risk the survival of the state and therefore legitimates the use of extraordinaire measures. But even though his primary concern is the state of exception and the extent of the Reich President`s powers under article 48 of Weimar Constitution[24], it can be said that he believes in the validity of the differentiation between rule and exception in other contexts, as reveals his quote Soren kierkegaard`s Repetion: "The exception explains the general and itself. And if one wants to study the general correctly, one only needs to look around for a true exception. It reveals everything more clearly than does the general. Endless talk about the general becomes boring; there are exceptions. If they cannot be explained, then the general also cannot be explained [...]"[25].

For the proponents of participatory and deliberative democracy[26], technological breakthroughs may overcome or at least diminish the

[22] SCHMITT, Carl, 2005. See particularly Chapter 1.

[23] "Sovereign is he who decides on the exception". SCHMITT, Carl, 2005. p. 4.

[24] Article 48. §2. If the German Reich, public security and order are considerably disturbed or endangered, the Reichpräsident may undertake necessary measures to restore public security and order, and if necessary may intervene with the aid of armed forces. For this purpose he may suspend, temporarily, in parto r entirely, the basic rights as provided in articles 114, 115, 117, 118, 123, 124 and 153.

[25] SCHMITT, Carl, 2005. p. 15.

[26] For a starter about the various conceptions of representative democracy, see GUTMANN, Amy. Democracy. In: GOODIN, Robert E; PETTIT, Philip; POGGE, Thomas, 2007, p. 527.

need of legislative delegations since the citizen will have means to get involved in the public discussion of pressing matters without incurring in the problems created by time constraints. Maybe. But we are not there yet. What the present shows is that, more and more, legislative delegations are becoming the new normal way of lawmaking; a new normal that Schmitt would point is uncomfortably – for the liberals, he might add – close to way things were before the liberal revolutions.

It could be argued that leaving lawmaking to the executive branch is not necessarily evil; that there can still be significant public discussion this way. There are means for overcoming the intrinsic lack of democratic legitimation that the creation of general and abstract norms by non-elected executive officials dictates. Such norms could be the product of an administrative procedure that is not only regulated by previous norms created by parliament but also permeated by the legal obligation of hearing all the interested parties through, for instance, public consultations that ensure enough discussion is taking place. Yes, but the question is: wouldn't this newfound democratic legitimacy reintroduce an intervention of time on the process of creating law?

Schmitt's answer would be unequivocally yes, as demonstrates his belief that[27] "great political and economic decisions on which the fate of mankind rests no longer result today (if they ever did) from the balancing opinions in public debate and counterdebate".

One does not need to agree with him that a strong government is the only option society has got when faced with this dilemma; that the guardian of the constitution – and therefore of the public's rights and liberties – should be the Reichpräsident; that the creation of law through public discussion in a parliament is, historically, the exception rather than the norm. One must recognize though that in order to guarantee the survival of parliament and all it represents – and to avoid a return to the status quo ante – legislative delegation must remain the exception, if not quantitatively, at least qualitatively speaking, because, as Kierkegaard wrote and Schmitt quoted[28], "[…] the general is not thought about with passion but with a confortable superficiality. The exception, on the other hand, thinks the general with intense passion".

---

[27] SCHMITT, Carl, 1988. p.49. See also his obvious disdain towards the nineteenth century authors that adhere to the belief in discussion as a way to fulfill rationality's promise in political matters, personified by Alphonse Lamartine, in endnote 49 of the same page.
[28] SCHMITT, 2005, p. 15.

References

CABRAL DE MONCADA, Luís S. Lei e Regulamento. Coimbra: Coimbra Editora, 2002.

CARNELUTTI, Francesco. A Morte do Direito. Belo Horizonte: Líder, 2004.

DAHL, Robert A. Democracy and its critis. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1989.

_____. On Democracy. New Haven: Yale University Press,2000.

FERREIRA FILHO, Manoel Gonçalves. Do Processo Legislativo. 3. ed. atual. São Paulo: Saraiva, 1995.

GOODIN, Robert E; PETTIT, Philip; POGGE, Thomas. A Companion to Contemporary Political Philosophy. Malden: Blackwell Publishing, 2007.

KELSEN, Hans. A democracia. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 1993.

OST, François. O tempo do direito. Bauru: Editora da Universidade do Sagrado Coração, 2005.

SCHMITT, Carl. Constitutional Theory. Durham: Duke University Press, 2008.

_____. The crisis of parliamentary democracy. Cambridge: MIT, 1988.

_____. Political theology. Four chapters on the concept of sovereignty. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 2005.

TELOS. Special Issue. Carl Schmitt: Enemy or Foe?. Nova York: Telos, 1987.

STRAUSS, Leo. The City and Man. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1964.

STRØM, Kaare; MÜLLER, Wolfgang C.; BERGMAN, Torbjörm. Delegation and Accountability in Parliamentary Democracies. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006.

WEBER, Max. From Max Weber. Essays in Sociology. London; Routledge, 2009.

Carl Schmitt: critic of Positivism

Fernando José Armando Ribeiro[29]

Abstract: In contemporary history, in which a series of arguments and ideas aimed at combating legal positivism are elaborated, it is appropriate to return to who was, in his time, one of the most important critics of that school of legal thought: Carl Schmitt. A critic of modernity's own political project, Schmitt outlines with clarity some of the crucial problems of positivist thinking, its internal contradictions and some of its equivocal assumptions. However, the solutions proposed by the controversial German thinker point us to a path that should not be followed because it also would lead to an undermining of the quality of humanism that should nourish the law. Moreover, let us see that Modernity, if not a complete project, should not be banished for its failure, but rebuilt and improved in the dimension of historical time and as a human cultural achievement.

Keywords: 1. Schmitt; 2. Positivism; 3. Legitimacy.

1. Introduction

Schmitt can be included in a tradition of critical thinking regarding the project of modernity, and this criticism is expressed most strongly in the deconstruction of liberalism made by the German constitutionalist, in both its political (the Parliamentarism) and juridical (legal positivism) branches. Schmitt, as Weber, sees modernity as a time of disenchantment caused by the absence of meaning generated by the election of rationality as a paradigm of legitimacy. Modern rationality, essentially instrumental, according to Weber, would be based on the quantifiable and manageable, reducing knowledge to technique and form, thus removing the manifestation of its real substance.

It is necessary to return to Weber to understand Schmitt's critique of liberal modernity. Weber's line of thought is extremely pessimistic about the achievements of modernity. According to him we would be imprisoned in an iron cage of rationality, forged by the obliteration of the world's magic and charm through instrumental modern rationality.

[29] PhD; Professor of Law at PUC-Minas; Judge in the state of Minas Gerais (Brazil).

Weber identifies two distinct forms of legitimation of legal Herrschaft: the first pre-modern, based on the insertion of an act, a ritual, in a symbolic order which would give the sense: placing a seal, a royal command, the ritual of a trial. The second is the modern form of legitimacy, relationship-based logical and rational rules embedded in a law. The second way tends to result in a bureaucratization of legal relations.

Schmitt sees this bureaucratization as the result of modern liberal technicity, which would find its perfect representation in Kelsen's legal positivism. Kelsen's belief in law as a complete system of rules turns the interpreter into a mere function of the State. Otherwise, by making the interpreter a point of normative imputation he does not consider the hermeneutic dimension, inherent to human interpretation. The problems of application are distortedly presented. Making the subject a mere "point of normative imputation", this theory excludes the human content, which should permeate the law, omitting the human being from the legal spectrum.

2. Sovereignty and Legitimacy

A central point of Schmitt's critique is the application of legal norms. For Schmitt, there is always a gap between the norm and its application, which can only be fulfilled by interpretation. According to legal positivism this gap does not exist, or if it exists it is not considered by legal science, which provides a very limited role for the interpretation.

Schmitt's opposition to legal positivism is based on his decisionist thought, which, according to McCormick is the result of his ideas about sovereignty. He also opposes liberal parlamentarism with his ideas about tradition and substantive representation:

> If substantive representation is the foil with which Schmitt negatively contrasts parliamentary representation, in Political Form and Parlamentarismus, then, as suggested in my earlier analysis of emergency powers, Schmitt's appropriation and reconstruction of the early-modern concept of sovereignty is the standard by which he criticizes liberal jurisprudence most forcefully in Political Theology and his subsequent Weimar constitutional writings. (MCCORMICK, 1999, p. 206)

The return to the idea of sovereignty would be more related to the application of the rules than with a ratio of monarchical or personal power as intended by Kelsen. Sovereignty here is seen as fundamental to the application of the law, since the applicator, which should be considered in his personhood, fills the gap between the norm and reality. Something that formalists refuse to see, according to Schmitt:

> The fact that the legal idea cannot be applied by itself results that it provides who should apply it. In every transformation there is an auctoritatis interpositio. A distinctive determination about the individual person or concrete instance may require such authority for themselves, cannot be extracted from the sheer quality of a legal principle. (SCHMITT, 2006, p. 29)

To base the validity of norms in its position within a closed and hierachically organized system would create an illusion that would remove, for Schmitt, the legal reality of the matter: that only a hierarchy of people, within a substantial conception of sovereignty confers validity to the norm and legal decision[30]:

> Since a law cannot be applied , manipulated or run itself , cannot be interpreted or defined, nor sanctioned, cannot alone either - if it is still a standard - appoint or designate an specific person to interpret or handle the law. Neither the concept of independent judge, subject only to the law, is normativist , but a concept of order, a competent authority, a member of an order system formed by officials and administrators . That particular person is the judge not given by rules or regulations, but by a specific organization of selective justice and individual appointments. So it's true what Hölderlin wrote in a note to his translator of Nomos basileus of Pindar : "The nomos, the law is here insofar as it is the figure by which man finds himself and God, the Church and the state order and the old precepts inherited that more strictly than art, retain vital relationships, which eventually found a village and itself. (MCCORMICK, 1999, p. 218)

Schmitt criticizes the prominent role given to the form by legal positivism. According to Schmitt, this dominance stems from an incorporation of the alleged objectivity of technical and natural sciences and a misunderstanding of scholastic thought about form and substance.

[30] "This betrays his nostalgia for the concrete domination of persons over persons that is characteristic of traditional politics and part and parcel of his developing neoauthoritarianism, as much as it conveys his concern for jurisprudenctial praxis." (MCCORMICK, 1999, p. 218)

The fact that Kelsen, as soon as he takes a step forward beyond its methodological critique, operates with a causal concept proper to the natural sciences, shows up best when he believes the criticism of the concept of substance, by Hume and Kant, can be applied to the theory of the State. However, this would be without considering that the concept of substance of scholastic thought is something quite different from that of mathematical thinking and of the natural sciences. The distinction between substance and the exercise of a right, which found a fundamental significance in the history of the dogma of sovereignty, in any way could be understood using concepts of the natural sciences, and it is obviously an essential moment of the legal argumentation (SCHMITT, 2006, p. 39) [31]

Schmitt believes the form is important because it is what reveals the contents, but there can be no pure form apart from content, nor content that proves to be fully without form. Any thought that focuses on only one of these categories would be incomplete and incapable of solving the array of problems involved in the subject. As the positivist thought reduces the law to the norm, considered as an abstract order, it generates a series of illusions and misunderstandings about the law.

The first one is the supposed impersonal command of the norm, fiercely opposed by Schmitt. According to him normativism does not realize that legislative or "authoritative" fetishism generates a belief in the intrinsic honor and virtue of the authority of the legislature, which is theologically identified with God as the creator. All concepts of honor and dignity, fundamental in maintaining the legitimacy of the order, are vested in the figure of the legislator, which, abstractly considered, ends up exerting a veiled and illegitimate sovereignty:

> If the concept of law appropriates any relationship to reason and justice, and, while it remains on the State to legislate with its specific concept of legality it concentrates on the law the greatness and dignity of the State. So fort, any determination of any kind, all order and measure, every command addressed to any officer or

[31] "The difference between the respective uses of distinction in question, for Schmitt, lies in decisionism's ability to bring substance alive through the formal act of a decision rather than letting it lie stillborn in the letter of the law or the phraseology of the constitution. As he often states, forms or functions per se are not dangerous, they necessary to make ideas realities." (MCCORMICK, 1999, p. 220) > soldier and every individual instruction addressed to a judge may be performed legally and legitimately, by a resolution of Parliament or of any of the bodies involved in the legislative procedure , under the "rule of law". The "purely formal" is then reduced to empty words and to the label "law", revealing its relationship with the rule of law. Exclusively and directly, all dignity and all the greatness of the law are linked- and more precisely, with meaning and effect immediately juridical-positive - this confidence in the justice and reason of the legislature itself and all participants in the process of lawmaking. All the legal guarantees and fastenings, as well as all the protection against abuse, are transferred to the person of the omnipotent legislature or to the legislative process. For something that is not deprived of reason or purely arbitrary, it is urgent that this process is dominated by the preconditions of trusts above mentioned. It is the propulsive force of the congruence of Law and of formal law. This system of legality does not exist at all, unconditionally. An unconditional equalization with the result of any formal procedure would only be an unconditional submission, or in other words, a blind decision taken by the bodies responsible for legislating without any connection with the contents of Law and Justice. It would be nothing more than an unconditional surrender to any kind of resistance. It would mean to seize the sic volo sic juebo in its most naive and purely psychological form, as if from the rudiments of superstition or from the waste of some previous legal religion. We can call that "positivism". But in our times this word can hide no more that the unconditional formalism consists of a claim to submit the law to purely political reasons and accompanied by a denial of any right of resistance, also driven for purely political reasons. (SCHMITT, 2007, p. 21-22)

According to Schmitt, positivism also causes another great problem, the relativization of the concept of Constitution. The relativity of this concept lies in the synonymy of the expressions "Constitution and constitutional laws". In other words, instead of fixing a unitary concept of constitution, positivism considers only concrete constitutional laws, which in turn depend exclusively on exterior features, called formal elements by traditional theory (SCHMITT , 1996: § 2, I).

In his line of thought, it is a common mistake to attribute a "formal" character to the Constitution by the criteria of being a written constitution and having its reform linked to more difficult procedures. By doing so, the main purpose is to make the concept of Constitution equivalent to a series of written constitutional laws (Constitution = lex scripta)

(SCHMITT, 1996: II § 2). In the end, the very meaning of Constitution will rest on the more difficult reform procedure. Schmitt warns that considering only the requirement of constitutional reform (as, for instance, the art. 76 of the Weimar Constitution) is to renounce the search for the real meaning of the Constitution. As a consequence, it will put the entire subject of the Constitution in a single norm, making it a kind of "blank law" that in each case should be fulfilled in accordance with the requirements of constitutional reform (SCHMITT 1996: § 2 III). Constitutional laws do not receive their power from the reform procedure, but to the contrary, it is the rules of reform, as all the other statutory and constitutional norms that receive their power from the Constitution.

The other illusion generated by the formal legal order is that sovereignty is a power exercised in accordance with norms. Law provides a formal structure that makes demands very precise and, if managed rationally, ensures that we can predict the outcome of our obedience or disobedience to such requirements. Thus, this rational legal structure sanctions the calculation element at the legal-rational authority. Consistency in decision making is crucial. Compared to a substantive law based on "material principles", and to a justice that would be substantial and therefore, ad hoc, legal formalism is predictable. The law, in turn, requires the modern bureaucratic state to provide a formal guarantee reliable for all contracts by the political authority.

This belief in an alleged causation of the real was the target for many critical thinkers of modernity, as Nietzsche.[32] But for Schmitt this [32] " Do ye know what is for me the" world " ? I show it in my mirror ? This world, an immense power , without beginning , without end , a firm , tanned magnitude of force that does not become larger, does not become smaller , not consumed , only becomes and , as a whole, is unchangeable greatness a household budget with no spending and no losses , but likewise without growth, earnings , terminated by " nothing " as per your limit, anything that fades , nothing wasted , nothing infinitely extensive , but as a determined force in a certain space , not in a place that was somewhere "empty", rather as force throughout, as a play of forces and waves of forces, at the same time one and various, piling up here and at the same time decreasing there, a sea in stormy forces and tributaries in themselves , always changing , always flowing back , with huge years of return , with ebb and amount of its settings , expelling from simple to more complex , the calmer, more intrincate and more cold to the incandescent, the wildest , so what else contradicts itself and then , again, the fullness coming home from the simplest , from the play of contradictions back to the joy of harmony, asserting himself even that equal their routes and years , blessing itself as that which must return eternally, as a becoming that knows no becoming satisfied, no disgust, no weariness: this my Dionysian world of the eternally creating itself , the eternally destroy of itself, this mysterious world of double pleasure, order would threaten the very idea of sovereignty that he defends so fiercely. For Schmitt the "sovereign is he who decides on the state of exception." What characterizes sovereignty is not under the command of norms, but the power to suspend them in an exceptional situation. For Schmitt, the moment of decision is shown in full force in the decision on the exception. The exception is not simply a state of necessity, but a boundary state, which cannot be predicted or encompassed by any normative order.[33]

Legal positivism does not consider the exception, regarding it as essentially irrational and not legal. It also transfers all the sovereignty to the normative order. In Schmittian thought, this position denounces a clear contradiction, since it stems from a metaphysical belief in the legal order as similar to a supposed normative order of nature. This order is identified by a metaphysical stance that the positivists, especially Kelsen, would always insist on denying:

> Schmitt locates the source of what he has thus far identified as Kelsen's jurisprudential rigidity: "At the foundation of his identification of state and legal order rests a metaphysics that identifies the lawfulness of the nature and the normative lawfulness. This pattern of thinking is characteristic of the natural sciences. It is based on the rejection of all 'arbitrariness,' and attempts to banish from the human mind every exception" (PT, 41). Kelsen and the legal theory he represents are a manifestation of Enlightenment thought's increasing indifference and even antagonism to the idea of the exception. But any attempt to draw attention to the exception – whatever form it takes, beneficial, banal, or, most important, dangerous – is considered irrational from the standpoint of the Enlightenment. (MCCORMICK, 1999, p. 223)

As Kelsen's method is based on the method of natural scienc-

---

this " my beyond good and evil " without end, if there is no end in a circle of happiness, unwilling , if there is good will on the ring which makes yourself - ye would have a name for this world? A solution for all its riddles? A light for you too, oh more cubby holes, stronger but fearless, more inserted at midnight ? This world is the will to power - and nothing else! And also you are will to power - and nothing else! (NIETZSCHE, 2008 , p . 512-513)

[33] "The decision on the exception is, in its most prominent sense, decision, as a general rule. It is presented by the legal principle usually valid. There can never be conceived an absolute exception, and therefore it can neither support the decision of a real and exceptional case." (SCHMITT, 2007)

es, its success depends on the identification of its own object. And this identification can only occur in an essentially metaphysical plane. It is beyond doubt that the scientific "purification" that Kelsen aims for with his project is based on the same "purgative" and reductionist procedures whereby natural sciences began in modernity. In fact, in their eagerness to reveal and identify natural laws, a project that failed, he emphasizes, the natural sciences have established that the only manifestations of reality considered worthy of study and reflection would be those ruled by such laws. This scientific reductionist method would lead to scientific positivism and expand its tentacles over the Law, already dominated by technicism. Most surprising is this method, with its belief in reality as a fact, mystifies and ignores the truth:

> Max Planck has demonstrated how the positivism of natural sciences, with its interest in achieving unconditional security only takes into account sensitive impressions. Consequently, it can not distinguish deceptive and illusory perceptions from the other; so forth, at a positivist physics there is no space for the illusion of the senses. The fate of positivism in legal theory, only interested in preventing arbitrariness and subjectivism bears some resemblance to same fact. If the normality of the concrete situation assumed by the positive norm fails, but, considering positive-legally, is imperceptible, then falls with it the strong possibility of predictable and unwavering application of the norm. Even the "justice of positivity", to quote Erich Jung, would cease. Without the coordinate system of a particular order, legal positivism fails to distinguish between right and wrong, and between objective and subjective arbitrariness. (SCHIMITT, 1996, p. 44)

On behalf of its alleged objectivity and legal security, positivism prefers to divorce itself from the contents of justice, disqualifying it as a subjective concept, incapable of being perceived by science.

> Today we perceive the decline of a mere positivistic reading of Constitutions. Positivistic reading does not provide the possibility of understanding the constitutional text as a moment of affirmation of the very ethos of a people. It does not allow the promotion of a gregarious life minimally stabilized and simultaneously articulated with an array of open and pluralist antagonistic positions. (RIBEIRO, 2004, p. 200)

This fragmentation of sovereignty would be one of the results of the ostensible increment of state bureaucracy generated by the normative intricacies of Kelsen's theory. According to Kelsen, the dimension of the will is disregarded and only the subsumption of certain events to certain norms remain. The development of strategic thinking in situations like these seems to be inevitable. That's the reason for the fact that the citizens of the State shall be had as merely numbers and statistics:

> Undoubtedly, Foucault is right in saying that the social sciences benumbed the moral fiber of our governments. Something happens to politicians who find themselves exposed to endless tabs of income levels, recidivism rates, cost effectiveness of firearms for the artillery and the like - more or less what happens to the guards of the concentration camps. Policymakers of liberal democracies come to believe that nothing matters beyond what is shown by the predictions of experts. They don't conceive their fellow countrymen as citizens anymore. (RORTY apud MORRISON, 2006, p. 336)

Schmitt believes that normativism prevents the real application of the law that was only made possible by a decision that fulfills the gap between norm and reality. McCormick asks whether Schmitt's critique of positivism aims to bring back the substance of the law or to create the appropriate legal conditions for domination, as heralded by Schmitt (MCCORMICK, 1999, p. 207). Even if we consider that the relationship of Schmitt with National Socialism led to an inappropriate abandonment of his considerations about law and politics for a considerable time, it would be a dangerous naivety not to relate his scientific positions to his ideology.

3. The charismatic foundations of sovereignty and violence

In its fight against Enlightenment´s rationalism, according to him merely technical and instrumental, Schmitt stands beside the charismatic representation in its pre-modern form. However, he insists that what he truly seeks are more complete scientific results that would not be possible to achieve with legal positivism.

Nevertheless, in many subjects the theories of Schmitt and Kelsen meet. Even if Habermas claim that Kelsen and Schmitt represent opposite sides of the same coin is questionable, it is a fact that there is an intriguing relationship between the two thoughts. According to Habermas (MCCORMICK, 1999, p. 218), there is a voluntaristic basis for the theory of Kelsen even though the normative order has the function of suppressing such will. Habermas also believes there is an empty formalism in the decisionism of Schmitt, because a formal structure would be always required to keep sovereignty.

In the course of German political history those positions were mediated by the national socialism, embraced by Schmitt and rejected by Kelsen . Despite their different positions, they both helped to justify the actions of the Third Reich. On one hand, the defense of a charismatic sovereignty by Schmitt reflects the rise and the use of power by Hitler. On the other hand the technicality which comes from Kelsen´s normativism can also serve as the basis for the organization of the violent bureaucratic and administrative machinery of of the Nazi government.

The charisma of Hitler strengthened the Third Reich and enabled the use of the "final solution", but "nearly 2000 laws and administrative rules [...] designed to degrade and make German Jews even more miserable were necessary " (MCCORMICK, 1999, p. 362). They used those resources because Germany shared the modern belief in the legitimizing capacity of legality which Schmitt denounces in Legality and Legitimacy as the result of technical rules. This technicity is a common feature in all aspects of the final solution: whether in the legal and administrative spheres, or even in the development of practical instruments for the elimination of the Jews:

> Auschwitz was also a routine extension of the modern factory system. Instead of producing assets, the raw materials were human beings and the final product was death, the number of daily units was carefully recorded in the graphs of production. The chimneys, symbols of modern factory system, cast a acrid smoke produced by burning human flesh. The perfect organization of modern European railway network carrying a new type of raw material to the factories. And it was transported as any other type of load. In the gas chambers, the victims inhaled a poisonous gas that usually came from cyanide capsules produced by the advanced German chemical industry. Engineers designed the crematoria, administrators designed the bureaucratic system that functioned with a dynamism and efficiency that would make envious a lot of nations. The hole plan was generally a reflection of the modern scientific spirit upside down. What you saw there was nothing less than a gigantic scheme of social engineering.(FEINGOLD, 1983, p. 399-400 apud BAUMAN, 1998, 28 apud MORRISON, 2006, p. 367)

The collapse of Law was the fruit of the marriage between Hitler's fanatical charisma and the evilness of modern social engineering techniques. It has been long discussed whether positivism or decisionism represented the legal form of those years. But in fact, the union of both allowed an aestheticization of politics, an act of faith in unprecedent techniques of social control, as well as a moral emptiness of political life. Both theories are also the product of their time.

An age that holds a constant threat of a return to a legalized and rationalized violence. An era which has left the indelible smell of human flesh burning in our nostrils and marked our consciences with the perennial questions about the limits of state rationality. A time when mystery and disenchantment joined in an incestuous embrace that crushed millions of lives.

References

BAUMAN, Zygmunt. Modernidade e holocausto. Tradução Marcus Penchel. Rio de Janeiro: Jorge Zahar, 1998.

CATTONI, Marcelo. Jurisdição e hermenêutica constitucional. Belo Horizonte: 2004.

DERRIDA, Jacques. Prenome de Benjamin. In ___ . A força da lei, o fundamento místico da autoridade. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2007.

FEINGOLD, Henry L. How Unique is the Holocaust? In GROBMAN, Alex e LANDES, David (Orgs.) Genocide: criticail issues ofthe Holocaust. Los Angeles: Simon Wiesenthal Centre, 1983. p. 399-400.

GALUPPO, Marcelo. A epistemologia jurídica entre o positivismo e o pós-positivismo. In: Revista do Instituto de Hermenêutica Jurídica, 2005, vol. 1, nº 3, p.195-206.

GOMES, Alexandre Travessoni. O fundamento de validade do direito: Kant e Kelsen. Belo Horizonte: Mandamentos, 2000.

HÖFFE, Otfried. Justiça Política. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2006.

MCCORMICK, John P. Carl Schmitt's Critique of Liberalism Against Politics as technology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

MORRISON, Wayne. Filosofia do Direito, dos gregos ao pós modernismo. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2006.

NIETZSCHE, Friedrich.Vontade de Poder. Rio de Janeiro: Contraponto, 2008

_____. Acerca da verdade e da mentira. São Paulo: Editora Rideel, 2005

RIBEIRO, Fernando Armando. Conflitos no Estado constitucional democrático. Belo Horizonte: Mandamentos, 2004.

SCHMITT, Carl. *Legalidade e Legitimidad*e. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2007

_____. Sobre los três modos de pensar la ciencia jurídica. Madrid: Editorial Tecnos, 1996.

_____. Teologia Política. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2006.

_____. Teoría de la Constitución. Madrid: Alianza Editoria, 1996.

STRECK, Lênio L. Hermenêutica jurídica e(m) crise. Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado, 2007.

Identity, violence, reason and justice
The debate between Amartya Sen and Jonathan Glover

Fábio Creder

Abstract: In his 2006 work, "Identity and Violence", Amartya Sen addresses crucial issues for a better understanding of the social causes of violence, focusing mostly on the subject of identity. According to Sen, "many of the conflicts and barbarities in the world are sustained through the illusion of a unique and choiceless identity." Therefore, "the hope of harmony in the contemporary world lies to a great extent in a clearer understanding of the pluralities of human identity, and in the appreciation that they cut across each other and work against a sharp separation along one single hardened line of impenetrable division" (p. xiv). However, Sen asserts that in order to achieve that understanding, we need an appropriate recognition of the role and efficacy of choice and reasoned public voice. The author reaffirms this remark in his 2009 book, "The idea of justice", resorting to the European Enlightenment to show how within this powerful tradition clear-headed reasoning was saw as a major ally in the desire to improve societies.

Nevertheless, Sen avows that "it is difficult to generalize about any overwhelming dominance of reason in the thinking prevalent in the Enlightenment period," and that, as Isaiah Berlin has shown, there were also different kinds of counter-rational strands during that age. Sen observes that it has become quite common in contemporary political discussions to argue that the Enlightenment oversold the reach of reason, and that this supposed over-reliance on reason has contributed to the propensity towards atrocities in the post-Enlightenment world. One of the voices added to this line of reproach, according to Sen, belongs to Jonathan Glover, who, in his brilliant work "Humanity: a moral history of the 20th century," argues that the ideologies that supported the tyrannies of the 20th Century are heirs of the Enlightenment tradition.

In this paper, I would like to examine the issues underlying this debate, focusing on the question whether reason is capable to avert our tendency to view identity as a destiny, or ideology and blind belief have to prevail in certain circumstances.

Keywords: Amartya Sen;Jonathan Glover;Violence.

1.

In a review of Humanity: a moral history of the twentieth century, the magnum opus of his longtime friend, Jonathan Glover, Amartya Sen enunciated a harsh criticism to what he considered an excessive disenchantment with the hopes of the Enlightenment and the positive power of reason.

The review was first published in 2000 in the 'New York Review of Books', and then republished, slightly revised, five years later in The Argumentative Indian. The question bothered Sen so much that he restated it in his important 2009 work, The idea of justice.[1]

Humanity: a moral history of the twentieth century was first published in 1999. In the preface to the second edition, published in 2012, Glover gave Sen an answer.

In this brief paper, I would like to examine the issues underlying this debate. I will try to argue contrary to what Sen says that both authors are very confident in the power of reason.

2.

According to Sen, a strong and self-conscious reliance on reason marked the Enlightenment. Lucid reasoning was a major ally in the desire to make societies better, and "social improvement through systematic reasoning was a prominent strand in the arguments that were integral to the intellectual animation of the European Enlightenment."

However, Sen recognizes, with Isaiah Berlin, that it is "difficult to generalize about any overwhelming dominance of reason" in the thinking prevalent in the 'Age of Enlightenment'. "There were also different kinds of counter-rational strands during the period." "And it has become quite common in contemporary political discussions to argue that the Enlightenment oversold the reach of reason", and that "the over-reliance on reason, which the Enlightenment tradition helped to instil in modern thinking, has contributed to the propensity towards atrocities in the post-Enlightenment world." (cf. Sen, p. 14)

In this context, Sen says that Glover adds his voice to this line of reproach, in arguing that the Enlightenment view of human psychology has increasingly looked 'thin and mechanical', and 'Enlightenment hopes of social progress through the spread of humanitarianism and the scientific outlook' now appear rather 'naive'.

[1] "The Reach of Reason: East and West", in the New York Review of Books, 47 (20 July 2000), republished, slightly revised, in The Argumentative Indian (London: Penguin, 2005), essay 13.

Still according to Sen, Glover "goes on to link modern tyranny with that perspective (as have other critics of the Enlightenment), arguing that not only were 'Stalin and his heirs' altogether 'in thrall to the Enlightenment', but also that Pol Pot 'was indirectly influenced by it'." (Sen, p. 35).

However, Sen recognizes that Glover does not wish to seek his solution through the authority of religion or of tradition, since, as he notes, in this respect, 'we cannot escape the Enlightenment'. Therefore, Glover would have concentrated his fire on forcefully held beliefs, to which overconfident use of reasoning substantially contributes. The crudity of Stalinism would have its origin in this kind of beliefs.

Sen also recognizes that "it would be hard to dispute Glover's pointer to the power of strong beliefs and terrible convictions, or indeed to challenge his thesis of 'the role of ideology in Stalinism'." On the word of Sen, "the question to be asked here does not relate to the nasty power of bad ideas, but rather to the diagnosis that this is somehow a criticism of the reach of reason in general and the Enlightenment perspective in particular." Therefore, he asks,

> "Is it really right to place the blame for the propensity towards premature certainties and the unquestioned beliefs of gruesome political leaders on the Enlightenment tradition, given the pre-eminent importance that so many Enlightenment authors attached to the role of reasoning in making choices, particularly against reliance on blind belief? Surely, 'the crudity of Stalinism' could be opposed, as indeed it was by dissidents through a reasoned demonstration of the huge gap between promise and practice, and by showing the brutality of the regime despite its pretensions – a brutality that the authorities had to conceal from scrutiny through censorship and expurgation."

Sen remembers that one of the main points in favor of reason is that it helps us to scrutinize ideology and blind belief. As he says, "reason was not, in fact, Pol Pot's main ally. Frenzy and unreasoned conviction played that role, with no room for reasoned scrutiny." According to Sen, "the interesting and important issues that Glover's critique of the Enlightenment tradition forcefully raises include the question: where is the remedy to bad reasoning to be found? There is also the related question: what is the relationship between reason and emotions, including compassion and sympathy? And beyond that, it must also be asked: what is the ultimate justification for reliance on reason? Is reason cherished as a good tool, and if so, a tool for pursuing what? Or is reason its own justification, and if so, how does it differ from blind and unquestioning belief?"

3.

In his response, Glover says that consider Sen's critiques mistaken, since he has not become an opponent of the Enlightenment and has not stopped supporting reason.

Indeed, just like Sen, Glover wants to criticize reason with tools provided by reason itself. When he says that he wants to replace "the thin, mechanical psychology of the Enlightenment" for something "more complex, something closer to reality," he means that the dark side of our psychology is not something the Enlightenment thinkers seemed to be very aware. Actually, Glover keeps saying that one of his book's purpose is to defend the Enlightenment's hope that by understanding more about ourselves we can do something to create a world with less misery.

4.

At the start of the twentieth century, most people accepted the authority of morality in Europe. As Kant, in the eighteenth century, they thought there was a moral law that self-evidently should be obeyed, that the moral progress of humanity was possible, and that viciousness and barbarism were endangered. Glover notes that at the end of the century, because of its atrocities and the hopes they frustrated, it was difficult to be confident either about the moral law or about moral progress.

Glover proposes to resort to ethics to question history. The so-called "moral resources", which are the factors that prevent people from treating each other in a strictly selfish way, and the existing reasons to accept moral restraints of conduct, are central to his approach.

The purpose of using ethics to question history is, according to Glover, to help understand, to shed light on one side of human nature often left in darkness. He argues that, in understanding history, philosophical questions about ethics cannot be ignored. Poor answers to these questions contributed to a climate in which some of the disasters were made possible.

Glover recognizes that understanding these things is not enough to stop the horrors. However, passivity helps its perpetuation.

Glover identifies himself with philosophers more sympathetic to a more pragmatic form of ethics, in which principles are applied experimentally, in the expectation that they are shaped and modified by our answers to practical problems, i.e., to the mutual adjustment between principles and our intuitive responses. This process would lead to what Rawls called reflective equilibrium.

Nevertheless, pragmatism can be taken even further, embracing the idea that our ethical beliefs should also be revisable in the light of an empirical understanding of people and what they do. If, for example, says Glover, the great atrocities teach us lessons about our psychology, this should affect our image of what types of actions and character traits are good or bad.

Ethics is not a highly abstract intellectual discipline to which people's understanding is not important. Glover hopes to engage ethics and psychology together, a project which involve thinking about the implications of some of the things we now know that civilized people are capable of doing to each other.

At the beginning of the century, there was optimism derived from the Enlightenment that the diffusion of a scientific and human perspective would lead to the evanescence not only of the war, but also of other forms of cruelty and barbarism.

Now we would tend to realize the Enlightenment view of human psychology as fragile and mechanical, and Enlightenment hopes of social progress through the spread of humanitarianism and the scientific outlook as naive.

One of the purposes established by Glover in his book is to replace the fragile and mechanical psychology of the Enlightenment with something more complex, something closer to reality. One result, he said, is to produce a darker account. However, the other purpose of the book is to defend the Enlightenment hope of a world that is more peaceful and humane, hope that understanding more about ourselves we can do something to create a world with less misery. Glover believes that this hope is well founded. According to him there are more things, darker things to understand about ourselves than those who share this hope have generally recognized. However, although his book contains much that is uniquely dismal, the message is not mere pessimism. Glover says that we need to look hard and clearly, some monsters inside us, but that is part of the project of caging and taming them.

Before the horrors of the twentieth century, Glover assumes that a central part of morality should be concerned with preventing the recurrence of disasters caused by man, of the kind perpetrated by the Nazis.

Glover notes that rational self-interest can eventually lead to a "reciprocal altruism". Although not all generous acts are reciprocated, a generous approach to the needs of others makes it more likely the presence of friends when they are needed. However, the narrow self-interest, as we can learn from the lesson of the prisoner's dilemma, can be self-destructive. Cooperation is not always advantageous. Simply, under certain conditions, cooperation is more advantageous than selfishness.

All we can do then is expect that decent behavior have other roots than the calculated self-interest.

Fortunately, according to Glover, there are also moral resources, certain human needs and psychological tendencies that operate against the strictly selfish behavior. These trends make it natural for people to show restraint and respect, and to care about the others. They make it unlikely that the "morality" in a broad sense perish, despite the evanescence of the moral law.

What are these moral resources?

According to Glover, they would be three: moral identity, respect and moral standing, and sympathy. Those are, as he persuasively shows in his book, very fragile resources, but they are the only resources that we can effectively at least try to rely upon.

5.

Glover's realism in fact is not quite different from Sen's realism. Indeed, in the beginning of The Idea of justice, his 2009 book, Sen says:

> "What moves us, reasonably enough, is not the realization that the world falls short of being completely just – which few of us expect – but that there are clearly remediable injustices around us which we want to eliminate." (Sen, 2009, p. vii).

With these inaugural words, Sen aims to clarify unequivocally the content of their goals in The Idea of Justice. An absolutely fair world is a utopia with which almost nobody dreams anymore. It is not the frustration of a perhaps unrealizable desire what moves us to action, but the realization that there are remediable injustices, joined, of course, by a genuine desire of remediating them.

The aim of the theory of justice proposed by Sen is precise. He does not want to know the nature of the perfect justice. Therefore, complicated issues over this subject, particularly in the prevailing theories of justice in contemporary moral and political philosophy, does not seem worthy of the effort to solve them. In fact, according to Sen, the questions that must be answered do not inquire what constitutes the perfect justice, but what can be done to promote justice and remove injustice.

It seems to me that Glover would totally agree.

References

Sen, Amartya. 2009. The idea of justice. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

Glover, Jonathan. 2012 (2001). Humanity: A moral history of the 20th century. New Haven: Yale University Press.

The potential of testimony in transitional justice: what truth can it bring to light?

Laura Degaspare Monte Mascaro

Abstract: Frequently, authoritarian regimes, accompanied by extremely violent human rights violations perpetrated by the state, leave a mark on the past of a people's history, which has to be remembered and understudied for this people to be able to project its future with freedom and comprehension. Therefore, it is even worse when that period in history comes accompanied by what we call here forgetting, represented by the emergence of a gap between past and future, which prevents properly dealing with the past.

Transitional justice proceedings can be a very important stage where the memory of the past and of its horrifying events may emerge. We intend to discuss here the potential of a specific procedure usually adopted by transitional justice: the hearing of testimonies from victims and others affected by the regime.

The opening for testimonies allows the existence of a proper space, were the multiplicity of voices and truths of the victims can be heard. The testimonies go far beyond the truth of the facts and the documentary truth, reaching to memory and revelation of the identity of the victims. Evidence may not come from testimonies, but they may bring a literary, non-factual, truth (Jacques Derrida).

Also, the orality of the testimonies vivifies the experience and memory, which is not a trail here, but live expression (Jacques Derrida). Suffering dwells at the vicinity of the soul, not of the spirit, therefore how can it be disclosed to the world of appearances and signified through discourse (Hannah Arendt)?

Finally, at the testimony, the question of whether the author is an important piece of the puzzle or not for its comprehension is more clear, considering that the witness is the one having its identity and experience revealed at the stage, making possible to reach a more "spiritual interpretation" (Saint Augustine).

Keywords: Transitional Justice; memory and truth, testimony.

I. A gaze into Brazilian past and future

For the consolidation of the Brazilian Democratic State of Right, established by the Constitution of 1988, it would be fundamental to understand our dictatorial tradition, marked by violence and barbarism, which has been gradually dissolved to make room to the current democratic regime. We are driven by our temporal existence to give some meaning to tradition starting from the horizon that can be seen from the point where we are standing; in other words, we must dialogue with tradition in order to reach a comprehension that will serve as a base to our future projects (MAMAN, 2003, p. 54), individually and as a community. Accordingly, how can we create a future project of Brazilian society by ignoring its past?

The Brazilian State redemocratization process has imposed to our community in general, and to the victims and familiars of the dead and missing during the military regime in particular, a burden even heavier than the reconciliation: the onus of forgetting. At that moment, carrying out an agreement so that the redemocratization process could be accomplished in a "pacific" way went through the political understanding that the crimes perpetrated by the agents of the dictatorial regime would be somehow covered up by forgetting. This pact was sealed by the amnesty law (Law nº 6.683/1979).

People didn't realized, however, that with the veil that has been put over memory, an even greater debasement of human beings was produced, because consisted of a violence that curtailed the very possibility of care towards the human existence while it's most fundamental freedom.

The apparently gradual transition from the authoritarian regime to the democratic one has concealed a fracture of the worst kind, a disruption that cost the silence of an entire tradition and, thus, of the past that speaks through men. This fracture can be read as the one targeted by Arendt's philosophical investigations (LAFER, 1995, pp. 49-51): as a gap between past and future that prevents comprehension. What we call here forgetting represented this gap that prevents us from dealing with the past.

Thereby, only with the knowledge and understanding of the criminal violence intromission in large scale at the Brazilian State during the referred historical period will be possible to build a new model of state: that denies on solid grounds this violence and creates dialogical forms of political action.

II. Memory versus factual truth

Memory, is important to set clear, differs from history, because chooses, selects and is lived at the present, with the concern for the future, and is characterized by the vivid remain of a past (LAFER, 2012). As in Drummond's poem Resíduo, is about a selection, a pool, a trace and its subjective nonfactual truth:

> (...)
> E de tudo fica um pouco.
> Oh abre os vidros de loção
> e abafa
> o insuportável mau cheiro da memória.
>
> Mas de tudo, terrível, fica um pouco, > e sob as ondas ritmadas
> e sob as nuvens e os ventos
> e sob as pontes e sob os túneis > e sob as labaredas e sob o sarcasmo > e sob a gosma e sob o vômito
> e sob o soluço, o cárcere, o esquecido > e sob os espetáculos e sob a morte escarlate
> e sob as bibliotecas, os asilos, as igrejas triunfantes > e sob tu mesmo e sob teus pés já duros
> e sob os gonzos da família e da classe, > fica sempre um pouco de tudo.
> Às vezes um botão. Às vezes um rato.
> DRUMMOND

Yet, how to think at the fulfilling of a collective right to memory in relation to serious human rights violations that occurred during the Brazilian military dictatorship? Further, how to conciliate the construction of such a collective memory with the search for the truth, with the right to truth. Which truth are we talking about when we refer to the work of the National Commission of Truth? With no doubt, according to Celso Lafer (2012), we are talking of factual truth. Nevertheless, can this factual truth encompass memory and understanding of the events?

The National Commission of Truth wasn't created to have a legal approach to the facts and responsibilities, which would reach a final conclusion in a certain moment that cannot be altered, culminating in the res judicata. Historical judgment, on the contrary, is much more open and subject to revisions. The work of the Truth Commission comes to contribute with this last approach, however, the extent of history is really hard to be framed within a process as ephemeral as the Commission, which, by the end of its works, must produce a detailed report (LAFER, 2012).

Celso Lafer (2012) considers that, independently from the recognition of the Amnesty Law's validity and fairness, the Truth Commission has its own merits in the Transitional Justice agenda, once it (i) goes against forgetting; and (ii) represents the affirmation of the collective right to the factual truth concerning serious human rights violations.

On the other hand, according to his considerations, the fact of torture is irreparable, indelible, and the Truth Commission must be concerned with the very memory of that stain and of what is related to it (LAFER, 2012). However, the stain, the truth that arises from this suffering, not always serves the appeaser purpose that instructs, for instance, amnesty. Derrida wisely questions (2005, p. 84): "what does 'truth' means here, and what to do when the so said 'truth' can be an obstacle to reconciliation, rather than conduct towards it?"

What concerns us here is how to bring these facts to light, and, more importantly, bring them to the light of an individual comprehension, by those directly involved, as well as of a collective understanding, by the people, and even universal. The understanding, however, about the past and the authoritarian tradition must not be unique. Many voices have to be heard at the public space and many narratives built.

Then, truth commissions have the purpose of establishing "one truth" about serious human rights violations occurred during authoritarian regimes, and they are instituted for a determined period of time, having greater or smaller range. Usually, they not only have to put together an archive that ensembles sound and visual records, apart from documentation, transcriptions, deliberations, but also build a report that already operates a cut, a selection, an interpretation (DERRIDA, 2005, p. 84).

III. Testimonial truth as Saint Augustine's spiritual understanding

No doubt that the opening of the archives of the dictatorship, while documentary sources of that period, will contribute to the reconstruction of the facts occurred at the time. These documents will be target of assessment and analysis by the historical method. As we mentioned, the comprehensive unveiling of the dictatorial period depends not only on the facts to be discovered. The big question would be: how to look at and treat the wounds of the past?

In order to fulfill its purpose of uncovering the facts once masked, the truth commission can make use of certain tools such as the disclosure of archives, access to information and testimony. Disclosure of archives and access to information usually grants experts access to documents kept in secret by the same institutions that perpetrated crimes in the past. Although it is a very valuable and necessary resource, once the truth sought is opposite to hiding and dissimulation (LAFER, 2012), we know that each unveiling entails a necessary occultation of a portion that remains concealed. Therefore, there must be different ways of accessing the facts that provides a more complete and multifaceted picture of the so called truth, which is also so fragmented.

The validity of documentation is that it usually brings a much more unchanged version of the facts. Documents are not a place of memory, since memory should be alive. They usually contain a version of the facts registered in the time of the events and conserved. They are what can be called a trail traced by the writing, which has to be brought to life by the expert's interpretation. They usually carry a very literal significance, which is the heart of its legal certainty and reliability.

Another thing that differs the truth brought by documents of the one brought by testimonies is the fact that documental truth is impersonal. There is no personal "I" in the discourse disclosed by a document. It is usually an institution or a "position" that subscribes it and we cannot be sure about who wrote it. Therefore, the speech brought by the writing in a document is not present, it is absent and so is its author.

Getting back to Plato's Phaedrus and Derrida's Pharmakon, on the myth of the invention of writing, this tool is criticized firstly because the writing is far from the speech as the speech is far from the thinking (dianoia) and secondly because it wouldn't be a medicine to memory, but on the contrary, a poison, once memory is a live thing that should be exercised, not substituted by a prosthesis (NASCIMENTO, 2001; COMPAGNON, 1998, p. 58).

Therefore, the dualism of thought and language is very important when we refer to memory in the philosophical and ethical fields. Aristotle's Poetics expresses this dualism in the separation between history (muthos) and its expression (lexis). At the classic rhetoric, because of the legal structure of its original practice, such dualism is translated by the dichotomy between intentio and actio, or voluntas and scriptum (COMPAGNON, 1998, pp. 58-62).

Saint Augustine denounces the hermeneutic mistake that consists in privileging the scriptum, instead of the voluntas, considering that the writing is equivalent to the body that imprisons the spirit or the soul. Thus, Saint Augustine sides with a spiritual reading of the text, in opposition to the carnal or corporal reading, and identifies the body with the writing and the canal reading with the one that cannot go beyond the text and cannot infer other meanings apart from the literal one. However, it is clear that in the same way that the body has to be respected, he recognizes that the writing should be preserved as the starting point to the spiritual interpretation (COMPAGNON, 1998, pp. 58-62).

The distinction between carnal and spiritual interpretation is not originally from Agustin, but refers to the Pauline binomial: "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." (AUGUSTINE, 2009, III, 5)

So, how can we bring up the presence of spirit and soul that is missing in the documents? How can we make the soul rise to the surface?

One of the important things for us to mention at this point is the opening of the Truth Commission for testimony[1]. This opening makes room for a proper space, in midst of the proceedings of the Truth Commission, for the multiplicity of voices and truths of the victims. Note that because they are discourses based on the memory of individuals – and not official documents, to which can be attributed certain certification of the truth as suitability to certain parameters – we are dealing here with the elaboration of discursive truth, from fragments of memory, the selection of these fragments and testimonial speech.

Nuremberg trials focused on documentary evidence and there was no space for the voices of the victims, which, in its turn, was found in the Eichmann trial, due to the testimonies of the victims' wide range (LAFER, 2012). In the context of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa were also collected testimonies, which were analyzed by Derrida's brilliant lecture Forgiveness, Truth, Reconciliation:

[1] The space of these testimonies, however, for the construction of this truth, is not limited to the Truth Commission, having testimonies been collected before other commissions with different purposes, such as reparation and for the creation of other spaces of memory such as the Resistance Memorial in São Paulo, for instance.

What Gender? (2005). At the context analyzed, however, the forgiveness was dealt as a public subject, delegable and exploited by the political utility, what is not intended, at least not explicitly, by the Brazilian National Commission of Truth.

Derrida (2005) questioned whether the validity of testimonies as factual evidence should be trusted, once proof, evidence, will never be of the order of testimony. Maybe not, but they still have the power to bring out a truth other than the factual. Finally, perhaps the goals of the Truth Commission should not be restricted to factual truth, risking, however, having an unpredictable end.

Going back to Augustine (2009), he considers the speech more close to the "the word that we have in our hearts" than what he calls "signs". According to him:

> Just as when we speak, in order that what we leave in our minds may enter through the ear indo the mind of the hearer, the word which we have in our hearts becomes an outward sound and is called speech; and yet our thought does not lose itself in the sound, but remains complete in itself, and takes the form of speech without being modified in its own nature by the change. (AUGUSTINE, I, 12)

We can observe that Saint Augustine doesn't establish a difference between what comes from the heart and what comes from the mind, between soul and spirit. Hannah Arendt, on the contrary, does that on The Life of the mind, while explaining how soul could be disclosed as an inauthentic appearance.

IV. Bringing the soul to surface

First of all, appearance not only shows, but also conceals something, as what is veiled and unveiled at the a-letheia. According to Merleau-Ponty ([S. d.] apud ARENDT, 1992, p. 21), quoted by Arendt, "nothing, no side of something shows itself without effectively hiding the others". Therefore, protection might be one of the most important features of appearance.

Subsequently, Hannah Arendt (1992, pp. 23-25) operates an inversion of hierarchy between appearance and substance, considering that appearance may be more significant than the functions it conceals, which serve to the preservation of the individual and the species. Accordingly, follows the distinction between authentic and inauthentic appearances: from things that spontaneously are offered to the senses and things that only are shown in consequence of a violation of the authentic appearance.

In consequence, what is shown authentically is what distinguishes us as individuals, because from the inside we would look all the same. But why is it important to discuss the testimony? Because this analysis may be adequate not only to the functions of the body, but also to the dichotomy spirit/soul versus language.

Appearance shows a power of major expression compared to what is internal. The presupposition that soul and spirit are the same - because both are opposed to the body due to the invisibility that characterizes them - doesn't apply when it comes to the way of expressing and making them come to the world of appearances. What applies to the spirit doesn't apply to the soul. The metaphorical discourse is indeed adequate to the activity of thinking (spiritual), but the life of the soul is much better expressed in a look, in a sound, in a gesture, than in the speech (ARENDT, 1992, p. 26).

For the spirit, even the mute activity that doesn't appear already constitutes a kind of speech, the silent dialog of me with myself and, as stated by Augustine (2009, I, 12), isn't altered in nature when takes the form of speech. Our feelings, passions and emotions, on the other hand, have the same trouble of our internal organs to become part of the world of appearances.

When Hannah Arendt discusses the past of totalitarianism, she argues that this past has proven to be incapable of being "dominated", indicating that If the refuse to think the unthinkable has prevented us to reevaluate legal categories, that appear to be harmless side issues, what to say about the horror? This is an obstacle for the understanding, since a lot of attempts to translate experiences - which are mostly emotive and forbid the speech - have shown to be inadequate. Thereby, it is necessary to keep in mind the difference between the unspeakable horror and not so horrific experiences, but frequently repulsive. As stated by Celso Lafer (2012), the fact of torture is irretrievable; however, is the memory of this stain that must be dealt by the Truth Commission.

How, then, can we expose these experiences of suffering into the world of appearances? Every form of demonstrating that suffering, apart from physical signs, is nothing more than what the activity of thinking does with this raw material, and is distinct from the suffering itself. Involves a decision of what should appear, and how. And so, at the moment of reflection and transfer to the form of speech, is the time to signify the feeling, through the spirit. It is this sense that is given to the experience of suffering, beyond the fact itself, that must be seized and will allow the victim to identify his or herself as such. And how the individual carries this translation, is what makes that suffering and person unique, not the suffering itself (ARENDT, 1992, p. 28).

V. The scene of the testimony and its character of presence

According to Hannah Arendt (2001, p. 199), the "stories" produced by action and by the web of human relations say a lot about their subject/character, the hero who is in the center of every story - who, however, can't be called its author, because no single individual can[2]. According to Hannah Arendt, the real story, in comparison to a fictional one, has no visible creator because isn't created and the only "who" it reveals is its hero. Therefore "we can only know who a man was if we know the story of which he is the hero - in other words, his biography (…)" (ARENDT, 2001, p. 199).

This way, another important aspect of the testimony and its differing presence is the attendance of the victim or witness in body and soul, as we commonly say. According to Derrida (2005, pp. 80-84), the scene of the testimony and of truth, of the unveiling of truth, stages the witness' body that can also be a victim (of torture, rape). New issues arise from this presence: the violence inflicted upon the testimonial body at the very moment of the testimony, by testimony, by its veracity, either because for the first time the woman has to unveil the traces of violence on her body, either because has to report one or several abuses. As pointed out by Arendt, in some cases, the suffering as found in the soul cannot be spoken, because it would make the victim revive or even enhance the prior violence.

Every violence inflicted on the body, is somehow, sexual abusive. For this reason, some women at the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission couldn't reveal the truth, being incapable of manifesting what had been inflicted upon them, precisely because their public and private speech about the experience had been murdered a priori. Sometimes, the condition of testimony doesn't exist and, when it does, since the experience is revived by the testimony, an objection that could be made to the truth and reconciliation project in South Africa: that these two purposes couldn't be conciliated (DERRIDA, 2005, p. 78)[3].

[2] Further, humanity is an abstraction that can never be considered an active agent

[3] Far from healing the wounds, sometimes this speech reactivates the hate, even because

One of Derrida's metaphors that reinforces the aspect of presence of the testimonies is the metaphor of the theater. The limited time of operation of the Truth Commission makes it the stage of a play, when truth comes to the stage. Derrida (2005, p. 85) states that "there is a stage in which scenes, acts, must be represented, with its proper duration, namely, a finite one"[4]. Once the drama and the catharsis have occurred, the curtain must fall.

In this sense, the limited time for the search for truth is a theatrical time, controlled, as well as the structure of the stage, the actors, the acts and the scenes that take place in a particular time and space. A question that rises inevitably is whether this singular performance is enough so that these actors and the audience handle the truth presented and not presented. It is also curious that the metaphor of the theater is often used to understand and picture the court and trial[5]. Even though the purpose of a truth commission is not the same as the purpose of a trial, were the facts and the truth will be interpreted as they fit in the criminal law standards or not, both are limited in time and have the character of presence when it comes to the testimonies, which make both resemble a performance.

Not for nothing that Hannah Arendt (2001, pp. 199-200) states there are many ways to reify the content and meaning of action and discourse in a work of art, however, the best way to express the action and discourse revealing character, which is intimately connected to the live flow of speech and action, is the drama that "imitates" action. The mimesis element is present also in the act of writing the play; however, it only achieves its full existence when interpreted at the theater:

> Only the actors and interlocutors who reconstitute the plot of the story can transmit the whole meaning, not so much of the story itself, but of the 'heroes' that it highlights. (ARENDT, 2001, p. 200)

In terms of Greek Tragedy, the universal meaning of the story is revealed by the chorus, that doesn't mimic and whose commentaries are pure poetry. The theater, thus, is seen by Arendt as the art of politics par excellence. We must highlight the conflict of the Greek Tragedy, which the character of presence of the testimonies makes the meeting between the victim and the perpetrator a very plausible possibility.

---

[4] Free translation by the author.

[5] As in Jogo, Ritual e Teatro: Um Estudo Antropológico do Tribunal do Júri, by Ana Lúcia Pastore Schritzmeyer.

is: how can one act politically (praxis), when one is not free?

Heidegger, in his Parmenides, shows an opinion on the Greek tragedy that also relates its way of representing to the character of the polis. The polis, as historical residence of the Greek humanity, and the stage for the aletheia conflict[6] has a cruel, atrocious character, where the ascension an fall of man take place[7] (HEIDEGGER, 2008, 132-133). The disclosure and concealment of the being happen on the basis of the speech and, very particularly, are pictured at the tragedy. The tragic mask that makes it so different from the subsequent dramatic arts is a symbol of the duality of aletheia that existed in the polis.

The way the Greeks inhabited the world and expressed themselves literarily and poetically at that original space of politics was the tragedy, making use of myth language to express the covering and uncovering of being, discussing the issue of the historical struggle of man against his fate. According to this analysis, this is the true meaning of the tragedy.

The tragedy tries to mimic the action, outlining the boundaries of freedom. The Greek tragedy essentially portrays human freedom against the fate guided by the daimons. The essence of tragedy, therefore, lies in the political man in full action, not in the modern political action, we must say, but in the original one, which is close to Arendt's understanding.

Consequently, we wonder if the truth revealed by the testimonies is the kind of truth pursued by the traditional historical method. Maybe the purpose of the truth commission itself, by its final report, is a supposedly objective truth, as an historian could intend to determine and fixate. However, the truth revealed in the testimonies may not be so objective, but yet fragmented and, at large, gathering multiple aspects of the so called truth, each one revealed by a unique speech that brings an singular understanding of what really happened.

As these reports are mostly informed by the live memory, than by a look that remained frozen in time, the most important aspect brought by them is not the fact or the experience itself, but what has been done with it. How it was processed and interpreted by the spirit and thinking over the years. The movement of the spirit, according to Derrida's interpretation of Hegel, is what constitutes its method and this movement is what is on the scene (DERRIDA, 2005, p. 69).

[6] Were the beings are hidden and disclosed.

[7] It is not incidental that men are pictured like this in the tragedy, because the need for the tragedy comes from this rooting of the polis in the conflicting character of aletheia.

When a woman in the South African Commission, whose husband was kidnapped and murdered, is invited to hear his assassins' testimony, she is questioned whether she is willing to forgive them. And she isn't. With this statement she goes beyond her unique and unspeakable suffering. She signifies it, going against the sense of a forgiving taken from her by a government, or any political-legal device. Her "exact" words were: "No government can forgive. [Silence.] No commission can forgive. [Silence.] Only I can forgive. [Silence.] And I'm not willing to forgive [Silence.]"[8] (DERRIDA, 2005, p. 75).

By saying "only I", she also means that the first victim, her husband, is dead. This makes us remember Primo Levi's testimonial and literary work Se questo è un uomo, considering that he, as a survival, admits to write "by power of attorney", namely, on behalf of those who perished and who cannot return to tell their own death (BOBBIO, 1997). Thereby, we can see what we call intersexuality arise from the multiple references established consciously or not between one speech and the other.

Also, this woman's statement, which was translated from a local language, raises the issue of the language that is imposed to the witnesses in their testimony. The mandatory or adequate language to these commissions tends to impose certain logic, sometimes, legal or political to what is said or translated. Considering the cases of indigenous people that had entire villages or communities decimated during the Brazilian military dictatorship - as recently emerged with the "discovery" of the Figueiredo report into genocide, torture, rape and enslavement of indigenous tribes[9] -, this matter is really important to be presented.

The local languages or dialects also translate the singularity of the victims' untranslatable suffering. And the meaning of certain words or expressions can easily get lost when the witness is "advised" to use a more convenient language, or when its speech is translated or reported by other experts with their own words, belonging to a certain métier, let it be legal, journalistic, psychological etc. According to Derrida (2005, p. 76), "when reading the sessions memoirs, with all those filters, we no nothing, we must admit, of what really occurred. Particularly since the

[8] Free translation by the author.

[9] <http://www.theguardian.com/world/2013/may/29/brazil-figueiredo-genocide-report> Accessed on August 9th, 2013.

irreducible screen of language is at once filtrating and deforming"[10]. The character of presence of the testimony should be sheltered even concerning the language spoken.

VI. Literary memoir and oral testimony

I must make a reservation; however, in view of the option we took in this lecture to approach not all kinds of testimonial reports, but only oral testimonies. Although there are outstanding testimonies belonging to the field of literature, written narrative, memoirs, etc, we had to make a choice for this work, once the way of being of these two kinds of narratives are extremely different and the issues that each one raises in terms of philosophical and linguistic thinking are indeed related, but sometimes are two sides of the same coin, thus, opposed. It is important to stress, then, that testimonial language is different from the testimony itself, which we are now discussing.

Mandela's memoirs, for instance, written during his martyrdom in captivity for 27 years, was essential for the translation of his pain to the testimonial language. And it was essential for his reconciliation with the oppressor as well, as an intimate process, but not only. According to Derrida (2005, pp. 60-62), his narrative would serve to free the oppressed, but also his oppressor, because it was destined to the other, it brought the reconciliation speech to the other. For Mandela, the political reconciliation process has always been connected to the walk to freedom. The reconciliation appeal had always been connected to the transcendental ideal of freedom, because he intended to address this freedom not only to his people, but to the oppressors as well.

This transcendental and political meaning that was given to his personal experience and suffering shows how can the testimonial language - and the effort of turning all that was lived into a structured and temporal narrative - help us signify history itself, our past of oppression. This is the kind of reading that should be made of the testimonial language: a reading that goes beyond its literal meaning. Quoting St. Augustine (2009, III, 9): "Now, as to follow the letter, and to take signs for the things that are signified by them, is a mark of weakness and bondage, so to interpret signs wrongly is the result of being misled by error".

The carnal interpretation is typical of formal documents and reports and shouldn't be reproduced by the commissions' members and others whenever listening, of even reading, a testimony, because that would mean the "subjection to the flesh by a blind adherence to the letter".

[10] Free translation by the author.

In addition, the literary aspect of Mandela's memoires made possible his discourse to be addressed to the world and to future times, surpassing the barriers of time and space. His narrative could transmute the fight for a particular cause, into a universal cause. This extrapolation is more complicated to be achieved by the oral testimony; however, it has its own merits.

References

ARENDT, H. A Condição humana. 10. ed. Rio de Janeiro: Forense Universitária, 2001.

_____. A vida do espírito: o pensar, o querer, o julgar. Rio de Janeiro: Relume Dumará/Ed. UFRJ, 1992.

ST. AUGUSTINE. On Christian Doctrine. Christian Classics Ethereal Library, 2009.

BOBBIO, N. Primo Levi, se questo è un uomo. In: Nuova Antologia. - A. 132, fasc. 2202 (apr.-giu. 1997), p. 19-23

COMPAGNON, A. Le démon de la théorie: Littérature et sens commun. Paris: Édition du Seuil, 1998.

DERRIDA, J. O Perdão, a verdade, a reconciliação: qual gênero?. In: NASCIMENTO, E. (org.). Jacques Derrida: pensar a desconstrução. São Paulo: Estação Liberdade, 2005. pp. 45-92.

HEIDEGGER, M. Parmênides. Petrópolis: Vozes, 2008.

LAFER, C. Desafios: ética e política. São Paulo: Editora Siciliano, 1995.

_____. Justiça, História, Memória: reflexões sobre a Comissão da Verdade. Seminário Internacional: História Contemporânea: Memória, Trauma, Reparação. Rio de Janeiro, UFRJ, IH/IFCS, 10, mai. 2012.

MAMAN, J. A. Fenomenologia existencial do direito: crítica do pensamento jurídico brasileiro. 2 ed. São Paulo: Quartier Latin, 2003

NASCIMENTO, E. Derrida e a Literatura: "notas" de literatura e filosofia nos textos da desconstrução. 2 ed. Niterói: EdUFF, 2001.

The State in crisis
Biopolitics and the state of exception

Elsa Cristine Bevian[1]

Abstract: The state as democratic sovereignty is in crisis. The economization of power relations, globally, is eroding the principles and purpose for which the state was idealized. As Bauman says, "power is global, but politics remains local." Sovereign is the capital, that rules the market, as if there were no states. A quality education, to educate citizens, is stifled by an education marketing, supporter of education competitive, revealing the failure of the state through institutional violence, permissive. There's excessive preoccupation with biological life, with the body, featuring biopolitics and resulting in the absence of reflection and critical thinking, and therefore, a society apolitical.

For Agamben, biopolitics the river runs underground form throughout history, and biopolitics, in this sense, at least as old as the sovereign exception. Foucault claims to be a phenomenon that started in the eighteenth century, when the state puts the biological life in the center of your calculations.

The power produces truths and subjection. You need to defend society from itself. How I made with analysis of reality, to be able to think again? A person's body is able, make a positive force. It is possible the body another reality, being and doing different? The truth is a constituent, is present in religious discourse, scientific, institutional. The truth is a problem and where there is no limit, there is no freedom. The practice of freedom is I always put me on edge. I'll move to new horizons, to new possibilities. The truth is tension between the limit and possibility. Instances transform limits on new possibilities. The fewer the instances of authoritarian power, the greater the possibility of freedom. Truth and freedom act as puzzles, always at opposite poles, but constitute mutually, is a game, a tension. I am the fruit of social tensions. What is truth and what grounds should I take to be legitimate or true?

We need to strengthen the rule of democratic sovereignty and this is possible only through education and training policy. Relationship of resistance or acceptance, as forms of expression of power, from a single instance to a higher instance. If we experience a state of exception, failure of democracy to overcome competitive social pathologies, it is necessary to overcome the passivity and neutrality in the face of important topics. You must redeem the want of will to truth and power.

[1] Alumni of the Interdisciplinary Doctorate Program in "Ciências Humanas" at UFSC. Member of the faculty staff in the Department of Law at Universidade Regional de Blumenau/SC (FURB) teaching General and Professional Ethics, Labor Law and Collective Law. She's been performing research and extension work on the world of work.

Keywords: democratic sovereignty; state of exception; biopolitics.

1. The State idealized by Hobbes and its transformations

When Hobbes writes about the natural condition of the mankind regarding its happiness and misery, in Leviathan, he claims that "Nature hath made men so equal in the faculties of body and mind as that, though there be found one man sometimes manifestly stronger in body or of quicker mind than another, yet when all is reckoned together the difference between man and man is not so considerable as that one man can thereupon claim to himself any benefit to which another may not pretend as well as he."[2]

For Hobbes, it is from equality in terms of capacities that the equality in terms of hopes derives. It is the hope to achieve our purposes. However, since many desire the same purposes, and when this is not possible, they eventually start to compete with one another, often becoming enemies, making an effort to destroy or subjugate one another; this reality of human nature generates distrust. He claims that one expects the other to ascribe the same value that he ascribes to himself, and facing all the signs of contempt or underestimate, he naturally makes an effort towards the glory, even causing damage to the other.

Facing the distrust among human beings and the constant state of war due to his survival instinct, the author claims that there must be a common power to regulate men, for where there's no regulation or law, there's no notion of good and evil, justice and injustice. For Hobbes, the justice and injustice are not part the faculties of body and mind, and these are qualities that belong to the human beings who live in society.

"The passions that incline men to peace are: fear of death; desire of such things as are necessary to commodious living; and a hope by their industry to obtain them. And reason suggested convenient articles of peace upon which men may be drawn to agreement."

[2] HOBBES, Thomas. Leviatã ou Matéria, forma e poder de um estado eclesiástico e civil. Thomas Hobbes de Malmesbury; tradução de João Paulo Monteiro e Maria Beatriz NIzza da Silva. 3ª ed, São Paulo: Abril Cultural, 1983. p.74.

In order to provide security, people abdicate their state of nature, in favor of a constitutional covenant of the State, whose role "is to confer all their power and strength upon one man, or upon one assembly of men, that may reduce all their wills, by plurality of voices, unto one will." (HOBBES, p.105) And we agree with the sanction resulting from the breach of covenant, because covenants without the sword, as the author asserts, are but words and of no strength to secure a man at all.

The social, political and economical relations have significantly changed since the XVII Century until the current XXI Century. We've gone through major revolutions in the field of ethics, the social organization, the economy and politics. We are experiencing the economical globalization revolution, which means the State is unable to ensure, through the covenants, the security for its citizens. We are experiencing times when, according to Bauman, the (economical) power is globalized, however, the politics, being the space for reflection and discussion on the social organization, remains local.

We experience the violence of one subject against another, disputes for the survival and for the power of domination, through the concentration of wealth. It is power legally permitted by the State, without limits, though, that doesn't benefit the collective welfare and security. This State, neoliberal, takes advantage of the social disorganization - the less social organization, the fewer demands, requirements, responsibilities, the less fair enforcement of the law. The State, as it was idealized by Hobbes, aimed to ensure security to its people; today, it allows lives to be snuffed. The omissions and weaknesses take place in all State branches – executive, legislative and judiciary, and in all the realms.

The democratic system is involved with buying and selling of votes, trickery and favoritisms, benefiting whoever has more money to invest in election campaigns as opposed to the public and egalitarian funding. These favoritisms and exchange of favors, are often hidden, through bidding procedures, omissions in inspections, withholding and tax exemption or other forms. There are a number of ways of corruption in the state system.

Our concerns come from the judicial work in law, as well as from working on teaching, research and extension that we accomplish at the University about the world of work and also environment issues. There is plenty of questioning that has been following us such as: 1) is it possible that law, being fruit and result of an agreement in a certain historical moment, can solve social problems? 2) Once there is the prescript/law there's a prescript/law, with advanced conceiving, why isn't it often enforced if it aims the social welfare? 3) What is power and how is it expressed through biopolitics? 4) Does guaranteeing participation of workers in the councils, through the law, solve their problems or the issues about them being less explored and controlled?

2. Power, biopolitics and State of exception

Foucault (1999, p.20-21) asserts that "power is that concrete one which every individual holds and whose partial or total cession enables political power or sovereignty to be established. [...] Power is essentially that which represses nature, the instincts, a class, individuals." The power, for the author, circulates, works through networks, passes through the individuals and is never held as a wealth or a property. People are not dominant or dominated the whole time. He still claims that "we have to study power outside the model of Leviathan, outside the field delineated by juridical sovereignty. We have to analyze it by beginning with the techniques and tactics of domination." (FOUCAULT, 1999, p.40)

Politics, for Foucault (199, p.23), would be "the continuation of war by other means. Politics, in other words,sanctions and reproduces the disequilibrium of forces manifested in war." For the author, law – as a fruit of politics and power, does not produce peace, and the war keeps doing damage in the inside of all mechanisms of power, even the most regular ones .

The law is, therefore, result of social contradictions, it isn't only result of constituted authorities, but result of social practices. Law, not as a priori, but a posteriori.

Foucault claims that freedom and power cannot be dissociated and that, where there's power, there's possibility for change. It takes resistance so each one can take care of himself, govern himself, and not be overruled by others. Freedom is, in itself, the politics. For such reason, the strife for ethics, about whose absence there's so much complaining, is the strife for freedom, which means fighting for the creation of prescripts, fighting for the enforcement of existing prescripts, as well as submitting the prescripts to critical thinking if we realize the distance between the legal and the legitimate/just. As we know, for Foucault (2006, p.267), "ethics is the form that freedom takes when it is informed by reflection". For him, as much as we cannot live without there being governance devices in which we are inevitably inserted, it is essential that we diminish the states of domination, and can establish new forms of subjectivity, fighting for ethics: it is related to the articulation point between the ethical concern and the political fight for respect of rights, between the critical reflection against the abusive techniques of the government and ethical investigation that allows the institution of individual freedom." (FOUCAULT, 2006, p.285)

Agamben, in his work Homo Sacer (2002), uses the "bare life" as the protagonist of his work, which would be equivalent to the extinguishable being in in Roman Law, in the sense that homo sacer' life could be eventually exterminated by anyone without any law being violated. He asserts that "politicization of "bare life" as such – constitutes the decisive event of modernity and signals a radical transformation of the political-philosophical categories of classical thought." (AGAMBEN, 2002, p.12)

The concept of "bare life" is applied to the world of work, as the workers are found in this condition, being extremely controlled, submitted to strenuous labor conditions, with goals that are beyond physical and mental limitations. To guarantee their job maintenance, in times of globalization, with surplus labor and moreover, with low-acquisitive-power salaries, they end up submitting to this system, with no resistance and becoming eventually ill.

The current capital – financial and economical power, does not have a specific nation and moves quickly between the spaces/nations and there's no regulation or world consensus to balance the international Market. The international organizations are failing to balance the economical relations between the nations and let alone, hold the thirst for profit of the international financial system. The International Labor Organization – ILO, is limited to establishing Work Regulatory Conventions, however, the States, that proclaims themselves as "sovereign" for a constitutional principle, are not obligated to ratify these Conventions, incorporating them to their legal order. As Bauman (2009) claims, "we're living a lapse in which, virtually, everything can happen, but nothing can be performed with complete security and certainty of success. One of the main characteristics of this interregnum is the increasing divorce between power and politics. The power has become global and politics hasn't managed to transpose the local. The territory-state-nation Trinitarian principle is in crisis."

Foucault (1999, p.40) affirms that "We have to study power outside the model of Leviathan, outside the field delineated by juridical sovereignty and the institution of the State. We have to analyze it by beginning with the techniques and the tactics of domination." For the author, this new kind of power – the disciplinary power, is one of the major inventions of the bourgeois society and was one of the fundamental tools for the implantation of industrial capitalism and the kind of society to which it is correlated.

What legitimates power? The power as institutions? We need a new economy of power relations. We experience "transversal struggles", that are effects of power of some over one another. Relations of resistance or acceptance. They start from an individual extent to a larger extent. In this sense, Foucault, in the text The subject and the Power (1995), claims that we should not look at the regulated and legitimate forms of power, but look at its extremities, at its outer limits at the point where it becomes capillary, in the local, regional institutions. He also says that we should not analyze the power on an level of the intentions or decisions (decision-making extents), but in the actual practices, where the power produces the real effects. We should not take the power as a phenomenon of massive domination, but as something that circulates, that works through network, in which the individuals are always in conditions of submitting and being submitted. It passes through our bodies, but one should not do the analysis from the center (State – legislative, executive and judiciary) to the periphery (individuals), but rather do an ascendant analysis of power, within the infinitesimal, small, located devices, peripheral, where the techniques and devices operate and produce their effects. And finally, he affirms that we should not analyze the power in terms of ideology, but its instruments and effective techniques, its fine mechanisms and where the power keeps its connection with knowledge.

We are living times of biopower – making it live and letting it die and biopolitics with the general sense of political power that operates as a formulator and an actor of a domination or nationalization of life. The purpose of biopolitics is the multiple body, the human being as a member of human species, rather than as an individual body, that was target of disciplinary power, initial form of biopower in modernity.

The biopolitics does not clash with the sovereignty theory. Agamben claims that the biopolitics is the original contribution of the sovereign power, because it is as old as the sovereign exception. For Agamben, the original structure of the sovereign power brings along a specific relation with life, a relation of exception. Sovereignty means always – for Agamben – that life is being exposed to violence and to the death power, in other words, that all the exercise of sovereignty includes in itself the game of inclusion and exclusion, typical of the state of exception that defines all the exercise of sovereignty. Whereas for Foucault, the biopower is a specific form of power, for Agamben, all political power, all exercise of sovereignty, is always biopower.

For Agamben, sovereign is whoever decides over the state of exception, is whoever is, somehow, outside the law to establish the law, acting as if there were no law. Hobbes also sees the sovereign as such: it is only sovereign if it is not submitted to the law, if it remains in the state of nature.

The bare life, in other words, "the life of the homo sacer that can be killed but not sacrificed" (AGAMBEN, 2002), remains in the margins of the same society that claims to guarantee the fundamental and universal human rights to the citizens. Placing the biological life in the center of its calculus, the modern State does nothing but reconduct the secret bond that joins the power and the bare life to the light.

For Agamben, there is no point in distinguishing totalitarian phenomena and liberal democracies, because they all have in their center of preoccupation the relation between sovereignty and the bare life. The liberal democracies as well as the totalitarian phenomena have the same "hidden paradigm of the political space of modernity": camps of concentration. "our contemporary politics does not recognizes no other value than life, and while the contradictions that this implies are not solved, Nazism and Fascism, that is, regimes which have taken bare life as its supreme political criterion, are bound to remain unfortunately timely". (AGAMBEM, 2002, p. 20).

We must try to understand what happens to us, problematizing ourselves among everything. Foucault states that the scholar's task, being inspired by Kant, is to be critical and permanently critical of himself, not getting attached to truths, dogmas, in order to keep thinking. But the pursuit of autonomy can never be considered a concluded project, but rather something that is always to be completed. And making the effort for this reading is the first moral commitment. If the last Foucault is the care for oneself and the ethics as a freedom practice, it is also the one that speaks about resistance, the one that questions himself more than before: how can we eventually be less governed than we are?

We face the inertia and the submission, the subjection. Hannah Arendt has already professed the difficulty to reach the action these days, however, she alerts that the humankind needs to find the solution, like "the alive microorganisms, which through mutation, manage to survive to the action of antibiotics" (ARENDT, 1983, p.336).

We need to strengthen the State as a democratic sovereignty and this is only possible through education and political training. Relations of resistance or acceptance, as forms of power expression, starting from an individual realm (bare life) to a greater realm. If we experience a state of exception, with scarce competitive democracy to overcome social pathologies, it is necessary to overcome the inactivity and neutralism before major topics. It is necessary to redeem the will from the desire for truth and potency.

References

AGAMBEN, Giorgio. Homo Sacer*: o poder soberano e a vida nua. Belo Horizonte, Edit. UFMG, 2002.

ARENDT, Hannah. A condição humana/ Hannah Arendt; tradução de Roberto Raposo; introdução de Celso Lafer. – Rio de Janeiro: Forense Universitária, 1983.

BAUMAN, Zygmunt. Entrevista a Héctor Pavón do jornal Clarín, 18-07-2009. http://www.rts.org.br/entrevistas/entrevistas-2009/zigmunt-bauman-sociologo, consulta em 01.08.09.

HOBBES, Thomas. Leviatã ou Matéria, forma e poder de um estado eclesiástico e civil. Thomas Hobbes de Malmesbury; tradução de João Paulo Monteiro e Maria Beatriz NIzza da Silva. 3ª ed, São Paulo: Abril Cultural, 1983.

FOUCAULT, Michel. Em defesa da sociedade: curso no Collége de France. Tradução Maria Ermantina Galvão. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 1999.

_____. Ética, sexualidade, política./ Michel Foucault: organização e seleção de textos Manoel Barros de Motta; tradução Elisa Monteiro, Inês Autran Dourado Barbosa. – 2.ed. – Rio de Janeiro: Forense Universitária, 2006.

_____. O Sujeito e o Poder. In: RABINON DREYFUS. Uma trajetória filosófica. Para além do estruturalismo e da hermenêutica. Rio de Janeiro: Forense Universitária, 1995.

Working time in Brazil
Unconstitutionality direct actions filed in the Federal Supreme Court between 1988 and 2012

Eleonora Kira Valdez de Moura[1]

Abstract: Unconstitutionality Direct Actions (ADI) are instruments available for Brazilian society, provided by the 1988 Constitution, in order to ensure the unity of the internal legal order and to protect fundamental rights. This research focused the constitutional issues about working time which managed to reach Federal Supreme Court by way of unconstitutionality direct actions, since the promulgation of 1988 Constitution until December 31, 2012. Information collection was performed by reading all the initial petitions of unconstitutionality direct actions filed in this period, and then data were systematized, providing graphs and tables which have supported further analysis. The results have allowed identification of problems caused by normative reconfiguration of working time in Brazil, in the context of globalization and flexible labor rights that occurred in the 1990s, and pointed to the displacement of the conflict between capital and labor to Brazilian Judiciary. The survey has detected four groups of issues involving fundamental rights of working time presented Federal Supreme Court: weekly and daily working hours, compensation schedules via hour bank, weekly paid rest on Sundays and paid rest on holidays. The analysis of the four thematic groups has shown that Federal Supreme Court has been adopting silence, whether through a rigorous formalism to extinguish these actions without decision on merits, or delaying their trials. The challenge consists of placing this performance between two different models of constitutional interpretation: Cass Sustein's minimalism or Luigi Ferrajoli's guaranteeeism.

Keywords: working time; constitutionality control; Labour; STF.

[1] Master on Law by Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro. Graduated in Statistics by Universidade do Estado do Rio de Janeiro (IME-UERJ) and in Law by Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro (FND-UFRJ). Researcher in Institutional configurations and labor relations research group (CIRT-PPGD-UFRJ). Working at Tribunal de Justiça do Estado do Rio de Janeiro.

1. Unconstitutionality Direct Actions about working time in Brazil

The struggle for limiting the amount of time dedicated to work has resulted in the recognition and in the assertion of a set of fundamental social rights by the constitutions of the post-wars period all over the world. In Brazil, the 1988 Constitution has enshrined a comprehensive list of individual, collective and social fundamental rights, assigning them immutability clauses (CRFB, art. 60th, § 4, IV), imposing their immediate applicability (CRFB, art. 5th, § 1), attributing to Federal Supreme Court the task of protecting them (CRFB, art. 102nd) and offering a range of remedies and instruments to ensure the exercise of these rights, such as unconstitutionality direct actions (ADI).

The guidelines on working time and the respective rest periods have been set in Article 7th, items XIII until XIX, of the Constitution. Nevertheless, their interpretation is conditioned to constitutional principles and other fundamental rights norms, such as human dignity and social values of labor and free enterprise (CFRB, Article 1st items III and IV), the objectives contained in the third article, which point out to the construction of a free, fair and mutually-supporting society, eradication of poverty and marginalization and reduction of social inequalities (art. 3rd items I to IV); also the catalogue of Article 5th, concerning individual fundamental rights, among other ones, the freedom of exercising any work, occupation or profession; freedom of assembly and of association, social purpose of property, jurisdiction assurance, free access to courts and the respect of acquired rights (items XIII, XVI, XVII, XXII, XXXV and XXXVI respectively).

However, the impact of the productive restructuring has been first felt in Brazil at the dawn of 1990 and has been stretched throughout the decade, when it was promoted an intense normative reconfiguration of traditional institutions of labor law, in order to erode worker's protective constitutional mantle. Since then, it has reflected in growing demand for unconstitutionality direct actions, which motivated this research[2], presented in this article[3].

Twenty-nine unconstitutionality direct actions on working time issues had been filed at Federal Supreme Court between 1988 and 2012, which represent approximately 14% of ADIs on labor matters, and about 0.57% of the whole total. The sinuous curve of Chart 1 (blue line) indicates that the rules on working time have become the subject of dispute in the Federal Supreme Court on a recurring basis, and that the year 1998 was the moment when the litigation has peaked, concentrating twelve ADIs (41%), all of them against Provisional Measures or Federal Laws authored by the Executive Branch[4], headed by then-President Fernando Henrique Cardoso[5].

---

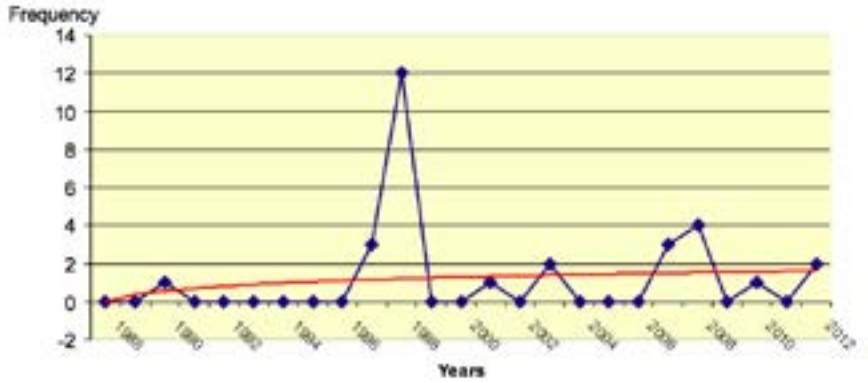
[2] The first task was reading the content of all initial petitions of unconstitutionality direct actions that have been presented to Federal Supreme Court since the promulgation of the 1988 Constitution until December 31, 2012, and cataloguing those ones that dealt with labor issues. From these, they were extracted the ones related to working time matters, resulting in a set of twenty-nine unconstitutionality direct actions.

[3] Neither index nor official statistics available at Federal Supreme Court's electronic address were taken into consideration, considering the impossibility of accessing their methodology for collecting information and data processing. Due to the possibility of detecting the effects that rules belonging to other branches of law could have on labor relations, reading ADIs initial petitions seemed to be the best choice. As labor matters (or labor issues) were considered the rights enumerated in Articles 6th to 11th, as well as those contained in Articles 5th, 114th, 133rd of the 1988 Constitution, as so Article 10th of the Temporary Constitutional Provisions Act (ADCT). Cf. SILVA, S. G. L. C; IGREJA, C. O; MOURA, E. K. V. 2009.

[4] Seven actions were filed against the Law 9,601 of 1998, submitted by the Ministry of Labor, which established the special employment contract for a limited time of time and schedule compensations via hour bank; three ADIs contested Provisional Measure 1,709 of 1998 which created part-time labor contract and extended for one year the deadline for compensation schedules via hour bank. Besides these, successive reprints Provisional Measure 1,539 of 1997 were contested by ADIs, which authorized work on Sundays to workers in commerce..

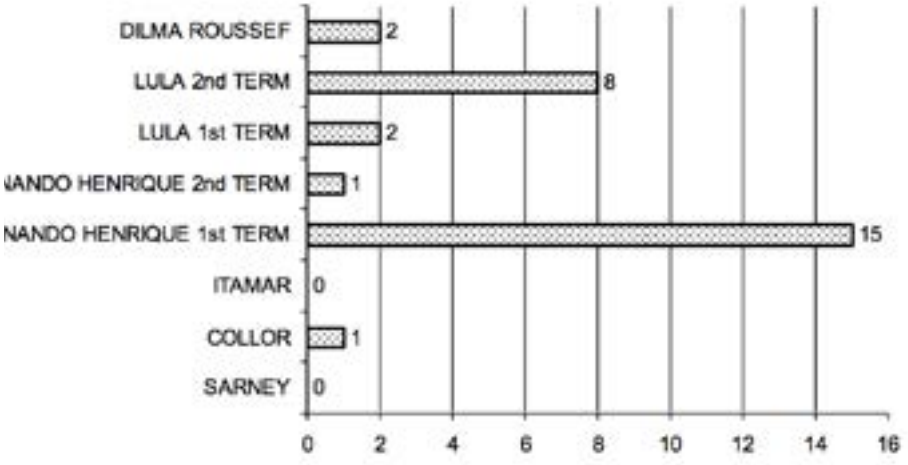
[5] Fernando Henrique Cardoso, from Brazilian Social Democracy Party (PSDB), was elected twice in a row to head the executive branch in Brazil, remaining from January 01st, 1995 to December 31st, 2002. Although PSDB brings the expression "social democracy" in its acronym, it is traditionally renowned for its alignment with neoliberal practices. Fernando Henrique Cardoso was the promoter of the Minimal State, having held numerous privatizations of public enterprises and implemented flexibility discourse of labor rights as a pretext for creating jobs, using intensively the Institute of Provisional Measures to promote reform in labor laws, especially in the years 1997 and 1998.

Chart 1 - Unconstitutionality Direct Actions on working time filed at Federal Supreme Court between 1988 and 2012



Source MOURA, 2013

Charter 2 - Unconstitutionality Direct Action about working time filed at Federal Supreme Court sorted by presidential term



Source: MOURA, 2013.

A second moment, when an increasing filing of ADIs can be noticed, has happened in the years 2007 and 2008, during the second term of President Luis Inacio Lula da Silva[6] (Chart 2), with eight unconstitutionality direct actions about working time. Ten actions were presented throughout the two terms of President Lula, but only two ADIs have challenged acts from the Executive[7].

Brazilian Constitution has allowed some subjects to file the unconstitutionality direct actions and this research has shown that the performance of each of them has been changing, according to the political and economic circumstances[8]. Workers Trade union confederations, for example, had eleven of their twelve claims concentrated in 1997 and 1998, when normative reforms on working time were taking place. Also during this period, the claims of political parties have grown, with four of their five ADIs presented[9]. Confederations of enterprises unions have pointed out to different targets, according to the productive branch[10]. The National Confederation of Commerce (CNC), for example, has focused its efforts on obtaining the unconstitutionality declaration of four

[6] Luis Inacio Lula da Silva, of the Workers Party (PT), was the first union leader presiding Brazil. He also was elected twice consecutively and has remained in power from January, 1st 2003 to December, 31st 2010. Although President Lula had kept the measures implemented by his predecessor, like privatizing public enterprises and flexible working rules, he has promoted some social advances, such as the increase of the minimum wage, a strong program of job generation and income distribution. His intervention in labor law occurred indirectly and punctually.

[7] These are ADI 3975, filed by the National Confederation of Workers in Commerce (CNTC) which has challenged the Provisional Measure 388 of 2007 and ADI 4,027, authored by Socialism and Liberty Party (PSOL) against Law 11,603 of the same year, which had turned the mentioned Provisional Measure into law.

[8] In the research interval, twelve ADIs were proposed by confederations of workers unions, seven by confederations of enterprises unions, five by political parties, three by States governors and one by General Attorney's Office.

[9] They are: ADI 1,764, proposed by the joinder between the Workers Party (PT), Democratic Labor Party (PDT), and Communist Party of Brazil (PC do B); ADI 1,767, authored the Unified Socialist Workers Party (PSTU) both against Law 9,601 of 1998; ADI 1,871 brought by PT and ADI 1,888 offered by the joinder between PT and PDT, against the Provisional Measure 1,709 of 1998, which authorized working on Sundays in commerce.

[10] The computer industry was the first to file ADIs on working time, in 1990, challenging the Ordinance 3,435 of the Ministry of Labour, which had limited working hours and had granted intervals for professionals in the field of data processing. The National Confederation of Industry (CNI) proposed only one action in 1998 against the state law that established pauses and intervals during the workday in the State of Rio de Janeiro (ADI 1,862) state laws that had laid down holidays and a District law that banned shops from operating on Sundays[11]. Governors also have contested state laws which had established holidays[12]. Finally, the General Attorney's Office appears only once in the entire range studied, what arouses interest for future research on the role of this institution in defense of the constitutional rights of workers in concentrate constitutionality control[13].

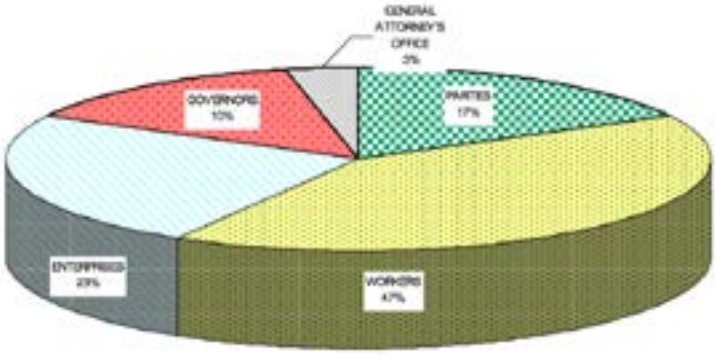
Charter 3 - Unconstitutionality Direct Actions about working time filed at Federal Supreme Court between 1988 and 2012 sorted by authors



Source: MOURA, 2013

[11] ADIs 2.560, 3.940, 4.091, 4.092 e 4.131.

[12] Those were Governors of the States of from Rio Grande do Sul, Distrito Federal and Amapá. Governor of the State of Rondônia has challenged state law 1,713 of 2007 which fixed workday of six hours for nursing professionals.

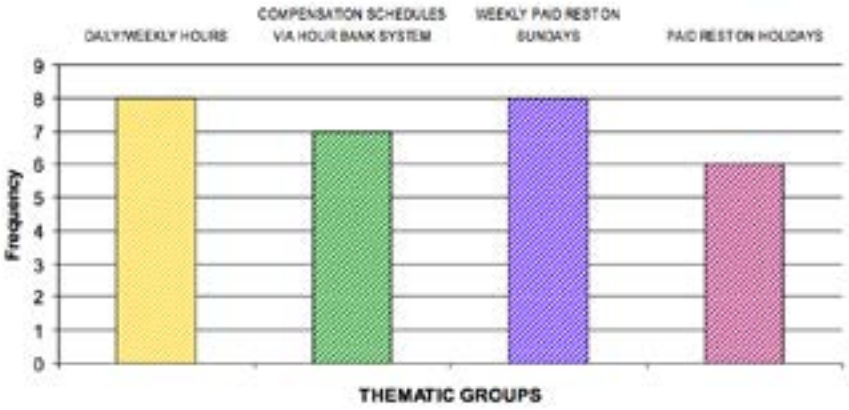
[13] From 1988 to 2012, PGR filed 10 unconstitutionality direct actions on matters related to labor law, six of which were presented in the first term of President Luis Inacio Lula da Silva, four against state standards, one on Constitutional Amendment 45 of 2004 and one on the federal Law 10,779 of 2003, which established certain requirements for granting benefits to unemployed fishermen. Although 1998 represented a moment of intense litigation in labor matters, only one ADI was filed by PGR in all two terms of President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, but even this action had not pointed out any act of this President (It was against § 2 of article 39 of Law 8,177 of 1991, a law passed before mentioned President came to power). In matters of working time, the only initiative taken by PGR took place in 2012, filing unconstitutionality direct action 4,842, against Article 5 of Law 11,901 of 2009 that has established for civilian firefighters 12 working hours by 36 resting hours.

ADIs can be classified into four thematic groups[14] (Charter 4), regarding to the rights pointed out as violated which have grounded the requests of unconstitutionality declaration. The first group comprises daily and weekly working hours matters with eight ADIs, half of which are awaiting trial, while the other half was extinct for formal reasons[15].

[14] Although no unconstitutionality direct action specifically claimed against disrespect of the rights to paid annual leave and to breaks, they were mentioned in the three ADIs that contested the Provisional Measure 1,709 of 1998, creator of the part-time labor contract (ADIs 1,871, 1,874 and 1,888) and two actions against norms for the protection of workers' health (ADI 360 and 1,862), all inserted in the first thematic group. the second group deals with the compensation schedules via hour bank, established by Law 9,601 of 1998; the third and fourth groups contain actions against rules on weekly paid rest on Sundays and the paid rest on holidays, respectively.

[15] Among these four extinct actions, three (two submitted by political parties and one by National Confederation of Workers in Commerce) had contested Provisional Measure 1,709 of 1998, which created the contract of part-time work and expanded to one year the period for compensation schedules via hour bank system. The fourth extinct action was proposed by National Federation of Technical Services on Information Technology and Similar (FENAINFO) against Ordinance 3,435 of 1990 from Ministry of Labour and Social Security, which imposed special breaks to employees in this sector. Among the actions awaiting judgment, ADI 1,862 has been presented by the National Confederation of Industries in order to obtain a declaration of unconstitutionality of State Law 2,586 of 1996, which had reduced working day hours and had set rest breaks for employees of Rio de Janeiro, for preventing repetitive strain injury (RSI) . ADI 3,894 had been proposed against Law 1,317 of 2007 from Rondonia, by the Governor of that State, because it established six hours-day work for nurses. In 2010, ADI 4,468 was presented by the National Confederation of Health against federal law 12,317 of the same year, which established the six hours workday for social assistants. Finally, in 2012, the General Attorney's Office brought ADI 4,842 before STF, contesting the validity of federal law 11,901 of 2009, which regulated non-military firefighters' working time in shifts of twelve hours working by thirty-six hours resting.

Charter 4 - Unconstitutionality Direct Actions about working time filed at Federal Supreme Court between 1988 and 2012 sorted by thematic groups



Source: MOURA, 2013.

The second thematic group brings together the unconstitutionality direct actions about compensating schedules via hour bank system[16] and it appears as a dated and concentrated phenomenon, since all actions had been proposed by a wide range of confederations of workers unions and political parties, in a single moment (1998) against the same normative act, federal Law 9,601 of 1998. In all ADIs, controversy revolved around the assumption that the flexibility principle was inserted into the Constitution Article 7th and, from this perspective, the collective negotiation to promote reduction of labor rights could prevail over legislated rules[17]. In this group, two ADIs were ended for formal reasons

[16] Hour bank system must not be confused with compensation scheme of working days previously predicted by the Consolidation of Labor Laws (CLT), which primitive text of Article 59 § 2 had allowed weekly basis system of hours compensation, previously dealt, individually or collectively, within constitutional bounds (forty-fours hours per week, eight hours per day, minimum additional of fifty per cent wage over normal hour, maximum limitation of daily two hours overtime). Law 9,601 of 1998 has brought in its Article 6th the possibility of compensation schedules on a 120 days basis without additional wage predicted in Constitution. Law 9,601 of 1998 has increased the workload compensation module, has eliminated the right to additional overtime and reduced the surplus time value . Later, Article 6th has been rewritten by Provisional Measure 1,709 of 1998 providing annual compensation.

[17] Just a few days after Law 9,601 publication in 1998, seven ADIs were brought before and five others are still waiting for trial[18].

The third thematic group contains the actions about weekly paid rest on Sundays. It was possible to observe a continuous designing and redesigning of this institute over the years, and it appeared as a specific conflict of commercial workers, still unsolved, since that there was no pronouncement on the issue in any of the lawsuits filed since 1997[19].

The fourth thematic group brings together unconstitutionality actions about paid rest on holidays. Four ADIs were presented by the National Confederation of Commerce and two ones by Governors of States[20]. All applications pointed out the violation of item I of Article 22 of the Constitution, which provides for exclusive entitlement of federal norms on labor matters, as grounds for the plea of unconstitutionality of state laws that set out holidays. Except for the ADI 3,940, all actions were filed after Provisional Measure 388 of 2007 has authorized

---

Federal Supreme Court, in order to obtain a unconstitutionality declaration of its whole text or some parts: ADIs 1764 to 1768, ADI 1794 and ADI 1816. Although this thematic group refers to matters of compensating schadules via hour bank system, ADIs were also challenging a new type of fixed-term labor contract. This is the reason why almost all the petitions have asked for the unconstitutionality declaration of the entire normative act.

[18] On December 31, 2012, ADI 1,767 and 1,816 had already been extinguished without decision on the merits, and five remaining actions were awaiting trial with the Rapporteur Justice Gilmar Mendes. One of these actions – ADI 1,764 – still stayed in view of a request for examination elaborated fifteen years earlier by Justice Nelson Jobim, already retired, succeeded by Justice Carmen Lucia.

[19] Seven ADIs did not contest the entire normative act but just a strange article authorizing operation of commerce on Sundays, grafted in Provisional Measure 1,539-35 of 1997, which ruled employee participation in profits and enterprise results, and after numerous rewrites, it was converted into law 10,101 of 2000, which was amended by Provisional Measure 388 of 2007 which in turn was converted into Law 11,603 in 2007. Four actions authored by CNTC were dismissed due to lack of an amendment to the application when Provisional Measure 1,539 has been reissued . Two ADIs remain awaiting trial in the Supreme Court: ADI 3,975 and ADI 4,027, in which respectively CNTC and PSOL has contested mentioned Provisional Measure 388 and Law 11,603.

[20] They are: ADI 3,069, of the Governor of the Federal District against District Law 3,083 of 2002, which established the Trade Labour Day ; ADI 3,940 of Confederation of National Trade (CNC) against Rondonia Law 1,201 of 2001; ADIs 4,091, 4,092 and 4,131 of the CNC in which the laws of Rio de Janeiro which set the Black Consciousness holidays, Carnival and St. George, respectively have been contested; and ADI 4820, of the Governor of Amapá challenging that StateLaw 1,686 of 2012 , that created the holiday in honor of St. Tiago.

working on holidays in general trade, subject to the previous collective bargaining. However, the arguments of CNC remained focused around the discourse of the high costs and their impact on job creation. Justices rapporteurs of ADIs about paid leave on holidays have admitted several civil society organizations as amici curiae, what helped to diversify debate from an essentially economic perspective towards a pluralist discussion. Among the arguments brought to the cases, one deserves to be highlighted because it reinserts the question in terms of the legitimate exercise of the powers of the states to legislate on the protection of historical and cultural heritage and on culture as the items VII and IX of Article 24 of the Constitution.

It is also noticed that promotion initiatives for healthy and safe work, either technical standards by the Ministry of Labor or legal rules by states, have met employers' resistance whenever it demanded reduction in the time length of labor, rest on holidays or granting pauses and breaks. Economic classes have appealed of these standards always by alleging Item I of Article 22 of the Constitution. Such a reductionist interpretation would lead content of article 196 of the Constitution to embed a great paradox, since health would only be "the right of all and duty of the Union, States, Federal District and municipalities" when not related to working people, because in these cases, health would be a matter submitted to the exclusive protection of the Central Power.

As already seen, working time appeared on the scene of judicial review in 1990, but the reason why this subject has remained in the conflicts zone presented to the Supreme Court until 2012 can not be assigned solely to the normative reconfiguration promoted by legislative action. In the researched period, only one of the twenty-nine unconstitutionality direct actions about working time has obtained decision on the merits[21]. Eleven actions were finished without jurisdictional provision, which points out to a rigorous formalism adopted by the Supreme Court, almost exclusively resulting from his own case-law, such as the requirement of amendment for initial petitions every time Provisional Measures contested were reissued, or the requirement of Powers fo [21] This is ADI 3069, in which the plenum of the Supreme Court in 2005 unanimously welcomed the vote of the rapporteur Justice Ellen Gracie to establish that the power of declaring holidays is implicit in the Union's exclusive competence to legislate on matters labor, following two understandings of the Court, prior to the promulgation of the 1988 Constitution, one from 1959 and another from 1984. The judgment of this ADI 3,069 was used as precedent in initial petitions of CNC to corroborate its claim that the institution of holidays is purely economic issue.

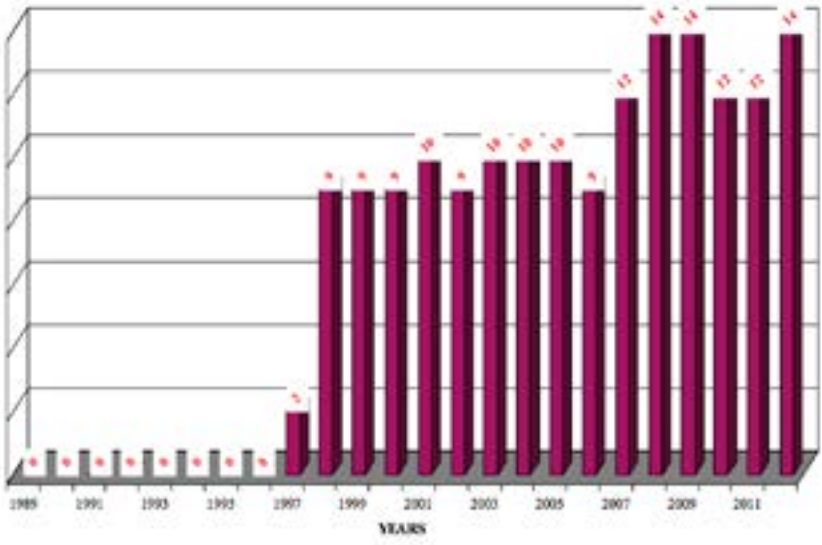
Attorney with written special powers to argue the constitutionality of a norm.

In thirteen of the seventeen actions awaiting trial, the Rapporteurs Ministers have adopted the special proceeding of article 12 of Law 9,868 of 1999, according to which, given the importance of the matter and having request for an injunction, the rapporteur may, after attended the requests for information, present the cause to the plenary, to whom would be allowed final judgment of the action. Thus, there has never been any injunction statement in all of these ADIs.

Chart 5 shows the distribution of cumulative frequencies, which takes into account the amount of unconstitutionality direct actions about working time issues, that has been waiting trial in the Supreme Court since the day when each first rapporteur has been designated, year by year accumulated, demonstrating that from 1997 on, it has been emerged what it might be called a collection of actions waiting for jurisdictional provision on this subject.

Charter 5 - Cumulative Frequencies of Unconstitutionality Direct Actions about working time issues awaiting trial in Federal Supreme Court between 1988 and 2012



Source: MOURA, 2013

Several other discussions about working time issues took place in the context of labor courts, but failed to reach the Federal Supreme Court by way of judicial review. Those who managed to reach it via appeal did not come to be appreciated, again due to STF case-law, even though some of these precedents had been stated before the new constitutional order[22]. Thus, the Supreme Court remained impervious to issues such as suppressing work breaks, payment of overtime in shifts of 12 hours of labor per 36 hours off, averaging in itinere hours, the divisor for calculating overtime and reducing the additional for night work in alternating shifts, whenever these issues were subject of collective bargaining[23].

Procrastination[24] and, consequently, the long delay in giving a jurisdictional response to a few actions which have managed to reach the Court, as well as the option for the rigorous formalism reinforce the hypothesis that Federal Supreme Court has adopted a negative activism though omission. In other words, the Court has opted for self-restraining, keeping a great silence regarding to protection of working time fundamental rights, even though such a silence would mean the strengthening of their deconstruction. Changes in plenary composition, which have been occurring since the first term of President Luis Inacio Lula da

[22] For example, Summula 454 of 1964, which has established the understanding upon which mere interpretation clauses do not allow extraordinary appeals, leaving all the rights subjected to collective bargaining without substantive examination. In addition, there is a lot of single or collective decisions of Federal Supreme Court in order not to aware extraordinary appeal whose object requires review of the validity of the clauses of collective agreement because it would require revolving material-factual evidence. Countless others lawsuits were extinct upon the argument that, if there was an offense against the Constitution, this would be reflexive, as if it would not assigned to Federal Supreme Court avoid any unconstitutionality, direct or reflexive.

[23] However, two debates on working time have overcome the narrow filter created by Federal Supreme Court: the first one resulted in Summula 675, according to which granting weekly paid rest would not disfigure alternating shifts system; the second one resulted in recognition of general repercussion in extraordinary Appeal 658,312, whether Article 384 of the Labor Code, which requires granting fifteen minutes interval for women before overtime work starts, has been receipt under 1988 Constitution.

[24] In ADI 1,764, a request to view made by Justice Nelson Jobim in 1998 has interrupted the trial, and six years after, in 2004, he not only has renewed it , but has still retained the process for two more years, until March 2006, when he retired. It's important to remark that, on December 15, 2003, then Chief Justice Mauricio Correa, lowered Resolution 278, which has established ten days as deadline to return all legal proceedings under request to view, authorizing one renewal for another ten days, after which it should return to trial, regardless of publication of the agenda. Even so, ADI 1,764 remains in Justice Carmen Lucia's cabinet, Nelson Jobim's successor, until nowadays.

Silva and have continued through President Dilma Rousseff's government, including the appointment of Justice Rosa Weber, from Superior Labor Court, raise the expectation about future trial of the unconstitutionality direct actions about working time.

References

MOURA, E.K.V. Trabalho e Constituição: ações diretas de inconstitucionalidade e os desafios da regulação do tempo de trabalho no Brasil. Dissertation. UFRJ, PPGD, 2013.

SILVA, S. G. L. Direitos fundamentais, Garantismo e Direito do Trabalho. Revista do TST. São Paulo, v. 77, n. 3, p. 274-292, jul./set. 2011.

SILVA, S. G. L. C; IGREJA, C. O; MOURA, E. K. V. Constituição e Trabalho: um exame sobre as Ações Diretas de Inconstitucionalidade propostas perante o Supremo Tribunal Federal que versam sobre direitos do trabalho. XXXI Jornada Giullio Massarani de iniciação científica, artística e cultural. Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro - CCJE. 2009.

The reduction of the weekly working journey to 40 hours in Brazil
A contemporary debate

Roberta Dantas de Mello[1]

1. Introduction

Both in the developed countries and those on the margins of capitalism[2], the claim for reducing the working journey is one of the historic banners of working class struggles. However, it is reasonable to say that in each historical period it acquires new forms.

In Brazil, the debate around reduction of the working journey and its defense to 40 hours weekly transcend the economic-financial fundamentals and, once realized, it will be one more effective means of caring for the social appreciation of work and of human dignity (fundamental rights inherent to the Democratic rule of law state).

Throughout the nation, intellectuals from various fields of knowledge openly defend the reduction of the working journey in Brazil, among those: Dal Rosso and Ricardo Antunes (sociologists), Márcio Pochamann (an economist), Valéria Marque Lobo (a historian) and Mauricio Godinho Delgado (a jurist).

Indeed, in a recent book by Mauricio Godinho Delgado, "Constituição da República e Direitos Fundamentais" (Federal Constitution and Fundamental Rights), in the article "Democracia, Cidadania e Trabalho" (Democracy, Citizenship and Work) the jurist claims that upon reflecting on work in the 21st century, one must refer to moderate work, diminished in time, adjusted to productivity gains from technological and organizational achievements, unlike what we find today. He concludes that society will continue to be working society, mainly employment society, but a place where everybody works less, which necessarily implies reduction of the paid working journey institutionalized in juridical order.

[1] MA in Employment law with PUC/, directed by Mauricio Godinho Delgado. Researcher with CAPES (2010-2012). A specialist in Employment law and Labor law. A specialist in Constitutional procedural law. Lawyer. Professor of Employment law.

[2] It is important to emphasize that Latin-American nations, although having suffered a disadvantage in time when compared to more developed capitalist countries, also fought significantly for the reduction of the yearly working journey during the decades following the Second World War.

Thus, it shall be seen that once the technological revolution is absorbed by the main spheres of Brazilian economy, generating increase in productivity (increasing the profits of the owners of production means), and given a favorable political context, the reduction of the weekly working journey to 40 hours will be more than necessary so that work productivity continues to progress along social development, following the guidelines of capitalism with reciprocity.

2. The contemporary debate

A short historical retrospective reveals that the capitalist production system has been marked by social struggles between capital and work for the control of time.

Since the second half of the 19th century, historical strikes and movements claiming for the shortening of working time have always had the goal of controlling the exploitation of work (survival struggle, "an existential marathon"); of creating proper conditions for the workers to have more control of their lives (struggles for humanizing work, for better quality of life) and of increasing employment (not always explicitly).

It is worth mentioning that the struggle for reducing the time dedicated to work has allowed for various action fronts (reduction of the daily or weekly working journey, lengthening of weekly rest, of leave of work periods and vacation days, retirement anticipation, reduction of the entrance age into the labor market via the requirement of primary education certification, among others). Those fronts guaranteed major accomplishments of the working class as far back as the second half of the 19th century; it has also continued to do so along the 20th century.

In Brazil, the issue was present in the Union movement at the beginning of industrialization – only in the end of the 19th century. It was marked by general strikes and even the introduction of bills, both with the aim of fixing the regular working journey at 8 hours a day, besides the 50% additional for overtime.

The first overarching law, which regulated the working journey to 8 hours a day and 48 hours a week to all workers was included in the 1931 Constitution. However, the implementation of this limited journey has not really happened. The reason is that, since that time, the employers have begun to use certain mechanisms to inhibit the fulfillment of the constitutional predicament, especially the extension of working hours by means of overtime, which was left free.

In 1943, with the implementation of CLT, even though overtime was limited to 2 hours daily, practically no significant changes were introduced in regard to the duration of the working journey, in comparison to the Constitutional Text of 1934.

The democratic period between 1946 and 1974 did not bring about any changes in the standard duration of the working hours established in CLT (8 hours a day and 48 hours a week), although it started various important advances. Clearly, during military authoritarianism (1964-1985) there was also no improvement of the juridical order concerning work in this respect.

Beginning in 1978, however, the so called new syndicalism appeared in Brazil organized by the Union movement of the ABC towns in the State of São Paulo. A new context emerges in civil society, influencing the development of this issue in Brazilian Employment law.

The 1985 strike represented the peak of new syndicalism and a landmark in Union movement and Employment law. The main demand of the metal workers of the paulista ABC concerned the shortening of the regular weekly working journey from 48 to 40 hours, without wage loss[3], as a means of guaranteeing the workers quality of life and generating new jobs. Due to the strategy adopted by the strikers to search for specific solutions with each company[4], the strike resulted in the attain-

[3] In fact, the great movements for reduction of the working journey that have occurred in the world in the past 150 years have never suffered wage loss of the workers, since the goal is to humanize work. In addition, the shortening of the journey without affecting the workers' life standards increases the income available in society; and, therefore, demand/consumerism.

[4] The so called "vaca brava" comes thereafter, since it represents a strategic review of the strikers to solve the deadlock. Any individual who placed themselves against the strikers would be attacked by them. They chose to solve the strike by means of individual agreements with the companies, rather than by labor dispute at the Labor Regional Court (they began considering that action counterproductive by virtue of the suspension clause of the effects of decisions made by a lesser court – in this case, the TRT/SP – regarding any appeal directed to superior jurisdiction– in this case, the Labor Superior ment of 40 hour weekly journeys for a small number of workers and an average of 44 hour weekly journeys for the majority[5]. Besides, it contributed to show the 1986-88 Congress the duration of regular work that Brazilian society was ready to adopt.

The discussion about the duration of working journeys proceeded through three jurisdictions in Congress. In the first two, the Sub-commission of Labor law and Public employees and the Commission of Social order, the Union movement proposal of 40 hour weekly journeys was approved. However, the Commission of Systematization, which should simply present the final project of the constitutional text according to the previous jurisdictions, inexplicably decided to abandon the winning proposal and to change the weekly working journey to 44 hours in that bill. Obviously, it obtained the definite approval by the Constituent, mainly composed of legislative officers of the center to extreme right ideological spectrum, known as "Centrão", strongly supported by the Executive Power.

Anyway, according to labor legislation, CR/88 was modernized, mainly by reducing weekly working journeys from 48 to 44 hours, uniformly to all workers under the CLT regime[6], which represented a new initial civilizing plateau and a closer following of the limits of prevailing standards in the developed capitalist countries in the West.[7]

After two decades of CR/88's initial advance regarding reduction of work duration from 48 to 44 hours weekly, modernizing the current Court – TST).

---

[5] The strike lasted 54 days (from April 11 to July 4) and an estimated adherence of 290 thousand workers. The strike in favor of the 40 hours, though it did not attain its goal, – signing of a convention for the whole category – ended the habitual working standard of so much as 60 weekly hours (48 hours of regular journeys plus 12 hours overtime).

[6] The 1967 Constitution had already introduced 40 weekly hours for public employees. Obviously, this measure led to "rise in employment regarding activities submitted to the Public employee statute, such as direct administration and governmental agencies. This effect was predictable because the State, as employer, does not use the same compensation mechanisms, such as intensification of work and appeal to overtime, which the private sector uses to counteract the reduction of the working journey."

[7] According to a report by OIT, published in 2008, about the rules regarding working conditions, the 40 hour weekly journey is the prevailing legal standard. More than 40% of the countries adopt this journey or even shorter ones. The majority of the industrialized countries adopt the limit of 40 weekly hours, including half the countries of the European Union, Canada, Japan, New Zealand, Norwood and the United States. Besides, in various European countries, the working journey varies between 35 to 39 weekly hours, through collective bargaining agreements.

constitutional text is of utmost necessity.

The juridical issue of work duration does not exhaust itself "as a simple repository of rules of the employment contract"; it is meaningful in "multiple dimensions, some of which beyond the typically juridical field."

By proposing to analyze those multiple dimensions, the jurist and minister Mauricio Godinho Delgado states that the change of the journey to 40 weekly hours would have positive effects on the following areas: health, education and family relationships, as well as an important impact on the social issue of employment/unemployment and on the domestic market, which we will summarize as follows.

Regarding health, the change would function as a "preventive measure", since it would significantly reduce the probabilities of professional/occupational diseases, or work related accidents. It would also foster productivity once rested workers make more effort, which would result in fewer errors and accidents. Thus, rules of law regulating the working journey turn out to be public health rules, too; so a 40 hour weekly working journey should be implemented as public health policy.

As for education (of both male and female workers), the reduction of the unitary length of service offers new opportunities for individual improvement, since it favors their search for further specific professional qualification and/or formal education in general. That is why the creation of greater individual availability for the working population is necessary for there to be actual public professional qualification policies or policies of higher educational standards. Such availability would actually occur with the shortening of weekly working journeys to 40 hours.

As for family relationships, the reduction of the weekly journey would represent public policies of family strengthening and redemption, specially of children and adolescents, by allowing the worker dedication to family and improvement of the children's and other dependents' educational process, thus contributing to their structural formation as individuals.

Therefore, the benefits of reduction of the weekly working journey to 40 hours are inarguable.

In view of the repercussions aforementioned, the worker (both male and female) will enjoy better quality of life, being able to further dedicate themselves to social and cultural activities and essential policies for the full exercise of citizenship.

The reduction of the weekly labor module in Brazilian Law will also come to serve as an important and efficient measure of fight against unemployment, according to what is observed in the experience of western developed countries. Reduction of work duration "automatically opens (though not in equivalent proportion), innumerable new jobs, or – at the worst – overtly and directly hinders the pace of advancement of the unemployment rate in the labor market."

From an international point of view, the respectable political economist, Jacques Nagels ("Elementos de economia política: crítica do pensamento único"), asserts that reduction of working time is imperatively accompanied by hiring additional staff, which alone helps diminish unemployment.

Nevertheless, it should be noted that increase in work productivity as a consequence of reduction of the working journey is not proportional to job creation. In other words, "never is increase in employment proportional to the reduced amount of work".

Moreover, the change of the weekly working journey from 44 to 40 hours would promote noticeable incentive to the Nation's domestic market, considering the increase in purchasing power of the favored workers, potential consumers.

Every historical example of evolution of Employment law in the West shows that the reduction of the working journey is functional and compatible with the development of the economic system, even more so because the impact is diluted with time and absorbed by the businesses and by society.

It is important to emphasize that a radical measure of reduction of duration of work is not being defended here, but rather an actualization of the upper limits of the standard Brazilian journey to the maximum of 40 hours weekly as that in the developed western countries. The necessary modernization should be implemented "moderately and evenly distributed among the economic agents and the whole of the workers, neither overburdening any segment of the economy in special to benefit others, nor creating unequal domestic conditions of competition among businesses" (MGD).

It is thus understood that reduction of the working journey should be an object of regulation by public authorities, since "the regulation aims to stop market laws from being the only determining factor of employment contracts (especially the cost and duration of work); or rather, that work be treated as market goods subject to disturbances in the economic situation and currency instability."

It is worth mentioning that currently in the Nation, PEC number 231/1995 is the legislative proposal regarding the duration of work with the greatest repercussion in the national Congress and society.

According to art. 7º of CR/88:

> Art. 7º The following are the rights of urban and rural workers, among others that aim to improve their social condition:
> XIII – duration of regular work not superior to eight hours daily and forty-four hours weekly, granted offsetting of working hours and reduction of working journeys upon agreement or collective working convention;
> XVI – payment of overtime beyond that, at least fifty per cent above normal;

PEC number 231/1995 proposes to change subsection XIII and XVI of the aforementioned art. 7º of CR/88. It suggests reduction of the maximum weekly work length from 44 to 40 hours and increase of the overtime hour in at least 75%[8] upon the regular value. The remaining rules in the constitutional text would be kept: maximal daily journey of 8 hours, possible offsetting of working hours and reduction of the journey upon agreement or collective working convention.

Ever since that proposal was presented to the Plenary (October 10, 1995) and though there have been public hearings for clarification and favorable opinions regarding its content and approval, approval of the final text of PEC number 231/1995 is still awaiting, for it cannot be subject to the restrict understanding of reduction of the weekly working journey to 40 hours only as a potentially efficient measure to fight unemployment and create new jobs. Its convenience must be contemplated under a multidimensional perspective, as approached earlier.[9] [8] Regarding PEC 231/1995, which also determines that overtime payment should have an AC increase of 75% above the value of the regular hour, it can be said that the legislator was very clever to have associated the changes in overtime payment to reduction of the working journey. Had he not done so, a vast number of the new jobs in perspective due to reduction of the journey could be converted in overtime. Therefore, the proposed increase in payment of overtime labor represents an economic discouragement in hiring of overtime and a fundamental tool in the fight against unemployment, together with other measures.

---

[9] As for the proceedings of PEC 231/1995: In October 11, 1995, the proposition was presented to the Plenary and in November 26, 1996 the Commission of Constitution and Justice and Citizenship was unanimously in favor of its admissibility. On October 23, 1997 a special committee was constituted to analyze the proposal. It did not finish its work, so the proposal was filed (1999) on the basis of legislature changes – 2003 and 2007. On April 30, 2007 the proposal was unfiled and on February 25, 2008 a new

Regarding the potential of RJT to fight unemployment and further generate new job opportunities, I suggest a few short reflections.

The main labor leaderships propose reduction of the weekly working journey from 44 to 40 hours as a solution to job creation and also to fight the Nation's unemployment. The main argument runs as follows: if workers of the formal sector of economy have their working hours reduced (work fewer hours a week), there will be a tendency for more people to get formally inserted in the labor market. In the specialized literature, this line of reasoning is known as work-sharing[10]. It is expected that reduction of the journey will allow for the same work to be shared by more workers (all of them working fewer hours) and, in turn, contribute to less unemployment besides the creation of new jobs.

Furthermore, as for the socioeconomic equation of employment versus unemployment, the proposal of reduction of the weekly working journey to the 40 hour mode "cannot be seen as panacea when the issue is work scarcity, nor can it be justified as simply a contingent mechanism to fight unemployment". However, it can be "a useful tool if adopted at the right time and if accompanied by other equally necessary measures."

It so happens that the success of work-sharing as a policy of job generation and fight against unemployment has always been questioned by a few studies[11], to which the employers turn to.

---

special committee was created and actually settled on December 16, 2008. At that time, Congressman Vicentinho (PT-SP) was designated to deliver the opinion. The proposal received various requirements, which were approved (testimony of witnesses and public hearings, during which specialists in Labor and Social Security Law and Economy, social interlocutors, representatives of employees and employers spoke), including extension of time of the works. In June 16, 2009, during a global economic crisis, there was a favorable opinion of the Reporting Congressman to the approval of PEC 231-A, which was unanimously accepted by the Special Committee. Since then, the inclusion of this proposal in the Agenda is being awaited in the Plenary for approval of the final text.

[10] Work-sharing is a system of temporary reduction of working hours as a means to avoid unemployment. The percentage of reduction of working hours and wages is agreed upon by companies and workers. Government support has been a decisive variable for the use of work-sharing systems as an alternative to workers' dismissal. In countries, such as Germany, Italy and France, where there are aids to partial unemployment, that practice has occurred more often.

[11] To illustrate, those carried out by Guy Aznar, André Gorz, Claus Offe, Ulrich Beck and Jeremy Rifkin, who, besides being pessimist about the evaluation of the possibility of reduction of the working journey generating new jobs and fighting unemployment, "curiously" contribute to the contemporary fallacy of loss of centrality of work/employment

The arguments of the employers against reduction of the working journey, which boil down to the same old opposition of 1988, are insufficient and contaminated by an ideology in favor of unbridled capitalism, contrary to the middle way of work dignity and contemporary employment.

To illustrate, the following reflections about the main arguments of employers against any reorganization of working time for fear of loss of profit are noted:

1. A shortening of the weekly working journey from 44 to 40 hours would be equivalent to a 9,09% reduction of the worked hours and would represent an increase of 1,99% in the total cost to the company. However, such increase in cost would be minimal for it would only happen once and it would be compensated by productivity gains[12] in fewer than 6 (six) months, without loss of future profits. The companies would also amortize that ridiculous increase in cost through organizational changes and would contribute with work productivity gains[13].

2. Costs with wages in Brazil are very low, mainly when compared to those of other countries[14]. Consequently, reduction of the working journey would not harm competitiveness in Brazil.

---

in capitalism.

[12] Labor by workers with better performance due to the fact that they work less, with more intensity and concentration and less tiredness is considered "labor productivity gains". As a result of growth in labor productivity, there is also growth in "capital productivity", since more concentrated and less tired workers can better operate machines and run fewer risks of damaging them. In addition, according to Cette and Taddéi, quoted by Calvete, the growth in work productivity is around 1/3 to 1/4 of the percentage of reduction of the working journey. CALVETE, Cássio da Silva.

[13] Upon analyzing the companies' reaction to the rise in costs due to reduction of the working journey, Calvete notes that the reaction "lacks a macroeconomic and long term perspective". He also admits that salary costs would be compensated by "productivity growth and, therefore, reduction of the marginal costs". CALVETE, Cássio da Silva.

[14] Rodrigo Garcia Schwarz notes that "the cost of work in Brazil is much inferior that the cost of work in North America, Europe and a few Asian countries, which are considered to be extremely competitive in the global market, such as South Korea. For a long time, Brazil has been practicing an economy based on social dumping, in a way that the World Bank identifies as "arbitrage of low wages", which, in turn, is one of the main reasons of salary flattening and of the accentuation of income gaps, distinctive features of globalization". In Western Europe today, very few countries maintain working journeys superior to 40 hours weekly.

Table 1 – Hourly personnel cost in industrial output – Selected nations 1975-2007 (in US$)

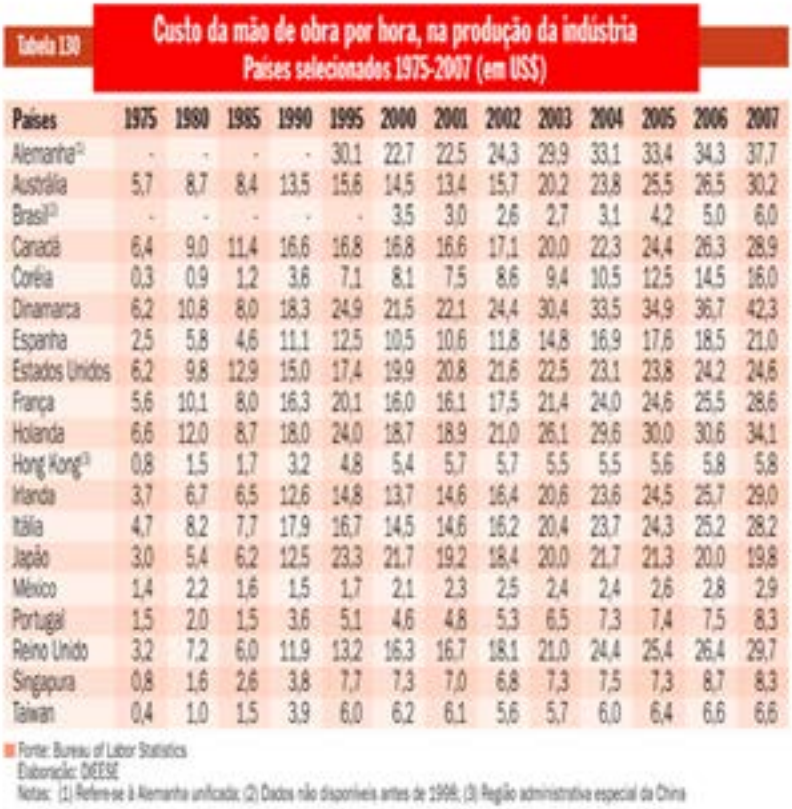

Tabela 130

Custo da mão de obra por hora, na produção da indústria
Países selecionados 1975-2007 (em US$)

Países	1975	1980	1985	1990	1995	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	2005	2006	2007
Alemanha[1]	.	.	.	.	30,1	22,7	22,5	24,3	29,9	33,1	33,4	34,3	37,7
Austrália	5,7	8,7	8,4	13,5	15,6	14,5	13,4	15,7	20,2	23,8	25,5	26,5	30,2
Brasil[2]	.	.	.	.	.	3,5	3,0	2,6	2,7	3,1	4,2	5,0	6,0
Canadá	6,4	9,0	11,4	16,6	16,8	16,8	16,6	17,1	20,0	22,3	24,4	26,3	28,9
Coréia	0,3	0,9	1,2	3,6	7,1	8,1	7,5	8,6	9,4	10,5	12,5	14,5	16,0
Dinamarca	6,2	10,8	8,0	18,3	24,9	21,5	22,1	24,4	30,4	33,5	34,9	36,7	42,3
Espanha	2,5	5,8	4,6	11,1	12,5	10,5	10,6	11,8	14,8	16,9	17,6	18,5	21,0
Estados Unidos	6,2	9,8	12,9	15,0	17,4	19,9	20,8	21,6	22,5	23,1	23,8	24,2	24,6
França	5,6	10,1	8,0	16,3	20,1	16,0	16,1	17,5	21,4	24,0	24,6	25,5	28,6
Holanda	6,6	12,0	8,7	18,0	24,0	18,7	18,9	21,0	26,1	29,6	30,0	30,6	34,1
Hong Kong[3]	0,8	1,5	1,7	3,2	4,8	5,4	5,7	5,7	5,5	5,5	5,6	5,8	5,8
Irlanda	3,7	6,7	6,5	12,6	14,8	13,7	14,6	16,4	20,6	23,6	24,5	25,7	29,0
Itália	4,7	8,2	7,7	17,9	16,7	14,5	14,6	16,2	20,4	23,7	24,3	25,2	28,2
Japão	3,0	5,4	6,2	12,5	23,3	21,7	19,2	18,4	20,0	21,7	21,3	20,0	19,8
México	1,4	2,2	1,6	1,5	1,7	2,1	2,3	2,5	2,4	2,4	2,6	2,8	2,9
Portugal	1,5	2,0	1,5	3,6	5,1	4,6	4,8	5,3	6,5	7,3	7,4	7,5	8,3
Reino Unido	3,2	7,2	6,0	11,9	13,2	16,3	16,7	18,1	21,0	24,4	25,4	26,4	29,7
Singapura	0,8	1,6	2,6	3,8	7,7	7,3	7,0	6,8	7,3	7,5	7,3	8,7	8,3
Taiwan	0,4	1,0	1,5	3,9	6,0	6,2	6,1	5,6	5,7	6,0	6,4	6,6	6,6

Fonte: Bureau of Labor Statistics
Elaboração: DIEESE
Notas: (1) Refere-se à Alemanha unificada; (2) Dados não disponíveis antes de 1996; (3) Região administrativa especial da China

3. As for the cost of social charges[15], entrepreneurs defend the [15] Salary charges represent that portion of the work cost that does not end up in the worker's pocket: contribution to the Instituto Nacional de Seguridade Social (INSS), to Serviço Social da Indústria (Sesi), to the Serviço Nacional de Aprendizagem Industrial (Senai) and the other institutions that compose the "S System"; to the Instituto Nacional de Colonização e Reforma Agrária (Incra), to insurance against work accidents, to education-salary and to Serviço Brasileiro de Apoio às Micro e Pequenas Empresas (Sebrae). DIEESE. Note to the press: immediate reduction of the working journey to 40 hours!

thesis that those represent 102% of the workers' salaries. However, they base their argument on a mistaken calculation. Many items accounted for as charges in this calculation are actually part of the worker's income. Therefore, all in all, the real value of social charges correspond to 25,1% of the total income of the worker, which can also be absorbed by employers through the gains aforementioned.

Otherwise, there is the possibility that the remaining (not compensated for) part be negotiated with the State. European practice[16] shows that there is a negotiation margin between the public and the private sector on sharing the costs of the increase in social charges.[17]

Anyway, throughout Brazilian history, marked by fights for reduction of the working journey, and even after the 1988 constitutional change, never did the companies have to be aided by the government ("as far as we know, not one of them broke for this reason"); and the workers had their salaries lowered;

4. Regarding micro- and small companies, employers' resistance "based on the premise of financial impossibility gets canceled once it is proved that the work charge drama" is merely apparent and emerges after failure of economic politics, through the high cost of bank loans and through unequal competition with the large groups. Following this line of thought, "for smaller enterprises, a fairer income distribution and enlargement of the layers of consumers is a survival condition, which can be initiated with reduction of the working journey without income reduction, opening up countless jobs;"[18]

5. Various categories of workers already have a reduced journey (40 hours weekly or even less), be it for special legislation disposition or via agreements or collective working conventions.[19] Therefore, the im-

[16] Calvete proves the truth of this practice through data obtained from Eurostat (European System of Integrated Social Protection Statistics – ESSPROS), where we can see that while there was a rise in social costs, during the 1990s, their financing fell to the public sector more and more often while corporate involvement decreased.

[17] As an example, there is the way opened by the French government to aid the companies that favor employment and reduce the working journey, considering that "the companies do not want to bear the cost of the shorter working journey and employment increase alone. They pass on the increased cost burden to society. This outcome happens today, when the companies have all imaginable political power within societies". DAL ROSSO, Sadi.

[18] COUTINHO, Grijalbo Fernandes. Redução da jornada de trabalho.

[19] According to MGD, "this is what happens, for example, with banks and the economic sectors, in general, with frigorific employees, telephone operators with variable working pact is restricted to the private and state-owned sector, the later when it acts according to legislation on employment relationships and within the hours affected by the change.

6. PEC 231/95 does not impair free collective negotiation, since it does not alter the following constitutional disposition about the working journey: offsetting of working hours and journey reduction upon agreement or collective working convention.

Consequently, "the contingent flexibility supposedly necessary for the labor market concerning work duration in hours to ensure greater competitiveness for Brazilian companies" is still assured by collective negotiation. Contrary to what employers claim, collective free negotiation is still privileged and "is still one of the open paths, a subsidiary and complementary form" of reduction of the working journey and offsetting of working hours.

2.1 The desired effect of applying a policy of reduction of the working journey would happen according to certain indispensable conditions, such as[20]:

a) a favorable period of economic growth and increase in productivity (otherwise, the new jobs opened by the time policy may be hit by an eventual recession, whose origin is not the reduction of the working journey);

b) control of overtime[21] (what is intended is to exchange average worked hours for new jobs), though there may hours, broadcasters, elevator boys, teachers, underground mine workers, journalists, laborers who work in nonstop shifts. In addition, there are also the employees who already enjoy this maximal weekly work duration because of collective negotiation, business legislation, contract clauses or employment custom. Beyond this whole important universe, we must acknowledge the vast spectrum of federal, state, district and municipal public-sector employees, who are also already subject to the 40 hour weekly work duration in general. In addition, there are the domestic servants who would not even be affected by a legal rule of this nature. So, we are talking of some millions of employees (and their respective employers, evidently) who would not be affected by such a normative change".

---

[20] As indispensable conditions, we privilege those quoted by Dal Rosso.

[21] As we defend overtime control, we also fight for proper inspection, capable of carrying out a broad and efficient examination so that the constraint of the amount of supplementary work is actually implemented.

still be resistance by employers and by part of the workers (those used to making additional profit by supplementary work);

c) effective Union intervention to bar actions undertaken by employers or regulated by law, which inhibit the employment effect (offsetting of working hours by mechanisms, such as the "hour bank" and hiring of excessive journeys, such as the 12×36, among other systematic measures that may emerge in this sense).

3. Conclusion

Given the current political-economic conjuncture, Brazil has favorable conditions to incorporate to its juridical order reduction of the weekly working journey to 40 hours. It also presents the needs that demand the adoption of that measure, given the plethora of advantages identified with it as we have shown.

As noted, reduction of the weekly working journey to 40 hours by approval of the final text of PEC 231/1995, which depends on political good will, will represent an efficient means of caring for the social appreciation of work and for human dignity (fundamental rights inherent to the Democratic rule of law sate. It will also represent protection and incentive to corporate development itself plus increase of the Nation's domestic market, by reconciling the interests of companies and workers, of capital and work, which guarantees the adequate functioning of the capitalist system.

We conclude, by paraphrasing economist Joseph Stiglitz, Economy Nobel Prize 2001, by inviting everyone to engage in political debates grounded on facts and evidence so as to give less emphasis to ideologies and to pay closer attention to what actually works.

Belo Horizonte, June 2013.

References

BRASIL. Câmara dos Deputados. Proposta de Emenda à Constituição n° 231 de 1995. Disponível em:<http://www.camara.gov.br/sileg/Prop_Detalhe.asp?id=14582>. Acesso em: 1 set.2010.

BUSSINGUER, Marcela de Azevedo. Política pública e inclusão social: o papel do direito do trabalho. 2010. 183p. Dissertação (Mestrado em Direito do Trabalho) - Pontifícia Universidade Católica de Minas Gerais, Belo Horizonte.

CALVETE, Cássio da Silva. A redução da jornada de trabalho como solução do desemprego: o mito de sísifo ou prometeu? Civitas : Revista de Ciências Sociais, Porto Alegre , v.3, n.2 , p.417-433, jul./dez. 2003.

COUTINHO, Grijalbo Fernandes. Redução da jornada de trabalho. Consulex : Revista Jurídica, Brasília , v.8,n,174,p.46-47, abr,2004.

DAL ROSSO, Sadi. A redução da jornada e o emprego. In: Seminário Internacional Emprego e Desenvolvimento Tecnológico, promoção DIEESE/PCDTC-NPq, São Paulo e Brasília, novembro 1997. Disponível em:<http://www.dieese.org.br/esp/jtrab_4.xml> Acesso: em 10 jan. 2011.

_____. O debate sobre a redução da jornada de trabalho. São Paulo: ABET, 1998. 106 p. (Coleção ABET. Mercado de trabalho;5).

DAU, Denise Motta. Benéfica para toda a sociedade. Disponível em: < http://www.fpabramo.org.br/o-que-fazemos/editora/teoria-e-debate/reducao-da-jornada-benefica-para-toda-sociedade > Acesso: em 10 set. 2010.

DELGADO, Maurício Godinho. Capitalismo, trabalho e emprego: entre o paradigma da destruição e os caminhos de reconstrução. São Paulo: LTr, 2006. 149p.

_____. Duração do trabalho: o debate sobre a redução para 40 horas semanais. Revista do Tribunal Superior do Trabalho, Brasília, v. 75, p. 25-34. 2009.

_____. O Direito do trabalho e a crise econômica atual. Disponível em:

<http://ext02.tst.jus.br/pls/no01/NO_NOTICIAS.Exibe_Noticia?p_cod_noticia=9898&p_cod_area_noticia=ASCS&p_txt_pesquisa=Ministro%20Maur%EDcio%20Godinho%20>. Acesso em: 26 out. 2009.

DIEESE. Boletim nº 197: o movimento sindical luta pela redução da jornada. Disponível em: <http://www.dieese.org.br/bol/cju/cjuago97.xml acesso em 28/01/11> Acesso: em 10 jan. 2011.

_____. Nota Técnica nº 57: reduzir a jornada de trabalho é gerar empregos de qualidade. Disponível em: <http://www.fenajufe.org.br/encontro6horas/arquivos/notatec57JornadaTrabalho%20dieese.pdf> Acesso: em 10 jan. 2011.

_____. Nota à imprensa: redução da jornada de trabalho para 40 horas já! Disponível em: < http://www.dieese.org.br/notatecnica/notaImprensaJornada0209.pdf> Acesso: em 10 jan. 2011.

FERNANDES, Reynaldo. Emprego, salários e redução da jornada de trabalho. Estudos Econômicos, v.21, n.1, p.41-69, jan./abr.1991.

GONZAGA, Gustavo Mauricio; MENEZES FILHO, Naércio Aquino; CAMARGO, José Márcio. Os efeitos da redução da jornada de trabalho de 48 para 44 horas semanais em 1988. Revista Brasileira de Economia, Rio de Janeiro, v.57, n.2, p. 369-400, abr./jun. 2003.

MELLO, Roberta Dantas. A crise mundial de 2007/2009 - o recente colapso do paradigma neoliberal. Reflexões e perspectivas para o mundo do trabalho. In: Congresso Ltr - 50º Congresso Brasileiro de Direito do Trabalho. 2010. São Paulo. Jornal do 50º Congresso Brasileiro de Direito do Trabalho. Disponível em: <http://www.ltr.com.br/web/jornal/direitodotrabalho.pdf>. Acesso em: 1 set. 2010.

POCHMANN, Márcio et al. A jornada de trabalho no Brasil: o debate e as propostas. Disponível em: <http://www.dieese.org.br/esp/jtrab_4.xml>. Acesso: em 1 set. 2010.

SCHWARZ, Rodrigo Garcia. A PEC 231/1995 e algumas ponderações necessárias sobre o sentido mais genuíno da redução legal da duração da jornada de trabalho. Disponível em: <http://lacasaenelaire.wordpress.com/2010/04/12/a-pec-n-%C2%BA-23195-e-algumas-ponderacoes-necessarias-sobre-o-sentido-mais-genuino-da-reducao-legal-da-duracao-da-jornada-de-trabalho/> Acesso: em 10 jan. 2011.

Constitutionality control about working matters in Brazil between 1988 and 2012

Sayonara Grillo Leonardo Coutinho da Silva[1]
Eleonora Kira Valdez de Moura[2]

Abstract: The Federal Constitution of 1988 inaugurated a new social order in Brazil, since it has brought a catalogue of fundamental labour rights and also provided remedies, guarantees and mechanisms that could enable not only the promotion and realization of these rights, as well as standardize the legal framework to the new constitutional order. The Direct Actions of Unconstitutionality (ADI) presented to Supremo Tribunal Federal (STF) appear as one of the instruments available for the Brazilian society able to guarantee the unity of the new constitutional system. In the context of investigations undertaken by the research group "Institutional Settings and Labor Relations" (CIRT) at Law School of the Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro, it emerged as relevant matters the actions presented to Supremo Tribunal Federal in the control of labor reforms carried out in violation of the fundamental rights of workers protected by the 1988 Constitution. Since the lack of information about the utilization of Direct Actions of Unconstitutionality in labour matters was detected, a database was built in order to support the Group's researches. In this article it

[1] PhD and MS in Legal Sciences from the Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro (Pontifícia Universidade Católica do Rio de Janeiro - PUC-Rio). Associate Professor at the National Law School (Faculdade Nacional de Direito - FND), where she is part of the Postgraduate Program in Legal Sciences at the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro (Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro - UFRJ) and working on a line of research involving "Decision Theories and Institutional Designs". Leader of the Institutional Settings and Labor Relations Research Group (Configurações Institucionais e Relações de Trabalho; CIRT) – part of the Directory of Research Groups at the National Council for Scientific and Technological Development (Conselho Nacional de Desenvolvimento Científico e Tecnológico – CNPq).

[2] LL.M from Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro. Bachelor of Statistics (Institute of Mathematics and Statistics at the State University of Rio de Janeiro - Instituto de Matemática e Estatística da Universidade do Estado do Rio de Janeiro - IME-UERJ) and Legal and Social Sciences (FND-UFRJ). Researcher linked to the Institutional Configurations and Labor Relations Research Group (CIRT). Judicial Technician at the Rio de Janeiro Court of Justice (Tribunal de Justiça do Rio de Janeiro - TJ-RJ).

is presented the construction process of this database and preliminary analysis of its information.

Keywords: Institutions; Judicialization; Labour; STF.

1. Introduction

In Brazil, the constitution of labor – consisting of a decent job that establishes the conditions for a life of dignity and of the exercise of a more autonomous existence – passes through the activity of multiple institutions, including political, union and judicial institutions, to shape the meaning of labor in the Constitution. In the judiciary, the interpretation of the Brazilian Supreme Court (Supremo Tribunal Federal - STF) regarding the rules, norms and principles of social justice, the subordination of the economic order to a social purpose and valorization of labor have gained increasing importance in labor world. Constitutional jurisdiction itself has been transformed and, with it, the institutional architecture that is geared toward the adjudication of labor disputes. The Supreme Court's role has been enlarged with respect to interpreting topics previously reserved primarily for the Labor judiciary and its Superior Labor Court (Tribunal Superior do Trabalho - TST), which is the court tasked with standardizing labor interpretation with the Constitution.[3]

These transformations are processed in a) the reframing of labor norms through the activity of interpreters; b) the institutional design of the Brazilian judiciary and conforming institutional spaces that authorize and allow the judge's interpretation of the text; and c) the role of the judiciary in controlling legislative reforms that affect labor law and undermine the assumptions of labor law theory. To understand these transformations, we developed investigative practices that focus on institutional arrangements and argumentative and judicial practices with respect to fundamental labor rights. Therefore, a methodological tool for monitoring, classifying and cataloging was built, which enables monitoring of concentrated control of constitutionality undertaken by the STF.

[3] Because there is a clear division of responsibilities in most areas of law, the Superior Court of Justice does not judge appeals based on constitutional claims. Those extraordinary appeals that challenge Regional Court decisions are directly addressed to STF, whether they originate in Federal Regional Courts or State Courts of Justice. However, all appeals of review filed against rulings by the Regional Labor Courts are directed to the Superior Labor Court – even if they have Constitutional foundation – which is in accordance with the rule expressly provided in Article 896th , paragraph c of the Brazilian Labor Code (Consolidação das Leis do Trabalho; CLT).

The article presents this research and its immersion in both the theoretical and political contexts that arise from the debate about judicialization in the next section, as well as an overview of the actions filed in STF concerning to labor rules and the role performed by STF in judging such unconstitutionality direct actions (

2. A brief contextualization of the debate.

Due to the variability of the uses of the word "judicialization" (MACIEL; KOERNER, 2002), a brief introduction is required as regards to understanding the judicialization of politics as it refers to the expansion of the judiciary's influence in the decision-making process in contemporary democracies (TATE; VALLINDER, 1997). In this sense, judicialization can be adopted as a suitable category to describe changes in contemporary democracies that have enabled courts to assume a greater role in the governance and life of nations. In Brazil, it is repeatedly used as a phenomenon that is understood as resulting from 1988 Constitution, which have increased instruments of judicial protection, access to courts, collectivization of interests etc. (MACIEL; KOERNER, 2002, p. 115).[4]

In a perspective that understands the phenomenon as positive, greater judicial participation in public life would derive from multiple factors, originated in the post-World War II world stage: the creation of the International Courts, the strengthening of legal institutions, the transformation of State and Law and the affirmation of the values of contemporary constitutionalism (VIANNA; BURGOS; SALLES, 2007, p. 39-40). Overcoming the liberal tradition of regulating the present from the past derived from legal certainty towards another tradition which regulates future from present – typical of the welfare state – would have allowed an expansion of the open texture of rules and increased normative indeterminacy (VIANNA et al, 2007). A greater porosity of law in social relations, including protection of vulnerable groups and intervention in the economic order, would have conferred new roles to the judiciary branch. The rise of neoliberalism, the deconstruction of protections by the way of flexibility or deregulating rights, and the weakening of executive action in the formulation and implementation of public policies would have guided toward the judiciary the debate about the absence or inadequacy of public policies.

[4]Strictly speaking, observes Werneck Vianna, the judicialization of politics refers to the constitutionality of control of the executive branch. This control is exercised by the courts at society's request. It affects the relationships between branches and the Republican canon of majority will; thus, it provokes an *institutional mutation of the Republican scene (*VIANNA, 2013, p.207). Brazil has experienced one of the strongest and most unique experiences of judicialization that would correspond to a new type of relationship between branches in the expansive context of the law, according to the author, and would be far from a pathological phenomenon.

For these matters, the 1988 Constitution is a watershed on the national context. VIANNA et al have already emphasized that transferring the interpretation of the constitutional text for civil society, through its institutions, placing itself as an instrument of social transformation, had promoted democratization of the republican tradition. Converting access to justice into an essential public policy would have produced a new arena for disputes between principles and values and would have brought about limitations on the will of the majority (VIANNA et al., 1999, p. 9-11). Then, it would have been consolidating democratic constitutionalism in Brazilian legal culture, which would subordinate legislative action to its commands, throughout the means provided for society to obligate, via judiciary branch, respecting for the constitutional bonds. In such a formulation, with wide dissemination and acceptance in the field of law, judicialization in our country is more closely related to the 1988 Constitution, which "made the law a feature of its engineering to achieve the fundamental rights it declared" (VIANNA et al., 2010, p. 14), than with legal activism itself. The judiciary, activist or not, expanded and is shown to be "a central institution of Brazilian democracy, whether in its political expression, or with regard to intervention in the social sphere" (VIANNA et al., 1999, p. 9).

This is an important reflection that emphasizes the debate from a normative point of view and is connected to the relationship between democracy and the Constitution, which guided the first set of studies on the topic in sociology, political science and Brazilian law, albeit from a critical perspective. From the perspective of the relationship between judicialization and labor relations, the uniqueness of the field, the diversity of the phenomena[5] and the historical specificity[6] encourage an inquiry into the feasibility of using the category of judicialization to describe institutional transformations in the sphere of class relations because it is possible to speak of a fall in the rate of judicialization (or "dejudicialization").

From an analytical point of view, a second set of studies addresses the institutional and political environment and focuses on measuring

[5]The collectivization of conflicts promoted by the 1988 Constitution, with the opening of the judicial system to collective actions, caused a shift in the debate from the arena of politics to that of the judiciary. This is one of the novelties of the Brazilian context, which is highlighted by research that characterized the judicialization of social relations and the associated positivity for democratic consolidation. However, that description is not echoed in the landscape of collective labor relations. The first decade following the 1988 Constitution saw the collectivization of rights and the expansion of collective redress that stimulated social actors to take action in the judicial system in defense of the rights of groups and communities. However, the labor sphere trod a discordant path. Restricting the unions' access to justice was a cornerstone of the Labor Court, either through a limited interpretation of procedural substitution (SILVA, 2008, 2012) or through a greater formalism in judging the legal grounds inherent in the handling of collective bargaining actions (SILVA, 2008, p.398-419). That specificity prevented an "explosion of litigation" with an increase in individual labor claims filed before the Labor Court. However, the possible explanatory variables are more related to the delegitimization of legal norms by capitalists (and therefore labor law itself), including, for example, the expansion of constitutional rights, such as the increase from 10% to 40% for compensation for arbitrary dismissal or dismissal without cause from the Severance Pay Fund (Fundo de Garantia do Tempo de Serviço – FGTS) (CARDOSO, 2002). In the sphere of individual conflicts, the judicialization of class relations would result from numerous factors, including the weakening of other institutions, such as labor inspection, and the coercive power of the unions, which would substantially reduce the cost of non-compliance with rules and encourage employers to promote the "thawing of a cold labor market" (CARDOSO, 2002, p.495).

[6]Labor relations in Brazil have always been "judicialized." Werneck Vianna is concerned with recognizing certain peculiarities of the Brazilian republican experience. In a recently published text, he states: "The bourgeois modernization that came to us from the Revolution of 1930 took the institutions and procedures of the law as one of its main supports to achieve economic and social change. This brought two crucial dimensions of social life under its jurisdiction: that of the political 'market' and the labor market. Special courts were created for their regulation: the Electoral Justice and the Labor Justice courts. Here, then, judicialization is born from a process of modernization imposed asymmetrically on society by the State, then formatted according to corporate modeling and acting for the protection and social control of workers' associational life" (VIANNA, 2013, p. 211).

and evaluating the phenomenon of judicialization.[7] Judicial behavior is studied under different methodological matrices. Currently, there is some consensus on the importance of institutions and their designs, and neoinstitutionalist approaches are increasingly used as an explanatory basis for understanding the expansion of the judiciary's role.[8] From a more realistic political perspective with a less prescriptive bias, it is possible, for example, to correlate a transfer of power from the legislative and executive spheres and reduced discretionary legislative will with the constitutionalization of rights and with the strategic perspective of political elites.[9] In this field, an increase in the institutional spaces of decision does not necessarily lead to the judicialization of politics.

Judicialization can also be studied using the political strategies of the actors and the scenario in which such choices develop (TAYLOR; DA ROS, 2008). This indicates the varying use of the courts by political actors, mainly by the opposition, to demand new problematizations to explain, for example, "that different patterns of judicialization may [7]From an analytical perspective that favors a judicial behavior approach, Carvalho describes the attitudinal model – which examines the correlation between judge, ideology and action – and the strategic model. In the strategic model, "the judges understand that their ability to achieve certain goals depends, in turn, on their ability to take into account the preferences of other political actors, the choices they expect them to make and the institutional context in which they operate." (CARVALHO NETO, 2004, p.123).

[8]See Hall; Taylor (2003).

[9]Arantes emphasizes the duality of interpretations regarding the massive transfer of political institutions' authority to the judiciary: "The first, of a more normative character, attributes a positive sense to this transfer, associating it with the decentralization and domestication of political power, whether in new democracies or consolidated democracies. Constitutionalizing rights and creating/strengthening constitutional control mechanisms would be forms of improving democracy against the old trend of tyranny by the legislative majority and/or the hypertrophied executive branch. The second way, itself from a realist-inspired political science, questions why politicians would be interested in transferring authority to non-parliamentary and non-executive power entities, such as constitutional courts, as well as reducing its discretion through the constitutionalization of rights. Unlike the first approach, this second appeals to the strategic character of the behavior of political elites and seeks to build explanations based on the idea of delegation of power motivated by self-interest. To the authors of this second perspective, the decision to constitutionalize rights and transfer authority to constitutional courts is directly related to the framework of political forces of the constituent moment and with the expectations of diverse parties in relation to the future." (ARANTES, 2012, p. 197). Under this approach, judicialization should not be naturalized as an expression of a democratic progress.

emerge from virtually identical institutional contexts" (TAYLOR; DA ROS, 2008, p. 829). In a comparative study of the similarities and dissonances of judicialization in two distinct periods of post-1988 Brazilian political life, Taylor and Da Ros observed distinct uses of judicialization, which is the rhetoric of the justification for the appeal used.

As distinct uses of judicialization, Taylor and Da Ros propose three categorizations: judicialization as opposition tactic, judicialization as arbitration of conflicting interests, and judicialization as a government instrument (2008, p. 838-843). In the first type, the suit is proposed to explain a rule to the opposition, to disqualify government public policies and/or to denounce, veto or delay government practices that the claimants have deemed are misleading. From the actors' point of view, the courts are used as arenas or instruments of opposition.

Judicialization as arbitration of conflicting interests refers to an action aimed at contesting rules that involve assignments and redistributions of powers and responsibilities to parties, federal entities, political entities, courts, etc. With this type of appeal, the negative impacts on conforming power resources that are allocated to institutions of various types are expected to decrease, which will reduce political and economic losses.

More recently, the judiciary has been used for overcoming legislative impasses, decision-making paralysis, "correcting mistakes" of previous administrations, disregarding approved laws without the political support of the government, removing legal statutes unfavorable to the executive, etc.[10] This is a third type of use of judicialization, which is understood as a government instrument that the government can use to express its opposition to congressional actions that are contrary to its interests or simply unpopular, as occurs with an increase in the spending and salaries of political agents (TAYLOR; DA ROS, 2008, p. 843).

Conversely, as a result of the debates about judicialization, old objections to constitutional control and the actions of judicial courts have reappeared. The discussion about the (lack of) legitimacy of judges to exclude the application of a rule is replaced by other terms, and the debate is renewed. Moving from the axis of judicialization, institutionalist approaches examine interpretative and argumentative models, [10]"Inspired by the lessons of Whittington (2005, 2007) on the important role of the United States Supreme Court, are the cases in which one seeks the 'helping hand' of the highest institution of the Judiciary Branch so that it implements or rules favorably on public policies in the interest of the government."(TAYLOR; DA ROS, 2008, p.842).

possible constitutional dialogues, etc. It is possible, then, to reflect on the interaction between political, social and business actors – and the interaction between these actors and the Judiciary – by employing the uses and strategies adopted in the judicialization of labor policies.

3. The Supreme Court and Labor.

The importance of labor in the Constitution dates to the origins of social constitutionalism. The emergence of the constitutional right of labor denotes the relevance of the regulation of economic and labor statutes in shaping the paradigms that define the ideals of social justice and the role of the state in the twentieth-century economic domain to promote the spread of democracy and to incorporate new dimensions to citizenship. After the Mexican (1917), Weimar (1919), and Brazilian (1934) constitutional precursors – and those that emerged post-war that refused authoritarian and exclusionary options for liberal-nationalism (Italy, 1947; Germany, 1949; Brazil, 1946) – strong changes in the structure of law and capitalism that were promoted by the welfare state and Keynesian economics reshaped social and political relationships. All this occurred before the redemocratization processes bequeathed to us by the Spanish (1978), Portuguese (1976) and Brazilian (1988) charters at the end of the twentieth century. This was the culmination of the twentieth century's process of expanding civil, political and social rights on a national basis. In terms of the demand for equality, recognition and affirmation of rights in public and private relationships, labor is a precursor for the enlargement of constitutionalism and fundamental rights.

The 1988 Constitution moved labor regulation from the domain of economic relationships to the domain of fundamental rights, which means replacing the predominant focus on the market and state intervention in the economic domain. This move is heir to a tradition of breaking with previous legal culture, which separated the Constitutional text from disputes, and ensures a quality assurance system of collective autonomy against the public/State by introducing a democratic openness that opens up the guarantees and means to implement norms to citizens. It distributes and redistributes power resources to actors and institutions. The expansion of active legitimate subjects to manage mechanisms of access to the STF through actions that directly trigger the concentrated control of constitutionality was added to a set of constitutional writs that are directed to avoid serious problems arising from omissions in the regulations of the Constitution (such as a writ of injunction and an action of unconstitutionality by omission). This expansion is in addition to the enlarged rights of freedom of association (which allowed the formation of unions of public servants), an increase in the number of trade union confederations[11], management of a collective writ of mandamus and collective actions for the defense of multiple interests, whether for themselves as public civil actions (Ações Civis Públicas - ACPs) or for the rights of others, procedurally replacing the members of the represented categories (Constitution of the Federative Republic of Brazil – Constituição da República Federativa do Brasil - CRFB, Art. 8, section III).

Given the significant number of labor rights that still require regulation (CRFB, Article 7) and with the legitimacy of access to the Supreme Court by class entities or national union confederations, it was expected that there would be a greater emphasis on writs of injunction and actions of unconstitutionality by omission. The first non-concrete, or subsidiary, action of the Supreme Court only recognized legislative inertia and determined that the regulation's pending rule should be drafted. This action certainly contributed to the low level of importance of such writs in the configuration of the judicialization of social relations. Conversely, the intense legislative activity and great controversy among political, economic and social forces in the post-constitutional period boosted the STF's activity and allowed for the formation of an information repository that was capable of supporting investigations related to this phenomenon.

Database construction has been undertaken through direct[12] and continuous collection of information[13] and is intended to identify the STF's position on the concentrated control of the constitutionality of the norms that address labor issues[14], beginning with the preparation of ta-

[11]With the exception of the rule requiring recognition by presidential decree.

[12]Direct collection does not use any sampling technique. Information is collected directly from the population.

[13]The research's chronological limit defines the date of the Constitution's enactment (October 5, 1988) as the starting point. The database was successively updated from 2008 to the end date presented here, December 31, 2012. To enable it to work within such an extensive timespan, it was necessary to define a limit for the object of research, so as to include only issues concerning the contractual relationship of employment in the survey of the actions of constitutionality. Therefore, statutory relationships that are typical of public servants were not contemplated.

[14]It was established that the definition of "labor issues" would take into account not only bles and historical series[15] that are able to support analyses of the judicialization of labor relations.

In the name of information reliability, the official statistics available at the STF's website were dismissed because it was not possible to access their methodology for data collection and processing[16]. Thus, initial petitions were adopted as the sample universe[17]. All initial petitions alleging direct actions of unconstitutionality (ações diretas de inconstitucionalidade; ADI), declaratory actions of constitutionality (ações declaratórias de constitucionalidade; ADC) and complaints of breach of fundamental precept (arguições de descumprimento de preceito fundamental; ADPF) were read. The extracted information was systematized into a summary table[18] that enabled a quantitative analysis of the primary variables – both in isolation and in correlation with one another – through data tabulation and graphs.

The preponderance of ADI among the instruments that require the Supreme Court to exert concentrated control is unequivocal. The comparison between the frequency distributions of actions (Graph 1) reveals that there were 199 labor-related ADIs between 1988 and 2012, the catalogs listed in Articles 6 to 11, but also the rules of Articles 5, 114 and 133 of the Constitution and Article 10 of the Temporary Constitutional Provisions Act.

---

[15]A historical series, chronological or temporal, is a graph that brings together information observed according to time.

[16]The STF portal advises that the results are presented without human interference, automatically, as they are inserted into the database. However, during information extraction, inconsistencies were detected in the calculation of total ADIs over the years. The official statistics available on the STF's electronic portal, updated through December 31, 2012, reported that 4,820 ADIs had been filed since 1988. The survey found that, between 2009 and 2012, 44 ADIs did not exist in the numbering sequence. If these actions had been computed by the Supreme Court's statistics, the last ADI proposed in 2012 should have received the number 4864. However, this ADI is classified on the STF portal with the number 4893. Taking 4893 as a reference, and subtracting the missing 44 actions, the total number of ADIs distributed since the promulgation of the Constitution until December 31, 2012, totals 4849. Problems in the indexing performed by the STF's electronic portal were also found because approximately half of the actions do not show the branch of law that their content addresses.

[17]Sampling universe, population universe, or simply universe designates every set whose elements have shared features from which samples can be extracted. In this work, sampling techniques were not used because all petitions available at the STF's website were read, and the selection of actions focused on those petitions that met the search parameters.

[18]For a description of the database construction methodology, see CIRT, 2012.

whereas there were five[19] ADCs and 33 ADPFs. As a result of the quantitative and qualitative importance of ADIs in the panorama of concentrated control of constitutionality, this study focuses on presenting those actions according to priority.

The expected war of regulation announced by political analysts soon after the end of the constitutional process, particularly in light of the deadlock in the vote on labor and union rights, did not occur exclusively in Congress. The regulatory arena was wider than expected because of the role of the executive branch, the antagonism of corporate and union forces around their interests and values and the great ideological and political polarization in the economic arena, together with the action (active or silent) of the STF, which was prodded by ADIs to assess the new laws adopted. An examination of the contested provisions' content also suggests a shift from regulation to deregulation, or rather to regulation that relaxes rather than strengthens constitutional rights.

Considering the classification proposed by Taylor and Da Ros on the uses of judicialization to bring labor-related ADIs, we consider the following categories of judicialization: judicialization as arbitration of conflicting interests, judicialization as opposition tactic, and judicialization as a government instrument.

Through ADIs, the dispute of labor reforms promoted over the Constitution's first 25 years can be observed, particularly those guided by the avalanche of discourse on relaxation that governments and judicial institutions indulged in during the first 15 years of the 1988 Constitution. Nevertheless, it is possible to consider periods of greater or lesser dispute over the time-span studied. For this reason, we are concerned with relating the actions to the moments of greater or lesser forcefulness of reforms.

As shown in Graph 1, there was no uniform demand for ADIs, but there was a significant increase in the number of actions filed during several years over the timespan researched. Labor issues remained under debate in the STF for the Constitution's 24 years, with an average[20] of approximately eight per year and with a significant number of ADIs filed in 1990, 1998, 2007 and 2008, with 15, 26, 12 and 19 actions filed, [19]The five ADCs were proposed in the years 1997, 1998, 2005, 2007 and 2009.

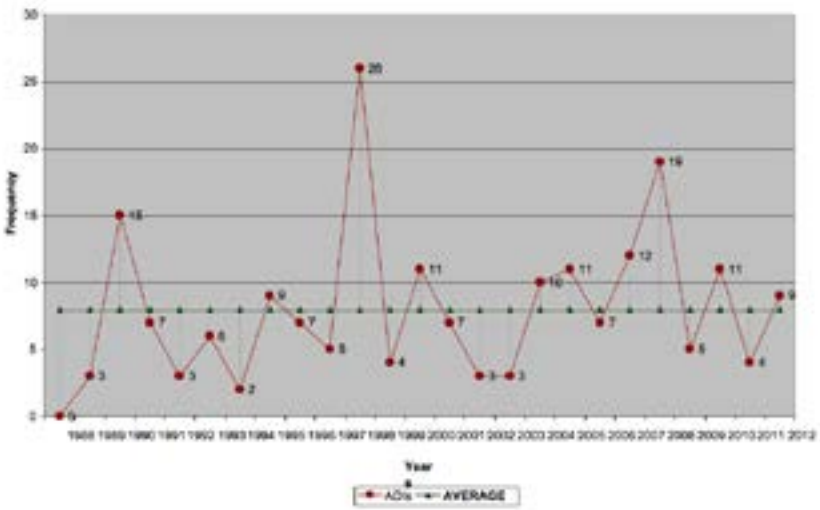
[20]The mean $\overline{X}$ of a population or sample corresponds to the measurement that coalesces the most observed frequencies around itself. There are different types of mean, and here we used the simple arithmetic mean, which corresponds to the quotient obtained by dividing the total sum of the frequencies by the number of years of the series.

respectively.

Graph 1
Comparison between the annual frequencies and the mean ($\overline{X}$ =7.96) of labor-related ADIs between 1988 and 2012)

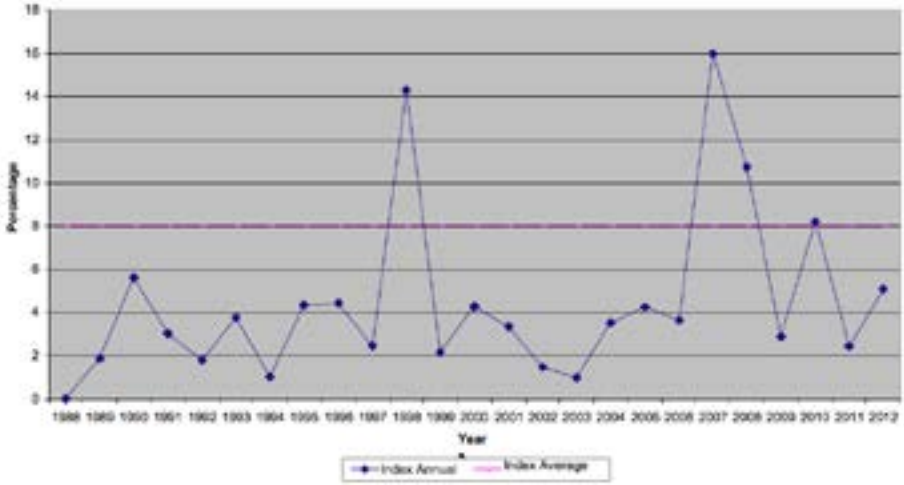


Source: CIRT Group-PPGD-UFRJ Database

Although labor issues are historically judicialized, it is possible to understand the moments when such disputes were more intensively taken to the STF, not only by comparing the annual frequency with the mean but also through a judicialization index[21].

[21]The judicialization index of labor issues in the STF in concentrated control through the direct pathway consists of a percentage that results from dividing the number of actions based on labor issues by the total number of ADIs filed each year.

Graph 2
Index of judicialization of the constitutionality of the control of labor issues in Brazil between 1988 and 2012



Source: CIRT Group-PPGD-UFRJ Database

As is clearly presented in Graph 2, the 199 labor-related ADIs that have been filed since the promulgation of the Constitution represent an annual average of approximately 4% of the 4,849 ADIs filed before that Court. Although this mean percentage suggests that the concentrated control of unconstitutionality through labor-related ADIs is relatively low when compared year-by-year to total actions filed, graph 2 shows that this index doubled in 2010, more than doubled in 2008, more than tripled in 1998 and quadrupled in 2007. Thus, the context of those periods in which the intensification of judicialization occurred should be explored.

In 1990, President Collor de Mello[22] issued successive economic [22]The government of President Fernando Collor de Mello began on March 15, 1990 and lasted for just over two years; it ended with his resignation on October 1, 1992. Collor de Mello began the neoliberal discourse in Brazil, diagnosing inflation and the public deficit as chronic effects of a strong state presence in the economy; these problems could only be solved through a program of privatization and administrative reform that aimed to minimize the size of the state. There were 29 material defects that were the subjects of 15 ADIs in 1990. In the field of fundamental individual rights, the most frequent is the violation of the principle of acquired rights (CRFB, Art. 5 XXXVI),whereas in the plans through which he promoted the trade liberalization of the Brazilian market, caps on prices and wages, a tight monetary policy and confiscation of private savings, all of which combined to generate a severe recession in Brazil that was caused primarily by a lack of liquidity. In this context, the loss of the purchasing power of wages caused by the inflationary spiral took center stage in the political debate surrounding labor relations particularly with respect to the successive changes in the policy of wage adjustments that resulted in injury to workers. Anticipating that disputes over salaries would be taken to the judiciary, President Collor issued Provisional Measure 190 of May 31, 1990, which provided in Article 1 that "in collective bargaining agreements of an economic or legal nature, to avoid serious injury to the public order or economy, the President of the Superior Labor Court, at the request of the interested party, may suspend, by reasoned order, wholly or partly, the implementation of decisions of the Regional Labor Courts until the final judgment of the decision pronounced in the respective appeal." With this, the procedural issue remained at the same level as the salary issue, with the addition of 11 of 15 actions involving disputed acts involving the Executive Branch.[23] Seven ADIs were presented by unions representing workers[24], five by political parties[25] and only one by an employer organization[26], context of social rights, the highest incidence is found in the breach of the principle of irreducibility of salary (CRFB, Art. 7 VI).

[23]Between May and December 1990, four Provisional Measures (Medida Provisória - MP) were contested in eleven ADIs (five with respect to MP 190, one with respect to MP 185, two with respect to MP 193 and three with respect to MP 211), in addition to Executive Order 99,684 (one ADI), Ordinance 3435 of the Ministry of Labor (one ADI) and Normative Instruction 09 (two ADIs). All these acts were issued that same year.

[24]Both the Central Union of Workers (Central Única de Trabalhadores - CUT) and the National Confederation of Metalworkers (Confederação Nacional de Trabalhadores Metalúrgicos - CNTM) filed two actions, while the General Workers Central (Central Geral dos Trabalhadores - CGT), the national union of taxi drivers and the union of commerce workers of the State of Rio de Janeiro each presented one action each.

[25]The Brazilian Social Democracy Party (Partido da Social-Democracia Brasileira - PSDB) was the claimant in two ADIs and a total of three more were filed by the Democratic Labor Party (Partido Democrático Trabalhista - PDT), the Communist Party of Brazil (Partido Comunista do Brasil - PCdoB) and the Workers Party (Partido dos Trabalhadores - PT).

[26]The National Federation of Information Technology Companies (Federação Nacional das Empresas de Serviços Técnicos de Informática e Similares - FENAINFO) challenged Ordinance 3435 of 19 June 1990 of the Ministry of Labor and Social Security, which addressed norms for worker ergonomics in the data processing area, setting a five-hour which demonstrates the confluence of interests between the business community and the government of Fernando Collor at that time.

In 1998, in a context marked by the negative activism of the Superior Labor Court (SILVA, 2008, p. 485-487), unions sought new instances of dispute; among these, the ADIS before the STF stand out. Unlike 1990, when only the national confederation of metal workers and the central unions filed ADIs, a myriad of professional confederations, separately or together, resorted to this mode of action, which highlighted the prominence of commercial entities as plaintiffs. The filing of ADIs was concentrated mostly in the hands of workers and political parties, with 11 and eight of the 26 ADIs in 1998[27], respectively, which verified the recurrent use of judicialization as opposition tactic at that time.

The labor issues at the center of the contested acts were essentially concerned with the duration of work and new forms of contracting. Indeed, that year, the executive branch adopted a "legal activism" (VIANNA et al., 2010) approach to make both entry into the employment relationship and the duration of work more flexible: the circumstances under which contracts were permitted for a specified amount of time were expanded and the system of compensating hours through a bank of hours was created (Law 9601 of 1998); rules for part-time contracts with the annualization of the 44 hour week for the purpose of compensation was introduced (MP 1709 of 1998), and several changes that addressed paid rest on Sundays (numerous reissues of MP 1539 of 1997).

In 2007 and 2008, the biggest news was related to the eight ADIs that addressed State statutes[28] because – for the first time – they exceed-limit for effective data entry work, in addition to a ten-minute break for every 50 minutes worked, which allowed, however, for the use of the remainder of the working day for other tasks.

[27]The actions proposed by employers' confederations were directed at state and local standards and a decision by the TRT for the 18th region, whereas political parties and professional confederations challenged provisional measures and laws arising from their conversion. Within these, 87 material defects were identified, with most of the claims relating to social rights, both generically (CRFB, Art. 6) and specifically, as with the irreducibility of salary, limitation of the workday and the right to overtime.

[28]In 2008, among the six contested state laws, four were from the State of Rio de Janeiro. Three of these created state holidays and one established mandatory preventive screening for breast cancer in workers. A law in Rondônia that prohibited commercial fishing in state rivers was also the subject of an ADI, in addition to a law establishing that companies must hire a minimum of 5% of people over the age of forty-five in the Federal District.

ed the number of ADIs directed at federal laws (four ADIs) and interim measures (five ADIs). The data suggest that disputes over labor standards encompass multiple regulatory bodies, including State governments. Thus, such disputes began to be heard in other regulatory bodies outside of Congress or the Presidency of the Republic.

As indicated in Graph 2, the year 2007[29] stands out from the others by presenting an annual rate (16%) four times greater than the average rate of labor actions as a percentage of the total number of claims filed (4%). Of the 75 ADIs proposed in the STF during that year, 12 were related to labor issues and analysis reveals the emergence of a new configuration of the judicialization of labor relations in the STF, with the emergence of other actors in more than half of the labor writs: State Governors are the plaintiffs in four ADIs[30] and class entities in three ADIs[31].

[29]This period falls within the government of President Luis Inácio Lula da Silva of the Workers Party (PT), the first trade unionist elected President in Brazil, who was sworn in on January 1, 2003, and reelected to remain there until December 31, 2010.

[30]These are ADI 3894 – in which the Governor of Rondônia challenges Law 1201 of 2001 of that State, which fixed the workday of nursing professionals at six hours – and ADIs 3899 and 3953, in which the Governor of the Federal District challenges District Laws 3923 and 3916, both from 2006. The first norm ensures employment for bus fare collectors by stipulating the necessity of this function, and the second governs the profession of hairdresser in that federated unit. Finally, ADI 3960 was authored by the Governor of São Paulo in which he disputes Law 12,252 of 2006, which prohibits the bus driver from performing the job of fare collector. With the exception of this last, which was dismissed, the others were awaiting decision on December 31, 2012.

[31]Two actions, 3928 and 3993, dealt with contributions. The first, filed by the Brazilian Association of Radio and Television (Associação Brasileira de Rádio e Televisão - ABRATEL) challenged Normative Instruction No. 20 of the Ministry of Social Welfare and Assistance for including portions of the "thirteenth salary" (annual year-end bonus) corresponding to the previous notice period and the previous notice period compensated on the basis of calculating pension contributions; the second was the initiative of the Federal Board of Nursing with respect to Decree 5773 of 2006, which exempted higher education teaching professionals from professional contribution. Both were dismissed without judgment on the merits. This group's third action, ADI 3961, is notable for the group chosen for activism: the National Association of Labor Court Judges (Associação Nacional dos Magistrados da Justiça do Trabalho - ANAMATRA) questions the constitutionality of Federal Law 11,442 of 2007, according to which the nature of relationships between the transportation company and the autonomous carrier will always be commercial; the claim was made using the argument that this norm encourages the practice of illegitimate contractual relations and prevents the recognition of employee relations and promoting fraud of constitutional labor rights. The action in question was awaiting judgment on December 31, 2013.

This change in configuration is confirmed by analyzing the year 2008, when three phenomena can be found. For the first time since the promulgation of the 1988 Constitution, employers' confederations took the lead in contesting rules through ADIs, accounting for nine of the 19 filed during the period, whereas union confederations of workers and political parties appear balanced, with three actions each. Although control of constitutionality was intensely focused on provisional measures in previous periods, both in the Collor de Mello Government and in the two terms of President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, this number was drastically reduced during the tenure of President Luis Inácio Lula da Silva, with only four interim measures contested during his two terms together.[32] Finally, the eight ADIs that challenged norms originating in States and municipalities exceeded the number of ADIs targeting federal laws (four ADIs) and interim measures (five ADIs) for the first time. These factors together reveal that labor disputes are now contested in other regulatory bodies that are outside of Congress or the Presidency of the Republic[33].

In addition to the peak years represented in the graphs, there was an increased incidence of labor-related ADIs in the STF in 2000, 2005 and 2010, when 11 ADIs were filed in each of those years. Although not representing an increase as significant as other years that have previously been analyzed, a closer look at the use of judicialization in these periods is warranted.

[32]This does not mean, however, that acts originating in the Executive Branch have passed unscathed. During the two terms of President Lula, nine ADIs were directed against four Ordinances of the Ministry of Labor and Employment and in 2008, five actions challenged Ordinance 186 of April 10, 2008.

[33]In addition, throughout the period of Luis Inácio Lula da Silva's government, there is a sharp decline in the filing of ADIs by political parties. Only three ADIs were filed by political parties during this period: ADI 4067 proposed by the Democrats party (DEM) questioned the formal recognition of central unions, challenging Law 11,648 of March 31, 2008; and the Brazilian Social Democracy Party (PSDB) filed ADI 4015 in order to stop Ordinance 218 of the Regional Labor Court - 8th region, which fixed the amount of debts to be paid by Small Value Requisitions (Requisições de Pequeno Valor - RPV). The Socialism and Liberty Party (Partido Socialismo e Liberdade - PSOL) authored ADI 4027, focusing on Law 11,603 of 2007, which authorized general commerce labor on holidays. This decrease can be explained by the fact that the parties that traditionally filed the ADIs formed the foundation of the government after 2002, in addition to the "parsimony" with which President Luis Inácio Lula da Silva used the "impulse toward relaxation," preferring to attack labor legislation "laterally" (VIANNA et al., 2010, p. 113).

In 2000, four of the 11 ADIs disputed Article 1 of Law 9958, passed on January 12, 2000, which created conciliation commissions to which any labor claims should be submitted. Three of these ADIs were filed by union confederation professionals and one by a joinder between opposition political parties[34], which made explicit the use of judicialization as opposition tactic, at least as a strategy of worker resistance to the continuity of the relaxed reforms of neoliberal bias.

In 2005, judicialization resulted from disputes over rules related to Constitutional Amendment No. 45 of 2004, which promoted the reform of the judiciary. Eight of the 11 ADIs that were filed that year related to the unconstitutionality of several of that Amendment's provisions concerning the jurisdiction of the Labor judiciary (Figure 1). Union confederation professionals were the plaintiffs in three actions (ADIs 3423, 3431, 3432) whereas the remaining five actions are distributed between other legitimate parties: one by the National Confederation of Liberal Professions (ADI 3392), one by the Union Confederation of Educational Institutions (ADI 3520), two by associations of judges, one by federal judges (ADI 3395) and one by state judges (ADI 3529), in addition to one by the Attorney General (ADI 3684). In these instances, there is no use of judicialization as opposition tactic because no political party took the initiative to file the ADIs. In any case, the presence of two associations of judges as plaintiffs, in addition to requests from Confederations concerning mutual agreement, suggests the use of judicialization as arbitration of conflicting interests. The challenges before the STF in those cases were, at the core, about the rules involving redistributing powers and competences to the judicial branches. The Confederations hope, in turn, to reduce the negative impacts of conforming the resources of power that were transferred to them with the possibility of introducing a regulatory body without the requirement of mutual agreement.

[34]These are ADIs 2139, 2148, 2160 and 2237, initially distributed to Minister Octavio Galotti. They are awaiting trial with a partially issued order from 2009 to give an interpretation according to the Constitution of Article 625-D, which was introduced by the contested provision, to ensure free access to the courts under individual bargaining. ADI 2139 was filed by the Brazilian Communist Party (Partido Comunista Brasileiro - PCB) in an active joinder with the Communist Party of Brazil (PCdoB), the Democratic Labor Party (PDT) and the Brazilian Socialist Party (Partido Socialista Brasileiro - PSB); the remaining actions had as plaintiff, respectively, the National Confederation of Workers in Educational Institutions (Confederação Nacional de Trabalhadores em Estabelecimentos de Ensino), the National Confederation of Commerce Workers (Confederação Nacional de Trabalhadores no Comércio) and the National Confederation of Liberal Professions (Confederação Nacional das Profissões Liberais).

Finally, in 2010, there is the use of judicialization as arbitration of conflicting interests by business union confederations because they have mostly involve ADIs related to laws in the states of São Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, Paraná and Rio Grande do Sul that focused on state minimum wages, regulation of professional practices and labor restrictions that are required for the participation of companies in bidding processes.

However, there are other examples of the use of judicialization as a government instrument during the research period.

In the timespan investigated, State Governors resorted to the STF 15 times to challenge state laws that contained labor issues that were beneficial to workers in almost all cases[35]. The distribution of ADIs among the political parties that the State Chief Executives belonged to indicates that governors from the PSDB were the plaintiffs in five actions, followed by representatives of the DEM and the PMDB in three actions each, the PSB in two actions and the PPB and PT, in one action. At this time, the phenomenon of the use of judicialization as a government strategy can be identified from the initiatives of several governors in challenging state laws.

4. Conclusions

In this article, we analyzed the judicialization of labor-related actions before the STF to understand the frequency and greater incidence of such actions and to relate them to the political strategies of the actors and the context in which they developed those choices (TAYLOR, DA ROS, 2008).

The actions examined show that professional and economic union confederations, analogously to political parties, make use of judicialization as opposition tactic – engaging the STF as a resource of resistance – although the prospect of success is irrelevant or distant[36].

[35]ADI 3282 and 4015 are the exceptions. They were filed by the Governors of the State of Rio Grande do Sul and Pará respectively, with respect to norms originating in the judiciary, which regulated the payment of convictions in small value requisitions. Action 3282 is awaiting judgment under the review of Minister Teori Zavascki. ADI 4015 was granted an injunction and is awaiting judgment on the merits, under the review of Minister Celso de Mello.

[36]As with ADI 1627, challenging Decree 2100 of 1996, which denounced ILO Convention 158, and with ADI 4568, which was filed by the PPS, the PSDB and the DEM in 2011 with respect to Law 12,382 of 2011, which addressed the policy of raising the min-

Recourse to judicialization as arbitration of conflicting interests has been used at different times. The classical limits of the judicialization of labor were topics brought to the STF, with ADIs filed against the new wording of Article 114, paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Constitution, by the 45th Amendment, which established the need for mutual agreement to file collective bargaining complaints, restricted the normative power of the Labor Court and reduced the power resources granted to unions (ADI 3392, 3395, 3423, 3421, 3432). In the case of Judicial Reform, the dispute concerns the procedural rules that limit the powers of the unions and the Labor Court itself. The ADIs that challenge Ordinance 186 of the Ministry of Labor and Employment on union registration (ADIs 4120, 4126, 4128 and 4139) can also be classified as the use of judicialization as arbitration of conflicting interests because they are initiatives that seek to avoid regulations that cripple union confederations and the monopoly of representation by previously established unions.

The use of judicialization as government instrument and "helping hand" continues to occur in the labor realm. Although barely visible in the study of ADIs, it is forcefully expressed in the use of Declaratory Actions of Constitutionality. A test case can be found in the judgment of ADC 16, which addresses the outsourcing and accountability of public administration through breach of duty. Although it falls outside the objectives of this article (which is focused on the study of ADIs), it demonstrates the richness of the monitoring and updating functionalities of the database that was designed and developed within the scope of CIRT/PPGD/UFRJ: A panel of design and redesign activities, institutions, norms and practices of Brazilian labor.

References

ARANTES, R. B., 2013. Cortes Constitucionais. In: AVRITZER, L, et. al. (Org.) Dimensões políticas da justiça. Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, pp. 195-206.

BARROSO, L. A., 2009. Judicialização, ativismo judicial e legitimidade democrática. Revista Direito do Estado, Salvador, year 4, no. 13, 29p., jan./mar. In http://www.plataformademocratica.org/Publicacoes/12685_Cached.pdf. Viewed 18 oct.2012. ISSN 1981-187X.

BOSCHI, R. R and SILVA, J. M., 2013. Direito e empresariado. In: AVRITZER, L, and others (Org.) Dimensões políticas da justiça. Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, pp.411-420.

---

imum wage.

BONAVIDES, Paulo, 2006. Curso de direito constitucional. 18ª ed. São Paulo: Malheiros.

BRANCO, A. P. T., 2009. O ativismo judiciário negativo investigado em súmulas editadas pelo Tribunal Superior do Trabalho. In: COUTINHO, Grijalbo Fernandes et al. (org.). Jurisprudência do TST: leituras críticas em defesa do direito do trabalho. São Paulo: LTr.

CARDOSO, A. M., 2002. Direito do Trabalho e Relações de Classe no Brasil Contemporâneo. In: VIANNA, L.W. A democracia e os três poderes no Brasil. Rio de Janeiro: IUPERJ. pp. 493-546.

CARVALHO, A. C., 2011. Direito do Trabalho: Curso e Discurso. Aracaju: Evocati.

CARVALHO, L. and VIEIRA, J. R., 2011. Desafios da Constituição: democracia e Estado no século XXI. Rio de Janeiro: UFRJ.

CARVALHO NETO, E. R. de., 2004. Em Busca da Judicialização da Política: Apontamentos para uma Nova Abordagem. In: Revista de Sociologia e Política. no.23, pp. 115-124. ISSN 0104-4478.

CASAGRANDE, Cássio, 2008. Ministério Público e a judicialização da política: Estudos de casos. Porto Alegre: Sergio Antonio Fabris Ed.

CASTRO, M. F. de, 1996. O Supremo Tribunal Federal e a Judicialização da Política. Revista brasileira de Ciências Sociais. Vol. 12 no. 34 São Paulo. Available from: http://www.anpocs.org/portal/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=203:rbcs- 34&catid=69:rbcs&Itemid =399 Viewed jan,03rd., 2013.

CHIARELLI, C. A. G and GRAZZIOTIN, M. R., 2012. Trabalho na Constituição. Direito Individual com jurisprudência e direito comparado. 2 ed. São Paulo: LTr.

DELGADO, M. G and DELGADO, G. N., 2012. Constituição da República e Direitos Fundamentais. Dignidade da pessoa humana, justiça social e direito do trabalho. São Paulo: LTr.

_____., 2013. Justiça do Trabalho. In: AVRITZER, L, et. al. (Org.) Dimensões políticas da justiça. Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, pp. 297-314.

EISEMBERG, José, 2002. Pragmatismo, direito reflexivo e judicialização da política. In: VIANNA, L.O. (Org). A democracia e os três poderes no Brasil. Belo Horizonte: UFMG; Rio de Janeiro: IUPERJ/FAPERJ.

ENGELMANN, Fabiano, 2006. Sociologia do campo jurídico: juristas e usos do direito. Porto Alegre: Sérgio Antônio Fabris Ed.

FARIA, J. E., 1992. Justiça e conflito: Os juízes em face dos novos movimentos sociais. 2. ed. São Paulo: Revista dos Tribunais. ISSN 0034-9275.

_____. , 2004. O sistema brasileiro de Justiça: experiência recente e futuros desafios. Estudos Avançados (USP. Impresso), São Paulo, vol. 18, no. 51, pp. 103-125.

ISSN 0103-4014.

FERRAJOLI, Luigi, 2007a Sobre los derechos fundamentales. In: CARBONELL, Miguel. Teoría del neoconstitucionalismo. Madrid: Trotta.

_____., 2012. Constitucionalismo garantista e neoconstitucionalismo. Anais do IX Simpósio Nacional de Direito Constitucional. pp. 95-113. Available from: http://www.abdconst.com.br/revistas_interna3.php Acesso em nov,22nd.2012

FREITAS, L. B., 2011. "Desjudicialização" da política ou a insuficiência dos conceitos de judicialização … In: MOTA, MAURICIO JORGE PEREIRA; MOTTA, LUIS EDUARDO PEREIRA. (Org.). O Estado democrático de Direito. Rio de Janeiro: Elsevier, pp. 245-266.

_____., 2011. A Política e o TST na Constituição dos Direitos do Trabalho. 1ª ed. São Paulo: LTr, vol.1, p. 112.

GARRIDO, Alexandre; et al., 2008. O Supremo Tribunal Federal e a Força Normativa dos Fatos. Revista Jurídica da Faculdade Nacional de Direito da UFRJ. vol.1, no.3, dec,2008. ISSN 1984-0950.

GOMES, A. de C and PESSANHA, E. G. da F., 2010. Trajetórias de Juízes. Porto Alegre, POA, TRT 4ª.

GOMES, F. R., 2013. Direitos Fundamentais dos Trabalhadores: critérios de identificação e aplicação prática. São Paulo, LTr.

HALL, P. A. and TAYLOR, R. C. R., 2003 As três versões do neo-institucionalismo. In: Lua Nova, 58. pp. 193-223. ISSN 0102-6445.

HESSE, Konrad, 1991. A força normativa da Constituição. Trad. Gilmar F. Mendes. Porto Alegre: Sérgio Antonio Fabris.

HORN, C. H and TEDESCO, M. S. R., 2010. A expansão recente da demanda da Justiça do Trabalho e a distribuição setorial das ações... Revista de Direito do Trabalho (São Paulo), vol. 137, pp. 11-44. ISSN 0102-8774.

HORN, C. H. (Org.) and COTANDA, F. C. (Org.)., 2011. Relações de trabalho no mundo contemporâneo: ensaios multidisciplinares. 1. ed. Porto Alegre: Editora da UFRGS,. vol. 1. 848 p.

LOBATO, M. S. C., 2006. O valor constitucional para a efetividade dos direitos sociais nas relações de trabalho. São Paulo: LTr.

LOPES, J. R. L., 1989. A Função política do poder judiciário. In: José Eduardo Faria. (Org.). Direito e justiça: a função social do judiciário. 1ª ed. São Paulo: Ática, vol. 1.

MACIEL, D. A and KOERNER, A., 2002. Sentidos da judicialização da política: duas análises. In: Lua Nova, no 57, pp. 123-124. ISSN 0102-6445.

MARTINS, C. E., 2009. A superexploração do trabalho e a economia política da dependência. In: SADER, E. SANTOS, T. (Coord.) A América Latina e os desafios da globalização. Ensaios dedicados a Ruy Mauro Marini. Rio de Janeiro: PUC-Rio. São Paulo: Boitempo. pp.189-216.

MOURA, E. K. V., 2013. Trabalho e Constituição: Ações diretas de inconstitucionalidade e os desafios da regulação do tempo de trabalho no Brasil. Dissertação (Mestrado em Teorias Jurídicas Contemporâneas) Programa de Pós-Graduação em Direito. Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro.

OLIVEIRA, M. A., 2002. Política trabalhista e relações de trabalho no Brasil: da Era Vargas ao Governo FHC. Tese (doutorado) – Instituto de Economia, Universidade Estadual de Campinas, Campinas.

OLIVEN, R. G; RIDENTI, M. and BRANDÃO, G. M., 2008. A Constituição de 1988 na vida brasileira. São Paulo: Hucitec/Anpocs.

PAESE, Raquel, 2011. A Constituição Brasileira de 1988 e a atuação dos sindicatos nos espaços de regulação do trabalho. HORN, C. H. (Org.); COTANDA, F. C. (Org.). In: Relações de trabalho no mundo contemporâneo: ensaios multidisciplinares. 1ª ed. Porto Alegre: Editora da UFRGS. vol. 1.

PESSANHA, E; ALEMÃO, I. and SOARES, J. L., 2009. TST, Dissídios Coletivos, Demissão Massiva: Novos Desafios para a Justiça do Trabalho. In: O Mundo do Trabalho, vol.1. Leituras críticas da Jurisprudência do Tribunal Superior do Trabalho. Hugo Melo Filho et. al. (Orgs.) São Paulo: LTr, pp. 77-94.

RAMOS FILHO, Wilson, 2012. Direito Capitalista do Trabalho: história, mitos e perspectivas no Brasil. São Paulo: LTr.

SARLET, I. W., 2001. O Estado Social de Direito, a Proibição de Retrocesso e a Garantia Fundamental da Propriedade. Revista Diálogo Jurídico, Salvador, CAJ - Centro de Atualização Jurídica, vol. I, no. 4, jul. In: http://www.direitopublico.com.br Acesso em: may, 1st, 2008. ISSN 1982-4858.

SENNETT, Richard, 2009. A corrosão do caráter. 14ª Ed. Rio de Janeiro: Record.

SILVA, S. G. C. L., 2009. Decisões judiciais e (des)construção dos direitos: uma revisita à interpretação dos direitos coletivos pelos tribunais superiores. In: COUTINHO, F.C et alli. O Mundo do Trabalho. Leituras críticas da jurisprudência do TST: em defesa do direito do trabalho. São Paulo: LTr, pp.418-438.

_____., 2008. Relações Coletivas de Trabalho: configurações institucionais no Brasil contemporâneo. São Paulo: LTr.

_____., 2012. Direitos fundamentais, Garantismo e Direito do Trabalho (republicação). Revista OAB. Rio de Janeiro, vol. 27, p. 115. ISSN 1984-2627.

_____., 2011. Reforma do Judiciário e Justiça do Trabalho: Esboço para a avaliação do legado reformador no âmbito do direito de greve. In: O que estão fazendo da Nova Competência da Justiça do Trabalho? Análise crítica da jurisprudência do STF, do TST e do STJ após a EC 45/2004. COUTINHO, Grijalbo, FAVA, Marcos Neves (Org.) São Paulo: LTr, pp. 611-639.

SILVA, S. G. C. L.; IGREJA, C. O. and MOURA, E. K. V.. 2009. Constituição e Trabalho: um exame sobre as Ações Diretas de Inconstitucionalidade ... XXXI Jornada Giullio Massarani de iniciação científica, artística e cultural. Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro – CCJE.

SILVA, S. G. C. L. and others, 2013. Ações Diretas de Constitucionalidade, Inconstitucionalidade e Arguições de Preceito ... Rio de Janeiro, Grupo de Pesquisa Configurações Institucionais e Relações de Trabalho. CIRT - PPGD-UFRJ, Apr, 2013.

SUNSTEIN, C. R., 1999. One case at a time: judicial minimalism on the Supreme Court. Cambridge: Harvard University.

SÜSSEKIND, Arnaldo, 2004. et al. Instituições do direito do trabalho. 21 ed. vol. 2, São Paulo: LTr.

TATE, C.N and VALLINDER, T., 1997. The global expansion of judicial power. New York: New York Univerity Press.

TAYLOR, M. M. and DA ROS, L., 2008. Os partidos dentro e fora do poder: a Judicialização como resultado contingente da estratégia política. Revista Dados. vol. 51, no. 4, Rio de Janeiro, pp. 825-264. Available from: http://www.scielo.br/pdf/dados/v51n4/02.pdf. ISSN 0011-5258.

TOLEDO FILHO, M. C., 2010. El caso Embraer y el ordenamiento brasileño. In: Revista Latinoamericana de Derecho Social, no. 11, Available from: Revistas.unam.mx, 2010. ISSN 1870-4670.

VIANNA, L.W. et al., 1999. A judicialização da política e das relações sociais no Brasil. Rio de janeiro: Revan.

_____., 2002. A democracia e os três poderes no Brasil. Rio de Janeiro: IUPERJ.

_____., 2010.A constitucionalização da legislação do trabalho no Brasil: uma análise da produção normativa entre 1988 e 2008. Centro de Estudos Direito e Sociedade (Cedes). Brasília: Fundação Astrogildo Pereira (FAP). ISSN 1982-1522

_____., 2013. A judicialização da política. In: Avritzer, L, et. al. (Org.) Dimensões políticas da justiça. Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, pp. 207-214.

VIANNA, L.W; BURGOS, M. B. and SALLES, P. M., 2007. Dezessete anos de judicialização. Tempo Social, vol. 19, no. 2. nov, 2007. pp.39-85. ISSN 0103-2070.

WALDRON, Jeremy, 2009. A Right-Based Critique of Constitutional Rights. Boston University Law Review. Apr, 2009. 478p.

The question of irregular migrant workers between a rights based international approach and national regulation

Daniela Muradas Reis[1]
Pedro Augusto Gravatá Nicoli[2]

Abstract: The analysis of the work rendered by immigrants in an irregular migratory condition reveals an existing disparity of positions on the issue. On one hand, national legal orders with merely repressive characteristics are silent on the specificity of the labour question or simply deprive migrant workers from protection, as a form of punishment and inhibition of migration. On the other hand, international human rights rules are dedicated to the matter, declaring the absolute necessity of protection in relation to the work performed. In this scenario, the essay proposes a critical comparison between the migration laws in Brazil, consolidated by the Statute of the Foreigner, and the approach of the issue by the International Labour Organization, to conclude in the direction of the necessary protection of the dignity of the worker, which cannot be adjourned.

Keywords: Labour Immigration; Brazilian Statute of the Foreigner; ILO's Rights Based Approach.

I. Introduction

[1] Daniela Muradas Reis holds a master degree in Philosophy of Law and a Ph.D. in Law from the Federal University of Minas Gerais (UFMG). She is a Labour Law Professor in the graduate and post-graduate Law School (master and doctorate) of the Federal University of Minas Gerais.

[2] Pedro Augusto Gravatá Nicoli holds a master degree and is currently a doctorate student in the Ph.D. in Law program from the Federal University of Minas Gerais, with scholarship from the Brazilian government (CAPES). Currently, he is in a research stage at the Collège de France, Paris, as part of "doctoral sandwich" program (2013-2014), under the supervision of Professor Alain Supiot.

It is not hard to perceive the relevance of the issue of international migration in the contemporary world. That occurs because this is an area of recurrent and serious affronts to human dignity, especially when it comes to work and the challenges related to the labour protection of the so-called undocumented immigrants. Antônio Augusto Cançado Trindade sees the problem in its amplified dimension, in the context of the advertised "globalization", presenting sharp criticism:

> "In times of the so-called 'globalization' (the misleading and false neologism which is en vogue in our days), the frontiers have been opened to the capitals, goods and services, but have sadly closed themselves to human beings. The neologism which suggests the existence of a process which would comprise everyone and in which everyone would participate, in reality hides the fragmentation of the contemporary world, and the social exclusion and marginalization of increasingly greater segments of the population. The material progress of some has been accompanied by the contemporary (and clandestine) forms of labour exploitation of many (the exploitation of undocumented migrants, forced prostitution, traffic of children, forced and slave labour), amidst the proven increase of poverty and social exclusion and marginalization"[3].

There are also situations of problematic interaction between irregular migrants and host societies, under the influence of complicating factors such as racism and xenophobia. Teresa Sales highlights:

> "Illegal or clandestine migration has been the focus of international bodies mostly from the 70's, when clandestine migration appeared stronger, generating movements of intolerance and discrimination against immigrants and their families"[4].

---

[3] CANÇADO TRINDADE, Antônio Augusto. Concurring Vote. In INTER-AMERICAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS. Juridical Condition and Rights of Undocumented Migrants. Advisory Opinion OC-18/03. San Jose, September 17, 2003. Avaliable at em http://www.corteidh.or.cr/docs/opiniones/seriea_18_esp.pdf. Access on February 2, 2014.

[4] SALES, Teresa. Brasil migrante, Brasil clandestino. Revista São Paulo em Perspectiva, São Paulo, 8(1), p. 107-115, jan./mar. 1994, p. 112. In the original: "As migrações ilegais ou clandestinas têm sido foco de atenção dos organismos de foro internacional sobretudo a partir dos anos 70, quando as migrações clandestinas se manifestam com mais vigor, gerando movimentos de intolerância e discriminação contra os imigrantes e suas famílias". Translation of the authors.

In this context, the analysis of the treatment given to unauthorized migrants reveals that there are quite dissimilar positions that reflect on the way legal labour protection of these individuals is perceived — guaranteed or deprived. The movement of hardening of migration laws around the world is well known, and sanctions to those who violate the migration legislation fulfill a central role as a policy to inhibit migration itself. At the same time, international bodies, such as the International Labour Organization, point in the direction of the necessary perception of the conditions to which these individuals are subjected and the need to protect their basic rights, such as the protection of labour performed.

It is essential to analyze the work performed by immigrants, since one can identify in almost every flow of people in the international scenario the presence of relations that have as its object the performance of human labour. National borders are almost always crossed with the intent of searching for better living conditions, what is generally mediated by work. That is because, after all, work is the lever to all the accomplishments of what may be called "human culture", as well punctuates Antônio Álvares da Silva.

Therefore, this article will address the essential difference that still exists in the perception of migrant workers by the Brazilian Statute of the Foreigner and by the standards of the International Labour Organization that deal with the subject, in order to provide a brief overview in which one can claim the incidence of a more humanized regulation, which does not lose sight of the size of the dignity of undocumented immigrants and the need to protect the work performed by them.

II. The condition of unauthorized migrant under Brazilian Law

The broadest definition of irregular migration, taken in view of the countries of origin and destination, as well as considering the legal assets involved, is synthesized by Eduardo Geronimi:

> "Irregular migration can be defined as all international movement that takes place outside of the legal regulation of the countries of origin, receipt, of both (...) or of passage. As definition, irregular migration is the result of a law that is enacted to control the migration flows (…), and it is a violation — or a offense under the criminal system of national legislation — against the State's sovereignty"[5].

Under the perspective of domestic law, a migrant can be considered unauthorized in Brazil whenever the prerequisites of the applicable legislation are not obeyed (namely Law 6.815/80, the so-called "Statute of the Foreigner"), in regard to the entrance, permanence and/or activities performed within the national territory. The national legal order established a long series of conditions needed so that the migration occurs in perfect consonance with what the country requires, aiming to protect, under the terms of article first of the Statute, "national security, institutional organization, political, socio-economical and cultural interests of Brazil, as well as the defense of national workers"[6].

As to the entrance, the foreigner will be in an irregular condition whenever the adequate visa to enter the national territory is not duly conceded. This first group is named "clandestine" immigrants[7] ("imigrante clandestino") by the Statute of the Foreigner (cf. art. 125, I of the Statute). In regard to the permanence, the irregularity will exist whenever the immigrant does not have any visa or, once expired the term of the visa, the immigrant stays in the country. To these the Law gives the denomination "irregulars" ("irregulares") (art. 125, XII). Finally, are also considered irregulars those who perform activities that are incompatible with the type of authorization that is guaranteed by the visa, as, for example, the bearer of a tourism visa who performs paid activities. Those

[5] GERONIMI, Eduardo. Aspectos jurídicos del tráfico y la trata de trabajadores migrantes. Programa de Migraciones Internacionales. Geneva: International Labour Organization, 2002, p. 4. Originally: Las migraciones irregulares pueden definirse como todo movimiento internacional que tiene lugar fuera del marco regulatorio de los países de envío, de recepción, de ambos (...), o de tránsito. Por definición, la migración irregular es el resultado de la legislación promulgada para controlar los flujos migratorios (...), y es una infracción — o delito, según el sistema penal de las legislaciones nacionales — contra la soberanía del Estado". Translation of the authors.

[6] In the original form: "à segurança nacional, à organização institucional, aos interesses políticos, sócio-econômicos e culturais do Brasil, bem assim à defesa do trabalhador nacional". Translation of the authors

[7] The technical inaccuracy of the expression clandestine migrant (or illegal migrant), once it expresses the odd idea of an "illegal person", apart from its ideological weight, makes it inappropriate for scientific use. One prefers, here, more accurate expressions, such as migrant in an irregular condition, undocumented migrant, unauthorized migrant and other expressions that reveal the irregularity restricted to the migratory condition. In any case, the wording of the Law 6.815/80, as it is currently, keeps the unfortunate expression "clandestine migrant".

are called "impeded" ("impedidos"), under the terms of Law 6.815/80 (see, for instance, art. 125, VII).

It is also important to highlight what the article 38 of the Statute of the Foreigner establishes, affecting directly the destiny of immigrants in irregular conditions. The article states to be "denied the legalization of the permanence of clandestine and irregular migrants, and the transformation in permanent of the transit, tourist, temporary (article 13, items I to IV and VI) and courtesy visas"[8]. Once can clearly notice that such provision is aligned with the essentially repressive feature of the Statute when dealing with irregular migration.

And the entire regulation in regard to the admission of migrants embraces the same logics, in an utilitarian view of borders' security, away from the line of human rights, legatee of an authoritarian inspiration and of the world view from the moment that the Statute came into force.

III. The sanctions of the Statute of the Foreigner for unauthorized migrants

There are essentially three sanctioning measures of compulsory expatriation under Brazilian legal order: deportation, expulsion and extradiction. It is important for this essay especially the concept of deportation, once "both extradition and expulsion presuppose the existence of a criminal offense" [9], as summarized by Miguel Florestano. This same author completes, stating that "in order to give rise to the first [extradition] the offense shall occur in foreign territory, and, for the second [expulsion], the crime must occur in national soil"[10]. That is, expulsion and extradition are concepts that are not correlated with the condition of irregular migration in itself, which is the object under discussion here[11].

[8] In the original form: "à segurança nacional, à organização institucional, aos interesses políticos, sócio-econômicos e culturais do Brasil, bem assim à defesa do trabalhador nacional". Translation of the authors.

[9] FLORESTANO, Miguel. Da deportação. In FREITAS, Vladimir Passos de (org.). Comentários ao Estatuto do Estrangeiro e opção de nacionalidade. Campinas: Millennium, 2006, p. 140.

[10] FLORESTANO, Da deportação, In FREITAS, Comentários ao Estatuto do Estrangeiro e opção de nacionalidade, cit., p. 140.

[11] An immigrant in irregular condition can, naturally, commit a criminal offense in the country, with no correlation with its migratory status. In these cases, however, the crime perpetrated does not concern the legal condition of undocumented migrant,

Deportation is defined by the Statute of the Foreigner as a measure consisting in the compulsory leave of the foreigner (art. 58), in the cases of illegal entry or residence, without voluntary departure (art. 57). Deportation is also applicable for a frontier worker who starts living in the country illegally (art. 21, §2º), foreigners who try to circumvent the entry inspection (art. 24) or perform activity that is prohibited for the type of visa (art. 98 et seq.)

Thus, a migrant worker on irregular conditions has deportation as the maximum penalty by Brazilian legal order. The expression "irregular conditions" is taken here in a broad and general manner, to cover irregular entry ("clandestine" in the words of the law), irregular stay ("irregular") and work carried out irregularly ("impeded"). For those so-called "clandestine" and "impeded" deportation is immediate (art. 125, I and VIII of the Statute of the Foreigner). Now for the "irregular", the law provides a period for voluntary departure, imposing the penalty of deportation in the event of noncompliance, besides fines in proportion to the days of illegal permanence (art. 125, II of the Statute).

It can be seen, especially here, that Brazilian Law still embodies an attitude of treating irregular migration as a matter of mere repression of offenders, through the implementation of the penalty of deportation, without providing assistance to potential victims, and it does not express major concerns about protections that may ensure a condition of dignity to these individuals that are, many times, for example, subject to trafficking or smuggling schemes. Therefore, the complaint presented by Rosita Milesi about the penalty of deportation under Brazilian law seems appropriate:

> "A legislation that presents such characteristics and, above all, the extreme rigor with which it is applied, deserves to be revised not only in isolated aspects or provisions. It is suitable to rethink life in a society as a space of universal horizons, where human beings that are bearers of values, contributions, wealth and dignity that go beyond national frontiers and geographic limits of a country live"[12].

---

reason why it does not relate to the object here proposed.

[12] MILESI, Rosita. O Estatuto do Estrangeiro e as medidas compulsórias de deportação, expulsão e extradição. Centro Scalabriniano de Estudos Migratórios. May, 2004. Available at www.migrante.org.br/artigo _deportacao_expulsao.doc. Access on January 22, 2014. In the original: "Uma legislação que apresenta tais características e, sobretudo, o extremo rigor com que esta é aplicada, merece ser revista não apenas em aspectos ou

It is not being claimed, obviously, there not to be migratory sanctions. The criticism that is presented, nevertheless, is to the exclusively repressive treatment, added to the discriminatory criteria for the visas. There is no doubt that the act of disobeying the legal order and entering into a country without the due authorization is serious. The national sovereignty is violated, with a behavior that attempts against the own autonomy of a State to establish norms of migratory control. The sanction, therefore, exists as a response to a violation, as an attempt to recompose the order. This is the coercive reality of Law, recognized by Edgar de Godói da Mata Machado, in a classical lesson:

> "To deny the concrete presence of coercion in a legal order would be to adopt a simply utopian attitude. Coercion is the result of the existing conditions of mankind. (…) There will always be in society those protervi et ad vicia proni, whose threats should be restrained by force and fear"[13].

The controversy is placed as to labour rights to migrants who work in an irregular condition. The Statute of the Foreigner is silent (in an actual eloquent silence), not foreseeing the consequences of the migratory irregularity for the labour contracts eventually entered into by the immigrant. To be highlighted, hence, that the sanctions that the migration legislation foresee are restricted to the question of the condition of the migration itself, not imposing the destitution of work rights as a form of punishment to the migration irregularity, or either as an inhibition policy.

In theory it could be possible to conceive the denial of work protection as a form of sanctioning the individual in an irregular condition, for the illegality of his behavior when entering the country. Likewise, one could recognize the penalization by such way as an attempt of restraining the practice of illegal immigration, once the migrant would no disposições isoladas. Comporta que se repense a convivência da sociedade como um espaço de horizontes universais, onde vivem seres humanos portadores de valores, de contributos, de riquezas e de dignidade que ultrapassam as fronteiras da nacionalidade e dos limites geográficos de um país". Translation of the authors.

---

[13] MATA MACHADO, Edgar de Godói da. Direito e coerção. São Paulo: Unimarco, 1999, p. 244. In the original: Negar a presença concreta da coerção na ordem jurídica seria assumir atitude simplesmente utópica. A coerção é fruto das condições existenciais do homem. (...) Sempre existirão na sociedade aqueles protervi et ad vicia proni, cujas ameaças devem ser coibidas pela força e pelo medo". Translation of the authors.

longer be assisted by labour rights that would prevail in a situation of regularity. This position, however, ought to be criticized, due to the systemic pertinence of the sanction, considering, above all, the well known structural lines of Labour Law in the country.

As to the fundamentals of Labour Law, long thoughts are not necessary, being enough to recall the prevalence, under the Brazilian legal system, of principles such as the social value of work (art. 1º, IV of the Constitution of 1988), of the human dignity (art. 1º, III of the Constitution) and of equality (art. 3º, IV and art. 5º, caput, of the Constitution). These prescriptions shall orient the legal treatment of work in itself, performed in the national territory, in spite of formal irregularities.

For this same reason, the criticism as to the denial of legal labour effects to the employment contract eventually entered into by an undocumented immigrant is also valid. The legal discipline of the work effectively done differs from the one directed to the entrance and permanence of foreigners in the country. Irregularities that may occur in the condition of migrant will be sanctioned by the normative categories of the applicable legislation (in the present case, Law n. 6.815/80, the Statute of the Foreigner).

That is to say the absence of legal labour protection for the undocumented migrant worker, as a form o sanction to the subjective condition of irregularity, does not seem compatible with the prescriptions of Brazilian legal order and with the developments of the protection norms to human labour under the perspective of human rights. Therefore, to deny the worker the labour rights arising from the employment relationship established (even if not expressly and regularly entered into), as a means to sanction an illegal situation of the International Law sphere, does not seem reasonable.

This does not mean, it is worth repeating, a denial of the repressive function of Law in face of a violation of its prescriptions. Nor there is a sense of condescension or an elevating intent towards irregular migration. Obviously the balance and pertinence of sanctions are fundamental to achieve fair and humanized treatment to individuals in a condition of vulnerability.

Thus, it is fundamental to face the question in its human dimension, analyzing it in a careful and non-alarmist manner, always within the juridical parameters that ought to format it.

Still in the Labour Law aspect, the bill n. 5.655/2009, of a new Statute of the Foreigner, going through the National Congress, includes, in its art. 5º, sole paragraph, the following prescription:

> "Sole paragraph. Shall be extended to foreigners, independently of the migratory situation, observing what is stated in the art. 5º, caput, of the Constitution:
> I – access to education and health;
> II – the benefits arising from the accomplishment of the legal and contractual obligations regarding labour relationships, under the employer's responsibility; and
> III – measures of protection to the victims and witnesses of traffic and smuggling of persons and migrants"[14].

Hence, it is noticeable that the new proposal of law embraces the directive of promoting human rights also to migrants in an irregular condition, not depriving them from minimal patterns of protection as a form to punish a migratory illegality. On the other hand, it keeps the punishments to the irregularities in the migration level, such as deportation.

From the sanctions viewpoint, the path of balance between control and supervision of frontiers, access and permanence, and the guarantee of a minimal standard of rights pertaining the human dignity appears to be the inclination of the legislative and political reforms on the matter in Brazil. Given the constitutional and international normative developments, this seem to be a solution that harmonizes the exercise of national sovereignty with the social value of work and the universal protection of the human being.

IV. ILO's Rights-Based Approach

The International Labour Organization has its own approach to the question, consolidated by normative instruments and studies, which contrast sensibly with the way Brazilian legal order deals with the theme. This contrast with national legislations, in fact, reinforces the relevance of the matter to ILO and the need to a human approach to the question, which is placed within the priority agenda of the institution.

[14] The bill 5.655/2009 is available in Portuguese at http://www.planalto.gov.br/ . Access in February 1, 2014. In the original form: "Parágrafo único. São estendidos aos estrangeiros, independentemente de sua situação migratória, observado o disposto no art. 5º, caput, da Constituição: I - o acesso à educação e à saúde; II - os benefícios decorrentes do cumprimento das obrigações legais e contratuais concernentes à relação de trabalho, a cargo do empregador; e III - as medidas de proteção às vítimas e às testemunhas do tráfico de pessoas e do tráfico de migrantes". Translation of the authors.

Prefacing a detailed report of practices and principles with recommended adoption, ILO's Director-General Juan Somavia indicates the dimension of the problem:

> "Many migrant workers, especially low skilled workers, experience serious abuse and exploitation. Women, increasingly migrating on their own and now accounting for almost half of all international migrants, face specific protection problems. In the face of rising barriers to cross border labour mobility, the growth of irregular migration, and trafficking and smuggling of human beings constitute major challenges to protection of human and labour rights"[15].

It is noticed that, in face of this serious situation, ILO emphasizes in the quoted report the need of what it calls a "rights-based approach to labour migration", as an alternative for the path of exclusive repression. It is important to clarify that one is not claiming the inexistence of surveillance and control, but preference is being given to the development of policies that capture the human dimension involved in irregular migration.

To understand the so-called clandestine migration in its causes of origin and reflexes to the States and people involved, in such a way to consolidate and implement this "rights-based approach", is a task of extreme complexity. Simplified readings tend to highlight, many times in a distorted manner, isolated aspects of State sovereignty, claiming that, once each country has the prerogative of selecting the migrants it wills to receive, those who do not comply with such norms should be divested from any protection.

To this rights-based approach it is necessary, however, to understand the question in all its facets, comprehending, among other aspects, the dilemma of poverty in many countries of the world, factor that contribute to the intensification of irregular migration flows. In this panorama, Carlos B. Vainer points out to the systematic cruelty that permeates irregular migration and its traditional treatment by States:

---

[15] SOMAVIA, Juan. Preface. In INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION. ILO's multilateral framework on labour migration: non-binding principles and guidelines for a rights-based approach. Geneva, 2006, p. V. Available at http://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/---ed_protect/---protrav/---migrant/documents/publication/wcms_178672.pdf. Access on January 15, 2014.

> "In the world which appears to approach the complete fulfillment of the neoliberal utopia, many millions are the compulsorily displaced, replaced, refugees and returnees and deportees, and the expelled and clandestine. Forbidden to stay, confined, prohibited from entering, forced to leave, they tell us of the evil nature of freedom operated under the hegemony of the contemporary globalization: the deterritorialized and border free world of some is the same territorialized and ghetto world of others"[16].

This alarming scenario is aggravated by national laws that are extremely repressive, feeding the intolerance and the marginal condition of irregular migrants, making the interaction with the receiving society even more problematic[17].

See, for instance, the emblematic example of the legislation of the North-American state of Arizona, which criminalized the condition of undocumented migrant, foreseeing also police prerogatives of extreme truculence. Enacted on April, 2010, the State Law 1.070 was considered

---

[16] VAINER, Carlos B. As novas categorias de uma sociologia dos deslocamentos compulsórios e das restrições migratórias. In CASTRO, Mary Garcia (org.). Migrações internacionais: contribuições para políticas. Brasília: CNPD, 2001, p. 182-183. In the original: "No mundo no qual parece se aproximar a realização plena da utopia neoliberal, muitos milhões são os deslocados compulsórios, os reassentados, os refugiados e repatriados e deportados, os expulsos e clandestinos. Proibidos de ficar, confinados, interditados de entrar, obrigados a sair, eles nos dizem da natureza perversa da liberdade operada sob a hegemonia da globalização contemporânea: o mundo desterritorializado e sem fronteiras de uns é o mesmo mundo territorializado e guetificado de outros". Translation of the authors.

[17] The debate as to the sanction to be applied to the irregular migrants has a great repercussion in the countries of the central capitalism, above all in Europe and United States. As explained, there are dissents, inclusively as to the criminalization of the condition of irregular migrant, given the magnitude of migration flows in these countries. Italy debates, currently, the criminal offense of "being an illegal immigrant", with an initiative of the Berlusconi administration for the creation of this criminal category. In this regard, the conclusion of Stefano Rodotà, Civil Law Professor at the University of Rome La Sapienza, published in the Spanish newspaper El País: "It is converted in a criminal offense a simple personal condition, the fact of being a foreigner, in contrast with what is established in the Constitution in the matter of equality". Cf. RODOTÁ, Stefano. Italia y los 'empresarios' del miedo. Jornal El País. Avaiable at http://elpais.com/diario/2008/05/24/opinion/1211580013_850215.html. Access on January 14, 2014. In the original: "Se convierte en delito una simple condición personal, el hecho de ser extranjero, en contraste con lo que establece la Constitución en materia de igualdad". Translation of the authors.

authoritarian and discriminatory, causing reactions in the international level, such as the express repudiation of UNASUL (Union of South American Nations)[18]. Brazilian government has also expressly disagreed with the norm, publishing a note by means of its Foreign Affairs Ministry[19].

[18] Cf. http://www.bbc.co.uk/portuguese/noticias/2010/05/100504_marcia_arizona_rc.shtml. Access on December 4, 2013.

[19] Part of the note n. 278 from Itamaraty, dated 05.03.2010: "The Brazilian government has received with great concern the news that the U.S. state of Arizona approved on April 22 a law criminalizing illegal immigration. The Brazilian government has spoken out strongly and repeatedly, in bilateral and international forums, against the improper association between irregular migration and crime. In the new law from Arizona, the discretionary powers to police to verify immigration status and arrest of foreigners come to the sacrifice of human rights of migrants. The Brazilian government considers that to grant the same treatment to undocumented migrants and to criminals undermines basic notions of humanity and justice. It deems that the way forward is not the one of criminality,but the regulation of migration, as exemplified by the approval of Brazilian Law 11,961, July 2009, which promoted extensive regularization of immigration status of foreigners in Brazil. The Brazilian government joins the protests against the anti-immigration law in Arizona. It hopes that such legislation is reviewed so as to avoid violation of the rights of millions of foreigners who live and work peacefully in the United States, such as the Brazilians who are in that country". In the original: "O governo brasileiro recebeu com grande preocupação a notícia de que o Estado norte-americano do Arizona aprovou, em 22 de abril, legislação que criminaliza a imigração irregular. O governo brasileiro tem-se pronunciado firme e reiteradamente, em negociações bilaterais e nos foros internacionais, contra a associação indevida entre migração irregular e criminalidade. No caso da nova lei do Arizona, o poder discricionário conferido aos agentes policiais para verificação da situação migratória e prisão de estrangeiros virá ao sacrifício dos direitos humanos dos migrantes. O governo brasileiro considera que conceder o mesmo tratamento a indocumentados e criminosos subverte noções elementares de humanidade e justiça. Julga que o caminho a seguir não é o da criminalização, mas o da regularização migratória, de que é exemplo a aprovação da Lei brasileira nº 11.961, de julho de 2009, que promoveu ampla regularização da situação migratória dos estrangeiros no Brasil. O governo brasileiro se une às manifestações contrárias à lei anti-imigratória do Arizona. Espera que tal legislação seja revista, de modo a evitar a violação de direitos de milhões de estrangeiros que vivem e trabalham pacificamente nos Estados Unidos, como os brasileiros que se encontram naquele país". Translation of the authors. MINISTÉRIO DAS RELAÇÕES EXTERIORES. Nota à imprensa 278. Brasília, 2010. Available at http://www.itamaraty.gov.br/sala-de-imprensa/notas-a-imprensa/lei-anti-imigratoria-do-arizona. Access on December 10, 2013.

V. ILO's Convention 143: Protection of All Migrant Workers

One of the main normative instruments consolidating ILO's rights-based approach to labour migration is the Convention 143 of the Organization. Dating back to 1975, the Convention 143 entered into force in the international order in 1978 and it deals with migration in abusive conditions and the promotion of equality of opportunities and treatment to migrant workers.

By means of the Convention 143, as mentioned by Rodrigo de Lacerda Carelli, "the International Labour Organization seeks the due and equal protection, at least in regard to fundamental rights, to all workers in the world"[20], whether they are migrants in conditions of regularity or irregularity.

In this intent, the first article of ILO's Convention 143 establishes that "each Member for which this Convention is in force undertakes to respect the basic human rights of all migrant workers".

Thus, from the opening article of Convention 143, one can already tell what its main differential point is: the inclusion of migrants in a situation of irregularity in the large group of workers to be protected. And, further on, on article 9 of the statute, this directive becomes even clearer:

> "The migrant worker shall, in cases in which these laws and regulations have not been respected and in which his position cannot be regularised, enjoy equality of treatment for himself and his family in respect of rights arising out of past employment as regards remuneration, social security and other benefits".

What is clear, here, is that the treatment given to irregular migration starts to be taken more as a question of protecting human rights than a national security issue only. It is important to clarify, however, that the Convention does not lose track of migratory control, for instance when establishing that the States shall take the measures to "suppress clandestine movements of migrants for employment and illegal employment of migrants" (art. 3, "a" of the Convention). The rights-based approach, conversely, sets the tone of the instrument and reveals a very clear position in the direction of protecting the work performed personally by the immigrant.

[20] CARELLI, Rodrigo de Lacerda. Trabalho do estrangeiro no Brasil. Boletim do CEDES – Centro de Estudos Direito e Sociedade. March, 2007. Available at http://www.cis.puc-rio.br/cedes/PDF/cidadaniatrabalho/trabalho%20do%20estrangeiro%20no%20Brasil.pdf. Access on January 21, 2014. In the original: "busca a Organização Internacional do Trabalho a devida e igual proteção, pelo menos quanto a direitos fundamentais, a todos os trabalhadores do mundo". Translation of the auhtors.

Summarizing the protection architected by the Convention, Patrick Taran and Eduardo Geronimi affirm:

> "The migrant worker has rights to remuneration for work performed, including any normally paid indemnities upon termination of contract, and whatever unused annual vacation benefits may be payable according to national practice, regardless of whether status was legal or not"[21].

In other words, the convention understands the labour protection as an inalienable right of the human being, which will not be harmed in face of a migration irregularity status. This directive is the result of an international process of setting the bases for the protection of migrant workers.

Convention 143 faces accentuated problems of acceptance among the countries around the globe, given the maximum priority that it proposes on the guarantee of human rights concerning the work performed by an undocumented migrant. There are only twenty three[22] ratifications up to the present moment, almost all of them from countries that are not major receivers of immigrants[23].

The Convention has not been ratified yet by Brazil, not being, therefore, a formally cogent statute under the national legal order.

It is interesting to report that, on September, 2008, the Tripartite Commission on International Relations of the Ministry of Labour and Employment (Comissão Tripartite de Relações Internacionais do Ministério do Trabalho e Emprego) approved — with the support of the governmental, workers' and employers' representation — the submission of the [21] TARAN, Patrick A., GERONIMI, Eduardo. Globalization, labour and migration: protection is paramount. Geneva: International Labour Organization, 2003, p. 14.

[22] On August, 2011, as per information available at ILO's website.

[23] The exception among the countries that ratified Convention 143 is Italy, country that receives a considerable amount of migrants. However, in spite of having ratified the document, Italy is going through a moment of actual contradiction as to migration regulation, once it has hardened its internal rules, even making the condition of irregular migrant a criminal offense.

Convention to the ratification of the National Congress[24], embracing the claim of several social movements that, along the years, vindicated the ratification of the Convention (such as the Pastoral Care of Migrants, for example) and demonstrating a solid intention of the country to adopt the statute[25].

One can affirm that ILO's Convention 143, together with Convention 97 of the same institution and the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families of the UN, from 1990, form the mainstay of the international protection to migrant workers. On the words of Patrick Taran and Eduardo Geronimi:

> "These three Conventions together provide a comprehensive 'values-based' definition and legal basis for national policy and practice regarding non-national migrant workers and their family members. They thus serve as tools to encourage States to establish or improve national legislation in harmony with international standards. They are not simply human rights instruments. Numerous provisions in each add up to a comprehensive agenda for national policy and for consultation and cooperation among States on labour migration policy formulation, exchange of information, providing information to migrants, orderly return and reintegration, etc."[26].

This juridically oriented view is adopted in the present article, which shares the idea that international regulation on the subject consolidates directions that deserve immediate implementation, with the elimination of national norms that are go in a different direction from the idea of a humanized treatment to the migration issue.

VI. Conclusion

The legal thoughts over the question of migration currently de-

[24] See news on the website of the Ministry of Labour and Employment: http://www.mte.gov.br/ sgcnoticia.asp?IdConteudoNoticia=3732&PalavraChave=imigracao,%20cnig,%20oit. Access on July 18, 2011.

[25] The International Labour Organization itself has already pointed out Brazil as one of the possible countries to ratify the Convention 143. Cf. http://www.migrantsrights.org/ILO_report 101199.htm. Access on July 18, 2010.

[26] TARAN, GERONIMI, Globalization, labour and migration, cit., p. 15.

mand the construction of a platform of treatment based on the protection of fundamental rights of human beings, in all dimensions, under the backdrop of solidarity. The work rendered by immigrants, in this context, deserves consistent juridical regulation, in standards that are in line with the advances promoted by International Labour Law.

Inflows of two kinds are received here, both of them towards the same direction. First, the protection of the immigrant person, who cannot be discriminated due to reasons of ethnical ascendance, having to be taken by Law with the essential human condition. Second, the progressive development of labour protection, which shall be regulated and associated with rights to the worker as an essential element for a dignified life.

The own notion of justice as a constant exercise of virtue for the other — considered the dimension of the apparent difference of a migrant, who, inevitably, becomes "the other" — the observance to these axiological standards historically built is indispensable, otherwise an inadmissible deviance of the own purposes of Law would take place.

The regulation of the matter at the international level is a reflex of this directive, and along the last decades several normative instruments and commitments with global, regional and local reach were established, reaffirming the principle of non-discrimination and embracing the development of protection to migrants, also by means of guarantee of labour related rights. It is the emergence, here, of what Antônio Augusto Cançado Trindade calls a "universal juridical conscience" that determines "the necessity of prevalence of the dignity of the human person in any circumstances"[27].

There is no way, however, to deny the incongruity between national legislations regarding the theme — Brazilian therein included —, once many of the so-called developed countries insist on prioritizing the dimension of national security, treating immigration as an issue of police only. This situation, nevertheless, only reinforces the need of concrete plans of action for making the international commitments become a reality, as a way of implementing ethical determinations that do not admit postponement.

---

[27] CANÇADO TRINDADE, Antônio Augusto. Concurring Vote. In INTER-AMERICAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS. Juridical Condition and Rights of Undocumented Migrants. Advisory Opinion OC-18/03. San Jose, September 17, 2003. Avaliable at http://www.corteidh.or.cr/docs/opiniones/seriea_18_ing.pdf.

Irregular immigration, in this portrait, is a subject o major concern in the international agenda, once thousands and thousands of human beings are every day submitted to the risks of irregular crossing of national borders, hoping for a better life (aim that can hardly be disapproved).

Coming from poor countries, it is possible to affirm that undocumented migrants, not rarely are, "refugees for subsistence" [28], in the striking and precise metaphor from Cristiane Maria Sbalqueiro Lopes. That is to say, they run away from conditions of extreme poverty and lack of perspectives in their countries of origins to seek for a new life in more developed nations, which, in turn, respond generally in a harsh manner.

Hence, in face of undocumented migrants questions tend to be extremely unsettling, bringing together elements of outstanding difficulty. In any event, one has to bear in mind that the condition of human being cannot be adjourned in face of the condition of irregular migrant. To get distant from the evaluation of undocumented migrants as criminals and be closer to a perception of them as victims of a cruel industry of poverty, which involves them in odious trafficking schemes and exploitation of forced labor is essential to the analysis of the theme in the way that was presented here.

Brazil has a very unique position in this scenario. Historic inheritor of active participation of immigrants in the formation of the national culture, the country lives currently a moment o changes in its migratory vocation. Nowadays, Brazil sends more migrants to abroad than it receives, reflex of the internal social panorama. Despite that, the flow of immigrants in conditions of irregularity, coming above all from South America grows considerably in Brazilian large cities, what can be confirmed by the situation of Bolivians in the city of São Paulo. And announcing that these flows will grow in the upcoming decades does not seem to be and unfounded forecast.

Thus, the migratory issue will certainly recover its relevance in the national legal agenda, being mandatory the alignment of the migration regulation and policies of the country to the major lines of the international discipline in this regard. This measure can be implemented in many ways, such as, for example, the enactment of the new Statute of the Foreigner, the approval of a new migration policy for the country, besides the ratification of the most relevant international conventions for the subject (such as UN's Convention of 1990 and ILO's Convention 143)[29].

[28] LOPES, Cristiane Maria Sbalqueiro. O direito do estrangeiro numa perspectiva de Direitos Humanos. Seville: University Pablo de Olavide, 2007, p. 35.

This way Brazil will consolidate a human and balanced position for the treatment of the migration theme, what shall be allied with the participation in international programs of combating trafficking and smuggling of people and migrants, besides multidisciplinary initiatives of elimination of any and all forms of work in a similar condition to slavery.

This is also a strategic option for the country. Only by taking a stand in favor of the human protection of documented and undocumented migrants shall Brazil be able to demand equal treatment to the many of its nationals that reside irregularly in other country, victims of the own evils of Brazilian social development.

As to the work performed by immigrants, there are many paths for a same conclusion, which embraces the "primary purpose, historically determinant of Labour Law: protection of employees against all forms of exploitation they may suffer"[30], in the lesson of Jean-Claude Javillier. Whether it is by means of an anti-discriminatory directive, of the application of the labor law theory of nullities, of a fundamental right to dignified work, of the development of the universal protection to labour, of the international statutes, in short, the essential answer will be that the work performed by an immigrant, whether in regular or irregular migration status, will deserve full protection, as the only way to enable a dignified existence.

References

CANÇADO TRINDADE, Antônio Augusto. Concurring Vote. In INTER-AMERICAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS. Juridical Condition and Rights of Undocumented Migrants. Advisory Opinion OC-18/03. San Jose, September 17, 2003. Avaliable at http://www.corteidh.or.cr/docs/opiniones/ seriea_18_ing.pdf.

CARELLI, Rodrigo de Lacerda. Trabalho do estrangeiro no Brasil. Boletim do

[29] In this sense: SÜSSEKIND, Arnaldo. Direito Internacional do Trabalho. 3rd ed. São Paulo: LTr, 2000, p. 363.

[30] JAVILLIER, Jean-Claude. Manual de Direito do Trabalho. Translated by Rita Asdine Bozaciyan. São Paulo: LTr, 1988, p. 30. In the Portuguese version: "finalidade primordial, historicamente determinante do direito do trabalho: a proteção dos assalariados contra todas as formas de exploração que possam sofrer". Translation of the authors.

CEDES – Centro de Estudos Direito e Sociedade. March, 2007. Available at http://cedes.iesp.uerj.br/PDF/cidadaniatrabalho/trabalho%20do%20estrangeiro%20no%20Brasil.pdf. Access on July 17, 2010.

CASTRO, Mary Garcia (org.). Migrações internacionais: contribuições para políticas. Brasília: CNPD, 2001.

FREITAS, Vladimir Passos de (org.). Comentários ao Estatuto do Estrangeiro e opção de nacionalidade. Campinas: Millennium, 2006.

GERONIMI, Eduardo. Aspectos jurídicos del tráfico y la trata de trabajadores migrantes. Programa de Migraciones Internacionales. Geneva: International Labour Organization, 2002.

JAVILLIER, Jean-Claude. Manual de Direito do Trabalho. Translated by Rita Asdine Bozaciyan. São Paulo: LTr, 1988.

LOPES, Cristiane Maria Sbalqueiro. O direito do estrangeiro numa perspectiva de Direitos Humanos. Seville: University Pablo de Olavide, 2007.

MATA MACHADO, Edgar de Godói da. Direito e coerção. São Paulo: Unimarco, 1999.

MILESI, Rosita. O Estatuto do Estrangeiro e as medidas compulsórias de deportação, expulsão e extradição. Centro Scalabriniano de Estudos Migratórios. May, 2004. Available at www.migrante.org.br/artigo_ deportacao_expulsao.doc. Access on August 10, 2011.

RODOTÁ, Stefano. Italia y los 'empresarios' del miedo. Jornal El País. Avaiable at http://www.elpais.com/articulo/opinion/Italia/empresarios/miedo/elpepuopi/20080524 elpepiopi_13/Tes. Access on January 14, 2011.

SALES, Teresa. Brasil migrante, Brasil clandestino. Revista São Paulo em Perspectiva, São Paulo, 8(1), p. 107-115, jan./mar. 1994.

SOMAVIA, Juan. Preface. In INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION. ILO's multilateral framework on labour migration: non-binding principles and guidelines for a rights-based approach. Geneva, 2006, p. V. Available at http://www.ilo.org/wcmsp5/groups/public/---asia/---ro-bangkok/documents /publication/wcms_146243.pdf. Access on April 27, 2011.

SÜSSEKIND, Arnaldo. Direito Internacional do Trabalho. 3rd ed. São Paulo: LTr, 2000.

TARAN, Patrick A., GERONIMI, Eduardo. Globalization, labour and migration: protection is paramount. Geneva: International Labour Organization, 2003.

The equal legal treatment of paternity leave and maternity leave
The path to equality sexist labor market

Maria Cecília Máximo Teodoro[1]
Miriam Parreiras de Souza[2]

Abstract: Women's work is today mainspring of the capitalist system and its recovery is a major challenge of modernity. The woman does not experience extremely isonomic conditions in the labor market as a result of a typical system based on unequal forces - capitalism. Historical, philosophical, cultural and physiological reasons attempt to explain the differential treatment received by women in the labor market.

For a long time the woman took care of the housework, while men fit to provide families and homes. From the standpoint of philosophical and cultural, the woman carries the stigma of a human being more fragile, more emotional and benevolent. Since man is understood to be a more rude, rigid and rational. Physiologically, only the woman was given the gift of gestating life. Thus, it would be the woman the greater responsibility of caring for children and the home.

Men and women hold in the Brazilian Federal Constitution the status of equal rights and duties. But this equality is affirmed as a human right just because men and women are different in the reality, in the world of facts. Operators fit the legal acumen to understand the different, what better way to give different treatment, and when the unequal treatment effectively generates isonomic conditions. Already a breakthrough achieved by fundamental social rights, have become universalized and value provided in our Constitution (art. 7, XX, CF), still indeed to give special incentives to the women's labor market.

In Brazil, the law provides for the welfare of the wage maternity benefit, for the mother or adopter, for 120 days, which is not levied directly the employer

---

[1] TEODORO, Maria Cecília Máximo. Post-Doctorate in Labor Law from the Universidad Castilla-La Mancha, with research grant from CAPES; Doctor in Labour Law and Social Security from the USP; Master in Labour Law from PUC / MG; Teacher in Master and Graduate of PUC / MG.

[2] SOUZA, Miriam Parreiras de. Master in Labour Law from PUC / MG; Professor in Graduate of PUC / MG. Lawyer.

because it is paid by Social Security. Already paternity leave gives the father the right to be absent from work for only 5 days.

Thus, in order to meet the contemporary challenges of achieving social justice, the objective is to demonstrate in this article that maternity leave gives an illusory equality between men and women and exempts the employer only indirectly. And the constitutional provision of so short paternity leave, in fact, generates inequality, rather than equality, because it hinders the access and retention of women in the labor market and creates greater cost to the employer who hires workers.

Relying on broader social, economic and legal reasons, we intend to demonstrate the need to give equal treatment to men and women with regard to maternity and paternity leave.

Keywords: Parental leave. Maternity leave. Paternity leave.

1 Introduction

The female population growth in the Brazilian labor market was one of the most significant social changes occurring in the country in recent decades. The women's presence in the Brazilian labor market is becoming more intense and diverse and shows no tendency to retreat, despite the successive economics crises that have plagued the country since the 80s.

This reality, however, does not mean that women have achieved the same men's working conditions. Remuneration differences, occupying lower positions and discrimination of various kinds are a few examples of differential treatment that is aimed at women in the labor market.

According to research conducted by the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics[3], the average remuneration of Brazilian women is equivalent to 72.3% of the men's average remuneration, it means that women's payments remains 28% lower than men's. Even in occupations where higher education is required, the wage gap is shown to be higher among men and women.

The reason for this difference is the object of this article. It intends to demonstrate that one of the main factors preventing the improvement of women's working conditions is the fact that they get pregnant.

[3] IBGE. Salário das Mulheres permanece 28% inferior aos dos homens nos últimos três anos. 2012. Available in http://saladeimprensa.ibge.gov.br/noticias?view=noticia&id=1&busca=1&idnoticia=2096. Acess in 16.09.2013.

The most striking distinction between man and woman is undoubtedly the pregnancy, since only the woman has a phase of life that is devoted exclusively to maternal care and not to their work. On the other hand, the man has no such feature, because even when he is presented by parenthood, moves away from work for few five days and then is back available to your job.

Labour Law, in turn, has undergone several changes in recent decades regarding the protection of women's work. And among these changes, several studies conclude that women's overly protection, when not based on the special characteristics of being female, can generate an opposite effect from that expected by the legislator, leading to a women's withdrawal from the labor market and to the deterioration of their working conditions.

The Proof of this is that the Law 7.855/89 expressly repealed the original writing of articles 379 and 380 of the Labor Code, which used to prohibit the women's work in night shifts. The same thing happened to Law 10.244/01, repealed because the article 376 of the Labor Code used to prohibit the women's work in extraordinary journey.

In this context, it is important to note the maternity leave institute. Despite its eminently protective character, which seeks to ensure the women's dignity during pregnancy and postpartum period, nowadays this right has becoming an obstacle to women's labor market access and permanency. That's because, when man becomes a father, enjoys a extremely reduced license period compared to woman's one, becoming men the greater privileged to enter and remain in the labor market.

In this article, will be shown that women's working conditions differences, in most cases, are guided by the fact that they are holding the guarantees that are not also men's guaranteed.

For proof this, the legal ground of women's market labor will be discussed, although it is recognized the importance of the study of other issues related to racial and gender elements that permeate the subject.

2 The present women's status in the labour market

The women's position in society has undergone many changes throughout the history. With regard to the labor market and the applicable rules, the changes were even more significant.

In antiquity, the women were seen only as the procreative and must complete obedience to men, they used to submit only to domestic life, creating and raising children. Soon after, in the Middle Age, became to be regarded as an apprentice. However, despite being seen as an inferior human being, begins to exercise exclusivity with certain trades, such as spinner and silk weaver[4]. In the same period, agriculture starts to be a women's job, as the work of tapestry, gold casting and clothing[5].

With the Industrial Revolution, the female labor was submitted to all shorts of exploitation, without any kind of protection. The woman complied with long working hours and received really low payments. The European word industrialization process experienced in the nineteenth century was characterized by the exploitation of labor calls "half-strength", which was the women and children's work because they were less expensive and more docile[6]. It is in this endeavor that begins to emerge in England, France and Germany, the first protectionist legislation relating to women at work.

Moreover, women's work was one of the first matters to be subject by international organization's regulation and its scope operating costs was uniform in order to avoid unfair competition in the international market[7].

In Brazil, the first Federal Constitution that treated about the issue, was enacted in 1937, which prohibited women's work in hazardous industries (art. 137, k), in addition to ensuring hygienic and medical assistance to pregnant women, providing a home before and after childbirth without loss of pay (art. 137, l).

The 1946 Constitutional Charter, otherwise, in addition to those elements arranged in the previous Constitution, has added the remuneration distinction's prohibition due to gender (art. 157, II), denying women's work in hazardous industries (art. 157, IX), and increasing the pregnant women's right by the addition of an rest period before and after childbirth without loss of job, besides the already established concerning about the salary (art. 157, X). It also provided pensions in motherhood's favor (art. 157, XVI)[8].

---

[4] PANUZZIO, Daniele; NASCIMENTO, Grasiele Augusta Ferreira. Proteção ao Trabalho da Mulher no limiar do século XXI – O Direito e a Ética na Sociedade Contemporânea: Alínea, 2006, p.163-164.

[5] BARROS, Alice Monteiro de. Curso de Direito do Trabalho. 7ª Ed. São Paulo: LTr, 2011, p. 854.

[6] Idem.

[7] Ibidem.

[8] QUADROS, Grazielle de Matos. A discriminação do trabalho da mulher no Brasil. Available in http://www3.pucrs.br/pucrs/files/uni/poa/direito/graduacao/tcc/tcc2/tra-

The 1967 Federal Constitution went further, banning the remuneration distinction, as well as criteria for admission on grounds of sex (Article 158, III). Kept sealed women's work in unhealthy industries (art. 158, X), rest assured paid to pregnant women before and after childbirth, without loss of job and salary (art. 158, XI). Continued to ensure the welfare, aimed at protecting maternity (art. 158, XVI). This new constitution, however, gave the woman's right to retirement after 30 years of work with full pay (art. 158, XX)[9].

The 1988 Constitutional Charter granted several women's protective principles according to which the constitutional legislation should retain compatibility. In this sense, art. 3, IV, of the Federal Constitution makes clear its objectives, among then the promotion of the good of all, without prejudice and without discrimination. Moreover, in the art. 5 is ensured men and women's equality between about rights and obligations under the Constitution.

The art. 5 's highlights of the necessary observance of equality principle's exercise under the Constitution, however clearly indicates its mitigation, because although it is the assurance of equality between men and women, it cannot but admit obvious biological differences between them. Although juridically equal, men and women are physiologically and psychologically unequal, therefore can be treated unequally without implying, according to the will of the original Constitution, violence to equality, but unequal treatment with corrective focus inequality[10].

Also in the 1988 Constitution, art. 7, XXX, is more specific with regard to the substantive equality principle between men and women, highlighting the need to be guaranteed them equal functions and the same admission and pay criteria.

Given these provisions, it is clear that in Brazil there is a regulatory system that seeks to protect women in the labor market, avoiding inequality and discrimination on grounds of sex. However, some of the legal safeguards provided for women produce opposite effects from those expected. That's because not enough social prejudices, sometimes women find legal obstacles that prevent them from having access to the labor market or, sometimes end up producing a reverse discrimination.

Every standard intended to protect women, without pay atten-

---

balhos2011_2/grazielle_quadros.pdf. Acess in 10.09.2013

[9] Idem.

[10] MARTINEZ, Luciano. Curso de Direito do Trabalho. 3ª Ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2012, p. 629.

tion specifically to the differences it has in compared with man, ultimately generates a discriminatory effect, not desired. The Labor Law Compilation excluded women from night work, in unhealthy activities, and in dangerous and difficult conditions is a great example, which was repealed by Law 7.855/89. In the same way, Article 376 of the Labor Code prohibiting the women's extraordinary work, except force majeure, which was also repealed by Law 10.244/01.

All these legal provisions, whose tried to protect the women's working conditions, ended up restricting their labor market access, since the employer had no interest in hiring a unlimited workforce. Thus, while woman means a docile and easier to domesticate workforce, the employer before it translates into a hardworking full of limitations, which will not meet the company's profit expectations.

The man, on the other hand, has no such limitations. Thus, their labor market access is facilitated compared to the woman. Obviously, the employer will certainly prefer the male workforce, due its no limitation about the kind of developed activities and working hours. Thus, the repeal of CLT prohibiting rules of women's workforce in certain conditions was great.

However, it still persists in Brazilian law the institutes of maternity and paternity leave that due to its inequality's periods generate the same women discriminatory effect, regarding the remuneration gap and their labor market access.

Recent studies show that women's participation in the labor market has been growing in recent years. The records of the Annual Report of Social Information (RAIS) of the Labor Department shows that the employment's level of a women formal contract grew 5.93% in 2011, compared to the previous year[11]. However, this labor market women's growth is not accompanied by antidiscrimination policies on grounds of gender. For this reason, current research also shows that the gap remuneration between men and women is continuous in all kinds of work, even in those where higher education is required.

The Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics (IBGE)[12], in [11] RAIS. Registros de emprego com carteira assinada cresceu 5,93% em um ano. 2013. Available in http://portal.mte.gov.br/imprensa/cresce-a-participacao-da-mulher-no-mercado-de-trabalho/palavrachave/mercado-de-trabalho-rais-mulheres-crescimento-das-mulheres.htm. Acess in 16.09.2013.

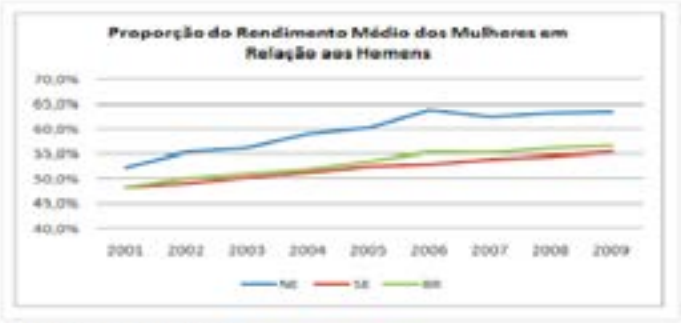
[12] IBGE. Salário das Mulheres permanece 28% inferior aos dos homens nos últimos três anos. 2012. Available in http://saladeimprensa.ibge.gov.br/noticias?view=noticia&id=1&busca=1&idnoticia=2096. Acess in 16.09.2013.

March 2012, revealed that the average income of Brazilian women is equivalent to 72.3% of the average income of men, which means that women's pay remains 28% lower than men's.

On the other hand, the labor market women's occupation and qualification is not so different from men's ones. The same survey showed that although women have more schooling, the gap wage compared to men following stable since the 2009 year. The following charts show the distinctions mentioned.



Fonte: PNAD/IBGE

Fonte: PNAD/IBGE

The gender gaps wage can achieve up to 40% and are presented as a persistent feature of the Brazilian economy, and can not be explained by gender differences, neither productivity nor qualification.

So, in fact, most of the differences seem to be due to unequal pay for men and women with identical observable characteristics working in the same occupation.

3 The symbolic law governing women's workforce

Facing the hypothesis about the differentiation of labor market women's treatment, what generates a patent discrimination in wage levels and occupations; it is necessary to investigate which is the problem that legitimizes this practice.

As discussed above, over the years, the legislature was concerned to issue rules that would give women's special protection, trying to ensure them dignity and equality compared with man.

But such standards do not always generate the expected effect, because many times end up producing deleterious effects, putting women away from the labor market, and not assuring the expected dignity.

Therefore, a considerable amount of laws ultimately play latent social functions contradicting their normative- legal effects, which means an opposed to its legal literal sense.

In this context, the German theoretician Harald Kindermann developed what he called symbolic legislation, under the one there is a hypertrophy of the norm symbolic function in place of the normative legal text concretization.

The Kindermann doctrine is treated in Brazil by Marcelo Neves[13] and is perfectly applicable to the discussed subject in this article.

According to Kindermann, the legislation symbolic function is present "when the legislature is restricted to formulate a claim to produce standards, without taking any action in order to create the conditions for effectiveness, despite being able to create them "or when the" texts production whose reference expresses the reality is normative - legal, but serving primarily and hypertrophic, the character not specifically normative- legal political purposes"[14].

Kindermann trichotomy theory proposed a model for the symbolic legislation identification. He said that legislation could be used to confirm social values, demonstrate the state ability and to postpone the social conflicts solution by delaying commitments[15].

---

[13] NEVES, Marcelo. A constitucionalização simbólica. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2007, p. 50.

[14] KINDERMANN, Harald. apud NEVES, Marcelo. A constitucionalização simbólica. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2007, p. 32.

[15] LOPES, Fernanda Ravazzano Azevedo. O conceito não revelado e as funções não declaradas da ressocialização: a resposta garantista à manipulação da linguagem. 2009. 244fls. (Dissertação de Mestrado em Direito). Universidade Federal da Bahia. Programa de Pós-Gradução em Direito Público, Bahia, 2009. p. 76. Available in http://www.biblio-

Another German philosopher who works the symbolic legislation question is Michael Foucault, in developing his biopolitics theory. According to Foucault, the symbolic legislation lacks normativity, which means a lack enforce ability, since it reflects only as a form of power mechanism's exercise, through the truth discourses creation.

> We have to produce the truth as, after all, we must produce wealth. And, on the other hand, are also the truth subjected, in the sense that the truth is the norm, it is true discourse which, at least in part, decides, it conveys himself propulsion power effects[16].

Thus, the truth discourses production is continuous, and the developed role of rule in this context is really significant today.

The rule belief, the idea that what the law says is a truth in itself, is a common sense thinking that constantly permeates modern society. This truth discourse, which is potential, which translated into the standard, is the essence of the driving force that uses symbolic legislation[17].

Arcelo and Gontijo[18], analyzing the Foucault theory, argue that symbolic norms serves the to fundamental rights violation, precisely because they have the effect of declaring that such rights exist and must be recognized. However, despite declared, the symbolic rules are characterized by their low normativity.

In the case of women's work, currently the legal principle that has more symbolic fulfilled this function refers to maternity leave, when compared to paternity leave.

In this sense, art. 7, XVIII of the 1988 Federal Constitution, guarantees the maternity leave women' right for a period of one hundred and twenty days. In XIX, the same article, paternity leave is ensured to man, but your period should be fixed by the infralegislation norm. Seeking to give effect to that provision, Art. 10, first paragraph, of the Acts tecadigital.ufba.br/tde_arquivos/17/TDE-2010-05-24T064553Z-1652/Publico/FRavazzano%20seg.pdf. Acess in em 14 dez. 2012.

---

[16] FOUCAULT, Michel. Em defesa da Sociedade. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2005, p. 29.

[17] SILVA JÚNIOR. Arnaldo. A legislação aparente na construção de uma constitucionalização simbólica. Available in <http://www.ribeirosilva.com.br/content/pdf/1410201171346.pdf>. Acess in: 30 jan. 2013.

[18] ARCELO, Adalberto Antônio Batista; GONTIJO, Lucas de Alvarenga. A Biopolítica nos Estados Democráticos de Direito: a reprodução da subcidadania sob a égide da constitucionalização simbólica. Belo Horizonte, 2011, p. 10.

of the Transitional Constitutional Provisions (ADCT) prescribes that the paternity leave period of paternity would be five days, until the infra law shall regulate the Constitutional text provisions.

Given this scenario, women tend to suffer more discrimination with respect to their access to the labor market as well as working conditions in general.

This disparity turns to the same problem faced before, about the prohibition of women's nigh work, in unhealthy and dangerous activities or in extraordinary journeys.

With dissonant license's periods, the standard that should ensure women protection during pregnancy and postpartum period, ends up discriminating them, whereas this disparity makes employers also prefer to hire male and make them more protection during the work contract, not to run the risk of hiring women.

This explains the fact that the women's wage level is much less than men's. However, employers prefer to pay men's higher salaries, due the fact they do not depart from work for a period of one hundred and twenty days, forcing the employer to hire a replacement. The woman, meanwhile, even still occupying the same position and have the same qualification that man, during pregnancy means a loss to the employer.

Although the maternity leave benefit is offered by social security, women's work becomes more costly for the employer, because during the license period, this will have to hire a replacement and cover its costs, or reorganize internally to meet the working lack.

Thus, this legislation seeks only to confirm social values and ultimately differentiate social groups, in this case, men and women, giving them different values. For this reason, totally fits the symbolic legislation concept handled by Kindermann.

4 The equal legal treatment of paternity leave and maternity leave

Being proven that distinct leave periods for men and women generate discrimination in women's labor market, now is necessary to make a new interpretation of the subject, in order to adapt the norm to the function for which it was created, ensuring their effectiveness normative- legal.

Initially, it should be emphasized that, in establishing the parenthood license, the Federal Constitution is intended to protect not only the figure of workers, but especially the child that is being generated, allowing their parents, fathers, to have time to devote to basic care in their first months of life.

The proof of this is that the motherhood wage, which is the women remuneration received during the leave period, is paid by Social Security not only to the insured employee, but also for all other worker's types (with no regular work contract) of the General Provident Fund Scheme, pursuant to art. 71 of Law 8.213/91, since not only the mother employee should be protected, but first of all the newborn child.

Its important to observe that Social Security has contributory and supportive character, given that men and women contribute to the INSS on equal terms, with no differences based in gender rates. This done, the parental leave granting in equality with maternity leave already have a funding source, which are the men's contributions because the exercised work activity.

Moreover, with the licenses temporal difference, there is a strong trend and an incentive for women to reduce their employment and assume most of the responsibilities in childcares. On the other hand, men are deprived of the opportunity to actively participate in raising their children.

Of course, it's not ignore the fact that woman has more rest needed after delivery, once your body undergoes profound changes with gestational period, which does not happen with the man. However, this fact also explains the male's presence indispensability to help her in the child take cares, allowing woman better recovery.

Moreover, in adoption cases by homo-affective marriage and in death or disability postpartum mother is very likely that man fulfills the child caregiver role. For these reasons, in our times it is stated that the license benefit is smaller's intended for and not worker's.

In this sense, the arts. 226 and 277 of the 1988 Federal Constitution says that the family, as the society basis, has special State protection. Says yet that the family, the society and the state have the child, adolescent and young's life responsibility.

The family, in contemporary society, presents a new conformation. Gender relations progressed; women actively entered the job market and the man is no longer the only home provider. For this reason, the man actively participates in childcare.

But, with such small paternity leave period, man is deprived of an active participation in the family, which infringes directly the family protection constitutional text.

The jurisprudence has coming changing to ensure the man's paternity leave right for the same maternity leave period, but this has occurred only in mother's death or disability events and in homo-affective union adoptions cases.

By the way, the Brazilian federal justice has already granted to a Federal Police server, whose wife had died during childbirth complications, the right to maternity leave. In the same way, the Paraná State second appellate court granted the maternity pay right, from Social Security, to a man due to his seven-months pregnant wife death, making necessary an emergency surgery and the anticipation baby delivery[19].

The National Congress (the Brazilian parliament) is processing the Constitutional Proposed Amendment No. 5473/2012, submitted on April 25, 2013 by the Henrique Oliveira's congressman, who previews the paternity leave grant likewise the maternity leave to newborn's parents in child's mother's death cases or in mother's temporary or permanent disability cases.

However, the license's equalization need cannot be restricted to cases where the woman is unable to the child take cares. Even when the woman is healthy, the father's presence in the family is essential in this delicate life moment.

But above all, what matters to the Labor Law is the granted of equality between men and women, stopping gender discrimination in labor relations. On the topic discussed herein, this equality will be achieved only with the parental leave institute assimilation.

Due to the equality constitutional principle, the same treatment should be ensured to men and women in the labor legislation and in the labor market. However, the distinction between maternity and paternity leave becomes the woman a more expensive market hand labor, hindering their labor market access and hurting their working conditions.

Surely, this practice confronts with the most basic labor law principles and objectives. That's why is required a shift in focus from protection to women's work, to promote gender equality in the work world. This equality is reflected both in equal opportunities in the labor market and in the care and responsibility sharing with the child.

---

[19] MASCARO, Sônia. O direito do pai viúvo à licença maternidade. 2012. Available in http://www.amaurimascaronascimento.com.br/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=433:o-direito-do-pai-viuvo-a-licenca-maternidade&catid=93:doutrina&Itemid=248. Acess in 10 set. 2013.

5 The interpretation according to the Federal Constitution

Given this explanation about the symbolic law governing the women's workforce, it is necessary to reach a new constitutional interpretation puts this symbolism away from the norm and which generates fundamental right's effectiveness, without produce a change in the constitutional text.

Initially, it should be noted that the Constitution is composed of rules with several peculiarities. But, before perform an effective constitutional interpretation, is necessary to understand that.

Constitutional rules have legal superiority in legal State ordainment. Is this superiority that confers the tying and paradigmatic character of the whole system, so no legal action can validly exist if goes against the Constitutional rules meaning[20].

The Constitution also contains a normative force that stimulates and coordinates the relationship between citizens and the state, and among them. She has, by itself, legal effect, as can be shown through the modern Constitutional hermeneutics' doctrine, whose are repeatedly adopted by jurisprudence[21].

However, this Constitutional norm's effectiveness does not occur without the human will's cooperation. Thus, legal practitioners must walk in order to reach increasingly fundamental right's realization, as proposed by Konrad Hesse already back in 1959 and featured in the homeland doctrine, by Paul Bonavides[22].

Hesse teaches that constitutional interpretation is significant for the Constitutional normative force's consolidation and preservation. For him, the appropriate interpretation is the one that can realize the provi-

---

[20] BARROSO. Luís Roberto. Interpretação e aplicação da Constituição: fundamentos de uma dogmática constitucional transformadora. 6. ed. rev. atual. e amp. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2004, p. 107.

[21] TEODORO, Maria Cecília Máximo; DOMINGUES, Gustavo Magalhães de Paula Gonçalves. Adicionais de Insalubridade e periculosidade: base de cálculo, cumulatividade e efeitos preventivos e pedagógicos. In: XX ENCONTRO NACIONAL DO CONPEDI. 20.2011, Belo Horizonte: Anais do Recurso Eletrônico do XX Encontro Nacional do Conpedi. Florianópolis: Fundação Boiteaux, 2011, p. 3.270.

[22] TEODORO, Maria Cecília Máximo; DOMINGUES, Gustavo Magalhães de Paula Gonçalves. Adicionais de Insalubridade e periculosidade: base de cálculo, cumulatividade e efeitos preventivos e pedagógicos. In: XX ENCONTRO NACIONAL DO CONPEDI. 20.2011, Belo Horizonte: Anais do Recurso Eletrônico do XX Encontro Nacional do Conpedi. Florianópolis: Fundação Boiteaux, 2011, p. 3.270.

sion meaning when facing a concrete fact[23].

For this reason, constitutional interpretation must always seek the standard implementation, which cannot be achieved solely on the logical subsumption or conceptual construction interpretation's methods[24].

Currently, in addition to the traditional constitutional interpretation's methods interpretation - grammatical, systematic and historical - the modern doctrine has pointed out some principles that help the interpreter in this arduous mission to find the rule true meaning and apply it to the case in order to achieve the desired justice.

One of these principles, which assist greatly in the women's work analysis, is the interpretation according to the Federal Constitution's principle.

By this principle, is preached that when there are plausible and alternatives legal text's interpretations, which allow them to be according with the Federal Constitution meaning, so the rule should not be declared unconstitutional. "It means the choice for a legal rule interpretation line, among others that the text contains"[25].

However, this principle has several consequences that go beyond its original concept. One is that it is necessary to seek an interpretation that not necessarily derives from the most obvious legal text reading. And, besides it, it is from its nature that the interpretation do not contravenes the Constitution.

Luis Roberto Barroso[26] extracts four elements from the interpretation according to the Federal Constitution's principle, namely:

---

[23] SOUZA, Josafá Jorge de. A força normativa da Constituição – Konrad Hesse (resenha). 2005, p. 1. Disponível em: <http://www.viajus.com.br/viajus. php?pagina=artigos&id=350&idAreaSel=
16&seArt=yes>. Acesso em: 14 dez. 2012.

[24] TEODORO, Maria Cecília Máximo; DOMINGUES, Gustavo Magalhães de Paula Gonçalves. Adicionais de Insalubridade e periculosidade: base de cálculo, cumulatividade e efeitos preventivos e pedagógicos. In: XX ENCONTRO NACIONAL DO CONPEDI. 20.2011, Belo Horizonte: Anais do Recurso Eletrônico do XX Encontro Nacional do Conpedi. Florianópolis: Fundação Boiteaux, 2011, p. 3.270.

[25] BARROSO. Luís Roberto. Interpretação e aplicação da Constituição: fundamentos de uma dogmática constitucional transformadora. 6. ed. rev. atual. e amp. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2004, p. 189.

[26] BARROSO. Luís Roberto. Interpretação e aplicação da Constituição: fundamentos de uma dogmática constitucional transformadora. 6. ed. rev. atual. e amp. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2004, p. 189.

> a) It is the choice of a legal standard interpretation that keeps harmony with the Constitution, amid other interpretive possibilities that the text admits.
> b) This interpretation seeks to find a possible norm direction, which is not totally visible or clear in the legal text.
> c) It allows the quickly exclusion of other possible interpretations, that would lead contrasting results with the Constitution.
> d) Therefore, the interpretation according to the Federal Constitution becomes a judicial review way, through the one is possible to declare the legitimation of a particular standard reading.

In the same sense, Jorge Miranda points out that:

> The interpretation according to the Federal Constitution is not exactly choose between possible and normal senses of any precept, which is more in line with the Constitution, but to discern the limit - on the unconstitutionality border - a meaning that, although not apparent or not arising other interpretation's elements, it's the necessary meaning able to made possible by virtue the Basic Law conformation form[27].

However, this interpretative effort to preserve the law in face of the Constitution, finds its limits, since the interpreter can not twist or tamper the word's meaning against the clear legislature intention, even if the focus is to save the law, because is not admissible an against interpretation law[28].

In women's work case, this interpretation type is very applicable. When the constituent legislator fails in establish the constitutional text the paternity leave period, delegating this function to the infraconstitutional norm, surely a parameter should be fixed taking into account the other institutes and constitutional principles applicable to Labor Law.

Due to this constitutional interpretation, any Constitutional rule incompatible sense must be discarded, because its incompatibility with the constitutional text itself. Allow a paternity leave period shorter than that maternity leave period is totally incongruous with the constitutional principles governing the employment relationship, particularly the equality principle.

---

[27] MIRANDA, Jorge. Manual de Direito Constitucional. 2. ed. Coimbra: Ed. Coimbra, 1983, p. 233.

[28] BARROSO. Luís Roberto. Interpretação e aplicação da Constituição: fundamentos de uma dogmática constitucional transformadora. 6. ed. rev. atual. e amp. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2004, p. 192.

On the other hand, considering that gender equality is a Constitutional guaranteed fundamental human right, the rule interpretation providing different period of paternity leave putts women at a disadvantage in the labor market, also finds an obstacle on the consistent interpretation principle because it hurts one of their bases.

Thus, the only interpretation that meets the Constitutional legislator objectives is the one that assures to the man the parental leave right in equal woman conditions, ensuring them to get the same participation rights in child care and family life.

6 The subject in the comparative law: maternity leave, paternity leave and parental leave

In Comparative Law, the worker's leave right granted because of the child's birth has several conformations, beginning by the institute of parental leave in addition to maternity and paternity leaves.

Parental leave is a relatively long license granted to the father or mother to take care of their child after the maternity or paternity leave period. The provisions relating to parental leave vary considerably from country to country, reflecting broader concerns within society, such as concerns related to child development, the fertility rate, the supply of skilled labor, gender equality and distribution income[29].

The advanced European countries adopt parental leave and parent's support of two ways: by granting license with stability or the financial support during the license period. Furthermore, the license can protect the both parents or just one of them. The Center of Economic and Politic Research examined the parental leave in 21 countries and found that Finland, Norway, Sweden and Greece have high performance systems by adopting five practices: the paid leave period is really generous with no transferable quotas to each parent. Furthermore, there is universal coverage combined with simple eligibility restrictions and financing structures that distribute the cost among various employers and there is also a programming flexibility license[30].

[29] OIT – Organização Internacional do Trabalho. Notas da OIT: Trabalho e Família. Disponível em http://www.oitbrasil.org.br/sites/default/files/topic/gender/pub/br_nota_6_700_726.pdf. Acesso em 19.09.2013.

[30] OIT – Organização Internacional do Trabalho. Notas da OIT: Trabalho e Família.

In some countries, like France and Germany, there is a minimum that must be taken by each parent in respect of maternity and paternity leave, and a remainder period that can be freely chosen between the couple, which of them will enjoy the remoteness to work to devote to child care, parental leave would be. In France, the couple has a set of 21.8 weeks leave period, and that the woman should have at least sixteen weeks and the man at least two weeks. The couple can freely adjust the remainder period. All these periods are remunerated[31].

In Portugal, after the son or daughter birth, mother and father are entitled to initial parental leave for 120 or 150 consecutive days, which can be shared enjoyment after delivery. The mother can take the initial parental leave license within 30 days before childbirth. It is mandatory enjoyment, by the mother, of six weeks leave after the birth. In mother or child hospitalization's case during the license period, this period is suspended for the hospitalization duration. In case that the father take the parental leave shorter than 30 days, he receives a higher subsidy, and the leave duration can be increased with 30 days, if the parents wish, achieving 180 days.

Moreover, it is mandatory the father's enjoyment of 10 days parental leave after the child's birth, consecutive or interleaved, but since that the 5 first days be enjoyed immediately after delivery. After this period, the father still has the right of a 10 days leave, consecutive or interleaved, if enjoyed simultaneously with the mother's parental leave.

The Portuguese legislation also created the Extended parental leave, where any of the parents can enjoy plus three months leave, achieving a total of six months subsidized by social protection, corresponding to 25% of gross remuneration, which in practice allows both parents the possibility of children's taking care in their first year's life.

Research results are best shown in the graphs below.

Disponível em http://www.oitbrasil.org.br/sites/default/files/topic/gender/pub/br_nota_6_700_726.pdf. Acesso em 19.09.2013.

[31] Idem.

TABLE 1
Minimum and Maximum Parental Leave Allotments, in Weeks of FTE Paid Leave

Country	Couples' FTE Paid Leave	Mothers' FTE Paid Leave		Fathers' FTE Paid Leave
		Minimum	Maximum	Minimum	Maximum
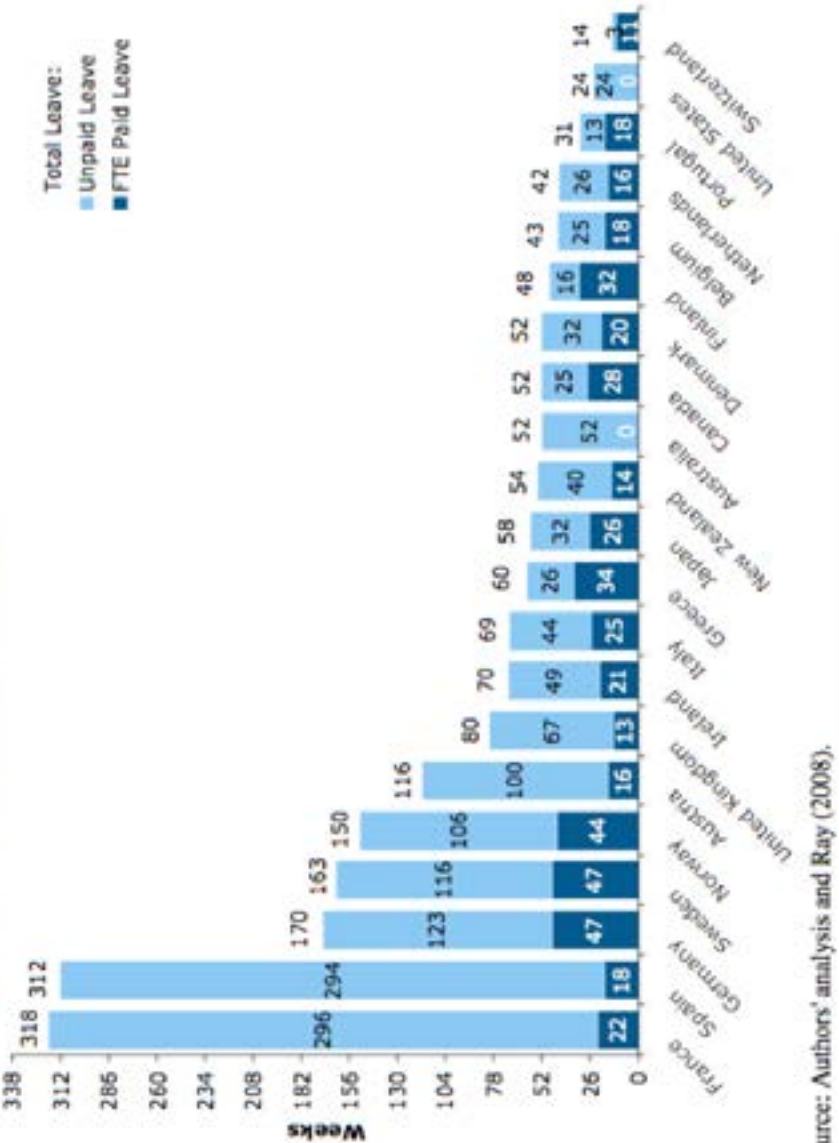
Australia	0.0	0.0	0.0	0.0	0.0
Austria	16.0	16.0	16.0	0.0	0.0
Belgium	18.0	13.9	13.9	4.1	4.1
Canada	27.5	9.4	27.5	0.0	18.2
Denmark	19.6	9.0	18.6	1.0	10.6
Finland	31.7	11.7	29.0	2.7	21.3
France	21.8	16.0	19.8	2.0	5.8
Germany	46.7	14.0	42.0	4.7	28.0
Greece	34.1	17.0	33.5	0.6	17.1
Ireland	20.8	20.8	20.8	0.0	0.0
Italy	25.1	17.3	25.1	0.0	7.8
Japan	26.0	8.4	26.0	0.0	17.6
Netherlands	16.4	16.0	16.0	0.4	0.4
New Zealand	14.0	0.0	14.0	0.0	14.0
Norway	44.0	9.0	38.0	6.0	35.0
Portugal	18.0	6.0	17.0	1.0	14.0
Spain	18.0	16.0	16.0	2.0	2.0
Sweden	46.9	6.9	40.0	6.9	40.0
Switzerland	11.2	11.2	11.2	0.0	0.0
United Kingdom	13.0	12.6	12.6	0.4	0.4
United States	0.0	0.0	0.0	0.0	0.0

Note: The first column is the sum of various combinations of leave taken by the two parents. In countries where the total entitlement is affected by the distribution between parents, we have assumed the shortest entitlement. For Finland and Portugal, the sum of mother's minimum and father's maximum is greater than the couple's total FTE paid leave. In Finland, if fathers take the last two weeks of parental leave, they receive two additional weeks, raising their total FTE paid leave from 31.7 weeks to 33.0 weeks. Similarly, in Portugal, if the fathers take two weeks of parental leave, that leave is paid (although it is unpaid if mothers take it). Thus, if fathers take their maximum FTE paid leave, it raises the total FTE paid leave from 18 weeks to 20 weeks.
Source: Authors' analysis and Ray (2008).

FIGURE 1
Total and FTE Paid Parental Leave for Two-Parent Families



Source: Authors' analysis and Ray (2008).

In Brazil, although the parental leave model doesn't exist yet, which would be desirable, is possible to reduce gender inequality existing today by granting equal maternity and paternity leave. Moreover, with the match of license's periods, will occur a men's recognition as an important holder of rights in the exercise of family's responsibilities and the work and family's reconciliation possibility. On the other hand, shall be provided the women's free access to the labor market and better conditions during the labor pact, which meets the objectives of the Labour Law and the Democratic State of Law.

Nowadays, in Brazilian arrangement's diversity society it's not acceptable that women exclusively exercise the child's birthrights. So is deeply necessary to recognize the fatherhood's rights importance and its exercise as a man of rights.

7 Conclusions

Gender equality, besides being a constitutional principle, is pursued by Law operators since its inception goal.

Men and women have unquestionable physical and psychological distinctions. By this way, in some instances, the law itself provides them different rights, in order to meet their specific in regard to the principle of equality under the material focus.

However, in this respect, the woman has always been the most affected person, since it is being more fragile, because of your physical weakness compared with men, and due the fact of being the only one able to get pregnant. Because of this supposed fragility, the legislature was concerned to establish an especially regulatory system applicable to women, seeking to ensure a free market access and better working conditions.

But such protective standards lead to an opposite and unexpected effect. Once the women become the legal protection's recipient that is not committed to man they becomes a more expensive and less attractive workforce to the employer. Thus, the women's discrimination begins in the labor market access, persisting during the all labor contract period.

Even woman having the same man qualification and occupying the same job, recent research shows that she still receives much lower salary. This shows that the women's presence in the labor market is not well accepted by employers.

With the aim to reduce such inequalities, the Brazilian legislation had being modified to exclude some women's protections, such as the prohibition of night work, in unhealthy activities, and in dangerous and extraordinary journeys. However, a large discrepancy still exists in the Brazilian legal system related to women's work, which makes it much impaired in the market, which is the maternity leave period, because of its longer term compared to father's leave.

While the maternity leave is guaranteed by a hundred and twenty days, to woman take care of her child; the father takes a five days leave, what legitimizes the women's discrimination in the labor market.

After all, its possible to realize that women becomes a more expensive work hand for the employer. So, their access to the labor market is difficult, and when it is reached, your salary has to be lower to compensate the spending on replacement during the maternity leave.

Comparative Law, in addition to the maternity and father's leaves, has the figure of parental leave, which is a paid or unpaid additional leave period, where parents decide which of them will be with the childcares during the period. In addition, many countries have minimum and maximum periods of maternity and paternity leave, providing opportunities for parents to choose which of them will be with the child in the first months of life.

In Brazil, this additional period called parental leave does not exist, only the woman has a license for a considerable period to take of the child, and the men does not have the same warranty, because they have so small license period that doesn't allows them an actively participation in child firsts years life.

By adopting an interpretation according to the Federal Constitution, based on the equality principles and in Brazilian Democratic State goals, its required a new look at the institutes of maternity and paternity leave, equating this durations in order to achieve gender equality, so dear to the Labour Law, dignifying women's work.

References

ARCELO, Adalberto Antônio Batista; GONTIJO, Lucas de Alvarenga. A Biopolítica nos Estados Democráticos de Direito: a reprodução da subcidadania sob a égide da constitucionalização simbólica. Belo Horizonte, 2011, p. 10.

BARROS, Alice Monteiro de. Curso de Direito do Trabalho. 7ª Ed. São Paulo: LTr, 2011, p. 1980,

BARROSO. Luís Roberto. Interpretação e aplicação da Constituição: funda-mentos de uma dogmática constitucional transformadora. 6. ed. rev. atual. e amp. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2004, p. 786.

IBGE. Salário das Mulheres permanece 28% inferior aos dos homens nos últimos três anos. 2012. Disponível em http://saladeimprensa.ibge.gov.br/noticias?view=noticia&id=1&busca=1&idnoticia=2096. Acesso em 16 set. 2013.

FOUCAULT, Michel. Em defesa da Sociedade. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2005, p. 207.

LOPES, Fernanda Ravazzano Azevedo. O conceito não revelado e as funções não declaradas da ressocialização: a resposta garantista à manipulação da linguagem. 2009. 244fls. (Dissertação de Mestrado em Direito). Universidade Federal da Bahia. Programa de Pós-Gradução em Direito Público, Bahia, 2009. p. 76. Disponível em http://www.bibliotecadigital.ufba.br/tde_arquivos/17/TDE-2010-05-24T064553Z-1652/Publico/FRavazzano%20seg.pdf. Acesso em 10 set. 2013.

MARTINEZ, Luciano. Curso de Direito do Trabalho. 3ª Ed. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2012, p. 1945.

NEVES, Marcelo. A constitucionalização simbólica. São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2007, p. 658.

MIRANDA, Jorge. Manual de Direito Constitucional. 2. ed. Coimbra: Ed. Coimbra, 1983, p. 987.

MASCARO, Sônia. O direito do pai viúvo à licença maternidade. 2012. Disponível em http://www.amaurimascaronascimento.com.br/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=433:o-direito-do-pai-viuvo-a-licenca-maternidade&catid=93:doutrina&Itemid=248. Acesso em 10 set. 2013.

OIT – Organização Internacional do Trabalho. Notas da OIT: Trabalho e Família. Disponível em http://www.oitbrasil.org.br/sites/default/files/topic/gender/pub/br_nota_6_700_726.pdf. Acesso em 19 set. 2013.

PANUZZIO, Daniele; NASCIMENTO, Grasiele Augusta Ferreira. Proteção ao Trabalho da Mulher no limiar do século XXI – O Direito e a Ética na Sociedade Contemporânea: Alínea, 2006, p.163-164.

QUADROS, Grazielle de Matos. A discriminação do trabalho da mulher no Brasil. Disponível em http://www3.pucrs.br/pucrs/files/uni/poa/direito/graduacao/tcc/tcc2/trabalhos2011_2/grazielle_quadros.pdf. Acesso em 10 set. 2013.

RAIS. Registros de emprego com carteira assinada cresceu 5,93% em um ano. 2013. Disponível em http://portal.mte.gov.br/imprensa/cresce-a-participacao-da-mulher-no-mercado-de-trabalho/palavrachave/mercado-de-trabalho-rais-mulheres-crescimento-das-mulheres.htm. Acesso em 16.09.2013.

SILVA JÚNIOR. Arnaldo. A legislação aparente na construção de uma constitucionalização simbólica. Disponível em http://www.ribeirosilva.com.br/content/pdf/1410201171346.pdf. Acesso em: 30 agost. 2013.

SOUZA, Josafá Jorge de. A força normativa da Constituição – Konrad Hesse (resenha). 2005, p. 1. Disponível em: http://www.viajus.com.br/viajus.php?pagina=artigos&id=350&idAreaSel=16&seArt=yes. Acesso em: 30 agost. 2013.

Pre-contractual discrimination towards different types of disabilities

The infra-discrimination on the employer's choice

Maria Rosaria Barbato[1]
Flávia Souza Máximo Pereira[2]

Abstract: This article analyzes the phenomenon of infra-discrimination, which is a kind of pre-contractual discrimination towards persons with disabilities, due to the mere imposition of the homogeneous quota system of hiring disabled persons applied isolatedly in the entrepreneurial environment, leading the employer to choose the candidate with the disability less severe and more viable to the company, which means the disability that requires lower social adaptation or business investment. First, is examined the importance of performing a job for those with disabilities from the perspective of independence and self-determination. Successively, the legal provisions aimed to avoid the discrimination towards persons with disabilities in the access to the labor market are analyzed, emphasizing the quota policy and its effectiveness in the entrepreneurial environment. Afterwards, the phenomenon of infra-discrimination is discussed, considering its perspective related to economic factors, such as the adequacy of the physical industrial space, as well its social one. Finally, are mentioned some European examples which are complementary to the homogeneous quota system and a brief conclusion is elaborated on the subject.

Keywords: People with Disabilities; infra-discrimination; Pre-contractual Discrimination.

[1] Professor at the Labour Law Department of the Federal University of Minas Gerais, Brazil. Coordinator of PRUNART (University Program of Support of Labour Relations and Administration of Justice) and coordinator of the Union Relations area. PhD in Labour Law by the Università degli Studi di Roma Tor Vergata, Italy.
[2]PhD student in the Labour Law Program at the Università degli Studi di Roma Tor Vergata, Italy.

1 Introduction: the importance of performing a job for those with disabilities

The work occupies a central figure in contemporary sociability. It is the fundamental element enabling human interaction with the environment and with other people. It is the continued achievement of work that defines the specificity of the social being, as it is a tool for the construction of culture and because it acts directly on the building of interactive actions with other social beings. According to Lukács, the work

> (...) Is in its nature an inter- relationship between man (society) and nature, with the inorganic nature (...) , as with the organic one (...) which is characterized above all by the working man, starting from the purely biological being to the social one (...) . All determinations which, as we shall see, are present in the essence of what is new in the social being are contained in the act of working. The work, therefore, can be seen as a an original phenomenon, as a model, as the protoform of the social being (apud ANTUNES, 2009, p. 19 – free translation[3])

Work as the protoform of the social being: the work not only as way of producing, but as part of the constitution of the social being (ANTUNES, 2009, p. 21). The work has an ontologically sense towards the humanization process in a broad sense, since it is the basis for generating other forms of social interaction, such as politics, religion, ethics, philosophy and art.

It is in this sense that should be discussed the social inclusion of persons with disabilities in the labor market. Is not a purely legal discussion. It is a debate essentially legal but eminently sociological and philosophical. For those with disabilities, to perform a job is essential to self-determine their human nature from the perspective of equality, freedom independence and sense of usefulness[4]. Lukács discusses the impact of performing a job on the transformation of human nature:

[3] "(...) é em sua natureza uma inter-relação entre homem (sociedade) e natureza, tanto com a natureza inorgânica (...), quanto com a orgânica, inter-relação (...) que se caracteriza acima de tudo pela passagem do homem que trabalha, partindo do ser puramente biológico ao ser social (...). Todas as determinações que, conforme veremos, estão presentes na essência do que é novo no ser social estão contidas in nuce no trabalho. O trabalho, portanto, pode ser visto como um fenômeno originário, como modelo, protoforma do ser social".

[4] Accordingly with the North American theory of social empowerment combined with

> The central question of changes in the inner man is to attain a conscious control over himself. (...) This control of the human body by consciousness, which affects a part of the sphere of his consciousness, that is, the habits, instincts, emotions, etc., is a basic requirement which exists even in the most primitive job, and should give a decisive representation that the man forms about himself (...) (apud ANTUNES , 2009, p.25, free translation[5])

It is through performing a job that persons with disabilities exercise their self-control and express their independence. It is producing something of value that disabled persons define their own human condition. It is through work that a person with disability is defined as subject of rights, as a participant subject and not as an object of social pity (GOES; BUBLITZ, 2010, p. 105).

Law's role towards persons with disabilities is exactly this: not allow that they become a target of public charity, but ensure that they could be able to develop their skills and capacity to produce (OLIVEIRA, 2000, p. 85).

However, are the current laws able to ensure the access of these persons to the labor market? Such laws are able to curb pre-contractual discrimination towards persons with disabilities? These are questions that we intend to discuss in this brief study of a peculiar form of discrimination that arises in the pre-contractual stage during the choice of the worker with disabilities by the employer: the infra - discrimination.

---

the psychological empowerment of persons with disabilities, there is a need for building relational contexts capable of openness and solidarity combined with the self-empowerment of patients with disabilities, which coincides with the perception of opportunities that go beyond difficulties caused by its deficiency: a person with disability would be the person who feels powerless and useless.

[5] "A questão central das transformações no interior do homem consiste em atingir um controle consciente sobre si mesmo. (...) Esse domínio do corpo humano pela consciência, que afeta uma parte da esfera de sua consciência, isto é, dos hábitos, instintos, emoções etc., é um requisito básico até no trabalho mais primitivo, e deve dar uma marca decisiva da representação que o homem forma sobre si mesmo (...)".

2 Legal provisions aimed to avoid the discrimination towards persons with disabilities in the access to the labor market: the quota policy and its effectiveness in the entrepreneurial environment

Human dignity and equality, expressed by non-discrimination and the materialization of parity of opportunities, are the assumptions and limitations of the legislation to protect the employee with a disability in the access to the labor market, as they had introduced in the legal order the duty of reciprocal respect, in order to ensure a minimum level of civility to such citizens.

Since 1923, there is a Recommendation of the International Labour Organization (ILO) which demands that all signatory countries adopt national laws mandating public entities and private companies to reserve a number of vacancies for the disabled, in order to promote the employment of numerous disabled persons after the First World War (MAIA,2008, p. 35).

In 1975, it was approved by the United Nations the Declaration on the Rights of Disabled Persons (Resolution no 2.542/75), recognizing internationally that persons with disabilities have the inherent right to be respect for their human dignity, whatever the origin, nature and severity of their disabilities, which implies first and everything, the right to enjoy a decent life, as normal and full as possible. The declaration was the starting point to facilitate the process of social integration of persons with disabilities, highlighting the inclusion in the labor market:

> Disabled persons have the right to economic and social security and to a decent level of living. They have the right, according to their capabilities, to secure and retain employment or to engage in a useful, productive and remunerative occupation and to join trade unions. (UNITED NATIONS, 1975)

Similarly, the Convention no 159 of the ILO on Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment for Disabled Persons, aiming the free access to the labor market for persons with disabilities, established on its article 4 the principle of equal opportunity between disabled workers and workers in general (INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION, 1983).

The Recommendation 99 of the ILO on Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons predicted affirmative actions for the access and maintenance of employment for disabled persons, establishing that there must be a certain percentage of job vacancies reserved for persons with disabilities, as well as the reservation of certain jobs (INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION, 1955). Subsequently, the Recommendation 168 supplements such precepts, adopting the principle of equal access, assuming the use of affirmative actions in order to maintain the balance in the access to the labor market between persons with and without disabilities (INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION, 1983).

In Brazil, the first law to establish the quota policy was the Organic Law of Social Security - Law 3.807/1960 that on its article 55 imposed percentages of 2% to 5% quota for rehabilitated employees for companies above 20 employees. In the Federal Constitution of 1988, the elevation of human dignity as a fundament of the democratic state and the article 5º, caput, which guarantees equality, without distinction of any kind, ensures access of persons with disabilities in the labor market, curbing any kind of discrimination. We can also highlight the art. 7, XXXI, which prohibits discrimination in terms of wages and hiring criteria towards persons with disabilities and the article 37,VIII, which requires that the law reserve a percentage of public employment for persons with disabilities and will define the criteria for their admission.

Besides the Federal Constitution, the Law 7.853/1989 created the National Coordination for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities. Subsequently, the Law 8.213/1991, on its article 93 established a minimum guarantee of employment for people with disabilities, imposing the quota policy in the entrepreneurial environment, transcribed:

> Article 93: The company with one hundred (100) or more employees are required to complete 2% (two percent) to 5 % (five percent) of their positions with rehabilitated or disabled, enabled, as follows:
> I - up to 200 employees: 2%
> II - 201 to 500: 3%
> III - 501-1000: 4 %
> IV - from 1001 onwards: 5%
> § 1 The dismissal of workers rehabilitated or disabled at the end of fixed-term contract with a deadline of more than ninety (90) days, and that one without cause with a contract for an indefinite term, can only occur after hiring substitute worker with a similar condition .
> § 2 The Ministry of Labour and Social Security is expected to generate statistics on the total number of employees and vacancies filled > by rehabilitated or disabled persons and provide them, on request, to unions or organizations representing the employees (free translation[6])

However, that law above mentioned was only effective when the Decree nº. 3.298 of 1999 regulated the Law 7.853/89 on its article 36, establishing the policy of reservation of quotas for rehabilitated or disabled person.

Currently, the Chamber of Deputies analyzes the Bill 2973/11, elaborated by Aguinaldo Ribeiro, which seeks to amend the art. 93 of the Law 8.213/1991, increasing the mandatory quota percentage for hiring persons with disabilities. The proposal establishes the obligation for companies with more than 30 employees and increases the maximum percentage to 8 % instead of the current 5%. According to the proposal, the job vacancies shall be filled in the following proportion: companies that have 30-200 employees must reserve mandatorily 2% of its jobs for persons with disabilities. For companies that have 201-500 employees, the quota reserved for disabled persons is 4%. For those companies which have 501 to 1,000 employees, the quota should be 6%. For companies with 1,001 or more employees, the quota reserved to disabled persons must be 8%. The bill, which is on the conclusive stage at the Parliament, will be now analyzed by the Committees of Economic Development, Industry and Trade; Labor, Public Service and Administration; Social Security and Family and by the Committee of Constitution, Justice and Citizenship.

There is no doubt that the role of international and national legislation that deters discrimination towards disabled persons is vast. However, are the current laws able to ensure the access of these persons to the labor market? It is questionable whether this quota system can eliminate discrimination during the employer's choice: the mere law imposition of hiring disabled persons is able to achieve the social inclusion for all types of disabilities? In the words of Walküre Lopes Ribeiro da Silva

---

[6] "Art. 93. A empresa com 100 (cem) ou mais empregados está obrigada a preencher de 2% (dois por cento) a 5% (cinco por cento) dos seus cargos com beneficiários reabilitados ou pessoas portadoras de deficiência, habilitadas, na seguinte proporção:I - até 200 empregados: 2%; II - de 201 a 500: 3%; III - de 501 a 1.000: 4%; IV - de 1.001 em diante: 5%. § 1º A dispensa de trabalhador reabilitado ou de deficiente habilitado ao final de contrato por prazo determinado de mais de 90 (noventa) dias, e a imotivada, no contrato por prazo indeterminado, só poderá ocorrer após a contratação de substituto de condição semelhante. § 2º O Ministério do Trabalho e da Previdência Social deverá gerar estatísticas sobre o total de empregados e as vagas preenchidas por reabilitados e deficientes habilitados, fornecendo-as, quando solicitadas, aos sindicatos ou entidades representativas dos empregados".

> The problem facing the disabled is not the absence of laws. From the point of view of the validity, we have laws that would be perfectly applicable to concrete cases. The big issue is the effectiveness of the existing standards (p.176, 1997, free translation[7])

Undoubtedly, the Brazilian law 8.213/91 which established the quota system for those with disabilities be able to access the labor market is a major achievement and extremely necessary in the fight against the pre-contractual discrimination. Furthermore, the systematic reading of this law in view of the Brazilian Constitution makes this law one of the world's most advanced legislation in order to protect and support persons with disabilities.

Therefore, we reject initiatives such as the Bill 112/2006, elaborated by the Senator José Sarney, which aims to reduce dramatically the maximum percentage of vacancies in the companies reserved for persons with disabilities from the current 5% to 3% and also outsources the workers with disabilities in order to fulfill the quota established by the law 8.213/91; we also disagree of the Bill 234/2012, created by the Senator Benedito de Lira , which proposes to divert to the FAT (Workers Support Fund) the funds for hiring people with disabilities by companies, reducing the maximum percentage from the current 5% to 0.5% .

However, although beneficial and necessary, the homogeneous quota system is not effective in curbing the pre-contractual discrimination against any kind of disability, revealing a kind of gap between the protective legislative framework and its application inside the companies. We are not questioning here the protection established by the system of quotas, which is sorely needed, but the way this protection is conducted and also its application.

The crucial problem is that the quota system applied isolatedly overestimates the power of the law. That is because we have to face the inertia of the State on providing effectiveness to the legislation, especially regarding to the accessibility of disabled persons in the companies.

[7] "O problema que enfrenta o portador de deficiência não é a ausência de leis. Sob o ponto de vista da validade temos leis que seriam perfeitamente aplicáveis aos casos concretos. O grande problema é o da eficácia das normas existentes".

The State acts predominantly as fiscal and not as a co-responsible with private companies.

We recognize the existence of preventive actions performed by the Ministry of Labor, which maintains a Permanent Committee to Study the Integration of Persons with Disabilities in the Labour Market, as well the role performed by the National Council of Persons with Disabilities - CONADE, part of the structure of the Presidency Special Secretariat for Human Rights, which consists on a decision-making body set up to monitor and evaluate the development of a national policy for the inclusion of persons with disabilities.

Nevertheless, the State action is predominantly composed by fiscal and investigative actions (monitoring companies through labor inspectors; establishing civil investigations through the Ministry of Labor, that proposes gradual fulfillment of the vacancies reserved for disabled persons by Terms of Adjustment of Conduct; imposition of fines),which may result in a public civil lawsuit.

Thus, the inclusion of persons with disabilities in the labor market is legally imposed by the State, but there is an omission in order to enable this policy. The State had transferred the responsibility of the social inclusion of persons with disabilities to the companies, establishing only goals to be achieved through the quota system.

Therefore, given the legal imposition on hiring workers with any type of disability and considering the lack of structure in the companies to receive workers with certain kinds of disabilities, - not just regarding the physical work environment, which demands some equipment and infrastructure endowed with accessibility, but also regarding the staff training, so they could be able to relate productively with this new worker with disability - companies choose the worker who has the less severe disabillity, such as a hearing impair worker instead of the worker in the wheelchair or the mentally impaired, unleashing a new kind of pre-contractual discrimination presented as a side effect of the legal system of homogeneous quotas in Brazil.

3 The side effect of the inefficiency of the homogeneous quota system on the employer's choice: the phenomenon of infra-discrimination

Due to the inactive position of the State regarding the feasibility of the legislation and due to the obligation imposed by the homogeneous quota system of hiring employees with any type of disability, it appears that during the choice of the employer, there is a preference for the kind of disability that is less severe and more "viable" to the company, which means the disability that requires lower social adaptation or business investment.

This assertion can be proven by a research held by the Ethos Institute with the 500 largest companies in Brazil, which has concluded that, at the operational level, only 1.9% of employees were people with disabilities in 2007. Most of then were physically disabled. Only 0.1% of those hired were visually impaired and 0.1% had multiple disabilities (ROLLI, 2013, p. 01).

The isolated imposition of the homogeneous quotas system for disabled workers in the companies, without the articulation of an social education policy inside them; without the analysis of the reality of each business activity and without the State incentive in order to provide the adequacy of the physical industrial space in the companies, does not allow the development of the social consciousness of the employer.

Practically, the employer hires the person with disability not because he believes that this is a person with rights and the work can be a tool for social inclusion. Given the unique obligation of hiring imposed by the homogeneous quota system, the employer works through the logic of number of vacancies to be filled at any cost, which is why most of persons with disabilities are employed in work activities of low complexity[8]. Therefore, the employer ends up choosing the worker with the disability that requires lower adaptation of the company, which will offer less risk and investment.

Francesca Limena comments similar contradiction on the Italian law that promotes the policy of quotas and alerts to the risks of segregation among persons with disabilities:

> (...) The law transforms the inclusion of the person with disabilities on a commodity exchange, which the disable person is in a position of object instead of subject, in a trade contract in which is left as a lower priority the primary objective of social integration and working inclusion of the person with disability in a business environment (2004, p. 53, free translation[9]).

[8]Also due to the factor of low qualification of such workers, who were also mostly deprived of educational and training.

[9] "(...) a ordem legal transforma a inserção do portador de necessidades especiais em uma mercadoria de troca, que se encontra em uma posição de objeto, em vez de sujeito,

The establishment of quotas disregarding the types of disabilities, without the analysis of the activities performed by the companies, without a study of their structure and without social awareness of their professionals, leads to the choice of the employee who has the kind of disability less severe in terms of economical (adequate equipment and space) and social barriers (staff unprepared).

We are facing a phenomenon of pre-contractual discrimination that affects a group that is already marginalized. There is an internal discrimination, overlapped, among persons with disabilities, manifested during the choice of the employer, due to the mandatory homogeneous quota system and the lack of incentive for its feasibility: the worker chosen is always that one who will be less costly for the company. We may denominate this phenomenon as infra-discrimination.

We can illustrate this concept better: During a recruitment process, an employer, faced by the obligation to hire a person with disability in the terms of the quota law, without the State incentive to provide an adequate physical infrastructure, between a candidate with a hearing impair and a candidate who has to use a wheelchair, he will choose the candidate with hearing loss. This choice is justified by the range of investments in terms of accessibility that the employer will have to make in case of hiring the worker who uses the wheelchair.

Cybele Goldfarb comments this new type of pre-contractual discrimination that arises as a side effect of the homogeneous quota system, which is supported by the lack of social responsibility of companies

> By doing so, companies continue undermining disabled creating informal classifications, levels of employability or "castes" among them, ceasing to hire persons with more severe disabilities, who require adaptive equipment, and maintaining their exclusion of the formal labor market. We believe that this type of argument by companies is the result of an erroneous view, which considers only the profitability in a short term, denying its social function and damaging a portion of society that needs support and law compliance (2009, p. 32, free translation[10]).

---

em um acordo comercial no qual é deixado em segundo plano o objetivo primário da integração social e da inclusão laborativa da pessoa portadora de necessidades especiais em um ambiente empresarial".

[10] "Agindo desta forma, as empresas continuam prejudicando os deficientes, pois, informalmente acabam criando classificações, níveis de empregabilidade ou "castas" entre eles, preterindo a contratação das outras pessoas com deficiência mais severa, as quais

We should emphasize that the infra-discrimination is not only caused by architectural reasons or by companies' physical structure. According to British social theory of disability, this should be considered a social construction, which means, the disability is the result of social behaviors and social structures. Persons with disabilities are a minority group that experiences discrimination, just as other minority groups, in the hands of a dominant[11] one (HARLAN; ROBERT,1998 p. 412). Unfair treatment could be generated by models of domination and oppression, considered as an expression of a struggle for power and privilege (GRAMMENOS, 1995, p. 63).

Given the social theory of disability, we can understand the phenomenon of infra-discrimination as a result not only of the absence of adapted physical structures inside the companies, but also as a consequence of the social interaction between people and their behavior in the workplace.

We can use as an example workers with intellectual impairment: for they reach a better work performance, it is necessary to create an environment in which they are able to concentrate, perform their duties and interact with colleagues. Moreover, the work dynamics is directly linked to the psychological support which that employee receives and needs. The employers should be aware that the tasks delegated to mentally impaired workers should be in accordance with their capabilities and their production time must be respected. Therefore, during a selection process considering the imposition of the homogeneous quota system, between a person who uses a wheelchair and another with and necessitam de equipamentos adaptados, e mantendo sua exclusão do mercado formal de trabalho. Consideramos que este tipo de argumento por parte das empresas é fruto de uma visão errônea, que considera somente a rentabilidade em curto prazo, renegando sua função social e prejudicando uma parcela da sociedade que necessita de apoio e cumprimento das leis".

---

[11] The social model of disability is a reaction to the dominant medical model of disability, which in itself is a functional analysis of the body as a machine to be fixed in order to conform to normative values. The social model of disability identifies systemic barriers, negative attitudes and exclusion by society (purposely or inadvertently) that means society is the main contributory factor in disabling people. While physical, sensory, intellectual, or psychological variations may cause individual functional limitation or impairments, these do not have to lead to disability unless society fails to take account of and include people regardless of their individual differences. The origins of the approach can be traced to the 1960s; the specific term emerged from the United Kingdom in the 1980s.

intellectual impairment, the employer will definitely choose the worker physically disabled, resulting on segregation among persons with disabilities.

The doctor Joseph Schwartzman Solomon warns about the generalization that quotas treat the disabled:

> Brazilian law makes no distinction on its treatment of different types of disabilities, and this is a big problem, because the levels of disability are distinct, as well as its severity. We can not treat all cases the same way as if all had the same capacities (PEZZUTTO, 2012, p. 02, free translation[12]).

Moreover, most of these companies do not analyze the disability of each worker in a specific way, which means, the few accessibility adaptations adopted are made in a general way, disregarding the real needs of the individual: the person with disabilities that must adapt to the company and not the opposite.

We can demonstrate the phenomenon of infra-discrimination on job advertisements, on which they disclose a preference for a specific type of disability, regardless the function that will be performed by the employee:

> Industrial Assistant - complete or incomplete primary education, preferably people with hearing or mild physical disability, 18-45 years (NÚCLEO DE APOIO AO TRABALHADOR, 2012, free translation)
> Administrative Assistant in São Paulo. Vacancy for persons with hearing impairment. Will perform administrative tasks. Knowledge in Office suite. English will be a plus. Training: Desirable to have higher education on administration (NÚCLEO DE APOIO AO TRABALHADOR, 2012, free translation)
> Production Assistant: Salary: 4.10 p / hour + full benefits. Job intended for persons with hearing disabilities. (NÚCLEO DE APOIO AO TRABALHADOR, 2012, free translation[13])

[12] "A lei brasileira não faz distinção no tratamento dado aos diferentes tipos de deficientes, e isso é um grande problema, pois os níveis de deficiência são distintos, assim como sua gravidade. Não se pode tratar todos os casos da mesma forma, como se todos tivessem as mesmas capacidades".

[13] "Auxiliar de Produção – ensino fundamental completo ou incompleto, preferência por pessoas com deficiência auditiva ou física leve, de 18 a 45 anos; Auxiliar administrativo (PCD) - PCD em SAO PAULO. Vaga preferencial para deficientes auditivos. Irá

Thereby, there is a kind of pre-contractual discrimination which is a side effect of the homogeneous quota system, which segregates a group that is already marginalized - the disabled, which causes a classification into categories types of disability, which strongly violates the principle of equality.

The Law 8.213/1991, on its article 93, by establishing a minimum percentage of employment for persons with disabilities, imposing quotas that must be filled by the companies; without the State's encouragement to facilitate such policy and no specific criteria for such percentages; ignoring the reality of each business activity and the specifically reality of each person with a disability, culminates in an irrational choice of the employer, who judges the type of disability less severe, that will be more convenient for his business activity.

The ratio of the quota law is to promote a differentiated legal protection for reasons of social solidarity, which gives all disabled persons legal superiority to compensate their limitations, so they can achieve equal opportunity in the labour market (NERI, 2003, p.12). As Hugo Mazzilli asserts:

> Becomes necessary to understand that the true meaning of equality, constitutionally guaranteed, is to treat unequal differently, in that it seeks to compensate legal inequality, equalizing them into opportunities. To achieve this purpose, the law may establish special conditions for access to employment, to the benefit of the rehabilitated or disabled without that characterizes discriminatory practice, as provided in the Paragraph 4 of the Convention. 159 ILO (1996, p. 15, free translation[14]).

The principle of equality should not be applied only between disabled and non-disabled workers, but also in a deeper level, between atuar com rotinas administrativas. Conhecimentos no pacote Office. Inglês será um diferencial. Formação: Desejável possuir ensino superior em Administração; Ajudante de Produção: Salário: 4,10 p/hora + todos os benefícios. Vaga destinada a pessoas com deficiência auditiva".

---

[14] "Torna-se preciso compreender que o verdadeiro sentido da isonomia, constitucionalmente assegurada, é tratar diferentemente os desiguais, na medida em que se busque compensar juridicamente a desigualdade, igualando-os em oportunidades. Para alcançar essa finalidade, a lei pode estabelecer condições especiais de acesso ao emprego, em benefício do reabilitado ou deficiente habilitado, sem que isso caracterize norma discriminatória, conforme preceitua o art. 4º da Convenção n. 159 da OIT".

workers with disabilities, rather than to treat all types and degrees of disability at the same way, which can damage the attempt to provide better living and working conditions for persons with disabilities (FERRETTI, 2012, p. 05). The group of persons with disabilities is not homogeneous. The difference in the nature of each disability demands a different inclusive measure in order to promote the equality of opportunity in the access to the labor market. Consequently, the nature of the disability is an important factor for the development of social policies and strategies.

4 Possible alternatives: experiences on comparative law of the European Union

After verify the phenomenon of infra-discrimination, we can conclude that the homogeneous quota system, by itself, does not solve the problem of the exclusion of persons with disabilities of the formal labor market. To have the full inclusion of persons with all types of disabilities in the labor market, policies and programs in education, health, awareness and competency and vocational rehabilitation should be implemented in a coordinated manner.

However, it should be noted that currently there is no other measure that might help in a direct and almost immediate way a disabled person to access the labor market as the quota system. The system is still not ideal, but is able to introduce many disabled employees in companies, and it is the inclusion mechanism more effective at the time, considering the Brazilian context. Cibelle Goldfarb affirms that at the moment should be recognized the importance of the quota system that, despite of its problems, should be maintained (2009, p. 25).

Also in the European Union, despite the criticism, in most States, the programs based on the quota system remained as the main permanent policy in favor of the inclusion of persons with disabilities in the labor market.

However, we must consider alternative policies that must act together to prevent or reduce the phenomenon of infra-discrimination in order to build a network of articulated public policies in the areas of education, training, rehabilitation, awareness and financial support for companies. The main issue is combine elements of the quota's law with elements of economic and social stimulus.

4.1 The Combined System of Quota-Contribution

As an alternative to the homogeneous quota system there is the combined system of quota-contribution, which is based on the principle that companies have a responsibility to create favorable conditions for those persons who have a disability. This system exists in France, Germany and Austria, where companies should provide jobs for disabled, however, when this is not possible, they must donate a certain value to an institution for the training and education of persons with disabilities, compensating thereby the portion of the legal quota unfilled. The contributions can also be used to stimulate companies to fill quotas by adaptations on their industrial space and on the working tools.

This system gives awards to companies that employ a number of disabled persons above of the level required. In France, 50% of funds from contributions turn to companies as incentives for incorporating disabled persons in its workforce (GHENO; BOLIS, 2005, p. 195). Importantly, the contribution occurs as a last resort, because the priority is to employ persons with disabilities.

Such system can be considered beneficial in the long term for persons with disabilities, because despite not being hired immediately, they will have the opportunity to prepare themselves to any activity that will eventually be engage in the company. Furthermore, companies respond better to economic stimulus and punishments than legal penalties (LOPES, 2005, p. 96). According to Pastore

> The use of the quota system-contribution generates resources to improve the situation on the supplier side (the disabled to be hired) and creates incentives for the demander side (the hiring companies) (...) The combined system of quota-contribution makes a constructive interconnection between supply and demand, as it serves the needs of disabled people (in the field of qualification) and the needs of companies (in removing barriers) (2000, p.114, free translation[15])

[15] "A utilização do sistema de cota-contribuição gera recursos para melhorar a situação do lado da oferta (os portadores de deficiência a serem contratados) e cria estímulos para o lado da demanda (as empresas contratantes) (...) O sistema de cota contribuição faz uma interligação construtiva entre a oferta e demanda, na medida em que atende as necessidades dos portadores de deficiência (no campo da qualificação) e as necessidades das empresas (na remoção de barreiras)".

However, we believe that the possibility of the company not hiring people with disabilities and, in return, contribute economically to a fund of support should be discussed as an alternative limited to special cases, when that is proven the inability of the company to employ a person with disabilities. This measure should be used as a last option and should be applied with strong supervision, since it can mean the monetization of the policy of inclusion of persons with disabilities and the loss of the ratio of the protective standard, which is the performance of the labor activity by disabled, by which them can experience self-control and independence.

4.2 The sheltered system

The sheltered system is designed not only to workers with disabilities, because it aims to the working insertion of all disadvantaged workers, which means anyone who has difficulty on entering in the labor market without assistance.

This system includes persons with disabilities who are not able to get or keep a regular job in regular companies. Labour units of the sheltered system provide jobs for those with severe disabilities and prepare them for future employment in the regular labor market, providing rehabilitation services and employment training. The sheltered system provides employment to about 500,000 people across the European Union and exists in Sweden, Belgium, France, Spain, Italy and Scotland (GHENO; BOLIS, 2005, p. 196).

Labour units of the sheltered system can be inside the structure of companies or in special separated centers. The units that operate in the very structure of the company, entering in the competitive market and acting locally, are those with greater economic and social outcomes.

In Spain and France there are special care centers of employment and work and in Italy the social cooperatives perform an important role in this system. The Italian social cooperatives are created and administered by the government and fight against specific forms of exclusion towards not only persons with disabilities, but also ethnic minorities, drug addicts and other groups considered disadvantaged.

Besides the social cooperatives, the sheltered system in Italy involves sheltered workshops, which are autonomous units exclusively for persons with disabilities that are not directly administered by the government. The economic operator of these sheltered workshops should be a legal entity in accordance with the law that operates in a stable economic organized activity; must show that the integration of disabled persons is one of the goals of the institution; should have the most of its own workers with severe disabilities that not allow them to exercise a professional activity under normal conditions.

The percentage of job abandonment in this system is very low, since people with disabilities feel safe in such jobs because they receive physical and psychological care without suffering the economic pressure which exists in an ordinary job. However, it should be noted that such organizations also have competition rules, because they attempt to reproduce an environment as close as possible of the working life of regular companies. For this reason, according to the decision of the European Court of Justice (Betray case 344/87), people with disabilities who work in Labour units of the sheltered system acquire the status of employees (GHENO; BOLIS, 2005, p. 197).

This system could be efficient against infra-discrimination, since it allows persons with severe disabilities to work. Nevertheless, this system also must be used with caution, since it may cause a permanent isolation and segregation of persons with certain types of disabilities who do not experience socialization in the regular work environment, which is why the units that operate inside structure of the company are those with greater economic and social outcomes.

4.3 The heterogeneous quota system

In Belgium, the legal homogeneous quota system is deeply criticized:

> The government believes that the system contradicts the philosophy that preaches supremacy of acceptance and reintegration of disabled persons in normal life. The authorities argue that coercive measures generate negative psychological effects to employers, to persons with disabilities and coworkers (PASTORE, 2000, p. 234, free translation[16])

The policy adopted by the State does not consist in set homogeneous quotas, but set rules for the establishment of quotas, which means there are no rules that establish percentages for companies, the quotas for each sector are established between government representatives, trade unions, employers and such shares may only be filled by those who are enrolled in their programs of disabled funds support.

[16] "O governo considera que o sistema contraria a filosofia que prega a supremacia da aceitação e reintegração dos portadores de deficiência na vida normal. As autoridades argumentam que medidas coercitivas geram efeitos psicológicos negativos para os empregadores, portadores de deficiência e colegas de trabalho".

This policy could be interesting against infra-discrimination, because it represents a local act of collaboration for the establishment of specific quotas for each sector, analyzing the type and risk of business activity, as well as the worker's type of disability.

However, for such policy to be effective, must be ensured conditions for a fair and equal debate among the representatives, in order to set a balanced percentage of quotas in each sector. Moreover, this policy must be followed by a program of social awareness inside the companies, which still mostly consider the worker with disabilities as a cost and not as an investment.

4.4 The State as a social co-responsible

It is observed in many European countries the existence of a philosophy which complements the traditional homogeneous quota system by a "support network" in order to educate, train, rehabilitate, inform, mediate and create incentives to introduce and retain persons with disabilities in the labor market. The isolated application of the homogeneous quota system is inefficient, generating infra-discrimination. The quota system should be coordinated with awards, subsidies and benefits provided by the State.

In France, there is a network of programs of stimulus and government subsidies for employers to carry out those policies of inclusion of disabled persons in the labor market: the objective is to transfer resources from public funds to companies to develop an environment suitable to this worker. From 1987, large companies were encouraged to develop integrated programs covering training, rehabilitation and retention and those which adopt this system are free of payment of the quota-contribution mentioned above. In Spain, the State assists in the recruitment of persons with disabilities, promotes tributaries deductions and provides resources for adapting the physical work environment.

As already mentioned, some equipment that workers with certain kinds of disabilities require have a high cost and this is one of the reasons that may lead companies to hire only workers who have mild disabilities that do not require many adaptations to perform regular duties. One of the possible ways for these costs being reduced is by loans provided by the government, with low interest rates, specific for the purchase of this equipment.

Another suggestion to curb infra-discrimination is the possibility of exemption of taxes on such equipment to facilitate their purchase by these companies. This initiative, already under study by the secretariats of the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and Finance of São Paulo, has application planned for the second half of this year. The idea is to define a minimum list of goods and allow businesses and independent professionals with disabilities acquire them free of taxes, serving as an incentive to hire persons who have certain types of disabilities. The list of products that may be benefit from this exemption has not yet been drafted. Among the possibilities are screen readers, scanners for the visually impaired, special printers to print text into braille and electronic devices to assist persons with difficulty to handle papers and documents. Furthermore, if the company has its tax burden relieved certainly passes this benefit to consumers, reflecting on the decrease in the price of the product or service.

5 Conclusion

The mere imposition of the obligation on hiring persons with disabilities through the homogeneous quotas system, applied isolatedly, without the articulation of education policies; without the analysis of the reality of each business activity and without the State encouragement regarding the adequacy of the physical industrial space, causes the phenomenon of infra-discrimination, which is a kind of pre-contractual discrimination caused by the employer's choice, who has a preference for that candidate with a disability less severe and more viable to the company, which means, the disability that requires lower social adaptation or business investment .

According to the British social theory of disability, we can also affirm that the phenomenon of infra - discrimination is a result not only of the absence of adapted tools and structures in companies, but also as a consequence of the interaction between people and their behavior in the workplace.

We had concluded that the quota homogeneous system, by itself, does not solve the problem of the exclusion of persons with disabilities in the formal labor market. To have a full inclusion is necessary to complement the homogeneous system of quotas with a " support network " that would act to educate , train , rehabilitate , inform, mediate and create incentives to enter , retain and replace the disabled in the labor market , and once inserted , provide them assistance.

It was mentioned in this article some additional systems that have been adopted in Europe, as the combined system of quota-contribution, the sheltered system, the heterogeneous quota system and some State mechanisms of incentives that can transform the State into a social co-responsible in the inclusion of persons with *all types of disabilitie*s in the labor market, which can serve as an example to Brazil.

However, it should be noted that currently there is no other measure that might help in immediate way a disabled person to access the labor market as the quota system. The system is still not ideal, but is able to introduce many disabled employees in companies, and it is the inclusion mechanism more effective at the time, considering the Brazilian context.

References

ANTUNES, Ricardo, 2009. Os Sentidos do Trabalho: Ensaio sobre a afirmação e a negação do trabalho, São Paulo: Ed. Boitempo.

FERRETTI, Amanda Teixeira Silva, 2012. O mercado de trabalho para deficientes visuais nas empresas privadas a partir da Constituição. [viewed 17 September 2012]. Available from: http://jus.com.br/artigos/22468/o-mercado-de-trabalho-para-os-deficientes-visuais-nas-empresas-privadas-a-partir-da-constituicao

GHENO, Stefano; BOLIS, Antonio, 2005. Il lavoro diverso. Per una nuova politica di inserimenti delle persone disabili, Milano: Ed. Guerini e Associati.

GOÉS, Maurício de Carvalho, BUBLITZ, Michelle Dias, 2010. Breves Comentários acerca da inclusão social dos portadores de deficiência através do cumprimento da lei de cotas. Porto Alegre: Revista da Justiça do Trabalho.

GOLDFARB, Cibelle Linero, 2009. Pessoas Portadoras de Deficiência e a Relação de Emprego - O Sistema de Cotas no Brasil. Curitiba: Ed. Juruá.

GRAMMENOS, Stefanos. 1995. Disabled Persons. Statistical Data. Eurostat, Theme 3, Population and Social Conditions, Brussels, Ed. Centre for European Social and Economic Policy (CESEP), Statistical Office of European Communities.

HARLAN, S.L; ROBERT, P.M, 1998.The social Construction of disability in organizations: why employers resist reasonable accommodation, Arizona. Work and occupation, 25 (4), pp. 397-435

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION (ILO), ILO Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention (No. 159) and Recommendation (No. 168), Geneva, 1983.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION (ILO), IL*O Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation (No. 99)*, Geneva, 1955.

LIMENA, Francesca, 1996. L' accesso al lavoro dei disabili, Milano. Ed. CEDAM.

LOPES, Glaucia Gomes Vergara, 2005. A Inserção do Portador de Deficiência no Mercado de Trabalho: A Efetividade das Leis Brasileiras, São Paulo, Ed. LTr.

LUKÁCS, Gyorgy. The Ontology of Social Being: Labour: London, Merlin Press In: ANTUNES, Ricardo, 2009. Os Sentidos do Trabalho: Ensaio sobre a afirmação e a negação do trabalho, São Paulo. Ed. Boitempo.

MAIA, Luiz Fernando, 2008. A cota de deficientes físicos,visuais,auditivos e mentais nas empresas – Inconsistências de Inconstitucionalidades do decreto nº5.926/2004, Porto Alegre, Revista IOB trabalhista e previdenciária, 19, (225), pp.34-46.

MAZZILLI, Hugo Nigro, 1996. A pessoa portadora de deficiência e o Ministério Público, em Direitos das pessoas portadoras de deficiência, São Paulo, Ed. Saraiva.

NERI, Marcelo Cortez, 2003. Política de cotas no mercado de trabalho para pessoas com deficiência.VIII Encontro Nacional da Associação Brasileira de Estudos do Trabalho – ABET, São Paulo, Ed. Revista da ABET.

Núcleo de Apoio ao Trabalhador, 2012. Anúncios de emprego [viewed 15 July 2012]. Available from: empregos.jangadeiroonline.com.br/vagas-para-deficientes/nucleo-de-apoio-ao-trabalhador-oferta-vagas-de-emprego-para-pessoas-com-deficiencia

OLIVEIRA, Sebastião Geraldo, 2000. Proteção Jurídica ao Trabalho de Pessoas com Deficiência em Discriminação, Coord. Márcio Túlio Viana e Luiz Otávio Linhares Renault, fSão Paulo. Ed. LTr.

PEZZUTTO, Ana Carolina, 2012. *Os desafios da inclusão de deficientes intelectuai*s [viewed 15 May 2012]. Available from: http://exame.abril.com.br/brasil.noticia/os-desafios-da-inclusao-de-deficientes-intelectuais.

ROLLI, Cláudia, 2013. São Paulo estuda incentivo para incluir deficiente [viewed 18 april 2012]. Available from: http://www.deficienteonline.com.br/sp-estuda-incentivo-para-incluir deficiente.htm

SILVA, Walkure Lopes Ribeiro, 1997. Seguridade Social e a Pessoa Portadora de Deficiência, in Direitos da Pessoa Portadora de Deficiência, São Paulo, Coleção Advocacia Pública e Sociedade (IBAP), Ed. Max Limonard.

UNITED NATIONS (UN), – United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, 1975.

The Pension Fund as an additional labour and pension instrument for promoting social inclusion in the Democratic Rule-of-Law State[1]

Érica Fernandes Teixeira[2]

1. Initial Comments

Private pensions were institutionalised in Brazil during the military regime, under the government of Pres. Ernesto Geisel, with the enactment of Law No. 6,435, in July 1977. After this initial milestone, the market for private pensions was very much expanded, and these activities started to be controlled and governed by the State. Before that, the institutions operated without any kind of state control, operating in isolation. The Private Pension System was thus officially born in our country, with provisions being made setting a time frame for the regulation of the existing institutions.

In the terms of Article 4 of Law No. 6,435 of 1977[3], Private Pensions were divided into open pension institutions and closed entities, depending on the institutions' relationship to the respective participants. The closed institutions of private pensions have been given the name of Pension Funds. Originally, these were exclusively for the use of the employees of a given company or group of companies, known as sponsors. The other institutions fell within the category of open pension institutions. Decree No. 81240 of 24/01/1978 defined the aforesaid closed entities, in its Article 1.

Since their creation, the open pension institutions have always offered individual pension plans made available to anyone. However, as mentioned in Article 26 of Complementary Law 109 of 29/05/2001, they also offered group plans, seeking to offer pension benefits to individual people who are directly or indirectly linked to a hiring Corporation.

[1] TEIXEIRA, Érica Fernandes.

[2]Doctor and Master in Law from the Pontifical Catholic University of Minas Gerais; Professor of Law and Labour Lawsuits (IEC/ PUC/MG). Professor at the University of Brasília (UnB). Solicitor.

[3] Repealed by Complementary Law No. 109, of 29.5.2001.

The benchmark of evolution of complementary pensions was established after Constitutional Amendment No.20, of 1998, which included the private pension regime within the social order chapter of the Constitution of the Federative Republic of Brazil. In Brazil, this private regime became part of the pension system, as a complement to own regimes and the general pension system.

Constitutional Amendment No. 20/1998 changed the wording of Article 202 of the Federal Constitution as passed in 1988. The scope of the constitutional regulation laid bare the relevance of the issue, and also showed the main guiding principles behind Private Pensions, also bringing them under state control. For this reason:

> even though there is contractual freedom in the private pension system, the constitutional accessory side ends up subjecting the private model (impregnated by the judicial institutes of Private Law) to the forecasts and changes as enforced by the Government.[4]

This regulation, as set out in the header of the previously mentioned Article 202 of the Federal Constitution, was implemented by Complementary Law No. 109, while the regulation of Paragraphs 3 to 6 was the object of Complementary Law No. 108, with both these Complementary Laws having been passed into law on 29/05/2001, thereby repealing Law No. 6,435/77.Article 31 of Complementary Law 109/2001 makes the following definition:

> Article 31. Closed institutions are those which, in the manner set out by the regulatory body and inspection organisation, are available exclusively:
> I –to the employees of a certain company or group of companies, and for servers of the Federal Government, States and Municipalities, as also of the Federal District, these being institutions known as sponsors;
> II – to associations or members of professional, class or sectorial institutions, known as institutors.
> According to the teachings of Wladimir Novaes Martinez, "The main characteristics of Complementary Pensions, as listed below, allow us to establish the essence and the scope of such pensions, > compatible with the reality of this protective social instrument: optional characteristic, accessory function, solidarity, and individual or group savings, private option, as well as its characteristic of being an institutional source of investment.[5]

[4] WEINTRAUB, Arthur Bragança de Vasconcellos. Previdência Privada:doutrina e jurisprudência. [Private Pensions: Doctrine and Jurisprudence]. São Paulo: Quartier Latin, 2005, page 75.

Complementary Law No. 108/2001 shall be highlighted for its role of democratisation of such Funds. This is because it regulated the participation of the quota holders at the Funds, thereby setting the parity on the Board of Directors and the Tax Board, that is, between representatives of the sponsor and the participants thus receiving assistance, in line with Articles 11 and 15 of Complementary Law (CL) No. 108/2001.

The study of the closed Private Pension entities, often simply called Pension Funds, as additional instruments of social and economic inclusion within the capitalist system has proved to be essential. Considering the significant growth which these institutions have achieved, it was possible to progress from a situation of paltry savings back in the 1970s to a mammoth volume of R$ 537.04 billion at the end of 2010, and this only considering Pension Funds, which account for 14.6% of the Brazilian Gross Domestic Product (GDP).[6] Even so, this growth is still somewhat timid, especially compared with developed countries, where the asset ratio exceeds 100% in many cases. This fact shows the sheer and as yet untapped potential for the growth of such institutions in Brazil, in line with a series of incentive measures which the Brazilian Government has adopted as from the year 2003.

The portfolio managed by Brazilian pension funds has advanced 15% per year on average over the last 10 years, having posted the best performance out of all the leading markets in this segment. The segment of closed complementary pensions in the country is now well consolidated and this is well proven by the way the market behaved during the crisis experienced in 2008.

2. Pension Funds: main characteristics

As mentioned before, Pension Funds are exclusively for the employees or a company or a group of companies, as also for employees of the Federal Government, Federal District, States and Municipalities, or also associates or members of professional, class or sectorial corporate bodies.

[5] MARTINEZ, Wladimir Novaes. Primeiras lições de previdência complementar. [First lessons in complementary pensions] São Paulo: LTr, 1996. p. 33.

[6] Available at: http://www.mpas.gov.br/arquivos/office/4_110408-152746-030.pdf. Accessed on 01/07/2012, at 1720 hours.

Article 2 of Decree No. 4206/2002, repealed by Decree No. 4,942 of 30/12/2003, includes the definitions of sponsors and institutors, which are still valid. This means that a sponsor is defined as company or group of companies, the Federal Government, Federal District, States and Municipalities, their mixed-capital companies, foundations, joint stock companies and other public institutions that offer their employees or collaborators a pension benefit plan through a closed society. An Institutor is a Corporation of professional, class or sectorial type, that sets up a pension benefit plan for its associates or members.[7]

Article 1 of Complementary Law No. 109/2001 sets the same principles as outlined in Article 202 of the Federal Constitution of Brazil, namely: the merely complementary character of the private regime and also this regime's independence in relation to the official Government Pension Scheme (Previdência Social). Thus, they stress the fact that participation is optional, and also the need to establish reserves that ensure the concession of the benefits. According to Weintraub:

> The judicial nature of Private Pensions is based on its complementary nature and also the optional nature of pensions, within the scope of social protection. It can be said that the judicial relationship in private pension plans develops through a contract based on succession, randomness and participation, thus being an equity mutual of consumption. Private pension plans shall be governed, within legal criteria, by the principle of certain rights, which can be easily proven by means of the contractual documents.[8]

Pension Funds do not seek profit, and are established under the form of a foundation or a civil society.[9] To be established and start op-

---

[7] Article 2 of Decree No. 4206/2002. Available at: http://www.planalto.gov.br/ccivil_03/decreto/2002/D4206a.htm. Accessed on 20/07/2012, at 1430 hours.

[8]WEINTRAUB, Arthur Bragança de Vasconcellos. Previdência privada – doutrina e jurisprudência. [Private Pensions: Doctrine and Jurisprudence] São Paulo: Quartier Latin, 2005, p.46.

[9]Non-Profit Civil Societies ceased to exist with the Brazilian Civil Code of 2002, also having to be adapted to the new rules within one year, as according to Article 2031 of this document.However, MPS/SPC Directive No. 2, of January 2004, exempted pension institutions from the changes, due to the specificity of CL 108 and CL 109/2001. In:

erating, the private pension institution needs to get authorisation in advance from the Government (Article 33, I and 38, I of CL 109/2001)

Different from the case of open entities, that can also carry out other economic activities, provided they are accessory in nature, the pension funds seek exclusively the management and execution of pension benefits plans, except health services, provided these were already available as at 30/05/2001, on publication of CL No. 109, as established in Article 76.

As mentioned in Article 14 of Complementary Law No. 109/2001, the benefits of Pension Funds shall offer a deferred proportional benefit due to the ending of the relationship of employment with the sponsor or associative with the institutor, before acquiring the right to full benefits, to be granted as soon as the eligibility requirements are met. This is the process called vesting, in which the participant gets a benefit proportional to what would be due, for having stopped their contributions in specific cases, such as unemployment.[10]

The funding of complementary pension plans for closed institutions is made through contributions from the participants (workers who decide to take part), those assisted (dependents of the workers, who may also join the plan) and the sponsor (employer). According to Weintraub, "the contribution of the company is a form of encouragement for the employees, who may maintain their current standard of living when not actively working."[11]

To understand the dynamics behind Pension Funds, one must present the core concepts of the PAYG regime and also the capitalisation regime.

In PAYG (Pay As You Go) regimes there is an agreement between generations, with solidarity prevailing between the participants. The active insurees pay the benefits for the inactive ones. Thus, the payment of your own benefits depends on future generation, which means the entry of new workers into the pension system, in order to keep the pact between the generations. This regime can be found in the benefit plan

---

IBRAHIM, Fábio Zambitte. Curso de Direito Previdenciário. [Course in Pension Law] 17th edition. Rio de Janeiro: Impetus. 2012. page 778.

[10] IBRAHIM, Fábio Zambitte. Idem. page 782.

[11] WEINTRAUB, Arthur Bragança de Vasconcellos. Previdência Privada. Atual conjuntura e sua função complementar ao regime geral da previdência social.[Private Pensions: The current situation and its function as a complemente to the general Government pension regime] 2nd edition. São Paulo: Juarez de Oliveira, 2003. page106.

as defined.[12]

In capitalisation regimes, each generation makes reserves to finance their individual benefits. Workers themselves, during their active lives, generate the funds that are necessary to cover the value of their retirement. Capitalisation occurs in the plans where there is a fixed contribution.[13]

The criticism that has been received by the capitalisation regime says that it is not considered a pension plan, but rather a financial investment. Thus, they feel that the whole responsibility and risk regarding retirement and financial security of the family is transferred to the worker himself or herself.

Practical results have shown major success in the publicity of pension funds, having imparted upon wild capitalism a process of humanisation, taming and general cleansing, as we shall show later on in this work.[14]

Article 16 of Complementary Law No. 109/2001 states that the plans must be offered to all participants. However, participation must not be forced either by the sponsor or the institutor, as participation is optional.

3. Pension Funds as additional instruments for social and economic inclusion within the capitalist system

[12] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo?[The Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: a cleaning up of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page209.

[13] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo?[The Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: a cleaning up of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page209.

[14] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo?[The Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: a cleaning up of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page210.

The policies for the creation and management of Pension Funds, which have become established as a key issue of Government interest, as well as that of trade unions and trade union associations, particularly within the banking and electricity segments, characterise what has been called the "cleansing and/or taming of capitalism", as they tend to invest sums arising from speculation in productive activities, that could generate jobs and income for the workers.[15]

In this regard: "The social inclusion projects during the two terms of former president Lula have always involved the market: microcredit, the Popular Bank of Brazil, and particularly Pension Funds, are some examples of this fact."[16]

The heavy volume of financial resources handled by institutional investors have made these people become leading players in the financing of the economy and in setting rules for corporate management. For this reason, quoting Plihon, Jardim states that: "Institutional investors such as Pension Funds have become the strongest operators in both national and foreign markets, and are regarded as key players in what has been called 'new capitalism'."[17]

This means a new version for the capitalist system, bringing a (re)significance of the concepts of work, of the social, of the State, seeking their social niche within the changes and complexities of modern society."[18]In the contemporary capitalist system, Pension Funds have

[15] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo?[The Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: a cleaning up of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page 199.

[16] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo?[The Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: a cleaning up of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page 199.

[17] PLIHON, Dominique. Le noveaucapitalisme. [The New Capitalism] Paris: Le Découvert, 2003. In: JARDIM, Maria A. Chaves. Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] In: JARDIM, Maria A. Chaves.A natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page 13.

[18] JARDIM, Maria A. Chaves .Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.

taken on a key role, defining the new social players. Following the logic behind corporate governance[19], through these institutions, even the minor shareholders have become owner shareholders of many companies. In those cases where the Funds are majority shareholders, the control is even tighter. Thus, "through the logic of corporate governance, the Pension Funds have disciplinary power and also the power to carry out surveillance of the companies, being their main creditors."[20]Thus, the author continues:

> [...] governance changes the essential data for sharing of income, division of social classes of capitalism, and also social roles of capitalism and of the worker. Through the logic of the shareholders' capitalism, if the Funds control the companies then, at least in theory, it is the workers who control the company, as this is a case of workers' savings. In this sense, corporate government rethinks the role of the capitalist and also of the workers.[21]

Here we see a strong link between Pension Funds and the issue of social and economic inclusion in plural societies. This makes clear the strengthening of real democratic instruments, which agree with several

---

[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] In: JARDIM, Maria A. Chaves.A natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page 14.

[19]According to the Brazilian Institute for Corporate Governance: "Corporate Governanceis a system throughwhichsocieties are managed and monitored, involvingrelationshipsbetween Quota Holders/Shareholders, Board of Directors, Directors, IndependentAuditors and TaxCommittee. Best practices of corporategovernanceseek to increase the value of the society, makingaccess to capital easier, and contributing to the survival of the Corporation". Available at: http://www.ibgc.org.br. Accessed on 18/07/2012, at 1623 hours.

[20] JARDIM, Maria A. Chaves. Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites. [The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] In: JARDIM, Maria A. Chaves.A natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page 20.

[21] JARDIM, Maria A. Chaves. Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites. [The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] In: JARDIM, Maria A. Chaves.A natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites.[The Social Nature of Finance: Pension funds, trade unions and the recomposition of the elites] Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. page 20.

institutions for worker protection, which are part of Labour Law, especially defensive principles, which are part of this branch of Law. The empowerment of the worker, making him or her an active citizen within the company and with a better salary, is a valuable result obtained with the creation and development of Pension Funds in our country.

Domeneghetti[22]states the importance of Pension Funds and also lists factors that stress the role of these institutions. Among these, he lists the limit on the cap on Government pensions and also changes to the minimum age to seek retirement through the official Government pension system, the INSS. He also stresses the strong regulations to which pension funds have been subjected. About this strong regulatory action, he continues:

> [...] with the limitation of fixed-income investments, variable-income investments, derivatives, real estate, stakes in companies, and operations involving participants and people assisted, also considering that these regulations are being implemented by the majority of Pension Funds (EFPCs), having an influence on the financial management and mobility thereof. These factors are restrictive, but ensure greater strength to the system as a whole and reduce occurrences of actuarial deficits and breaches of contract that could hinder the establishment of the new EFPCs – Pension Funds. especially in the institutor segment (corporate persons of professional, class or sectorial nature).[23]

The author also mentions that the strength of the system firmly rejects non-compliance with contracts, as was the case with the insolvency of AERUS, which was the pension fund of now-defunct Brazilian airlines VARIG, CRUZEIRO and TRANSBRASIL, and which did not honour its commitments regarding top-ups of retirement pensions and also payment of other pensions to the airline workers. During the 1970s, the MONTEPIOS (charity institutions and private institutions of voluntary participation to provide small loans on terms more favourable than those of the market) also went bankrupt.[24]

[22] DOMENEGHETTI, Valdir. Previdência complementar: gestão financeira dos Fundos de pensão. [Complementary Pensions: financial management of pension funds] Ribeirão Preto, SP: Inside Books, 2009. page 3.

[23]DOMENEGHETTI, Valdir. Previdência complementar: gestão financeira dos Fundos de pensão. [Complementary Pensions: financial management of pension funds] Ribeirão Preto, SP: Inside Books, 2009. page 3.

According to the author, the increase in the population's life expectancy means a need to use new mortality tables.[25] In this way, to avoid future deficits, as a result of greater need to amass sufficient capital to cover the increase in actuarial liabilities, there is a need to change the investment policy, seeking profitability above the actuarial target as an alternative to increased contributions from participants and people assisted. Because of all this, it is relevant to adapt the method of management and cash flows to the degree of maturity of the EFPCs – Pension Funds. In this regard, the more mature pension funds (whose inactive participants outnumber the active ones)should prioritise investments that generate present cash flow to honour the increasing volume of disbursements. On the other hand, in the case of non-mature Pension Funds, there should be priority for long-term investments with greater return on investment, seeking to exceed the actuarial target. In this way, it is possible to generate larger volumes of cash flow in the future, or increase the value of the benefits to be paid, or even bring about a reduction in monthly cost contributions. All these measures bring benefits for the participant and for the person assisted, and therefore strengthen the Pension Funds.[26]

Previ, which is the pension fund for employees of the Bank of Brazil, is the largest pension fund in the country. It was in 24th place

[24]DOMENEGHETTI, Valdir. Previdência complementar: gestãofinanceira dos Fundos de pensão. [Complementary Pensions: financial management of pension funds] Ribeirão-Preto, SP: Inside Books, 2009. page 3.

[25]According to data of the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics (IBGE) about the mortality table, "in 2010, the life expectancy at birth in Brazil was 73.48 years (73 years, 5 months and 24 days), which is an increase of 0.31 years (3 months and 22 days) compared with 2009, and 3.03 years (3 years and 10 days) compared with the indicator for the year 2000.With the increased life expectancy among Brazilians, there shall be an average reduction of 0.42% in the value of the benefit for workers who retire as from 1/12. This is because the Complete Mortality Tables from Brazil are used by the Ministry for Pensions as one of the parameters to establish the pension factor, when calculating the pensions of retired people within the general Regime of Social Pensions." This data reflects the importance that pension funds have been taking on as part of the maintenance of the standards of living of the citizens above the limit of the INSS in their retirement years. Available at: http://www.ibge.gov.br/home/estatistica/populacao/tabuadevida/2010/default.shtm, Accessed on 23/07/2012, at 2034 hours.

[26] DOMENEGHETTI, Valdir. Previdência complementar: gestãofinanceira dos Fundos de pensão. [Complementary Pensions: financial management of pension funds] Ribeirão-Preto, SP: Inside Books, 2009. page 4.

in the whole world, with over 190 thousand participants. In 2011, the payment of benefits to more than 88 thousand retired people and pensioners from Previ came to R$ 9.04 billion, which was the greatest sum already paid by the institution in one single business year.[27]The growth sustained by PREVI, when compared with the list published in 2010, referring to the business year of 2009, was 12.6%, which means an increase of over US$ 10 billion. With assets of more than R$ 155 billion, this pension fund is nearly three times the size of Petros, the pension fund of national oil company Petrobras, which is the second largest foundation in the country with assets of R$ 58 billion.[28] Here we point out that this advancement was achieved with contributions of participants and sponsor having been suspended since 2007, and also the fact that Plan 1 was mature and going through a period of increased payment of benefits. Last year also saw a record number of sign-ups to the Previ Futuro plan, with the percentage of participation in the Plan exceeding 93%. Previ is present in the most important Brazilian companies, such as mining company Vale, and also has a majority stake in meat-processing company Perdigão, as well as being the Pension Fund with largest investments on the stock market. In addition, this Pension Fund is the owner of, and partner in, several major real estate developments in Brazil. The fund was set up back in 1904, before the implementation of the Brazilian Government pension system. Previ handles resources which essentially come from personal and employer contributions, as well as other special complementary contributions as set out in their statutes.[29]

5. Final Comments:

The pension market is undergoing rapid expansion. We can see that the transactions involving Pension Fund cash has boosted the capitals market, making these institutions important institutional investors in the country.

Brazil manages some 369 pension funds, offered by Government and private companies to their employees and also by associations, handling a total asset worth of R$ 460 billion, which corresponds to 18% of the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) in Brazil, according to information supplied by the Brazilian Association of Closed Pension Institutions – ABRAPP.[30]The sums managed by Complementary Pensions edged up by 14.7% in 2010, which is the largest growth among the thirteen largest markets in the world, according to the study by the name of*Global Pension Assets Study 2011*,of the responsibility of Towers Watson. The study also showed that, last year, the asset holdings of the thirteen largest industrial companies in the world had an average rise of 12% compared with the previous year, meaning a total volume of US$ 26.49 trillion on a world scale. Since the year 2000, Private Pension assets have already risen by 66%, in 2010 reaching a level equivalent to 76% of the world's Gross Domestic Product (GDP), compared with 71% in 2009 and 61% in 2008.[31]

[27]Available at: http://www.previ.com.br/portal/page?_pageid=57,1915440&_dad=portal&_schema=PORTAL. Accessed on 23/07/2012, at 1708 hours.

[28]Available at: http://www.valor.com.br/financas/2675686/previ-e-um-Fundo-de-pensao-como-nenhum-outro#ixzz21fPuxxX4Accessed on 23/07/2012, at 1810 hours.

[29] Data available at: ttps://conteudoclippingmp.planejamento.gov.br/cadastros/noticias/2012/5/26/ricardo-flores-deixa-o-comando-da-previ/ Accessed on 24/07/2012, at 0913 hours.

Here we see the growing importance of these funds on the world scene, particularly in Brazil. The number of Brazilians who would benefit by the system reaches a level around 8 million, distributed between participants, dependents, and the people who are given assistance.[32]They have an important social role, as they supply a top-up to the sum which is the cap of INSS pensions, to preserve the quality of life and well-being of citizens linked to them. They act as real instruments for the perpetuation of socioeconomic affirmation – made possible by Labour Law during the worker's active life. For this reason, in the periods of inactivity, Pension Funds are financial props seeking to make sure that the citizens have worthy standards of living. They are, therefore, members of the Pension Law System that reproduce the protective aims that are inherent to Labour Law.

In relation to the companies that participate in a Pension Fund, one cannot deny the fact that they take on a distinctive threshold, showing their social role in the fullest possible manner. According to Eros Roberto Grau, the idea of the social function gives the property "a specific content, thus moulding a new concept."[33]In addition, Pension Funds are, for [30] Available at: http://www12.senado.gov.br/noticias/entenda-o-assunto/Fundos-de-pensao. Accessed on 23/07/2012, at 1823 hours.

[31] Available at: http://www.abrapp.org.br/Lists/Revista/VisualizarConteudo.aspx-?ID=523. Accessed on 23/07/2012, at 1345 hours.

[32] Available at: http://www12.senado.gov.br/noticias/entenda-o-assunto/fundos-de-pensao. Accessed on 23/07/2012,at 18:23 hs.

[33] GRAU, Eros Roberto. A ordemEconômicanaConstituição de 1988. [The economic or-companies, valuable instruments within the human resources policy. In this regard:

> This is the case, for example, with companies related to research into high technology, in which there is an evident and highly justifiable effort, not only to attract talents but also to make efforts to retain them. In general, we assume that companies of this nature wish to encourage long-term contracts, as they invest in training and incur high costs to terminate a contract, as well as adverse effects on productivity when a worker leaves the company, as production depends on a well-structured team. For this reason, a benefit such as a complementary pension may have an important impact on the policies that seek such results. Thus, a simple decision by the company about the implementation of a complementary pension plan could define, for example, if the company shall hire younger workers and get them to retire sooner or if, as an optional method, they encourage the workers not to stay with the company for too long a period.[34]

Also for the companies, quoting Flávio Rabelo, says Denise Delboni, the advantages of participating in a Pension Fund are the following:

> a) keeping the company competitive in relation to the labour market, b) advantages in the attraction of qualified personnel, c) retainment of qualified personnel, d) remuneration strategy and e) a reward system, rewarding longer periods with the company.[35]

---

der in the 1988 Constitution] 3rd Edition. São Paulo: Malheiros Editores, 1997. P. 249.

[34] DELBONI, Denise Poiani. A Previdência ComplementarcomoInstrumento da Política de RecursosHumanos: EstudoemEmpresas do SetorFarmacêutico [Complementary Pensions as an Instrument of Human Resources Policies: A Study of Pharmaceutical Companies]. 2003. 225 f. Thesis (Doctorate in Business Management) - EAESP –Business Administration School of São Paulo, Getúlio Vargas Foundation. São Paulo. 2003. p. 43.

[35] RABELO, Flavio M. Perspectivas de expansão da previdênciaprivadafechada no Brasil. [Prospects for Growth of closed private pension schemes in Brazil]. In: RAE - Revista de Administração de Empresas, São Paulo, v. 40, n. 4, pages 56-69, Oct./Dec.2000. In: DELBONI, Denise Poiani. A Previdência ComplementarcomoInstrumento da Política de RecursosHumanos: EstudoemEmpresas do SetorFarmacêutico [Complementary Pensions as an Instrument of Human Resources Policies: A Study of Pharmaceutical Companies]. 2003. 225 f. Thesis (Doctorate in Business Management) - EAESP – Business Administration School of São Paulo, Getúlio Vargas Foundation. São Paulo. 2003. p. 70.

Apart from these advantages, companies tend to humanise their human resources policies, on creating, for example, conditions so that older employees may retire as soon as possible, thereby allowing the renewal of the workforce in an organised and rational way, thus generating new job openings.[36]

In terms of the employees, the results are also positive:

> Thus, in theory, the employees who are most satisfied with their benefits shall be most likely to have a greater commitment with the company, seeing their benefits not only as part of the remuneration policy but, most importantly, as a contribution towards security in the future.[37]

Apart from getting better retirement pensions, the employees also benefit with the Pension Funds for obtaining credit on more attractive terms. Thus:

> There are also studies confirming that credits obtained as a result of the existence of a Pension Fund become more significant during periods of recession, when the real salaries and job opportunities decline, showing that the associate members manage, during these periods, to get better rates to which other people would not be entitled.[38]

---

[36] DELBONI, Denise Poiani.A Previdência Complementar como Instrumento da Política de Recursos Humanos: Estudo em Empresas do Setor Farmacêutico [Complementary Pensions as anInstrument of HumanResources Policies: A Study of Pharmaceutical-Companies]. 2003. 225 f. Thesis (Doctorate in Business Management) - EAESP –Business Administration School of São Paulo, Getúlio Vargas Foundation. São Paulo. 2003. p. 70.

[37] DELBONI, Denise Poiani.A Previdência Complementar como Instrumento da Política de Recursos Humanos: Estudo em Empresas do Setor Farmacêutico [Complementary Pensions as anInstrument of HumanResources Policies: A Study of Pharmaceutical-Companies]. 2003. 225 f. Thesis (Doctorate in Business Management) - EAESP –Business Administration School of São Paulo, Getúlio Vargas Foundation. São Paulo. 2003. p. 62.

[38] Dutton, Gail. Benefits soften up, HR Focus, New York, vol.75, issue 11, p. S9-S10. Nov.1998. p.10. In: DELBONI, Denise Poiani. A Previdência Complementar como Instrumento da Política de Recursos Humanos: Estudo em Empresas do Setor Farmacêutico [Complementary Pensions as anInstrument of HumanResources Policies: A Study of PharmaceuticalCompanies]. 2003. 225 f. Thesis (Doctorate in Business Management) - EAESP –Business Administration School of São Paulo, Getúlio Vargas Foundation. São Paulo. 2003. p. 70.

It is therefore possible to say that Pension Funds bring about domestication, moralisation and the humanisation of capitalism.[39]For this reason:

> The prevailing logic is that of using Pension Funds in social projects for the nation, and transform the funds arising from high interest rates and speculation into productive capital which can bring employment and income. The negation of 'wild capitalism' is therefore made quite clear.[40]

Even for the trade unions and institutions representing professional categories, Pension Funds have shown themselves to be important. It cannot be denied that the establishment of a benefits plan brings the worker closer to his or her representative institution. For this reason, it is possible to say that this approximation leads to a path for the strengthening of trade unions and also reinforcement of group conscience. According to the teachings of Maria Chaves Jardim:

> Backed up by the discourse of corporate governance, social responsibility and ethical investment, democratic management of the Funds, protection of workers' savings and the fight against capitalism, using their own weapons, the Brazilian trade unionists have taken the legitimacy accumulated in the labour space over to the financial sphere. For this, they have struck up a dialogue with the elites in the financial field and also with those of the political area. The arguments they have defended in these dialogues is that they are morally legitimate in the management and protection of workers' savings.[41]

---

[39]Characteristicsassigned by Maria A. Chaves Jardim. In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo? [Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: A moralisation of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites. [The social nature of finance: Pension Funds, TradeUnionists and the recomposition of the elites]. Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. P. 223.

[40] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo? [Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: A moralisation of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites. [The social nature of finance: Pension Funds, TradeUnionists and the recomposition of the elites]. Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. P. 223.

[41] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do

Thus, the author continues:

> [...] trade unions are more and more present on the financial market. The strategy of some segments of the trade union movement is that of creating and, more importantly, managing the funds from workers' pension funds, (re)signifying the traditional forms of trade union struggle, and the relationship between work and capital. Similarly, pension funds also appear as an option rather than the possible 'crisis of strategies and traditional purposes' of this sector. It is in this perspective that the research suggests that the creation and management of Pension Funds can also be interpreted as being new strategies for trade union fights.[42]

We see that, therefore, Pension Funds have a strong democratic role to play, also within the sphere of trade union activism. It is therefore expected that the trade union representation, through protective actions, lead the market to incorporate, more and more, the basic aims of social inclusion. In a democratic scenario, which would be unimaginable without the strength of the Pension Funds, "the trade union, financial and political elites find themselves on the same discussion tables, to decide on the future of the retirement of Brazilian workers, as also the lives of the retired people."[43]

All these factors, together with the imperative actions of the Government, encourage the strengthening of Labour Law, tending to reduce capitalismo? [Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: A moralisation of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites. [The social nature of finance: Pension Funds, TradeUnionists and the recomposition of the elites]. Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. P. 200.

---

[42] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo? [Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: A moralisation of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites. [The social nature of finance: Pension Funds, TradeUnionists and the recomposition of the elites]. Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. P. 224.

[43] JARDIM, Maria Chaves. Governo Lula, Sindicatos e Fundos de pensão: moralização do capitalismo? [Lula Administration, Trade Unions and Pension Funds: A moralisation of capitalism?] In: JARDIM, Maria Chaves (org.). Natureza social das finanças: Fundos de pensão, sindicalistas e recomposição da elites. [The social nature of finance: Pension Funds, TradeUnionists and the recomposition of the elites]. Bauru, SP: Edusc, 2011. P. 224.

inequality while raising the standard of living of the general population. The presence of a strong trade union, with a valued and satisfied employee, with assurance of the maintenance of a good standard of living when the employee retires: these are the fundamental qualities for the expansion of company activities on the world scene.

As mentioned in Article 202 of the Federal Constitution of 1988, the company has the right to participate in a pension fund. For this, there is a need for Government policies that are specifically for the creation of tax incentive mechanisms of different orders, so that the Pension Funds become more general.

There are several types of incentive for companies, such as allowing them to deduct, from their profit, for corporate income tax purposes, the contributions that they have made to private pension institutions to benefit their employees; generation of distinctions on taxation, in the case of individuals, exempting from taxes any contributions which have been correctly invested in a pension plan, and taxing benefits only when they are received.[44]

[44] DELBONI, Denise Poiani. A Previdência Complementar como Instrumento da Política de Recursos Humanos: Estudo em Empresas do Setor Farmacêutico [Complementary Pensions as anInstrument of HumanResources Policies: A Study of Pharmaceutical-Companies]. 2003. 225 f. Thesis (Doctorate in Business Management) - EAESP –Business Administration School of São Paulo, Getúlio Vargas Foundation. São Paulo. 2003. p. 51.

Reflections on the concept of poverty and social change in Brazil
An analysis of the "Bolsa Família" program

Tainah Simões Sales[1]

Abstract: The paper aims the analysis of the concept of poverty, searching a broader concept, which can reflect the real social needs, and the analysis of social changes that have occurred with the development of policies in Brazil, with emphasis on the Bolsa Família Program, which is the largest income transfer program in the country. We will study the traditional conceptions of poverty, the problems in adopting exclusively monetary criteria for measuring the levels of poverty and development, data about social inequality in Brazil, the characteristics of the Bolsa Família Program, philosophical and sociological aspects related to social change and its relation to Law and finally we will analyze the conception of Law as promoter of social change.

Keywords: Poverty. Social inequality. Development.

1 Introduction

The Brazilian government is increasingly concerned about promoting welfare policies, serving the citizens who need it the most. Several policies have been created, especially after the promulgation of the 1988 Constitution. The Bolsa Família Program, created in 2004 (Law No. 10.836/04), is the largest income transfer program in the country.

In this paper, we will study the implications of the adoption of monetary criteria for measuring poverty and social inequality. We propose the adoption of a broader conception, attentive to the individuals real needs and considering aspects such as the deprivation of liberties and opportunities, emphasizing the indispensability of effective policies related to the quality of the education, health, labor, sanitation etc.

[1] Currently, is Master student in Law from Federal University of Ceará (UFC), with scholarship provided by Fundação Cearense de Apoio ao Desenvolvimento Científico e Tecnológico (FUNCAP), researcher at the Center for the Study of Constitutional Law at UFC (CEDIC), coordinator of the research line named Constitutionalization of Private Relations, researcher at Democracy and Public Finance Group, from UFC. Lawyer. E-mail: tainahsales@gmail.com.

Further, we will analyze data related to social inequality in Brazil and compensatory policies developed, with emphasis on the Bolsa Familia Program and its particularities. We sought to answer the following question: income transfer programs and, more specifically, the Bolsa Familia Program, are sufficient to change the condition of poverty of the individual?

It is a topic of not only academic relevance, but mainly social. Discussions about this topic should be promoted, so that urgent solutions to the problems concerning the efforts to eradicate poverty and ensure social development can be found. That is the purpose of this paper.

2 The concept of poverty

Activities aiming poverty eradication exist for many years but now it is possible to say that the governments are more concerned about creating policies in this regard, trying to make effective human rights.

However, for those policies to be effective and satisfactory, it is essential to understand and discuss the meaning of the term "poverty". The criterion used in most studies around the world to evaluate the level of development of a city or a nation as well as the degree of poverty in a community is the monetary. Therefore, social development and poverty are measured according to the personal income.

But using this criterion without considering other important aspects, such as the individual's freedoms, their needs and their ability to choose between different opportunities makes the results unsatisfactory and inconsistent with reality[2].

Moreover, it should be noted that economic development does not always result in social development. Not if it depends only on the increase of personal income. On the opposite: the social development seems a process that can be vital for sustained economic development[3]. Economic growth depends on investments to improve people capabilities, from a democratic society perspective. Increase income without improving basic aspects of existence, such as health, sanitation, education and housing cannot characterize, in fact, long-term development[4].

[2] SEN, Amartya. Desenvolvimento como liberdade. Translation by Laura Teixeira Mota. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 2000, p. 77.

[3] KLIKSBERG, Bernardo. Repensando o Estado para o desenvolvimento social: superando dogmas e convencionalismos. Translation by Joaquim Ozório Pires da Silva. São Paulo: Corteza, 1998.

In Brazil, it is adopted a policy of compensatory measures: the adoption of various programs to "compensate" poverty, unemployment and social inequality. The idea is to ensure assistance to the needy urgently: one should give more to those who have less[5].

Encouraging such assistance programs stems from the fact that they are immediate and urgent, and also because the costs are lower than investing in policies to promote education, health, sanitation, housing, among others. Moreover, they are important instruments to acquire votes in elections.

The first discussions on income transfer programs in Brazil occurred in the 1970s, however, it was only in 1991 that there was a project to effect policy accordingly. The project aimed to create a negative income tax, which would benefit people over 25 who had an income under a certain level, which at the time corresponded to 2.5 times the minimum wage[6].

After that, other programs were created, linking the possibility of earning supplementary income to the requirement of providing schooling for dependents in 1995. There were also the Eradication of Child Labor Program, including, besides the monetary benefit and the need for school enrollment, incentives to cease child labor, the Bolsa Escola Program and Bolsa Alimentação Program.

The Fome Zero Program was created by the Federal Government in 2003 in order to actualize the right to food, without the focus on the individual's income. But, the program was widely criticized and did not show satisfactory results. The model of income transfer seemed more effective and more economical than the model adopted by the Fome Zero Program.

Thus, on January 9th, 2004 the Federal Government created the Bolsa Família Program (Law No. 10.836/04, regulated by Decree No. 5.209/04), setting the income transfer according certain conditions set by legislation, such as the number of children, the condition of school enrollment etc. Currently, the program benefits more than 13 million[7].

[4] SEN, Amartya. Development thinking at the beginnig of 21st Century. In: BID. Development thinking and practice conference, Washington, set. 1996.

[5] COHEN, Ernesto; FRANCO, Rolando. Avaliação de projetos sociais. Petrópolis: Vozes, 1993, p. 30.

[6] BRITTO, Tatiana; SOARES, Fabio Veras. Bolsa família e renda básica de cidadania: um passo em falso?. Available: <http://www.senado.gov.br/senado/conleg/textos_discussao/TD75-TatianaBritto_FabioSoares.pdf>. Access: Nov. 17th 2011.

For the Bolsa Familia, extremely poor people are those who survive with monthly income of up to R$ 70.00 (seventy reais) and poor people are the ones who earn up to R$ 140.00 (one hundred and forty reais) monthly[8]. By November 16th 2011, the Brazilian Government published the result of Population Census 2010: 6.3% of the population still lives with a monthly income of up to R$ 70.00[9].

From this, it is noticed that, for purposes of analysis of national poverty, important factors such as the needs, the opportunities (or its lack), the culture, the rights and freedoms of those individuals are not being considered.

Indexes for measuring poverty exclusively based on income present often incomplete or misleading results. It does not mean, however, that the money is not an important criterion. We just want to expand the current concept, since it is insufficient. According to Amartya Sen, poverty must be seen as the deprivation of basic capabilities rather than merely as low income, which is the traditional criterion of identification of poverty [10].

Poverty is a multifaceted phenomenon and must be analyzed through the prism of the deprivation of liberties and opportunities. Based on this concept, the Government may draw up policies in order to effectively contribute to the reduction of social inequality and the strengthening of citizenship, instead of worrying only with increasing individual's income.

Besides, income transfer programs such as Bolsa Familia should not be implemented on a permanent basis, because they may lead to accommodation, ie, to the resignation to social status. It is important to note that we are not trying to deny the importance of welfare policies. We are just stating that, perhaps, if those income transfer programs were not permanent they would effectively contribute to the purpose

---

[7] BRITTO, Tatiana; SOARES, Fabio Veras. Bolsa família e renda básica de cidadania: um passo em falso? Available: <http://www.senado.gov.br/senado/conleg/textos_discussao/TD75-TatianaBritto_FabioSoares.pdf>. Access: Nov. 17th 2011.

[8] These values correspond approximately to $ 140 and $ 280, respectively.

[9] INDICADORES Sociais Municipais 2010: incidência de pobreza é maior nos municípios de porte médio. Instituto Brasileiro de Geografia e Estatística, Brasília, 16 de novembro de 2011. Available: < http://www.ibge.gov.br/home/presidencia/noticias/noticia_visualiza.php?id_noticia=2019&id_pagina=1>. Access: Nov. 17th 2011.

[10] SEN, Amartya. Desenvolvimento como liberdade. Translation by Laura Teixeira Mota. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 2000, p. 120.

for which they propose. If they are implemented on a permanent basis, there may be distortions of the program goals, causing stagnation or even social backlash.

Moreover, government actions aimed at improvements in education, public health system and sanitation, for example, are fundamental and more effective for poverty reduction. What is proposed is that, in addition to giving money directly, other factors must be considered, as already mentioned, to measure development and poverty and to promote satisfactory policies.

Eradicate poverty considering only monetary criteria is very easy: the Government must only give money and the problem is solved. But these people will still live without health, education and they will remain without job opportunities and without social assistance. They will remain marginalized. Their problems will not be solved. Their opportunities will be reduced. Is this real freedom? Do they really will no longer be poor and need government assistance? Surely the answer is negative.

3 Analysis of "Bolsa Família" program

According to art. 1 of Law No. 10.836, of January 9th, 2004, the Bolsa Família Program emerged with the purpose of unifying the existing income transfer programs, mainly Bolsa Escola, Auxílio Gás and Cartão Alimentação programs.

Aurelio Weisshemer[11] states that the program strategy to guarantee poverty eradication has three main elements: income transfer; strengthening the right to basic health services, education and social assistance; and integration with other initiatives and government programs and also with society. Besides, it is important to note that the main objectives are: fighting poverty and promoting the emancipation of these families.

The Bolsa Família Program was implemented by the Ministry of Social Development and Fight Against Poverty counting on the aid of the municipalities, which play an important role by controlling the program and transferring funds to the beneficiaries. The decentralization of the program's management and execution is regulated by Law

[11] WEISSHEMER, Aurélio. Bolsa Família - Avanços, limites e possibilidades do programa que está transformando a vida de milhões de famílias no Brasil. 2. ed. São Paulo: Perseu Ábramo, 2010, p. 34.

No. 10.836/04. The federal states have the technical support function and must supervise the municipalities involved.

The National Secretariat of Citizenship Income (SENARC) has an important role in the management of the benefits, providing setting criteria of beneficiaries and the amounts to be transferred, the procedures relating to the blockade and the suspension of benefits, and the questionnaire to be answered by those responsible for the household before the registry[12]. The Department of Assessment Information (SAGI) studies the positive and negative impacts of the program[13].

Currently, the Bolsa Família benefits 13.530.000 families[14] with per capita income of up to R$ 70.00 (being considered extremely poor) or up to R$ 140.00 (being then considered poor) [15]. This is the largest cash transfer program in the country. According to Sergei Soares and Natalia Sátyro[16], the Bolsa Familia only is surpassed, in number of beneficiaries, by the National Health System, which in principle covers the entire Brazilian population, the public education, serving 52 million students, and the social security, which boasts 21 million benefits.

To acquire benefits, the family must fulfill certain conditions regulated by law. According to art. 3 of Law No. 10.836, the conditions are as follows: in the case of families with school-age children, they must prove frequency of 85% in a regular education establishment; if they have children 0-6 years old, they must follow the vaccination schedule; pregnant women should observe pre and postnatal examinations, nutritional and breast-feeding monitoring, in addition to other conditions [12] Regulated by Decree No. 6,135, of June 26th 2007.

[13] BICHIR, Renata M. O Bolsa Família na berlinda? Revista Novos Estudos, n. 87, jul. 2010, p. 120.

[14] Dependência do Bolsa Família quase triplica no Estado. Diário do Nordeste Online. Available: <http://diariodonordeste.globo.com/materia.asp?codigo=1185156>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013.

[15] When the Program was created, the values were R$ 50.00 R$ 100.00, respectively, for inclusion of poor and extremely poor families, being subsequently adjusted to R$ 60.00 and R$ 120,00. SILVA, Maria Ozanira da Silva e; LIMA, Valéria Ferreira Santos de Almada (Coord.). Avaliando o Bolsa Família: unificação, focalização e impactos. São Paulo: Cortez, 2010, p. 33.

[16] SOARES, Sergei; SÁTYRO, Natália. O Programa Bolsa Família: desenho institucional, impactos e possibilidades futuras. IPEA, Texto para Discussão, 2009, n. 1424, p. 12. Available: < http://desafios.ipea.gov.br/sites/000/2/publicacoes/tds/td_1424.pdf>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013.

that can be established later[17]. These are the beneficiaries' counterparts, demonstrating its commitment to the State and society. Thus, the counterparts charged are those that we should all observe and fulfill[18].

The control related to educational counterpart is performed by the municipal government and also by the Ministry of Education. The counterparts related to health are monitored by the Ministry of Health, with the assistance of local health departments.

It should be noted that if the family receives the benefits but then stop fulfilling the requirements, the benefit will not be ceased immediately. The Ministry of Social Development and Fight Against Hunger (MDS) will evaluate the reasons for non-compliance so that the beneficiary is not impaired. After all, we know that often the requirements are not fulfilled not by a beneficiary's negligence, but because of the deficiencies in the provision of public services by the State, for example, the lack of places for school enrollment in some localities; absence or limited access to public transport for schools or hospitals; absence of professionals and beds in health centers and public hospitals, among others.[19]

Furthermore, in relation to the educational counterpart, Soares and Satyro[20] affirm that if the child has absences in excess of 15% due unjustified or unknown reasons, the beneficiary receives a letter of notification and also a warning on the terminal screen of the bank used by him for the withdrawal of values. If, even after the notifications, the absences continue to occur, after two months, new notifications will be sent and the benefit will remain temporarily locked and can be withdrawn in the next month.

If, after the third scan, the frequency is still below 85%, new notices will be sent and the benefit will be suspended for one month and

---

[17] BICHIR, Renata Mirandola. O Bolsa Família na berlinda? Revista Novos Estudos, n. 87, jul. 2010, p. 123.

[18] SOARES, Sergei; SÁTYRO, Natália. O Programa Bolsa Família: desenho institucional, impactos e possibilidades futuras. IPEA, Texto para Discussão, 2009, n. 1424, p. 15. Available: < http://desafios.ipea.gov.br/sites/000/2/publicacoes/tds/td_1424.pdf>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013.

[19] SILVA, Maria Ozanira da Silva e; LIMA, Valéria Ferreira Santos de Almada (Coord.). Avaliando o Bolsa Família: unificação, focalização e impactos. São Paulo: Cortez, 2010, p. 100.

[20] SOARES, Sergei; SÁTYRO, Natália. O Programa Bolsa Família: desenho institucional, impactos e possibilidades futuras. IPEA, Texto para Discussão, 2009, n. 1424, p. 16. Available: < http://desafios.ipea.gov.br/sites/000/2/publicacoes/tds/td_1424.pdf>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013.

it would not be able to be withdrawn in the next month. In the fourth round, it will suspend the benefit for a period of two months. Finally, if the absences persist, the benefit will be canceled.

Research conducted by the National Secretariat of Citizenship Income (SENARC) indicated that since the beginning of the program until the year 2008, only 4% of families had benefits canceled because of the failure of the educational counterpart[21].

Since 2004, the benefit is granted for an initial period of two years (if the family fulfill the requirements). After this period of time, the government must provide the updating information of families in order to check whether they are still eligible and can continue to get the values or if they are emancipated. If the family get some other kind of income that becomes ineligible to receive the benefit, ie, if the per capita income is above the limits, established by law for the assessment of values, both the family and the respective municipality should be informed that the benefit will be blocked. If is verified that the family no longer fits the program profile, the benefit will then be canceled so that another family can begin to receive[22].

An important detail about the Bolsa Família is that not all families in need have been benefited, yet fulfilling the requirements of legislation. This happens because the budget is limited. Once exhausted the budget, no one can begin receiving the benefit, at least until there is extra credit. People criticizes this rule, since it seems impossible to ascertain who is the most needy of all who fulfill the legal requirements, which makes the choice unfair and often arbitrary[23].

In case of death of the person responsible for receiving the values , there is no cancellation of the benefit, because the values are for the whole family and not to a specific person. The family must update the registry and replace the responsible. While the substitution is not performed, the benefit is not blocked.[24]

[21] SOARES, Sergei; SÁTYRO, Natália. O Programa Bolsa Família: desenho institucional, impactos e possibilidades futuras. IPEA, Texto para Discussão, 2009, n. 1424, p. 17. Available: < http://desafios.ipea.gov.br/sites/000/2/publicacoes/tds/td_1424.pdf>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013

[22] SOARES, Sergei; SÁTYRO, Natália. O Programa Bolsa Família: desenho institucional, impactos e possibilidades futuras. IPEA, Texto para Discussão, 2009, n. 1424, p. 13. Available: < http://desafios.ipea.gov.br/sites/000/2/publicacoes/tds/td_1424.pdf>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013

[23] SOARES, Sergei; SÁTYRO, Natália. O Programa Bolsa Família: desenho institucional, impactos e possibilidades futuras. IPEA, Texto para Discussão, 2009, n. 1424, p. 11. Available: < http://desafios.ipea.gov.br/sites/000/2/publicacoes/tds/td_1424.pdf>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013.

The benefit may vary between R$ 32.00 and R$ 306.00[25]. They are granted by the following form[26]:

a) Basic Benefit of R$70.00 is paid to families considered extremely poor, with incomes of up to R$70.00 per person[27].

b) The Variable Benefit of R$32.00 is paid to poor families with monthly income of up to R$140.00[28] per person, if they have children and teenagers up to 15 years, or if there is a woman pregnant and/or breastfeeding. Each family can receive benefits up to five variables, ie, up to R$160.00[29].

c) The Variable Benefit Linked to Teen (BVJ) of R$38.00[30] is paid to all families who have teenagers attending school. Each family can receive benefits for up to two variables related to adolescents, ie, up to R$76.00[31].

d) The Extraordinary Variable Benefit (BVCE) is paid to families who had financial losses with the migration of the other assistance programs to Bolsa Família. The benefit amount varies from case to case.

Currently, about 55 million Brazilians are living in poverty and 22 million are considered indigent, although advances can be identified: according to estimates from the Institute of Applied Economic Research (IPEA), between 2003 and 2007 , about 16.5 million people were able to overcome the poverty line[32].

In Ceará, a state of Brazil, according to a study conducted by the Laboratory for Poverty Study (LEP) of the Federal University of Ceará,

---

[24] WEISSHEMER, Aurélio. Bolsa Família - Avanços, limites e possibilidades do programa que está transformando a vida de milhões de famílias no Brasil. 2. ed. São Paulo: Perseu Ábramo, 2010, p. 65.

[25] Converting to U.S. dollars, this equals $ 65 and $ 615, approximately.

[26] BRASIL. Valores dos benefícios. Available: <http://www.mds.gov.br/bolsafamilia/valores-dos-beneficios>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013

[27] U$140, approximately.

[28] U$280, approximately.

[29] U$320, approximately.

[30] U$76, approximately.

[31] U$152, approximately.

[32] WEISSHEMER, Aurélio. Bolsa Família - Avanços, limites e possibilidades do programa que está transformando a vida de milhões de famílias no Brasil. 2. ed. São Paulo: Perseu Ábramo, 2010, p. 19.

in 2012, about 1.44 million people have escaped poverty line[33]. Studies state that the benefits from Bolsa Família Program contributed to the improvement of these indices.

However the question is: Does the Bolsa Familia provide a substantial change in the individual condition of poverty, if we analyze it by a broader concept, which includes the freedoms and the real needs of individuals, beyond the monetary criteria already mentioned? This is what will be discussed below.

3.1 The income and the substantial change in the individual condition of poverty

There are many debates about the Bolsa Família Program. People discuss if the program should be temporary or permanent; many people say that the amounts received are negligible and do not modify the state of misery of the individual; social scientists question the monetary criteria for the characterization of poverty; some say that the conditionalities are not efficient and do not have a relevant role, creating overspending for the government, which now have to monitor and evaluate the evidence of conditions imposed by law; people question the situation of dependency of beneficiaries, resulting disincentive to work and social conformation; others discuss the issue of corruption, creating a situation where people in need are not included on the program, and who is not in need, in turn, receive the values; there are also debates about the need to implement other policies and the positive and negative consequences of the program, among other issues.

However, we know that for those who have practically nothing, receive some financial aid, although small, create a great impact on the lives of their families[34]. A research made by the Center of Social Research, from Federal Fluminense University (UFF) [35], showed that, before the creation of Bolsa Família, 34.9% of the interviewed families could buy enough food for just one week, 34% could buy for two weeks; 20.2% for three weeks and only 10.9% said that their families could buy food for the entire month. After Bolsa Família, the numbers have changed: 16.1% said they were able to buy food only for a week, 29.4% for two weeks, 33% for three weeks and 21.5% responded that they were able to buy food for the whole month.

[33] Dependência do Bolsa Família quase triplica no Estado. Diário do Nordeste Online. Available: <http://diariodonordeste.globo.com/materia.asp?codigo=1185156>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013

[34] WEISSHEMER, Aurélio. Bolsa Família - Avanços, limites e possibilidades do programa que está transformando a vida de milhões de famílias no Brasil. 2. ed. São Paulo: Perseu Ábramo, 2010, p. 24.

[35] For more details about this: WEISSHEMER, Aurélio. Bolsa Família - Avanços, limites e possibilidades do programa que está transformando a vida de milhões de famílias no Brasil. 2. ed. São Paulo: Perseu Ábramo, 2010, p. 125.

Thus, it appears that, although the program is subject to criticism, and relevant reforms must be urgently done, the contribution of Bolsa Família is very significant for those who receive it. Some say it provides concrete and immediate possibilities of improving life conditions for a large part of population that often has no income[36].

Although the amount received is not sufficient to significantly modify the poverty condition of the individual, no one can deny that income transfer programs contribute to reducing levels of inequality and poverty, reducing the limitations and deprivations of numerous families. At least they could have something to eat[37]. So, it is possible to assert that, although not enough to eradicate poverty in the country, the Bolsa Família Program represents an advance for welfare policies in Brazil, which adopted, especially after the 1988 Constitution, the character of Welfare State.

The government needs to attend to the citizens' concerns and needs, increasingly policies that expand the individual freedoms and opportunities, so that everybody can have equal opportunities to live as one wants.

Aurelio Weisshemer[38] affirms that a child or a young person does not learn in school if he or she is not healthy. Likewise, if health is not

---

[36] SILVA, Maria Ozanira da Silva e; LIMA, Valéria Ferreira Santos de Almada. Caracterizando o Bolsa Família: uma aproximação ao processo de unificação dos programas de transferência de renda no Brasil. In: SILVA, Maria Ozanira da Silva e; LIMA, Valéria Ferreira Santos de Almada (Coord.). Avaliando o Bolsa Família: unificação, focalização e impactos. São Paulo: Cortez, 2010, p. 107.

[37] SILVA, Maria Ozanira da Silva e; LIMA, Valéria Ferreira Santos de Almada. Caracterizando o Bolsa Família: uma aproximação ao processo de unificação dos programas de transferência de renda no Brasil. In: SILVA, Maria Ozanira da Silva e; LIMA, Valéria Ferreira Santos de Almada (Coord.). Avaliando o Bolsa Família: unificação, focalização e impactos. São Paulo: Cortez, 2010, p. 93.

[38] WEISSHEMER, Aurélio. Bolsa Família - Avanços, limites e possibilidades do programa que está transformando a vida de milhões de famílias no Brasil. 2. ed. São Paulo: Perseu Ábramo, 2010, p. 15.

ensured, the fundamental rights to food, clean water, sanitation and housing may be impaired. He also says that it should be created policies to effect the transition from the state of dependence on income transfer programs for a sustainable phase characterized by social inclusion that combines participation in the labor market with guaranteed rights[39].

Therefore, it is essential that, in addition to the improvement of programs like Bolsa Familia (which has, as already seen, many structural problems such as the definition of poverty based on monetary criteria), other policies should be discussed and implemented. It cannot be expected that a single income transfer program solves all problems related to poverty and inequality that exist since the beginning of history[40].

Poverty is a complex phenomenon and should be analyzed through the prism of deprivation of liberties and opportunities. Based on this concept, the Government may draw up policies in order to effectively contribute to the reduction of social inequality and the strengthening of citizenship.

Conclusions

It is concluded that it is essential to change the concept of poverty based on money due to the failure of its meaning. If poverty is analyzed by one-dimensional view, several important aspects, such as the needs, culture, history and opportunities of individuals will not be considerate. Eradicating poverty just transferring income directly to those in need it is a not effective way maily if you consider a long-term development based on actual human and social needs.

This does not mean that the monetary criteria is not important or that the money received by those families does not make any difference. We are just saying that this alternative is not enough, because they will still need access to health, education, housing, among others.

Bolsa Familia has the merit to calm the hunger of millions. But the path towards development is much more complex, and much remains to be done. The Government cannot consider his part done only by creating this program to transfer income, and also society cannot be silent, believing that much has been done. This was only the first step. Only with the awareness that poverty is more than lack of income is that effective changes can be observed and those individuals may be, in fact, free.

[39] WEISSHEMER, Aurélio. Bolsa Família - Avanços, limites e possibilidades do programa que está transformando a vida de milhões de famílias no Brasil. 2. ed. São Paulo: Perseu Ábramo, 2010, p. 68.

[40] BICHIR, Renata Mirandola. O Bolsa Família na berlinda? Revista Novos Estudos, n. 87, jul. 2010, p. 126.

References

BICHIR, Renata Mirandola. O Bolsa Família na berlinda? Revista Novos Estudos, n. 87, jul. 2010.

BRASIL. Constituição (1988). Constituição da República Federativa do Brasil, Brasília, DF, Senado, 1988.

_____. Economia. Available: <http://www.brasil.gov.br/sobre/economia/indicadores/disoc_rdcg/indicadorview>. Access: Jan. 16th 2013

_____. Lei ordinária nº 10.836 de 9 de janeiro de 2004. Cria o Programa Bolsa Família e dá outras providências. Available: < http://www.planalto.gov.br/ccivil_03/_ato2004-2006/2004/lei/l10.836.htm>. Access: Jan. 16th 2013

_____. Decreto nº 5.209 de 17 de setembro de 2004. Regulamenta a Lei nº 10.836, de 9 de janeiro de 2004, que cria o Programa Bolsa Família, e dá outras providências. Available: <http://www.planalto.gov.br/ccivil_03/_ato2004-2006/2004/decreto/d5209.htm>. Access: Nov. 10th 2011.

_____. Ministério do desenvolvimento social e combate à fome. Bolsa Família. Available: <http://www.mds.gov.br/bolsafamilia>. Access: Nov. 17th 2011.

_____. Programa Fome Zero: O que é. Available: < http://www.fomezero.gov.br/o-que-e>. Access: Nov. 17th 2011.

_____. Ministério do desenvolvimento social e combate à fome. Valores dos benefícios. Available: <http://www.mds.gov.br/bolsafamilia/valores-dos-beneficios>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013.

BRITTO, Tatiana; SOARES, Fabio Veras. Bolsa família e renda básica de cidadania: um passo em falso?. Available: <http://www.senado.gov.br/senado/conleg/textos_discussao/TD75-TatianaBritto_FabioSoares.pdf>. Access: Nov. 17th 2011.

COHEN, Ernesto; FRANCO, Rolando. Avaliação de projetos sociais. Petrópolis: Vozes, 1993.

DEPENDÊNCIA do Bolsa Família quase triplica no Estado. Diário do Nordeste Online. Available: <http://diariodonordeste.globo.com/materia.asp?codigo=1185156>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013.

INDICADORES Sociais Municipais 2010: incidência de pobreza é maior nos municípios de porte médio. Instituto Brasileiro de Geografia e Estatística, Brasília, 16 de novembro de 2011. Available: <http://www.ibge.gov.br/home/presidencia/noticias/noticia_visualiza.php?id_noticia=2019&id_pagina=1>. Access: Nov. 17th 2011.

KLIKSBERG, Bernardo. Repensando o Estado para o desenvolvimento social: superando dogmas e convencionalismos. Translation by Joaquim Ozório Pires da Silva. São Paulo: Corteza, 1998.

MEDEIROS, Marcelo; BRITTO, Tatiana; SOARES, Fábio. Transferência de renda no Brasil. Revista Novos Estudos, n. 87, jul., 2010.

SILVA, Maria Ozanira da Silva e; LIMA, Valéria Ferreira Santos de Almada (Coord.). Avaliando o Bolsa Família: unificação, focalização e impactos. São Paulo: Cortez, 2010.

SEN, Amartya. Desenvolvimento como liberdade. Translation by Laura Teixeira Mota. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 2000.

SOARES, Sergei; SÁTYRO, Natália. O Programa Bolsa Família: desenho institucional, impactos e possibilidades futuras. Instituto de Pesquisa Econômica Aplicada. Texto para discussão, n. 1.424, out. 2009. Available: < http://desafios.ipea.gov.br/sites/000/2/publicacoes/tds/td_1424.pdf>. Access: Jan. 10th 2013.

WEISSHEMER, Aurélio. Bolsa Família - Avanços, limites e possibilidades do programa que está transformando a vida de milhões de famílias no Brasil. 2. ed. São Paulo: Perseu Ábramo, 2010.

Truth, Hermeneutics and Judicial Decision

Fernando José Armando Ribeiro[1]

Abstract: Modern hermeneutics teaches us that everything that is perceived and represented by human beings refers to a process of interpretation, and that the world comes to mind through language. Therefore, Law depends on the hermeneutic mediation. Without hermeneutics there is no law, only normative texts. This paper makes use of the philosophical hermeneutics by Gadamer to investigate the limits and possibilities of judicial interpretation. The paper explores the contribution of philosophical hermeneutics to a new model of rationality and how can it influence the application of Law, and not only legal theory. Therefore, we will examine some of the most important themes of the legal debate today in Brazil and the USA. What should be the role of the judge in a democracy? What can we understand by judicial activism and by correct interpretation? With this theoretical background we analyze some cases, always trying to show the better way to legitimize the judicial decision and the contribution that hermeneutics and the new dimensions of language can bring to it.

Keywords: 1. Hermeneutics; Judicial decision; 3. Democracy.

1 Introduction

Law is not only what is contained in the texts of statutes and precedents. These legal texts only set forth abstract commandments, able to regulate interpersonal relations. Therefore, the search for law in legal texts is fruitless if it does not consider the role of the interpreter and the plurality of all the other norms that compose the legal system which by themselves are the product of interpretation.

Modern hermeneutics teaches us that everything that is perceived and represented by the interpreter refers to a process of interpretation, and that the world comes to mind through language. If language is already a form of interpretation, hermeneutics is inseparable from human life and, therefore, inseparable from Law.

Hence, Law depends on hermeneutic mediation. Without hermeneutics there is no law, only normative texts. Only through discourse can Law express the valid and invalid, the reasonable and unreasonable, and the dialectical affirmation of human freedom.

[1] PhD; Professor of Law at PUC-Minas; Judge in the state of Minas Gerais (Brazil).

To investigate and reflect the application of law in a democracy and in the context of pluralism requires the recognition of the inevitability of reflective interpretation of texts. In this sense, Gadamer's philosophical hermeneutics can be considered indispensable to the study of Law. It demonstrates its critical and reflective dimension when understood as a dialogue with tradition. Making use of Gadamer's philosophical hermeneutics, this paper investigates the limits and possibilities of judicial interpretation of law.

2. The role of the judge: some reflections

In the Civil Law system, in the beginning of the modern era the law as an incarnation of the State found the very meaning of its sovereignty through the statutes. To the judge, understood as a simple instrument of the State, rested the role of applying the law according to the model of syllogistic application. Member of a power of reduced importance, the Constitution would lie beyond judiciary reach, considering that the concept of law did not cover the normative force of the Constitution, a dimension able to establish the public space (STRECK, 2010, p. 81). When legal positivism came to its peak, with its concern about the abstract system of Law, judicial interpretation was also separated from the force of tradition, as well as from the possibility of rescuing the fundamental principles of the legal system itself.

The formalist perspectives can be explained by different reasons. Among them, with prominent evidence, is the historical evolution of the law that led it through medieval times to the modern age. If the people became the new sovereign, and they speak through legislation, laws and statues should be seen as their voice. The more systematic and precise legislation is, the more interpretation is restricted and so the, self-government principle will be more respected as the will of the people. Law's interpretation could then be reduced to a subsumptional process.

This idea was properly incorporated into the ideology of the Liberal Modern State. It can be understood by Montesquieu's (1979) words, written in the Le sprit des lois, according to whom the judge should be merely seen as "la bouche de la loi", the law's mouth, responsible only for pronouncing what was already contained in legal statutes.

However, the tragic events that happened under the totalitarian states of the twentieth century demonstrated with strong force that the rationality of the Law should not be separated from the normative order of morals. The search for justice, reborn in contemporary law meant, firstly, that Law depends on principles and the interpreter should have a more relevant role in the application of the law.

3 The evolution of hermeneutics and the contribution of Hans-Georg Gadamer

The model of hermeneutics, from the scholastics to the historic-evolutionary system, consists in the study of the processes used to establish the meaning and the reach of language's expressions. However, since Heidegger, hermeneutics studies cannot be conceived as a mere instrument to make the subject of study understandable.

Following the path of his master Heidegger, Gadamer (2006, p. 470) says, "being that can be understood is language". The language in the context of Gadamer's Philosophical Hermeneutics is the total mediation of the experience of being. And, in these terms, the limit is imposed on all hermeneutical experience of meaning. For Gadamer (2006, p. 471-472) being can never be understood in its totality, because for everything that triggers language always refers beyond the statement as such. The self cannot be understood in its entirety and cannot therefore claim to be a complete interpretation. It is noteworthy that, in the preface to the 2nd edition of Truth and Method Hans-Georg Gadamer (2006, p. XXV) states that "if there are any practical consequences of the present investigation, it certainly has nothing to do with an unscientific 'commitment'; instead, it is concerned with the scientific integrity of acknowledging the commitment involved in all understanding".

For Gadamer, if the experience of art proves that the truth rests beyond the sphere of methodical knowledge, something similar is true for all the sciences of spirit (Geisteswissenchaften) in which historical tradition is transformed into an object of research. Truth and Method is proposed to expose the truth as happening, always an actualization, but already steeped in tradition (GADAMER, 2006, p. XXV). In this sense, Gadamer presents some important contributions that should be noted. The historical horizon is the possible range of view from a particular point in history, i.e., the result of the dialectical contrast of past and present. In the words of Gadamer (2006, p. 390), "the interpreter's own horizon is decisive, yet not as a personal standpoint that he maintains or enforces, but more as an opinion and possibility that one brings into play and puts at risk, and that helps one truly to make one's own what the text says".

The historic experience shows that man's access to the world comes from the point of view of his hermeneutical situation, which is his specific position in front of the phenomena. Prejudices would be an advance and diffuse prior meaning of the text influenced by the tradition in which the interpreter is situated. In other words, they are the product of the intersubjective relationship the interpreter keeps with the world. Prejudice – or pre-understanding – is a part of understanding itself. In sum, it ontologically constitutes comprehension.

Understanding is formed through pre-understandings. According to Gadamer (2006, p. 484)., "there is undoubtedly no understanding that is free of all prejudices, however much the will of our knowledge must be directed toward escaping their thrall" We do not know something in its integrity, but always something as something. Gadamer points out that the historical horizon does not mean enclosure, but opening. Tontti (2004, p. 28) observes that awareness of the historical horizon allows a better glimpse of it towards a more correct standard. The concept of historical perspective comes to the consciousness of the plurality of meanings in which there is a constant shifting of changing meanings over time.

The understanding that comes through the hermeneutic dialogue involves merging the horizon of the interpreter with the horizon of what is interpreted. And from the inter-relationship of the interpreter's own horizon with the horizon of the text, a new one is born. For Gadamer (2006, p. 390), the fusion of horizons is what takes place in conversation in which something that is not only my author's, or mine but in common, is expressed. The interpreter's understanding is part of an event that stems from the actual text that needs interpretation. In the fusion of horizons rests the idea that the truth of the text is not in unconditional submission to the opinion of the author, and not only in the interpreter´s preconceptions.

It should be noted that the fusion of horizons involves another kind of fusion, that one between understanding, interpretation and application. In a reversal of the classic position, according to which first comes interpretation and then understanding, Gadamer shows that something always needs to be understood before being interpreted. According to the philosopher for the interpretation there must be a previous understanding (prejudice or pre-understanding). However, for Gadamer the application is not a third moment in a process of understanding and interpreting. For Gadamer, interpretation is nothing more than an explicit understanding and not a specific moment distinct from it. The application will not proceed further than the very act of understanding.

However, the authority of tradition does not take away the freedom of the interpreter, as it can be rationally controlled. Therefore, the recognition of the history of effect does not mean the absence of critical sense. The other way, facing a future time when the prejudices originating from tradition no longer respond, brings the possibility of differentiation between true prejudices, those which make our understanding possible, and those false prejudices that only bring misunderstanding (GADAMER, 2006, p. 298).

We should always consider the new meaning of language beyond Gadamer's hermeneutics. The German philosopher states "language is the universal medium in which understanding happens." Only through language can we understand. And language cannot be understood merely as the description of objects. It is through language that we can create and act in the world (GADAMER, 2006, p. 390). This allows Gadamer to interrelate the intrinsic dialectic in the relationship between thought and speech as a conversation. And also the dialectic relation between question and answer is relevant to the interpretation of any text. In this sense the author says, "the linguisticality of understanding is the concretion of historically effected consciousness"(GADAMER, 2006, p. 391).

Not only tradition, but also the very nature of linguistic understanding has a fundamental relationship with linguistics. As Gadamer (2006, p. 443) points out, the world itself is the common ground, not trodden by anyone and acknowledged by all, that unites all who speak to each other. All forms of community life are forms of linguistic community, and moreover, are forms of language. The linguistic worldliness of the world in which we have always lived is the condition for all of our concepts and thoughts. There is no possible perspective outside of history, as there is no history without language. The speculative character inherent to language is then understood.

4 What can Law learn from traditions?

The modern Law was built over some patterns such as predictability and security, and it has been a difficult task for judges and lawyers to face the inevitable open texture of Law. So far, whether in the Common Law or in the Civil Law systems, jurisprudence has tried to cover this inherent "imperfection" using some interpretation tools and patterns in order to limit the level of generality. Among those, the appeal to the original intention has been one of the most important.

The originalism defended, among others, by Justice Antonin Scalia and Robert H. Bork, frequently refers to historical traditions as a source of Law, or as something able to provide meaning to legal texts, or craft the precedents with a special consistency and objectivity.[2] It would be the only way to really interpret the Constitution. All the other approaches would be trying to change the Constitution, and not to interpret it. But the use of historical traditions suggested by Scalia is very different from that one came from the philosophical hermeneutics. As some scholars have noted, in Scalia's argument there is an implicit suggestion that historical traditions come equipped with instruction manuals explaining how abstractly they are to be described (TRIBE e DORF, 1991, p. 98). If we consider the historical traditions this way, they become subtle to serious manipulations, what compromises the objectivity, strongly advocated by the originalist school. There will always be a question remaining unanswered, which is how can we identify the appropriate time to reject historical traditions, and what should we reject about them? We can find in Scalia a paradoxical answer which strengthen even more the difficulties to understand his coherence, and shows the contradictions of the originalist proposal. Scalia (1989, p. 856-857 says that "even if it could be demonstrated unequivocally that public flogging and hand-branding practices were not cruel and unusual measures in 1791, these practices would not be sustained by our courts").

As questioned by Tribe and Dorf (1991, p. 101), what precisely is the "most specific level at which a relevant tradition "exists? Are positive laws more or less specific than social attitudes? Are social attitudes about one subject, say gender, more or less specific than social attitudes about another, such as religion? That's why the originalism cannot escape from the hermeneutical approach. Only through hermeneutics and argumentation one can answer the questions came before the historical search for intentions. As put by Sortirios Barber (2007, p. 82), originalism > […] assumes the theorist have done their philosophic work successfully – assume they've shown who ought to count as framers, what should count as evidence of their intentions, how to deal with disagreements among leading framers, and so forth. Intentionalist theorists still would face the question – a philosophic question – of what kind of interpretation their judges should seek: abstract intentions or concrete intentions?

[2] To a broader understanding of the originalism, see the following works: SCALIA, Antonin. A matter of interpretation, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997; BORK, Robert H. The tempting of America, New York: Free Press, 1990; WHITTINGTON, Keith E. Whittington. Constitutional interpretation: textual meaning, original intent and judicial review. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1999.

The use of traditions is a form to make contextualization or to limit constitutional rights. The risk brought by the originalist approach is to flatten human language, action and comprehension. It can lead to a distortion of history in history's name (BARBER, 2007, p. 107). A provocative insight about the constitutional interpretation and its reflexive dimension was conceived by Michel Rosenfeld (Jan. 1995), in his article "The identity of the constitutional subject". In an analysis of the deconstructive discourse Rosenfeld shows how the interpretation can forge the constitutional identity, and how the traditions can be used by the law. The fact, presupposed by Rosenfeld (Jan. 1995, p. 1095) is in accordance with the hermeneutic conception, and it departs from the inherent incompleteness of the constitutional text. As he explains:

> A written constitutional text is inevitably incomplete and subject to multiple plausible interpretations. It is incomplete not only because it does not cover all subjects that it ought ideally to address, but also because it cannot exhaustively address all conceivable issues arising under the subjects that it does encompass. Moreover, precisely because of the incompleteness of the constitutional text, constitutions must remain open to interpretation; and that, in most cases, means open to conflicting interpretations that appear to be equally defensible.

To Rosenfeld, the interpretation issue must never be put apart from the problem of understanding and integrating traditions. That's because the constitutional interpretation depends on a reflexive comprehension of the constitutional identity. And the constitutional identity is inevitably related with other identities such as the national, the ethnics, religious and cultural identities which are always in tension under the pluralistic dimension of contemporary constitutionalism. As said by Rosenfeld (Jan. 1995, p. 1051)

> […] constitutional interpreters cannot be completely stripped of their national or cultural identity. Accordingly, the key question becomes how constitutional identity can distance itself sufficiently from the relevant identities against which it needs to forge its own image while, at the same time, incorporating enough elements from these identities to remain viable within its own sociopolitical environment.

According to Rosenfeld, the tools for the reconstruction are the negation, the metaphor and the metonymy. He recurs to Hegel in order to explain the negation. The way to conform the so called identity of the constitutional subject is reflexive and hermeneutical. It evolves three stages. At the first stage, the relation with the tradition is one of negation. There is a search for a different identity. An identity different from the one came from the pre-constitutional one. The features of this first stage are the repudiation of the pre-revolutionary past, the rejection of the traditional identities and the exclusion of the aggressive and anti-pluralist traditions (ROSENFELD, Jan. 1995, 1071). The second stage is characterized by the selective incorporation of the traditions left behind and not by a mere return to them. The traditions are evoked as long as they are compatible with the interests of the constitutionalism. At this moment we have a negation of the negation, i.e. the pluralism must reincorporate the conceptions of good previously denied, adopting an activist profile, knowing that the resulting tradition came from its own work.

The use of the metaphor corresponds to the Freudian concept of condensation. To combine and organize complex and multifaceted elements in terms of similarities it becomes possible to better apprehend the identities. To Rosenfeld (Jan. 1995, p. 1078), the metaphor plays a fundamental role in the legal rhetoric as well as in legal interpretation. An example could be found in the American dictum that "the Constitution is colorblind". It should be seen as a metaphor to emphasize the similarities among the races, or in other words, what they share in spite of their differences.

The dissenting opinions in Bowers v. Hardwick did not consider the homosexuality among different cultures in history. They focused at the similarities between homosexuals and heterosexuals through the individual view, considering that they both have "the same interest in deciding how he will live his own life, and, more narrowly, how he will conduct himself in his personal and voluntary associations with his companions. State intrusion into the private conduct of either is equally burdensome" (ROSENFELD, Jan. 1995, p. 1079).

The metonymy goes in an opposite direction of that one adopted by the metaphor. While the last one points to the similarities, the metonymy leads to a larger contextualization. And concerning constitutional rights, the use of the metonymy can lead both to its enlargement as well as to its restriction. It can be well illustrated by the majority opinions in Bowers v. Hardwick. The Supreme Court's majority refusal to extend intimate association privacy rights to protect consensual homosexual sex, was considered to be justified by traditional repudiation through criminalization of homosexual acts and by hostility towards homosexuality rooted in the Judeo-Christian religious tradition. The idea of the autonomous individual left alone to decide about his or her intimate associations was denied by the Justices in the majority in Bowers. The idea of the autonomous individual had to be contextualized with the historical traditions and the precedents, in order to show the inapplicability of Griswold, which was considered to involve the right of privacy in the context of the marital relationship.

The process of interpretation is a process of reconstruction. But it does not mean that law should be seen as if really were a mirror for the readers. Even if it was possible to return to the original intention of the authors, as of the Framers – and, as Gadamer shows, it is not possible – this would be no guarantee for a proper interpretation. We must take the text seriously, because without text we don't have norms (TRIBE, 1995). Or, in Gadamer's lesson: who wants to understand a text must, first of all, let the text tell him something. The best way to interpretation is to search for the meaning in the dialectical interplay between the text and the attribution of meaning.

Law requires a perennial interpretation considering that the words of the law are not unequivocal. As Dworkin (1986, p. 16-19) has shown, the reflexive (or philosophic) approach is the only interpretive dimension which is coherent to a written Constitution. It continues the tradition, but it will be a tradition of cultivating citizens who can think critically for themselves about the meaning of the common and shared lives, as well as their duties and commitments. The interpretative process of law does not mean the discovery of unequivocal or right direction, but, instead, means a productive interpretation originated from a process of understanding. In this process, the hermeneutic situation of the jurist merges with the legal text expressing something that is not only the prejudices of the interpreter, and not only the text. It is something that comes from the inherent difference between them, and appears as something new.

An interpretation can only be improved on a given context, and therefore, the concrete case becomes important. The case reflects a new situation in which the interpreter (the judge is primarily an interpreter) has to renew the effectiveness of the norm. Such effectiveness is not achieved by simply trying to reconstruct the original intent of the legislature. It is an attempt doomed to failure whereas the interpreter's pre-understanding takes part of the interpretive process. Renewing the effectiveness of the norm means to create a new meaning for the norm applied to a case. The horizon of the interpreter, with all his pre-understandings (his life experiences, study and knowledge of law) merges with the horizon of the legal case. From the inter-relationship of the horizon of the interpreter himself with the horizon of the case, a new meaning is born. This meaning needs to be deepened by the interpreter. Otherwise there will certainly be misconceptions and inauthentic preconceptions. Thus, the norm's text is only the beginning of a whole process of interpretation, since understanding is not a simple act of reproduction of the original meaning of the text.

Justice Stephen Bryer (2005, p. 32) has said very appropriately that > [..] as history has made clear, the original Constitution was insufficient. It did not include a majority of the nation within its `democratic community`. It took a civil war and eighty years of racial segregation before the slaves and their descendants could begin to think of the Constitution as theirs. Nor did women receive the right to vote until 1920.

It is valid to remember, with Justice Cardozo (1921, p. 51), that a legal principle, once enunciated, will tend to expand its logical limit, occupying fields for which it was not crafted. The danger, also noticed by the renowned Justice is that, in striving for a coherent and consistent body of law, we might so exalt abstract principles that we would lose sight of the commonsense of justice. But if a legal text – and a precedent is also a text – could cover all the hypotheses of application, then it would be a "perfect norm".3 It would be as if we could draw a map that was perfectly set accordingly to the earth. But then, what advantages could we take from it? As said by Lenio Streck (2007, p. XXXIV), if the reality could be transmitted as it is, we would be facing a paradox. And paradoxes are things about which we cannot decide. Law always demands decision. Therefore, it has to deal directly with the problem of interpretation, with all its difficulties, conflicts and problems.

5 Analyzing a case

In Brazil, we can find a very important example of the contribution of the hermeneutic dimension of language on a judicial decision. The writ of Habeas Corpus 82.424-2, decided by the Brazilian Supreme Court (Supremo Tribunal Federal) became an emblematic decision, a leading case not only about "hate speech" and "freedom of speech", but also for the important discussion about the limits of judicial interpretation concerning legal concepts. In this case, the Brazilian Supreme Court was judging a writ of habeas corpus concerning the possibility of freeing Siegfried Ellwanger, charged and imprisoned for having committed the crime of racism. His crime, typified by law, consisted of having edited, distributed and sold anti-Semitic books, as a writer and editor in chief of the private Press called Revisão Editora Limitada. According to the prosecution, the books contain and support anti-Semitic, racist and discriminatory messages. They intend thereby to induce and incite racial discrimination, sowing in their readers feelings of hatred, contempt and prejudice against people of Jewish origin (BRASIL. Supremo Tribunal Federal, 2004). The other side, the defense, although recognizing the discriminatory effects of the publications, argued that the Jews are a people and not a race. Therefore, Ellwanger could not have committed the crime of racism, which is non-bailable and imprescriptible according to the Brazilian Constitution (Article 5, Clause XLII).

Justice Moreira Alves, who did not recognize the crime of racism, opened the main discussion. His opinion was for the concession of the habeas corpus. In his analysis, the historical element is fundamental for constitutional interpretation. It shows that, when there is no sufficient time for a significant change in the use of the concepts, the use of the word must be considered in its most common meaning. According to the Justice, in the case, the word "racism" is designated to protect the historically persecuted races in Brazil, or, in other words, the black people (BRASIL. Supremo Tribunal Federal, 2004, p. 14). The Jews are not properly a race, and so the crime committed by Siegfried Ellwanger cannot be considered racism.

[3] HABERMAS, Jürgen. Between facts and norms: contributions to a discourse theory of law and democracy, 1999; GÜNTHER, Klaus. The sense of appropriateness: application discourses in morality and law, 1993.

We can see in Justice Moreira Alves' opinion the problems that came from the semantic use of language. In a passage of the opinion, the Justice used some dictionary and encyclopedia definitions of the term. In the end, his vision of race tended to be limited by a biological meaning combined with a certain traditional use in the past. This was the main critique that came from the opinion of Justice Mauricio Corrêa. Inaugurating the divergence, Justice Corrêa emphasized that we cannot use the concept of race in a mere biological meaning. We should never limit our interpretation to the literal meaning of the term. We must combine it with its sociological and anthropological senses (BRASIL. Supremo Tribunal Federal, 2004, p. 25). In a very important moment, the Justice points out that, nowadays, science does not give support for a definition of human races. Biologically speaking, there's no human race because all human beings are biologically equals. Then he concludes:

> Although we cannot recognize anymore, under a strict scientific perspective, any division of human races, racism still exists as a social phenomenon. And that leads us to say that the existence of different races comes from historical, political and social conceptions, which must be considered in the law's application. It is this social aspect, and not the biological one, which inspires the normative regulation of the crime, with its imprescriptibility established by Clause XLII, Article 5 of the Constitution (BRASIL. Supremo Tribunal Federal, 2004, p. 30).

There was also an argument that cannot be forgotten. It said that the original intention of the Constitution was to consider racism only the crime committed against black people. Here we can clearly see the potential danger to consider the effects of a strict originalist approach in legal interpretation. There was really a predominance of references about black people during the constitutional debates. But we should never forget that this award granted to black people in the constitutional debates could have come from the natural indebtedness of Brazilian society with the black community. This conscience predominated during the debates, but it never meant to lose sight of the broader coverage of the normative innovation that was being formulated by our new and democratic Constitution.

Therefore, to take tradition as a parameter to legal interpretation requests that the interpreter never forget the intrinsically open nature of traditions, in their constant and dialectical evolution. As Gadamer taught, the "hermeneutical horizon" is not the horizon of the past, but the fusion of present, past and future in an open and continued construction.

The Ellwanger case shows with great clarity that treating normative concepts such as race, by mere reference to the intention of its creators, can lead to the exclusion of minorities, or even of majorities, from a fundamental protection of rights. Should only the black community be considered the racially protected group of twenty first century Brazil? Why should we not consider the largest Japanese community outside Japan, living in São Paulo and struggling to keep loyal to their traditions? Should we forget the Arabic people, or the Italian and German communities in Southern Brazil? And last but not least, should we once more forget the Indians, the first inhabitants of the country, fighting hard to preserve the integrity of their diverse communities?

If we look at the problem through this veil, it becomes almost self evident that the answer can only be a reverberating no. We cannot interpret race literally, because the other way, it would lead racism to become an impossible crime, for absolute lack of subject. After all, if there is no other human race than the human race itself, the crime of racism losses its purpose and meaning. We also cannot interpret race according to the original intents, because the concepts in Law must always be conceived as a web of concepts and practices, and, as Gadamer demonstrates, the conceptual content can never be separated from the other concepts and pre-concepts (prejudices) that conform to our world view and understanding.

6 Conclusions

The adoption of the reflexive model of hermeneutics in law casts judges as policy makers as well as representative of one of the dimensions of society's "public reason". This dimension is the one of the "rule of law". So, if we add to this the democratic vector as a key element in the system's architecture, we will understand how the judicial process can be a fundamental part of the concept of the right to freedom. It will be a freedom that acquires a more concrete dimension, so far as it can catalyze a new concept of political representation. This will come not only through the abstract voice of the legal statutes, but from the "we the people actually speak", as conceived by Ackerman (1984, p. 1013 ss.; 1989, p. 453 ss.).

The courts mission will be to become a policy agent, in the sense that the judges will act as representatives of the people, and on behalf of the people, to prevent and control the abuses eventually perpetrated by the pattern of the so called "normal politics" (Ackerman). These abuses will not only be those contrary to the majority's institutionalized will through law, but also those abuses committed against the procedurals of the minority's will. The courts major function will be to create conditions of reliability and trust that these fundamental legal edges will not be overcome. Therefore, this model of democracy leads the Judiciary to become an instrument of society, and not merely of the State.

Reference

ACKERMAN, Bruce. Constitutional politics/constitutional law, Yale Law Journal, 1989, vol. 99, p. 453-470.

_____. Discovering the constitution, Yale Law Journal, 1984, vol. 93, p. 1013-1043.

BARBER, Sortirios. Constitutional interpretation: the basic questions. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.

BORK, Robert. The tempting of America. New York: Free Press, 1990.

BRASIL. Supremo Tribunal Federal. Crime de racismo e anti-semitismo: um julgamento histórico do STF (Habeas Corpus n. 82424). Brasília: Brasília Jurídica, 2004.

BREYER, Stephen. Active liberty: interpreting our democratic constitution. New York: Alfred Knopf, 2005.

CARDOZO, Benjamin. The nature of the judicial process. New Heaven: Yale University Press, 1921.

DWORKIN, Ronald. Law's empire. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1986.

GADAMER, Hans-Georg. Truth and Method. 2nd. ed. Translated by Joel Weinsheimer and Donald Marshall. New York: Continuum, 2006.

GÜNTHER, Klaus. The sense of appropriateness: application discourses in morality and law. New York: Sate University of New York Press, 1993.

HABERMAS, Jürgen. Between facts and norms: contributions to a discourse theory of law and democracy. Boston: MIT, 1999.

MICHELMAN, Frank. Brennan and democracy. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.

MONTESQUIEU, Charles Luis de Secondat, Baron de la Brède et de. De l'esprit des lois. Paris: Garnier-Flammarion, 1979.

PALMER, Richard. Hermeneutics – interpretation theory in Schleiermacher, Dilthey, Heidegger and Gadamer. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1969.

ROSENFELD, Michel. The identity of the constitutional subject. Cardozo Law Review, Jan. 1995, vol. 16, p. 1049-1109.

SCALIA, Antonin. A matter of interpretation, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.

_____. Originalism: the lesser evil. University of Cincinnati Law Review, 1989, vol. 57, p. 856-857.

STRECK, Lênio. O que é isto – decido conforme minha consciência?. Porto Alegre: Livraria do Advogado, 2010.

_____. Interpretando a constituição: Sísifo e a tarefa do hermeneuta. In TRIBE, Laurence e DORF, Michael. Hermenêutica constitucional. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2007.

SUNSTEIN, Cass. Designing democracy. What constitutions do. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

TONTTI, Jarkko. Right and prejudice: prolegomena to a hermeneutical philosophy of Law. Burlington: Ashgate, 2004.

TRIBE, Laurence. Taking text and structure seriously. Harvard Law Review, 1995, vol. 108, nº 6, p. 1221-1303.

TRIBE, Laurence e DORF, Michael. On reading the constitution. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1991.

WHITTINGTON, Keith. Constitutional interpretation: textual meaning, original intent and judicial review. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1999.

Philosophical and Jurisprudential Issues on Domestic Violence and Gender Discrimination

Marcia Nina Bernardes[1]

Abstract: In this paper, I want to examine issues concerning gender discrimination present in the application of Brazilian Law 11340/ 2006, the so called Lei Maria da Penha. First, I claim that gender violence is both a cause and consequence of gender discrimination. Then I look into definitions of gender-based violence by the Rio de Janeiro State Appeal Courts. I contend, resorting to Judith Butler's definition of gender performance, there is no fixed, stable and uncontroverted definition of the categories women and of gender, and I discuss some to the complications that this raises for women's protection

Keywords: gender discrimination, distinction sex/gender, gender performance

1. Introduction:

In this paper, I want to examine issues concerning gender discrimination present in the application of Brazilian Law 11340/ 2006, the so called Lei Maria da Penha. It is our first Brazilian statute against domestic violence, enacted in 2006 as the result of a great mobilization of domestic and transnational feminist networks. In fact, after a joint effort of different governmental bodies and civil society organizations, the draft bill prepared by the Feminist Consortium was discussed and unanimously approved in Congress with practically unaltered language.

I will divide my presentation into two parts: a brief introduction

[1] Professor of Law at the Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro (PUC-Rio). Academic Coordinator of the Human Rights Center (PUC-Rio Law Department). Juridical Science Doctor (NYU School of Law 2007). Hauser Global Scholar (NYU School of Law 2001). I would like to thank Adriana Vidal for profitable discussions on this topic, which informed many of the most fundamental insights in this paper. I would also like to thank Noel Struchiner. His comments on a earlier version of this paper helped me envision further complications for judicial adjudication raised by a Butlerian framework. I owe him many of the points highlighted in the conclusion. I thank CNPq and FAPERJ for providing the funds for the research that originated this paper.

to the phenomenon of domestic violence, to make the case that it is both a cause and consequence of gender discrimination, and then an analysis of judicial controversies on the definition of a gender-based action. I will look into decisions by the Rio de Janeiro State Appeal Courts, and, for this analysis, the work of American philosopher Judith Butler will be referential. I contend that there is no fixed, stable and uncontroversial definition of the categories women and of gender, and I discuss some to the complications that this raises for women's protection.

2. On Domestic Violence and Discrimination

To be sure, women are not the exclusive victims of domestic violence and other social groups, such as children and the elderly, may also be victims. However, domestic violence affects women disproportionately and hinders their participation in social conditions of parity with men. No other social group is so affected by this problem, which is "one of the most serious causes of homelessness, disease and disability in women."[2] In fact, according to the United Nations, women and girls aged 15 to 44 are more likely to suffer rape or some form of domestic violence than cancer, car accidents, wars or malaria.[3] In Brazil, according to the Secretariat for the Promotion of Policies for Women, women are the victims of 74% of domestic violence incidents recorded in public hospitals. In 53% to 70% of the reported cases, the abuser is the husband or partner.[4] Although significant, these numbers are not accurate. Most episodes of domestic violence are not reported. Given the seriousness of this scenario, it becomes critical to understand the contours of this problem and the reasons that allow for its perpetuation and its systematic character.

Part of the difficulty lies in the fact that this kind of violence does not translate into individual episodes, but into continuous situations where the seriousness of the violence should be measured not only by

[2] MEYERSFELD, Bonita. Domestic Violence and International Law. Hart Publishing, 2010, p.1.

[3] Resources for Speakers on Global Issues, Ending Violence Against Women and Girls, United Nations, http://www.un.org/en/globalissues/briefingpapers/endviol/index.shtml, Last visited on Feruary 13th, 2013.

[4] Política Nacional de Enfrentamento da Violência Doméstica. Secretaria de Promoção das mulheres. 2011, p. 11-13. Available at em http://www.sepm.gov.br/publicacoes-teste/publicacoes/2011/politica-nacional the severity of the physical harm caused but also by the degree of vulnerability and isolation that it causes to the victim. In fact, we know that domestic violence can be equated to torture in terms of the intensity of physical and psychological (in addition to the moral) suffering inflicted on the victim.[5] But even mild forms of injury in the context of domestic violence and the subordination of women acquire a seriousness that they would not have in other contexts. Domestic violence is somehow invisible; these forms of violence are either normalized and naturalized or are so extreme that people won't believe the victim and the woman is simply discredited.[6]

Likewise, the intimacy with the offender - who is her father, husband, partner, boyfriend – makes it harder for the victim to acknowledge she is in an abusive relationship, and then to gather the courage to get out of it, facing all the economic and personal consequences of this decision. In fact, Bonita Meyersfeld says that the intimacy element complicates the understanding of victims of violence, their ability to escape from it and society's reaction to their experience.[7] Often, these victims are economically dependent on the abuser and feel pressured to stay in the abusive relationship by the extended family, by their children or even by her own notions of her role as a woman. To report or to leave that abusive situation can be perceived as a "failure" of the female obligation to ensure the family harmony. Moreover, the element of intimacy facilitates the perception of this situation as a private matter in which

[5] Cf. International Criminal Tribunal for Former Yoguslavia (ICTY), Appeal Chamber, Prosecutor v Kunarac et. al, 12 de junho de 2002, paras. 151-152. Inter-American Court on Human Rights, Case González et. al. vs. México (Cottonfield case). Judgement on november 16th, 2009 (Preliminary Exceptions, Merits and Reparation). Concurrent opinion Judge Cecilia Medina Quiroga, paras.1, 8-9. Cf. Article 2 of the Inter-American Convention Against Torture. On rape and domestic violence as forms of torture, see MacKinnon, Catharine (1993), 'On torture: A feminist perspective on human rights', in Mahoney & Mahoney (eds) Human Rights in the Twenty-First Century: A Global Challenge, Martinus Nijhoff', p. 22.

[6] Cf. Amnesty International & Redress, Gender and Torture: Conference Report, Available at http://www.redress.org/downloads/publications/GenderandTortureConferenceReport-191011.pdf

[7] MEYERSFELD, Bonita. Domestic Violence and International Law. Hart Publishing, 2010, p. 122. The following analyzis is largely influenced by Meyersfeld's book on State International Responsibility for domestic violence. According to her, there are five fundamental elements that should be present: the severity of the harm, the continued aspect of violence, the intimacy between the victim and the offender, group vulnerability and state failure in preventing such violence.

society should not get involved. The intimacy between victim and aggressor expands the role that gender stereotypes play in the dynamics of naturalization and justification of discrimination and violence against women.[8]

One should also add to this picture the lack of trust in public institutions. The fear that nothing will happen to the perpetrator may discourage many victims. Therefore, these women, when they manage to seek help in the public sphere, need a proper response from the state. The phenomenon of double victimization refers to the common situations in which women are once again discriminated against, now by public officials, based on gender stereotypes. Questions like: "What did you do to make him that angry?" or, "What were you doing out that late?" can be terribly intimidating, in effect blaming the victim for the violence she suffered.[9]

In light of the seriousness of this scenario, the Maria da Penha Law is commonly regarded as an important achievement in terms of rights protection. It is the result of a social understanding, gradually and painfully achieved, about the relationship between domestic violence and gender discrimination. However, after it was enacted, a number of issues arose in the Judiciary. One of the loudest controversies, already settled by the Brazilian Constitutional Court (the Supreme Federal Tribunal, "STF," in Portuguese) revolved around the fact that its protection is applied only to women who are victims of domestic violence.[10] Several lawyers and judges argued that this restriction violates the non-discrimination principle, (Article 3, IV and Article 5, I of the Brazilian Constitution), and, therefore, the statute should also be declared unconstitutional. The STF, in 2012, upheld its constitutionality, ending

---

[8] CASTILHO, Ela Wiecko. "Estereótipos sexuais na justiça brasileira" in COOK, Rebecca. Rebecca Cook entrevistada por Débora Diniz. Rio de Janeiro: EdUERJ, 2012, p. 51-62. FREITAS, Lucia Gonçalves de. "Representações de papéis de gênero na violência conjugal em inquéritos policiais" in Cadernos de Linguagem e Sociedade, v. 12, p. 128-152, 2011. COOK, Rebecca & CUSACK, Simone. Gender Stereotyping: Transnational legal perspectives. University of Pensylvannia Press, 2010.

[9] In the Cotton field case, decided in 2009 by the Inter-American Court on Human Rights, there are a number of examples of double, or secondary, victimization. Cf Inter-American Court on Human Rights, Case González et. al. vs. México (Case Cotton Field). Judgment on November 16th, 2009 (Preliminary Exceptions, Merits and Reparation), par. 151-154, 196-208.

[10] Law 11.340/2006, articles 1, 2 and 3. Available at www.brazilink.org/tiki-download_file.php?fileId.

the dispute over this topic in lower courts.[11] It broadly accepted the feminist argument that men and women are not in comparable situations, given that only women carry the inferiority stigma and, therefore, face a greater challenge when trying to leave a violent environment.

However, in the next section, I want to examine other controversies in the Judiciary, related to the interpretation given by different courts to the related notions of gender oppression, gender discrimination and vulnerability.

3. An Analysis of Brazilian Case Law on Gender Violence

The judicial controversies in which I am interested emerge because the statute defines domestic violence, in Article 5, as any kind of action or inaction "based on gender" causing women's death, injury or physical, sexual or psychological suffering, or patrimonial, or moral damage. Such action or inaction may take place in a "space shared by people with or without family ties" as well as in "the scope of the family" or even in any "intimate relationship of affection." However, when exactly is an action or inaction "based on gender"? This is the fundamental starting question. The same acts, if not based on gender, would be tried according to the gender-neutral Brazilian Criminal Code.

At stake here is a dispute over the meaning of "gender" and, thus, of "gender oppression". The term "gender" has been used in opposition to "sex": the former refers to the biological reality of male and female bodies, whereas the latter refers to a social construct about what is proper for men and women to do, to think, and to feel.[12] It is in this sense that Simone de Beauvoir famously said that "one is not born but, rather, becomes a woman."[13] Judith Butler reminds us that this disjunction between nature and culture allows for different cultural interpretations of a female bodies and breaks from the fixity of women's (and men's) identities. Moreover, the subordinate status of women in patriarchal societies is not a natural given, but a social construct.

[11] Ação Direta de Constitucionalidade 19, decided in February 8th, 2012. In this action, Brazilian Executive Branch, in support of the Law, asked the Court to declare that the following provisions are constitutional: Article 1 (establishing the right of women to be free from domestic violence in compliance with Brazilian Constitution and International Obligations derived from International Treaties), articles 33 and 41, which, combined, changed the classification of minor bodily injures derived from domestic violence from misdemeanor to crimes, to the jurisdiction over theses case from the Special Criminal Courts to newly created Special Domestic Violence Courts.

[12] The World Health Organization thus defines both concepts: (i) sex is "the biological and physiological characteristics that define men and women", (ii) gender is the "socially constructed roles, behaviours, activities, and attributes that a given society considers appropriate for men and women." Available at http://www.who.int/gender/whatisgender/en/. (visited on January 20th, 2014).

> the distinction between sex and gender has been crucial to the long-standing feminist effort to debunk the claim that anatomy is destiny; (…)With that distinction intact, it is no longer possible to attribute the values or social functions of women to biological necessity(…). the presumption of a causal or mimetic relation between sex and gender is undermined.[14]

Butler notices that there is an ambiguity in the expression "become a woman": it can be interpreted as referring to a social construct that is "imposed on identity", shaping it via different constraints, but it also can be understood as a "project" of constructing ourselves.[15] In this second sense, if gender is a "choice", one would have to be positioned some place outside gender, from which to choose what to be. That brings all sorts of philosophical puzzles related to the assumption of an ontological subject prior to language and culture. On the other hand, the first option also poses difficult questions. Questions of agency and resistance become problematic at the same time that it also assumes a "female self-identical being" who is distorted and oppressed by culture:

> Does this system [patriarchy] unilaterally inscribe gender upon the body, in which case the body would be a purely passive medium and the subject, utterly subjected? How then would we account for the various ways in which gender is individually reproduced and reconstituted? What is the role of personal agency in the reproduction of gender?[16]

As a social construct or as a personal project, rather than a nat-

[13] BEAUVOIR, Simone. The Second Sex. New York: Vintage Books, 1973, p.301.
[14] BUTLER, Judith. "Sex and Gender in Simone de Beauvoir's Second Sex". Yale French Studies, No. 72 (1986), p. 35.
[15] BUTLER, Judith. "Sex and Gender in Simone de Beauvoir's Second Sex". Yale French Studies, No. 72 (1986), p. 36. Later, in her book Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. (New York: Routledge. 1990), Butler questions the expression "project" and chooses the word "strategy", as we will see later in this section.
[16] BUTLER, Judith. "Sex and Gender in Simone de Beauvoir's Second Sex". Yale French Studies, No. 72 (1986), p. 36.

ural fact, one may wonder if gender relations may vary. That poses the question if gender hierarchies subordinate all women, even if to different degrees. Can we think of women's emancipation in this scenario? Are there subjective requirements that should be assessed in each individual case in order to determine if there is a situation of subordination, or should the verification of objective elements be enough? Back to the application of Maria da Penha Law, will episodes of violence between brothers and sisters, parents against children, adults against the elderly, between same sex couples, and employers against maids necessarily fall under the law's scope as long as the victims are women? Or should we assess which women are vulnerable to domestic violence based on gender?

Our Constitutional Court, in the 2012 decision mentioned above, did not provide a direct answer on this topic. But it declared null and void the statute's provision that established the victims' consent as a condition for the criminal prosecution of minor bodily injuries, alleging that women, due to gender coercion, are not in a position to grant a truly free consent. This implies the perception of domestic violence as a structural problem and, as such, affects all women. However, lower courts, when deciding on which law – the Maria da Penha or the Criminal Code – they should apply, have construed the idea of gender-based action in different ways, not entirely consistent amongst each other. Both objective and subjective analyses played a role in these decisions.

A survey of Rio de Janeiro case law, between February 8th 2012 and February 8th 2013, indicates conceptual difficulties in the application and interpretation of law.[17] Some of the cases surveyed establish "the subjugation of women" as the defining characteristic and most decisions analyzed stress "vulnerability or physical and economic inferiority of women in intimate relationships" as a definition of gender-based violence, attaching great importance to biological elements in order to explain the subordination of women and their vulnerability to violence.[18]

[17] In a research I conducted at PUC-Rio, we read all decisions by the Rio de Janeiro State Court of Appeals, issued between February 2012 and February 2013, settling conflicts of jurisdiction between Domestic Violence Special Courts and Regular Criminal Courts. According to Brazilian Law, cases of minor bodily offenses will be judged by regular criminal courts unless it was "based on gender". In the 52 decisions we saw, these types of courts disagreed on whether a given offense was based on gender or not and the Court of Appeals settled the dispute. I thank Mariana Braga and Daniella Ferrari, who diligently assisted me in this research.

[18] On the primacy of the biological element in the definition of gender-based violence by

Likewise, another biological element, puberty, is often used to define if an episode of violence against children and adolescents was based on gender or on age. It is fair to say that to many judges in Rio de Janeiro, "woman" is defined by a biological reality, despite the decade-long efforts to distinguish nature from nurture when it comes to sex and gender. And because biology is given, fixed and universal, the decisions based on this understanding do not tackle the question of agency or resistance, in order to assess the victim's vulnerability.

Lets bracket the agency problem for a moment and focus on the biology versus culture problem. According to the logic above, one could argue that travestites and trangender individuals, to the extent that they would not be in principle "biologically vulnerable", could not be victims of gender-based violence. To be sure, Amini Haddad Campos and Lindinalva Campos Rodrigues Correa, respectively judge and prosecutor in a Domestic Violence Court in Mato Grosso for a few years, state in a book they wrote on women's rights that "only women, legally and biologically recognized as such, can be considered as a victim of the crime of domestic violence against women, for obvious reasons".[19] However, isn't it precisely because of their social performance similar to a woman, betraying the conduct of a "real macho", that they suffer this violence? [20] To what extent is the use of biological arguments suitable to reveal the vulnerability of a social group and to justify State measures that can protect them more or less widely?

Gender performance is a key concept for Judith Butler, which has called into question the very distinction sex/gender. For her, both sex and gender are only meaningful concepts within culture and discourse. After all, is there a sexed body which is not, from the start, gendered? Is there some being which becomes a gender on a given point of

---

Rio de Janeiro State Courts, see the Procedures Conflitos de Competência No. 0053878-15.2012.8.19.0000, 0047795-14.2011.8.19.0001, 0010627-44.2012.8.19.0000, 0048425-39.2012.8.19.0000. For cases resorting to the fragility/vulnerability/inferiority argument, see Conflitos de Competência. 0016705-54.2012.8.19.0000, 0032898-47.2012.8.19.0000, 0037024-43.2012.8.19.0000, 0028450-31.2012.8.19.0000, 0062788-31.2012.8.19.0000, 0037100-67.2012.8.19.0000, 0063544-40.2012.8.19.0000.

[19] CAMPOS, Amini Haddad & CORREA, Lindinalva Rodrigues. Direitos Humanos das Mulheres. Editora Juruá, 2007.

[20] On homophobia as gender violence, see GOMEZ, Maria Mercedes. "Violencia por prejuicio" in MOTTA, Cristina & SAEZ, Macarena (org.) La mirada de los jueces: sexualidades diversas em la jurisprudência latino-americana. Bogotá: Siglo del Hombre Editores, 2008, pp. 90- 190.

her life and how did she do that?[21]

To correlate sex to nature resulted in an association of sexuality to reproduction. That, in turn, contributed to the construction of matrix, which naturalizes heterosexuality and divides humanity into males and females. In Butler's conception, the natural fact of "sex", assumed in the sex/gender distinction, imposes limits on the possibilities of cultural constructions of gender, and allows for the "naturalization" of gender stereotypes. Speech acts, repeated over time, stabilize the division of bodies in two groups along sexual lines, at the same time that each of these groups are, in turn, perceived as more or less homogenous. This claim is not intended to deny differences between male and female bodies, but to emphasize that, in this matrix, existing similarities between these bodies become irrelevant, and so do the differences between different bodies of the same assigned sex.[22] Resorting to Foucault's analysis on sexuality, she also claims that such division is an expression of power, creating hierarchies between bodies.[23] The notion of "sexual differences" made possible the distribution of social roles between man and women as if it were a natural given. The consequence, she claims, is that the emancipatory content intended in the distinction sex-gender is, thus, lost.

> Collectively considered, the repeated practice of naming sexual difference has created this appearance of natural division. The "naming" of sex is an act of domination and compulsion, an institutionalized performance that both creates and legislates social [21] BUTLER. Judith. Gender trouble: feminism and the subversion of identity, p.89. Butler criticizes various feminist theories because of their resort to the foundational categories of : "natural sex", "real women". According to her, "categories of true sex, discrete gender, and specific sexuality have constituted the stable point of reference for a great deal of feminist theory and politics. These constructs of identity serve as the points of epistemic departure from which theory emerges and politics it, self is shaped. In the case of feminism, politics is ostensibly shaped to express the interests, the perspectives, of "women." But Is there a political shape to "women," as it were, that precedes and prefigures the political elaboration of their interests and epistemic point of view? See also VIDAL, Adriana de Oliveira. A constituição da mulher brasileira: uma análise dos estereótipos de gênero. Doctoral Dissertation presented to PUC-Rio Law Department. April, 2012. Available at http://www.dbd.puc-rio.br/pergamum/tesesabertas/0721432_2012_pretextual.pdf.

[22] VIDAL, Adriana de Oliveira. A constituição da mulher brasileira. Op.cit.

[23] FOUCAULT, Michel. The History of Sexuality, Vol I, An Introduction Nova York: Vintage, 1990.On the relevance of speech acts in Butler's theory, see BUTLER, Judith. Excitable Speech: a Politics of the Performative. Routledge, 1997.

> reality by requiring the discursive/perceptual construction of bodies in accord with principles of sexual differences.[24]

Butler defines as "heterosexual matrix" this "performative", not natural or biological, association between sex, gender and desire. According to her, patriarchy should be understood as a compulsory heterosexual matrix structured by a binary logic which excludes subjectivities that do not align perfectly to these binaries. For her, discourse forges subjectivities - the "normal" male and "normal" female - assigning to each social behaviors, gender identities and specific sexual behaviors. In this conception, the intelligibility of concepts like body, sexual orientation and social role is only possible within the repeated and naturalized performances in this matrix, and, thus, the distinction between sex and gender becomes problematic, as mentioned above. On the one hand, male bodies are associated with a masculine identity determinant of manly behavior and sexual desire for the opposite sex. On the other hand, the female body is correlated to a passive identity and sexual desire also for the opposite sex.

> I asked what configuration of power constructs the subject and the Other; the binary relation between "men" and "women," and the internal stability of those terms? (…) Are those terms untroubling only to the extent that they conform to a heterosexual matrix for conceptualizing gender and desire? What happens to the subject and to the stability of gender categories when the epistemic regime of presumptive heterosexuality is unmasked as that which produces and reifies these ostensible categories of ontology?" [25]

Butler rejects the conception of the body as grounds for a substantial, pre-discursive identity, which, in her account, is always "performed" instead of expressed, and is always "discontinuous" and not stable or solid. In this framework, gender should be understood as a "doing" and not a "being", and identity as a result, not an assumption, of performance. In her book Gender Trouble, she recalls Beauvoir in order to make clear her own conception of "gender":

> And in my earlier reading of Beauvior, I suggest that gendered bodies are so many 'styles of the flesh.' These styles all never fully > self-styled, for styles have a history, and those histories condition and limit the possibilities. Consider gender, for instance, as a corporeal style, an 'act,' as it were, which is both intentional and performative, where 'performative' suggests a dramatic and contingent construction of meaning.[26]

[24] BUTLER, Judith. Gender Trouble. Op.cit. p. 147.
[25] BUTLER, Judith. Gender Trouble. Op.cit., p. XXX.

She goes on to say that rather than conceiving gender as a "project", as she did in an earlier article, it should be conceived as a strategy of cultural survival, always inscribed in historical power relations with "clearly punitive consequences." [27] In fact, she says that "discrete genders are part of what 'humanizes' individuals within contemporary culture; indeed, we regularly punish those who fail to do their gender right."[28] Adriana Vidal illustrates this humanizing process of gendering someone resorting to the first question a pregnant woman is asked: "Is it a boy or a girl"?[29] Those who 'fail' to do their gender right, such as LGBTI individuals, are constructed as "the other", the abject, who at once transgress and affirm the boundaries of culturally permissible identities.

Thus, whenever the heterosexual binaries are subverted either by LGBTI individuals, or by women with aggressive manners or men with gentle temper, patriarchy reacts, usually violently. How should law respond to that? Back to our question: who should be protected against domestic violence, since gender violence is reproduced in gay relationships, in relationships between transgender women and heterosexual men, between intersex individuals and their families? Should transgender women and transvestites be included in the legal definition of women for the protection against patriarchal violence? Can we de-stabilize the category "women" without weakening the protection?

In a case decided in a lower court in the state of Goias, the judge applied the Maria da Penha Law in a case of domestic violence against a tranvestite, based on the concept of "social sex", which approaches the idea of performative sex. According to her, "there was no doubt regarding the victim's social sex, that is, the identity that she assumes before society." [30] This interpretation, nevertheless, has been given in a so far

---

[26] BUTLER, Judith. Gender Trouble. Op.cit., p.380 (my emphasis).

[27] BUTLER, Judith. Gender Trouble. Op.cit., p.381

[28] BUTLER, Judith. Gender Trouble. Op.cit., p.381

[29] VIDAL, Adriana. A constituição da mulher brasileira. Op.cit.

[30] See lawsuit nº 201103873908, decided in 2011 by a judge in the Goiás State: "Destarte, não posso acolher o respeitável parecer ministerial e ignorar a forma pela qual a ofendida se apresenta perante a todas as demais pessoas, não restando dúvida com relação ao isolated case in Brazil.

If Butler is right and gender is a social performance that constitutes subjects, how can we think of agency? Are all women necessarily subjugated? Is women's emancipation possible? In a controversial decision, one of the chambers of the Rio de Janeiro Court of Appeals decided that one cannot assume vulnerability and that it has to be found in each specific situation. The facts of the case related to an episode involving two famous actors, then boyfriend and girlfriend, in which he allegedly slapped her in the face and pushed her to the floor, because she showed her breasts during a play she was performing in. The panel of judges argued that Maria da Penha law protected women that were vulnerable to violence due to gender oppression, providing an interesting interpretation of the sex/gender system. The decision quotes the Statute to say that gender oppression is socially constructed and that it would be wrong to raise any biological justification for the hierarchy between genders. Thus, it further argues (and here is the novelty), it is not because one is biologically a women that she is vulnerable. It is notorious, the panel says, the actress in question has never been oppressed or subjugated by men in any sense, therefore the Maria da Penha Law should not be applied in the case.[31] The panel used the distinction sex-gender to weaken women's protection, instead of strengthening it.

There are a number of considerations to be made here. It is clear that this decision assumes a liberal perspective and ignores, or doesn't sufficiently account for, the pervasive and constitutive character of gender oppression. According to the panel, power is perceived as an asset a subject may have or not, and epistemically, the decision assumes that there is a subject who is ontologically free and autonomous, which may be "later" oppressed by culture. In this framework, law should make sure that there are no unjustifiable constraints on one's autonomy. In seu sexo social, ou seja, a identidade que a pessoa assume perante a sociedade. Somados todos esses fatores (a transexualidade da vítima, as características físicas femininas evidenciadas e seu comportamento social), conferir à ofendida tratamento jurídico que não o dispensado às mulheres (nos casos em que a distinção estiver autorizada por lei), transmuda-se no cometimento de um terrível preconceito e discriminação inadmissível, em afronta inequívoca aos princípios da igualdade sem distinção de sexo e orientação sexual, da dignidade da pessoa humana e da liberdade sexual, posturas que a Lei Maria da Penha busca exatamente combater."

---

[31] The court, then, denied the application of the Maria da Penha Law and decided that the gender-neutral Criminal Code should be applied. See Embargos Infringentes number 0376432-04.2008.8.19.0001, decided on July 1st, 2013.

this case, the court found none and concluded that law should remain neutral.

However, structural approaches to power, such as Foucault's and Butler's, highlight its pervasive character and criticize dyadic models, which focus on the relation between oppressors and oppressed. Power constitutes male and female subjectivities in both public and private realms, backed by publicly institutionalized practices and discourses. Oppression is not merely a result of abusive acts of some mean people, as Iris Young, also influenced by Foucault's analysis of power, explains:

> Its causes are embedded in unquestioned norms, habits, and symbols, in the assumptions underlying institutional rules and the collective consequences of following these rules. (…) In this extended structural sense, oppression refers to the vast and deep injustices some groups suffer as a consequence of often unconscious assumptions and reactions of well-meaning people in ordinary interactions, media and cultural stereotypes, and structural features of bureaucratic hierarchies and market mechanisms – in short, the normal processes of everyday life.[32]

In Judith Butler's terms, there is no way out of culture, which will always impose on our bodies and genders a given intelligibility. Both actors involved in the case were performing according to the heterosexual matrix. The actress in question does seem to be a very powerful woman, as the Court noted, and yet, she was hit by him. She subversively dared to defy the stereotype of a well-behaved woman, she dared to confront [32] YOUNG, Iris. "Five Faces of Oppression" in George Henderson and Marvin Waterstone (eds.) Geographic Thought: a Praxis Perspective. New York: Routledge, 2009, p.56. Her five faces of oppression are: exploitation, marginalization, powerlessness, cultural dominance and violence. To be sure, not every individual in an oppressed group will be a passive victim. There are different and sophisticated ways in which one may explain agency and empowerment of individuals who are members of vulnerable social groups. In Butler's framework the concept that approaches that idea is the concept of "subversive bodily acts". See the last part of her book Gender trouble: feminism and the subversion of identity. She explains those subversive acts linguistically in the book Excitable Speech. On the question of agency and structural character of power, see BIROLI, Flávia. "Autonomia, opressão e identidades: a ressignificação da experiência na teoria política feminista". Revista Estudos Feministas, Florianópolis. vol. 21, nº 1, pp 81-105, 2013. In Butler's framework the concept that approaches that idea is the concept of "subversive bodily acts", which she explains in her book Gender Trouble. She explains those subversive acts linguistically in the book Excitable Speech.

him when inquired about it, and he felt authorized to hit her. In fact, in this case, it seems it is because she was empowered that she was hit. This is the meaning of oppression or subordination: the fact that some people – empowered or not – will have to navigate through obstacles and challenges that do not exist in regard to individuals differently positioned in society.

4. Concluding remarks

If we take into consideration Butler's analysis on gender, the reliance on stable and fixed categories of women and men become problematic. As we saw, despite the great awareness of the cultural character of gender social roles, the search for these categories's foundations will take us back to some cientific and supposedly incontroversial fact: women are naturally vulnerable or women are not naturally vulnerable. The performative aspect of being a women is, thus, rendered invisible.

However, law and public policies proceed via more or less rigid categories. Should judges, then, in their decisions, de-stabilize the category women in the application of the Maria da Penha Law to include transvestites and exclude seemingly empowered women, for instance? In fact, de-stabilization prescriptions may maximize much discussed Herbert L. Hart's penumbra problems and Ronald Dworkin's hard cases. That is a question to be answered by an adjudication theory that goes beyond the scope of this paper.

Precedent as a typological term upon the Court of Justice of the European Union Decisions

Bartosz Greczner, PhD[1]

Abstract: This Article addresses the concept of precedent on the grounds of the European Union. It analyzes the methodological status of the term and determines under which conditions it is an adequate research tool for the European Union courts decisions examination. The Article argues that the methodological status of the term "precedent" present in the literature is incorrect. Studies presented in the article led to conclusion that the term precedent has typological character and only having such methodological status a term precedent is suitable for analysis of the case law of the CJoEU.

Keywords: Precedent, Court of Justice of the European Union, Typological term.

The legal order of the European Union is constantly developing creating dynamically changing legal reality. This new legal order which is in the process of formation sets up new quality and often cannot be unambiguously described through categories peculiar for civil law as well as common law system.

In this paper I will pay my attention to one of the categories which is present in both legal systems, even if very often it is connected with one of them - that is to precedent. The theoretical problem discussed in this paper can be expressed in the form of the following question: Is the term precedent an adequate research tool for the European Union courts decisions examination and under what conditions as to its methodological status? In other words the aim of the research is the analysis of the Court of Justice of the European Union (the Court; CJoEU) trial rulings, for determining whether in the rapidly evolving EU legal order exists the phenomenon, the study which conceptual apparatus associated with the concept of precedent is useful. Raising this problem seems to be appropriate especially as the term precedent is ambiguous. Diversity of the contexts of its use which leads to the terminological chaos within its scope is noticeable.

[1] Wrocław University.

Precedent is a term widely used within the jurisprudence to denote a specific type of judicial decisions. Commonly it is associated with Anglo-Saxon legal culture however since over time precedent began to be used also within the civil law culture. While comparing the two systems of law one can notice the variety of the contexts of its use. This variety leads to the ambiguity of the analyzed term. "Terminological chaos" which results from different usage of the term precedent can be explained by its cultural character[2]. This explanation however is not sufficient in my opinion.

It must be remembered that the concept of precedent is an example of purely theoretical construct. It constitutes an abstract model which consists of some standards - essential features, which do not refer to phenomena that could be known in an objective, empirical manner. The lack of possibilities to verify its essential characteristics in empirical manner is conductive to discussion of its shape and can be a cause of diversity between the particular definitions developed even within one legal culture.

The result of the discussion, carried out in the conditions described above, is an excessive expand of the "terminological net", which we can see when we look at the types of precedent distinguished in legal-theoretical literature. The main problem is not their richness, but the lack of logical correctness between them. The scopes of various terms overlap.

Reasons for above described state of affairs, that is, the conceptual chaos arising on the grounds of jurisprudence in relation to the concept of precedent, I personally ascribe to the lack of reflection on the methodological statues of the term.

As the result of the analysis I have determined two key constructive elements of the term precedent. These are: normative novelty and the real impact on the decisions made in the future, ie. so called influence. No doubt both elements are the foundation or rather a core content of the concept, regardless of the legal culture based on which we analyze the term which is the subject of research. In principle the presence of the two elements mentioned above, allows to classify a particular judicial decision among the precedential decisions. Their absence, on the other hand, exclude the affiliation of such a decision into this class.

---

[2] Zirk – Sadowski, M., Precedens a tzw. decyzja prawotwórcza, PiP, 1980, no. 6, pp. 70

However, these two key features of the concept do not always occur in objects known as precedential decision in a similar form. Both normative novelty and influence can take many forms. In exceptional cases, the normative novelty may even be subject of complete disappearance, which however does not rule out the possibility of determining these objects as a precedent decision. As an example we can indicate declaratory precedents in which normative novelty element is hard to find. This lack is usually compensated by the intensified presence of the other key feature.

In the context of the normative novelty one can speak of at least three different forms of it. Logical (semantic) and axiological forms are distinguished in the literature. One can not forget, however, that the normative novelty may take the form of involving the direct creation of new legal norms (principles or rules), as the judges in the common law system do.

The above mentioned various forms of normative novelty are a manifestation of its alternating intensity (the importance for the system of law).

Assuming the position, according to which the highest level of normative novelty can be observed in the latter form, where the change in the sphere of duty is the most radical, while placing the logical novelty on the opposite end (in this case a charge of normative novelty is the smallest) I presume gradating character of a normative novelty. In other words, I am on the position that the normative novelty when appearing in precedential decisions may appear in them with different intensity taking on various forms of this intensity. Presented arrangement, however, lacks the units of measurement, as analyzed items are phenomena, among which there are no empirical relationships (these items are not the subject of direct observation and measurement). Therefore, the scale used is the ordinal (importance) scale.

In case of influence, as a rule, two main forms can be distinguished. They are: bounding and persuasive influence. These, however, as rightly observed by A. Peczenik are further disaggregated. Within the boundedness, you can point out: boundedness in the strongest sense so-called boundless boundedness, boundedness in the strong sense so-called revoking boundedness and boundedness in the weak sense. In case of persuasive influence the form characterized by the power of "revoking" and "undermining" can be distinguished. Accepting the Peczenik's position five distinct forms of the influence can be seen. Like normative novelty influence has also gradating character. At the highest point of the scale of intensification of that element the boundedness in the strongest sense is placed and persuasive influence in its undermining sense is placed on the opposite end.

It is worth mentioning at this point that, in contrast to the normative novelty (which in exceptional situations can be absent in the precedent decisions) the influence is a sine qua non condition for the recognition of a particular decision as a precedent. That is why influence element can never fully disappear. Occurrence of this element is common to all objects classified as a group of precedential decisions. As in case of normative novelty, arrangement presented above lacks the units of measurement and that is why is an example of an ordinal (importance) scale.

The awareness of the gradating character of the constructive elements of the term precedent together with possible decline of one of them is central to the debate on its methodological status. In this light previously encountered in the literature perception of the concept of precedent as a classifying concept appears to be incorrect. Classifying terms allow, at most, a division of a particular set of objects, due to a property attributed to them into two subsets: items with search feature (features) and subjects without it (them). Lack of indicated features makes it impossible to classify the particular items to the given class. With this assumption classifying terms do not take into account the gradating character of their constructive elements. Therefore classifying terms, do not deal with the analysis of the similarity of the features of the objects not qualified for the class with the characteristics of the objects that have been assigned to it. In other words, they do not analyze the gradating characteristics of the considering items. However, the classification of particular decisions among the class of precedential decisions is based on the perceived similarity between the elements of the decision subjected to classification and the decisions already included in the created class.

Due to the gradating nature of the constructive elements the assignment is based not on their identity, but the general similarity. If we add to this, as I have mentioned before, that judgments which form a group of precedential decisions do not always have both highlighted elements, (the lack of the mentioned features is not an obstacle for their classification to the class), one can see clearly that term precedent can not be considered as a classifying term. In other words, if the concept of precedent would have classifying nature, all legal decisions included by the science among the precedential decisions should always have present both of the above-mentioned features with the same intensity. However, since the analysis of the case law referred to as precedential does not indicate the presence of this regularity, we should look for the answer to the question about the methodological status of the term precedent directing our attention towards typological terms which function as a standard/model. They are the gauge/hallmark of the characteristics features, fundamental for the particular term. Thanks to them, we can not only rule on an object belonging to a group forming a scope of a particular term, but also assess the degree of similarity between the elements of the object with the model due to the intensity of the characteristics features. What is worth to mention, the absence of the features included in the essence of a term does not necessarily mean, in case of typological terms automatic exclusion from the scope of the particular term, as long as sufficient similarity to the model is possible to demonstrate. Thus, the gradation of the key features can result from a situation of their full occurrence, to their almost complete disappearance (and in extreme cases even complete disappearance of some of them).

Thus, studies have led me to conclusion that the term precedent has typological character. Accepted in such form methodological status of the term increases its usefulness in the field of systematization measures of the law sciences, because it leads to the construction of the type row of the emerging precedential decisions. It helps to organize the types of precedential decisions in terms of presence and intensification of their influence and a normative novelty. Depending on which element of the content of the term comes to the front and will be deemed as important we will be able to offer different type rows. If we recognize the normative novelty as a significant feature, the designed type row would include adequately: a norm (principle) precedent, axiological precedent, logical precedent and final example will be decisions where normative novelty is missing. In the above row there will be a possibility to distinguish and rank particular subtypes because of the different intensity of the second element that is the influence.

To confirm the conclusions as to the methodological status of a term precedent, set out in the paper, I referred myself to the judicial material of the Court of Justice of the European Union, and in particular to preliminary rulings.

However before placing them in one of the proposed type rows I compared the practice of the CJoEU with a theoretical depiction of the doctrine of precedent and discussed the similarities and differences that exist between them.

Perceived similarities between the theoretical depiction of the precedent doctrine and practice of preliminary rulings made by the Court of Justice of the EU are so clear that they authorize us to make a thesis which assumes the formation of case law system on the grounds of the European Union. Obviously this is not detailed mapping of the common law system solutions, however, solutions introduced by the Luxembourg judges are very close to them. Thus, the Court of Justice of the European Union can be considered as a "court of precedent"[3], while the preliminary ruling issued by CJoEU can be classify as precedent decisions.

It can be done without fear of making the terminological chaos bigger especially since CJoEU decisions are characterized by the presence of two key elements of the term precedent. Both the normative novelty and the influence are elements that without any doubt can be seen if we take a closer look at the preliminary rulings. The first element however is not present in all the decisions with the same intensity. Normative novelty, which we have to deal with in the preliminary decisions take the form of logical, axiological novelty and norms novelty, that is the novelty which creates legal principles or rules which do not existed yet in the legal system. In addition to the judgments "equipped" in it in the judicial reality decisions, which are only a part of the emerging or already formed case-law and do not create but only confirm the validity of pre-made solutions, can also be found. This type of judgments creates an additional group of decisions different from the decisions equipped in normative novelty element. Using therefore the normative novelty criterion at least four types of preliminary rulings can be distinguished and are a subject of gradating due to the different intensity of that element. Thus, it is possible to rank the preliminary rulings under one type row of precedent decisions proposed in this paper.

The concept of precedent used in jurisprudence (and certainly on the European Union law ground) is not a classifying but typological term.

I would like to sum up by saying that as a result of my analysis I came to the following conclusions:

1 The existing terminological chaos is a result of the treatment of the term precedent as a classifying term.

2 Its actual methodological statutes due to gradating character of

[3] Balcerzak, M. Zagadnienie precedensu w prawie międzynarodowym praw człowieka, Toruń, 2008, pp. 23 its constructive elements should assume its typological character.

3 Only as the typological term precedent is suitable for analysis of the case law of the CJoEU (especially a preliminary rulings) without fear that we make terminological chaos even bigger.

The right to justification and the Rule of Law
Towards a "justifiable" legal argumentation theory

Rafael Cascardo Cardoso dos Santos[1]

Abstract: The fundamental core of moral rights is far from being an undisputed matter among philosophers and scholars in general. Here, I intend to show a possible interpretation of moral rights as having a common ground: the right to justification. The whole construction of this argument relies upon Rainer Forst's book: The Right to Justification. In the mentioned book, the author defends that the content of this right is reconstructed by looking at the contexts of people's relations in society. Although firstly developed in the moral context, I also look to show how this right could be applied to the basic structures of society (here I also rely to Rainer Forst's ideas, however, in a more loose manner). Institutions, however, are limited in internalizing the requirements of the right to justification, since they work inside a pre-established design and not in a pure normative way. Considering these limitations, I will try to show how the Legislative and the Judiciary could act in harmony to enforce this right and to help each other in a synergic manner. To justify the application of the moral notion of the right to justification to institutions, a parallel between this right and the Rule of Law is a useful resource, since the concept proposed here of Rule of Law seems to be close to what we could call an institutional ground to the right to justification. Finally, I will expose how the growing studies on legal justification and argumentation theories could improve with the normative idea of the right to justification. By doing so, my goal is not to show a correct legal argumentation theory, but rather to give an important ground to construct analytical rules and principles of justification in legal reasoning.

Keywords: Justification; Political Constructivism; Rule of Law.

1. Introduction

Prior to starting the work itself, I will briefly outline its sections. Firstly, the components of a moral right to justification will be exposed and analytically decomposed. In this first part, I will focus on the idea shown by Rainer Forst on his book The right to Justification. Following this first description of Rainer Forst's normative conception of the foundation of moral and human rights, the second part shifts its attention to the basic structures of society. This part will show, by the method of political constructivism, how institutions – notably the Legislative and the Judiciary bodies – ought to play its roles inside the requirement of the right to justification and the Rule of Law. There are limits that prevent an institution from achieving an optimal result in theirs deliberative activity and these limits will be exposed not only descriptively, but also in order to suggest ways of making a better deliberation process. Furthermore, I will draw some remarks on Brazil's recent institutional experience and try to diagnose its problems with the help of the approach of the right to justification to political/judicial institutions. Finally, the last section is focused on legal argumentation theories and how they could be affected by the right to justification.

[1] Undergraduate student of State University of Rio de Janeiro (UERJ).

2. The core of moral rights: the basic right to justification

Rainer Forst formulates the right to justification as being the ground of morality, which "lies in the re-cognition of the human responsibility to reciprocally and generally justify one's actions in moral contexts in relation to all others affected"[2]. Moreover, he emphasizes the fact that the action must be reasonably (which means generally and reciprocally) nonrejectable rather than acceptable. This right has two important consequences, one as being positive and the other negative: it grants the affected a right to say in the matter (positive aspect) and a – qualified[3] - veto right against norms and structures that cannot be justified within the two exposed criteria and bring the disadvantaged unjustifiable inequalities (negative aspect).

The first important idea is the criteria of reciprocity and generality. According to Forst, reciprocity "means that no one may refuse the particular demands of others that one raises for oneself (reciprocity of content), and that no one may simply assume that others have the same values and interests as oneself or make recourse to 'higher truths' that are not shared (reciprocity of reasons). Generality means that reasons for generally valid basic norms must be sharable by all those affected"[4]. These criteria provide a common ground by which human rights can be "constructed" and against which no good reason can be raised. However, the principle of justification that gives rise to the duty to justify cannot itself be justified (or "constructed") and we must reconstruct the various contexts of human practices to conclude that the criteria of generality and reciprocity are always present in the intersubjective expectation of individuals. Again, Forst asserts that human beings are justificatory beings and "if we want to understand human practices, we must conceive of them as practices bound up with justifications; no matter what we think or do, we place upon ourselves (and others) the demand for reasons, whether they are made explicit or remain implicit (at least initially)"[5].

[2] FORST, Rainer. The Right to Justification: Elements of a Constructivist Theory of Justice. Translated by Jefffrey Flynn. Columbia University Press, New York, 2012. p. 42.

[3] Rainer Forst characterizes this right as 'qualified' "in the sense that the moral appeal as 'veto' itself must observe the criteria of reciprocity and generality". p 214.

The methodological aspect of the criteria of justification applies primordially to the validity claims of moral relevant actions and norms. In his words, "a comprehensive analysis of practical and normative justification would thus have the task of examining the various contexts of justification within the framework of a recursive reconstruction of the validity claims raised in each context to identify the conditions for redeeming those claims"[6]. It is also very important to emphasize the contextual aspect of the discursive process of justification and its primary addresses: "those affect in relevant ways. This is far more in accord with the meaning of morality, which consists in respecting the justified claims of vulnerable beings. These claims find their way directly into the moral justification"[7]. Therefore, in the discursive procedure of justification, in order for the validity claim of the norm or action to be considered justifiable, the addresses – the most affected in relevant ways – must assess its reciprocal and general validity. The conclusion that we can reach is that, for Forst, the norms that pass the referred test have a "morally unconditional normative character and are in a strict sense categorically binding as norms against whose validity no good reasons can speak"[8]. The moral reasons which justifies the moral claims must be shared reasons, "in order to do justice to the openness of the procedure of justification and to underscore the (in this sense counterfactual) moment of recipro-

[4] FORST, Rainer. Idem. p. 6
[5] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 1
[6] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 16.
[7] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 20.
[8] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 21.

cal and general acceptability – or better, nonrejectability – independent of the factual acceptance or nonacceptance of reasons"[9]. These reasons "arise within a practice of mutual and general justification, and constitute a 'space of justification', which is not a space that contains a stock of moral truths that are fixed once and for all, but one that must always be reactualized and newly validated in concrete practices of justification"[10].

However, this categorical and unconditional binding gives rise to the question of how to conciliate the autonomy of morality and the morality of autonomy. Forst answers this questions with a second-order practical insight, which is an insight not in how to justify – which is explained by the principle of justification -, but into the unconditional duty of justification. This duty, according to Forst, is not derived from an obligation, "but rather as one that a person has in virtue of one's capacity for being a moral person"[11] and that "this means recognizing that (and how) one is accountable to others as an autonomous person, without any further reason"[12]. This insight into the moral point of view combines the "cognitive (the capacity for justification), volitional (willingness to give justification and act justifiably), and affective (the sensorium for moral violations) components"[13]. Forst creates his own view of Kant's idea of human being as an end in itself, affirming that "moral persons recognize one another in accordance with this duty as persons who have an irreducible right to justification. This, on my account, is precisely what it means to regard oneself and others as ends in themselves (…) Without this insight into, and acceptance of, the duty to provide justifications the principle of justification would be left hanging in the air"[14] and saying that "morality is in the first instance concerned with the dignity of other persons"[15].

Another interesting point of Rainer Forst's concept of the right to justification is the advantage of the negative formula – moral norms must be such that cannot be generally and reciprocally rejected – over the affirmative formula of merely saying that moral norms must be gen-

[9] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 21.
[10] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. pp. 21-22.
[11] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 35.
[12] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 35.
[13] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 39.
[14] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 57.
[15] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 55. Here, Rainer Forst is criticizing Kant's perspective on the primary concerning of morality with oneself rather than with the dignity of other persons.

erally and reciprocally accepted. According to Forst, "it leaves open the possibility of morally admissible norms that could be legitimately rejected – and hence that are not categorically binding – but that can also be reasonably accepted because they concern actions that are supererogatory. Second, and more importantly, the criteria of general and reciprocal rejectability make it possible to test the character of the claims raised and to determine when a claim can be or could be reasonably rejected even in cases of (expectable) disagreement or of 'false' agreement (based, for example, on illegitimate influence, intimidation, or lack of information)"[16]. The possible limitation of the discourse of justification in the core of the definition of the right to justification makes it an interesting concept, especially regarding the next sections that will focus on institutions, which are, by definition, limited. The right to justification is compatible with dissent[17], recognizing that pure consensus theories are highly fictitious. Rainer Forst makes another good observation, paraphrasing Hannah Arendt, asserting that "reflection on the finitude of human beings also includes becoming aware of the finitude of reason and the impossibility of being able to resort to 'ultimate' and unquestionably certain grounds in procedures of moral justification. This impossibility grows more concrete as a moral problem is posed, from which, of course, the impossibility of justifying reasons does not follow, but rather the necessity of always reciprocally and generally reassessing the justifications provided. A morality of justification is a morality that can be criticized and revised in its details: a human morality 'without a banister' that cannot in principle exclude the possibility of failures and errors"[18].

To conclude this first part, it is important to emphasize that Forst finds the concept of justice – the core meaning of it being the right to justification -, as having its fundamental opposition in arbitrariness. His moral theory is thoroughly directed to fight arbitrariness, trying to make persons "understand and embrace the responsibility for finding a common 'ground' for their action on which they can stand and stand their ground: not an 'ultimate' ground, but still a stable ground precisely because of its openness to a critique in which 'nothing [is] so holy' as the

[16] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 49.

[17] "In contrast to a pure consensus theory, the criteria of reciprocal and general justification make it possible in cases of dissent (which are to be expected) to distinguish better from worse reasons" – FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. pp. 5-6.

[18] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 39.

'agreement' or the 'veto' of each"[19]. Therefore, even though the right to justification is the base from which derives all other human rights; it does not give each of these human rights full potential. Instead, it delivers only a basic framework than can be developed on different grounds than the one offered by this right to justification[20].

3. Political Constructivism[21], institutions and The Rule of law

This section is divided in three parts: the first one makes the shift from moral theory to the formation of society's basic structures (focused on the Legislative, Executive and the Judiciary) and the role of the right to justification there (3.1); the second is a little bit more focused on how the connection of the role of the right to justification and the referred institutions can be conceptually binding, so it treats how the right to justification can penetrate the notion of Rule of law (3.2); and the last is especially dedicated to some remarks on Brazil's institutions and the contribution that could be made by accepting the right to justification as a mechanism of moral correction of these institutions (3.3).

3.1 The Right to Justification as a legit basic ground for institutions

So far, we have exposed Rainer Forst's moral constructivism based upon the right to justification. Now I am going to turn my attention to the possible effect of this right when applied to state institutions. Although I am going to gradually detach myself from Rainer Forst's lessons, I will start with some of his conceptions, remarkably by his view on political constructivism.

Rainer Forst affirms that political constructivism is on the second "discursive construction" level of a constructivist conception of human rights, on which "conceptions of legal, political, and social structures need to be developed in which these general rights are concretely justified, interpreted, institutionalized and realized as basic rights in given

[19] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 42.

[20] This "weak" aspect of the right to justification is important to make it more manageable in other contexts of justice which are not pure normative and have more complex constraints to the interaction of the actors.

[21] Although introduced by John Rawls in Political Liberalism, the concept here is used in a different, but similar away. The difference between the conception here defended and Rawls's can be seen at FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. Chapter 4.

historical and social contexts"[22]. The first level is composed by the already exposed moral constructivism.

The two levels are at the same time autonomous and dependent from each other. They are autonomous, since they work in different contexts – "moral norms have to be justified in the moral community of all human beings, whereas norms of political and social justice are to be justified in particular political communities"[23] -, but they are dependent because "moral justification is – in a normative-formal sense – the core of political justification"[24].

In fact, the moral construction must be integrated by political constructivism, since the general list of moral rights that appear by the method of moral constructivism can only be enforced and "concretely justified, interpreted, institutionalized (…) within a legally constituted political order"[25]. However, even though political discourse has limitations, it "may not violate the basic right to justification or the criteria of reciprocity and generality. What is valid in the universal moral context must also be demonstrably valid in particular political contexts"[26].

Nevertheless, since political contexts are situated socially and historically, they do not merely institutionalize moral rights previously established. The rights that are going to be legally prescribed depend on the demands that are going to appear in each political context. Then, it is important to say that "a legally binding interpretation, institutionalization, and realization of these rights can be supplied only in a law-governed state, a state in which the citizens confer upon themselves a right to justification and recognize the rights that are justifiable on the basis of this right (in the form accepted by them)"[27]. The concept of "law-governed" state can be interpreted as a state that is inside the framework of the Rule of Law.

Every state that works inside the Rule of Law has a constitution – written or not – that represents its fundamental legal base. Following Forst, "a constitution has the double task of fixing a list of basic rights that citizens of a democratic order who respect one another's basic right to justification have to grant and guarantee one another (…) and of lay-

[22] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 213.
[23] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 217.
[24] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 218.
[25] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 218.
[26] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 218.
[27] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 219.

ing down the principles and rules of fair deliberative procedures"[28]. These aspects reflect the constitution as "the result of a moral construction of a just basic structure and the groundwork for the political construction of a just political and social order"[29].

However, for the success of this continuous "process of moral and political construction", a special commitment from people is necessary. As Dworkin states in his community model of principle "(…) people are members of a genuine political community only when they accept that their fates are linked in the following strong way: they accept that they are governed by common principles, not just by rules hammered out in political compromise. Politics has a different character for such people. (…) In short, each accepts political integrity as a distinct political ideal and treats the general acceptance of that ideal, even among people who otherwise disagree about political morality, as constitutive of political community"[30]. Therefore, we can see integrity as central to politics[31] and as a useful virtue, even if ideal, that a political community should have to lay down the referred principles and rules of fair deliberative procedures that fits inside the requirement of the right to justification.

Klaus Günther also contributes to the matter, taking an intersubjective perspective rather than an individualist one that seems to be on the background of Dworkin conception. Günther affirms that "the principle of coherence, to which legislation is also subject, implicitly manifests this interconnection between societal solidarity and an intersubjectivist concept of law. Because every new right is valid always only in the context of consideration of other rights, they are embedded in relations of mutual recognition from the very beginning"[32]. Here, it is useful to go beyond Günther and say that not only rights are to be justified, interpreted and validated intersubjectively and interconnected to others rights, but also to affirm that in this complex chain all of them are ultimately related to the right to justification and its criteria of generality and reciprocity. Günther continues to affirm that "by 'equal concern and respect', one could mean the idea of impartiality (…) as a rule of argumentation in practical discourses. For this rule operationalizes only the universal-reciprocal sense of the idea of impartiality, namely, that

[28] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p.182.
[29] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p.182.
[30] DWORKIN, Ronald. Law's Empire. London: Fontana Masterguides, 1986. p. 211.
[31] DWORKIN, Ronald. Idem. p. 216.
[32] GÜNTHER, Klaus. The Sense of Appropriateness: Application Discourses in Morality and Law. Translated by John Farrell. Albany: SUNY Press, 1993. p. 283.

of equally considering the interests of each individual when justifying a norm"[33]. Here it is important to observe that, in spite of considering the concrete interests when justifying a norm, he does not give a special consideration to the potentially affected in the context of justification, falling short to obey the criteria of the right to justification.

Now turning specifically to the concretization of rights by deliberative institutions following the criteria imposed by the right to justification, there are two points that should be mentioned. Firstly, the cultural background is an important factor to enhance the democratic deliberation. The culture aspect is optimized in the already referred scenario of Dworkin's model of principle community. Similarly, Rainer Forst says that a community of responsibility is important to develop relations of political trust between citizens. According to him, "trust is a normative resource of special importance in a democracy, for citizens need to trust both that other citizens will accept their responsibilities and that social institutions will work according to justifiable rules and norms, even if no 'perfect' institutionalization of democracy and of democratic supervision can be established"[34]. Secondly, the institutions themselves should enable effective and fair participation and argumentation. Freedom of speech concretized in efficient mechanisms of direct participation of citizens is crucial, in order to make the input of information and the accountability of the output provided by state decisions more democratic. As Forst affirms "political institutions in a narrower sense, most importantly parliamentary decision-making bodies, also have to be 'designed' so that the 'force' of the better argument can become a real political force"[35].

Nonetheless, if majority institutions fail to make justifiable outcomes, which will always happen to a certain degree, since institutions do not work in ideal deliberative conditions, judicial review is there to check political decisions. In fact, the institutional task of Judiciary related to the right to justification is to examine "political decisions with respect to the question of whether the criteria of reciprocity and generality have been satisfied, that is, whether important moral (reciprocally and generally nonrejectable) reasons have been neglected or trumped by inappropriate considerations, and with respect to the question of whether the procedures of political participation, inclusion, and justification have been adequately followed"[36].

[33] GÜNTHER, Klaus. Idem. p. 282.
[34] FORST, Rainer. Op. cit. p. 180
[35] FORST, Rainer. Idem. pp. 181-182

Analyzing the matter of judicial review, Humberto Ávila proposes normative standards that should be followed by the Judiciary which are in accordance with the separation of powers. According to him, the Judiciary should be more self-restrained when "(1) there is a doubt about the future effects of the norm; (2) the matter is of a difficult and technical nature; (3) the constitution permits an open balance by the Legislative on the matter"[37], whereas when there is a restriction of fundamental rights and the premises on which it is founded are clearly mistaken, the Judiciary should act in a more activist (in a non-technical sense) way. Adopting a more restrained perspective, in a defense of judicial minimalism, Cass Sunstein asserts that "minimalism tends to be the appropriate course when the Court is operating in the midst of reasonable pluralism or moral flux, when circumstances are changing rapidly, or when the Court is uncertain that a broad rule would make sense in future cases. (…) When a democracy is in a state of ethical or political uncertainty, courts may not have the best or the final answers. Judicial answers may be wrong. They may be counterproductive even if they are right"[38]. In spite of making this presumption in favor of a minimalist approach, Sunstein also says that "Sometimes minimalism is a blunder; sometimes it creates unfairness. Whether minimalism makes sense cannot be decide in the abstract; everything depends on context, prominently including assessments of comparative institutional competence"[39].

Although the Judiciary has an important role in democratic societies, its importance should not be overestimated. In fact, taking a critical-descriptive approach, Forst asserts that "what is necessary then is the general and unimpeded possibility of raising objections to decisions by pointing out that reciprocally nonrejectable claims or reasons have been ignored. This is a task that is often fulfilled by courts, with all the disadvantages of turning political questions into legal questions and of excluding certain claims which may not be easily phrased in the

[36] FORST, Rainer. Ibidem. p. 182.

[37] ÁVILA, Humberto. Teoria dos Princípios: da definição à aplicação dos princípios jurídicos. 12ª Edição, 2011. Malheiros. p. 187 (translation made by the author of this paper). For the role of burden of proof in restriction to fundamental rights, see also SILVA, Virgílio Afonso da. Direitos Fundamentais: conteúdo essencial, restrições e eficácia. 2ª Edição, 2010. Malheiros. pp. 168-183.

[38] SUNSTEIN, Cass. One case at a time – judicial minimalism in the Supreme Court. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2001. p. 263.

[39] SUNSTEIN, Cass. Idem. p. 262.

established legal language; therefore – and dhis is even more important in large-scale democratic orders such as the European Union- it should be a task taken up by political institutions designed for that purpose"[40].

Therefore, the risk of a "juristocracy" is always imminent and should be taken seriously[41]. The Judiciary cannot go beyond the institutional design to correct a flaw from the Legislative, since there are institutional rules to which it should be deferent. Sometimes suboptimal outcomes are not only institutionally inevitable, but also required by the legal system. In the case of a flaw of a majority institution, it is even relevant to adopt a second-best choice in the legal decision, since in the future the majority can recognize its error by seeing the bad effects it had caused (which the Judiciary could not reassess, due to institutional limitation) and correct it by itself. In a similar way, Schauer points out that "in operating in this fashion, law does not intend to be perverse. It does, however, intend to take institutional values especially seriously, and it does that in the hope that in the long run we may be better off with the right institutions than we are when everyone simply tries to make the best decision"[42].

3.2. The Right to Justification as institutionally binding – some remarks and contributions on the debate of the concept of Rule of Law

The best way to analyze the right to justification as a required component of institutions is by tracing its similarity with the Rule of Law in its common aspect: the fundamental opposition to arbitrariness[43].

Nevertheless, the concept of the Rule of Law has been much disputed nowadays between scholars. The core idea of its opposition to arbitrariness is, however, an idea shared by almost all of them, even though they diverge in matters of defining the content of the Rule of

[40] FORST, Rainer. Op. cit. p. 182.

[41] For a dense account of institutional and democratic critiques of judicial supremacy, see BRANDÃO, Rodrigo. Supremacia Judicial versus Diálogos Constiucionais: a quem cabe a última palavra sobre o sentido da constituição? 1ª Edição. 2ª Tiragem, 2012. Editora Lumen Juris. Chapter 5, pp. 183-197.

[42] SCHAUER, Frederick. Thinking Like a Lawyer: A new Introduction to Legal Reasoning. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2009. p. 233.

[43] However, it is clear that they recognize that eradicate arbitrary power completely is an impossible task.

Law. Here, I will briefly expose the view of Finnis and Raz which are two of the most recent and eminent scholars writing about the subject and then I will give reasons to provide an alternative structure for the Rule of Law.

Before starting, it is important to emphasize some other aspects that the authors consider common grounds. They all acknowledge that the Rule of Law in a certain State may be more or less followed, in other words, it doesn't follow the common binary code of judicial system of legal/illegal, being its implementation a matter of degree. Also, they all seem to follow[44] at least the eight requirements proposed by Lon Fuller, as being necessary to any law that exists in a State submitted to the Rule of Law[45]: generality, promulgation, no retroactivity, clarity, no contradiction, possible commanding, constancy through time, congruency between official action and declared rule[46]. At last, they agree on two basic functions of the Rule of Law: that the government should be ruled by law and that the law should be formulated as being able to guide human conduct[47].

Beginning with Finnis, it is important to say that he has both a substantial and procedural approach to the Rule of Law, although it seems, as it will be exposed, that the former always prevails over the latter. He draws his position referring to the Rule of Law as a necessary constraint in the relationship between rulers and ruled, in the sense that the rules must act towards the ruled based on a procedure fairness and reciprocity, aiming to achieve the common good[48]. A virtuous State in [44] It is important to mention that Raz has quite a different elaboration of these requirements, saying that some may not comply with what he sees as the two basic functions of the Rule of Law. In addition, he discards some of them criticizing Fuller's view that they have a value in itself, asserting that they are not independent from the two main functions of the Rule of Law and if they cannot guarantee that these goals will be achieved, other principles shall be established for that purpose. See RAZ, Joseph. The Authority of Law: Essays on Law and Morality. Oxford University Press, 1979. pp. 214-219.

[45] FULLER, Lon. The Morality of Law (revised edition). Yale University Press, 1969. pp. 46-91

[46] Although the authors agree in these components, they develop them in a different way. However, the exposition of these differences escapes the purpose of the present paper. For a dense approach to the development of these components, see MARMOR, Andrei. Law in the age of pluralism. Oxford University Press, 2007. pp. 10-33.

[47] Again, the different insights given in the topic of these functions of the Rule of Law will not be explored.

[48] FINNIS, John. Natural Law & Natural Rights. Oxford University Press. Second edition, 2011. p. 274.

terms of the Rule of Law would be the one that puts the common good as it main goal.

Finnis goes on to say that following the Rule of Law sometimes is not enough to attain the common good and then suggests that one should depart, "temporarily, but perhaps drastically, from the law and the constitution"[49]. Therefore, even if the law obeys the eight procedural requirements, which Finnis acknowledges as being necessary components of the law in the Rule of Law, provided it does not achieve the common good in a satisfactory way, the agent should not apply the law. It is important to mention that common good in the Aristotelian approach proposed by him seems to include other moral values and virtues (dignity and equality, just to mention two of them). Proceeding this way, Finnis is not being clear on which extent the common good is a substantive component of the Rule of Law, not offering a methodological way to verify it. Therefore, Raz is right in his criticism that the Rule of Law is not the Rule of the good Law, since if it was this way, "the term lacks any useful function"[50].

On the other hand, Raz offers a more minimalistic conception of Rule of Law[51]. He affirms that "it is the virtue of efficiency; the virtue of an instrument as an instrument. For the law this virtue is the rule of law. Thus the rule of law is an inherent virtue of the law, but not a moral virtue as such"[52]. However, he asserts that although not being a value in itself, it is of a great moral value, since it "enable(s) the law to perform useful social functions; just as it may be of moral importance to produce a sharp knife when it is required for a moral purpose"[53]. In addition, one of his main notions is that "the Rule of Law is essentially a negative value. The law inevitably creates a great danger of arbitrary power--the rule of law is designed to minimize the danger created by the law itself. Similarly, the law may be unstable, obscure, retrospective, etc., and thus infringe people's freedom and dignity. The rule of law is designed to prevent this danger as well. Thus the rule of law is a negative virtue in two senses: conformity to it does not cause good except through avoiding evil and the evil which is avoided is evil which could only have been caused by the law itself"[54]. He concludes by saying that "since the

[49] FINNIS, John. Idem. p. 275.
[50] RAZ, Joseph. Op. cit. p. 211.
[51] For a refutation of Raz's perspective, see MARMOR, Andrei. Op. Cit. pp. 50-54.
[52] RAZ, Joseph. Op. Cit. p. 226.
[53] RAZ, Joseph. Idem. p. 226.
[54] RAZ, Joseph. Ibidem. p. 224.

rule of law is just one of the virtues the law should possess, it should be expected that it possesses no more than prima facie force. (...) Conflict between the rule of law and other values is just what is to be expected. Conformity to the rule of law is a matter of degree, and though, other things being equal, the greater the conformity the better--other things are rarely equal. A lesser degree of conformity is often to be preferred precisely because it helps realization of other goals"[55].

The notion of Rule of Law that I will expose here is within a different paradigm. It has become a common ground nowadays that the Rule of Law must also presuppose the idea of a democratic State. By saying this, it is true that one gives a substantial value to the rule of law. However, I propose here that by giving the democratic characteristic to the Rule of Law, one necessarily incorporate the notion of the right to justification to the Rule of Law. The logical implication is that the eight procedural criteria mentioned above are not enough to describe the Rule of Law in democratic States. Nevertheless, the criteria of generality and reciprocity, as defined in the right to justification, makes it complete. In fact, Rainer Forst develops the concept of the right to justification in the basic structures of society taking as presupposition that these societies are democratic[56].

Finally, it is important to assert that the Rule of Law with the requirement of the right to justification makes the process of elaboration of the law to comply with the criteria of reciprocity and generality (and also the other eight original standards of the Rule of Law exposed before). The analysis is one of degree, since it is humanly impossible[57] to require the deliberative institutions (notably the Legislative) to achieve an optimum procedure referred to the right to justification. Furthermore, in a rather weak sense, the Rule of Law also requires a substantive approach regarding the approved law by the Judiciary in terms of judicial review. As it was shown, the right to justification demands that the law

[55] RAZ, Joseph. Ibidem. p. 228.

[56] It is very important to emphasize that this is only one context in which the right to justification can be applied. In this specific context of basic institutions of the State, the right to justification requires a democratic State. In other contexts, this requirement may not be raised. Forst's argument for a right to justification is context-based. This right can also be applied in transnational perspective – which is usually done by Forst – and in this context it has other requirements. However, it is not the purpose of this article to analyze other contexts of justice than the ones of basic institutions within the national State.

[57] We can generally say that it is humanly impossible to achieve the practical discourse ideal conditions, since institutions invariably work in a suboptimal empirical context.

must be such that it cannot be generally and reciprocally rejected, so the content will be analyzed in this manner, taking into account this aspect in a procedure of balancing based on the principle of proportionality.

3.3. A normative approach especially elaborated for Brazil's case

Before going further to the next section, I would like to make some remarks related to Brazil's institutional experience. Institutions do not work in a vacuum and we have to take into account the peculiarities of each State institution, in order to evaluate them. And now I have to do so, since, in my opinion, the second-best choice reasoning in the format that I just mentioned in section 3.1 is not a good way of reasoning by second order arguments in Brazil's institutions. I say that because the chance of the suboptimal decision taken by the Judiciary generating a dynamic effect to encourage the majority institutions of correcting its flaws by themselves in Brazil is very little. In fact, Brazil's majority institutions are under a very big crisis of representativeness[58]. Considering this scenario, scholars have worked a lot in order to justify the Judiciary activist approach inside the institutional design. However, it seems to me that the important issue to deal with now is to enhance the mechanisms of direct participation. Again, with Forst, it has been presented that the trust of citizen in each other is a strong value for the institutional democratic deliberation to be optimal. This is a important beginning to form a political culture that will make institutions to work inside justifiable rules and principles. However, Brazil does not have an ingrained culture of republican virtues, on the contrary, it possess a historical antirepublican tradition. Therefore, one alternative is trying to make a political reform[59] and expand the mechanisms of direct democracy to [58] I am not forgetting here that this phenomenon is not exclusive of Brazil, but there the matter has taken critical patterns.

[59] For a proposal of political reform in Brazil, see BARROSO, Luís Roberto. A Reforma Política: Uma proposta de Sistema de governo, eleitoral e partidário para o Brasil. RDE I Revista de Direito do Estado. Ano 1, nº 3. Jul/set 2006, pp. 287-360. However, the scope of political reform here defended is more vast than the one in Barroso's, since it does not exclude mechanisms of direct participation not mentioned in the referred text (by saying so, I certainly do not mean to affirm that Barroso does not agree with mechanisms of directed participation). Another demand that would make democracy in Brazil on its way to a concretization of the right to justification in a specific context would be that of giving provisory prisoners the right to vote, since the rejection to it has no justifiable grounds (see SARMENTO, Daniel. Por um Constitucionalismo Inclusivo. 1ª Edição, encourage the participation of citizens and the growth of republican virtues. In parallel to this, it is important that the Judiciary, ultimately the STF (Supremo Tribunal Federal), makes decisions that keep democracy alive with its substantial and procedural requirements, even taking a representative role when necessary[60].

Moreover, even though, as exposed in section 3.2, we can derive constitutionally the requirement of the right to justification in the context of institutions by the framework of the Rule of Law comprehended in a democratic State, the Brazilian Constitution[61] has other normative statutes that can be interpreted as requiring the referred right. The institutional duty of public administration to act in accord with the principle of morality[62], being a general command, can be interpreted as requiring the observance of the right to justification, since it has an ultimate moral basis. As for the institutional duty of the Judiciary, there is an explicit prevision of the duty to provide justified decisions[63]. Furthermore, the Brazilian constitutional system seems to comply with a moral interpretation that confers to some of its vague texts the reading that gives rise to a duty to justification by institutions of the State and the corresponding implicit right to justification by the people. Nevertheless, the lack of compliance to this duty by the institutions in Brazil is a problem observed empirically.

To help finding a solution to the posed matter, Forst considerations are always elucidative. He affirms that the "most important in institutional designs is the institutionalization of the possibility of what 2010. Editora Lumen Juris. pp. 311-333).

---

[60] For an example of typical representative approach by the STF, see ADI 4650 about campaign finance reform. For a detailed treatment of the issue, see SARMENTO, Daniel; OSÓRIO, Aline. Eleições, dinheiro e democracia: A ADI 4650 e o modelo brasileiro de financiamento de campanhas. Available from: http://www.oab.org.br/arquivos/artigo-adi-4650-362921044.pdf

[61] It is also important to mention that Brazilian Constitution declares in its first article that its bases rely upon the legal democratic State.

[62] "Article 37. The direct or indirect public administration of any of the powers of the Union, the states, the Federal District and the municipalities, as well as their foundations, shall obey the principles of lawfulness, impersonality, morality, publicity and also the following:"

[63] "Article 93. A supplementary law, propose by the Supreme Federal Court, shall provide for the Statute of the Judicature, observing the following principles:

IX. All judgments of the bodies of Judicial Power shall be public, and all decisions shall be justified, under penalty of nullity, and the law may, if the public interest so requires, limit attendance in given acts to the interested parties and their lawyers, or only to the latter;".

one could call reciprocal objection. (…) Ideally, this kind of raising objections should already be part of the proper process of decision making, but given its constraints, this may not always be possible: thus, the need for additional checks that would require some institutional imaginativeness"[64]. The relation between the normative criteria of reciprocal and general justification and the concrete imperfect justification makes "democracy necessarily a self-critical enterprise"[65]. Therefore, the institution of mechanisms that confer a critical "veto" for relevant decisions interposed not only by structures of the state that aren't the authority in question, but also by associations of people, are important to strengthen the power of democracy in Brazil. However, as stated in section 3.1., there are other values to be taken into account and there are costs related to the establishment of a decision-making process more complex by the possibility of continuous objections. This empirical approach is a very relevant tool when evaluating the perfect equilibrium between raising the quality of democracy and not damaging too much governability. The way to make it concrete is a task for our time.

4. Legal Argumentation Theories, the Rule of Law and the Right to Justification – a possible approach

The moral right to justification as conceived by Rainer Forst, which is the idea that is being adopted in the whole paper, was not originally applied to legal argumentation theories. However, there is no reason to think that the criteria of reciprocity and generality could not be raised in the context of analyzing legal argumentation theories. According to Thomas Bustamante, "legal argumentation theories are theories about the use of arguments and its weights in the discourse of justification of the legal decision, looking to increase the rationality in the process of justifying and applying the law to an optimal degree"[66].

The possibility of linking the right to justification and legal argumentation theories becomes clearer if we accept Alexy's "special case" thesis[67]. The "special case" thesis affirms that legal reasoning is a special

[64] FORST, Rainer. Op. cit. p. 182.
[65] FORST, Rainer. Idem. p. 186.
[66] BUSTAMANTE, Thomas da Rosa de. Teoria do Direito e Decisão Racional: temas de teoria da argumentação jurídica. Editora Renovar. 1ª Edição, 2008. pp. 362-363.
[67] ALEXY, Robert. A Theory of Legal Argumentation: The Theory of Rational Discourse as Theory of Legal Argumentation. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989. Translation by Ruth case of practical discourse, since it involves practical issues and these issues discussed have a claim to correctness, in spite of the discussion being framed within institutional limitations (the deliberation occurs inside a pre-established system of rules and procedures).

Moreover, procedures of judicial decision-making are not only institutionally limited, but also have an immense variety of constraints, being they internal or external to law. Fernando Leal states that "procedures of judicial decision-making are invariably limited. These factors will be separated within three big groups. The first consists of language and rationality limitations (extrinsic limitations), the second consists of typical limitations of judicial rationality (intrinsic limitations), and the third consists of institutional limitations"[68].

Therefore, it is easy to see that the right to justification will have a limited non-ideal penetration in legal argumentation theories, in a way similar to the limitations observed in the last section. However, by seeing specially the influence of the right to justification in legal argumentation theories, it is possible to know more accurately and analytically the manner by which the Judiciary will respond to society and to other state institutions with most of its responses being raised upon reciprocally and generally valid claims.

In addition, Peczenik states that the Rule of Law requires legal decisions to be simultaneously predictable and morally acceptable[69]. Nevertheless, there is a tension here between legal certainty and the other moral values, but this tension is only apparent since "1 - The law-giver cannot predict in advance or acceptably regulate all cases that occur in future practice. The evaluations to be done in legal practice, among other things concerning the question whether a decision of a given kind is just are easier to make in concrete cases, not in abstracto. 2 – Historical evolution of the method of legal reasoning has adapted it to the purpose of weighing and balancing of the wording of the law and moral demands. The judge has a far greater practical experience in applying this method to concrete cases than any legislative agency can have"[70].

Adler and Neil MacCormick . p. 212.

[68] LEAL, Fernando. Ônus de Argumentação, relações de prioridade e decisão jurídica: mecanismos de controle e de redução da incerteza na subidealidade do sistema jurídico. Tese de doutorado defendida em 2012 na Universidade do Estado do Rio de Janeiro. pp. 28-125.

[69] PECZENIK, Aleksander. On Law and Reason. Law and Philosophy Library. Dordrecht: Kluwer, 1989. p. 25.

[70] PECZENIK, Aleksander. Idem. p. 27.

However, the way Peczenik finds to solve this apparent tension is by his idea of coherence, which have ten quantitative criteria[71]. Two of these ideas are general and reciprocal justification[72], but not in the way that I am using here. Peczenik's choice to use the idea of coherence for a coherent system leads to a stability of practical opinion. Moreover, according to him, the ten quantitative ideas would lead to a moral result, since they would fulfill the demands of rationality. Peczenik says that "legal interpretatory statements are not true in the literal sense. But they can fulfil the requirements of Logical, Supportive and Discursive rationality. They thus can be both coherent and acceptable in the light of both morality and the legal paradigm. Consequently, they can fulfil important criteria of truth, coherence and consensus. For that reason, L-, S-, and D- rationality are indications of their correctness"[73].

Peczenik's idea seems to be the closest to an ideal normative and rational theory of justification of legal sentences. In spite of its analytical efforts, it seems that this theory would not achieve the requirements of the right to justification, since it does not pay enough attention to the various contexts of justification and to the addressees of the moral relevant norm. In addition, Peczenik's concept of coherence seems to rely too much on logic and rationality. As it was exposed, human rationality is limited, it is doubtful that theory that relies that much on human rationality would be altogether successful, not to mention the institutional and time limitation of gathering information. In brief, one could say that his theory talks too much about logical coherence and gives little attention to an equal – and sometimes more – important moral coherence[74].

It is important now to turn to another theory, which considers the time and rationality limits as important constraints to legal reasoning. Klaus Günther seems to propose a theory in this manner[75], by redefining the notion of integrity made by Dworkin[76]. According to Günther, "the principle of integrity can be understood as a principle for appropriateness argumentation. In this form of argumentation, societal [71] PECZENIK, Aleksander. Ibidem. Chapter 4.

[72] PECZENIK, Aleksander. Ibidem. pp. 132-144.

[73] PECZENIK, Aleksander. Ibidem. p. 171.

[74] For an analysis of the concept of moral coherence, in a critical reference to the idea of Dworking's integrity, see MARMOR, Andrei. Op. Cit. pp. 41-44.

[75] GÜNTHER, Klaus. Op. cit. p. 43.

[76] Dworkin's theory is not going to be analyzed here since the refined version proposed by Günther appears to have ameliorated it, if we examine through the lens of the right to justification, making sufficient the evaluation of the latter.

relation of recognition are given effect in such a way that the network of concrete rights is applied equally in each particular case. (…) The right to be treated as an equal with concern and respect appears here as the right to equal treatment, that is to say, treating like cases alike not with reference to an individual norm, but with reference to a coherent set of principles as rights. This kind of equal treatment systematically creates differences and conflicts. But the very structure of such conflicts and a structure leading to the consideration of differences is the structure of appropriateness"[77]. Provided that by differences, Günther means potentially affected persons in the context of justification, then his structure of appropriateness obeys the criteria of reciprocal and general justification.

Finally, it is important to expose briefly the relation between the principle of contradictory and the right to justification. In judicial process, "the contradictory must be seen as a right to influence, which has a correspondent duty to debate, inherent to the cooperative structure of process"[78]. It is easy to conclude that "it is not possible to talk about motived decision, if it does not face explicitly the reasons brought by the parties in their manifestations"[79]. Since the parties in the process are the potentially affected in the judicial sentence, it is valid to see a context-related component of justification as presented in the relation between the principle of contradictory and the right to justification. However, in order to give a complete account of motivation of sentences that is not only context-related, but that also observes the criteria of reciprocity and generality, the following requirements of justification"(a) the enunciation of the choices made by the judge to; (a1) individualization of applicable norms; (a2) assentation of factual allegations; (a3) juridical qualification of factual support; (a4) juridical consequences derived from the juridical qualification of the fact; (b) the context of the nexus of implication and coherence between the statements and (c) the justification of statements related to criteria which put in evidence the rational quality of judicial decision"[80] may not be enough or relevant in all cases. In fact, these requirements may suffice in the concrete case to give effectiveness to the right to justification, may go even further than [77] GÜNTHER, Klaus. Idem. pp. 283-284.

[78] SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; MARINONI, Luiz Guilherme; MITIDIERO, Daniel. Curso de Direito Constitucional. 1ª Edição; 2012. Editora Revista dos Tribunais. p. 667.

[79] SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; MARINONI, Luiz Guilherme; MITIDIERO, Daniel. Idem. p. 667.

[80] SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; MARINONI, Luiz Guilherme; MITIDIERO, Daniel. Ibidem. p. 668.

the basic requirements or may not be enough to comply with them. The point here is that the right to justification with its criteria of reciprocity and generality does not require specific standards that make it more concrete, since these standards may eventually fail in the concrete case to translate the idea behind the right to justification. On the other hand, the best approach is to see it as a metacriterion of correctness of concrete standards of legal argumentation theory, whether for the content of the standard itself or for its application. It is only by this way that the right to justification is read within legal argumentation theories as it is in the basic structures of society: at the same time being an internal feature that the justified standard (or application of the neutral standard) has and being a transcendental concept, since it is ultimately a moral concept that lies beyond the standard.

Conclusion

After seeing the application of the right to justification in different political contexts, I tried to show that none of them is sufficient by itself. All things considered, it is easy to acknowledge the synergy between the contexts of justification. Even though we recognize the limits of human rationality and of the basic institutions of society (especially the Legislative and the Judiciary bodies that were analyzed here), it is always possible to have the right to justification as a goal and a parameter to make institutions work better. If we conceive ourselves as human beings that live in an "order of justification"[81] with our basic institutions and our relation to others "governed by" the procedural criteria of reciprocal and general justification, then we can start talking about contextualizing the ideal notion of "forceless force of the better argument"[82]. This ideal should serve as a guide to a never-ending pretension to correction of concrete institutions.

References

ALEXY, Robert. A Theory of Legal Argumentation: The Theory of Rational Discourse as Theory of Legal Argumentation. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989. Translation by Ruth Adler and Neil MacCormick

ÁVILA, Humberto. Teoria dos Princípios: da definição à aplicação dos princípios jurídi-

[81] FORST, Rainer. Op. cit. p. 192.
[82] FORST, Rainer. Idem. p. 7.

cos. 12ª Edição, 2011. Malheiros.

BARROSO, Luís Roberto. A Reforma Política: Uma proposta de Sistema de governo, eleitoral e partidário para o Brasil. RDE I Revista de Direito do Estado. Ano 1, nº 3. Jul/set 2006, pages 287-360

BRANDÃO, Rodrigo. Supremacia Judicial versus Diálogos Constiucionais: a quem cabe a última palavra sobre o sentido da constituição? 1ª Edição. 2ª Tiragem, 2012. Editora Lumen Juris.

BUSTAMANTE, Thomas da Rosa de. Teoria do Direito e Decisão Racional: temas de teoria da argumentação jurídica. Editora Renovar. 1ª Edição, 2008.

DWORKIN, Ronald. Law's Empire. London: Fontana Masterguides, 1986.

FINNIS, John. Natural Law & Natural Rights. Oxford University Press. Second edition, 2011.

FORST, Rainer. The Right to Justification: Elements of a Constructivist Theory of Justice. Translated by Jefffrey Flynn. Columbia University Press, New York, 2012.

FULLER, Lon. The Morality of Law (revised edition). Yale University Press, 1969.

GÜNTHER, Klaus. The Sense of Appropriateness: Application Discourses in Morality and Law. Translated by John Farrell. Albany: SUNY Press, 1993.

LEAL, Fernando. Ônus de Argumentação, relações de prioridade e decisão jurídica: mecanismos de controle e de redução da incerteza na subidealidade do sistema jurídico. Tese de doutorado defendida em 2012 na Universidade do Estado do Rio de Janeiro.

MARMOR, Andrei. Law in the age of pluralism. Oxford University Press, 2007.

PECZENIK, Aleksander. On Law and Reason. Law and Philosophy Library. Dordrecht: Kluwer, 1989.

RAZ, Joseph. The Authority of Law: Essays on Law and Morality. Oxford University Press, 1979.

SARLET, Ingo Wolfgang; MARINONI, Luiz Guilherme; MITIDIERO, Daniel. Curso de Direito Constitucional. 1ª Edição; 2012. Editora Revista dos Tribunais.

SARMENTO, Daniel; OSÓRIO, Aline. Eleições, dinheiro e democracia: A ADI 4650 e o modelo brasileiro de financiamento de campanhas. Available from: http://www.oab.org.br/arquivos/artigo-adi-4650-362921044.pdf

SARMENTO, Daniel. Por um Constitucionalismo Inclusivo. 1ª Edição, 2010. Editora Lumen Juris.

SCHAUER, Frederick. Thinking Like a Lawyer: A new Introduction to Legal Reason- ing. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2009.

SILVA, Virgílio Afonso da. Direitos Fundamentais: conteúdo essencial, restrições e eficácia. 2ª Edição, 2010. Malheiros

SUNSTEIN, Cass. One case at a time – judicial minimalism in the Supreme Court. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2001.

Law and science in public hearings:
Between the legislator's discretion and scientific (un) certainty of the Brazilian Federal Supreme Court

Margarida Lacombe Camargo[1]

Abstract: The text deals with the problem regarding the weight and the importance of the scientific arguments on the judicial review, in Robert Alexy Fundamental Rights Theory. The question is to what extent scientific certainties or uncertainties prevail in the decisions? Or: How judges decide when faced with uncertainties about the empirical premisses that explicit the case? Some examples were extracted from the brazilian Supreme Court decisions.

Key words: Judicial Review. Robert Alexy. Law and Science.

In the context of the research on the use of scientific arguments by the Judicial branch, we highlight the role of public hearings in the Brazilian Federal Supreme Court. From it, we aim to examine to what extent the practice of public hearings emphasizes the importance of what Robert Alexy calls empirical epistemic discretion, with regard to the interpretation and enforcement of fundamental rights.

It is increasingly common in the Brazilian Federal Supreme Court, the consultation of experts on non-legal matters, when it is seen as necessary to the understanding of the problem brought to trial. Altogether, there already have been 12 public hearings held since 2007, with about 40% of them concentrated in the first semester of 2013, which indicates a strong tendency of the Supreme Court to summon public hearings. This shows the interdependence of law and science, as the Court realizes that the practice of science depends on sound law, as well as the law itself requires access to sound science[2].

This practice of public hearings has been concentrated within the judicial review, especially on decisions of "general repercussion"[3] of the appeal to Supreme Court and binding effect of some constitutional actions, on a matter constitutional rights. In these cases, it is not rare that the Court faces the problem of balancing competing constitutional rights. It has happened in all the cases that led to public hearings , such as: 1) the use of embryonic stem cells for research purposes in curing neurodegenerative diseases (right to life vs. right to decent life or to health); 2) the abortion, also called termination of pregnancy, of anencephalic fetuses (freedom and women's health vs. right to life of the fetus);3) the importation of used tires (sustainable environment vs. free enterprise), 4) the ban on the sale of alcoholic beverages in federal highways (right to life vs. free enterprise); 5) the ractice of fires in the sugar cane plantation (right to health vs. right to work and free enterprise) 6) the Electromagnetic Field Power Transmission Lines (right to health vs. free enterprise); 7) the imprisonment system (human dignity and freedom vs public safety); 8) the financing of political campaign (political participation vs. political participation); 9) the affirmative action policies of access to public universities (material equality vs. formal equality), 10) use of asbestos (right to health / life and sustainable environment vs. right to work and free enterprise); 11) Judicialization of Health, especially about the Public Health System, called "SUS" (right to life and health vs. other social rights); 12) the Cable TV (free enterprise vs. freedom of expression and pluralism).

[1] Professor at Federal University of Rio Janeiro (UFRJ) and researcher at Casa Rui Barbosa Foundation.

[2] See Stephen G. Breyer, The Interdependence of Science and Law. Judicature. Vol.82. n.1, July-august, 1998, p. 24-27.

The complexity of these issues underlines the topical aspect of Law"[4], which requires multifaceted reasoning as opposed to linear reasoning. It is not possible, for example, to solve the problem of the use of embryonic stem cells by simply seeking the meaning of the word "life" and make the classic syllogism: a) the Constitution protects life, b) the embryo is life, c) therefore, the embryo is inviolable.

Thinking in this way does not face the problem of leftover un-

[3] In portuguese, "general repercussion" is called "repercussão geral", which is an institute similar to discretionary review of the writ of certiorari. The difference is that the inadmissibility of the writ called "Recurso Extraordinário" requires, under Article 102, §3º by The Brazilian Constitution and by article 543-A of Civil Procedure Code, the justification of the Court that there is no "relevance" in economic, social, political and legal perspective, as well as the absence of "transcendence", which means the case is not representative of one group of other cases and, therefore, the judgment of this case does not go beyond the subjective interests involved. So, only if two thirds of justices decided in this way the appeal can be not hear.

[4] Theodor Viehweg, in Topics and Law.[Trad. Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Jr.] Brasília: Ministério da Justiça, 1989.

used embryos in the process of artificial insemination, frozen for more than three years, and without the possibility of being implanted in the womb by an explicit statement of the parents, keeping in mind the fundamental right to seek the cure of diseases and scientific knowledge.

In order to understand this problem, it must be known, for instance, what the geneticists define as life; the efficacy of embryonic stem cell research compared to adult stem cells; if there is an accurate diagnosis of non-viable embryos; what stance Brazil takes in the international scenario of patents, etc.

Even while taking into consideration the political assessment of the legislator to choose the best practice for Brazilian society, the question does not dispense legal analysis, insofar as it implies the incidence of fundamental rights prescribed by the constitution.

Robert Alexy discusses the tension between constitutional rights and democracy in the postscript to the Theory of Fundamental Rights, in 2002, instigated by the criticism of Jürgen Habermas. Alexy focuses on the question of the legislator's discretion, but we can say that delimiting the legislator's competence also implies in delimiting the competence of the Constitutional Court. Like Alexy, we understand that recognizing the discretion means recognizing the competence in some measure: the area that is available to the decision maker.

To analyze this problem, we will take into account the manifestations of Justices regarding the uncertainties about the content of constitutional rule. For example, if we ask whether the Federal Constitution allows or not the use of white asbestos, of the chrysotile kind, when we question the constitutionality of a federal law or state law that regulates the matter, we are actually asking whether white asbestos violates the constitutionally protected right to health. In other words, if there is no possibility of safe and controlled use of the substance, which justifies its banishment.

Robert Alexy is right when he distinguishes rules from principles, relating the latter with the balancing values. However, our hypothesis is that the principle of proportionality does not necessarily imply in a moral reading of the Constitution, to use the words of Dworkin. In fact, Alexy brings the problem of factual uncertainty to the formula weight: "the greater... the greater". The author aims to establish a distinction between "intensity" and "weight" to justify his new proposal of weight formula. The intensity would be the characteristic of the concrete weight formula, which measures the degree of non-satisfaction or affectation of a constitutional right by "the material importance of the reasons supporting the intervention", while the weight of the intervention grows in the same proportion to increases the degree empirical uncertainty about the competing principles.

Knowing whether the legislator is legally capable, as Alexy says, is knowing if the intervention in the constitutionally protected right to freedom satisfies the principle of minimal protection. In the case of the acquisition and possession of products derived from cannabis sativa, for personal consumption, the German Federal Constitutional Court held that the prohibition established by the legislator was valid, given the scientific uncertainty about the consequences of drug use[5].

Through our verification, the increasing implementation of public hearings in Brazil is due to a necessity to have safe and objective knowledge about the situations that lead to the restriction of constitutional rights. Unlike the post-positivist theories suggest[6], it is not the arguments of principle that prevail, rather those based on evidence, which indicates a pragmatic dimension of Law. The knowledge of the consequences of legislative action, controlled by constitutional courts, is what has guided decision making, at least from what we see in practice in the Brazilian Federal Supreme Court. In the asbestos trial[7], the Justice Gilmar Mendes, in obiter dicta, stressed the increasing importance of consulting experts to avoid misconceptions and decide safely. Unlike the legislator, who can review his decisions when the results do not prove adequate, he says, the Court can make no mistakes, otherwise risk losing its institutional credibility . It is believed that the desired safety can come from the knowledge of experts.

The stance of Justice Gilmar Mendes increases the power of the Court, and decreases, therefore, the discretion of the legislator. This equation is directly related to the greater or the lesser degree of certainty and knowledge that the Court has on empirical premises that inform [5] See the main parts of decision at book about 50 years of German Constitutional Supreme Court: http://www.mpf.gov.ar/docs/RepositorioB/Ebooks/qF655.pdf See also the interpretation of this case of, available at Robert Alexy, postscript in Theory of constitutional rights. Translated by Julian Rivers, Oxford university press, 2002 , p. 414-415.

[6] Just like post-positivist theories, we understand that the speech is the medium binding required between law and morality. Jürgen Habermas, Robert Alexy, Ronald Dworkin, Manuel Atienza. See paradigm shift explained by Luiz Afonso Figueroa, "El paradigma jurídico del neoconstitucionalismo. Un análisis metateórico, una adhesión y una propuesta de desarrollo. En A. García Figueroa (comp.). Racionalidad y Derecho. Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales: Madrid, 2006.

[7] ADI 3937 e ADI 3357 in www.stf.jus.br the case. Regarding the collision of constitutional rights, as pointed out in the cases that justified public hearings, knowledge of the facts reduces the level of empirical uncertainty of the legal decision maker, and increases the capacity and legitimacy to decide.

Alexy, considering the intensity of interference in the collision of constitutional rights, indicates three levels of intensity control, according to the degree of uncertainty of the facts involved:

a) an intensive content control, supported by the highest degree of certainty of empirical premises;

b) a medium control, based on the plausibility and defensibility of empirical premises; and

c) a weak control when the empirical premises are not qualified as false and there is the lowest level of certainty.

Although there is no clear methodology of this, the fact is that the greater or the lesser knowledge of the subject allows us to decide with greater or lesser degree of certainty, which makes the Constitutional Court also find a greater or lesser degree of legitimacy to their own decisions, which is responsible for the final word on what the Constitution means.

Justice Ellen Gracie, in the ADI[8]_3510 (Embryonic Stem Cells), says, adequately, that the act of judging is, first and foremost, a great exercise in humility.[9] When the beginning of life was being discussed at court, she highlighted a phrase that became famous: "we are not a science academy".

The problem with capacities and institutional designs[10] relative to this subject has not received the attention that it deserves in Brazil. There is no admission nor validity criteria for scientific evidence in the constitutional legal process. However, the fact is that the complexity of the issues that come to the Federal Supreme Court has demanded knowledge beyond the legal system, which leads us to inquire about the scope and deference on the studies of experts as they occur in public hearings. As the Justice Stephen G. Breyer said, "I believe that in this age of [8] This kind of action can be suit directly in the Federal Supreme Court to the declaration of unconstitutionality of an administrative act or statute. It´s one of various actions of the Brazilian system of "judicial review".

[9] By the way, see John Hardwig, Toward an Ethics of Expertise. http://web.utk.edu/~-jhardwig/expertis.htm science we must build legal foundations that are sound in science as well as in law."[11] In same perspective, I believe that the public hearing, according Brazilian practiced, helps to build bridges to connect the right to science.

[10] Cass R. Sunstein and Adrian Vermeule. Interpretation and Institutions. Michigan Law Review, vol 101:885, February, 2003, p.885-951.

References

ALEXY, Robert. Postscript in Theory of constitutional rights. Translated by Julian Rivers. Oxford university press, 2002 .

BREYER, Stephen G. The Interdependence of Science and Law. Judicature. Vol.82. n.1, JulyAugust, 1998.

FIGUEROA, Luiz Afonos. "El paradigma jurídico del neoconstitucionalismo. Un análisis metateórico, una adhesión y una propuesta de desarrollo. En A. García Figueroa (comp.). Racionalidad y Derecho. Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales: Madrid, 2006.

HARDWIG, John. Toward an Ethics of Expertise. http://web.utk.edu/~jhardwig/expertis.htm

SCHWABE, Jürgen [Org.] Cinqüenta Años de Jurisprudência del Tribunal Constitucional Federal Alemán. Bogotá: Colômbia, 2003.

SUNSTEIN, Cass R. and VERMEULE, Adrian. Interpretation and Institutions. Michigan Law Review, vol 101:885, February, 2003, p.885-951.

VIEHWEG, Theodor. Topics and Law.[Trad. Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Jr.] Brasília: Ministério da Justiça, 1989.

[11] See Stephen G. Breyer, The Interdependence of Science and Law. Judicature. Vol.82. n.1, July-August, 1998, p. 24-27..

To whom it serves to conciliate?
Reflections on the access to justice in neoliberal times

Gabriela Maia Rebouças[1]
Mariana de Faro Felizola[2]

Abstract:The National Council of Justice (CNJ) has determined as one of its goals to grant effectiveness to the principle of access to justice. In order to achieve it, campaigns have been set to promote alternative methods of resolution of conflicts, such as conciliation and mediation. Among the campaigns' objectives is the reduction of the backlog of cases, nowadays common in the judicial system, and the promotion of satisfaction and agility on the resolution of conflicts. In order to attain these goals, CNJ has approved the resolution 125/2010, in which it states that State and Federal Courts should maintain a uniformed database about conciliations and mediations. This study is going to consider conciliation/mediation and its part as a method to guarantee access to justice, based on results obtained on a scientific initiation research intended to evaluate the degree of implementation of this resolution in Sergipe's State and Federal Justices between 2011 and 2013. The philosophical reflection will allow us to question the foundation of this estate model, frankly neoliberal, which manipulates the access to justice in statistic and quantitative terms, leaving less room to promote a qualitative access to justice that would be able to empower the parties of the process. Especially because the neoliberal state in which we live encourages the surpassing of goals as an end in itself, and the judicial sphere is not excluded of this phenomenon. As much as the promises of speed and access to justice are important, they alone are not enough to accomplish a qualified access. On the other hand, the game of big litigants, whether big companies, financial institutions or the State itself, so close to the judicial system, is always prejudicial to the citizen, accentuating the disparity between the access of different parties. The importance of this study rests, therefore, in observing if the path of promoting these alternative methods of resolution of conflicts – conciliation and mediation –, does not simply result in a doubly disadvantageous dimension to the access of justice: on one hand, the judiciary with its more effective justice by way of being cheaper, selling the illusion of access, and on the other, the big litigants cunningly forcing deals in cases in which their side always wins and the citizen always loses.

[1] Doctor in Philosophy of Law by the Federal University of Pernambuco UFPE (2010). Researcher of the Institute of Technology and Research IRP/SE at the social technologies centre, leader of the "Access to justice, human rights and resolution of conflicts" research group active at CNPq. Graduation and post-graduation professor at UNIT and FITS. Author of Links Between Subjectivities and Law: A Constitution of the Subject in Michel Foucault and the Systems of Resolution of Conflicts, published in 2012 by Lumen Juris. "gabrielamaiar@gmail.com"

[2] Law student at Universidade Tiradentes (UNIT), Aracaju-SE. Scientific Initiation student by CNPq. "marifelizola@gmail.com"

1. Introduction

Because of the consolidation of the Democratic State of Law in Brazil, the last eight years witnessed, as of the constitutional amendment no. 45/2004, best known as Judiciary Reform, an increase in the number of discussions and actions around the Judiciary System in the pursuit of an effective access to justice. That principle has been originated from the Liberal State, yet with only a merely formal characteristic in order to preserve the power sphere of individual rights.

As the social rights evolved and the Welfare State reforms went through, the principle gained effectiveness. Therefore, the State had to provide the population with information and means to seek solutions to their disputes in the best possible way[3].

A worldwide movement connects the actions and strategies that made the Judiciary a privileged Republic protagonist. That is an expansion movement of opportunities to apply Law and commitment in search of effectiveness of human rights.

It is essential to mention, amongst other aspects, the growing judicialization of rights promoted by our Constitution driven by the best public interest. Not to mention the judicial activism converting the Judiciary into the grand materializer of rights reinforcing contrariwise the insufficiencies of the other powers.

On the other hand, the experiment of pluralism and of democratic society has increased the belief and the necessity for more communicative and non-violent procedures to lead our lives. Thus, the focus became the self-composing systems of disputes as a more viable alternative to the resolution of conflicts.

---

[3]MAYER, Larissa Affonso. Métodos alternativos de resolução de conflitos sob a ótica do direito contemporâneo. Jus Navigandi, Teresina, ano 16, n. 2997, 15 set. 2011. [cited 11 February 2014] Available from: <http://jus.com.br/artigos/19994>.

In doing so, the National Council of Justice (CNJ) has determined as one of its goals to grant effectiveness to the principle of access to justice. In order to achieve it, campaigns have been installed to promote alternative methods of resolution of conflicts, such as conciliation and mediation.

The dissemination of conciliation as a procedure to resolve disputes is notorious when we analyze the Brazilian Post-Constitution Legislation of 1988, either through the incorporation of the preliminary conciliation hearing, or through the Special Courts of Law of 1995. Furthermore, what we may observe is a bet on dialogue and consensus as a type of resolution of conflicts at federal law as of 2001; therefore, a special inter-subjective method.

The importance of this dissemination lies in the idea that these resolution mechanisms aim to end the conflict completely, starting from its origins; not simply that dispute in which the parties are eventually engaged. Because "(...) a disputa não é o conflito, mas uma decorrência do conflito."[4] Thus, when a third party (judge) sentences a dispute, most of time it will not end the conflict.

This study is to reflect upon conciliation/mediation, and its part as a method to guarantee access to justice. The analysis was founded on data gathered through a scientific initiation research. This program evaluated the implementation degree of CNJ Public Policies in the Justice System of the State of Sergipe from 2011 to 2013.

The starting point of the research was the implementation of strategies by the National Council of Justice (CNJ) concerning Public Policies to implement a Judiciary Statistics System, focusing on the Resolution No.125 of 2010, which determined specific statistical management criteria set out for the centres of conciliation and mediation.

The philosophical reflection will allow us to question the foundation of this State model, frankly neoliberal, which manipulates the access to justice in statistic and quantitative terms, leaving less room to promote a qualitative access to justice that would be able to empower the parties of the process.

[4] COSTA, A. Cartografia dos métodos de composição de conflito. In AZEVEDO, A. G. E*studos em arbitragem, mediação e negociação*. Porto Alegre: Fabris, 2001, p. 3. "(...) the dispute is not the conflict, but a consequence of the conflict." (author's translation)

2. To whom it serves to conciliate?

Conciliation and mediation are amongst the systems of resolution of disputes, in which the participation of parties grows as the obliging power of the third party weakens. During conciliation, the intervening third party may still propose a deal and ponder resolutions jointly with both parties. Conversely, the mediator cannot even do that. He is restrict, regarding the deal, to the duty of creating a communication channel and, therefore, allow the parties to transform the conflict[5].

Admittedly, the conciliation culture appeals to a society that intends to cope with its own conflicts in a more pacific and participative way by expanding the access to justice in every possible perspective. The conciliator must conduct the analysis of the case in search for possible suggestions so that the parties themselves may settle the conflict. By doing so, what matters is that the decision may satisfy both parties, opposing to the decision made by a judge, which would inevitably make the parties take the roles of winner and loser.

In general, the mediation constitutes the method chosen for family cases, in view of the need to, besides ending the dispute, to restore the subjective relations. For it is in the family conflict that the parties have more contact and normally more emotional connection. By stimulating these alternative methods,

> " O Judiciário passaria a desempenhar um papel subsidiário na estrutura Estatal, na medida em que seria acionado quando outros meios de resolução de conflitos não atinjam a utilidade desejada para satisfazer as partes[6].

In this perspective, it is not possible to work by the idea of winners and losers anymore, neither with other common dualisms (victim/attacker, right/wrong, guilty/not guilty), which excludes the pacifist characteristic of the method based on the idea of complementarity

[5] REBOUÇAS, G. M. T*ramas entre subjetividades e direito.* Rio de Janeiro: Lumen Juris, 2012.

[6] MAYER, L. A. Métodos alternativos de resolução de conflitos sob a ótica do direito contemporâneo. Jus Navigandi, Teresina, ano 16, n. 2997, 15 set. 2011 [cited at 11 February 2014]. Available from World Wide Web: <http://jus.com.br/artigos/19994>."The Judiciary would take a subsidiary role in the State structure, as it would be called for when other methods of resolution of disputes don't live up to the parties expectations." (author's translation)

> (...) que pressupõe, em todo conflito, a presença ativa de dois opositores responsáveis pela sua manifestação e manutenção. Ativa aqui não é sinônimo de violência, como passiva tampouco é sinônimo de vitimização [7].

The unequal forces of bargain create a tension always present in the negotiation and also reflect in conciliation. Despite imagining a horizontal field of arguments and counter-arguments, of relations and interactions between interests and solicitations, where it's not possible to idealize a communicative rationality which allows the parties to put themselves in a position of equality, it is needed to not lose sight of a uneven field of forces.

Through the rhetorical and argumentative instruments and the appeal to the common ideals of society, particular interests are imposed when not dissonant from the discourses that try to legitimate the pact. In which case, is important to accept the striking ideas of Laura Nader, when the cohercitive harmony of the juridical models is analyzed: "In every case that I have examined, the rule is that the weakest party goes in search for the law while the strongest tries to negotiate."

Therefore, beyond conciliation's legal configuration in the judicial process, what matters is to recognize that there has been a significative effort from the Judiciary since the National Council of Justice's Movement for Conciliation, which aims to use this self-composing method of resolution of conflicts to accelerate, minimize and grant effect to the process, seeking a way to guarantee the access to justice.

The judicial system, therefore, supported by an amount of rights and procedures which guarantee a certain predictability in the decision while at the same time, establishes as its ideal an equal treatment, intermediated by this third party – impartial and distant from the dispute itself –, if not capable of being the guardian of the expectations of those vulnerable by economical and social conditions, at least allows the dispute to not be abandoned under a field of forces that are certainly adverse to the ones with no information, status or economical power. This argument imposes a certain obstruction to the self-composing system of resolution, whose impositions may also be disguised by a discourse of harmony and consensus.

[7] MUSZKAT, M. Mediação de Conflitos: Pacificando e prevenindo a violência. São Paulo: Summus Editorial, 2003, p. 35. "(...) that presupposes, in every dispute, the active presence of two opponents responsible for the manifestation and management. Active in this case is not a synonym of violence, as passive neither is synonym of victimization."(author's translation)

However, the theoretical implications of conciliation's adequacy in the course of the judicial process are contrasted by a lot of advertisement and investment, especially during the times when the major litigants request conciliation hearings. This has happened over the last years, starting from a posture taken by the Judiciary itself, but later supported by the other powers and above all by both republican pacts firmed between the chiefs of all three powers, respectively in 2004 and 2009[8]. In this sense, it is important to observe that:

> "O cotidiano forense não se modifica porque novas legislações têm vigência, antes, para a eficácia jurídica e social de uma instituição jurídica, prescinde que ocorram mudanças na visão de mundo dos atores jurídicos[9].

It is needed, therefore, to investigate if the Judiciary has materialized its own rules regarding the juridical administration. And, at the same rate, it is also needed to question said rules from a critical point of view, so that it is possible to determine their effectiveness.

Let it not be denied that the necessity of public policies is real in order to reach a larger dissemination of the conciliation culture. But it is even more important to investigate the real objective behind the discourse of access to justice.

3. Reflections on the access to justice in neoliberal times

It seems that what has made the Brazilian Judiciary System search for public policies that aim to stimulate conciliation and mediation is not only the achievement of access to justice. The CNJ (National Council of Justice) has tried to establish the conciliation culture inside Brazilian's judicial system through campaigns such as the Conciliation

[8] IWAKURA, C. R. Conciliar é legal?. Jus Navigandi, Teresina, ano 15, n. 2579, 24 jul. 2010. [cited at 11 February 2014]. Available from World Wide Web: <http://jus.com.br/revista/texto/17035>.

[9] STAMFORD, A. Conciliação judicial e ação comunicativa: acordo judicial como negociação versus consenso. In: Anuário dos cursos de pós-graduação em direito, n.13, 2003, Recife: Edição do Programa de pós-graduação em direito da UFPE (2003). "The forensic daily routine does not change because new legislations have validity. Previously, in order to maintain the judicial and social efficacy of a juridical institution, it is necessary to change the vision that some of the juridical actors have of the world." (author's translation)

Week and through the resolution 125/2010.

> "A padronização objetiva conciliar crenças sociais e especificidades locais, neste país de dimensões continentais e de vasta diversidade cultural. Unifica a práxis sem uniformizá-la, evita disparidades de orientações e de práticas e, ao mesmo tempo, propõe assegurar a boa execução desta política pública."[10]

But the most important objective seems to be the statistical management of the number of processes, in order to optimize expenses and diminish the volume of demands in all of magistrate's courts. Supported by the marketing of celerity, joint efforts and incentives to conciliation are advertised through every judicial sphere.

The observations taken form the state of Sergipe's justice between 2011 to 2013 revealed a less than democratic method of managing this disputes (despite all of conciliation's benefits). It enables the big litigants, who are the financial institutions, to send to conciliation only the demands that they find already lost (in general, the ones on the execution phase).

The conciliation process will evaluate whether the winner part wants to receive a lesser value instead of waiting the enormous amount of time required by the justice system. This means that its malfunction is the primary argument used by the big debtors so that they can diminish the values of the agreements. And so, the distinction pointed out by Cappelletti[11] between "casual" litigants and "customary" litigants comes true. The customary litigants are the ones with advantage in the juridical transaction for lots of factors, but mainly because of their greater experience with the law.

On the other hand, the time to conciliate is not enough and the conciliators lack in preparation and incentive to work. The conciliation is then reduced to a mere number to be managed statically. And poorly managed! The data retrieved from Sergipe revealed that the rules established by the Council of Justice have not been taken too seriously, which can be stated due to the countless inconsistencies present. It starts with how the data is collected: the conciliator himself, by the end of the day, reports how many conciliation hearings there were and how many were effective. By doing so, they make it impossible to verify which processes were not conciliated and which ones were. Besides, the numbers do not match mathematically and they do not represent the entire state of Sergipe, only those made by the conciliators at the Conciliation Centre, which is far from representing the number of courthouses in the state. Not even the State's Justice Court organizes the data of conciliations conducted there.

---

[10] LEVY, F. et al. Resolução n. 125 do Conselho Nacional de Justiça: Leitura Comentada. DJ-e nº 39/2011, 01/03/2011, p. 1. [cited at 11 February 2014]. Available from: <http://www.foname.com.br/wp-content/uploads/2011/10/MEDIACAO-CNJ-RESOLUCAO-GUIA-PRATICO-final.pdf.>. "The standardizing aims to conciliate social beliefs and local specifications, in this country of continental dimensions and of great cultural diversity. It unifies the praxis without uniforming it, avoids orientation and practices disparities and, at the same time, proposes to assure the good execution of this public policy." (author's translation)

[11] CAPPELLETTI, M. and GARTH, B.. Acesso à justiça. Porto Alegre: Fabris, 1988.

The resolution 125/2010 also determines that citizenship services be instituted in Sergipe's justice but they paradoxically do not exist in the Judicial Centre of Resolution of Conflicts and "Citizenship". The same happened to the institution of the Permanent Nucleus of Consensual Methods of Resolution of Conflicts – department which should be in charge of managing the National Judicial Policy on the Adequate Treatment of Conflicts of Interest – its creation is not clear, though they argument that it was introduced together with the Centre, but there is no practical distinction between them.

It is important to point out that the resolution 125/2010 is not the only one regulating the subject, there are two others which operate within the state's judicial sphere: the resolutions 11/2011 and 35/2012. The first one states the Permanent Nucleus of Consensual Methods of Resolution of Conflicts and in its article nine determines the application of the rules instituted by the resolution 125/2010, also it modifies the name of the Centre of Conciliation to Judiciary Centre of Solution of Conflicts and Citizenship. The later determines the attributions of the Nucleus instituted by the resolution 11/2011, the attributions of the Centre of Solution of Conflicts and Citizenship and the conciliator's duties.

Besides these resolutions there are different projects of law, which regulate conciliation and mediation, such as the Project of the New Procedural Civil Code, which intends to systematize those institutes. There is also the Project of Law 1028/11, which authorizes the lieutenants to promote conciliations in crimes of minor offensive potential even before the investigation.

Still trying to insert culturally the practice of these alternative methods of resolution of conflicts, it has been set since 2005 the Conciliation Week as part of the National Council of Justice's program, which mobilizes the Brazilian justice. It is an initiative in which for five days the Judiciary incentivises conciliations for open cases, not to mention the other joint efforts that take place year-around.

As an example of previous research done in the area, entitled "The impact of the National Movement for Conciliation by the National Council of Justice on the State's Common Courts in Sergipe through 2006 to 2010", an investigation about Sergipe's quantitative data on conciliation began. Reaching the emphatic conclusion that despite the Council's marketing about the rise of conciliations around Brazil, there never was reliable statistical data to conclude such rise. The reason lies in the uneven method through which the data has been collected, either because the Council itself had been modifying every year the information that should be collected by the Centre, or because the refusal to use a technological system that would prevent simple human mistakes. And thus obstructs the precise verification of the impact caused by the conciliation's campaigns around all of Brazil.

Now after the standardizing of the collectable data, which was done by the National Council of Justice through the resolution 125/2010, it is not yet possible to verify any evolution on the results.

4. Final remarks

Through the analysis of conciliation as a mean of access to justice it is possible to conclude that the promotion of the alternative methods of resolution of conflicts constitutes an extremely important measure to the National Judiciary. Nevertheless, caution is necessary when dealing with the methodology in which they are imposed; otherwise it would be easier to neglect the qualitative concept inherent in conciliation.

The truth is the discourse of harmony and Peace, which surrounds the Centre of Solution of Conflicts and Citizenship, is rather weak when compared to the human subjectivity. In the collectivity, however, reside the means to make it function properly through the union of the litigants and the conciliators.

> "Para que se alcance a função pacificadora dos conflitos, os magistrados e as partes envolvidas, incluindo-se aqui os colaboradores e serventuários do Poder Judiciário, devem adotar uma postura condizente com o mecanismo conciliador, deixando-se por um momento as relações humanas em evidência e abrindo-se mão da tecnicidade excessiva, para que se viabilize assim um resultado > satisfatório e mais aproximado da realidade dos fatos e das características pessoais dos litigantes12.

In other words, at the moment the self-composing methods are somehow set so that the parties' symbiosis becomes tangible, an initial step will be taken towards the end of the crisis in the Judiciary. It is certain that the existent public policies are not enough to do it in a short amount of time but they represent essential measures on the search of this path.

The immediate goal may be the decrease in the number of judicial actions but in the future the foresight of a new mapping of methods of resolution of disputes, "em que todos os métodos sejam compreendidos como estratégias específicas no tratamento jurídico da conflituosidade social e, não mais como elementos auxiliares da jurisdição (...)"[13] perhaps will arise.

But for now, it is crucial to question the presentation of data – mere numbers without true meaning – as improvement in access to justice. Specially because of the neoliberal state in which we live in, where the attempts to surpass goals as an end in itself remains and the judicial sphere is not excluded from this phenomenon.

Even if the promises of celerity and access to justice are important to the resolution, they alone are not enough to reach a qualified access. However, the game of the big litigants, such as companies, financial institutions or the State itself – so close to the judicial system as they are – is always disadvantageous to the regular citizen, accentuating the inequality of the parties' conditions.

---

[12] MAYER, L. A. Métodos alternativos de resolução de conflitos sob a ótica do direito contemporâneo. Jus Navigandi, Teresina, ano 16, n. 2997, 15 set. 2011 [cited at 11 February 2014]. Available from World Wide Web: <http://jus.com.br/artigos/19994>."In order to accomplish the pacifist function of the disputes, the judges and the parties involved, including here the collaborators and servants of the Judicial Power, must adopt a posture which reflects the conciliatory mechanism, leaving aside for a moment the evident human relations and the excessive technicality, so that a satisfactory result could be possible and closer to the reality of facts and to the personal characteristics of the litigants." (author's translation)

[13] COSTA, A. Cartografia dos métodos de composição de conflito. In AZEVEDO, A. G. Estudos em arbitragem, mediação e negociação. Porto Alegre: Fabris, 2001, p. 6. "(…) through which all the methods are comprehended as specific strategies in the juridical treatment of social disputes and no longer as auxiliaries of the jurisdiction (...)" (author's translation)

The importance of this study rests, therefore, in observing if the path of promoting these alternative methods of resolution of conflicts – conciliation and mediation –, does not simply result in a doubly disadvantageous dimension to the access of justice: on one hand, the judiciary with its more effective justice by way of being cheaper, selling the illusion of access, and on the other, the big litigants cunningly forcing deals in cases in which their side always wins and the citizen always loses.

References

CAPPELLETTI, Mauro; GARTH, Bryant. Acesso à justiça. Trad. Ellen Gracie Northfleet. Porto Alegre: Fabris, 1988.

COSTA, Alexandre Araújo. Cartografia dos métodos de composição de conflito. In: AZEVEDO, André Gomma (org). *Estudos em arbitragem, mediaç*ão e negociação. Porto Alegre: Fabris, 2001. Vol.3

IWAKURA, Cristiane Rodrigues. Conciliar é legal?. Jus Navigandi, Teresina, ano 15, n. 2579, 24 jul. 2010. [11 February 2014]. Available from: <http://jus.com.br/revista/texto/17035>.

LEVY, F. et al. *Resolução n. 125 do Conselho Nacional de Justiça: Leitura Comentada. DJ-e nº 39/2011, 01/03/2011, p. 1. [cited 11 February 2014]. Available from:<http://www.foname.com.br/wp-content/uploads/2011/10/MEDIACAO-CNJ-RESOLUCAO-GUIA-PRATICO-final.pdf.>.

MAYER, Larissa Affonso. Métodos alternativos de resolução de conflitos sob a ótica do direito contemporâneo. Jus Navigandi, Teresina, ano 16, n. 2997, 15 set. 2011. [cited 11 February 2014] Available from: <http://jus.com.br/artigos/19994>.

MUSZKAT, Malvina. Mediação de Conflitos: Pacificando e prevenindo a violência. São Paulo: Summus Editorial, 2003.

REBOUÇAS, G. M. Tramas entre subjetividades e direito: a constituição do sujeito em Michel Foucault e os sistemas de resolução de conflitos. Rio de janeiro: Lumen Juris, 2012

STAMFORD, Artur. Conciliação judicial e ação comunicativa: acordo judicial como negociação versus consenso. In: Anuário dos cursos de pós-graduação em direito, n.13, 2003, Recife: Edição do Programa de pós-graduação em direito da UFPE, 2003. p.75-109.

Regnum legis hic et nunc

Daniel Nunes Pereira[1]

> "I'm the king of my own land. Facing tempests of dust, I'll fight until the end. Creatures of my dreams raise up and dance with me! Now and forever, I'm your king!" – Outro – M83

Abstract: This study examines the bases upon which lies our idea of Democracy and Rule of Law. Also, it show the tensions inherent and inborn with the democratic state based on a Constitution and its Judicial Review. Yet, the paper tries to foresee some kind of relation between Rule of Law, Constitutional Jurisdiction and the Real and Ideal instances of the Law.

Keywords: Democracy, Constitution, Rule of Law.

I

The form, the substance and meaning of 'Democracy' proved a conceptual problem for ordinary people, scholars and statesmen in various parts of the world, in various periods of human history. Even Sir Winston Churchill, as a guise of illustration, questioned his parliamentary colleagues and his cabinet ministers.

> "How does the right hon' Gentleman conceive democracy? (…) Many forms of Government have been tried and will be tried in this world of sin and woe. No one pretends that democracy is perfect or all-wise. Indeed, it has been said that democracy is the worst form of government except all those other forms that have been tried from time to time"[2].

[1] Grad. Student – Sociology and Law; Political Science – UFF – Universidade Federal Fluminense – Brazil.

[2] CHURCHILL, Winston Leonard Spencer. Speech in the House of Commons

If conceptually 'Democracy' is a problem, its defense and institutional maintenance becomes an intellectual battleground undermined by quandaries and seemingly insurmountable philosophical tensions. While problematic, this issue has to be riddled, at least ad hoc, to sustain the most wholesome, enduring and cherished categories to Western Civilization, such as the defense of freedom and human dignity.

This study focuses on the question of how to defend the hodiernal idea of democratic state (understood as Rule of Law or Rechtsstaatlichkeit/Rechtsstaat) under three paradigms: a) a nearly consensual concept of Democracy, b) the problem of democratic legitimacy of a constitutional court as a defender of democratic rule of law c) the tension between the real and ideal dimensions of law as a civilizational foundation issue.

II

The political experience went through several trials, thus, there are several "possible worlds" for academic usage of democracy as concept. Therefore, themed cutouts are made towards fitting Democracy in an alleged political model of nowadays material consensus.

Under the so called contemporary theory of democracy converge three major traditions of political thought (BOBBIO, MATTEUCCI, 1998: 319): a) the Classical Theory, disclosed as Aristotelian theory about the three forms of government, according to which democracy is the government of the people, of all citizens, i.e. those who enjoy the rights of citizenship, the monarchy stands the Government of a sole person, and the aristocracy, the Government of few; b) the Medieval Theory, originated in classical Rome, based on popular sovereignty, based under the conception that supreme power derives from the people and becomes representative, or it derives from the Princeps and is transmitted by delegation from the upper to the lower social strata; c) the Modern Theory known as the theory of Machiavelli, born with the notion of the Modern National State in the form of large monarchies, whereby the historical forms of government are essentially two: the monarchy and republic, and the former Democracy is nothing more than a form of republic (the other is the aristocracy), which originates the characteristic of pre-revolutionary period over exchanges between democratic ideals and republican ideals and the Government genuinely popular is called, instead of democracy, a republic.

11/11/1947. In. "The Official Report, House of Commons (5th Series)" vol. 444, cc. 206–07. Available at: http://hansard.millbanksystems.com/commons/1947/nov/11/parliament-bill#column_206

From these three historical matrices is possible to trace an overview of modern/contemporary (the last two centuries) theoretical horizon, whereupon some authors whose seminal works highlight on the subject of Democracy, namely: Schumpeter, Mises, Popper, Hayek, Tocqueville and Kelsen. These authors may be divided, for this study's sake, among those with a theory on formal democracy and those concerning a theory on material democracy – namely, the late is more useful to this intellectual effort than the first one. Thus, under the present paradigm, are more fruitful to study the theories of Kelsen and Tocqueville, understanding as more fragile the theses of Schumpeter, Mises, Hayek and Popper, since they have in common, the aim on formal democracy and not material, that is the crux of this study.

The basis of our weltanschauung concerning Democracy probably is the idea of popular deliberations on political matters. Deliberative democracy was first envisioned by Aristotle, which is evident on "Politica" and ethica Nicomachēa" (ARISTOTLES, 1981, 2000) born from exposure to collective opinions that diverge and converge, tending to form an intense dialogue that aims the scope of practical truth, which guides all political action. Thus, in Aristotle, the basis of democracy is the practical reason, understood as prudence, which, in turn, seeks a practical truth. The teleological conception of the world of Aristotle must be observed so that you can understand deliberative democracy as a form of government capable of bringing the man's realization of its Telos (purpose). However there is a highly utopian character on Aristotle propositions, of course, not by chance, in line with his work. Thus, in order to address a more immanent theory, we must counter this Aristotelian transcendence.

This highly idealized Democracy on Aristotle's shall be complemented with Kelsen's procedural democracy, understood as a method capable of creating a social collective order (KELSEN, 1993: 102-104). It is contemplated the Majority Rule as the essential characteristic of procedural democracy, which allows the lien of freedom for greater number of individuals in society. Towards this purpose a relativistic view of the world shall be adopted (KELSEN, 1993: 161) which explains philosophically the "kelsenean democracy", based on freedom, and therefore self-determination concerning creation and foundation of one's truth and moral values.

In the work of Kelsen one can only understand procedural democracy as a method capable of creating a collective social order, id est, the form of government that provides rules and procedures that allow citizens to make decisions. These rules do not pertain to the content of the decisions, but they operate in order to establish who are the citizens able to take legal and political decisions and how such decisions are attained: "(... democracy is only one way, only one method of creating social order (...)"(KELSEN, 1993: 103). Thus understood as the Majority Rule, lies an essential characteristic of procedural democracy and this is what preserves the freedom of the greater number of individuals in society.

The concept of Democracy hereby presented and problematized demands a political anthropology understanding the individual as antisocial and self-interested by nature, demanding freedom, wanting to impose their will for their own interests, ultimately opposed by the coercive power of the State. However, unlike the eminently liberal authors such as Mises, Hayek and Schumpeter, this kelsenean theory do not admit "a rational man stricto sensu" (as in Rational Choice), but a psychological man who brings reverberations of his psyche to the social and political world, according to Freudian theory (KELSEN, 1993: 301).

The ontological necessity of social demands power to regulate human relations, the natural liberties and freedom must undergo on some kind of cleavage, as seen on Tocqueville and Burke, thus "the natural liberty becomes a social or political freedom." (KELSEN, 1993: 28).

This social freedom comprehends self-determination, i.e., one is truly free when the law comprises its will. Since it is impossible to reconcile all individual volitions with the social order "(...) the existence of society or the state assume that there may be disagreement between social order and individual volition." (KELSEN, 1993: 30).

The worth of equality is linked to value freedom, but is understood as secondary unlike to thinkers accustomed to classical liberalism. "It is the value of freedom and not equality that defines, firstly, the idea of democracy" (KELSEN, 1993: 99). The 'equality issue' on a procedural democracy is a formal idea, that is, parity of political rights: "(...) because everyone should be free to the greatest extent possible, everyone must participate in the shaping of the will of the State and, consequently, in the same degree"(KELSEN, 1993: 99).

Trussing the concept of democracy hereby developed, an analogy shall be proposed between political theory and disciplines of philosophy, namely, epistemology and Values Theory. In Kelsen's theory, ultimately with phyto merely argumentative and didactic, there are two antagonistic forms of state: democracy and autocracy. And in philosophy, both in epistemology and the Values Theory, there is antagonism between philosophical absolutism and philosophical relativism.

> "(...)There is not only an outer parallel, but an internal antagonistic relation between autocracy / democracy on the one hand, and philosophical absolutism / philosophical relativism on the other. Autocracy, understood as political absolutism, is coordinated with the philosophical absolutism, while democracy, as political relativism, is coordinated with the philosophical relativism" (KELSEN, 1993: 161).

The examination of the philosophical basis of democracy should neither objectify nor constitute a justification for absolute democracy, which would focus on the paradox of skepticism, like on the thought of Sextus Empiricus (KOLAKOWSKI, 2009: 88). A philosophical speculation riddled with absolute thoughts, typical of metaphysics and religion, leans to do not recognize any social value towards the inclusion of the other.

Therefore, the only permitted vindication for Democracy lies on a relativistic and science-based philosophy, with a few phenomenological caveats (HUSSERL, 1976: 302, 331, 371), ergo a functional justification. Such justification leaves the decision about the social value to be put in place over the individuals active in political reality. In this step, democracy finds its functional foundation under the hypothesis of individuals active in political reality understanding that freedom and equality are values that should be put in place. Thus behold, the main difference between Kelsen and Schumpeter, Mises and Hayek. Democracy is justified, therefore, to be the form of government most functionally adjusted to achieve the values of freedom, liberty and equality.

Since Kelsen, with mainstay in Aristotle and denying Schumpeter and other liberals, proposes Democracy as form, yet he worries about its materiality. Therefore, there is a question and problematization over the legitimacy and the possibility of a dictatorship of the majority (KELSEN, 1993: 178, 179), leading us to infer that shares some of Tocqueville thinking.

Tocqueville asserts that the exercise of full and unconditional volition of the majority, without observing the upper limits of the law, tends to erode the equal freedom required by the rules of democratic government (TOCQUEVILLE, 2005: 294). This possibility is identified by Tocqueville as a tyranny of the majority, identified when the elements of democracy are not reachable or guaranteed for all the citizens.

> "The freedom of some derives from the prohibitions imposed on others. There is a famous phrase of Tocqueville that implies similar definition: 'despots themselves do not deny that freedom is good, they just want it for themselves, and abide that all other people are absolutely unworthy of it'. Therefore there is no difference concerning the opinion about freedom, but on the greater or lesser value that is attributed to men "(ARON, 1985: 205).

It shall be, therefore, under this normative horizon comprised on Kelsen, Tocqueville and Aristotle that assertions about the Rule of Law under contemporary institutional issues will be developed.

III

Democracy as a concept, and within the parameters set out above, lies in tension with the democratic legitimacy of the Constitutional Jurisdiction, since this is (under kelsenian understanding) the Guardian of the State under Rule of Law. However, this is a juridical guard of political and oft philosophical matter.

If the law[3]deals with the rationalization of facts and its logical sequence, to what extent the Constitutional Jurisdiction shares (or should commune) of a generalized logic, immanent, and functional through assumptions and conclusions? The legality of the decisions of a Constitutional Court shall be consistent under a notion of legal system conjoint to the assumption of Rule of Law as the basis of Democracy.

The clou of constitutional norm (which should be sheltered by the Constitutional Court) derives from the fundamental elements of its legal ratio and distinction of moral standards (which would have been out the scope of the Constitutional Court). These rules are structured towards the subject of law, videlicet, the dynamic between objective and subjective rights and duties. Moreover, this bilateralism can be seen as the basal distinguishing mark between moral and legal norm. The moral rule would establish a merely duty unilateral, no one can demand compliance. The rule of law is imperative, because it establishes commands that must be compulsorily observed. This compulsoriness is guaranteed by the sanction imposed by the State (KELSEN, 1998:113). Thus, since the legal rule is a statement written and demanded by the State, in other words, the rules of law is formulated by the State, or recognized by its imperative attributes, with some kind of special treatment when Constitutional in nature, since its closer to the so called Grundnorm. (KELSEN, 2003: 215).

[3] Jus, not Lex, i.e., Rechts and not Gesetz.

This notion of legality is inferred from the cognition of Legal System, a polysemous and elusive concept. Such system is conceptualized in various notions, but only under the sign of two elements, namely, order and unity (CANARIS, 2002: 20). From order is inferred a staggered arrangement of norms, which comprise a apprehensible rationality of certain plight of things. Furthermore, the unit serves as preventing any source of dispersion. Under such notion of system congruous to the signs of order and unity, it emerges the very idea of Law (Jus). The order referenced to the system, is embodied by the staggering of rules, which has its empirical apex in the Constitution. Thus, the need for decisions under the Constitution can be interpreted as the last guarantor of systemic unit towards the Democratic State and the Rule of Law.

However, this catenation of thought is opposed by the work of Carl Schmitt, powerful mind, penman of writings endowed with great and terrible wisdom that can lead political philosophy and iuris prudetia towards dangerous and bleak places. Schmitt opened strange doors that we'd never close again[4]…

In theory there would be some aporiae in the juxtaposition of categories such as 'Constitution', 'Basic Norm' and 'Constituent Power' (SCHMITT, 1996: 63, 96). Also, another stalemate, the idea of Constitutional Jurisdiction deals the issues of multiplicity of meanings for Category of Constitution, id est, according to the author in comment, there may be in the Constitution antithetical concepts, such as Absolute, Relative, Positivist and Ideal (SCHMITT, 1996: 29, 37, 45, 58). In Schmitt's perspective, despite being an auteur maudit, there are important links between the legality of judicial decisions and multiplicity of concepts about constitutional reality and its categorical contrapositions.

The very wrangle concerning the concept, scheme and purport of Democracy, when tensioned to issues relative to Judicial Review, must be retraced and redacted on the light of the critical model pleaded by Carl Schmitt himself.

---

[4] "She opened strange doors that we'd never close again". BOWIE, David. "Scary Monsters and Super Creeps" In. "Scary Monsters (And Super Creeps) - Album". London/New York: RCA.1980.

Can the judicial system of courts, namely the Constitutional Court, become the hegemonic instance regarding interpretation of the Constitution and usurp the legislative function? How to ensure respect for the Constitution despite the popular and political animorum? Such questions illustrate the complexity upon imperious quarrels concerning the legitimacy of the Constitutional Jurisdiction within certain democratic political order.

Considering the paradigm about democracy explained above (founder of social order and lying between the Majority Rule and the protection of minorities) arise questions regarding the role of the Constitutional Jurisdiction. Thus, regarding the expansion of the judiciary in the contemporary constitutional democracies identified for this study, there are three main criticisms upon democratic legitimacy of the Constitutional Jurisdiction (BARROSO, 2009: 11) - a) political ideological criticism b) misgiving upon institutional capacity, c) seeming limitation of debate.

The political ideological criticism lies in the fact that judges may ot be not elected officials[5], in other words, investiture is not derived from the popular will. Furthermore, when judgment is upon acts of the Legislature or the Executive branch, the judiciary plays a role that is clearly political.

The institutional capacity of the Judiciary is put to the test whilst understood as the power "the final, ultimate and indefeasible word". In theory, the three constituted Powers, can and should interpret the Constitution and guide their activity based on it. The exception is the divergence, and, to this matter, the "final word" appertains to the Judiciary, woefully the constituted power that undergoes on such huge democratic deficit.

Finally, once the parley and moot are placed, ultima ratio, at the hands of the judiciary, there are restrictions derivative of dialogism and semiotics of law.

> "The world of Law has its own categories, speeches and proper methods of argumentation. The mastery of this instrument requires technical knowledge and specific training, not accessible to most people. The first consequence of the drastic judicialization is the gentrification of the discussion and excluding those who do not master the language or have access to the locus of legal parley. Legal institutes such as public hearings, 'amicus curiae', law> suits perpetrated by civil society organizations, mitigate but not eliminate this problem. Thus arose the danger of producing apathy in social forces, who would be waiting for providential judges. "(BARROSO, 2009: 14).

[5] Brazil and United States of America's case, for instance.

These three problems regarding the Constitutional Control towards protection of the Democracy and the Rule of Law, verily conceal another issue, much more profound and deep-seated at the very ontological relations between the phenomena of juridicity and society itself – the conflict between real and ideal.

IV

There are two instances in the Law (Jus), namely a real or factual dimension, and another one, the Ideal or critical. In both instances there is tension between social efficiency and ideal rights as well claims of moral correctness. Such coexistence and tension between the two dimensions, not incidentally appears in the work of Kelsen, influenced by Hume and Kant. In the first, the "is-ought problem" (HUME, 2009: 509) that form the basis of his meta-ethics, while the latter used the terms "Sein" and "Sollen" to indicate that man lives two different dimensions, as a member of nature and subject to its rules, and as founder of some project concerning correction of the natural world. Thus, from Hume and Kant to Kelsen, the issue of tension between Ideal and Real gains importance for an analysis intended to keep the Rule of Law and Democratic State by legal institutions.

The Ideal parameters of the Law, according to Kant, concerns a claim to a essential adjustment (ALEXY, 2009: 10), which includes a claim to moral correctness, which is the source of the relation between law and morality. This moral adjustment operates in the maintenance of the Democratic State, id est, there is a theoretical construct of how democracy should be institutionalized. In Accordance with Kant, the cognition regarding State, is undoubtedly a legal idea, so what ends up characterizing the activity of the State is therefore a legal activity. Even in a situation of social inequality is necessary to consider the legal equality - to imagine how a democratic state should be is to institutionalize the means to achieve it. The attainment of a Democratic State is not only wanted to achieve, but the path towards it is important, videlicet, beyond the existence of the Rule of Law is imperious to institutionalize its means, exempli gratia, Judicial Review.

The factual side is reflected in the defining elements of the formally adequate production and social efficacy of the law (ALEXY, 2005: 29). Is possible to ascertain the law as the rationalization of human volitions and desires, i.e. "Reason is, and ought only to be the slave of the passions" (HUME, 2009: 451). It seems, therefore, that yet holding to rationalists dictates, the law is deduced from volitional expressions, not always rational, which lies in the dimensions of Real/Sein.

In the instance of Real or "Being" (Sein), there are two realities that overlap each other: a complex society (sometimes called postmodern) and existential human condition.

Western societies are structured upon capitalism and have been thriven in a multicultural context, composed of very different identities, under the ideological background of an alleged homogenization and universalization. The multiple cultures in those societies are part of a general culture where the logic of capital puts its manifestations in a network of mass production oriented towards endless consumption. There is a recrudescence of the interrelationships between individuals, understood as products and concomitantly producers of social reality, magnifying the individualistic organization and individualism. Considered as an ideology and moral base structuring of capitalist society, individualism is under constant mutation, showing strong tendency to radicalization, amid an abundance of human resources which, strictly speaking, would be sufficient to provide human happiness.

In the other hemisphere of "Sein" lies the existential human condition, which presents itself as a dramatic and hopelessly sore narrative in which man remains torn between two realities co-dependent and mysterious that cannot be defined, namely, the existence and transcendence (JASPERS, 1994: 173-178). Transcendence gains importance when the known cognizable through empiricism and science it is not self-sufficient and does not explain itself. Thus, Man being himself infinite yet tied in a finite human experience, is reified by Law through its institutions.

Therefore, these two sides of the Sein become problem to the Law, when it is placed to defend the democratic order. However, both sides of Real/Sein are reverberated on the Ideal the instance of Law, namely, the ultimate justification of legal and political experience - humankind itself.

Legal rules have underlying existential justifications, standards of justice or principles against arbitrariness. Thus, one can observe that rules are not obeyed only by the emanation of authority, but because it contains values that transcend its own text. In order defend values and goals that go beyond the text of the norm, it is possible, for instance, to overcome it, through contra legem acts.

Every law, yet inscribed on the Ideal instance, aim to protect the Man himself. Each of the rules of a particular legal system, including the Basic Law, concerning democracy and/or the Constitutional Jurisdiction, aims to defend the humankind.

Thus, it is concluded, the defense of Democracy and the Rule of Law is not an end in itself, since such categories are mere abstractions. The Law (Jus) serves the Democratic Ideal insofar protects every individual in his private universe, within and beyond his or her existence amidst the "here and now" of today's multifaceted society. In every law, every rule, every decision of each Court, there is a transcendence of text itself and its prompt objectives. Likewise, in every gesture of compassion, in every act of justice and even in every struggle for survival, lie the reasons and justifications of Democracy and the Rule of Law - ourselves.

References

ALEXY, Robert. "Begriff und Geltung des Rechts". Freiburg: Alber Verlag. 2005.

ALEXY, Robert. "Principais elementos de uma teoria da dupla natureza do Direito". In: "Revista de Direito Administrativo". N.253. Rio de Janeiro: Editora FGV Direito Rio. 2010. pp. 9-30. [ALEXY, Robert. "Hauptelemente einer Theorie der Doppelnatur des Rechts", In. "Archiv für Rechts — und Sozialphilosophie", v. 95, N. 2, p. 151-166, abr. 2009].

ARISTOTLES. "Nicomachean Ethics". Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 2000.

ARISTOTLES. "The Politics". Harmondsworth: Penguin.1981.

ARON, Raymond. "Estudos Políticos". Brasília: Editora UNB, 1985. [ARON, Raymond. "Études politiques", Paris: Gallimard, 1972]

BARROSO, Luis Roberto. "C*onstituição, Democracia e Supremacia Judicial*". In: "Revista de Direito do Estado", Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2009, v.16, p. 3/42.

BOBBIO, N. MATTEUCCI, N. "Dicionário de Política". Brasília: Editora UNB. 1998. [Dictionary of Politics: Diccionario de Politica. French & European Publications, Incorporated. 1983]

CANARIS, Claus Wilhelm. "Pensamento sistemático e conceito de sistema na Ciên- cia do Direito".Lisboa: Fundação Calouste Gulbenkian, 2002. [CANARIS, Claus Wilhelm. "Systemdenken und Systembegriff in der Jurisprudenz". Berlin: Duncker und Humblot. 1969].

HUME, David. "Tratado da Natureza Humana". São Paulos: Editora UNESP. 2009. [HUME, David. "A Treatise of Human Nature". London: NuVision. 2007].

HUSSERL, Edmund. "La Crise dês Science Européenes et La Phénoménologie Transcendantale". Paris: Gallimard. 1976.

KELSEN, Hans. "A Democracia". 1ª ed., São Paulo: Editora Martins Fontes, 1993 [This Brazilian edition comprises the following original works: KELSEN, Hans. "Vom Wesen und Wert der Demokratie", Tübingen: Mohr. 1920; KELSEN, Hans. "Das Problem des Parlamentarismus" Wien: Braumüller, 1924; KELSEN, Hans "Foundations of Democracy" In. "Ethics - LXVI". Number 1, 1956; KELSEN, Hans. "Der Begriff des Staates und die Sozialpsychologie. Mit besonderer Berücksichtigung von Freuds Theorie der Masse" In. "Imago", Vol. VIII, 1922, pp. 97-141; KELSEN, Hans. "Absolutism and Relativism in Philosophy and Politics". In. "The American Political Science Review" XLII, N. 5. 1945].

JASPERS, Karl."Philosophical Faith and Revelation". In. OAKES, Edward T. [Org.]. "German Essays on Religion". New York: The Continuum Publishing Company. 1994.

KELSEN, Hans. "Teoria Geral do Direito e do Estado". São Paulo: Martins Fontes. 1998. [KELSEN, Hans. "General Theory of Law and State". Cambridge: Cambridge University Press .1945]

KELSEN, Hans. "Teoria Pura do Direito". São Paulo: Martins Fontes. 2003. [KELSEN, Hans."Reine Rechtslehre", Wien: Mohr Siebeck. 1934]

KOLAKOWSKI, Leszlek. "Sobre o Que nos Perguntam os Grandes Filósofos – Vol. 1". Editora Civilização Brasileira: Rio de Janeiro. 2009. [KOLAKOWSKI, Leszlek. "O co nas pytaja wielcy filozofowie Trzy". Krakow: Knak. 2008].

SCHMITT, Carl. "Teoría de la Constitucíon". Madrid: Alianza Editorial. 1996. [SCHMITT, Carl. "Verfassungslehre". München: Duncker & Humblot 1928.]

TOCQUEVILLE, Alexis de. "A democracia na América". São Paulo: Martins Fontes, 2005. [Tocqueville, Alexis de. "De la Démocratie en Amérique". Cambridge: Schoenhofs Foreign Books. 1986].

From autonomy to democracy

Mou Chengwen[1]

Abstract: This paper mainly discusses about the relationship between autonomy and democracy: autonomy is prerequisite of existence of democracy and democracy is only the possibility result of development of autonomy. As far as subject of being is concerned, there are three intermediary links from autonomy to democracy which are identification and confirmation of right boundary of aseity, identification and confirmation of right boundary of other's existence, and cultivation and practice of democratic spirit. Therefore, autonomy may develop into democracy, at least by going through the above-mentioned three intermediary links.

Keywords: Autonomy Democracy Right Boundary Democratic Spirit

What is the relationship between autonomy and democracy? Now, there are two typical viewpoints on it. One is that both are identical in meaning, the other is that nothing is in common between them. In author's opinion, both views need to be discussed . Autonomy and democracy are neither identical in meaning, nor nothing in common between them. Autonomy is the prerequisite of democracy, and hence it can only be regarded as a lower form of democracy. Democracy is a possible outcome of autonomy, and hence what the democracy demonstrate to autonomy is inevitably the development prospects of autonomy . As thus, there are many intermediary links between autonomy and democracy. It is such intermediary links that constitute either differences or inevitable connections between them.

What intermediary links are there from autonomy to democracy in the being subjects? In the author's view, there are at least three links such as the identification and verification of right range of aseity and of the other's existence and the cultivation and practice of democratic spirit. The author intends to start further discussion on this issue.

[1] Scientific Socialism Research Institution, Institute of Political Science, Central China Normal University, Wuhan, Hubei.

I

Autonomy has only demonstrated an accidental form of democracy, or just unveiled democracy from an obscure state to an obvious state in an accidental way. While democracy has demonstrated development trends of autonomy, which can only exist by accident. The whys and wherefores for that is as follows: if autonomy only takes aseity as an ultimate aim of its existence, it will stand still and decline to move forward ultimately. Only if autonomy takes its existence as an intermediary link of its existence or a post house of the democratic development, can it become democracy.

The process from autonomy to democracy must first of all go through identification and verification of right range of aseity, which is the intermediary link or a must post house from autonomy to democracy.. Lingering in this post house, autonomy must be subject to identification and verification of the right range of aseity firstly.

As for the being subject, self-cognition starts with recognizing aseity, and cognition of aseity starts with recognizing the right range of aseity. Therefore, a being subject with complete self-consciousness firstly is a kind of existence which has complete self-consciousness of the right range of aseity. To achieve recognition of right range of aseity, it is necessary to identify and verify right range of aseity. To identify and verify the right range of aseity, identification is of first importance, and the identification has mainly expressed a priori comprehensive survey . In order to identify the right range of aseity , it is necessary to distinguish mission, position, need, influence, value and significance of aseity in society in light of social context, and define responsibility of aseity to social existence and society's protection to aseity, in other word, what can aseity provide for social existence? What can social existence offer for aseity? How can aseity interact with social existence effectively? If aseity can take itself as an intermediary link with positive correlation of social existence and take social existence as a link with positive correlation of itself, related interaction with positive correlation between them can be constructed in the epistemology which is identification of right range of aseity. It needs a reasonable premise of epistemology to construct a reasonable identification. The reasonable premise of epistemology should include at least four aspects as follows: relatively complete related knowledge, sound self-consciousness, acute philosophical inspiration and reasonable guide of Era Spirit.

If identification of right range of aseity is taken only as an initial stage of self-consciousness, verification of right range of aseity should be re-identification to this initial stage. Why does the human-existence need this re-identification? There are such reasons as follows. Firstly, existence of identification itself is in the flowing state, identification is always flowing beyond itself. Secondly, existence of identification itself cannot become the standard and yardstick of aseity, therefore, it is necessary to transcend the scope of the existence of "identification" itself to judge the identification. Thirdly, only by transcending the scope of the existence of "identification" itself is it possible to understand the value and significance of identification.

Why can the verification form the re-identification of the identification? Because the verification is the nearest to the identification, the distance between them not only reflects a physical significance but also or more importantly expresses a psychological or philosophical significance. It is this situation that determines that the verification become reinforcement to the identification which can only provide some materials to the verification.

The verification of right range right range of aseity can provide subjects the value and significance in at least three aspects in political philosophy . Firstly, it can offer an opportunity to take an acquaintance of existent power as a kind of relative stability, and then this acquaintance can turn intuition into rational and then becomes a being-- which is worth being grasped and can be grasped. Secondly, it can offer spiritual nourishment to self-consciousness which will therefore become more vivid and richer and more colourful than before. Thirdly, it can offer a post house to the identification which will not be a kind of accidental existence in the verification.

II

The process from autonomy to democracy also includes the intermediary link of the identification and verification of right range of the other's existence as well, which is a post house which autonomy must pass through before turning into democracy . Autonomy lingering in the intermediary link must identify and verify right range of the other's existence.

As for the being subject, isolated individuals cannot achieve its independence and freedom. To achieve independence and freedom, one must transcend an isolated individual or isolated self-consciousness and enter into the other's world. Of course, this entry doesn't mean infringing on the other's legal airspace, exceeding the other's legal domain and treading the other's rights underfoot. This entry is a kind of reasonable cognition, understanding and digestion to the other and their existence, by which one will obtain a kind of existent spirit on the mankind. Since it is so, it is necessary to identify and verify the right range of the other's existence. Because it is only this that makes the cognition, understanding and digestion to the other's existence not become infringement on the other's legal airspace, transgression beyond the other's legal domain and violation of the other's rights.

Firstly, the identification of right range of the other's existence is a prerequisite of reasonable cognition, understanding and digestion to the other's existence. The others are the selves different from selves and are in a community with the selves. Speaking intuitively, the others are out of the selves and the selves are out of the others. Speaking bluntly, there are some distances between the others and the selves which cause existent disagreements among different subjects, which frequently are comprehended a kind of philosophical disagreement in ontology and result in some spiritual distances among beings. In the specific context, the spiritual distances can transform into apathy of each other. If this apathy becomes a governing structure, different subjects may be indifferent to each other, and even scorn of or dogfights of each other. In this way, there is the possibility that narrow aseity will become a universality. Overcoming and transcending this state means cognizing, understanding and digesting the other's existence reasonably. How to cognize, understand and digest the other's existence reasonably by the identification of right range of the other's existence? Firstly, the selves must be reflected, by which inspiration, experience and terrace of correct cognition about the other's existence can be obtained. Secondly, the history of existence must be criticized rationally, by which a reasonable understanding of the process of evolution on existence of kind can be grasped, and then the conception about existence of the integrity can be longitudinally achieved. Thirdly, the other's existence must be looked closely with overall look, tolerant spirit and analytic perspective, by which spirit about existence of the integrity can be achieved transversely.

Secondly, the identification of the right range of other's existence needs to be re-identified, so it is necessary to verify of the right range of the other's existence. How to verify the right range of the other's existence? At first, it is necessary to standardize duty with will. If the will is a priori principle of rational beings, it is evitable to standardize duty with will. The existent processes of the subjects should be in duty. The duty of the self- existence of being needs to be shouldered by the self. They must possess a consciousness and a spirit of shouldering for entirety while the existent subjects understand and verify the other's existence. Next, it is necessary to take self-discipline as a superlative goodness. It is the self-discipline of the existent subjects that can realize the identification of right range of the other's existence, because it is the self-discipline that can restrain and improve the self-consciousness of the existent subjects. If the self- discipline can be understood as the superlative goodness, it can become an internal self-consciousness. Only if the self-discipline is regarded as the superlative goodness can the self-discipline be the greatest reward of the regulatory existence. It is the greatest reward that can change the self-discipline into the inner self-consciousness. Following this, it is necessary to take forgiveness as happiness. Forgiveness should be apprehended as a rational extension rather than an outward coerce in the internal spirit. So, forgiveness must bring good effects to the being subjects, inevitably, and make the being subjects feel happiness. If forgiveness is only comprehended as one or external existing mechanism, and then it must become the being subjects' repugnant things which will not bring any happiness to the subjects necessarily. To make one final point, it is necessary to take honest as virtue. Feigned actions mainly stem from covetous thoughts of some people in the market economy, whose appetites are so uncountable, endless and complicated that they can be changed into abnormality, irregularity and infringement of rules. If the award to the subjects is always labeled as a material satisfaction, the covetous thoughts will be audacious and unprincipled, and wantonly harass the people's homeland just like predators in flood. The award of the subjects, however, should be labeled as honest which should be defined as virtue. Only in this way can the subjects discipline and examine themselves' and other's existence with a fair, impartial and just yardstick and in a fair, impartial and just sight.

III

From autonomy to democracy, the subjects also need the cultivation or practice of the democratic spirit for selves as an intermediary link. Such an intermediary link is also a post house which the autonomy to become democracy must pass through. And autonomy staying in this link requires the subjects to cultivate and practice the democratic spirit.

In author's opinion, the being subjects should start with the cultivation of the democratic spirit in following four aspects:

Firstly, it is necessary to strengthen learning and accumulating democratic knowledge. Democracy is either a Given existence or a changeable existence. Its Given existence means that it is an integration of ways, skills, experience and ideologies about the power's division and application which abstract from processes of the subjects on its natural existence, and tracing in ontology, its existence correlated with its natural existence at first, therefore, it is not beyond its history and process of existence. Its changeable existence means that democratic values, significance and norms are an effect of human or creative existence rather than of natural existence, which, meanwhile, always transcends the scope of its existence to individuals. Therefore, the subjects need to learn and accumulate democratic knowledge in order to enhance democratic skills and cultivate the democratic spirit. Democratic knowledge includes the knowledge of politics, law, philosophy, sociology and all kinds of ideologies, etc, inherited from human history. And the process of learning and accumulating is one of drawing, refining and practicing democratic knowledge.

Secondly, it is necessary to cultivate and train the democratic consciousness, which is an acquisition from nurture rather than from born gift and mainly stresses that the subjects can understand their subjective existences. The subjectivity can reflect on not only the subjects' themselves governing themselves but also the subjects' themselves coexisting with others in amity. And it is rational one that can exhibit in the double-stressing and combining proportionally of the right and the obligation rather than narrow one that can only focus on the right and set aside the obligation, or only underline the obligation and turn blind eyes to the right. The essence of democratic consciousness fundamentally reflects in the double-stressing and combining proportionally of the right and the obligation. Any un-equilibrium in the stressing of the right and the obligation should be a misunderstanding of the essence of the democratic existence. In today's society where social relations are becoming more and more intimate, democratic development stresses the importance of this essential existence more comprehensively than ever before, for any specific subjective existence may be the intermediary link for others' existence or the barrier for other's existence. Every subject may become the intermediary link for others' existence if one can be trained effectively in the perfect democratic environment and abide by the democratic rules. Conversely, one can only become the bar of other's existence. So, it is necessary to cultivate and train the democratic consciousness.

Thirdly, it is necessary to develop and cultivate the freedom consciousness. Only if the subjects have understood the freedom in the un-freedom or the un-freedom in the freedom can they get freedom, or not. Freedom does not mean that one's existence can override others' existence, or impose one's freedom on other's un-freedom. Hence, if one wants to gain freedom, one should pay costs equal to the freedom that one wants to gain. The premise as an existent freedom only evinces a metaphysics; the freedom as a real being only can be in the price paid for freedom by the specific subjects. It requires that the subjects should set up and practice above thought and conception to cultivate and shape the democratic spirit. Because it is necessary to have the freedom consciousness participate in shaping of the democratic spirit, which needs the subjects to foster and cultivate the freedom consciousness.

Fourthly, it is necessary to develop and cultivate the fair consciousness which is one that surpasses the narrow consciousness of individuality. The subjects with the fair consciousness are an existence in which they can examine closely the existence of itself and other and its mutual association and can surpass the narrow existence of the self-consciousness and of being in self. To nurture and cultivate the democratic consciousness, it is necessary to nurture and cultivate the fair consciousness, likewise, in order to nurture and cultivate the fair consciousness, it is necessary to nurture and cultivate the democratic consciousness and the freedom consciousness. Consequently, in order to cultivate the democratic spirit ,it is necessary to nurture and cultivate the fair consciousness certainly.

In author's opinion, practicing of the democratic spirit should defer to three aspects as follows.

Firstly, the being subjects should be good at joining in the democratic activities. The ultimate goal of the democratic practicing is to practice democracy in the real world, so, the democratic practice must become the destination of nurturing the democratic spirit which needs to be inspected, improved and enhanced in the democratic practicing. Thus, that the subjects should be good at joining in the democratic activities will become the touchstone and the base of the being subjects' surpassing and improving themselves.

Secondly, the being subjects should be good at rising to challenges by which the being subjects can be steeled, enhanced and improved. The being processes of the being subjects are those that the subjects go on continuously meeting, taking on and overcoming challenges. The challenges are the best teacher of the being subjects. It is in the challenges that the being subjects can be improved and perfected. And likewise, there must be a lot of challenges in the practical process. Only dare to meet, take on and overcome the challenges can the being subjects become winners ultimately.

Thirdly, the being subjects should be good at accumulating, summing up, and completing experience in the practical processes where accumulating experience is regarded as re-practice, summarizing re-thinking, and perfecting re-lifting. Therefore, only going on continuously accumulating, summarizing and perfecting experience can the subjects be going on consolidating the gains of the democratic practice, improving of the subjects' themselves and pushing the social democracy forward.

The process from autonomy to democracy is a development course either which the special subjects as democratic citizens must undergo, or which democracy as a mature system must go through in a specific social context. The mature democracy is an institutional, conceptual and practical existence which must go through many practical links and be moulded comprehensively and deeply. Any attempt to skip these links to build the mature democracy must forfeit its future, which is the truth proved by history repeatedly.

References:

[1]Martin Heidegger Being and Time[M].Beijing Sanlian Bookstore,2006.

[2]Edmund Husserl Time Consciousness Phenomenology[M].Beijing Commercial PressMar,2009.

[3]Immanuel Kant Practice Rational Criticism[M].Beijing People's Press,2003.

The hardships faced in the path of democratisation:
Democratisation against conservatism and Turkish experience[1]

Dr. Zeynep Üskül Engin[2]

Abstract: Social changes are the common features faced in all socities with its societal surges, processes of ambiguity and transition phases. These changes, therefore, pose a vital role in order to maintain the existence of the society. These can emerge in the technical and political organisation of the society, in its culture and various institutions, and thus can be profound and efficient in affecting the structure of the society. Besides, these changes can be slow/fast, smooth/tough, long-term/short-planned, regular/random, planned/unplanned and permissive/oppressive. For some countries democratisation may mean a societal change in this sense. Adoption of Western values, opening its doors to the West's culture of law and changing the existing political system is an extensive alteration bringing along many others. Hence, for the jurists it is highly striking that the laws are being utilised to establish this change. Above all, laws emerge as an exerting force in the hands of the ones holding the political power. Societal engineering by the help of the laws can create possible alternative outcomes in order to apply the desired; however in traditional and conservative societies a resistance can occur, and there can always be a likelihood of the segregation of the multi-lingual or multi-religious socities. If these mentioned societies, once ruled by a single authority, the difficulties are multiplied. In spite of the political, social, economic and cultural efforts in order to root the changes in the society there can occur some serious reactions and resistance. The acceptance of material culture is much easier than the spiritual one; that is the reason why, for example, when members of the society accept technological changes rapidly (i.e mobile phones), they cannot show the same tendency against the alterations in laws (i.e. capital punishment), and this eventually stands as an obstacle against the emergence of culture of law. Under the circumstances where there is less reaction against democratisation, naturally each country's history, moral structure, socioeconomic situation and societal balance are influential.

[1] The research has been financially supported by Galatasaray University Research Found.
[2]Associate Proffessor, Galatasaray University Law Faculty.

The aim of this article is to discuss the hardships that faced Turkey in the path of democratization. The main objective is to open mentioned issues into discussion which would based on experience.

Keywords: Democratization, Conservatism, Turkey.

Introduction:

Social changes are the common features faced in all societies with its societal surges, processes of ambiguity and transition phases. These changes, therefore, pose a vital role in order to maintain the existence of the society. These can emerge in the technical and political organisation of the society, in its culture and various institutions, and thus can be profound and efficient in affecting the structure of the society. Besides, these changes can be slow/fast, smooth/tough, long-term/short-planned, regular/random, planned/unplanned and permissive/oppressive.

Examining a country which is perfectly in order and has solved most of its problems can reach to fine scientific conclusions; however, it can also be claimed that the search can thus be ordinary and reach to less appealing results. Actually, for a social scientist it is rather interesting to examine Turkish society. Each society is in motion but Turkish society has been experiencing the greatest breakings, and has been presenting itself as a society of ongoing change. Even, there have been numerous changes since the moment when the title of this article was chosen and the time when it started to be written. Plus, during this period everyone has given astounding reactions, and thus embodying features that would affect the course of this study.

As an example that can be given to this is that in late May, what attracts the whole Turkish country and the entire world - receiving support from Brazil, and more or less at the same period there have been concurrent large-scale protests in Brazil - are the protests against a construction of a shopping mall in the city centre in Gezi Park, Taksim, İstanbul. What actually lie under these are the reasons related to social, political, cultural and legal history. In order to understand the demands here, acknowledgement of past and recent issues is strongly required because Turkey's social construction is quite complex. Ethnic identities, differences in religious sects, class distinctions, cultural differences stand as a couple of factors that can be counted. Although the project of transforming the park has been a subject which is the main interest of the environmentalists and Taksim residents, and has stood as a peaceful protest, the police have used disproportionate force and the protests have become nationwide. Despite the fact that the protests have lasted for 20 days and become popular in domestic and foreign grounds, demands of freedom and democracy have not been fully understood.

This incident has shown us directly that a society can embody two trends that are totally opposing to each other. One of them is what can be called as "individuals" adopting a western lifestyle and demanding an area of freedom where he/she can live within a democratic state. Their claim is that they have been oppressed and suppressed. The other group is a community adopting capitalist values and claiming that they have developed the country. They also put forward the traditional, paternal and religious values alongside with conservative moral approach. Another issue they bring forward is that they have once been unfairly oppressed by the former group. In order to understand the recent developments, it can also be explanatory to state that the conservative part of the society has been the ruling power for over ten years and the representing voters constitute about 50% of the population. The ruling power was the first saying that "Democracy is for everyone". However, democracy is defined as holding the majority and the authority of asking every decision without the need of a consensus.[3] This creates the cultural fault line in Turkey.

Initially, it has to be well understood that the basis of all is mainly related to the trials of Westernisation that had once put Turkey into motion.[4] Although this had embodied the efforts to save the Ottoman Empire itself, the goal had not been achieved to do so. However, we all know that these efforts were transformed in order to lay the foundation of a new state: The societal transformation that had yet to be established by the ones in the first years of the foundation of this new state resulted in some humble steps towards civilisation, modernisation, interiorisation of the Enlightenment Age and eventually democracy. Turkish Republic was founded thanks to a revolution, thus it cannot be said that the goals had been reached in the first years, however certain steps were taken afterwards. An evidence of this can be given as the quick attempt to establishing a multi-party system soon after the foundation of the Republic.

[3] Oktay Uygun, Demokrasi (İstanbul: XII Levha Yayıncılık, 2011), 260.

[4] Halil İnalcık, Rönesans Avrupası-Türkiye'nin Batı Medeniyetiyle Özdeşleşme Süreci (İstanbul: Türkiye İş Bankası Kültür Yayınları, 2013), 316-317.

Yet, it seemed that the old habits, traces and cultural values that emerged from the Ottoman Empire that lasted for 6 centuries could not be eliminated once and for all. That was the reason why a social engineering process had begun. It is a well-known fact that this process has been long criticised by the conservatives. And when it was the time for them to hold the power by the great support they received from the public, they wanted to reverse this process. It may be possible to say that the tension that has been going on in Taksim -in front of the eyes of the world-is not on the grounds of environmental concerns, it is actually the tension between the parts of the society that have been transformed previously, and the ones that have been questioning and criticising as they think that these acts are unethical and inappropriate with their religious values.

Modernisation used to be a process which was in accordance with democratisation, and now it can be regarded as a country evolving in economic terms and modernity. However, this modernisation takes place by undermining the human rights which is a priority for democracy. The acceptance of material culture is much easier than the spiritual one; that is the reason why, for example, when members of the society accept technological changes rapidly (i.e mobile phones), they cannot show the same tendency against the changes in laws (i.e. capital punishment), and this eventually stands as an obstacle against the emergence of culture of law. This definitely lies in the past of Turkey. That is why this should be covered briefly.

I) Attempts at Democratisation of Turkey

The attempts at changing a society can embody positive intentions but they can still cause great problems. These problems generally are not due to the change itself but to the obstacles and delays in the process of this change.[5] The history of Turkey's democratisation can be written as the resistance against this. The religious powers' resistance against the renovation of the system in Ottoman Empire, the assassination of a Sultan (III. Selim), the reactionary demonstrations in 1909, the opposition of the religious leaders to the War of Independence can be given as examples. These reactions were all remembered well and when the new state was established these were all taken into consideration.[6] In the historical process, it has to be said that supporters of Westernisation have been influential, not the conservative trends.

[5] Sezgin Tüzün, Değişmenin ve Geçiş Toplumunun Sosyoloğu: Mübeccel Belik Kıray (İstanbul: Bağlam Yayıncılık, 2012), 27.

As a result of this, Turkey has become the first and the sole secular country with the majority of the Muslim population. Above all, it has always been needed to prevent the reactions of the opposition to modernisation, and hence leading to some practices like monitoring religion. Turkey, with a desire to be a secular country, has applied these practices through state institutions.[7] There have been some extreme cases, though.

a) The Historical Roots of Democratisation

When searching the roots of Turkish Republic's democratisation trials, attempts in constitutionalisation take a significant place due to the loss of land that Ottoman Empire had experienced. Although the sultans were not in favour of sharing their ultimate power, they had to accept the new constituitional order in order to keep the diversified population of different languages and beliefs unified. Therefore, it can be said that Turkey has had a parliamentary experience for 150 years.[8]

Another restriction of the power of the Sultan through constitution is the effect of the winds of modernisation from the West.[9] It can be observed that there had been considerable legal, economic and social changes during this modernisation process.[10] However, even during this process some regulations were strictly opposed by the conservationalists. They had been thinking that the collapse of the Empire could have been hindered by religion, and thus raising voice to the reforms.[11]

---

[6] Suna Kili, Atatürk Devrimi (Ankara: Türkiye İş Bankası Kültür Yayınları, 1981), 268-269.

[7] Zeynep Özlem Üskül, "L'Affirmation de la Laïcité en Turquie: Un Gage de Modernité", Politique et Sécurité Internationale, No: 3 (1999): 23. H.N. Kubalı, Anayasa Hukuku. Genel Esaslar ve Siyasi Rejimler (İstanbul: Ersa Matbaacılık Koll. Şti, 1965), 356.

[8] E. Günal, Türkiye'de Demokrasinin Yüzyıllık Serüveni (İstanbul: E Karakutu Yayınları, 2009), 24-31.

[9] Öktem, N. "La Philosophie de la Révolution Française et l'Empire Ottoman", İÜHFM, No: 1-4, 1987, 150-152.

[10] Aydın, M. A. İslam-Osmanlı Aile Hukuku, Marmara Üniversitesi İlahiyat Fakültesi Yayınları, No: 11, İstanbul, 1985, 127. Kılıçbay, M. A. "Osmanlı Batılılaşması", in Tanzimat'tan Cumhuriyet'e Türkiye Ansiklopedisi, Tome: I, İletişim Yayınları, İstanbul, 1985, 150-152.

[11] Tüccarzade İ. H. "Aile Hayatımızda Avrupalılaşmanın Tesiri", in Sosyo-Kültürel

b) Atatürk's Republic and Attempts in Modernisation:

Turkish Republic, which was founded in a much smaller land than the Ottoman Empire, has been aiming at eliminating false beliefs hampering the development of the country and ending the intervention of religion to state affairs. Instead, scientific, positive and Western values should be the main goals.[12] Democratisation brings along the modernisation, and modernisation is directly used as the synonym for Westernisation. Democracy is a product of western philosophy which has its roots in Ancient Greece, and today democracy is mainly based on human rights; in short it can be named as a participatory democracy. That is the reason why democracy is not solely the governance of the ones holding the power. It is more the reflection of an earthly social philosophy to some extent.[13]

The process of Turkey has been quite different from other developing countries and the West: Turkey has not been colonised. Therefore, the criticism against the claim that it has been left underdeveloped like countries in South America and Africa is not valid.[14] Plus, it has never colonised, it created its own statism.[15] However, for some time there has been an authoritative political tutelage period when passing through democratisation. The reason why the term "tutelage" is used[16] is that the target was a structure of a state which is Westernised, modern and contemporary. Yet, it is indicated that it is this "tutelage" period which led the way to the multi-party democracy.[17] A single-party governance was preferred at the beginning because it is attributed that Turkish society was classless, unprivileged and a collaborative society.[18] Besides, the

---

Değişme Sürecinde Türk Ailesi, (Ankara: T. Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu, 1992), 1076.

[12] Tüccarzade, "Aile Hayatımızda Avrupalılaşmanın Tesiri", 1079.

[13] İnalcık, Rönesans Avrupası-Türkiye'nin Batı Medeniyetiyle Özdeşleşme Süreci, 363.

[14] Anthony Giddens, Sosyoloji/ Kısa Bir Eleştirel Giriş (Ankara: Siyasal Kitabevi, 2012), 135.

[15] B. Lewis, "Why Turkey is the Only Muslim Democracy?", Middle East Quarterly, http://www.meforum.org/216/why-turkey-is-the-only-muslim-democracy (accessed 12.6.2013).

[16] Levent Köker, Modernleşme, Kemalizm ve Demokrasi (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012), 17.

[17] Köker, Modernleşme, Kemalizm ve Demokrasi, 17. Ahmet Taner Kışlalı, Forces Politiques Dans la Turquie Moderne (Ankara: Sevinç Matbaası, 1968), 16.

[18] Köker, Modernleşme, Kemalizm ve Demokrasi, 245.

early Parliament was not homogeneous embodying the revolutionists and conservationalists. Although the parliament did not have a multi-party structure, with its controversies and tensions, it operated as a pluralist parliament.[19] Consequently, blaming Atatürk with dictatorship stays as unfounded allegations by the conservationalists who have been opposed to change from the very beginning.

Besides, the revolutionists as being in favour of modernisation and secularism and familiar with Western culture eased the way of democratisation. It is not possible to establish a democratic government without secularism. Kemalism was considered an anti-religious ideology, but it is important to say that it had nothing against the Islamic religion, his point is to deny religion as a source of political power.[20]

c) Imposition of a New Way of Life

If democracy is a product arising from a series of economic and cultural changes during the Renaissance period, then there raises the question how the non-Westernised countries shall be democratic. Westerners think that for democratisation, capitalism, adequate economic development and cultural improvement level should be essential. For this reason, the necessary conditions for democracy and the social cultural structure brought by modernity is an economic sub-structure relying on capitalism. Then, the non-Western and anti-democratic societies have to go through a very quick transition phase so as to accelerate the process and to have a democratic system.[21] This certainly creates the necessity of acceleration by a direct interference to build modernity and democracy which was established by a more natural process. Therefore, in order to implement this speeding up process a multi-directional infrastructure started to be formed in the fields of law, education and especially in lifestyles.[22]

For Turkey democratisation meant a significant societal change. The process of a society that was once ruled by a Sultan into a democratic, constitutional and a legal state is at the same time signifies the history

[19] T. Z. Tunaya, Devrim Hareketleri İçinde Atatürk ve Atatürkçülük (İstanbul: İstanbul Bilgi Üniversitesi Yayınları, 2007), 181.

[20] Emre Kongar, "Turkey's Cultural Transformation", http://www.kongar.org , 9 (accessed 15.4.2013).

[21] Köker, Modernleşme, Kemalizm ve Demokrasi, 16.

[22] Mübeccel Belik Kıray, Değişen Toplum Yapısı, (İstanbul: Bağlam Yayınları, 1998) 7.

of Turkish Republic. Accepting people as individuals and not as a part of a religious community and basic human rights and adoption of legal structure and institutions led way to a comprehensive change in social structure. Through the laws there have been great changes to especially educational institutions and family during this period.

Social engineering by laws can create positive outcomes in societies; but multi-lingual and multi-ethnical societies with traditional cultural values, possessing a long historical past can face some serious resistance. If the changes are towards democratisation and if the society is exposed to authoritative governance, democracy can be a regime which can attract considerable amount of reaction. It is not possible to say that these changes were accepted once and for all. Surely, social engineering implementers are like the engineers, they must work with resistive materials[23], that is why they have taken economic (financial aid to the formal wives of the Korean and Second World War soldiers only on the condition that they have civil marriage[24]), cultural (encouraging positive sciences, teaching of western philosophy, support to arts, dress code), societal (changes in the family law) measures through laws. Still this did not protect them from social reactions, and thus created the problems of Turkish sociology of law despite their existence until today.

It has always been appealing to study the efforts and the obstacles since the first years of the Republic. It is not possible to mention all in this study, the conservative attempts to stand against modern Turkish society is to be explained in certain limits. As exemplifying them would be more enlightening, two areas are to be mentioned: Family and Education. The basic reason why these have chosen them is that the first step of democratisation is in family and secondly, education provides the basic principles of this area theoretically and practically for various people coming together. Besides, these two institutions are handled by laws. The controversy that has been stated above is the reflection of the uncompromising views of two parts of the society.

aa) Family and Social Transformation:

Democratic societies have noticed that the individuals of which

[23] K. Makkar, "Law is a Tool for Social Engineering in India", http:// www.manaputra.com (accessed 10.4.2013) are formed in the families and enough importance should be given to education. In today's world, education starts at the age of three and preschooling becomes increasingly important and formal education should go on until the students are at the age of seventeen or eighteen.

[24] S. Timur, "Türkiye'de Aile Yapısının Belirleyicileri", in Türk Toplumunda Kadın (Ankara: Türk Sosyal Bilimler Derneği, Çağ Matbaası, 1979), 169.

When looking at the history of Turkey the modernisation acts in Ottoman Empire were reflected on the family law. In these years, the Ottoman intellectuals believed that some changes were needed related to families and that the Empire could be saved only by this way. Above all, they were defending that women should be educated and the obstacles hindering the development of the society could only be removed by science.[25] Nevertheless, this reflection did not open a radical way for a change. Some legal regulations were made in civil law (Mecelle), but being hesitant due to the possible reactions of the conservative part of the society, family law and law of inheritance were excluded.[26] Later although a regulation was made related to the family law, (Hukuk-ı Aile Karanamesi) this was mainly to inform the state about the marriages; otherwise the applications of religious principles were not restricted. Early marriages (girls at the age of 9 and boys at the age of 12) and polygamy on religious basis were allowed.[27] This situation creating a main inequality and other inconveniences, could not be changed due to the possible reactions of conservative part of the society. The regulations related to family, changed to great extent by the reception of Swiss Civil Code in 1926. There was then a new family model that was wanted to be created, and this model was significant because it would lay the foundation of a democratic country.

During this period, some circles that wanted the application of religious principles had been insisting on acceptable issues by the secular and democratic countries. The priority was of polygamic marriages: In fact, apart from the Sultans and statesmen in Ottoman society monogamy was more common.[28] Yet, it can be clearly stated that polygamy is an orientalist legend, not a fact of the period.[29]

[25] İ. H. Tüccarzade, "Aile Hayatımızda Avrupalılaşmanın Tesiri", in Sosyo-Kültürel Değişme Sürecinde Türk Ailesi (Ankara: T. Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu, 1992), 102.

[26] Cem Baygın, "Atatürk'ün Hukuk Devrimi", Atatürk'ün 125. Doğum Yılında Armağan (Erzincan: Erzincan Üniversitesi Hukuk Fakültesi, 2007), 21. Bülent Tahiroğlu, "Tanzimat'tan Sonra Kanunlaştırma Hareketleri", in Tanzimat'tan Cumhuriyet'e Türkiye Ansiklopedisi (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 1985), 594.

[27] Halil Cin and A. Akgündüz, Türk Hukuk Tarihi, Özel Hukuk (İstanbul: Osmanlı Araştırmaları Vakfı, 1996), 87. H. Aktan, "İslam Aile Hukuk", in Sosyo-Kültürel Değişme Sürecinde Türk Ailesi (Ankara: T. Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu, 1992), 102.

The newly adopted civil law did not reflect the traditions and customs of the society; on the contrary what was expected from the Civil War was to change these laws.[30] This law was one of the most important steps taken for the modernisation of Turkish Republic. What was understood from modernisation was Westernisation, development and creating a new culture is inevitable for a societal transformation. This law appeared as one of the most important tools for social transformation through laws.[31] The forcing power of modernisation found its place in this law which was mainly aiming at being contemporary. When taking into account the parallelism between modernisation and women, there were some regulations enhancing the status of the women that could be named as "state feminism"[32] in the first years of the Republic. Creating a legal system in which the men and women are equal has the utmost importance for democratisation because it is not possible to name an individual or a society as a democrat where there is a distinct discrimination between men and women.[33] With this law, instead of a paternalist culture a new approach was to be established. Accordingly, reception of the Swiss Civil Code was not only meant to make a brand new regulation but also to reach the same level of the host country and culture[34], segregate religion only to conscience and make it retreat from the public domain.[35] It is also very important to mention this point: Westernisation

[28] A. M. Aytaç, "Türkiye'de Ailenin Tarihsel Dönüşümü", in 1920'den Günümüze Türkiye'de Toplumsal Yapı ve Değişim (Ankara: Phoenix Yayınları, 2012), 308.

[29] Fanny Davis, Osmanlı Hanımı. 1718'den 1918'e Bir Toplumsal Tarih (İstanbul: Yapı Kredi Yayınları, 2006), 103. Ö. Demirel and A. Gürbüz and M. Tuş "Osmanlılarda Ailenin Demografik Yapısı", in Sosyo-Kültürel Değişme Sürecinde Türk Ailesi (Ankara: T. Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu, 1992), 102. Alan Duben, Kent, Aile, Tarih (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012), 143.

[30] Nilüfer Göle, Modern Mahrem (İstanbul: Metis Yayınları, 2011), 105.

[31] H. Çetin, "Gelenek ve Değişim Arasında Kriz: Türk Modernleşmesi", Doğu-Batı, Yıl: 7(2003-2004), 25.

[32] Ülker Gürkan, "Türk Devleti ve Kadına Yönelik Hukuk Politikası", 20. Yüzyılın Sonunda Kadınlar ve Gelecek (Ankara: Türkiye ve Ortadoğu Amme İdaresi Enstitüsü, 1997), 13.

[33] Emre Kongar, Demokrasimizle Yüzleşmek (İstanbul: Remzi Kitabevi, 2007), 79.

[34] Cahit Can, Türk Hukukunun Kökenleri ve Türk Hukuk Devrimi (İstanbul: Kaynak Yayınları, 2012), 164.

[35] A. Davison, Türkiye'de Sekülarizm ve Modernlik (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012), 315-316.

during Ottoman period had been directed by some Western countries for their own interest, but in the later case the decisions for westernisation and modernisation were taken independently soon after the war that was won against the Western nations.[36]

The legal grounds that are needed for the family law are required by the secularity. For this reason, there is a close relationship between secularity and civil law regulations in Turkey. Naturally, conservative part of the society was highly worried that the nation would be anti-religious due to reception of the law from a Christian country, and that it was being a democratic law including principles of equality between men and women.

The revolutionisers were for modernisation, and this resulted in the basis of separation between the parts of the society as modernisers and conservationalists.[37] The main reason for that is the perception that the essence of Western civilisation is Christianity.[38] The answer given to this is as follows: The foundation of this civilisation is not on a religious basis; it is on a philosophy which is based on reasoning of concepts developed by Ancient Greek. This philosophical approach does not depend on a religious dogma but on a rational humanism.[39]

Early in the period as the communication networks and especially transportation was underdeveloped, the public did not know much about the Civil Code, and consequently failed to adapt themselves to a certain extent. However, as the people of a newly founded country they tried to do their best to implement the requirements of the new law due to the excitement of the period when the war had recently ended. It has been alleged that after the acceptance of the Law there have been great changes in legal and social circumstances.[40] Nonetheless, there have been some complaints that the implementers of the Law were careless and suffered from the lack of knowledge.[41] And, unfortunately these complaints and criticisms are even valid for today.

When we have a look at today' s problems:

---

[36] Can, Türk Hukukunun Kökenleri ve Türk Hukuk Devrimi ,165.

[37] Köker, Modernleşme, Kemalizm ve Demokrasi, 18.

[38] S. S. Onar, "Medeni Kanunun İçtimai Bünyemiz Üzerindeki Tesirleri ve İçtimai Kıymeti", İş, No: 30-31, (1953), 184.

[39] İnalcık, Rönesans Avrupası, 276.

[40] Onar, "Medeni Kanunun İçtimai Bünyemiz Üzerindeki Tesirleri ve İçtimai Kıymeti", 182.

[41] Ibid, 185.

1. Early marriage is a social practice that is still applied today and is based on religious, economic and traditional reasons. In fact, every citizen is considered as immature until 18 and has to be educated. Some exceptional reasons are required for marriages of under 18 and judicial decisions are only for the ones who completed the age 17.
2. The Civil Code did not prohibit religious marriage ceremonies; however civil marriage is compulsory, and upon request religious marriage can be performed along with civil marriage. This article was added in order to prevent polygamy. But, this regulation has been an issue of concern after the acceptance of Civil Code.[42] Especially, illegitimate children are excluded from the rights that are provided by the laws.[43]
3. In some areas because of the economic, traditional reasons polygamy continues. There have been some efforts to increase the girls' level of education in order to eliminate this situation leading to social and legal problems.
4. And again for economic and traditional reasons there has been an ongoing problem of dowry because of the poor situation of women in households. The law did not prohibit this, yet ignored it. This situation has resulted in some controversial verdicts of the Supreme Court. Besides, in some areas of the country, in order to avoid dowry, brides are still exchanged in religious marriages, which is named as "berdel".

As it can be clearly understood from the points that are stated above, a conflicting condition is the point in question of traditions and implementation of laws. A renowned Turkish historian says "In families social engineering cannot be applied".[44] It is for sure that changing a conservative institution like family would receive reactions. Yet, from the Ottoman period the situation has been quite different. There have occurred a body of women who are educated, work and are aware of their rights. However, the pressure of the conservative part of the society on girls and the bringing up of the boys in strong family values stand as an obstacle against the individualisation of women.

[42] M. Şekib, "Monogami Meselesi", İş, No: 1 (1953), 142.
[43] Yücel Turgay, "Les Traits Essentiels du Droit Familial en Turquie", in Le Droit de la Famille en Europe (Strasbourg : Presses Universitaires de Strasbourg, 1992), 173.
[44] İlber Ortaylı, Osmanlı'yı Yeniden Keşfetmek (İstanbul: Timaş Yayınları, 2006), 44.

In the application of the Civil Code and on legal basis the conservative resistance has been proceeding. As a matter of fact, important steps have been taken in conservatism in the last ten years, a new social engineering movement has begun. To illustrate, Article 50 of the constitution that says "the young, women and the physically and emotionally incapable shall be protected."- the word 'women' proves another masculine point of view. Apart from this, in accordance with the latest policies the title of "Ministry of Women and Family" has been changed and instead "Ministry of Family and Social Policies" has been established. Another example is in marriage. Religious ceremony is not allowed before the civil marriage. In the previous criminal law, this was considered as a serious offence and the offenders were to sentenced to imprisonment from a term of 2 to 6 months. And if the man is already married, the sentence was from a term of 6 months to 3 years. Specifically, this subsection was included in order to avoid fellow briding.

In the period of the conservative government this law was changed as thus: "Anyone who holds a religious marriage ceremony without a civil marriage shall be sentenced to imprisonment from a term of two to six months. However, if a civil marriage is carried out, any public proceedings, sentences and other consequences thereof should be cancelled."[45] In this case, there can be some individuals who would prefer religious marriage until divorce, which may help them demonstrate themselves as married couples in the society.

The traces of an understanding which wanted to take women to the centre of the society are being erased by another social transformation movement. This country which has evolved in terms of democracy, has been tried to be converted into its religious features embodying family values, traditions and religion. In this country, where the process of being a social state has not been completed yet, women are encouraged to have more than one child. Apart from this, the conservative government are dictating the medical procedures to have children, and the majority of women-especially educated- stand against this situation as the right of abortion is being taken away and pregnancy is not kept confidential and recorded without the will of the pregnant women.

[45] Zeynep Özlem Üskül Engin, Hukuk Sosyolojisi Açısından Türkiye'de Evlenmenin Evrimi (İstanbul: Beşir Kitabevi, 2008), 201.

bb) Education:

aaa) Special Importance Given to Girls:

In this country, education of girls because of tradition and religious reasons have always been a controversial issue. Girls are not educated and this is mainly because of a paternalist attitude. Girls being monitored by codes like chastity, suppression they are facing, unconditional obedience to men and economic dependence hamper their education.[46] Especially in rural areas, girls are to be given up easily in terms of education.[47] A part of the unschooled girls are forced to marry in spite of the age limit defined by the Civil Code. By this way, both ignorance and early marriage bring along many problems (miscarriages or death in childbirth). According to some researches, families have sent their daughters to some courses in order to make them learn Arabic; but these girls have failed in learning and using Turkish.[48] In Islamic sect of the society, there is a strong circle in Central Anatolia tagging themselves as "Islamists, not concessive, conservative in changing the identity and ideas" , who are in accordance with this part of the society. This kind of resistance is more in adopting new styles and structures and internalising them.[49] Clearly, these girls would not be educated and thereof would not change.

The foundation of a democratic and a modern country is equality between men and women, Kemalist revolution paid adequate importance to women's rights. For example, the right to vote and stand for election was hold before any European country in 1934. An educational mobilisation started, and women were taught that they had rights. Everybody was given the right of education; and therefore equality was established in this field. In 1923 and 1924 the number of female students were 62.954 while this figure was 256.061 in 1937-1938.[50] Nevertheless, during this period the female students were expected to reflect this edu-

[46] Aksu Bora and İlknur Üstün, Sıcak Aile Ortamı (İstanbul: Tesev Yayınları, 2008), 19-21. Üskül Engin, Hukuk Sosyolojisi Açısından Türkiye'de Evlenmenin Evrimi, 91.

[47] Mübeccel Kıray, "Sosyal Yapı ve Nüfus Artışı Etkileşimi", Toplumsal Yapı Toplumsal Değişme (İstanbul: Bağlam Yayınları, 1999), 164.

[48] Durmuş Tezcan, Türklerle İlgili Stereotipler (Kalıp Yargılar) ve Türk Değerleri Üzerine Bir Deneme (Ankara: Ankara Üniversitesi Eğitim Fakültesi Yayınları, 1974), 91.

[49] Ali Bayramoğlu, Çağdaşlık Hurafe Kaldırmaz (İstanbul: TESEV Yayınları, 2006), 88-89.

[50] Nurgün Koç, Köy Enstitüleri (İstanbul: İdeal Kültür Yayıncılık, 2013), 48.

cation eventually at home in spite of the importance given to education. "The order of the house is the order of the country" was the widespread thought.[51] At the girl's institutes the curriculum was mainly based on household chores. Their educational policies were aiming at, "the training of girls as prospective mothers who are going to raise a new nation"[52], and were seen as the "spreader of the Western civilisation"[53] in the first years of the Republic. The values of the Republic wanted to be internalised in these institutions.

And for the ones who wanted to continue their education, instead of being a doctor they are expected to become nurses since nursing and care is a continuation of their household activities.[54] Alongside the fact that women are trained for these professions, in education, the textbooks have been designed to serve the purpose of permanent gender roles. To exemplify, in these coursebooks women have been portrayed as mothers making pickles and jam, but fathers while reading paper coming home from work.[55]

When observing the situation of today definitely considerable improvement has been made. Certainly, there are problems. These problems are trying to be solved from many aspects. Such as, private enterprises have been contributing by building schools and dorms for girls. This is highly important because then families would be able to send their daughters to a further place to have education. To encourage, state has been honouring the aider by giving his/her name to the schools or make them benefit for tax reduction. Media have been launching campaigns for the schooling of girls by the help of celebrities. NGOs have been showing great efforts to support schooling of girls. In rural areas, civilian authorities have been collaborating with the teachers to persuade the families.[56] Through the laws supporting social engineer-

[51] Elif Ekin Akşit, Kızların Sessizliği Kız Enstitülerinin Uzun Tarihi (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012), 183.

[52] Akşit, Kızların Sessizliği Kız Enstitülerinin Uzun Tarihi, 145.

[53]Ibid, 196-197.

[54] M. F. Hatem, "19. Yüzyıl Mısır'ında Sağlık Mesleği ve Kadın Bedeninin Denetlenmesi", Modernleşmenin Eşiğinde Osmanlı Kadınları (İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yurt Yayınları, 2000), 64-68. L. Şimşek-Rathke, Dünden Kalanlar. Türkiye'de Hemşirelik ve GATA TSK Sağlık Meslek Lisesi Örneği (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2011), 14.

[55] F. Gümüşoğlu, "Cumhuriyet Döneminin Ders Kitaplarında Cinsiyet Rolleri (1928-1998)", in 75 Yılda Kadınlar ve Erkekler (İstanbul : Tarih Vakfı Yayınları, 1998), 106.

[56]"Yeter ki Kızlar Okusun", http://egitim.milliyet.com.tr/yeter-ki-kizlar-okusun/ilkogretim/haberdetay/04.05.2010/1233400/default.htm (accessed 4.5.2010).

ing, the families who do not send their children to schools are fined, or imprisoned.[57] This is also a very positive development for the boys who can also face the risk of being used in labour force. Nonetheless, an ongoing deficit in teaching staff and ideological changes that were made by every ruling power resulted in a dead end road.

bbb) Education as a Tool of Secularisation and Modernisation

The efforts to create a new society caused grand expectations from the society. Education is used as a fundamental instrument of reshaping society in the social transformation progress.[58] The education system laid on a reaction against Ottoman religious education and erased its traces.[59] The aim of the revolution was to create an individual not a religious community, a society not a communion.[60] Consequently, the anti-revolutionists have always emphasised the importance of religious education and wanted some regulations for wiping out the traces. From time to time, even some parties that are for revolution have supported these regulations for the sake of increasing their votes.[61] Nowadays, educational policies intend to build a more conservative society. And the instrument has always been religion lessons. That is why the opponents of revolution have emphasised the importance of religious education and asked for some regulations to erase the traces of revolution.

In Ottoman Empire, illiteracy rate was high and people were uneducated. It is a well-known fact that despite the significance given to education, the rate of literacy could not be increased. One of the most important cultural and educational reforms was the change of the alphabet from Arabic to Latin letters on 1 November 1928.[62] Latin alphabet was more convenient and easier than the Arabic alphabet. Elementary school students can learn how to read and write just in two months. Naturally, this change was criticised: The change of the alphabet was [57] Turhish Civil Code Article 55.

[58] Ercan Uyanık, " II. Meşrutiyet Dönemi'nde Toplumsal Mühendislik Aracı Olarak Eğitim: İttihat ve Terakki Cemiyeti'nin Eğitim Politikaları (1908-1918)", Amme İdaresi Dergisi, 42/ 2(2009), 68.

[59] Emre Kongar, Kültür Üzerine (İstanbul : Remzi Kitabevi, 2008), 75.

[60] Ortaylı, Osmanlı'yı Yeniden Keşfetmek, 268.

[61] Çetin Yetkin, Karşı Devrim (1945-1950) (Ankara: Kilit Yayınları, 2011), 447.

[62] Kongar, Turkey's Cultural Transformation, 11.

"the first phase of purificationism". That purificationism caused "a cognitive rupture" and this movement made it impossible to establish communication with the past.[63]

One of the changes that were made for secularisation was the law on unification of education (1924). Through this law, the Moslem theological schools were closed, and education has become completely secular.[64]

It is a republic target to create a democratic, individual and modern society. Conservatives, on the contrary, has been thinking that education does not mean seperation from tradition and that the community should come before the individual. Modern, the new innovative-traditional Islamic part of the society adapting themselves to the capitalist system have encouraged to apply technology in the classrooms; but at the same time favoured a less creative and analytical education system, and have made legal regulations to establish this starting from the elementary school. Besides the number of high schools giving religious education has been increasing dramatically; and these schools are taking the place of the regular schools. Graduates of these can become doctors, lawyers or judges. The objection to this is thus: A person who has a religious education cannot relate the principles of law. and his educational background can contradict with these.[65] While these high schools were a vocational school raising clerks, these now have become a widespread educational institutions. Another problem is that religious education is given for only one sect, the others are left out. Even the members of one sect with its high population of 10 million people are obliged to get the same education. Clearly, this is not a democratic approach.

ccc) Dispute of Head Scarf and Education:

On the basis of this dispute lies the laws of revolution. Atatürk, by a dress code, was aiming at the modernisation and westernisation of Turkish society. By then, women would leave the head scarf and wear modern clothes. In fact, Turkish women were excluding themselves

---

[63] Keleş, F. "Modernization as State-led Social Transformation: Reflections on the Turkish Case", Journal of Development and Social Transformation, 5. http://www.Maxwell,syr.edu/uploadedFiles/moynihan/Keles.pdf?n=4211 (accessed 3.3.2013).

[64] Bozkurt Güvenç, Türk Kimliği. Kültür Tarihinin Kaynakları (İstanbul : Boyut Yayıncılık ve Tic. A.Ş., 2010), 255.

[65] Kongar, Demokrasimizle Yüzleşmek, 72.

from men and covered her hair. That was the reason why conservatives objected also to this subject.

The dispute of head scarf started when the girls were accepted to religious schools in 1951. The female students want to cover their heads due to the education they receive from school. For a long time, wearing headscarf in universities –because they were seen as areas of public domain- has been regarded as anti-secular since headscarfs are seen as a symbol of political Islam. The ones who thought that this was the violation of human rights, applied to the European Court of Human Rights, but the Court did not convict Turkey.[66]

Upon this, the conservative party in power have made some regulations cancelling the ban on head scarf. It is also important to mention that this created a certain amount of reaction from the secular sect of the country. Now, female students wearing head scarfs can have university education, but in elementary and secondary education this is still banned. The discussion is currently on labouring them in public domain because women with head scarfs can enter public domain but cannot work as a public officer or a lawyer, for example.

ddd) Koran courses:

After the 1980 coup d'etat religious courses (only for Sunni sect) became compulsory at schools. Just like the vocational schools, there are some high schools that educate clergy. As it can be clearly understood, no matter what their religious background is they have to get the same education. The ones who want to have religious education are contend with this, but the rest (like the ones belonging to Alevi sect) have applied to European Court of Human Rights.[67] The reason underlying these is one: the standard teaching of one sect. Recently, "the life of prophet" or "teachings of the religious book" have been added to the curriculum.

Apart from these there are other courses giving religious education. These are named as "Koran courses". There are two types of these courses. The boarding ones and the regular ones. And these schools provide a weekly 30-hour-education. There is an exit exam at the end of each term. Furthermore, there are summer courses that give a 5-day-education, and on each day there are three hours. The reason given for the opening of these courses are given as the demand of the public, which can be true to an extent that especially in summer time in rural areas these schools have some considerable popularity.

[66] Ulusoy, A. "Avrupa İnsan Hakları Mahkemesi'nin Üniversitelerde Türban Yasağına İlişkin Kararları Üzerine Notlar", Ankara Üniversitesi Hukuk Fakültesi Dergisi, 2004, 125.

[67] Güvenç, Türk Kimliği. Kültür Tarihinin Kaynakları , 247.

These courses are regulated by a guideline. For example, according to Article 8 "the personnel should act and be known to act accordingly to the Islam traditions". In this case, a non-practising Muslim or a Christian cannot work at those schools even as a chef. Certainly, teaching staff should be Muslim but it is unclear why the other staff should comply with this condition. This is a discriminative article and should be reconsidered.

These courses should be an educational institution and require a certain number of students, and in that case a mosque can be allocated for this purpose. (article 19/2) Thinking that the believers of a sect like Alevis do not go to mosque, it can be said that these courses are established and supported to spread one single religious view. Apart from these, the curriculum is designed by The Presidency of Religious Affairs. (article 21/3) The Presidency has been criticised as being the representative of only the Sunni sect[68], and education is provided in these courses accordingly. This is against the freedom of religion and liberty of conscience. The extra curricular materials are to enhance national, spiritual and moral improvement of the attendants. Plus, attendance is compulsory and if the attendant decides to leave, the reason is imprinted to the registry book. (article 36/1-2). Additionally, the commission which would evaluate the end of year performance have to be women for the courses where there is female enrolment. (article 43/1).This rule is discriminative and against the secular and democratic republic stated in the constitution.

Especially for poor families, children who do not attend a formal education programme spend all summer in vain, which creates a problem for the families. Although summer schools can be a solution to this problem, still millions of children attend Koran courses in summer and get Arabic religious education. This means that this education is not analytical since they do not know Arabic as a language. These courses are not related to the Ministry of Education, funded by some foundations, and these are against the Law of Unification of Education. Koran courses, like the religious high schools, have always been supported by the conservative power, thinking that they would be the voters of their cause. In short, the new target is to create a "religious generation".[69] However, in Kemalist secularity it is stated that religion cannot be used for personal interests and political aims, and thus religion is limited to personal area of beliefs.[70] This area is being carried to the public domain, and there are serious changes in the education system, which created some serious concerns for some parts of the society.

[68] Erdoğan Aydın, İslamcılık ve Din Politikaları (İstanbul: Kırmızı Yayınları, 2006), 262.

ee) Village Institutes

A mobilisation of education movement started when the reasons of underdevelopment and bigotry were identified as the lack of education. One of the parts of this mobilisation was the village institutes. The most important educational leap to insert technology to the society was the establishment of these schools.[71] One of the other reasons was to raise the intellectual capacity of the peasants and by this way to help spread the Kemalist Revolution in the countryside.[72] In these schools intelligent peasant children would be educated and this education would be transferring to other villages. As a result, village institutes appeared as an institution both raising its own teacher and helping the development of the village. These schools were the institutions where agricultural practices such as beekeeping or viticulture were taught. Building, tailoring, forging, carpentry, healthcare and masonry were being taught. Apart from these, intellectual improvement was highly significant, so playing a musical instrument and reading classical books were the liabilities. Both girls and boys were admitted to the institutes and had both genders in the classrooms.

These institutions were founded in 1940 and closed in 1954. The closing was ideological: It was claimed that communists were educated.[73] The antidote of communism is religion.[74] For example one of the criticisms against it was that the new teachers did not show a good example

---

[69] Güvenç, Türk Kimliği. Kültür Tarihinin Kaynakları, 249.

[70] Köker, Modernleşme, Kemalizm ve Demokrasi ,175.

[71] Kongar, Kültür Üzerine, 76.

[72] M. Asım Karaömerlioğlu, "The Village Institutes Experience in Turkey", British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies, No: 25, No: 1(1998), 47.

[73] Güler Yalçın, Canlandırılan Ütopya. Köy Enstütüleri (İstanbul: E Yayınları, 2012) 78-79.

[74] Yetkin, Karşı Devrim (1945-1950) 438.

from the religious standpoint.[75] The other reason was denominational. The representatives of the dominant class were scared that there would be a structural change in society. The conservative political power in the 50s missed the opportunity of the development of villages because of their religious attachments and Ottoman links.

If one can speak of an original institution in the field of education we can say that the village institutes were truly an original Turkish creation. Schooling is still a problem in rural areas. School buildings are needed for sure, but specially trained teachers, capable of meeting the particular needs of the villagers who still complain that the teachers are not teaching useful things, are required.[76]

The transition of Turkish education from a religion based understanding into a science based one has required a long and burdensome process. This process has also evolved in accordance with the democratisation process in the Turkish history. [77]

The last words that can be said about education are that we still need radical changes for every stage of education. Turkish education system is not completely analytical, and lacks directing to meet the technological needs of the society. Because of this, it does not help either free thinking or creative abilities of an individual.[78] Today, the demonstrators of Gezi Park are well-educated youngsters following technology. Education fosters questioning. For democracy, free thinking is a must. Restructuring education and allocation of resources would contribute to democracy.

Conclusion

Turkey, as holding the Muslim majority in its population, and is governed by democracy, has set a unique and positive model.[79] Turkey's democratisation process continues with its ups and downs. It is for certain that democratisation would be beneficial for every part of the society. But, democratisation is used by the ruling power to move [75] Alexandre Vexliard and Kemal Aytaç, "The 'Village Institutes' in Turkey", Comparative Education Review, 8/ 1 (1964), 45.

[76] Vexliard and Aytaç, "The Village Institutes in Turkey", 46.
[77] Süleyman Çelenk, "Secularization Process in the History of Turkish Education", http://www.krepublishers.com (accessed 21.6.2013).
[78] Kongar, Kültür Üzerine, 77.
[79] Bahattin Akşit et al. Türkiye'de Dindarlık (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012), 52.

along with their ideologies. It can be clearly observed that political regimes legitimize themselves by taking democratisation as a reference and shape society according to their own ideology. This can also be seen in both secular and conservative parts of the society. The part of the society that can be named as contemporary or secular positioned traditions and modernity as opposing patterns. As tradition is accepted as the negative side of modernity, the traditionalists have been convinced that they have been alienated.[80] Now that the conservatives are the ruling power, they think that it is now their turn. The fault line is cultural here and now deeper than ever.

Due to the fact that for the last ten years the military has disappeared in the political arena, the EU has supported Turkish government. In order not to lose this support, the government has acted as if they were seeking for the acceptance to the EU. The achievement of leaving the military out of the political arena, has made the government reluctant about the acceptance to the EU. This situation brings along the idea that the project of making the society more conservative is now easier and less challenging. For this reason, the conservatives have intervened the ordinary lives of the secularists, and made some regulations that can be regarded as opposed to principle of separation of powers, harming the sense of justice and limiting the freedom. Consequently, this part of the society with a foundation of revolution, and taking place in opposition has become more conservative. The reason for this is the fear of losing the system although it is not a fully democratic one. This obstructs the development of the society. There is an urgent and strong need to root the system in which everybody enjoys freedom and an area to live.

The contemporary problem of identity occurs when integrating people.[81] It seems that the conflict between longing for the roots in our country and contemporary search for identity will go on for some time. What is important here is to create a consensus not in every area, but just in one. And that is mutual respect to freedom and living together. A secular legal state can establish this. Tolerance is needed, and when this develops, Turkey will be a more democratic country.

A large part of the society is left alone in many fields by exerting an authoritative and violent methods in political, economic and cultural [80] Tayfun Atay, "Gelenekçilikle Karşı 'Gelenekçiliğin Gelgitinde Türk 'Gelenek-çi' Muhafazakârlığı, in Modern Dünyada Siyasi Düşünce (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2003), 155.

[81] Güvenç, Türk Kimliği. Kültür Tarihinin Kaynakları, 6.

choices, allocation of resources or regulating daily lives. But they don't lose the wish to live in democracy accepting the differences. After all, the only option is democracy since it is a system which would assemble all ethnic, sectional, religious and gender diversities. It is possible to say that the actual Turkey's prior problem is not economic but democratic.

References:

Akşit, B. and Şentürk, R. and Küçükural, Ö. and Cengiz, K. Türkiye'de Dindarlık, İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012.

Akşit, Elif Ekin. Kızların Sessizliği Kız Enstitülerinin Uzun Tarihi , İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012.

Aktan, H. "İslam Aile Hukuk", Sosyo-Kültürel Değişme Sürecinde Türk Ailesi, Ankara: T.C. Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu, 1992.

Armağan, M. Türkçe Ezan ve Menderes, İstanbul: Timaş Yayınları, 2011.

Atay, T. "Gelenekçilikle Karşı 'Gelenekçiliğin Gelgitinde Türk 'Gelenek-çi' Muhafazakârlığı", Modern Dünyada Siyasi Düşünce, İstanbul : İletişim Yayınları, 2003.

Aydın, E. İslamcılık ve Din Politikaları, İstanbul: Kırmızı Yayınları, 2006.

Aydın, M. A. İslam-Osmanlı Aile Hukuku, İstanbul: Marmara Üniversitesi İlahiyat Fakültesi Yayınları, 1985.

Aytaç, A. M. Türkiye'de Ailenin Tarihsel Dönüşümü, 1920'den Günümüze Türkiye'de Toplumsal Yapı ve Değişim, Ankara: Phoenix Yayınları, 2012.

Baygın, C. "Atatürk'ün Hukuk Devrimi", Atatürk'ün 125. Doğum Yılında Armağan, Erzincan: Erzincan Üniversitesi Hukuk Fakültesi, 2007.

Bayramoğlu, A. Çağdaşlık Hurafe Kaldırmaz, İstanbul: TESEV Yayınları, 2006.

Bora, A./ Üstün, İ. Sıcak Aile Ortamı, İstanbul: TESEV Yayınları, 2008.

Can, C. Türk Hukukunun Kökenleri ve Türk Hukuk Devrimi, İstanbul: Kaynak Yayınları, 2012.

Cin. H./ Akgündüz, A. *T*ürk Hukuk Tarihi, Özel Hukuk, İstanbul: Osmanlı Araştırmaları Vakfı, 1996.

Çelenk, S. "Secularization Process in the History of Turkish Education", http://www.krepublishers.com (accessed 21.6.2013).

H. Çetin, "Gelenek ve Değişim Arasında Kriz: Türk Modernleşmesi", Doğu-

Batı, No: 7 (2003-2004).

Davis, F. Osmanlı Hanımı. 1718'den 1918'e Bir Toplumsal Tarih, Trad.: Bahar Tırnakçı, İstanbul: Yapı Kredi Yayınları, 2006.

Davison, A. Türkiye'de Sekülarizm ve Modernlik, Trad.: Tuncay Birkan, İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012.

Demirel, Ö./ Gürbüz, A./ Tuş, M. "Osmanlılarda Ailenin Demografik Yapısı", Sosyo-Kültürel Değişme Sürecinde Türk Ailesi, Ankara: T.C. Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu, 1992.

Duben, A. Kent, Aile, Tarih, İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012.

Giddens, A. Sosyoloji/ Kısa Bir Eleştirel Giriş, Trad.: Ülgen Yıldız Battal, Ankara: Siyasal Kitabevi, 2012.

Göle, N. Modern Mahrem, İstanbul: Metis Yayınları, 2011.

Günal, E. Türkiye'de Demokrasinin Yüzyıllık Serüveni, İstanbul: Karakutu Yayınları, 2009.

Gümüşoğlu, F. "Cumhuriyet Döneminin Ders Kitaplarında Cinsiyet Rolleri (1928-1998)", 75 Yılda Kadınlar ve Erkekler, İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yayınları, 1998.

Gürkan, Ü. "Türk Devleti ve Kadına Yönelik Hukuk Politikası", 20. Yüzyılın Sonunda Kadınlar ve Gelecek, Ankara, Türkiye ve Ortadoğu Amme İdaresi Enstitüsü, 1997.

Güvenç, B. Türk Kimliği. Kültür Tarihinin Kaynakları, İstanbul: Boyut Yayıncılık ve Tic. A.Ş., 2010.

Hatem, M. F. 19. "Yüzyıl Mısır'ında Sağlık Mesleği ve Kadın Bedeninin Denetlenmesi", Modernleşmenin Eşiğinde Osmanlı Kadınları, Ed.: Madeleine C. Zilfi, Trad.: Necmiye Alpay, Tarih Vakfı Yurt Yayınları, İstanbul, 2000.

İnalcık, H. Rönesans Avrupası-Türkiye'nin Batı Medeniyetiyle Özdeşleşme Süreci, İstanbul: Türkiye İş Bankası Kültür Yayınları, 2013.

Karaömerlioğlu, M. A. "The Village Institutes Experience in Turkey", British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies, No: 25/ 1, 1998.

Keleş, F. "Modernization as State-led Social Transformation: Reflections on the Turkish Case", Journal of Development and Social Transformation.

http://www. Maxwell,syr.edu/uploadedFiles/moynihan/Keles.pdf?n=4211 (accessed 3.3.2013)

Kılıçbay, M. A. "Osmanlı Batılılaşması", Tanzimattan Cumhuriyet'e Türkiye Ansiklopedisi, Tome: I, İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 1985.

Kıray, M. B. Değişen Toplum Yapısı, İstanbul: Bağlam Yayınları, 1998.

Kıray, M. Sosyal Yapı ve Nüfus Artışı Etkileşimi, Toplumsal Yapı Toplumsal Değişme, İstanbul: Bağlam Yayınları, 1999.

Kışlalı, A. T. Forces Politiques Dans la Turquie Moderne, Ankara: Sevinç Matbaası, 1968.

Kili, S. Atatürk Devrimi, Ankara: Türkiye İş Bankası Kültür Yayınları1981.

Koç, N. Köy Enstitüleri, İstanbul: İdeal Kültür Yayıncılık, 2013.

Kongar, E. Demokrasimizle Yüzleşmek, İstanbul: Remzi Kitabevi, 2007.

Kongar, E. "Turkey's Cultural Transformation", http://www.kongar.org (accessed 15.4.2013).

Köker, L. Modernleşme, Kemalizm ve Demokrasi, İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2012.

Kubalı, H.N. Anayasa Hukuku. Genel Esaslar ve Siyasi Rejimler, İstanbul: Ersa Matbaacılık Koll. Şti, 1965.

Lévi-Strauss, C. Modern Dünyanın Sorunları Karşısında Antropoloji, Trad.: Akın Terzi, İstanbul: Metis Yayınları, 2012.

Makkar, K. "Law is a Tool for Social Engineering in India", http:// www.manaputra.com (accessed 10.4.2013).

Onar, S. S. Medeni Kanunun İçtimai Bünyemiz Üzerindeki Tesirleri ve İçtimai Kıymeti, İş, Türk Medeni Kanununun XV. Yıl Nüshası, 30-31, No: VIII (1955).

Ortaylı, İ. Osmanlı'yı Yeniden Keşfetmek, İstanbul: Timaş Yayınları, 2006.

Öktem, N. La Philosophie de la Révolution Française et l'Empire Ottoman, İÜHFM, Tome: 1-4, (1988): 1-4.

Lewis, B. "Why Turkey is the Only Muslim Democracy?", Middle East Quarterly, http://www.meforum.org/216/why-turkey-is-the-only-muslim-democracy (accessed 12.6.2013).

4, 1987.

Şekib, M. Monogami Meselesi, İş, No: 1, (1953): 19.

Şimşek-Rathke, L. Dünden Kalanlar. Türkiye'de Hemşirelik ve GATA TSK Sağlık Meslek Lisesi Örneği, İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2011.

Tahiroğlu, B. "Tanzimat'tan Sonra Kanunlaştırma Hareketleri", Tanzimat'tan Cumhuriyet'e Türkiye Ansiklopedisi, İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 1985.

Timur, S. "Türkiye'de Aile Yapısının Belirleyicileri", Türk Toplumunda Kadın, Ed: Nermin Abadan-Unat, Ankara: Türk Sosyal Bilimler Derneği, Çağ Matbaası, 1979.

Tunaya, Tarık Zafer. Devrim Hareketleri İçinde AtatürkAtatürkçülük, İstanbul: İstanbul Bilgi Üniversitesi Yayınları, 2007.

Turgay, Yücel. "Les Traits Essentiels du Droit Familial en Turquie", Le Droit de la Famille en Europe, Strasbourg: Presses Universitaires de Strasbourg, 1992.

Tüccarzade İbrahim Hilmi. "Aile Hayatımızda Avrupalılaşmanın Tesiri", Sosyo-Kültürel Değişme Sürecinde Türk Ailesi, Ankara: T.C. Başbakanlık Aile Araştırma Kurumu, 1992.

Tüzün, Sezgin. Değişmenin ve Geçiş Toplumunun Sosyoloğu: Mübeccel Belik Kıray, İstanbul: Bağlam Yayıncılık, 2012.

Ulusoy, Ali. "Avrupa İnsan Hakları Mahkemesi'nin Üniversitelerde Türban Yasağına İlişkin Kararları Üzerine Notlar", Ankara Üniversitesi Hukuk Fakültesi Dergisi, (2004).

Uyanık, Ercan. " II. Meşrutiyet Dönemi'nde Toplumsal Mühendislik Aracı Olarak Eğitim: İttihat ve Terakki Cemiyeti'nin Eğitim Politikaları (1908-1918)", Amme İdaresi Dergisi, 42 : (2009): 2.

Uygun, Oktay. Demokrasi, İstanbul: XII Levha Yayıncılık, 2011.

Üskül, Zeynep Özlem. "L'Affirmation de la Laïcité en Turquie: Un Gage de Modernité", Politique et Sécurité Internationale, No: 3, 1999.

Üskül Engin, Zeynep Özlem. Hukuk Sosyolojisi Açısından Türkiye'de Evlenmenin Evrimi, İstanbul: Beşir Kitabevi, 2008.

Vexliard, Alexandre/ Aytaç, Kemal. "The 'Village Institutes' in Turkey", Comparative Education Review, 8/ 1, 1964.

Yalçın, Güler. Canlandırılan Ütopya. Köy Enstitüleri, İstanbul: E Yayınları, 2012.

Yetkin, Çetin. Karşı Devrim (1945-1950), Ankara: Kilit Yayınları, 2011.

Democracy in the presence of liberalism and its enemies: the history of a concept[1]

Laurenio Sombra[2]

Abstract: Western political history has been marked and shaped by so-called liberal democracies. In the 1990s, Francis Fukuyama decreed the "end of history", with the promise of a definitive consolidation of these liberal democracies. Behind this optimism, however, lies an ideological concealment: 'democracy' and 'liberalism' represent two constructs that have not marched hand in hand since the dawn of modernity. If the essential values of liberalism were constituted on the philosophy of John Locke, the modern idea of democracy has, at least since the French Revolution, been presented as something attractive on the one hand, while also being dangerous and frightening. According to Tocqueville, although democracy is inevitable, its harmful effects must be ameliorated. A whole series of conservative thinkers, dating at least as far back as Edmund Burke, have set themselves up to react against and reduce these effects. In this sense, it is worth handling with the foundations of modern democracy and the requirement that the exercise of state power is vested in the people, through a perspective in which collective and community values take a certain precedence over individual ones; a stronger concept of social equality, while the concept of liberty acquires the positive notion of political liberty, with support from authors such as Jean-Jacques Rousseau. The question is: how does the historical process since the French Revolution demanded the transformation of the concept of democracy? At the same time: in what way this same process weakened the concept of democracy.

Keywords: Politics; democracy; liberalism.

[1] Translated by Cressida Evans.

[2] Laurenio Sombra is Professor of Philosophy atUniversidade Estadual de Feira de Santana (UEFS), Bahia, Brazil. Master of Philosophy at Universidade de Brasília (UnB), Brazil. Researches in philosophical hermeneutics and political philosophy.

In the summer of 1989, the political scientist Francis Fukuyama produced a highly controversial article, called The End of History?, based on a Hegelian reading of history, in which he decreed that we have reached "the end point of mankind's ideological evolution and the universalization of Western liberal democracy as the final form of human government".[3] At the time, Fukuyama sustained the excitement created by his prediction with certain crucial facts. Firstly, the recent fall of the Berlin wall, an episode that served as a byword for the overthrow of the Eastern Europe Socialist Bloc, bringing to a practical end any hope of implementing successful Marxist-Leninist or Maoist inspired governments, since China had already radically changed direction. Secondly, because of the increasing retreat of social democracy in Western countries, with the rise of conservative governments such as those of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher, as well as disappointment with the rise to power of supposedly socialist governments, such as those of François Mitterrand (France) and Felipe González (Spain), who pushed through measures heavily influenced by neoliberal doctrines, later repeated in the United Kingdom under Tony Blair and even with Fernando Henrique Cardoso in Brazil.

Many things have changed since Fukuyama's prediction: we have had September 11, the American crisis of 2008, the Arab Spring and the current European crisis. The latter, apparently, precisely because of the European Union governing power's insistence on neoliberal solutions to a crisis which seems to require the precise opposite. All these factors appear to confer on history a complexity that makes this classic article risible. However, Fukuyama does not need to surrender so easily. He had already admitted, in a seminal article, that the real world would still produce crises and facts. In his words, "the victory of liberalism has occurred primarily in the realm of ideas or consciousness and is as yet incomplete in the real or material world. But there are powerful reasons for believing that is the ideal that will govern the material world in the long run"[4]. To explain: since Fukuyama is based on Hegel, the suggested victory was principally a victory of "spirit", in other words, of the most advanced human consciousness, a consciousness that, sooner or later, will inevitably spread to all peoples. The material implementation of this victory of spirit may come about slowly, but is inevitable.

[3] Fukuyama, Francis. The End of History? The National Interest, Summer 1989 [online] Available from internet via: http://ps321.community.uaf.edu/files/2012/10/Fukuyama-End-of-history-article.pdf [Viewed 12 February 2014], p. 1.

[4] Fukuyama, Francis. The End of History?, p. 1-2.

What, then, are liberal democracies? Certain attributes appear to have consensus: free elections, universal suffrage, basic individual rights secured or at least defended by the State, freedom of the press and of expression, alternation of political power and a free market – for the latter, read a capitalist system. However, the way that these attributes are arranged appears to disguise a notion of an ideological nature: if we talk of "liberal democracies", what contribution does each of these terms (democracy and liberalism) provide? Alternatively, do they merely serve to reinforce one another, having become the same and inseparable amalgam? Are there no internal sources of tension between liberalism and democracy that should be re-thought? Thinkers of different ideological hues, such as Norberto Bobbio and Chantal Mouffe, think so, which invites us to reflect a little more on this matter.

Such a reflection needs to adopt a combined approach. It requires a conceptual investigation about the concepts of liberalism and democracy, particularly the latter. However, from the beginning of modernity, historical facts have revealed important tension factors within developed concepts, which have constantly been updated to take these into account. Therefore, this does not merely involve establishing fixed ideas and testing them against reality. This approach begins with an assumption that a conceptual discussion, principally within the context of political philosophy, must be scrutinized and assessed in terms of the tension in real life. We cannot simply fix on a concept and analyse reality through this fixed model. If we were to do so, there would be a trend for increasingly anachronistic analysis, one that was probably nostalgic and which, principally, would overlook the contributions that history has brought us. This perspective may be supported by Wittgenstein's apparently strange assertion from On Certainty: "it is a system within which consequences and premises give each other mutual support."[5]

On the other hand, it is not simply a matter of changing the meanings of a word in full agreement with the term's historical evolution. The evolution of this article itself must be explicit, since the task is equally inadequate to the purpose. We will argue that, with respect to the concept of democracy, some of the term's semantic transformation has virtually emptied out the concept. Simply to incorporate what we currently normally call democracy would mean abdicating the very critical possibility that this work seeks to provide.

[5] Wittgenstein, Ludwig. Da Certeza [On Certainty]. Lisboa: Edições 70, 1969, p. 53.

The first modern thinkers about democracy and liberalism

Our reflection about liberalism and democracy takes place within the context of modernity. It is true that democracy is a term deeply rooted in Greek theory and practice, but here the concept is considered directly. Liberalism, on the other hand, is a way of thinking only justified since the modern era.

We may think of modernity as an historical era directly associated with Western Europe, through which the notion of the individual, from a political point of view, has gained increasing prominence. As this notion gains ground, the social system is increasingly less structured on a previous hierarchy (which may be thought of as structured by God, the king, the aristocracy and/or a superior Law) and more on the individuals who make up society. Added to this is the consideration that, as the hierarchical consciousness disintegrates, these individuals are ideally presented as having equal rights in relation to all other individuals.

With John Locke, this process begins to take on a shape associated with liberalism. It is reasonable to consider Locke as the first great liberal thinker. Certain very clear features of liberalism are inscribed in this author's work, particularly in the Second Treatise on Civil Government, his most important political work. The "state of nature" that Locke describes, influenced by the natural law of Grotius and Hobbes, indicates a certain universal condition, prior to any political order. This contains rational individuals who enjoy their property rights, an ambiguous term that embraces both an individual's possessions while also, in the broader sense, includes their life and liberty - everything, therefore, which is his own. Any political State must have a primary function to protect such individuals, to protect their property. A State that does not achieve this mission, or betrays it, is not worthy of being maintained, and it falls to the citizens to constitute the "right to rebellion", to overthrow a government that does not fulfil its role.[6]

In Locke's formulation, on can already see the fundamental seeds of liberalism. On the one hand, an emphasis on individual rights, including the liberty of each citizen. On the other, are the first glimpses of the idea of the State as a "necessary evil", a State whose power must be contained and whose mission must be established in the best interests of its citizens, since a transcendent authority that legitimises and justifies, once and for all, is no longer acceptable.

[6] Locke, John. In: Weffort, Francisco (Org). Os Clássicos da Política Vol. 1. 13dr ed. São Paulo: Ed. Ática, 2005.

Either way, we may see John Locke as a thinker who considers the seeds of democracy, although Jean Jacques Rousseau is certainly better described as a kind of "father of modern democracy". Rousseau defined clearer notions about the idea of popular sovereignty, through which a united people form a joint body (materialized in the notion of general will). General will is formed by a social contract that unites the people in a single will, not aimed at selfish ends, but for the common good. As Rousseau describes it, "to find a form of association which will defend and protect with the whole common force the person and the goods of each associate, and in which each, while uniting himself with all, may still obey himself alone, and remain as free as before."

This formulation has certain points in common with liberalism. The suggested association aims to protect "the person and the goods of each associate", in something that appears to recognize the importance of individual property. However, we need to consider this more carefully, since in his Discourse on the Origin and the Basis of Inequality Among Men Rousseau had already announced that the defence of property represented a form of illusion of the rich in constituting a law that favours them.[7] We therefore need to pay more attention to another aspect of the contract, the fact that the individual "is obeying himself" in obeying the general will.

According to Rousseau, "whoever refuses to obey the general will shall be compelled to do so by the whole body, which means nothing less than that he will be forced to be free".[8] In relation to property, he asserts that, "the right which each individual has to his own estate is always subordinate to the right which the community has over all".[9] There is clearly a difference here in relation to the individual rights claimed by liberalism, a difference that is further highlighted when Rousseau talks of "the total alienation of each associate, together with all his rights, to the whole community".[10] Also associated with the risk of rupture from

[7] Rousseau, Jean-Jacques. In: Weffort, Francisco (Org). Os Clássicos da Política, Vol. 1 p. 220.

[8] Rousseau, Jean-Jacques. In: Weffort, Francisco (Org). Os Clássicos da Política, Vol. 1 p. 222.

[9] Rousseau, Jean-Jacques. In: Weffort, Francisco (Org). *Os Clássicos da Política,*Vol. 1 p. 222.

[10] Rousseau, Jean-Jacques. In: Weffort, Francisco (Org). Os Clássicos da Política, Vol. 1 p.

popular sovereignty is Rousseau's controversial defence, which essentially rejects representative democracy, in the name of direct democracy, in other words: direct popular participation in the construction of the essential laws of the nation.

The basis of Rousseau's proposal, however, is the notion that the people, as a single body, must run the State. In liberalism, this basis is founded on a series of individuals; in democracy, in a kind of new "personality", which is shaped by the single will of the people, which gains such power that individuals themselves must be subordinate to this general will.

Democracy and liberalism after the Revolutions

Thus, Locke and Rousseau made an indelible mark on modern political thought, demarcating two different and partially conflicting forms of thought about the legitimacy of the State. Following their works, two significant historical facts shaped the political world. On the one hand, the War of Independence in the United States, which managed to liberate itself from the yoke of England. The so-called American "founding fathers" were heavily influenced by liberalism, directly and indirectly based on John Locke's thinking and on republican ideals from Roman history, ideas that rejected the monarchist model, which was seen as corrupt and illegitimate.

The other historical fact, clearly, was the French Revolution, which marks the end of the Ancien Régime in France, proclaiming the equality of all citizens, independent of their origin and bringing an end to the monarchy. In terms of the French Revolution, we see the famous Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, which demonstrates the inspiration taken from the natural rights of natural law advocates, particularly of Locke, and from the American Revolution itself. However, France's revolution was much more accentuated, with a strong emphasis on the idea of popular sovereignty.

In France, the challenge of overcoming the Ancien Régime was much more brutal and, just as the struggle for equality fascinated many thinkers, such as Kant and Hegel, the so-called revolutionary Terror also frightened many such thinkers, paving the way for conservative reactions, such as those of the Irish thinker and politician Edmund Burke, who reclaimed the importance of traditions, initiating a long series of anti-Enlightenment reactions, still seen today. Democracy became something dangerous and, for some, to be entirely rejected.

220.

Even in countries that were more moderate, such as the United States, the liberal thinker Alexis de Tocqueville heralded the arrival of democracy with a mixture of fascination and fear. Tocqueville considered it inevitable, but perceived negative aspects that needed to be minimized. Democracy was associated with an ideal of equality that tended to homogenise man, removing his power of singularity. Worse than this, however, was Tocqueville's fear of it transforming into a kind of tyranny of the majority, suffocating individual freedoms, which have greater value than liberalism. In a statement addressed to the democrats, but which appears to be a response to Rousseau, he confirms:

> …our contemporaries imagine a single, omnipotent, tutelary power, but one that is elected by the citizens. They combine centralization and popular sovereignty. This gives them some respite. They console themselves for being treated as wards by imagining that they have chosen their own protectors…[11]

The installation of Marxist ideology and the consolidation of the left

However, one thinking that exploded onto the 19th century scene was Marxism. Marx (and Engels, his eternal partner in intellectualism and militancy) comes from a socialist tradition of thinking, which had been gaining ground since the 18th century. The central idea of socialism is essentially opposed to the fundamental principles of liberalism, entirely structured on individual property, while socialism prioritizes collective property. Marx consistently manifests this opposition and from his early works onwards denounces the illusion of "political freedom", which does not effectively achieve human freedom.

As his examination deepens, it increasingly denounces the foundations of modern thinking and the modern State, which are structured on economic dominance and the interests of a dominant class. In opposition to this, the class struggle is a central element for the transformation of human history. Such definitions are essential to the democratic discussion, since in the capitalist system the proletariat must be thought of as the truly universal class that will overcome the contradictions of this system. This is the class that must initially occupy the State (in the so-called "dictatorship of the proletariat") and be the driving force for a new period, a classless society, in which the State will no longer be necessary.

[11] Tocqueville, Alexis de. Democracy in America. Quoted by Bobbio, Norberto. Liberalismo e Democracia [Liberalism and Democracy]. 6dr. ed. São Paulo: Ed. Brasiliense, p. 59. Due to lack of space, we do not also address the important ideas of John Stuart Mill, who reinforces the fear of the "tyranny of the majority", addressing the importance of antagonism and proposing representative government, in opposition to Rousseau's direct democracy.

The definition of the proletariat as the "popular" class contains quintessentially ambiguous notions, which require clarification. The term proletariat is of Roman origin - the proletarii were the poorest, those without property, who could neither contribute taxes nor provide military service. In the Marxist context, the specific preoccupation with the capitalist mode of production presents the industrial proletariat as the proletarian class, par excellence, those who have the greatest historical conditions to confront the contradictions of capitalism and overcome them.

This does not mean, however, that Marx and Engels formulated a policy that disregarded components of the other popular classes. According to Rosenberg, "for Marx and Engels, the democratic movement was altogether an alliance of workers, peasants and the petty bourgeoisie. However, within this coalition, the proletariat, necessarily, should take over."[12]

Advanced democratic processes in Europe emerged, in general, pari passu with the constitution of socialist and/or leftist parties, as well as with coalitions of union federations that fought for a range of issues such as universal suffrage (in some cases, including that of women), eight-hour days, better working conditions, and others. These issues were frequently at odds with the anarchists, who, at the end of the 19th and beginning of the 20th century, were still fighting for the attention of the left.[13]

At the end of the century, the left, still in major dispute with anarchism, was increasingly influenced by Marx as well as by Engels' consolidation of Marxism in editing the unpublished volumes of Capital,

[12] Rosenberg, Arthur. Democracia e Socialismo [Democracy and Socialism]: história política dos últimos cento e cinquenta anos. 1789-1937. São Paulo: Global Editora, 1986, p. 94.

[13] Eley, Geoff. Forjando a Democracia

coordinating the international socialist movements and transforming, as the historian Geoff Eley asserts, "Marxism into the social democratic movement's official creed."[14]

Since the French Revolution, democratic struggles were ever-present in the Western consciousness and were associated with popular class struggles for several ends: universal suffrage, tax reduction, a reduction in the working day, and others. Given that the first socialist thinkers were hardly involved in the political struggle[15], it was the democrats who instilled fear in the elites. As Rosenberg asserts, "at that time, only democracy […] smelt of blood and barricades."[16]

If 1848 was a particularly revolutionary year in Europe, Rosenberg considers the counterrevolutionary developments of this period to be fundamental to a primary semantic transformation of the notion of democracy. The struggle for universal suffrage[17] had always been a cornerstone of the democratic struggle. The French experience, however, with its many ramifications, demonstrated that the achievement of universal suffrage did not effectively guarantee democratic achievements. According to Rosenberg, after a long series of clashes against the elite, but also following internal divisions between popular parties and sectors, it was clear that the dominant sectors had the full capacity to control real political power, including preparing the army and police for the repression of popular uprisings, if necessary. However, for the popular classes this did not represent the effective abandonment of democracy as an ideal of struggle, but a first sign of despair, the beginning of a growing perspective in which democracy was no longer a target to be achieved, but at most an intermediate stepping stone towards the effective liberation of the working class.

With this semantic transformation, socialism increasingly became a point of reference for the proletarian struggle. Moreover, this reference is increasingly associated with Marxism, although still in the context of a growing struggle against anarchists, inspired by Proudhon and later by Bakunin, who directly confronted Marx. One could say that Marx and Bakunin set out two models of democracy. In the case of Marx, joint ac-

[14] Eley, Geoff. Forjando a Democracia, p. 67.

[15] Thinkers such as Saint-Simon and Fourier were particularly focused on socialist experiments in the form of cooperatives undergoing wide-scale transformation through political mechanisms. Militants influenced by Proudhon manifested greater militant participation, albeit in a context resistant to participation in the State.

[16] Rosenberg, Arthur, Socialismo e Democracia, p. 70.

[17] A notion that, in the 19th century, did not often include women.

tion is essential in a model that participates in the struggle for the State (including through elections) and, finally, occupies it (the famous dictatorship of the proletariat) so that it may later be destroyed. For Bakunin, however, the political struggle must reject the State from the outset, not participating in the electoral game but destroying it through revolution. The Marxist concept, however, becomes progressively more dominant. Moreover, it presupposes an action that may still be considered democratic. Socialists carried on participating in the democratic game and fighting for victories for the popular classes, particularly the working class. This trend has a more symbolic example in the German Social Democratic Party (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands: SDP).

At the end of the 19th and beginning of the 20th century, one can confirm that democracy was still a dangerous word, such that in most Western European countries universal suffrage was only obtained at the beginning of the 20th century. However, this danger was increasingly attenuated. The SDP represented a model of democratic socialism that progressively retreated from its popular roots, and when it was in a position to take up power at the beginning of the Weimar Republic (1918), allied itself to more conservative sectors, rather than more radical ones. It achieved some social progress, such as universal suffrage, an eight-hour day and union recognition, but its operations were more often cautious, aggravated by the context of a Germany weakened by defeat in the I World War, and immediately having to abide by a series of humiliating measures imposed by the victors through the Treaty of Versailles.

Reformist and revolutionaries: the Russian Revolution and the new communist parties

The beginning of the 20th century saw the increasing consolidation of large capitalist companies, which, instead of cultivating the old liberal values of the rising bourgeoisie, meddled in the State, requiring decisive imperialist activities of it in the search for new markets and, chiefly, for the raw material required for their development. As Rosenberg perceived, from the 1890s onwards, large companies had consolidated their cartels and trusts. The "new liberalism" defended greater state intervention in other countries and demanded that internal uprisings should be repressed, for the better functioning of business.[18]

However, with the I World War things changed a great deal.

[18] Rosenberg, Arthur. Socialismo e Democracia.

"Dynasticism and divine right effectively disappeared as plausible means of legitimating political rule. And the war swept away all four great continental empires: the German, the Habsburg, the Russian and the Ottoman"[19]. The entire feudal structure lost even more of its foundations. "It was not just state forms that suffered a tremendous loss of legitimacy. A whole-European order of deference and clearly defined feudal or quasi-feudal hierarchies was destroyed, or at least profoundly shaken"[20]. This change required the construction of new elements that substituted the "transcendent element" of the monarchies, and the pathway identified was through the consolidation of constitutions, reinforcing a fundamental aspect of the "Rule of law", according to Bobbio's thinking:

> In liberal doctrine, the rights-based state means not only that public power of every kind is subject to the general laws of the country [...], but also that the laws themselves are subject to the material limitation stemming from the recognition of certain fundamental rights which are constitutionally, and thus as a matter of principle, taken to be 'inviolable'".[21]

On the other hand, a large-scale extension of the right to vote took place. As Müller confirms, "Before the war, women had been allowed to vote only in Finland and Norway; in 1918, Britain introduced universal manhood suffrage and the vote for women over thirty"[22]. Between 1918 and 1919, several other European countries extended suffrage.

From the point of view of popular uprisings, significant disputes about the pathway to socialism broke out in Germany and Russia. If the German SDP formally followed Marxism, its trend, through the militancy of Engels following the death of Marx, was to avoid the violent assumption of power at any cost. Arthur Rosenberg sees this process as beginning in the 1870s, and associates it with socialist struggles against the apparently ineffective violence of the anarchists.[23]

This anti-revolutionary perspective was defined most moderately by Bernstein and his "evolutionary socialism", which almost scan-

[19] Müller, Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy: political ideas in twentieth-century Europe. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 2011, p. 16.
[20] Müller, Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy, p. 18.
[21] Bobbio, Noberto. Liberalismo e Democracia, p. 18-19.
[22] Müller, Jan-Werner, Contesting Democracy, p. 20.
[23] Rosenberg, Arthur. Socialismo e democracia, p. 217.

dalously accepted liberal values and asserted that, "there is no liberal thought that is not also part of the intellectual equipment of socialism"[24]. However, it also took place in Germany with the intellectual formation of Karl Kautsky, who practiced a form of "passive radicalism". If Kautsky defended the orthodox acceptance of the principles of Marxism, this had to signify the inevitable fall of capitalism, through crises arising from its own development. It should involve a kind of passive position in relation to that moment. In Kautsky's famous phrase, "it is not our task to organize the revolution, but to organize ourselves for the revolution"[25]. Part of this ideology also considered that there were countries not yet sufficiently "mature" for socialism, since their capitalist development had not yet reached the stage appropriate to its own downfall.

Positions such as that of Kautsky and Bernstein were profoundly challenged by Marxist thinkers, such as Rosa Luxemburg and Vladimir Lenin. At the beginning of the century, Luxemburg had already developed her well known Reform or Revolution, in opposition, above all, to Bernstein's "reformist" theories. Rosa Luxemberg's more revolutionary position was also embraced by Lenin, key intellectual and political leader for the thinking of the popular Russian uprisings, and also for leading and governing the revolutionary process which culminated in the 1917 revolution.

Rosa Luxemburg and Lenin, however, diverged radically in one fundamental aspect in understanding the ramifications of the socialist revolution and the relationship, in both theory and practice, between these ramifications and democracy. Lenin's intellectual work was extremely ambiguous, even contradictory, regarding the relationship between a vanguard party and the masses. The great challenge was, to use Marxist terminology, how to guarantee that a class "in itself", in the concrete stage in which it found itself, effectively transforms into a class "for itself", one, in other words, with a revolutionary consciousness.

In What is to be done?, his first truly relevant work published in 1902, Lenin presents a categorical solution, one that was resoundingly rejected by the defenders of democracy: the proletarian class does not in itself possess a revolutionary consciousness. For him, "the workers cannot even have a social democratic consciousness. This may only be introduced from outside,"[26] and he adds that the foundation of revolutionary theory itself comes about within the "radical bourgeois intelligentsia". In another fundamental aspect, he asserts that "the organization of the revolutionaries must consist […] of people whose profession is revolutionary activity […]. Such an organization must perforce not be very extensive and must be as secret as possible."[27]

[24] Bernstein, Eduard. Quoted by Müller, Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy, p. 55.

[25] Kautsky, Karl. Quoted by Müller, Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy, p. 55.

[26] Lênin, Vladimir, Que fazer? [What is to be done?]: problemas candentes do nosso

There is a significant difference between this proposal and Marxism. In Marx's formulation, the essential revolutionary transformation takes places within the proletarian struggle itself, a context which reveals, in the core of the struggle itself, a reality within which the intellectual and the party leader must face one another. In Lenin's What is to be done?, consciousness comes about "from outside" and must drive the revolutionary party. It was this differentiation that caused the famous clash between Lenin and Rosa Luxemburg. For her, Lenin's point of view is "of a crude centralism […]. The central committee appears as the real active nucleus of the party; all the remaining organizations are merely its executive instruments"28. She claims "the collective ego of the working class, which reclaims the right to commit the same mistakes and learn the dialectic of history for itself"29, a position shaped by the idea that "the errors committed by a truly revolutionary movement are infinitely more fruitful and worthwhile historically than the infallibility of the very best Central Committee."30

The facts that follow the popular uprisings in Russia seem to confirm Luxemburg's assertions, since the constitution of the soviets (the popular factory councils that came together during the popular uprisings) was not top down. Lenin seems to have completely accepted this new reality and made profound modifications to his theoretical formulation, in opposition to what he had said in What is to be done?, the work which he himself considered outdated in many ways. If this, for some time, was Lenin's theoretical formulation, the new Bolshevik govern-movimento. 2dr ed. Lisboa: Editora Avante, 1978, p. 39.

---

[27] Lênin, Vladimir, Que fazer?, p. 126.

[28] Luxemburgo, Rosa. Quoted by Silva, Ozaí. O dilema da socialdemocracia. Rosa Luxemburgo e Lênin: concepção de partido e reformismo. Maringá: Revista Espaço Acadêmico, 119. April 2011, pp. 129-137, p. 131.

[29] Luxemburgo, Rosa. Quoted by Silva, Ozaí. O dilema da socialdemocracia. Rosa Luxemburgo e Lênin: concepção de partido e reformismo. Maringá: Revista Espaço Acadêmico, 119. Aprill de 2011, pp. 129-137, p. 131.

[30] Luxemburgo, Rosa. Quoted by Silva, Ozaí. O dilema da socialdemocracia. Rosa Luxemburgo e Lênin: concepção de partido e reformismo. Maringá: Revista Espaço Acadêmico, 119. April de 2011, pp. 129-137, p. 131.

ment practice was at some distance from this. The Party assumed power very rapidly and effectively retreated from the participation of the people. In 1919, the VII Party Congress (under Lenin's rule) assumed that "the Russian communist party must gain exclusive dominance of the soviets and the practical control of all their work."[31] This clearly anti-democratic perspective was strengthened in practice by the increasingly concentrated power of the party and was reinforced by intense fighting, arrests and assassinations of "counterrevolutionaries". In practice, this revolutionary confrontation meant combatting any questioning of the model set up by the party. As quoted by Müller, "when, in 1921, workers and sailors in Kronstadt near Petrograd demanded 'Soviets without Bolsheviks', Lenin sent in the troops. Even internal criticism within the party was now severely curtailed"[32].

After the Russian Revolution, the parties of the left divided into those that were inspired by Marxist-Leninism (becoming the so-called communist parties) and socialist or social democratic parties, who continued primarily to invest in electoral contests. However, from the outset, the communist parties associated with the Russian Komintern gave up any real attempt at democracy and faithfully followed the definitions from Moscow, which led to an even greater concentration than that considered by Lenin. Instead of parties of the vanguard, all of them submitted to one party of the vanguard, the "Soviet".

Due to lack of space, we will not here consider another fundamental period during the 1930/40s - the rise of fascist governments, led by Italy and Germany, which were only defeated at the end of the II World War. We would simply like to record the following: at the end of the War, the Soviet Union was strengthened by its fundamental support for the struggle against Nazism and dominated all of Eastern Europe, including some of Germany, under the rule of a totalitarian dictatorship led by Stalin. Added to this, was a profound consciousness amongst European peoples, seriously wounded by the horrors of Nazism, particularly the calculated and unprecedented slaughter of millions of Jews and other persecuted groups (gypsies, homosexuals, and others).

In Western European countries, certain fundamental liberal rights were maintained and consolidated into a constitutional regime that protected fundamental liberal rights from outbursts of immediacy and won important gains for the democratic struggles for universal suffrage, which in almost all countries included the women's vote. For those who followed the context of popular uprisings in the 19th century, this framework was still some way from being a "victory for democracy" but one cannot deny that it constitutes important progress.

[31] Quoted by Carlo, Antonio. A concepção do partido revolucionário em Lênin. Córdoda-Argentina: Passado y Presente, 43, July/December 1973, pp. 67-113, p. 96.
[32] Müller, Jan-Werner, Contesting Democracy, p. 39.

Post-War democracy

To cite Ernesto Laclau: "we know, from Saussure, that language (and by extension the entire system of signification) is a system of differences, that linguistic identities – values – are purely relational".[33] If we consider the concept of democracy from this perspective, we may, with some facility, understand what occurred in the Post-War period. On the one hand, there was the almost unanimous horror of German Nazism and Italian Fascism, political systems that had come about through a broad system of oppression and exclusion, fed by exacerbated nationalism and facilitated by the radicalizations common during periods of war. On the other hand, there was a growing horror of Soviet repression, with Stalin's great purges, millions incarcerated, hundreds of thousands dead, leadership rotations and a climate of repression, although there was not a great deal of clarity about this information, which was frequently taken as capitalist counter information. Soviet socialism still nourished many hopes. However, both Khrushchev's denunciation of Stalin in 1956 and the repressive activities of the post-Stalin USSR in Hungary (1956) and, particularly, in Czechoslovakia, progressively exhausted such hopes.

Through a different relationship, the concept of democracy was transformed, at least for the elite commanders of Western Europe, into a notion ever more distant from the popular and threatening origins that it had constituted in the 18th and 19th century. The term was increasingly associated with a more procedural notion of secured liberal rights, and representative mandates through universal suffrage, although these same mandates contained a number of limitations for the endorsement of their representation.

Paradoxically, at the same time that the term "democracy" was increasingly associated with Western capitalist countries, these very countries were carrying out activities that reduced the impact of political discussion on their governance– including by strengthening constitutional courts, the European community and even union agreements between employers and employees. As Müller asserts, "stability was to become a major goal – in fact the lodestar – of the post-war Western European political imagination"[34].

[33] Laclau, Ernesto. Emancipação e Diferença [Emancipation(s)]. Rio de Janeiro: EdUERJ, 2011, p. 68.

It is important to note that, since the 1930s, liberalism as an economic agenda in the capitalist world has lost a great deal of its force, as a result of capitalist crises provoked by liberal-inspired approaches. Since then, a number of interventionist activities of a Keynesian nature have occurred through growing social investment, particularly in more developed countries, creating a kind of social safety net for citizens, through an active redistribution policy arising from the high taxation of higher incomes. Thus, if on the one hand, the necessary measures were taken to curb political activity, huge resources were injected into the construction a new covenant, thereby avoiding social unrest. Once again, the system of differences is essential to understanding this, since the socialist threat (not merely from Eastern Europe, but from China and independent Trotskyists as well) drove developed capitalist countries to strengthen the social protection of their citizens. In contrast, anti-communist fear in Latin American countries more often led to military coups.

The implementation of the social contract in the post-war period suffered its first fundamental setback to public consciousness in the uprisings of the 1960s. In this decade, the United States saw the intensification of the struggle for civil rights, crowned by the publication of the Civil Rights Law in 1964, with several later ramifications. Large-scale protests against the war in Vietnam also emerged during this period. In France, the demonstrations known as "May 68" broke out. The post-May 68 uprisings provoked particularly cultural changes, although they also had an important impact on the political process over the long term. According to Umberto Eco:

> …even though all visible traces of 1968 are gone, it profoundly changed the way all of us, at least in Europe, behave and relate to one another. Relations between bosses and workers, students and teachers, even children and parents, have opened up. They will never be the same again[35].

[34] Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy, p. 128.
[35] Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy, p. 200.

Feminism was possibly the first great struggle shaped by the uprisings of the 1960s, with important developments in the 1970s. It activities changed the very nature and meaning of political struggle. As Eley states,

> The feminist insistence on the relationships between politics and daily life, on the importance of sexuality, on the connections between body and mind, on pleasure and not on discipline, on consumption and not on production, transformed the starting points for thinking about political change, expanding the premises on the left about what the political category contains. 'The personal is political' gave new meaning to individual autonomy.[36]

Between the 1960s and the 1970s, a huge range of struggles occurred against racism, colonialism and misogyny, gay movements and pacifist movements as well as others that transformed the political landscape. Macro-political disputes increasingly could not afford to overlook these elements. Politics was no longer only a class struggle or a matter for the public authorities. The need for populist coalitions in the struggle against hegemony gained unprecedented complexity and required new theoretical formulations to encompass them, as proposed by the philosophers Ernesto Laclau and Chantal Mouffe[37]. This series of political struggles, called the "new social movements", injected new vitality into democratic struggles and brought the notion of a merely procedural democracy into question.

On the other hand, the beginning of the 1970s also witnessed the emergence of neoliberalism to a degree that seriously threatened the legitimacy of popular demands. From the economic point of view, this phenomenon came about within the context of the oil crisis of the 1970s, with the Welfare State experiencing some financial fatigue, but also with a growth in the service sector, in detriment to workers and peasants, who formed the historical foundations of populist uprisings.

Neoliberalism introduced a growing idea of State reduction, particularly in terms of social investment, but also in weakening the unions. It was an idea that introduced a new economic and financial model, accompanied by a moral discourse. Ideas were reclaimed, such as those of [36] Eley, Geoff. Forjando a Democracia, p. 438-439.

[37] Laclau, Ernesto e Mouffe, Chantal. Hegemonia y Estrategia Socialista [Hegemony and Socialist Strategy]: hacia uma radicalización de La democracia. 2dr ed. Buenos Aires: Fondo de Cultura Económica de Argentina, 2004.

Hayek, which associated social measures with "servitude". The conservative philosopher Michael Oakeshott talked of "the individual manqué – human beings incapable of bearing the burden of making their own choices"[38]. The Welfare State clearly fitted the context that Oakeshott criticized. For Oakeshott, the modern European individual, celebrated by thinkers such as Montaigne, Hegel and Tocqueville, was at risk of extinction.

Fundamental to the neoliberal idea was the containment of democratic struggles, particularly when these involved claims for the redistribution of State funds.[39] To this end, it was important for the liberal idea to constitute a body of policies that would curb these struggles. One such preoccupation was found in the Trilateral Commission of the United States, formed in 1975 by three intellectuals, who feared a "democratic surge" in a context whereby, "too many people wanting too many things from government and ultimately also too much participation in government made statecraft ever more difficult"[40].

This preoccupation was tackled theoretically in formulations such as those of the German sociologist Niklas Luhmann. According to Müller, "he offered the most coherent and sophisticated theoretical justification for why policy-making should be shielded from widespread participation and essentially be left to bureaucrats".[41] Luhmann thought of society in terms of complex systems and subsystems with some degree of autonomy, making counterproductive the interference of one system in another; this included the economic subsystem.

Formulations such as these, of a technical and moral nature, provided the foundation for real efforts to concentrate the main economic measures within a ruling elite coordinated by the major economic powers, with a very low level of popular interference in such decisions. What was at play appeared to be too complex to be discussed with the population or to attend to popular will. In Europe, this process became even more marked through currency unification and the concentration of power in the European Central Bank, to the point that when, in 2011, the Greek Prime Minister proposed a referendum to discuss the bailout

[38] Oakeshott, Michael. Quoted by Müller, Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy, p, 224.

[39] This perspective creates a paradox that merits attention. The struggles of the "new social movements" could be partially absorbed into the set of liberal rights. They only become an effective problem for the neoliberal State when, in their essence, they include a struggle for State funds.

[40] Quoted by Müller, Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy, p. 204.

[41] Müller, Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy, p. 204.

measures associated with the government's "Greek rescue" plan, this was treated as a scandal and required him to back down.[42] In several countries, processes have taken place to promote the autonomy of central banks and "market-based" flexible exchange rates, amongst a range of other measures that erode both popular activity and even that of the political class. These aspects appear even more definitive when parties supposedly on the left assume power and essentially maintain such measures.

Final Considerations

It is not easy to measure our current degree of democracy. Popular struggles have always been the target of curbs by the major powers. However, it is reasonable to point to neoliberalism and its ramifications as factors that erode this policy. Several aspects appear to have sustained this erosion, but economic ideology, which argues that the technical aspects of economic policies cannot and must not be deliberated through democratic decisions, appears to be extremely powerful.

What seems to further confirm this diagnosis is a general feeling of paralysis, since no exits are provided. There no longer exists a clearly alternative model, such as that announced by Marxism in the 19th and 20th centuries. There are, however, at least two aspects that may provide potential pathways for further investigation.

Firstly, it is worth noting the approach of Ernesto Laclau and Chantal Mouffe. According to them "the economy's very space is configured as political space and […] in this space […] hegemonic practices […] fully operate"[43]. If we follow this approach, we must understand that the "economic subsystem", to use Niklas Luhmann's terminology, is always composed of an intense power game, which must be publicized. At the heart of these relationships, we should see the major economic groups as true centres of power, not politically controlled[44]. Thus, if neoliberalism has decided to move politics away from the economy, the challenge is precisely the opposite: to politicize the economy, and to [42] Something that also occurred in Brazil in 2013 when President Dilma Roussef proposed a plebiscite for political reform.

[43] Laclau, Ernesto e Mouffe, Chantal. Hegemonia y Estrategia Socialista, p. 113.

[44] In many countries, such as Brazil and the United States, the fact that the electoral game itself operates through the legal and illegal funding of these economic groups makes their involvement an even more serious matter.

this end it is essential that the government choices involved in major economic decisions form part of the field of political discussion.

Secondly, and in apparent contrast to the first point, we should not ignore the neoliberal argument that some features of governance are highly complex and may not be the target of democratic deliberation, which could result in counterproductive activities that affect the basic stability of the State. Here, we do not have room for the wider discussion that this subject merits, but we may begin with the following argument. If the idea of popular sovereignty emerges in the modern era through Rousseau's general will, it is essential that we understand that in philosophy the idea of will should not be confused with simple desire[45], but implies a fundamental human condition that is always in dialogue with reason and liberty. It is for this reason that Rousseau warns us that general will does not merely represent the sum of private interests, or even the will of the majority. If we consider popular sovereignty as general will in the terms put forward by Rousseau[46], we must also consider the mechanisms through which the population's free option may be an option mediated by the possibilities involved, a factor that necessitates profound dialogue with technical agents. We should not forget that Rousseau himself talked about "when the people being sufficiently informed deliberate…"[47] If we may make an analogy here - only a doctor is skilled in conducting surgery and only he may have the technical capacity to present us with the risks and benefits involved. To make such a decision without a prudent medical assessment would be entirely counterproductive. However, such factors of a technical nature should not stray from the fundamental point that, under general conditions the decision of the surgeon has to be that of the patient. The growing curbs to democracy as an ideal, which have reached their apex with neoliberalism, appear to advocate that it is the doctor who should decide…

Finally, certain points require further study and we should not forget the victories that seem to have been won. History shows us the [45] Without taking into consideration the psychoanalytic connotations that give this term a more complex connotation.

[46] Albeit tempered by liberal critiques. The much-criticized "complete submission" to Rousseau's general will must be accompanied by the necessary protection of individual rights. These formulations may be reconciled if we consider that they form part of the general will of contemporary "liberal democracies" to maintain such rights.

[47] Rousseau, Jean-Jacques. In: Weffort, Francisco (Org). Os Clássicos da Política Vol. 1, p. 228.

meaning and importance of individual rights, which, in the final analysis, we may consider as based on old political liberalism. Reasonable political proposals that do not respect these rights do not seem to be on the horizon, although in many countries they remain some way from attainment. Moreover, the struggle for such rights has been further extended by the cultural revolution that swept the western world with the uprisings of the 1960s and the developments that followed. Out of these, a new agenda of political claims (and rights) has become manifest and includes women, black people, homosexuals, ethnic minorities etc. It is essential that with all the progress sought one does not lose sight of the significance of these victories. In this sense, in the face of the eternal confrontation between democracy and liberalism, we may see that democracy cannot reject liberalism, but should always place it in tension, so that it further extends the rights agenda. In addition, it should admit the always-feared popular sovereignty, which is the basis for any democracy that wishes so to be called.

References

Bobbio, Norberto. Liberalismo e Democracia [Liberalism and Democracy]. 6dr. ed. São Paulo: Ed. Brasiliense.

Carlo, Antonio. A concepção do partido revolucionário em Lênin. Córdoda-Argentina: Passado y Presente, 43, July/December 1973, pp. 67-113.

Eley, Geoff. Forjando a Democracia [Forging Democracy]: a história da esquerda na Europa, 1850-2000. São Paulo: Ed. Fund. Perseu Abramo, 2005.

Fukuyama, Francis. The End of History? The National Interest, Summer 1989 [online] Available from internet via: http://ps321.community.uaf.edu/files/2012/10/Fukuyama-End-of-history-article.pdf [viewed 12 February 2014].

Laclau, Ernesto. Emancipação e Diferença [Emancipation(s)]. Rio de Janeiro: EdUERJ, 2011.

Laclau, Ernesto and Mouffe, Chantal. Hegemonia y Estrategia Socialista [Hegemony and Socialist Strategy]: hacia uma radicalización de La democracia. 2dr ed. Buenos Aires: Fondo de Cultura Económica de Argentina, 2004.

Lênin, Vladimir, Que fazer? [What is to be done?]: problemas candentes do nosso movimento. 2dr ed. Lisboa: Editora Avante, 1978.

Müller, Jan-Werner. Contesting Democracy: political ideas in twentieth-century Europe. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 2011.

Rosenberg, Arthur. Democracia e Socialismo [Democracy and Socialism]: história política dos últimos cento e cinquenta anos. 1789-1937. São Paulo: Global Editora, 1986.

Silva, Ozaí. O dilema da socialdemocracia. Rosa Luxemburgo e Lênin: concepção de partido e reformismo. Maringá: Revista Espaço Acadêmico, 119. April 2011, pp. 129-137.

Weffort, Francisco (Org). Os Clássicos da Política Vol. 1. 13dr ed. São Paulo: Ed. Ática, 2005.

Wittgenstein, Ludwig. Da Certeza [On Certainty]. Lisboa: Edições 70, 1969.

Between agreement and disagreement:
A search for the best conception of democratic jurisprudence

Ana Luisa de Navarro Moreira

Abstract: The sense in which the idea of democracy should be understood becomes an important philosophical theme, due to the ever-closer relationship between democratic values and the institutionalization of the Rule of Law. In this sense, this paper, in the first section, will approach two conceptions of democracy: democracy as majoritarian decision-procedure, proposed by Jeremy Waldron, and democracy as deliberative political will formation, proposed by Jürgen Habermas. Despite both advocate a normative theory, Waldron accepts the idea of a constant disagreement, while Habermas, on the other hand, aims at achieving an agreement, the consensus reachable through a rational understanding which is made possible by discourse theory. After expounding, in the second section, these two principles, the principles of agreement and disagreement, are better developed. As a result of the proposed debate, we conclude that, even though the conceptions of democracy and legality proposed by Waldron seem more "compatible" with the democratic states which have a high degree of diversity of cultural traditions, as noted in Brazil, the model proposed by Habermas to explain the political process on the basis of the discursive theory of law provides a more robust idea of citizenship, participation and, especially, of democracy.

Keywords: democracy, disagreement, rational acceptability.

I. Introduction

Over the recent years we can notice an ever-closer relationship between democratic values and the institutionalization of the Rule of Law. With the defeat of totalitarian states and the development of institutionalized democracies, history has witnessed the recognition of human beings as true citizens, especially as persons endowed with public and private autonomy.

The right to liberty and the right to equality, which have been put in check during the biggest part of the 20th Century, both gain the attention and protection of the Western legal systems and become inseparable from the idea of legality or the Rule of Law.

In this context, the question of what is the sense in which the idea of democracy should be understood becomes an important philosophical theme, which must be placed at the root of any significant jurisprudential theory of law and will gain our attention in this paper.

The first section of the paper addresses two conceptions of democracy: democracy as majoritarian decision-procedure, proposed by Jeremy Waldron, and democracy as deliberative political will formation, proposed by Jürgen Habermas. Although both authors share the same methodological stance, advocating a normative theory that explores the relation between the value of democracy and the concept of law, they are based in two ideas that seem to be diametrically opposed. While Waldron accepts the idea of a constant disagreement in the community, since people disagree considerably on issues of law and justice, Habermas, on the other hand, moves towards the idea of an agreement, the consensus reachable through a rational understanding which is made possible by discourse theory.

In the second section, after clarifying these conceptions of democracy, the two ideas stated above (the acceptance of disagreement and the advocacy of a consensus) are better developed. What is the extent of the relation between each concept of democracy and those ideas? What are the characteristics of each one? Apparently, the risk of disagreement is imminent, especially in societies composed of moral and political projects so diverse. But how deal with them?

Finally, as a result of the proposed debate, we conclude that, even though the conceptions of democracy and legality proposed by Waldron seem more "compatible" with the democratic states which have a high degree of diversity of cultural traditions, as noted in Brazil, the model proposed by Habermas to explain the political process on the basis of the discursive theory of law provides a more robust idea of citizenship, participation and, especially, of democracy.

II. Democracy as majoritarian decision-procedure

Democracy by Jeremy Waldron involves that people themselves establish the rules they are going to follow. In others words "includes the idea that rules are chosen by people whom they rule" (WALDRON, 2008, p. 8).

The principle of equality is central in this argument, and it involves that people act, vote and deliberate as equals. Thus, the right to participate in the making of the laws is crucial, so that there cannot be a democracy unless each individual possess the regular exercise of the right to political participation, which is called the "right of the rights" (WALDRON, 1999, p. 232). People are equally entitled to participate in the debate that determines what their rights are.

In this sense, democracy and individuals rights are not incompatible; on the contrary, there is a natural congruence between them: people need a democratic procedure to claim theirs rights. Every time that a disagreement arises, everyone must have their right of participate preserved, because if it is not preserved, if someone is excluded or the process is unequal, them "both rights and democracy are compromised" (WALDRON, 1999, p. 283).

Since the individuals are identified as a right-bearer, each one should decide the grounds on which they are governed, the principles of their coexistence and the content of their laws.

But members of a community constantly disagree about everything (WALDRON, 2002, p. 4). They disagree about meaning of life, existence of God, about what makes a good life, what someone should do in determined situation, and, likewise, they disagree about which individuals rights should be preserved, what is justice in some special cases and, in particular, which grounds, principles and contents the laws of a community should have. It is fairly natural, therefore, that people come into disagreement.

Then, as people disagree, they need procedures to come to decisions to handle these disagreements. These procedures shall be governed by the principle of political equality: they shall ensure that every individual (1) has secured an equal opportunity to express herself by participating, so that all the people have the same status of participation and no one is regarded as more important or entitled of having different opportunities to speech than the others (2).

Waldron's democratic jurisprudence, thus, is attentive to those who (1) participate in the making of the laws (the people) and how (2) the laws are maid (as equals). In this sense, the solution that he offers to settle those constant disagreements is the majoritarian decision-procedure, in which everyone has an equal vote to decide (one-person, one-vote).

The defense for majoritarian procedures is based on the argument that only a democratic decision-making is authoritative to establish law. Democracy presupposes that "the people are entitled to govern themselves by their own judgment, including judgments with regard to reasonably controverted questions of justice and morality" (WALDRON, 1999, p.264).

Waldron choose the majority rules, because it at least allows "a voice and a vote in a final decision-procedure to every citizen of the society", unlike other procedures that instead "proceed to make final decisions about the rights of millions on the basis of the voices and votes of a few" (WALDRON, 1999, p. 299). As democracy itself involves equal respect for individual moral agency, the disagreement shall be resolved politically by equal voting procedure.

The argument, thereby, is based on the principle of political equality.

Lastly, for this procedure to be appropriate one needs the assumption that the members of the community are committed to the rights and that every one of them is endowed with moral capacities of thinking responsibly about their own interest and the interest of others. This capacity to consider conscientiously the relation about individual interest and collective interest is indispensable, because is the "primary basis of democratic competence" (WALDRON, 1999, p. 282).

Since every individual are mutually respectful of each other's different views and since it is a form of procedure of "deliberation and majoritarian voting that treats the opinions of those citizens as equals" (WALDRON, 2002, p. 9), then the settlement should stand.

Therefore, Waldron's argument of the right of political participation constitutes the core of his intellectual defense of democracy as majoritarian decision-procedure.

III. Democracy as deliberative political formation

Habermas, in the same way, believes it is possible for a community to be self-organized by free and equal citizens, even under the conditions of complex communities (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 7). But his arguments go beyond the principle of political equality, as he develops the idea of communicative power connected with the principle of democracy. To consolidate this idea, he proposes that democracy is intrinsically related with the exercise of political autonomy (1), which is secured by the discourse conception of law (2).

The political autonomy (1) must be explained on the basis of an internal connection between human rights (private autonomy) and popular sovereignty (public autonomy) (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 101)

The liberal conception of autonomy conceives human rights as the expression of moral self-determination (close to the Kantian tradition); thereby, the priority of human rights guarantees personal liberties which protect private autonomy. Hence, democracy turns into an instrument for the defense of private interests and its exercise set limits on the sovereign will. On the other hand, the republican conception of autonomy interprets popular sovereignty as the expression of ethical self-realization (close to Roussean idea of social contract). In this manner, it presupposes an ethical community oriented to the common good, where all citizens have political virtues. It is a system of collective decisions where democracy allows the State to be proactive in the task of consolidating of that common good.

In the first view the system of rights is reduced to a moral reading of human rights while in the second one it is an ethical reading of popular sovereignty (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 104). Both views, because of their specific characteristics, seem contradictory; but, on the contrary, they needed to be integrated in an evenly balanced manner, which is called political autonomy.

The public autonomy is only well exercised when private autonomy is also ensured, so that individual rights are sufficiently independents in a way that everyone turn into an effectively real citizen and the sovereign will formation becomes possible (HABERMAS, 2002, p. 293). In this sense, private autonomy and public autonomy presuppose one another. Both are equally fundamental, and only through law they interact properly.

Thereby, the system of rights must contain and guarantee the individual rights that citizens mutually grant one another (as recipient of law), so that they can legitimately regulate their lives in common by the democratic procedures governed by the discourse principle (as authors of law), in this sense Habermas develops the discourse concept of law (2).

The discourse principle (D) determines that are valid only those standards that all possibly affected persons accepted and agree as participants in rational discourses (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 107). This principle has an important and indispensable element: rational discourses.

The rational discourse includes the attempt of reaching an agreement of controversial claims by discursively grounded procedures based on equal opportunities for the political use of communicative power.

Each individual has the same status of participation and the same conditions or opportunities of speech.

But only through a legal structure both deliberative procedure and discourse principle are applied. In this sense, "in assuming a legal shape, the discourse principle is transformed into a principle of democracy" (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 121).

Then, the discourse conception of law presupposes this intrinsic connection between the Rule of law and democracy (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 449), in which the principle of democracy establish a procedure of legitimate lawmaking but also guides and controls the medium of law itself. In other words, the discourse principle institutionalizes the political will formation but at the same time must provide the medium in which this political will formation can be expressed as the will of free and equal members of a community.

The discourse theory proposes that democratic legitimacy depends on the legally institutionalized procedures and communicative presuppositions, because in this way the lawmaking process leads to rational outcomes (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 414). Hence, the agreement is reachable only through a rational understanding between the parties, which is made possible by discourse theory.

Therefore, the Habermasian defense of the exercise of political autonomy secured by the discourse concept of law constitutes the normative core of his conception of democracy as deliberative political will formation.

IV. Waldron's view: The pervasive disagreement and the circumstances of politics

Waldron's defense of the conception of democracy as majoritarian decision-procedure is a reflection of his view on disagreements (WALDRON, 2002, p. 8)

The disagreement is intrinsic to plural societies. Since the development of cultural and moral pluralism, the gap among the individuals who constitute the people has grown in large proportions, so interpersonal relationships became extremely complex.

Cultural, political, economic and moral transformations provided the emergence of a pluralistic and open community, which has the ability to integrate and disassociate opinions that were previously consolidated consensually or were apparently taken as consensus.

Thus, the worldview that previously presupposed an implicit consensus and a relative stability in the conceptions of goods suffers from an intense questioning.

Consequently, a pervasive disagreement among individuals is expected. Diversity on these matters is a permanent feature of the public culture of democracy. In other words, we face the inescapability of disagreement (WALDRON, 1999, p. 106).

In this sense, Waldron believes in the existence of persistent and durable disagreement within society. All men and women have different views of everything, especially about rights and justice.

But, even with this constant disagreement, there is a strong commitment among the members of the community to the idea of individual rights (WALDRON, 2006, p. 1364). Furthermore, the requirement of settlement of the controversies about rights is recognized, especially because the settlement is indispensable to providing the foundation for common action when it is needed.

However, issues of rights and justice are not easy to deal with. That is why the disagreements need to be confronted by a political decision procedure which shows equal respect for each individual (WALDRON, 1999, p. 114).

Waldron's view is that voting and majority-decision procedures can be the solution for that problem, and to support this argument he introduces the idea of 'circumstances of politics'.

The circumstances of politics is the necessity of a "common (1) framework or decision or course of action on some matter, even in the face of disagreement (2) about what that framework, decision or action should be" (WALDRON, 1999, p. 102).

Therefore there are two significant elements of the circumstances of politics: the felt need for common action (1) in face of reasonable disagreements (2).

The disagreements (2), as explained, are inevitable. It is not unnatural to think that reasonable people disagree (WALDRON, 1999, p. 225). People in good faith constantly oppose their opinions and values with one another, even after deliberation (WALDRON, 1999, p. 112), and they disagree especially in substantial political issues, making it harder to act together.

Hence, since is undeniable there is an enormous difficult for people to act together and even more difficult for them to reach an agreement, the circumstances of politics requires the importance of establishing a specific policy despite the existence of all these disagreements.

The felt need for common action (1) demonstrates that it is better to have a reasonable action or decision than not having any. But for this reasonable action to be possible, the procedure must have some distinctive features.

In such pervasive disagreement, the decision-procedure needs to be neutral with regards to the merits of the decision, in such a way that any of us identifies the policy established by that procedure as ours. In this sense, it has to be technical (a) and also a method that is morally respectable to each individual (b).

The majority-voting for Waldron satisfies both requirements.

Concerning a technical decision (a), all individuals can identify the common policy decision as the one chosen by the majority; regardless of agreements about its merits (WALDRON, 1999, p. 108). Thereby, people do not have to share a common view on the merits about philosophy, ethics or even religion involved in the decision, but they need a procedure for settling these moral controversies.

In the circumstances of politics the important thing is to find a way of choosing a single policy among others, where the people participate and are respect the final decision, rather than finding a single policy that everyone agrees as the best moral choice. The process of majority-voting allows everyone to participate and does not require anyone's view to be placed down (WALDRON, 1999, p. 111).

Thus, apart from its technical character, it is a procedure which respects each individual (b) whose votes it aggregates. Firstly, the individuals do not need to pretend that there is a consensus when there is none; secondly, they can keep theirs beliefs, since it does not require anyone to stop having their own views about justice and about common good; and, thirdly, its essence is the principle of respect, which is preserved by the guarantee of equal weight and equal potential decisiveness to individual votes.

By the principle of respect, an individual truly respect other opinion in such a way the final decision is adopted as if they all decided even if the individuals don't agree with its merits. This attitude of respect stem from the importance of toleration among people, which is also a political principle (WALDRON, 2013, p. 2).

In this sense the majority-decision is also a respectful procedure, because political equality preserves the respect between people.

Therefore, the circumstances of politics are indispensable for understanding Waldron's argument for a procedural decision-rule as majority-decision in face of such pervasive disagreements.

V. Habermas view: The possibility of agreement and the elemensts of communicative power.

The pervasive disagreement is the guiding idea of Waldron's choice for majoritarian decision-procedure. Habermas, on the other hand, faces the existence of this permanent feature of democratic communities, but believes in the consensus reachable through a rational understanding which is made possible by discourse theory.

First, one thing needs to be clarified. The disagreements do not cease to exist on Habermas's proposal. By the same token, this author deals with the ever-present risk of disagreement and sees the high costs of dissension from the view point of action coordination (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 21).

The disagreements reflect the characteristic pluralism in democracies, which is one of the foundations of the democratic Rule of Law. In this sense, it has to be preserved and not eliminated (ensuring private autonomy). Besides, it is indispensable that all people's values and interests can be also performed freely and equally in the political procedures (ensuring public autonomy).

Hence, the individuals still maintain different moral views about the themes which are presented for debate and only in face of them it is possible to sort out the possibilities for an agreement through discourse (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 309).

The difference from Waldron's view subsists on what (1) happens when these moral disagreements emerge and how (2) citizens react in face of those disagreements.

With the linguistic turn, language now is conceived as a universal medium for embodying reason, and with the communicative power the use of language is oriented to reaching an understanding (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 8).

Thus, in Habermas' theory, rationality is directly linked to the language, as communicative rationality is essentially discursive. Therefore, the expression of these free and equal values and interests occurs through a dynamic process where citizens communicate through language.

So, when the disagreements emerge the individuals, who participate with the same conditions or opportunities of speeching, must deliberate rationally (1). The political will-formation must be consolidated through a discursive process in a communicative process that constitutes the discourse principle (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 51).

Hence, the understandings are constantly modified through an inter-subjective relation where the communicative rationality is rooted in the structures of communication that bind people to a fair discursive procedure (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 148).

The reflexivity of argumentation and constructive interpretation are elements of this rational deliberative procedure, so that "the rationalization of a lifeworld is measured by the extent to which the rationality potentials built into communicative action and released in discourse penetrate lifeworld structures and set them a flow" (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 98).

In consequence, the communicative action enables the debate leading to democratic will-formation. The public sphere constantly thematizes itself, because it must always preserve the discursively grounded procedures based on equal opportunities for the political use of communicative power.

The communicative power, therefore, lies at the heart of the communication model of the democratic political process because "all political power derives from the communicative power of citizens" (HABERMAS, 1999, p.170).

At the same time the citizens, once deliberating, adopt a performative attitude in search for the best argument (2). Those who participate in the debate must assume a performative attitude because they all must act to reach an understanding with one another about something, and still, they can expect one another to take the same stand on reciprocally raised validity claims (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 119).

Only by the mutual orientation for validity claims (HABERMAS, 1989 , p. 42) people can attempt to deliberate about competing interpretations of the situation at hand, harmonize their disagreements and, thereby, recognize the "force of the better argument' (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 11).

Hence, the presuppositions of communication power that undergird legitimate lawmaking are the rational deliberation and the performative attitude in the search for the best argument, where disagreements don't subsist.

The individuals have the capacity of reaching rational agreements through discursive and argumentative procedures (HABERMAS, 1999, p. 500). In other words, through the language oriented to mutual understanding, communicative reason can convince individuals to agree without coercion.

Therefore, Habermas' defense of an agreement doesn't make the disagreement disappear; but it completely influences the bases on his normative framework. When he combines a procedural account of democracy with deliberative politics, the legitimacy of democracy becomes dependent on the discursive structure of the opinion will-formation.

The essential point here is not the achievement of the agreement in itself, but it is much more important the improvement of the conditions of debate and discussion, in other words, "the discursive level of public debates constitutes the most important variable" (HABERMAS, 1996, p. 304).

VI. Conclusion: Radical democracy as morally desirable

The democratic nature of the democratic Rule of law depends on the nature of democracy, which involves the universality of the concept of individual (all men are equal) and the universality of political participation of each of them (all men are free).

Each citizen has the right to free and equal voice and the same possibility of speaking up, so that only by the political autonomy people are guaranteed to be both author and recipient of the rules that institutionalize the legislative process.

In this sense, the public sphere becomes the scene of a constant tension between conceptions of good and conceptions of fairness, or, in other words, the tension between the lifeworlds and the character of the Constitution. But, despite the search for agreements being central for the stabilization of law at each historical moment, what predominates in the discourse of the Brazilian people are the disagreements, mainly because of the differences that bulged between them.

However, a democratic society is not marked by homogeneity; on the contrary, difference and disagreements are their distinctive features.

Thus, democracy necessarily requires the harmonious coexistence between those who are different. The difference must be tolerated when it manifests itself in the exercise of political autonomy on the verge of constant disagreements.

So, at that, who has the best option and the best conception of democracy? In which basis should we try to solve the problem of how constitutional democracy can be consolidated in complex societies?

Both authors intend to build a community of free and equal citizens with self-organization. Both propose a model centered in respect of worldviews and forms of life of each individuals. Both share the same methodological stance, advocating a normative theory that explores the relation between the value of democracy and the concept of law. But they are apart from each other in fundamental features.

First, Waldron reaches important achievements with the defense of the principle of political equality and the proposal that people should act, vote and deliberate as equals. Yet his conception of democracy as majoritarian decision-procedure misses the legitimating force of a discursive process of opinion and will-formation.

The influence of language and the rational deliberation on the democratic procedures governed by the discourse principle deserves a much greater attention than it has received in his political philosophy.

Secondly, he starts with the precious idea that the members of the community are committed to the rights and that every one of them are endowed with moral capacities of thinking responsibly about their own interest and the interest of others. However, he insists on pervasive disagreement and he apparently does not give credit to deliberation.

According to his scheme, people are committed to rights but in a lonely and individual way, and not through an inter-subjective relation where communicative rationality enables a performative attitude in search for the best commitment, the best argument. In this sense, the potential of self-government is underestimated.

The public sphere functions as a normative concept. The discursive and argumentative procedures enable people to discover relevant issues for the society and for contributing with possible solutions for existing problems, by means of the construction of good arguments. Through the language oriented to mutual understanding, the interests of others are truly taken into consideration. Everyone becomes an effectively real citizen and the sovereign will formation becomes possible.

Third, Wadron keeps his procedural choice because it is also a respectful procedure. Nevertheless, only the communicative mastery is the source of solidarity and cooperative regulation, where people decide together through deliberation, demonstrating equal respect for each individual moral agency and argumentation.

Therefore, deliberative political will formation is the procedure which best guarantees the principle of respect, because by it individuals truly respect other opinions and the final decision is adopted as ours.

Habermas' theory of democracy affirms those normative notions without neglecting the difficulties from complex communities when he emphasizes the communicative presuppositions and procedural conditions of democratic will-formation as the source of democracy legitimacy.

So, even though the conceptions of democracy and legality proposed by Waldron seem more "compatible" with the democratic states which have a high degree of diversity of cultural traditions, as noted in Brazil, the model proposed by Habermas to explain the political process on the basis of the discursive theory of law provides a more robust idea of citizenship, participation and, especially, of democracy.

Finally, regardless of which institutional framework is accomplished today, on this view, it is always good to be subjected to a critical evaluation, so that it can be reachable by the democratic procedures indispensable for a real and genuine democratic will formation.

References

CATTONI DE OLIVEIRA, M. A. . A coesão interna entre Estado De Direito e democracia na teoria discursiva do direito de Jürgen Habermas. Revista Brasileira de Estudos Jurídicos, v. 1, p. 77-88, 2006.

HABERMAS, J. Between Facts and Norms. Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy. Translated by William Rehg. The MIT Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts. Second printing, 1996.

A inclusão do outro: estudos de teoria política. 2. ed. São Paulo: Edições Loyola, 2002. Cap. 10.

The teory of communicative Action. Tr. Thomas McCarthy. Boston: Beacon Press. 1999.

Consciência moral e agir comunicativo, Trad. Guido Antônio de Almeida. Rio de Janeiro: Tempo brasileiro, 1989.

WALDRON, Jeremy. Toleration: Is there a paradox? New Your University School of Law. Public Law & Legal Theory Research Paper Series. Working Paper No. 12/75. January 2013.

Law and disagreement. J.C.A. Gaskin ed, Clarendon Press. Oxford Univ. 1999.

Can there be a democratic jurisprudence?" (2008). New York University Public Law and Legal Theory Working Papers. Paper 97.

Introduction: disagreements on justice and rights. 6: 1 Journal of Legislation and Public Policy (2002): 5-10.

The core of case against judicial review. 115: 6 The Yale Law Review (2006): 1346-1406.

Interpreting Law:
Democracy and decision procedures

André Almeida Villani

Abstract: This paper states the relationship between one's conceptions of democracy and specific decision procedures that take place in contemporary western States. In order to do so, this work is based on the conflicting ideas of two authors, Ronald Dworkin and Jeremy Waldron. What these philosophers have in common is that both share the same meta-theory of law, purporting to explain existence of theoretical disagreement in legal reasoning. In other words, there are disagreements about what are the real grounds of law. The latter information is the reason why both philosophers give us a post-positivist account of law, which matches with their conceptions of contemporary democracy. However, they disagree when the subject is decision- procedure: Dworkin is a famous supporter of the judicial review of legislation, while Waldron claims that the final decision, in issues of fundamental rights, should be taken by the Parliament. The grounds of the dissent between these philosophers are exactly the conceptions of democracy advocated by each one of them, which lead to different conclusions about who should interpret the law and how it should be interpreted.

On that basis, this paper is formatted in two main parts. The first one is dedicated to study the different conceptions of democracy, where particular problems are developed, in order to set them out and to compare them, such as: what does it take to an institution to be democratic? What legitimates democracy? And finally, how can individual rights be respected when they conflict with other interests of society? All those questions are, of course, strictly related to each other, and they help us to understand some fundamental criteria to choose between these different conceptions of democracy. The second part, in turn, discusses the two decision procedures mentioned and points out the critics aimed directly to them. At this point, the focus and what links this part to the former is, specially, the possibility to make a decision procedure that satisfies the democratic criteria established before. This paper ends by considering then the conditions for democracy and what is, probably, in account of these conditions, the best decision procedure when rights are taken.

Keywords: Democracy, interpretation, decision procedures.

I. Introduction.

In the few moments H.L.A. Hart uses the word democracy in his most famous book he says that "judges are not usually elected and in a democracy, so it is claimed, only the elected representatives of the people should have law-making powers" (HART, 1994, p. 275). The statement is located on Hart's postscript, where he discusses his theory of positivism after the critics Dworkin has made, especially the ones about the foundations of law, the existence of principles and also the types of disagreements that participants in a legal reasoning process seem to have. Although the debate between these two philosophers is certainly one of the most important dialogues in Jurisprudence's history, the focus of this paper is, in some form, on the ideas proposed by the quote above. In other words, in many democratic States, such as Brazil, Germany and the United States, there is a Supreme Court that has the power to make decisions in hard constitutional cases, while in other States (e.g. England and New Zeland), that are also democratic States, this task is entitled to the Parliament. But the question remains: which system is better considering the democratic principles and its claims? Which of them can in a better way satisfy the conditions imposed by democracy?

To answer this question it is first necessary to demonstrate what we understand as democracy. Obviously this is not an easy task. A great amount of philosophers and political scientists have dedicated their lives to give us an objective answer to that problem. Therefore, what is here demonstrated does not have any purpose to give an absolute answer, but only a partial, although reasonable one, just to make possible the argument on the best decision-procedure in legal reasoning. But, before entering in the material aspect of the problem of defining democracy, I want to give a formal description of interpretative concepts that shall help in the sequence of this text.

Dworkin, as a legal philosopher, has developed a very consistent theory of constitutional interpretation, which is based, mainly, on his view of law itself:

> Of course, law is a social phenomenon. But its complexity, function and consequence all depend on one special feature of its structure. Legal practice, unlike many other social phenomena is, argumentative. Every actor in the practice understands that what it permits or requires depends on the truth of certain propositions that are given sense only by within the practice; the practice con> sists in large part in deploying and arguing about these propositions (DWORKIN, 1986, p. 17).

In that context, Ronald Dworkin proposes an interpretive attitude towards law, because that seems to be the only way to explain the theoretical disagreements that exist in its core. That, briefly described, is the main critic of the american philosopher to Hart's positivist theory that was already mentioned. For the purposes of this paper, it is said that this same attitude can be used towards democracy, once it can also be understood in an argumentative character.

Following Dworkin's thesis, the interpretive attitude has two main assumptions (DWORKIN, 1986, p. 47): (i) the first one, in our case, is that democracy has an objective or a finality, it serves some kind of ultimate purpose and that does not hang on specific descriptions of its rules or working procedures; (ii) besides that, there is the assumption that democracy may not necessarily or exclusively be understood as something that it has always been thought of. On the contrary, it is susceptible to its own purpose. To illustrate this kind of thought, Dworkin uses (DWORKIN, 1986, p. 69) an example formulated by Wittgenstein to show that an institution can remain essentially the same along history, although it can be changed or modified in some shallower aspects as well. He asks us to think in a big and thick rope that is made from a bundle of other small wires, in such a way that any of these wires run along the entire rope. In the end, there is an entire and long rope, but there is no wire that is present in it all along. In other words, the value or purpose of the institution remains along history. However, there is no such figure as a one and only peculiar determining characteristic that can be found and described as a fundamental element. The only possible explanation here is a historical one.

In this same scenery, as a tool to interpretation, one can distinguish concepts from conceptions, and, once more, another metaphor can be used to illustrate this distinction. The debates around democracy usually run in a tree structure (DWORKIN, 1986, p. 70), namely, participants in general agree with the most generic and abstract propositions about democracy and that is the tree's trunk. However, people usually also disagree on the more concrete refinements of these abstract propositions, videlicet, the tree's branches. That interpretive structure is exactly the distinction between concepts and conceptions, according to Dworkin (1986, p. 71), and to expose this structure is to make an argument better. Thereby it follows that the contrast between these two ideas (concepts and conceptions) is not only the level of abstraction, but also the level of normal disagreement towards what is to be interpreted.

Once that this has been said, it becomes easier to build a concept of democracy, or, in other words, abstract propositions about it, which are not usually controversial. Etymology can be useful in this point. Democracy comes from the words demos and kratos. People and power to decide, respectively. In the word itself, then, we can find a very abstract idea of what democracy is, and this idea, that the people must have the power to decide, seems not controversial at all. Perhaps we can go further and say that democracy is a government in which the sovereignty is held by the people. Having defined this concept with abstract propositions, the next step is to turn it more concrete, namely, to establish a conception of democracy, a task that is much more complicated.

II. Conceptions of democracy.

In order to take this next step we will introduce two different conceptions of democracy which were developed by two authors that have led a debate between judicial review of legislation and a Legislative's final decision.

The first conception belongs to Dworkin itself, who happened to be a defender of the judicia review. If we tried to summarize his entire decision theory in a word (act that would be very ungracious, but, at the same time strategic to an introduction to his theory) it would be integrity. Integrity is a principle, just as equity and justice that, on the other hand, have the assumption to condemn incoherence of principles among the acts of a personified State (DWORKIN, 1986, ps. 183/184). In that sense, it turns out that integrity is accepted in a community as a political ideal, because it is part of our political morality to demand from authorities a behavior that is coherent with principles, avoiding, for example, conciliatory solutions in cases where there are matters of principles, giving both parties a mediocre and shallow decision that satisfies partially them both, so the authority agent can excuse himself from facing the problem in its fundaments. In addition to that, this demand, in most of the western legal systems, is also a constitutional demand (DWORKIN, 1986, ps. 184/185), since the constitution itself holds norms that guarantee the equal protection of citizens when they are standing in front of an official waiting for a decision.

In the last paragraph we've used the term community and that deserves a deeper explanation, because that same term, in the language Dworkin uses, has a specific and elemental meaning. In Law's Empire, the American philosopher describes three types of communities (DWORKIN, 1986, p. 208). These models offer, in common, a straight view of general attitudes of the political community members towards each other. Nevertheless, they all show very big differences when compared one to another.

The first one assumes that the members of a determined community treat their associations only as a matter of fact, historically and geographically speaking. This model, however, does not represent a true political community, because there are no effective and embracing enough reasons for a political authority to see its responsibilities towards the people as a moral issue. It is called the model of facts. The second, called the rule's model, assumes that the members of the community accept a general commitment of obeying established rules in a way that is exclusive to this community. It works like a kind of game, in which the players are honest enough to follow the rules, but, at the same time, they are selfish and have their own individual interests. In this case, these players see the commitment to the set of rules just as a simple convention that is limited only to the content of those same rules. There are no subjacent principles which would represent a more abstract and general source of obligation. Finally, the third model is the principle's one. In this case, people agree that, in the same way as in the second model, a shared understanding is needed, but it ought to be wider and more generous than the previous one. The people believe that they are governed by common principles, and not only by rules originated from a political agreement. In other words, it is said that the political rights and duties depend not only in particular decisions taken by political institutions, but also on a scheme of principles that these same decisions ought to assume and consider.

Having this said, Dworkin concludes that only the third model is capable of being a true political community, where responsibilities are taken as personal responsibilities. And that demands that no one shall be excluded or scarified in the name of others. In the same pace, it follows that an individual can be fairly considered responsible for acts of the group. Those propositions can be concentrated in the idea of moral membership in a political community.

This conception of political community is the foundation of Dworkin's constitutional theory and also of his theory of democracy. Starting from the former, that includes the moral reading of the constitution as an interpretation theory, he gives us his conception of democracy, since the constitutional argument is "a debate not about how far democracy should yield to other values, but about what democracy, accurately understood, really is." (DWORKIN, 2005, p. 15). And to understand that, is not to discuss methods of representation, but to understand a philosophical argument about the value or aim of democracy. In this context, Dworkin assumes the argument of the majoritarian premisse, which is a thesis, in his view, about outcomes (and that idea is fundamentally important to our debate):

> (…) it insists that political procedures should be designed so that, at least on important matters, the decision that is reached is the decision that a majority or plurality of citizens favors, or would favor if it had adequate information and enough time for reflection. (DWORKIN, 2005, p. 16)

Against that premise, the American author argues that a majoritarian process is not a definition of democracy and not even a necessary aim of it. In his constitutional conception of democracy, the only reason to defend the majoritarian premise would be a commitment of the people to equality, because that is the foundation of democracy: the attitude from a political institution to dedicate to each of the individuals the same consideration and respect. Therefore, a majoritarian process of decision is not a conditio sine qua non to a democratic regime.

In order to establish this conception of democracy we have already said that the moral membership in the political community is the only way to make it possible, but how are we to conquer this kind of membership? Logically, there are also some conditions to it and they can be separated in three groups (DWORKN, 2005, p. 24).

The first one is a structural set of conditions. This set describes the character of the community in general, and that is why it has an essential historical root that carries sociological traces that the entire community shares, such as a stable territory, a common language and values and so forth. However, this set of conditions it's not as important to us as the others that follow. The second ones are called relation conditions, and they state how must an individual be treated to he or she be considered a moral participant of a determined community, and that is mostly a matter of participation. Everyone must have a voice in the public debate on a decision of the community. Although that is the condition that insists on universal suffrage, Dworkin says (DWORKN, 2005, p. 24) that it does not mean that elections are the only way possible to satisfy this condition, which, above all, shall preserve the freedom of speech. At last, the third set is made of moral independence conditions. In other words, each individual must have the possibility to regard his or hers own choice in a group venture, even when that opinion is not going to change the outcomes at all.

It is then demonstrated that democracy does not require necessarily a majoritarian premise. On the other hand, it is a matter of constitutional arrangement, participation, and specially, equality. Or, as Dworkin, himself, states:

> If the legitimacy of a political arrangement can be improved by constitutional arrangements that create some in equality of impact but carry no taint or danger of indignity, then it would be perverse to rule these measures ou.t That is the fatal weakness of the majoritarian conception. It rightly emphasizes the value of equal impact, but it misunderstands the nature and hence the limits of that value; it compromises the true value at stake, which is positive liberty, by turning equality of impact into a dangerous fetish. (DWORKIN, 2011 p. 392)

The second conception of democracy we want to present here is the one Jeremy Waldron defends, especially in his book Law and Disagreement. Just like Dworkin, Waldron thinks that democracy is compatible with the idea of individual rights, in the sense that there is no trade-off between them. Also following the American philosopher, Waldron uses an interpretive methodology when analyzing law, democracy or any other concept, denying a merely descriptive approach of jurisprudence in the way Hart proposed (WALDRON, 2008, p. 10).

Therefore, one can conclude that Waldron rejects positivism just like Dworkin, but that is not entirely true. Connecting the ideas of jurisprudence and democracy, Waldron goes back to the roots of legal positivism when it was entirely associated with democratic values. As an example, he gives us the work of Jeremy Bentham. That proposition was actually made by Dworkin himself, who, however, observed that the connection between this two ideas has been lost, partially because he thinks in a democracy associated with a right's jurisprudence enforced by judges, but also partially because he thinks that positivists have turned against any sort of political connection with law (WALDRON, 2005, p. 12). Waldron, on the contrary, uses positivism as a starting point for his theory of a democratic jurisprudence, therefore, not denying it entirely.

Apart from that, now focusing in the conception of democracy, Waldron believes that democracy needs very robust fundaments and, because of that, it would be insufficient to say that democracy is just a government of the people in which the people itself can choose their representatives through a majoritarian process. More than that, it also would not be enough to say that democracy should treat anyone as an individual who has fundamental rights which are represented by constitutional principles. Those two premises, in Waldron's believe, it is important to mention, are based on moral grounds, because to take someone as a right-bearer, is to have confidence in that person's moral capacity – his capacity to be responsible when there is a moral relation between his interests and another's.

Completing these two propositions, Waldron adds that there cannot be a democracy unless each individual bare and regularly exercise the right to participate, or, as he calls it, the right of rights (WALDRON, 1999, p. 282). He explains that:

> For me, democracy includes the idea that rulers are chosen by the people whom they rule, the people determine the basis under which they are governed, and the people choose the goals of public policy, the principles of their association, and the broad content of their laws. The people do all this by acting, voting, and deliberating as equals, through elections and through their relations with representatives (WALDRON, 2008, p. 8).

On that basis, Waldron establish a new conception of what Dworkin called a constitutional democracy. Instead of thinking only in a theory oriented especially to the results of a decision, he designs also a theory of democratic means or procedures. Obviously, in the end, what matters most is a democratic result, but, in Waldron's view, the way that result is reached is also included in the idea of democracy. According to him, Dworkin puts his argument in defense of his constitutional democracy theory as a "elision between a decision about democracy and a decision made by democratic means" (WALDRON, 2004, p. 292). And assuming this distinction, Waldron argues that the point he wants to make is that "concerns about the democratic or non-democratic character of a political procedure do not evaporate when the procedure in question is being used to address an issue about the nature of democracy" (WAL-DRON, 2004, p. 293).

At this point, we are able to affirm that Waldron's conception is more focused in a procedural character. But why is that? The answer is what he calls the circumstances of politics (WALDRON, 1999, p. 102). It is an argument based on the same structure of the circumstances of justice, developed by John Rawls, which he describes as "the normal conditions under which human cooperation is both possible and necessary" (RAWLS, 1999, p. 109). The circumstances of politics, however, according to Waldron, means that we all live in disagreements. And by that, he means that people disagree in good faith, that is, for example, we all want to achieve a solution to a problem, but may of us disagree on how are we going to conquer this aim, or even on what that solution exactly is. In other words, we all want to end the disagreement, but as free individuals who have the right of self conviction, we may still disagree. Some may think that an answer to that problem is a kind of deliberative democracy, in which a valid consensus is the key. That consensus must be rational and motivated, that is, it must take place in a public arena (a legislature, for example) where the individuals bare freedom of speech, and so the best argument will naturally prevail. But, as Waldron says that "in the real world, even after deliberation, people will continue to disagree in good faith about the common good, and about the issues of policy, principle, justice, and rights which we expect a legislature to deliberate upon (WALDRON, 2004, p. 93)

Because of that, we can conclude that deliberation will always be embedded in disagreement. And that leads us to the central idea of the circumstances of politics: how can we, individuals, act in a common way in disagreement? Or, how can a course of action be possible in the face of disagreement? Those questions emerge from the bilateral character of the circumstances of politics: firstly, according to Waldron, disagreement would not matter, if there was no urgency for a course of action; and, secondly, this urgency would not give rise to politics as it is known if there was not the potential for disagreement related to this concerted course of action ought to be. Our society, in that way, is a non-well-ordered one.

At this point, Waldron, who has been greatly influenced by Rawls political liberalism, just like Dworkin, takes a step against the ideas of the author of A Theory of Justice. In rawsian's terms, Waldron puts it, "To think – as we have to – about the politics of a society whose members differ radically an in principle about what justice is (…) is to move from ideal (or strict compliance) theory, to non-ideal (partial compliance) theory.". If that is correct, he continues, Rawls's argument is very problematic, because it can not be applied in a society like ours, in which people do not accept the same principles of justice (WALDRON, 1999, p. 158). Our society is deeply emerged in disagreement, including disagreement about principles. Therefore, we must engage in procedural principles.

So, in Waldron's conception, democracy is not only about reaching the best decisions, but also about how do we reach those decisions. The democratic outcomes do not invalidate the democratic importance of the means these outcomes are conquered. And, most important, this conclusion do not come from a normative need of democracy, it comes from the fact that the level of disagreement among citizens is so high, that it reaches the consensus of what is the best decision. There is no consensus.

III. Outcome related reasons and process related reasons.

The arguments that have been until now exposed constitute a solid background for the analysis of the problem stated in this paper. Taking both conceptions of democracy described until now, the main difference between them can be pointed by two types of reasons, outcome-related and process related. Both, Dworkin and Waldron, recognize the existence of those reasons, but their approach to them and, therefore, the role they play in a democratic decision procedure, is different.

As we have seen, Dworkin rejects the majoritarian premise, since it is not fundamental for democracy. In this sense, judicial review of a specific statue enacted by the Parliament, through a majoritarian premise, that declares it unconstitutional, is not anti-democratic at all, as long as this declaration promotes rights and do not interfere in the participation of people (in the sense he defends) in the discourse. However, this conclusion is limited, because it does not provide a positive defense for judicial review. In addition to that, Dworkin (2005, p. 33) argues that democracy is incomplete, because it does not prescribe procedures for testing whether the conditions it demands for this procedures are being attended.

According to him, his moral reading method does not prescribe necessarily, who should take decisions. It remains silent to that question. What to do then? The only way to answer that is by taking results, or outcomes as criteria, whether than procedures or processes (DWORKIN, 2005, p.33). The best one to take those decisions is the one who reaches the best answers.

But in this case, Dworkin's argument is not satisfactory. He admits, in the end, that there is disagreement when deciding who can reach the best answers, and that this is exactly the incomplete character of democracy: it can not provide a procedure do decide that! (DWORKIN, 2005, p. 34). He now takes Waldron premise, and that seems illogical for him to do, once he defends the existence of a right answer and the possibility to reach it in regard of the procedure there is to be chosen. Dworkin ends by taking an already established Constitution (the United States Constitution) that already prescribes an institutional desing, to say, only, that there is no reason to oppose to judicial review of legislation (DWORKIN, 2005, ps. 34/35). This attitude to talk about law, and to talk about the law, without making this contrast, in Dworkin's discourse, has been much criticized, and it can be considered a flaw in his argument (KRAMER, 1999, p. 129).

However, there are at least two arguments that offer a positive defense for judicial review. One is presented at the end of this section, the other is stated on the next one. Before presenting them, nevertheless, it is necessary to present Waldron's view.

In the face of disagreement, Waldron claims that in certain situations a course of action is unavoidable. There is a need for settlement when we disagree about rights. It follows then that a decision-procedure ought to be set up. But how is that possible? He explains that "even though the members of the society we are imagining disagree about rights, they need to share a theory of legitimacy for the decision-procedure that is to settle their disagreement". (WALDRON, 2006. 1371). This, however, must be independent of the disagreement it is suppose to settle, it can not reignite it, otherwise, it would not be good. Having this said, Waldron argues that, although relevant, outcome-related reasons are inconclusive, while process-related reasons truly stand against judicial review (WALDRON, 2006, p. 1375).

The core of the case, when relating to these process-related reasons goes back to legitimacy. It is a fact that we disagree in good faith, but, since we have to take decisions, we must have a process to do it, and what assures that the decision taken must be followed eve by those who do not agree with it, it is the legitimacy of the process. We have already established that in Waldron's conception of democracy, the right of rights, or the right to participate, is fundamental. Therefore, it must be on the basis of the decision-procedure to be followed. Once everyone has participated in this procedure, it is legitimate. But how to do that?

We have already in mind, two models: judicial review or the legislature final decision. It is then a question whether which of them promotes the participation of everyone interested in the decision.

To test both models, Waldron, adopting the point of view of a citizen, asks:

> Why should this bunch of roughly five hundred men and women (members of the legislature) be privileged to decide a question of rights affecting me and a quarter billion others?; (ii) even if I accept the privilege of this five hundred, why wasn't greater weight given to the views of those legislators who agreed with me? (WALDRON, 2006, p. 1387)

The same questions are addressed to Justices. Waldron begins answering that the answer to the first question is the fair election of members of the legislature, which, in most countries, do not take place when Justices are chosen. In his account, fair elections treat each individual equally, respecting the right of rights. To the second question, the answer is the majoritarian premise, because, in order to take each individual's opinion equally, each legislator's opinion must be treated in the same way as the other.

However, that does not bring any advantage to the legislature's final decision. It can be said that judges are chosen or indicated by those who were elected, having, in this way, the same "democratic credentials" as members of the legislature. Waldron know this argument (WALDRON, 2006, p. 1391), but he fails to respond to it. He says that election of members of the parliament is democratically superior to Justice's indirect election, because the formers are usually accountable to their constituents, something that does not happen to judges.

Nevertheless, this argument only presumes that legislators do so. One can not infer that, once a legislator is elected he will vote or participate in law-making by always being accountable to his constituents! There is a logical flaw in this argument: the conclusion of the premise is not obligatory. There are no clear reasons for us to believe that legislators are always faithful or loyal to the ones who voted on them. The correct conclusion is that elections might serve as a legitimate credential to democracy and that opposes nothing to judicial review. Since legislators may or may not be loyal to its constituents, so do judges. In fact, most of the times, it is said that even if a judge or Justice is chosen by a political representative of the people, he must not be always loyal to this representative. On the contrary, the judge must be free, politically speaking, in order to reach decisions that are not always desired by the ones who hold political powers, and that can be taken as a positive argument in favor of judicial review.

In relation to the second answer, the one about the majoritarian premise, if we take the statement made in relation to the first one, it is easy to see that it makes no harm to judicial review as well. If elections do not provide a positive definite and obligatory democratic consequence, both judges and legislators have the same legitimacy. And, if the majoritarian premise is important to democracy (to Dworkin we have already seen, that it is not), there is no difference whether the decision is taken in courts or legislatures, because, both of them vote by following a majoritarian process. In both cases, the proposal which have the most votes is the one to be taken as the final decision.

As follows, what Waldron has argued as being the core of the case against judicial review is, in the end, an argument that favors neither one, nor the other. What lefts, then, is the outcome-related reasons. Nonetheless, these reasons are actually just a part of a broader argument, which we consider to be the key to the question, the argument on moral reasoning as a method of interpretation. Since, in this case, what matters to democracy is the final result, it does have some connection to the method of interpretation of law, which is a determined type of reasoning.

IV - Moral reasoning.

The main problem faced in this paper, so far, has been answered by philosophers in two different ways: one that is based on the who question and the other on the how question. In other words, who should be the one making decisions and how that should be done. The first question, in a narrower view, is our main problem itself, while the second one, although may be part of the problem, takes our horizon a bit further, but for good reasons, because it forces us to go deeper in this research.

In order to answer those questions, they won't be taken as two completely separated subjects, but as parts of a one and only matter and there is no such time or space, in this opportunity, to demonstrate the answer to the how question as a whole, but only where it comes in contact with the who question, which is exactly the part that we want to focus on. We think it is already clear that regarding to law, the interpretive perspective can not be avoided and, because of that, all decisions in all the aspects of law should be taken through an interpretive method. And when we look at all the existent interpretive methods, we reach another giant controversial area in law, which I won't explore right now. Thus, based on the arguments showed in the first parts of this paper, the moral reasoning (understood as an interpretive method), can be taken as one of the best methods to take decisions in law, specially when the criteria is democracy. In fact, this method is taken in account by both main authors discussed in this paper (DWORKIN, 1986, and WALDRON, 2009).

But how does moral reasoning (one of the answer to the how question) connects to the who question? The answer is another question: who can be a moral reasoner?

Waldron says that most of the times it is said that courts are better at moral reasoning than legislatures (WALDRON, 2009, p. 2). In other words, it is said that judges take moral issues more seriously than legislators, who have to face a chaotic majoritarian-procedure. Against that, Jeremy Waldron argues that if the most important issues concerning individual and minority rights have to be addressed directly as moral issues, just like he and Dworkin advise, we might well think that courts aren't the best institutional forums where the final decision ought to be taken, because, although judicial reasoning about rights is indispensable, it may not be the right answer when a moral phase is considered (WALDRON, 2009, p. 14). He thinks that those issues may be better conducted through settings where they will not be compromised by "doctrines, precedents, texts, and interpretation" (WALDRON, 2009, p. 14), characteristics that are intrinsic to legal reasoning, which may, however, compromise moral reasoning. Waldron even gets to use the expression "contaminated moral reasoning" (WALDRON, 2009, p. 15) to describe judicial reasoning.

On the other hand, he says that an ideal legislative type of reasoning does not have to face such obstacles, because it is a way of reasoning in the name of the whole society that is not constrained prima facie:

> (It) is different from a court's obligation to reconcile its decision with previous decisions on the same and similar issues. Mostly, legislators are in a position to reason about moral issues directly, on the merits. Members of the legislature speak directly to the issues involved, in a way that is mostly undistracted by legal doc> trine or precedents. (WALDRON, 2009, p. 19)

In brief, this latter type of legal reasoning can be described as made by representatives of the whole society, elected on a basis that treats all individuals as equals (one fundamental aspect of a democracy), who also vote and reason in a direct way as equals. This argument can easily be addressed to common law systems, where there is no written constitution, specially regarding to the precedents which, in this sense, are supposed to work as a filter to an effective type of moral reasoning. But Waldron believes that the same argument can be used in systems where a written constitution is present, because, in this case, the type of moral reasoning used by courts members will not be based on a fresh look at the issues (WALDRON, 2009, p. 21). It will only be moral in the sense to reconcile what is thought as moral with what has been already thought as moral by the society and, therefore, established in the constitution's text. Thus, it wouldn't be an authentic kind of moral reasoning like the one we are searching for.

Finally, Waldron concludes that questions about rights, which are subjected to the controversy regarding judicial review, are not, in most of the times, issues of interpretation (WALDRON, 2009, p. 22). In his view, they only present themselves as such. In fact, these questions should better be treated as practical and political matters than actual interpretive issues.

Although Waldron's argument might sound very convincing and well elaborated, it does have some weak points that, in our view, compromise the defense of legislatures when the subject is fundamental decisions about rights. We will start with the types of reasonings that can be extracted from his argument. In his work, he says that decisions involving fundamental rights should be taken as moral issues, therefore, moral reasoning should be the method through which the problems ought to be interpreted.

However, moral reasoning is inserted in a more generic type of reasoning: legal reasoning. Inside this genre, besides moral reasoning, there is a type of reasoning that states the abilities to find and to apply law (WALDRON, 2009, p. 14). This division in legal reasoning has been historically carried out by positivists in very different ways, but Waldron, in this case, just like Dworkin, holds a post-positivist position. He believes that the best view on legal reasoning is the one that considers that finding, applying and (morally) interpreting law are many parts of a hole and that they can not be well isolated or distinguished one from another. It is practically impossible to say when a jurist is finding, applying or interpreting, even morally, the law, and when he is not, or when is doing only one of these tasks. Thus, we reach the conclusion that moral reasoning is legal reasoning.

Nonetheless, when attacking judicial review, Waldron seems to forget this fact. He thinks judges, because they have to face doctrine, precedents, texts and even interpretation, might not morally reason in a good or authentic way. Well, facing doctrine, precedents and texts is a very important facet of legal reasoning, because all of these are aspects of the language and, more importantly, aspects (or sources, in a more traditional vocabulary) of the legal discourse. And interpreting these and all other aspects of the discourse may be considered the main facet of legal reasoning! Furthermore, interpretation itself can not be considered an obstacle to moral reasoning, in fact, it can not even be considered an aspect of the legal discourse, it is, instead, the base or foundation for any kind of discourse, it is the process through which discourse itself is created.

The idea of discourse takes us to the next argument presented by Waldron: that judges, specially in systems where there are written constitutions, never have the possibility to face moral issues with a fresh look. But what is a fresh look? And how this idea is related to the idea of discourse? Waldron does not give us a philosophical answer, he says that a fresh look is the one free from commitments, that in our view, as already stated, can be considered legal commitments, because they are related to aspects of the legal discourse. In that sense, a fresh look towards a moral issue would be the one that holds no commitments to these aspects. Again, Waldron seems to run away from an interpretive perspective which he, in earlier moments, claim to adopt. There is no fresh look. The discourse in general, as well as the legal discourse, never starts from nowhere. There is always a commitment or influence of some historical kind. One can not be considered someone free from these linguistic commitments or influences. A discourse does not start from a "fresh" environment. There is always a linguistic and historical background. In addition to that, as long as we are considering moral reasoning as our interpretive method, we must pay attention that moral reasoning itself demands a kind of historical commitment to the community where the decision is to be taken and that does not mean precedents or historical propositions can not change, it means that they must, at least, be considered and, therefore, interpreted during the decision process.

At last, in relation to the point that issues regarding judicial review should be treated as political or practical ones, instead of interpretive issues, despite of Waldron's sayings, our conclusion can not be different: issues that are related to decision taking processes, especially when fundamental rights are at sake, must not be treated as merely political, because of the inherent interpretive character of law.

There is, then, no reason to believe that judges are bad at moral reasoning, because legal reasoning itself includes the former. Legislatures, on the other hand, have obstacles to face when using moral reasoning. Waldron tried to expose obstacles faced by judges, that, in the end, were proved to be linguistic commitments intrinsic to legal discourse, and therefore, to legal reasoning and to moral reasoning, while the truth is that legislators are the ones who have to face real obstacles. The commitments taken by legislators with the ones who have elected them and with other officials in order to participate in the political processes are not commitments based on aspects of legal reasoning or in the legal discourse. They are, in fact, external commitments, which do not have any kind of relation to moral reasoning. However, these same commitments have influence on the result of the decision process, because they reflect in the choice of arguments used by legislators. And, unfortunately, the practical procedures used in parliaments, most of the times, do not prevent those influenced arguments to take place.

IV. Conclusion.

We have seen that just like law, democracy must be analyzed through an interpretive attitude and, within that, moral reasoning has been pointed (including by both authors in here discussed) as one of the best methods when the issues are related to fundamental rights. In the same pace, we have established the concept of democracy and a conception of democracy that contains the propositions that all individuals, understood as participants, shall be treated as equals, who integrate a system of rights formed by rules and by constitutional principles. Moral reasoning, therefore, must be used in order to reach the best decisions, considering all individuals as equals.

In addition, we have also demonstrated that, despite the importance of the results, procedures shall also be considered, but only to guarantee those results, since process-related reasons do not give us any motives to choose courts or legislatures as the best forums for decision-making.

Thus, confronting Waldron's arguments on attacking judicial review, we have argued that the interpretive character can never be left aside and that legislators have to face obstacles that come from outside the legal discourse, and, hence, outside legal reasoning, which is something that should be avoided in the decision-processes. To the question in relation to who must take decision on fundamental rights, the conclusion, then, can be no other than that judges are the ones, because they are more settled on the legal discourse, since they have stronger commitments to its aspects.

References.

DWORKIN, Ronald. Freedom's Law: the moral reading of the american constitution. Oxford University Press, 2005.

DWORKIN, Ronald. Justice for Hedgehogs. Oxford University Press, 2011.

DWORKIN, Ronald. Law's Empire. Harvard Unuversity Press, 1986.

HART, Herbert Lionel Adolphus. The Concept of Law. Oxford University Press, 1994.

KRAMER, Matthew H. In Defense of Legal Positivism: law without trimmings. Oxford University Press, 1999.

RAWLS, John. A Theory of Justice. Harvard University Press, 1999.

WALDRON, Jeremy. Can There Be a Democratic Jurisprudence?. Public Law and Legal Theory Research Papers Series, Working Paper no. 08-35, 2008.

WALDRON, Jeremy. Judges as Moral Reasoners. Oxford University Press, 2009.

WALDRON, Jeremy. Law and Disagreement. Oxford University Press, 1999.

Transitional justice and Brazilian amnesty law:
A study on their democratic legitimacy

Ronaldo Louzada Bernardo Segundo[1]
Adriano Sant'Ana Pedra[2]

Abstract: This study aims to discuss the democratic legitimacy of a legal instrument on the political transition that took place after the last dictatorship period in Brazil, between the years 1964 and 1985. It approaches from the theoretical framework established by Friedrich Müller, in "Who are the people?" in order to evaluate the validity of the Brazilian Amnesty Law. Based on the analysis of the essential concepts to understanding the subject, such as amnesty, transitional justice and political crimes, the study discusses the different historical experiences lived on different countries to demonstrate the diversity of solutions to address the questions posed by the need for political transition societies different from its historical, cultural and political and, thereby, demonstrate that the solution found by the Brazilian society is the result of its peculiarities, not deserving reproach from the comparison with other solutions found by other societies.

Keywords: Amnesty; democracy; transitional justice.

1. Introduction

The last three decades of the 20th century served as backdrop for deep political changes around the world; as one of the most important results, democracy took over authoritarian political model in many countries.

[1] Master in Fundamental Rights and Guarantees (Faculdade de Direito de Vitória – FDV). Lawyer. E-mail: ronaldosegundo@hotmail.com. Curriculum Vitae: http://lattes.cnpq.br/0109049271076413.

[2] PhD in Constitutional Law (Pontifícia Universidade Católica de São Paulo – PUC/SP). Master in Fundamental Rights and Guarantees (Faculdade de Direito de Vitória – FDV). Professor of Constitutional Law at Faculdade de Direito de Vitória – FDV (bachelor, master and doctoral program). E-mail: adrianopedra@fdv.br. Curriculum Vitae: http://lattes.cnpq.br/0637600349096702.

It is no exaggeration to affirm that each society had chosen its own unique path to allow the political transition to occur, however it is also possible to point out similarities in their processes.

Among these similarities, one is the object of this work: finding the answer to the question of how to accommodate the newly created democratic structure components of antagonistic political groups basically divided on those who support the former authoritarian regime and their opponents, a question whose relevance becomes greater when one considers the fact that in these countries have routinely occurred disrespects of human rights.

The analysis of the proposed theme demands the comprehension of at least three essential concepts, without which is not possible to understand the thesis defended: amnesty, transitional justice and political crimes.

2. Amnesty

There is almost no controversy about the nature of amnesty as an instrument to promote the oblivion of legal offenses committed, inclusive when derived by etymological analysis of the world.

If there are relevant controversies, they are focused on the possibility of granting amnesty to common crimes as history reveals that the institute emerged from the need to resolve mainly political issues, which is not sufficient by itself to rule out its use in case of crimes of another nature – including common crimes.[3] [4] [5]

By the other hand, amnesty presupposes the existence of a crime expressly typified and manifests itself through a sovereign political choice to promote forgiveness despite the fact committed, as it had never occurred, still being a legal institute able to make its way in the political field, therefore it is a decision of the holder of political power to choose the facts to be amnestied.

---

[3] PRADO, Luiz Regis. Curso de direito penal brasileiro: parte geral. São Paulo: Revista dos Tribunais, 2006. p. 722.

[4] VIEIRA, Vanderson Roberto. Anistia no direito penal. Disponível em: <http://www.faimi.edu.br/v8/RevistaJuridica/Edicao6/ANISTIA%20-%20vanderson.pdf>. Acesso em: 31 mar. 2011.

[5] PERRONE-MOISÉS, Claudia. Leis de anistia em face do direito internacional: desaparecimentos e direito à verdade. In: PIOVESAN, Flávia (Coord.). Direitos humanos, globalização econômica e integração regional. São Paulo: Max Limonad, 2002. p. 285-305.

3. Transitional Justice

It is possible to conceptualize transitional justice as a field of research destined to examine how different societies face issues related to "[...] legacy of human rights abuses, mass atrocities or other forms of severe social trauma, which includes genocide and civil war, intending to build a more peaceful and democratic future".[6]

Activity that aims to investigate the past, assign responsibilities and also find ways to punish the guilty of disrespecting human rights, its main purposes are to provide the victims of violent or arbitrary actions of the state or of others human rights violators, to pacify society by eliminating tensions among opposite political groups and to provide the establishment of political instruments to prevent the recurrence of past events.[7]

Each of these purposes is directly related to different standards of legal responses to the history of disrespects of human rights: punishment, pacification and the search for truth, graduating from the elements highlighted and the inexistence of finding the right pure solutions, a set of triangular solution models for the question.[8]

The finding of the absence of the aforementioned "pure solutions" is essential in that it reinforces the belief there are numerous paths to be traversed by different societies that face the challenges of transitional justice, each endowed with such a high number of variables that seems impossible affirm the possibility of replication or the superiority of one model over the other.

---

[6] MEZAROBBA, Glenda. O que é justiça de transição: uma análise do conceito a partir do caso brasileiro. In SOARES, Inês Virgínia Prado; KISHI, Sandra Akemi Shimada (Coord.). Memória e verdade: a justiça de transição no Estado Democrático brasileiro. Belo Horizonte: Fórum, 2009. p. 37-53.

[7] MEZAROBBA, Glenda. O que é justiça de transição: uma análise do conceito a partir do caso brasileiro. In SOARES, Inês Virgínia Prado; KISHI, Sandra Akemi Shimada (Coord.). Memória e verdade: a justiça de transição no Estado Democrático brasileiro. Belo Horizonte: Fórum, 2009. p. 37-53.

[8] DIMOULIS, Dimitri. Justiça de transição e função anistiante no Brasil: hipostasiações indevidas e caminhos de responsabilização. In: DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Antonio; SWENSSON JUNIOR; Lauro Joppert (Coord.). Justiça de transição no Brasil: direito, responsabilização e verdade. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2010. p. 91-127.

4. Political Crimes

The main difference between common and political crimes consists in the fact that the political, unlike the common, are not theoretically practiced for selfish reasons, but rather to influence decisions concerning the exercise of power characterized as a radical modality of political participation in situations where the ordinary paths to take part in political decisions are blocked to opponents and dissidents.[9]

Political crimes can be analyzed from at least two criteria: objective and subjective. In the first, the definition is based on the legal object effectively threatened or injured, restricting the recognition of such nature of acts against the political body; in the second, the focus is the goal pursued by the agent, which if it has a political character, his acts will assume this quality no matter the characteristics of the goods threatened or harmed.[10]

Arguments that deny political acts committed by state agents fail to consider the existence of doctrinal elements able to justify the assignment of such nature to the aforementioned acts.

5. Brazilian Amnesty

During the process of redemocratization that followed the last dictatorship period, the amnesty issue has became more important than ever in the long history of Brazilians amnesties and it echoed deeply into society.

Surrounded by controversy – specially because of granting amnesty to public agents involved in the repression of regime opponents – the Amnesty Law allowed the return home of many expats living overseas for years and, despite the criticism it suffered, it was reaffirmed by the Constitutional Amendment that convened the National Constituent Assembly, responsible for drafting a new constitution.

Since then the discussion concerning the validity of the Amnesty Law has been increasing and reaching unprecedented significance in recent years. On one hand, it had lined up proponents of the thesis that amnesty law was wrested by the military dictatorship, causing its il-legitimacy by lack of democratic representation, enhanced by the existence of amnesty law established for public officials involved in torture, despite the violation of the obligations assumed by Brazil to combat this kind of practice; on the other hand, it lined up those who advocate amnesty as an instrument to promote social peace and understand it to be essential to allow democracy transition and the consolidation of new political institutions.

[9] SILVA, Carlos A. Canedo Gonçalves. Crimes políticos. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 1993. p. 55.

[10] SILVA, Carlos A. Canedo Gonçalves. Crimes políticos. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 1993. p. 55.

In order to understand the process of political transition, which one of the main points was the granting of amnesty, is necessary to remember that throughout the period of military rule always existed disputes among different political-military groups, fueled by differences over the conduct of the "revolutionary process".[11]

Such groups were not easily identifiable and neither were made up of factions clearly separated; trying to set in black and white the political arrangement may seem inglorious task, although it is possible to affirm the existence of two extremes between which revolved all that in any way had a voice in policy decisions of the military government.

This dynamic was present form the beginning to the end fo military rule and the result os clashes between different groups was always a point to be considered when it was necessary to take important decisions by generals-presidents who occupied the head of the Executive Branch in the period.

6. Wrested Amnesty

The claims about the amnesty established by Law n. 6.683/79 having been wrested by military dictatorship[12] [13] [14] [15] do not consider

[11] MARTINS FILHO, João Roberto. 40 anos depois. In: REIS, Daniel Aarão; RIDENTI, Marcelo; SÁ MOTTA, Rodrigo Patto (Coord.). O golpe e a ditadura militar: 40 anos depois (1964-2004). Bauru: Edusc, 2004. p. 125-140

[12] GAGNEBIN, Jeanne Marie. O preço de uma reconciliação extorquida. In: TELES, Edson; SAFATLE, Vladimir (Coord.). O que resta da ditadura. São Paulo: Boitempo Editorial, 2010. p. 177-186.

[13] NOHARA, Irene Patrícia. Direito à memória e reparação: da inclusão jurídica das pessoas perseguidas e torturadas na ditadura militar brasileira. Revista de Direito Constitucional, São Paulo, n. 67, p. 125-159, abr./jun. 2009.

[14] BICUDO, Hélio. Anistia desvirtuada. Revista brasileira de Ciências Criminais, São Paulo, n. 53, p. 88-97, mar./abr. 2005.

[15] ALVES, Márcio Moreira. Teotônio, guerreiro da paz. São Paulo: Vozes, 1983. p. 169.

essential elements for understanding the dynamics of the process that resulted on its approval.

Similarly, statements about the lack of legitimacy of Congress to vote and approve the measure, which according to critics it responded to the interests of the state agents who failed to account for their illegal actions during exception.[16] [17]

Similarly, complaints regarding the lack of legitimacy that could be called "popular" – as opposed to the one that would be called "politics".

First of all, there are good reasons for credit to several popular groups the initiative of claim by amnesty – with special emphasis to the student movement – since the mid-1970s.

The claim of having been amnesty wrested fails to consider the previously mentioned bitter struggle for the leadership of conduction of the military regime, in which were involved supporters of institutional nomalization (which amnesty was an essential element) and the other different groups interested in maintaining government dictatorial (which were radically opposed to any amnesty proposal).

To understand the issue and try to find a satisfactory answer to the question concerning the validity of the Amnesty Law, it is important to verify if its approval answers the wishes of a significant portion of the population, even within the limits imposed by the historical context then lived.

At this point, it is necessary to discuss the theoretical framework formulated by Friedrich Muller in his book "Who are the people?", going beyond what is written in the Constitution, once the author's goal is to establish the criteria to identify the different roles played by the members of this great community called people, and that can be applied to any situation. Such analysis is necessary to try to demonstrate if the model of transitional justice adopted in Brazil is endowed with "popular" legitimacy.

---

[16] ARAÚJO, Maria Paula Nascimento. A luta democrática contra o regime militar na década de 1970. In: REIS, Daniel Aarão; RIDENTI, Marcelo; SÁ MOTTA, Rodrigo Patto (Coord.). O golpe e a ditadura militar: 40 anos depois (1964-2004). Bauru: Edusc, 2004. p. 161-175.

[17] LEMOS, Renato. Anistia e crise política no Brasil pós-1964. Topoi, Rio de Janeiro, p. 287-313, dez. 2002.

6.1. Who are the people?

In order to answer the question objectively and scientifically grounded, Friedrich Muller outlined four distinct concepts that can be attributed to the word "people", demonstrating how each of them fits a certain reality, providing subsidies for the understanding of the topic.

6.1.1 Active people

The success of the French revolutionary process of 1789 brought the need to justify the exercise of power by the victorious. It was grounded in theories related to the divine until it faces a process of change which displaces the Crown – and God – as the bases of sovereignty to base it on an element which had not yet played such prominent role in political science: people.

Once identified with the electorate, the active people is the starting point for validity of all the state legal system. Although the association with democracies is more common, the fact is that even dictatorships make use of such association in order to legitimize the exercise of power.

The idea of active people respond to the need to establish a starting point for individual compliance to social rules, avoiding opened debate on the subject to comply with the determinations of any authority, solving two problems at once: the question of legitimacy of power combined with abandonment of any kind of metaphysical justification for submission to it.

6.1.2 The people as a global instance of legitimation

Here the term people takes a new meaning due to the interruption of the cycle of legitimation, no longer acting directly but represented by public officials.

This idea is therefore a necessity in modern states in which the exercise of power occurs indirectly through representatives an in which decisions can only be exercised through extensive professional and specialized paperwork, holder of portions of state power.

6.1.3 The people recipient of civilizing benefits of state

Alongside the role of "active" and "legitimizing" the people still plays another, which Muller calls "civilizational recipient of benefits".

Absent the people, it would not be possible to speak of the state – at least not according to the theoretical basis that has being adopted for this concept since the Peace of Westphalia – following from this fact the need, on the other hand, to ensure the people effectiveness of fundamental rights.

6.1.4 The icon people

The people appointed as an icon is to justify the attitudes of those in power, however that actually does not legitimize anything, being a mere instrument of justification of the measures taken, serving only as a symbol just as the religious icons (pictures, flags, banners etc.) used to be carried by the ancient armies: nothing more than an attempt to show the approval of the deity to the designs of individual rulers.

In the name of this new divinity, policies are made and actions are performed, however the divinity is never consulted. Most often it is not even informed of the decisions that are taken and it becomes aware of them only when it gets affected by the results.

Elections, popular consultations, as well as public and "spontaneous" demonstrations on the part of the population are instruments who use notorious detractors of democracy to demonstrate that represent the "people", which does not cease to be true, if consider the people mentioned here the "people" icon, resulting from the work of "creating" the people, including, when necessary, through violent practices, such as [...], resettlement, expulsion, settlement and more recently also by 'ethnic cleaning', a barbarian neologism to denote the old barbaric practice."[18]

In other situations, the iconization do not occur ostensibly, but covertly; existing distinct and opposing groups in a given political reality, each trying to accuse those who hold the opposite position this negative designation. In such situations it is possible to make a parody with the author and to redo the question that baptizes his work in the following terms: who are the people icon?

---

[18] MÜLLER, Friederich. Quem é o povo? A questão fundamental da democracia. São Paulo: Max Limonad, 1998. p. 67-68.

6.1.5 The icon is always the other one

The accurate analysis of F. Muller shows that it is possible to understand "the people" by different concepts, each occupying a different dimension, showing that the desire of any person or group has or aspires to exercise political power is present to itself as a representative of "the people" in its positive aspects.

On the other hand, it does not seem to be credible that any person or group who has or aspires to exercise state power want to see their power connected to the idea of people icon concept that should always be reserved for those who do not share their political beliefs in order to, first, take away from this group – this 'other' that is different – any possibility of legitimacy and, second, to ensure this legitimacy only to himself.

It can be concluded that there is an irresistible temptation to those who somehow struggle for power – and even stronger when the power is exercised from convictions strongly ideologized – to confer themselves the role of active people, as the opponents keep the function of mere icon.

During the last military government the two warring sides repeatedly tried to assign the nature of icon to that portion of the population that demonstrated to be contrary to their ideals, keeping to themselves the exclusive role of representative of the popular will.

Today, those who try to invalidate the Amnesty Law always deny the existence of popular support for its approval, as well as deny historical facts that point out to a root eminently popular of the movement that leads to the Amnesty Law and reject to assign to those engaged in the fight the title of active people.

The aforementioned origin is enough popular to recognize those who struggle and have risked in favor of amnesty project the role of active people. To do so, it would be sufficient to adapt Muller's ideas about this dimension of the people to a reality that is not exactly the one imagined by him when developing his theory.

Muller refers to the role of active people within a democratic environment, even though this was not the situation in Brazil at the time. Instead of serving as an obstacle to the recognition of the role of active people who took part in the campaigns in favor of amnesty, the political environment should be recognized as a factor to increase the value of their actions; in dictatorships, political participation is discouraged or severely repressed and take position against the permitted by those who wield power demand greater deal of courage and commitment.

Despite all the risks involved, it was just within society that amnesty project started and grew. Later on, it was taken over by the government as an instrument to make easier the political transition, representing a situation that is not enough to delegitimize the validity, as it will be shown bellow.

6.2. The Struggle For Amnesty

Long before the adoption of the amnesty law, voices were heard calling for the granting of an amnesty to allow the return to Brazil for a large number of exiled and banished, as well as to release those who had been imprisoned for their political activities.

These first signs emerged from the family of the political prisoners and they had a great impact as government promoted a slow increase in political freedom known as Abertura, which allowed claims once forgotten by the media to be broadcast, as well as gave opposition politicians the necessary enthusiasm to hold the thesis of amnesty.

Although the country was far from experiencing a democracy, it was due to popular action, with special emphasis on those organizations whose names referred to targets proposed to achieve with their activities – among others, the Movement for Amnesty and Female Brazilian Amnesty Committees – the process that resulted in the adoption of the amnesty law began.

Despite the peculiarities of that time, it is clear that because of the actions of ordinary people – apart from the possibility of attributing those who supported the campaign in favor of amnesty one purely iconic nature – the possibility of political action was reintroduced in national life.

References

ALEXY, Robert. Derecho injusto, retroactividad y principio de legalidad penal: la doctrina del Tribunal Constitucional Federal Alemán sobre los homicidios cometidos por los centinelas del Muro de Berlin.

Disponível em: <http://biblioteca.universia.net/html_bura/ficha/params/title/derecho-injusto-retroactividad-principio-legalidad-penal-doctrina-tribunal-constitucional-federal/id/42167421.html>. Acesso em: 3 out. 2011.

ALVES, Márcio Moreira. Teotônio, guerreiro da paz. São Paulo: Vozes, 1983.

ARAÚJO, Maria Paula Nascimento. A luta democrática contra o regime militar na década de 1970. In: REIS, Daniel Aarão; RIDENTI, Marcelo; SÁ MOTTA, Rodrigo Patto (Coord.). O golpe e a ditadura militar: 40 anos depois (1964-2004). Bauru: Edusc, 2004.

BICUDO, Hélio. Anistia desvirtuada. Revista brasileira de Ciências Criminais, São Paulo, n. 53, p. 88-97, mar./abr. 2005.

DIMOULIS, Dimitri. Justiça de transição e função anistiante no Brasil: hipostasiações indevidas e caminhos de responsabilização. In: DIMOULIS, Dimitri; MARTINS, Antonio; SWENSSON JUNIOR; Lauro Joppert (Coord.). Justiça de transição no Brasil: direito, responsabilização e verdade. São Paulo: Saraiva, 2010.

GAGNEBIN, Jeanne Marie. O preço de uma reconciliação extorquida. In: TELES, Edson; SAFATLE, Vladimir (Coord.). O que resta da ditadura. São Paulo: Boitempo Editorial, 2010.

LEMOS, Renato. Anistia e crise política no Brasil pós-1964. Topoi, Rio de Janeiro, p. 287-313, dez. 2002.

MARTINS FILHO, João Roberto. 40 anos depois. In: REIS, Daniel Aarão; RIDENTI, Marcelo; SÁ MOTTA, Rodrigo Patto (Coord.). O golpe e a ditadura militar: 40 anos depois (1964-2004). Bauru: Edusc, 2004.

MEZAROBBA, Glenda. O que é justiça de transição: uma análise do conceito a partir do caso brasileiro. In SOARES, Inês Virgínia Prado; KISHI, Sandra Akemi Shimada (Coord.). Memória e verdade: a justiça de transição no Estado Democrático brasileiro. Belo Horizonte: Fórum, 2009.

MÜLLER, Friederich. Quem é o povo? A questão fundamental da democracia. São Paulo: Max Limonad, 1998.

NOHARA, Irene Patrícia. Direito à memória e reparação: da inclusão jurídica das pessoas perseguidas e torturadas na ditadura militar brasileira. Revista de Direito Constitucional, São Paulo, n. 67, p. 125-159, abr./jun. 2009.

PERRONE-MOISÉS, Claudia. Leis de anistia em face do direito internacional: desaparecimentos e direito à verdade. In: PIOVESAN, Flávia (Coord.). Direitos humanos, globalização econômica e integração regional. São Paulo: Max Limonad, 2002.

PRADO, Luiz Regis. Curso de direito penal brasileiro: parte geral. São Paulo: Revista dos Tribunais, 2006.

SILVA, Carlos A. Canedo Gonçalves. Crimes políticos. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 1993.

TELES, Edson. Entre justiça e violência: estado de exceção nas democracias do Brasil e da África do Sul. In: TELES, Edson; SAFATLE, Vladimir (Coord.). O que resta da ditadura. São Paulo: Boitempo Editorial, 2010.

TELES. Edson Luis de Almeida. Brasil e África do Sul: os paradoxos da democracia: memória política em democracias com herança autoritária. p. 103. Disponível em: < www.teses.usp.br/.../8/.../TESE_EDSON _L_ALMEIDA_TELES.pdf>. Acesso em: 3 out. 2011.

VIEIRA, Vanderson Roberto. Anistia no direito penal. Disponível em: <http://www.faimi.edu.br/v8/RevistaJuridica/Edicao6/ANISTIA%20-%20vanderson.pdf>. Acesso em: 31 mar. 2011.

ZILLI, Marcos. O último tango? In: SOARES, Inês Virgínia Prado; KISHI, Sandra Akemi Shimada (Coord.). Memória e verdade: a justiça de transição no Estado Democrático brasileiro. Belo Horizonte: Fórum, 2009.

State power legitimacy in Brazilian democracy

Luciana Cristina de Souza[1]

Abstract: This article debates about resilience principle, imported for us from Physics with the intention to use this concept to equalize the relationship between State and Civil Society inside de Rule of Law, but not cloistered for it. Under our point of view, Law borns in the middle of the political and official branches, but also it comes from Society too, composing its dual aspect. We do not use classical bibliography about State power for this essay because in this new approach concerning democracy we want to understand the cooperative interaction between official branches and Citizens mediated by Law like a boundary issue, which is marked by the conceptions of "essentiality" and "resilience" of social and political structures. The resilience principle is, for us, a condition to establish a parameter for evaluating the quality of democracy in Brazil nowadays, once it is a way to measure State power legitimacy, which one is measure, in its turn, by the quality of Citizenship. If the Citizens do not have democratic access, if they can not be cooperative with the State in the public discussions, they are not true Citizens, because the boundary between State and Society is stiffened. Resilience is the opposite of that, it represents flexibility with stability in the relationship between State and Society (Citizens), since this principle aims to maintain a balance between the essential elements of Rule of Law and the growing demand by inclusive democracy in Brazil today. In fact, without inclusion of all Citizens, they will become "Sub-citizens", speechless and the State will not be legitimate. This balance between this two subjects, State and Civil Society (Citizens), are imperative to actual Brazilian democracy.

Keywords: Brazil; Citizenship; Democracy; Legitimacy; Resilience

[1] Doctorate Degree in Law at Catholic University of Minas Gerais (2012); Master Degree in Sociology at Federal University of Minas Gerais (2005); Professor of Sociology of Law at Milton Campos Law School, Nova Lima (Minas Gerais); Professor at IBS, certified by Fundação Getúlio Vargas, Belo Horizonte (Minas Gerais); Researcher of National Council of Research (CNPq), in Brazil; Associeted to the National Council of Research about Law (CONPEDI), in Brazil, and to the International Sociological Association (ISA); Lawyer. E-mail: dralucianacsouza@gmail.com

1 Brazilian democracy today - A brief profile

Nowadays, in Brazil, democracy is been redefined. Despite its greek inspiration and the Enlightenment principles, today our meanings for categories as "individual", "State", "popular participation", "responsivity" and "rationality" are very different than traditional studies showed, they are more deliberative and it demands new capacities from official branches before the Citizen needs of effective participation in public decisions. The individual is a new category because he represents itself and, at the same time, a fragmented group created by social networks like Facebook and Twitter that influences his behavior (HALPERN, 2013; PARENTE, 2007), which are very important in Brazilian political and social context due to their amplitude and cost. Our country has serious problems of education and information access – according 2012 International Seminar "Regulation of Public Communication" speakers, hosted in Brazil, few families, about only six, behest 70% of our media – and tools like those could open to Citizens different ways to interact, to show their opinions and to organize actions with other people to improve their Citizenship and solve social issues.

This new reality it is very different than previous notions of social movements in Brazil. How explain William César Castilho Pereira (2001) and José de Souza Martins (2000), because they was supported by strong identity of groups – students, unions, associations, etc. – that guaranteed their way of fight for recognition in a very particular manner, they use to defended mostly private and particular interests longed for their group, because their interaction depended on their similar identity one to another. The traditional social movements are much institutionalized too, and some of them, like unions and non-governmental organizations, have internal struggles by power and receive financial support from public funds, which causes interference of the State in many of its decisions (for example, art. 149, Constitution of Federative Republic of Brazil, 1988, and art. 9º, Federal Rule n. 9.790, 1999).

Nowadays, plurality is emphasized and there are social nets that exchange information and resources together solving some financial problems caused by State dependency of social movements which imposed obligations in the past. The net organization of Citizens in Brazil empowers day by day the individual and social movements providing them with real time information and funds for actions. The plural and diverse net condition also enables transversal interests, like environmental and public services quality. Many people do not go to civil organizations anymore, however answers immediately to invitations posted in social networks to participate in public protests. Today, the social media has a lot of potential to give more overture to public debates, access to information and to amplify democratic deliberation (HALPERN, 2013). There is a new subjectivity of Brazilian Citizens that began with internet interaction (PARENTE, 2007).

This new organization permits empower group efforts, get more resources for the social conflicts with State and also the quickly exchange of important informations, like we said. But, if the individual it is no more a ordinary figure distinct of the group like traditional studies emphasized, mainly after the researches about human agency in the XX century promoted specially by Anthony Giddens (1979), he is no more a particular universe how used to be in Liberalism. He is one subject in a net and his kind of interaction it is shared, global, has multiple faces and is instable in a certain way, what is one of the main causes that currently difficult the performance of governments and his Law. Because of this, we need define new boundaries between State power and Citizen participation, boundaries that conserve the "essentiality" of the Rule of Law that assure fundamental rights against particular interests and, also, that could be "resilient" before the real and actual demand by cooperative public decisions, what means, inclusive democracy.

How to do that?

1.1 Connect people

Zygmunt Bauman (2007) call this moment of history the "liquid time", because the human relations assume a great importance, but a constant and fast process of transformation of institutions to attend the new social demands causes instability. We feel that phenomenon when we observe the struggle situation between State and Civil Society in Brazil and in others countries in order to provide these demands. Today individuals all over the world are connected and this new relationship using the virtual space and the facilities of communication offers conditions to individuals sustain their particular existence at the same moment they shared the experiences inside a plural and virtual environment. An individual connected behavior is so unlike a individual modern behavior – the word "modern" is used here to indicate the period of rationality in the first centuries after the Enlightenment process – that we need other categories to study this new condition in social life. And the redefinition of State, democracy and Law is essential, in this new context of virtual condition, to understand better what happens in human relations and what one define like "legitimacy" nowadays. Notedly State legitimacy in front of this new individual that constitutes our Civil Society.

In Brazilian democracy currently there is a fundamental concern on State power legitimacy because popular participation had a meaning improvement in the last decades, especially with internet growth in the country since information is really necessary to exercise Citizenship and, in the last years, have become widely available whereby, for example, transparency portals through which Citizens can monitor government activities (SOUZA, 2008). The Brazilian Civil Society assumed central role after 90's, which was a political struggle period for the democratization due to the end of the military dictatorship that had lasted thirty years, the return of freedom of speech, free elections, the promulgation of a new constitution and the creation of several boards with the State in which popular participation could be practiced (PEREIRA, 2001).

This is the phase of social movements mutation from traditional model to social nets; democracy and technology grow together – but not at the same measure – in Brazil during the first years of present Constitution, changing relations between State and Citizens dramatically. From the 90s to the present day, internet increases, because many investments were made by Brazilian government and private companies. This historical period of Brazilian Society has redefined the ways of popular participation because four principle reasons:

a) Brazilian population got more access to political information with the web expansion in our territory, which facilitated access to governmental acts, as well as allowed programs and other means of disseminating news beyond the traditional media, with a more critical and less controlled perspective (SOUZA, 2008);

b) a new sense of Citizenship born in 1988 with the new Constitution, which is called the Citizen-Constitution and that brings a extensive list of fundamental rights, due to the democratization process whereby the Civil Society had passed in 1980s, which put an end to thirty years of dictatorship in the country (PEREIRA, 2001), and this access movement lobbied the Government in different ways, achieving some significant advances for democracy and Citizenship, as well as postulating more political space by the empowerment of population (AVRITZER, 2002).;

c) Brazilian federalism includes municipal administration (different than EUA, for example, where just exists federal and States federative entities), the municipalization process amplified popular participation, although many problems still persist, because it created the Municipal Boards of important social demands like childhood, the environment, education, urban planning, social inclusion and others (GUIMARÃES, 2008).

Therefore, people still demand the inclusion of fundamental rights not recognized yet – our redemocratization process still go on – and through which individuals represented by social groups could be included with more quality in the roll of Citizens. In fact, this is a very essential reflection for brazilian today: what is the quality level of our Citizenship?

1.2 Inclusive democracy

To evaluate democracy inclusion in our country it is fundamental talk about the concept "Sub-citizen", from Jessé Freire de Souza (2003). If we intend to include people not respected yet like real Citizens we have to balance the "essentiality" of our social and political structures that define the Brazilian Rule of Law with the "resilience" of boundaries whereby this state structure can be changed by Society (Citizens) to improve Citizenship and become it effective for those "Sub-citizens". The "Sub-citizenship" problem highlights the difficulty of accessing fundamental rights like housing, health, safety, and other aspects that make our Human Development Index inappropriate and makes us question whether the Rule of Law and the Constitutions written inside it would be really emancipatory for Citizens or in fact, perhaps merely declaratory of rights whose effectiveness seldom citizen can get in their daily lives (nowadays, current HDI Brazil provided by United Nations Development Programme is better than some years ago, but in some states, the highest and the lowest cities are neighbors and the difference between them is like a African and a European countries).

For change this, it is necessary beyond the digital access, modify cultural inheritance, why Brazil many times justify "Sub-citizenship". It is essential to consider our slavery heritage that exclude part of Brazilian people from qualify public services and drove them to the slums, the colonial tradition of male political and family control, the strong influence of religion in official branches that have Christian symbols in all the state buildings, the extremely low index of Brazilians with university access (according Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics, 11% of Brazilians, mostly white people in a population of about 200 million in accordance with last census, in which more than half are black or brunet) and further, like explain Roberto Loeb (2001), a unequal economical stratification.

To promoted inclusive democracy resilience is fundamental. Different groups fight for public services in this disagreeable social context, as occurs in the affirmative actions that intend to include Afro-Brazilians at universities. When Citizens make social nets the interaction revels clearly this unfair reality, because they express their thoughts and demands by this way, and the State necessity of talk with Citizens about solutions, maybe changing the operating state apparatus if required. But, even local governments still have difficult to hear, specially the "Sub-citizens", because the political instruments that allow a individual or group public speech are insufficient and controlled by few people.

The only way is empower Citizens and Sub-citizens by the human rights assure in Law. Since to be considered a effective Rule of Law, the State have to develop social functions – guarantee the moral fundament of Society, its important values, and also the individual rights (DURKHEIM apud OLIVEIRA, 2010) – democracy becomes a central subject. First, due to the redefinition of Brazilian moral fundament after the Constitution of 1988, called Citizen-Constitution, which has listed many unprecedented fundamental rights, for example Habeas Data constitutional action that allow Citizen access to his personal information in government database. Second, because this function of keep the balance between State and Citizens and between different individuals or groups is part of the "essentiality" of the Rule of Law, soon, State have to act in the sense of "resilience" exactly to fulfill its social function, as explain Émile Durkheim in his political sociology. Individual liberties depends on State capacity to be resilient before new demands and social pluralism; even depends on State authority to conserve the moral fundament from community sense which sustain the "essentiality" of social and political structure when we want a inclusive democracy in the Rule of Law.

2. The Resilience Principle

In order to promote this discussion and the inclusion of excluded individuals, we believe the State is able to absorb, democratically, the transformations conducted by Civil Society, without implying renunciation of his legal and political authority to govern and we also believe that this attitude from State is fundamental to be recognized like a legitimate authority by people. State legitimacy depends on democracy and, nowadays, it´s unthinkable waits for democracy and legitimacy without a regular and complete popular participation in State decisions through an effective Law. In this cases, Law would be the mainly instrument for democracy and Citizenship effectiveness through developing and applying what I call "resilience like a principle in the political and Law fields", which brought to us for the legal area a better analysis of Brazilian democracy.

"Resilience" it is a scientific term came from Physics and, in the last years it had been used in Psychology. Resilience is the ability to be passing through a shock or profound changes in its structure without losing its fundamental characteristics. A resilient body it is capable to adapt to the new, while retain that is substantial in your essence. Why State and Law must be resilient? To be democratic. Why Civil Society must be resilient in their internal groups? To be democratic. The resilient State seeks to understand and define the institutions, rules and values that are fundamental to it constitutes, what it calls its "essentiality", while also listening to the voices of the other subjects with which it interacts, arising out Civil Society, its reason for being.

The State exists for and with Civil Society, not without her or tutoring her mandatorily. Civil Society should also assume a resilient approach to safeguard the right to difference in democracy and to avoid the imposition of stronger groups, since in many cases of dispute the popular collective understanding is not possible. This means you can combine evenly the need for adaptation and the need for support, based on its essential elements that remain during the event. Read these examples:

a) In the Physics field, a simple one is the pole vault at the Olympic games. The stick must be sufficiently flexible to allow the scale needed to drive the athlete while ensuring safety and sustainability of the heel part to conserve intact its internal structure. Therefore, it is not destroyed, it becomes another object of a different pole jumps, but is modified face of external force exerted on it in order to enable a satisfactory result, in the case, the successful jump;

b) In the Environmental field, a example is the recuperative powers that has an ecosystem after being beaten by some form of external impact, so is the ability of the living elements of that ecosystem have to resume their interrelationships biological and revive the environment by adapting to changes and also overcoming the possible damage caused by the offender, as a deforested area which, if protected, can recover;

c) In the Psychology field, this term is apply to people who have overcome traumatic situations and after these events, they were able to pick up their lives with quality, although they have had to adapt to what the obstacle may have become unrecoverable, such as loss of one body member in a traffic accident or grieving;

d) In the Technological field, it represents the ability to interact under new media instruments to socialize information, culture, economic interests, transnational policies, and other issues in the digital Society, without harming the essentiality of their local cultures, which aim to be preserved in this interactive global environment where they exchange experiences;

e) In the Sociological field, this term could be used to explain dialogue in the possible struggle between State and Society groups which ask for more protection for their rights, like minorities, because in this situations, State sometimes have to offer some conditions there are expected by these organized individuals that are not previously announced in the public policies, making it necessary to establish the equilibrium point between the functions defined by the State for its social and those required by the new situation submitted by social groups.

Therefore, "resilience" is totally different from "resistance", because in this one the actors are opponents and in these cases one will find a power struggle – like he only answer to democratic understanding problem, as the more extremists legal pluralists did; the principle of resilience, how we call in our doctoral thesis, represents a value very essential to actual Brazilian democracy, since this application by Law in State-Society conflicts could equalize "State power", which must be legitimate, and "popular participation", whose interventions in political context sometimes aims just particular demands, compromising important public interests or minority rights.

The resistance was necessary sometimes (RIBEIRO, 2004). In many moments in Brazilian history – the slavery abolition (1888), the constitutionalist revolt (1932), the end of the 1964-1985 dictatorship, and others examples – and, until now, could be, perhaps, a way to fight to recognition . But for a uninterrupted process of democracy, that involves routine decisions about social life, the resilience could be a way to practiced tolerance, recognition of the other and to learn about our own borders in pursuit of a joint project of a shared democratic State, mostly since we live in the internet times. As any kind of democratic principle, the resilience demands its application in the middle of the Rule of Law.

And it is important to define the kind of "Law" we will consider for this application, because we can interpret "Law" at a legislative way, a judicial one, or like a social construction. This is the meaning here used, because Brazil is a plural country and this undeniable multiplicity necessarily reflects on the routine of legislators and professionals in various legal areas – judges, Lawyers, etc.. Considering this, one cannot discuss this study on resilience without considering Brazilian pluralism, which is an important differential in our reality at the moment to create legal rules to the Citizens. But what is the reason that in recent years this social multiplicity became so frequent? Does the recent demonstrations in the streets of Brazil are actually interrelated with the yearning to narrow the debate about what is "Law" with the State? Had an objective structurally transforming of its relationship with society, which feel "forgotten", a subject of "second class"?

This occurred especially because of the high degree of disparity that still exists in Brazil between Citizens - economic and cultural inequalities, problems of access to education and habitation, etc. -, as observed in the Brazilian democratic context because in our country there is still a significant amount of people who are called Sub-citizens, which marked our democratic model with heterogeneity and constant struggles for recognition (FREIRE DE SOUZA, 2000, p. 133). As part the process to establish a democratic dialogue between the State and Civil Society allowing both subjects be considered equitable, that relationship that defines socially "Law" for all of us must applies the principle of resilience, requiring the State realizes that openness to dialogue with the Sub-citizens, a attitude that does not compromise its essential elements of authority.

Hence the resilience, as a principle governing relations between subjects treated in a democracy, fulfills the important role of maintaining equilibrium in continuous play of forces between State and Civil Society, the result of a continuous process of delimitation of boundaries between State sovereignty (Clause 1, Constitution of the Federative Republic of Brazil, promulgated on October 5, 1988 - CR/88), which aims to ensure the permanence of their authority over Citizens, and popular sovereignty (Clauses 14 and 61, §2º, CR/88), whose main purpose is to expand in order to achieve more political space where up their demands. And, concomitantly, balances the play of forces within Civil Society itself, formed by different social groups, with interests not always harmonized, thus avoiding the continuing prevalence, for example, the most influential politically or economically more powerful, the that could lead to the particularization of public policies.

In this way, the principle of resilience is a social mechanism for releasing the Sub-citizens, however, without the intention to deconstitute the existing legal-political model, but focused on their rehabilitation to the current needs of individuals, enabling social inclusion. This does not mean that the confrontations are always avoided, because they are part of everyday dialectic constant delimitation of space and autonomy. However, we perceive the resilience principle like a way to preserve ethics in relations between State and Civil Society.

Urge remind that in a resilience process we do not have to agree all time with the other, or accept State rules without objections, or always sustain a resistance attitude if we do not agree. Any individual and the State have to know that are some essentiality that we have to preserve, and discuss about what each side could waive. The importance of resilience is too in the ability to discuss. These actors need to recognize themselves as subjects able to dialogue – not to a complete agreement. If State power it is only a strength demonstration of political superiority, or if people claim only particular interests, democracy can't be real.

A good example in Brazil, nowadays, it is the defense of "family" made by religious groups against homosexual rights. Despite Brazilian Constitution (CR/88) guarantee human dignity like an important principle (article 1, III), there is a huge discussion about the limits between State and religion principles, because some rights have been hindered for a non-laic government attitude, especially for political representatives. The overture text in the Constitution begs for God bless to State and their Citizens and churches have no taxies duties. Because of this religious intervention in political decisions, some minority rights are offended. In this scenery, it is urgent to reflect on State commitment with the freedom of faith. How to get a equilibrium between State, religious groups and homosexuals in order to conserve democratic principles inside a so pluralistic Society?

Emphasizing our own reality and thinking about sub-Citizen category of Citizenship, we have to concern on the essential elements of a democratic Rule of Law and have these elements as a guide, in the resilience principle, to propose a dialogue between these subjects. We know how hard would be and, even, that the subjects could never agree one with another, but is indispensable create a parameter, linked in this essential structure of authority, to limit the groups in struggle and, so on, guarantee portions of both rights claimed – fundamental principles in the present Constitution are effectual like parameters. According Émile Durkheim (1982), there is a duality in moral facts, and Law is part of this facts. This duality consists in a double face of Law, mostly, that is called duty-right relation; there is no total freedom for anyone that wishes to live in Society and, at the same time, Society has to respect individuals.

We'll have, ergo, determine what is essential in our Rule of Law in terms of dignity constitutional fundaments to both groups, which will have a portion of his use of freedom if they respect themselves, first of all, because "dignity" is part of the essentiality of our democratic system, it is a fundamental element (BARCELLOS, 2002). Preserve dignity is guaranteeing both interests insofar the necessary equilibrium between State and Society, and between Society different groups. How explains Michel Rosenfeld, the Constitution has to be a interplay between identity – individual or collective – and diversity: "Equality is itself necessarily linked to the interplay between identity and difference... There has been a general tendency to associate equality with identity and inequality or inferiority with difference." (ROSENFELD, 1994, p. 9). If the better situation happens, equality linked to possibility of diversity, for us, it is resilience because has a deliberative and fundamental aspect to democracy quality.

In this article, we use to explain this reality a benchmark of what would be the democracy quality, resorting to the following concept of deliberative democracy: the legal-political organization founded on the people's participation with a view to their inclusion in decision-making policies and in the drafting of legal rules will apply. His plea supports the analysis of Argentine jurists Carlos Santiago Nino (2003) and Roberto Gargarella (2007), beyond research Robert Dahl (1971) about polyarchy, called by the author of effective democracy. And if the Democratic State intends to encourage this effective democracy, or polyarchy, resilience it becomes so fundamental as principle as federalism or separation of powers, e.g., as well as you need to ensure a equilibrium between these legal relations, is also of paramount importance to ensure the balance, by Law, between State and Civil Society, not only giving negative rights, but also rights of proactivity with the dynamics of everyday life controlled by State agencies.

Thus, resilience is understood also by the ability of political institutions to assimilate the intervention of new subjects - Citizens proactive - in its internal structure in order to interact with them aiming their continuous improvement. Refers directly to the theory of human agency, which in this article will be addressed by the perspective of Anthony Giddens (1979). The structuring Giddens model allows better understand how the principle of resilience is applied within the social system, in casu, considering the Democratic State. Giddens is undoubtedly one of the contemporary authors that better recognizes the individual's action called human agency. For this reason, chooses not to accept the rigidity of the term structure, and instead it adopts the concept of structuring, giving the notion of dynamics to his theory.

The use of this term is intended to represent the conditions under which agents choose to act in a context in order to continue the status quo, or, otherwise, to transform it. The differential analysis of Giddens assignment lies in its greater capacity of the agency to the individuals that comprise the structure (Stare, political institutions, etc.). According to Giddens, the agency is the power of social agents to transform the structure in which they live. Although the structure, or social setting, delimit a field of choices , many individuals usually arranged in groups, create strategies that allow them to overcome such limitations, acting in order to adapt it to a new reality and also legitimize it (GIDDENS, 1979) .

For example, social movements reproduce standards of conduct prescribed by Law (create associations registered in the registry office, subscribe to get tax breaks, etc.), but also produce new behaviors (particular mechanisms of conflict resolution, informal labor, and others) they wish to (re) known to the State to be valid in the social system organized by this "Law". Individuals from such groups depend on the institutional recognition to integrate the official system of social relations. When they do not get, then, rises a conflict between what the agency capacity of individuals of these groups can do, considering their particular network of relationships, and State institutions.

According to Giddens human agency theory, while the actual political and legal systems retain their fundamental features, changes in other aspects are also negotiated to allow the inclusion of new categories of Citizens, or simply to update the dynamics of democracy today. This mainly occurs in the contexts of deliberative democracy, as they assert Gargarella and Nino. The ability to absorb and live with such changes is resilience, not misrepresent these social systems, but transforms them. And, most importantly, this transformation comes as much from within because the State promotes the application of the principles, as out of a thread until a few decades ago was not adequately address the subject while emancipated and able to debate political and legal Civil Society.

Based on this conceptual repertoire, Giddens (1979) lists some characteristics of Societies with recognition of citizen-subjects and their human agency:

a) there is no fixed locations (hence use the naming structuring);

b) the normative elements serve to ensure claims of legitimacy on a social location (position), which can, of course, be of many types and be challenged to a greater or lesser degree;

c) the Society shall not be confused with the territorial limits of a State, but referred to a network of relationships formed by individuals, which can be varied according to the plurality of possible joints socially.

And this recognition of Citizens as subjects in their plurality, made possible by the resilience, is critical to improving the level of quality of democracy that we intend to adopt in Brazil today. We can then say that the hallmark of contemporary Citizenship is its deliberative character, even though sometimes seeming a promise yet to be realized, because there is confidence in the Constitution. Its confidence is part of the essentiality of the Democratic State structure, as said Rosenfeld:

> Constitution making also raises the question of maintaining the essential identity of the newly created constitutional self over time in order to secure a sufficient link between the generation of constitution makers and numerous succeeding generations. Carving a constitutional identity over time is crucial to the legitimation of imposing the constitutional scheme devised by the constitution makers upon subsequent generations. (ROSENFELD, 1994, p. 15).

Thus, resilience principle is part of a valid constitutional scheme created, in Brazilian case, for de 1986-1988 popular assembly that formulated a democratic essential identity, which one we hope be respected and enforced for Citizens benefits. According to Brazilian jurist Humberto Ávila (2007), a principle should become an ideal in an achievable objective and to do this is necessary to define the legal right which aims to protect and further the necessary behaviors for their protection. Considering the principle of resilience, its achievable objective is to enforce the Citizenship through equilibrium between State and Civil Society, showed in the routine life by the equitable use of democratic instruments – it is the way to measure equilibrium – mainly, nowadays, by the equitable use of internet media.

The legal rights under resilience principle protection are democracy, popular sovereignty and Citizenship, all under the actual Constitution (CR/88) protection too. And, the necessary behaviors for their protec- tion, which are indicated by the principle of resilience in the political and legal areas, are: recognition of Brazilian plural identity, which justifies the adoption of measures for discussion in public able to allow for diversity, on this account even conflicting groups ever intend to agree with each other they have to defended the essentiality of Democratic State (difference right); non-criminalization of social movements human agency, thus ensuring that Civil Society can manifest without political persecution; transparency in public acts to not prevent Citizens from obtaining necessary information for free exercise of their Citizenship; the maintenance of public digital spaces for wide Citizens interaction, avoiding any type of exclusion in this field, so relevant presently.

3. Digital democracy in Brazil - How to include

Considering what was said and by observing the current Brazilian reality we can say that one of the main forms of Citizens activity or agency has been the articulation of efforts through social media especially Facebook - although groups like the Free Pass Movement have ceased to publish their agendas mailing preferably in social networks on the allegation of increased State control over what was said by the people in these virtual spaces, a situation that would prejudge this group conditioning them to a peripheral Citizenship, typifying Sub-citizenship. With the propose of guarantee this equilibrium among State and Civil Society, and between different Society groups too, nowadays Brazil needs discuss: State legitimacy to exercise authority over its Citizens; the problem of Sub-citizenship; and the functions of State e Civil Society in digital democracy, because the level of participation is amplified by social networks and other digital medias which can overcome the huge geographical distances of our country and also give informational accessibility.

Likewise, we must learn to know about the behavior of the individual networked and also about this new rationality that was born with the digital media, what I call in my article mediatic rationality. Without that comprehension, we will not be able to accomplish democracy in these days, which has so many peculiarities and in which one have to develop new categories to shed light on current challenges. Being resilient in this context means: one have disposition to change if it is better for democracy; at the same time, sustain what is essential in the Rule of Law. It is a "pulse" movement, that could keep democracy (and Law) more reasonable and inclusive.

Aside the metaphors, we have to think of the close relationship that exists among State, Society and Law in Brazilian democracy today. The current political institutions that make the link between Citizens and the State, as well as the legal rules governing them and the latter, have presented a performance below social needs to adapt to a new era in Brazilian democracy. As a result, State has failed to sustainability (stability) to act and solve by conventional means new issues presented to him. His performance deficit is due to bureaucratic model used, little or nothing dialogical, which imposes a vertical system of authority in which the Citizen is still treated passively.

Because the bureaucratic model is extremely attached to fixed formulas and patterns, it becomes difficult the recognition of new subjects, and also the plurality of subjects, after all, the increased number of participants in the dialogue does not mean they are all from the same social subgroups, cannot be a shared agenda between all who are demanding greater attention and dedication of public power. And as the traditional political institutions are not eligible for this type of flexible interaction, too often confuse public demonstrations with "disorder" and the criticism coming from segments of the civilian population as "unjustified" and from persons "without legitimacy / authority to do it".

From the point of view expressed in this article seems a nonsense the same State that says its right to political participation is formally guaranteed to their Citizens, determine this right have to be subject to the prior approval of the State authority (not we are talking about commitments to use public spaces such as streets for demonstrations, but the right to manifest itself).

Thus, Brazil is now facing the following challenges:

I - How best to define what are essential elements such as the dignity of the human person under the Constitution in force (BARCELLOS, 2002), in order to differentiate the concessions that may or may not be made during the upgrade process with the objective to maintain balanced adaptation needs and support of political institutions;

II - How to extend the process of Citizens emancipation, both for access to public discussion forums, such as the recognition and protection of minorities that do not have full freedom of speech but, in fact, they are submitted under the prevalence of a univocal power.

These issues are paramount and difficult to answer, because it depends on the degree of resolution possible in the Brazilian democratic model, which means that they are linked to existing tools that can facilitate public debate and access to culture and information, public hearings, access to digital government pages, free communication media, etc. (SOUZA, 2007a and 2008). The definition of what are these essential elements must be the result of a political-social process constructive and resilient so that one can have a great definition without an ideological particular pressures, although such interference will always exist. Therefore, more important than define them, is to establish the democratic process within which they are set. Thus they will have more legitimacy and public trust, but also provide an internal and stable structure for political institutions, which should keep the deliberative process continuously to preserve open needs constant adjustment.

