It is a new routine for social life. Replaces up the rigid institutional trust in perpetuity, coming from the liberal bourgeois culture of the XIX century and its bureaucratic model to establish the relationship between the State and Civil Society, and one puts in its place a new parameter of dynamic and interactive nature. In the digital age, as well as operating systems (iOS, Android, Java, etc.) maintain a base of programming that is fundamental architecture of the software on it and make constant updates, we must now put the model shared and resilient democracy rather than rational thought pattern of industrial motivation. The cell operation and activities network replaced the traditional way of thinking, repetitive, standardized and methodical inspired the production line of factories. It is up to the political institutions and the right, who once considered themselves "modern" by following this inspiration, now have to follow another model that is more suited to the challenges of our own time.

But it is no easy for our authorities or, even, for jurists. Liberal modern rationality still remains in many books, seminars, legislations. To adapt our institutions to a new parameter of rationality, marked by the effect of social medias on the internet, you'll need a huge resilience effort to overcome the inertia caused by the desire to remain in the past, to use the ordinary control instruments – as we saw in the recently conflicts among popular and police during the public manifestations in the streets. We have a futuristic Constitution, because it provides many fundamental rights that our political (and security) institutions aren't ready to execute. Nowadays, Brazilian legislators are discussing about a "regulatory mark" to internet, and the question is: It is a way to establish greater State control over the web or to contribute to the regulation of an important public space?

Brazil has two fundamental challenges to win to qualify better democracy and Citizenship, respect internet as a public space and create instruments to include peripheral Citizens in this further communication channel. This inclusion would be made materially, because Citizens need appropriate hardware and software to interact, and rationally, once a new mindset was born with this social transformation and one has to know more deeply this mediatic rationality. According Neal Thomas (2011), social computing it is a reality of our days and it is responsible too to rationalize information, conceived as a shared token of meaning, despite inside the chaotic hyperlinking structure of the web. The computing rationality is a collective construction, made by a community which wants to optimize its actions rationally. One of the instruments used by people and, mostly, by organizations to rationalize information is building data bases full of individual behavior characteristics.

Of course, it is a kind of "god's-eye view" (THOMAS, 2011) on the private life practices by State, companies and other organizations and we have to debate on the ethic in these power relationships among State and Civil Society inside the web. Social media it would be the mainly channel for that, since social computing, due its specific rationality, provides an interactive environment favorable to multiple human agency (THOMAS, 2011). Any agent could interfere in the others agent's actions, changing the result and returning a new object on which these others agents will work. Social computing functions as a rational steering medium in network societies. It is a continuum and interactive process with the propose of rationalize information and share it. As asserts André Parente (2007) space, events, information and people are each day more influenced by telecommunications and cyberspace in a pantropic way, because technology occupy every place nowadays.

Our way of life is shifting, gradually and inexorably, for virtual environments: reduction of geographical distances, reduction of language difficulties, content management arranged in huge shared databases, video conferences, agreements and other documents with digital certification and legal effect admitted in many countries, social networks that expand exponentially institutional and personal networking, news and weather data in real time, fast articulation and global Civil Society movement (flash mobs).

These and many more are the prospects that the internet and new technology of virtual interaction through computers and mobile phones enabled humanity. The interaction can define our space, as well as the limits that we must obey. However, the freedom of action available to us in the digital society – multiple human agency – does not always ensured the wellbeing expected in the face of easier access to information and communication, since this new social structure has the characteristics to be of a (TRIVINHO, 2005): virtual nature (much of the interaction is done without real human contact, often being hidden by avatars or fake profiles), dromocratic (based on speed and immediacy with which the relationships occur, which has changed the language we use, inclusive) and fragmented (ties and affinities are constructed and deconstructed all the time, making it difficult maintaining the cohesion between people).

Virtualization of human relationships brings as challenges the legal regulation of acts performed in digital media and the protection of users of this new communication system. The defense of privacy is another important flag raised in the present day due to the intense ethical aspect that involves. The dromocratic aspect of the digital society is bound to virtualization. As the word "Autodrome" the greek term "dromo" means "speed" (VIRILLO apud TRIVINHO, 2005). A dromocratic Society therefore, is one that has technological resources that enable their human relationships (personal, commercial artistic governmental etc.) to be developed and disseminated quickly, almost at the same time the events occur.

The fragmentation, in turn, makes it difficult to maintain social ties more solid and stable as a warning Polish sociologist Zygmunt Bauman (2007). Just "click" the mouse to join, leave, "like" a social group who organize virtually. For example, although thousands of people have heeded the call made on social networks and attended the demonstrations on the streets in Brazil this year for most there is no real commitment to any organized movement that will keep the agenda of discussions on long-term is easy to simply "unplug".

So take care of these challenges mentioned becomes very important to ensure that not create a contingent of digitally excluded Brazilians who do not appropriate their rights because ignore them; should also seek to strengthen the bonds created virtually by other live means, even to make more durable guarantees conquered. Finally, it is very important to rethink our relationship with technology itself, so it does not become "servants" when the correct should be the opposite. And it is crucial that the significance of Law in a society whose meaning is constructed in the midst of political and social discourse in digital media does not serve the massification of social relations at the risk of reducing the paths to democratic dialogue.

Considering topics outlined, Brazil needs qualify its digital democracy to qualify democracy itself as predict in the Constitution

(CR/88). Many Brazilians do not have an appropriate access to these new media, or have difficult to understand this mediatic rationality – even intellectuals and authorities. As Trivinho says (2005), technology brought a diverse type of "death", because the Citizen that can't interact using internet has less democratic access to State services, information and, also, compromises his social networking, indispensable nowadays to public participation. And, as participation is a fundamental of our Democratic State, part of it essentiality, State has to supply Citizens with means to digital interaction and to get comprehension about this mediatic rationality.

Technology can't be used to manipulate Citizens or submitted them under State control. Have to be a way to qualify democracy and improve Citizenship. A State that sustain a political regime not respectful with its Citizens, it has not the necessary legitimacy to be accepted for people. The principle of resilience has to be apply here to avoid abusive decisions from State using technology against Citizens freedom.

Therefore one must think to be equal in the XXI century as a process of broad inclusion of Civil Society in policy making through a fair interaction between different groups or so one will see only the revalidation of the old liberal "ideological core" now with hi-tech aspect of the information age. The creation of new spaces for deliberation through communication media available today do not reflected yet in the increase of democracy especially in Latin America where access to computers and the web is not widespread if we consider the numbers needed for effective public access.

The Brazilian campaigns for free education of new technologies demonstrate the distance that remains between the different types of Sub-citizens and Citizens that our society still has (FREIRE DE SOUZA, 2003), what offends the principle of human dignity protect by CR/88 (BARCELLOS, 2002). In countries where democracy is still under construction, as Brazil, more than computerize administrative offices will be necessary to integrate differences within the sphere of political power, basic condition to State legitimacy, even if it means not always we'll have the "quiet" expected when one mention the ordinary concept of social peace.

So, digital democracy is required to guarantee equilibrium of power among Citizens and the State – resilience. When there is overlap of the will of the latter upon the former, this means that some control mechanism is used to reduce the political role such as ideology, which is one of those devices employed by the State authority to cover the imbalance of relations. Ideology can hide inequality between Citizens and Sub-citizens behind the discourse of the "connected world - free for all and informative."

Ensure technological access notably to mass media must be central to any discourse these days if we want get a more egalitarian democracy. Will not help the Citizens mere refinement of the forms of domination, if the quantum of decision power who can effectively engage in their relations with the State does not change. Obtain a certificate via online reduces the volume of calls in locus allowing the government to reduce staffs. But it is so much different than to open the system for inserts providing them with interactivity policy decisions. Internet could contributes to the equilibrium between State and Civil Society, because public decisions broadcast in this media reach a greater number of people, as in distance education using the web via satellite, since the intricate system of rivers, creeks and streams of the Amazon region, for example, hinders other types of informational access.

Contributes either to the equilibrium between Society groups since one do not have to be economic powerful to broadcasting in internet, it is possible publish a blog about the group or community - it will still be possible if the internet regulatory mark, that is being voted on today in Brazil, does not create obstacles to free traffic information today this media offers, what would mean yielding to lobbying by big businessmen who control radio and TV in Brazil.

4. Conclusion

In conclusion we can say that State legitimacy is deeply dependent on the level of popular participation in political decision making, which requires the Brazilian government – at all levels of federalism: federal, regional and local – appropriate preparation to achieve a viable equilibrium between the private interests and between them and collective interest; also between State and Civil Society. And, this kind of Citizens participation is increasingly becomes each day more dependent on digital forms of democracy. We have the challenge now: to make policies that include Sub-citizens, to negotiate new public spaces to political interaction, to redefine "Law" considering Brazilian diversity. These three aspects are crucial to qualify Brazilian democracy today.

Our dictatorial past will be overcome when Citizens can really practice political and legal interaction with authorities in an equality base as a respected subject in this relationship. And to make it happens State has to stop defending its outdated elements, like the excessive vertical use of power, the authoritarianism, the bureaucratic communication, the low educational level of the people (not just alphabetization, but mostly, the preparation to interact in a mediatic rationality), the few electoral connection among political representatives and their voters, the elitism, etc.. With this outdated elements interfering in social and political relations, resilience isn't viable, what means that democracy with quality isn't possible yet.

Technique, Dehumanization and Human Rights

Eduardo C. B. Bittar[1]

Abstract: "The modern technique promotes economic development. But also modern technique produces social dehumanization. This creates a challenge for the culture of human rights. This article aims to study the effects of dehumanization from the social thought of Jürgen Habermas.

Key-Words: Technique - Dehumanization – Human Rights.

1. Methodological fundamentation and field study assessment

Studies on the importance of technique in contemporary social life are relevant in terms of research on the human condition and, especially since, if technical resources have the virtue of representing a solution to practical and operational problems in life, they also have the potential to stifle action and the understanding of world perspectives. Technical advances, in this sense, are neither a curse nor simply a sign of pure progress. Based on this, one may measure human advances; however, modern history warns against how deceitful a direct association between these two phenomena may be. Therefore, the state of technology, as we can assess, has positive and negative effects on human condition, and a current diagnosis faces the challenge of verifying both harm and benefits resulting from technological advances, based on what can be submitted to critical considerations and, thus, and establishing humanly responsible guidelines concerning the apparatus. In fact, warnings had already been clearly expressed in the text of José Ortega y Gasset, Meditación de la técnica, 1939, where he states: "One of the themes that will be discussed with more intensity is the significance, the rewards and drawbacks of technology".[2]

Technology, as an issue of our times, beckons a series of interconnected considerations, prompting us to ponder whether technology has provoked alienation or liberation and, also, if it has served a function of humanization or dehumanization.[3] Sociology of knowledge and critical philosophy both intersect at this exact point where, in assessing net gains and losses of technological advances, one must consider the effects of celebrating production and economic ideology as integral factors in the appearance of modernity and the historical definition of a capitalistic production mode, along with the ramifications created in its darkest moments. Technical sociology, as a branch of the sociology of knowledge,[4] has expressed the dysfunctional effects caused by pervasive technical reason;[5] in addition, critical philosophy has obtained results from this process, based on a enlightenment[6] dialectics.

Marx and Engels may be considered the theoretical framework for both perspectives, that is, sociology[7] of knowledge and critical philosophy itself. Theirs is the observation: "It is not the consciousness of men that determines their being, but, on the contrary, their social being that determines their consciousness."[8]

A critique of a hyper-inflated economy is not only criticism of an economic system, but a critique of its effects on human condition itself. And, if the observed effects have been unfavorable, one must not think that the logic of materialist productivism is capable of producing better conditions of life when, in actuality, it causes the progressive deterioration of human existence. This concern becomes clear when, in German Ideology, Marx and Engels state: "In general, it has obliterated all possible natural elements on the workplace, and has succeeded in dissolving all natural relations, transforming them into monetary relations. In place of cities born naturally, large modern industrial cities were created, popping up like mushrooms. Wherever it reached, it destroyed crafts and, in general, all pre-industrial circumstances. It defined the victory of commercial urban centers over the field. Its first condition is automation."[9]

2. Techné, from art and technique to instrumentation and technique, and praxis, from art and interaction to labor and production;

The etymological origin of the term 'technique' is Greek, but this does not mean that the Greek are aware of the extent to which techné is still a semantic component in this word, as it is used in modernity. Techné among the Greek, indicates a knowledge-based meaning of competence that differs from instinctive capacity (phýsis) or mere chance (tyche). Heidegger observes in his text, The Question Concerning Technology (Die Frage der Technik), that the meaning of the term, among the Greek, encompasses the arts, from architecture to painting and sculpture, not forgetting the carpentry skills in building a ship or those of a farmer tilling the land.[10] The Greek also distinguished clearly between (techné) and action (práxis), considering that techné leads to production (poietiké) and práxis represents a deliberate exercise in virtue (phrónesis).[11] Human excellence, however, does not reside in technique, but in virtue, and the mastering of virtue is equivalent to the mastering of active reasoning and not to the mastering of production. In Nicomachean Ethics 1140 a, 15, Aristotle makes a very clear distinction: "In reality, while production has an end beyond itself, this is not the case of action, since a good deed is an end in itself".[12]

The Greek had also come to realize that the question of freedom (eleutería) was linked to the way in which work relations were administered. Also, theoretically, technique carries a liberating potential in terms of labor. Even slavery is justified, and this is clearly stated in Aristotle, based on the premise that instruments do not carry out their functions on their own; if they were capable of obeying orders or could even anticipate them, as the statues of Daedalus or the Hephaestian tripods, if the looms themselves wove autonomously, then the masters would not need slaves (oudén àn édei oúte toîs architéktosin yperetwn oúte toîs despóstais doúlwn).[13] Aristotle's argument reveals that technique conveys a liberating dimension of labor and that, consequently, domination loses its grounds when technique is placed at the service of human liberation.

While the Greek were familiar with the term techné and, more than that, were able to appreciate excellence (arethé) of technique in the splendor of Fidian esthetics, in the harmony of the cithara, or in the enchantment of kartarsis produced in theater,[14] on the other hand, they could not fathom the astounding technological development that, nowadays, places humans in the spotlight of history. We could even say, according to Walter Benjamin, that the Greek "… were obliged, due to the state of their technical mastery, to produce eternal values." Taken this way, beauty also becomes a product of techné and, therefore, techné was capable of translating harmony, proportion, and balance.[15] So, how come, if the Greek had recognized the liberating force in technique, did it become an instrument of domination? Let's remember that Western history is marked by fissures, and realize that the term 'technique' has taken on new connotations with the arrival of modernity.

Changes are brought on through history. While techné is not worthy of much further ado on the part of the Greek, it is not in this manner that moderns view it. If the ancient Greek viewed techné as an accessory to phýsis, in other words, a sum total of human experience expressed through knowledge and materialized through artifacts in the real world, yet distinct from knowledge itself, between episteme and sophia, they chose to glorify the latter. One can, therefore, observe continuity and discontinuity in transition from old to modern technique, even considering that the latter derives from the former. The former had a more solid nature, while the latter is no longer dependent on man, except as its instrument. Techné becomes the reason behind new times, such as modernity. In modernity, conditions were destroyed to convert techné into the sophia of our times. The abandonment of autonomy on the part of sophia and its subjugation to techné builds a history stripped of its capacity to offer autonomy to every person. It is in this sense that Heidegger refers to technique, not merely as an instrument for action but, fundamentally, as a perspective on the world: "What is today becomes subjected to the essence of modern technique, a domination that has become prevalent on all spheres of life, through multiple indicative signs that can be named: function, perfection, automation, bureaucratization, information."[16]

3. Technique and modernity: the technical empire

Lost in time is the notion that technique, inevitably, would free man and pave the way to human emancipation. After overwhelming evidence to the contrary, we may discard the optimistic views of Bacon: "In fact, the benefits of inventions may reach humanity as a whole, with civil measures reaching but a few communities and being short lived, while these may last forever. In other words, State reforms rarely take place without violence and upheaval, but inventions prompt activity and their benefits do not cause harm or bitterness."[17] This is due to the fact that technique, which operates above communicative reason, becomes the prevailing instrument in the organization of life and, with the advent of modernity, leeches the emancipatory potential in instrumentation processes affecting man and nature.[18]

Modern technique has proven to be a form of social rationalization. However, rationalization is here assessed in a Weberian sense, in other words, in a perspective that recognizes that, if there are gains, there are losses.[19] Technique becomes the main driving force of emergent capitalism.[20] The technocratic conscience that appears with modernity does not only mean a new ideological force shaping the world, sterilizing politics and alienating the masses, it also represents a reduction in practical reason (ethics, justice, politics) due to technique.[21] The immediate consequence is the transformation of action awareness to production awareness, with homo actives reduced to homo faber. Thus, we can sense the nullifying effects on existence and interaction setting in. Work emerges as a sovereign element, smothering all others.

In modernity, technique takes on the status of –logy, when it becomes 'techno-logy,' and culture becomes 'technologism,' with effects reaching deeper than the mere addition of a suffix to the term techné; this change causes a shift that also affects the meanings of these terms themselves. The anthropological and instrumental definition of technology,[22] more accessible to common sense, is debunked by a more powerful player. Technology not only reaches its own independence as a branch of study but also as a fundamentation of itself. Its force and status are also instrumental in fueling the process of its autonomy. Once one realizes that technical expertise can represent power through the control of both nature and human populations, then technique becomes rebellious to man, since, "…technique, in itself, is anything that man does not dominate," according to Heidegger in Political Ontology.[23] From a mere instrument of anthropological intentions, technique becomes the master of human existence itself.

This Copernican turnaround in the sense of techné takes place in the passage into modernity. Modern science, an instrumental view of nature, the rise of science and an ideology based on technique are all elements that preceded the industrial revolution itself. In observing this passage into modernity and natural science, Heidegger identifies, especially, in the physics of the end of the 17th century, an open road towards the creation of a technological empire, starting in the 18th century.[24] The 18th century is characterized by the establishment of terms, such as, investigation (indagine) and experiment (cimento). The 18th century represents the first time in history in which utilitarian expertise becomes, in effect, respectable, in midst a strong progressive ideology of technical advances and a rush towards new inventions. Utilitarian exploration is regarded as a social conquest, imparting notoriety and driving industrial production capacity to new limits. Thus, the economical system is open to scientific endeavors, appropriating modern discoveries. Hence, quantity and efficiency "…become the new moral virtues, technological morality," as Mathilde Niel[25] would put it in Technology and Science as Ideology), 1968, dedicated to 70-year-old Herbert Marcuse. Habermas, in line with a Marcusean thesis, notes: "With the grand-style industrial investigation, science, technology and the revaluation of capital flow into a single system."[26]

The troublesome question of modernity proves to be not exactly related to technological reason in itself, considering human history has always been linked to technological history, but to the fact that technological reason has become an end in itself and, especially, a form of existence of an era, prevailing over all other essential categories.[27] The passage from a theo-centered to a techno-centered perspective, establishes a predominant ideological path that does not lead to human emancipation. In fact, technical knowledge was not just incrementally perfected, it was raised onto a sacred pedestal.[28] Modern man places technique on a throne, and human armies worship it. From its inert nature springs life, though not the lives of millions offering their own to sustain the inert. Inert matter shifts from body accessory to body replacement.

The Aristotelian idea of liberation from the realm of needs through technology which, supposedly, would take the place of slavery, goes awry precisely where technology inverts the human-machine polarity, to machine-human. From the passage of technique to technology, the promise of liberty ends churning up more oppression, and the emancipatory perspectives of technique are paradoxically achieved through human enslavement. In line with Mathilde Niel, technology "…has, today, become the new support system for the old absolutist and emotional mentality. Thus, instead of featuring as a form of liberation, which is conceivable, technology has become a means of enslavement."[29] When a tool that would enhance natural dimensions takes on a life of its own, we will concur with Ortega y Gasset, that: "It is no longer the utensil that aids man, but the contrary: man is reduced assisting machinery."[30] Therefore, the more one advances in a world that depends on technical resources, promoting the self-circulation and self-nourishment of the technical organism, the more the idea of freedom goes up in smoke and becomes an unrealized objective."[31]

to stand against a technological empire. These concerns are magnificently voiced by Walter Benjamin in The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction, 1935: "A new form of misery has emerged with this monstrous technical development, dominating man."[32] This is because technical resources convey no deeper spiritual component[33] other than the draining of spirituality itself. Things that lose their meaning, actually, become fungible and, therefore, lose their aura. "The concept of aura allows us to summarize these characteristics: what is atrophied in an age of technical reproducibility of the work of art is the aura. This process is symptomatic, generating shock waves far beyond the domain of art. Generalizing, we can say that reproducibility removes the copied object itself from the domains of tradition. As it spawns new copies, it replaces the one-of-a-kind existence of a work of art for a serial existence."[34] Technique advances, leaving trails of corroded identity and fungibility on its way towards its ultimate goal: man, stripping him of his aura, therefore, leaving him vulnerable to becoming an object and, consequently, exposing his bony structure, deprived of its very flesh. World view itself is then conditioned to the empire of reproducibility: "Here, unity and resilience are as intimately bound as are, in terms of reproduction, transience and repetitiveness. The r*emoval of the object from its casing and the destruction of its aura are characteristics of a form of perception whose capacity to capture "the similar in the world" is so strong that, thanks to reproduction, it can capture it in a single event."*[35]

Technical resources, without a doubt, enable interaction with nature, allowing for humans to adapt to their environment and safeguard the survival of the species through cumulative experience and knowledge.[36] Life depends on technique for conservation and reproduction. To a large degree, natural challenges prompt responses that propel technical evolution. Thus, Ortega y Gasset notes: "Man, technique and well-being are, ultimately, synonymous."[37] Modernity permits, through material advances, a series of unlikely modifications in the field of material development that result in a greater capacity to enjoy well-being and overcome previous existential limitations. It is Engels who notes that this is the first time in history that conditions are right to acknowledge a greater possibility, through material possessions, of providing improved human conditions for all.[38]

Moreover, it is Marx that realizes with stupefaction that science has brought the dominance of technology, allowing for a series of material advances which, also, provide a greater comfort and well-being, albeit no greater justice, inclusion or socially distributed welfare. Even though this may be a reality for some countries, by no means does it constitute a global reality.

For modernity has associated technology to its functions in an enlightenment dialectic fashion and, therefore, promotes progress, carrying out reification, promising freedom and delivering oppression. In the warning words of Ortega y Gasset,[39] technology does not imply in an adaptation of the person to the environment, but in an adaptation of the environment to the person, and it is this that inverts the meaning in this relationship, also expressing the possibility that, in the relation between ego and alter, the other himself becomes a part of the environment and, thus, becomes both instrument and means of technique. The instrumentalization of objects evolves to the instrumentalization of man. Therefore, if technique takes on a new significance, it is so that it may drift towards the degeneration of both man and environment as it defines the identity of modernity; 'modern' is here synonymous with denaturing nature and dehumanizing humans. What emerges from this is the homo fabricatus, to which Habermas refers.[40]

Primarily, modern man is responsible for disenchanting and dehumanizing. First, he disenchants nature, turning it into an object, res extensa, then he dehumanizes, because the domination exerted on things is also exerted on humans. Aura and soul are extracted from everything. Therefore, as expressed in the Dialectics of Enlightenment "To disenchant the world is to destroy animism."[41] The civilization vessel is launched on a mission to purge the world of its mystery and obliterate enchantment. Pretenses disguised as explorative are, in fact, dominating, for their interests do not seek the acquisition of knowledge, but domination. "Technical reason, today, is the rationality of domination itself. It represents the compulsive character of a society that is alienated from itself."[42]

Thus, the advances of modernity derive from independent technical advances which often supersede man himself. From mechanisms imagined to aid in overcoming human needs, technical resources have come to engender new human needs, driving the wheels of irreversible dependency relentlessly into the future. "On the contrary, technological man lives in a state of extreme technological stress."[43] The desire to control in a panoptic society, to which Foucault makes reference, is aggravated through an increased loss of control as a consequence of technical dependency itself. The unbridled search for more, the competition to acquire the latest knowledge, the unlimited and insatiable desire to control and possess nature are the founding blocks of an order that overwhelms human capacity in order to exercise control. Total control implies in total lack of control. Therefore, for Adorno and Horkheimer, "The myth is clarified and nature is objectified. The price paid for greater power is the alienation of that over which power is exerted."[44]

Modern pipedreams envisioning technique as a channel for freedom have become a fetish. Hence, its central role in increasing productivity has also become a factor of economic growth and permanent revolution in modern history. However, the same modern history with its recent conquests and advances forebodes a cyclical relationship involving technology, State and ideology which, to a considerable measure, fuse modern history with the history of desires and power.[45] The potentiation of power through technology also carries with it the great paradoxes experienced throughout modernity. Hence, the translation of modern human history into this ambiguous and paradoxical condition: technical resources that liberate also serve to oppress, opening venues for the objectivation of life. This provides the very evidence that enlightenment dialectics operates within modernity as a secret driving force, turning subliminal gears which, between evolution and involution, progression and regression, has allowed for events such as Auschwitz, Gulag and Guantanamo to take place, as observed by Adorno and Horkheimer. At the base of this dialectical analysis, Western society exposes us to ever-increasing paradoxes that devour the most auratic elements of existence. Enlightenment dialectics continues to operate its contradictory machinations, where discolored humans herald the dawn of technology, and vice-versa.

A world that, contrary to human interests, has long relinquished its anthropocentric nature, as announced by the dawn of modern renaissance, has embraced technocentricity; the further technology advances, throughout modern history, the more grandiose and showy it becomes, causing man to feel belittled and impotent in face of powerful machines. Man's potency is surrendered in confrontation with powerful machines, and debilitated work efforts affect his capacity to engage in the spirit of enlightenment which, in other words, represent the passage out of the self-inflicted condition as a minor referred to by Kant, and here quoted by Adorno and Horkheimer: "In Kants words, enlightenment is the solution for man in his under-aged condition, for which he himself is responsible. As a minor, he is incapable of acting on his perceptions without the intervention of another. 'Understanding without the direction of another' is the understanding directed by reason."[46] Human impotence in face of machines now becomes an autonomous force instigating tools and equipment.

Conditions in this technological era enable technically skilled individuals to experience through technology a new form of legitimizing domination, as notes Habermas: "For now, the first productive force, technological-scientific progress in limited to a few, has become a new form of legitimation. This new form of legitimation has, no doubt, lost the old form of ideology."[47] It is true that a new form of ideology strengthens production, domination and control, making human emancipation impossible. It is through the need to adapt to technical conditions and through the desires fueled by negotiating life as merchandise that technocratic consciousness spawns and replicates unchecked; after all, it operates as a disguised weapon within the economic system itself. Who would deny the importance of technology or science? Therefore, its inherent repression is profoundly infiltrated in social consciousness and actions, garnering "…the loyalty of the masses" through "…compensations directed to the satisfaction of privatized needs."[48] Consequently, present-day perceptions find incongruence in modernity and, therefore, produce anxiety-ridden perspectives of either succumbing to technology or overcoming its historically accrued effects, from Auschwitz to Hiroshima-Nagasaki, and from Guantanamo to Iraq.

It is not a question of abominating technology or associating it with any end-of-the-world omen, but a question of realizing that technology distances man from himself and, therefore, builds walls between a stupefied comprehension of gnosis and the simple pressing of a button. Technology desensitizes individuals in terms of their responsibilities, establishing a gap between acts and their repercussions. The technological era brings out the beast in men for, with the same nonchalance with which a hand moves the mouse of a computer, systems are activated to destroy entire cities. Technology releases barbarity and challenges civilization, while emancipation rests abandoned on a heap of things to do. Technocratic consciousness is, in a sense, less ideological than all previous ideologies; since it does not have the opaque power to blind which, at least, would falsely suggest satisfaction. On the other hand, the somewhat vitreous prevailing background ideology that makes of science a spell, is more irresistible and more far-reaching than ideologies of yesteryear, considering that the disguising of issues not only justifies the partial domination interests of one class, suppressing the partial emancipatory need of another, but it also affects emancipatory interest, as such, of the entire human race."[49] The issues, therefore, concerning the effects of these processes in the dimensions of life would call for a more detailed analysis.

4. Technique, the world of life and dehumanization

Modern society, an era dominated by enframing (Gestell), in a Heideggerian sense,[50] has converted the emancipatory potential of technology into a formula of oppression by the bourgeoisie, and this transformation has changed its effects from liberating to castrating. Modernity, therefore, takes on the meaning of a historical era in which experience is drained through work channels and market interests, and from where the dimension of technology, as a product of work, will co-determine all other areas of existence. The resulting historical change allows for the reduction of existence to labor and the rejection of the more encompassing concept of techné as entertained by ancient Hellenics. Modern capitalist and productivist society privileges the "mode of possessing" over the "mode of being," driving the carriage of destiny in determining historical events. The issue does not reside in the use of technical resources to either lessen human expenditures or to put an end to physical suffering or duress, but in its quintessential role in history –machine gears driving the gears of history. Man is to be measured by the yardstick of technology. For our time, therefore, technology is the measure of all things, contrary to Protagorean claims.

What is ultimately a product of human artifice, paradoxically, excludes humans. Technology's distinguishing feature is its very capacity to command the space of what is natural and what is human. It is not in dichotomic terms that the relationship between technology and humanity is seen, through simple and reciprocal exclusion, but in dialectic terms, where one dominates the other, fueling tense and contradictory conditions, inextricable from the confines of contemporary productivist and consumerist society. Technology discriminates when directed to discriminate; technology emancipates when it is allowed to emancipate. Technology may not be viewed apart from social considerations as a whole, which involve the historical relationship between production and productive forces at work, as stated in Marxist tradition. Technology presupposes historical and social conditions that endow it with any particular meaning. And the current meaning is exhausted in its ideological in maintaining the capitalist production system. Therefore, the problem is not in the technological advances and in the furthering of scientific knowledge; it lies in the enslavement of science to serve prevailing interests in using technology as a means of domination.

Furthermore, this critique seeks to focus on the gap between material progress achieved as a result of technology and the level at which elementary human dignity is catered to. Despite existing contraptions, these are not meant for all and are much less accessible to all. The problem is not in technology as a complement to human existence; it resides in its appropriation over man, in the conversion of human thought into technology-centered thought and in the prevalence and autonomy of technology over the natural world and over humanity. Technology proclaims its independence from man and stands above both man and nature.

In the age of cyberculture, the problems with absolute technological values can be traced to procedures ultimately established to control life, dislodging man from his own self-concept. Only a shared experience, constructed through symbols can define the human condition; however, when reduced to a purely labor condition, in a society run by bureaucratic powers and by economic interests, life itself dwindles to make way to the domination interests of immediatism. In information society, vulnerability towards technology is maximized, on a path with no return. The more technology is used, the more it becomes necessary. Technology is, thus, an inextricable part of our daily lives and, thus integrated, connects all life-cycle elements that depend on it, creating interdependency on a scale never seen before. It follows that technology has become the core of existence.

The nullification of existence is aggravated with each new advance in our technocratic era. Therefore, by no means can we claim that it is liberating, tout cort, we can claim that technology has liberated some men; however, there are hordes of people denied access, kept within their silent isolation from the lifeline of provision and means of developing communications, which represent, especially in an information society, limited productive communicative dialog and social mobilization on the public sphere, as points out Habermas.

Thus, the complex and rich experience of the world of life becomes void through external, systemic and determining factors of bureaucratic and economic powers that dominate production spaces, ultimately, through symbolically represented exchanges of experiences. Instrumental reason violates the space of communicative interaction. Therefore, when Habermas alludes to efficiency considerations of this technical ideology and modern science, he discusses his capacity to "… disassociate the self-concept of society to form the reference system of communicative action and from the symbolically mediated concepts of interaction, to replace them with a scientific model. Equally, the culturally determined self-concept of a social world of life is replaced by the self-objectivation of men, under the categories of guided rational action and adaptive behavior."[51] Instrumental imperatives substitute categorical imperatives and, consequently, trash the potential alternative of a constellation of emancipatory values on dimensions of communicative reason, as noted by Habermas: "However, this unfolding process of productive forces can only constitute a liberating potential if it does not replace rationalization on another level."[52]

Rationalization and technification grow conceptually apart, for rationality, while communicative, promotes emancipation, founded on logic and dialog and on the recovery of active interventions of man in history, while technology serves value-added interests and nullifies all interactive human potential. Therefore, the simplification of the world of life must be the standard and yardstick of the devastation provoked by society's modernization movements. The technical-operative mode of today's society makes behavioral conditioning the rule, invading and dissolving spontaneous, creative and integrating experiences of communication in line with the requirements of the world of life (Lebenswelt). What we notice in the world of life, therefore, in what affects society, an increased social disintegration, affecting culture, the loss of symbolic potential and, for the individual, the loss of autonomy.

5. Humanization: ethical responsibility of the human rights culture;

"To be radical is to take things by the root. However, for man, the root is man himself."[53] This phrase, by a young Marx, reveals his concerns for human dimensions that lie behind critical thought. The subtle question of ethics in Marx suggests that the path of resistance against reification may only be reached through humanization, in the sense that the instrumentalization of everything in modernity has become the new law.[54] "In the Marxist view, socialism is humanism as it organizes the social division of work, the realm of needs, the manner in which to allow that men fulfill their social and individual needs in the absence of exploitation and with a minimum of difficulties and hardship."[55]

of humanism, in fact, that is shared by a number of other theoretical currents for, actually, as a philosophical current, humanism itself (humanismo; humanisme; humanismus; umanesimo), in spite of having been thus baptized during the Renaissance, maintains its name long after the Renaissance.[56] There is, in this sense, an invisible line that connects the Socratic gnouth autos to the idea of the Vitruvian man of Leonardo Da Vinci, and to the socialism of Marx, in its critical views on capitalist society; an invisible line that expresses the concern for humanity and its condition. Humanitas is this invisible thread woven through history that connects a diversity of ideas around the same objective, from the Greek paidéia to the humanitas of Cicerus and Varronis, through to the trivium and quadrivium of Medievals, the umanesimo of Renaissance Italians, and the culture of hommes de lettres of French Enlightenment. Therefore, if Marx did not found Western humanism, he did, however, give it a very particular aspect different from bourgeois individualism, thus, taking his place as an important asset of critical philosophy.

The confrontation involving critical thought versus existential technification and the world of labor is a clear reactive component of the modern process of exalting progress and capitalistic fetishizing of the labor world.[57] Noteworthy in Marxist critical tradition is attempt to overcome the idea that ties life to work, enslaving man in a new form of domination that becomes the tool, the master over man himself and the instrument of class domination. In this sense, if technology were directed towards fostering equality and justice, technology would foster social balance rather than domination.[58] Consequently, work itself, originally a source of creation and protection of human life, as it stands, is the cause of the reification of life itself and of social oppression,[59] leading to domination.[60]

If man occupies center stage throughout Western Renaissance, at a later stage, technology takes his place as the driving force in defining conditions. Therefore, it is in the course of modernity that one observes the rise of man as a source of philosophical humanism, in other words, the idea that man is the measure of all things, as well as historical humanism, starting in the 14th century, encompassing a number of diverse ideals focused on cultivating humanitas.[61] The long years that separate us from the first declarations of the 18th century have clearly observed a more significant advance in the fields of technology than in the realization of ideals involving freedom, equality and fraternity. Therefore, having been born to exalt man, modernity has come to be responsible for the reduction of all things to possessions and to instruments of domination of nature, exhausting existence, turning colors to grey, fusing all dimensions into one and, ultimately, discoloring man, for "…accompanying the victory of the technological age comes the fading of the human aura," as notes Horkheimer in 1966.[62]

Modernity impoverishes the meaning of techné, when depriving it from its sense of technique and art, as known by the Greek, and when reducing it to an instrument of nature to produce a historical condition in which praxis in work becomes the only significant social life.[63] Technique has become the end, and the means have been legitimized, due to inconsequential teleologism. "What is, in fact, false in the realm of praxis, in today's perspective, manifests itself in the prevalence of tactics above all else. Means have become absolutely independent; while thoughtlessly serving their ends, they alienate themselves from these."[64] If one has sought to dominate nature through instruments, now the instruments dominate the consciousness of a time. In the 1965 text, Technical Progress and the Social Life-World, originally published in praxis, Zagreb, n 112, 1966, and later, integrated into Technology and Science as Ideology, in 1968, Habermas is emphatic in saying: "Technical power provided by science to affect nature has also, today, directly affected society…"[65] Ethics of ends prevails over ethics of means and becomes the driving force behind the functioning of technical logic. Man does not stand above nature; he is not beyond nature, and he cannot do without nature; man is a part of nature, and his unresolved relationship carries grave consequences with it, for it represents his conflict with his very matrix.[66]

Following this logical process, science is neglectful of its responsibilities towards existential emancipation, serving as an instrument of power itself, with its emancipatory forces harboring the oppressive agents of domination.[67] Science and technology, devoid of ethics, suppress fundamentally important factors of human conditions and become, precisely for this reason, forces which, instead of protecting, threaten the place of humans in the world.[68] Its corruption corresponds to the spirit of a period. There are science and technology ethics limiting their practice, and these ethical boundaries are set by a secularized culture of human rights, impervious to any metaphysical fundamentation, depending exclusively on the capacity of social coordination of human behavior to bring on the emancipation of the life-world.

If the advantages garnered from this process of blown up technology are evident and undeniable,[69] so are the effects of technical developments on nature and human coexistence.[70] Everything indicates that freedom will not be the crop harvested at the end of the day, but more oppression, following the modern configuration logic of the capitalist society.[71] Plucked by the dialectics of enlightenment, man marches forward, allowing technology to work towards his ultimate annihilation. Therefore, we can echo Sophocles: "The most marvelous and terrible in the world is man… from his art and creative genius result good and evil" (Sophocles, Antigona, 335). The reason being, is that where homo faber prevails, his fate is the reification of things. In the words of Hannah Arendt: "Fabrication, which is the work of homo faber, consists in reification."[72] Therefore, absorbed by the world of labor, banned from the political arena, homo faber tends to determine the conditions of social power. Hannah Arendt, commenting on Marx, notes with propriety: "In one of the passages that reveals his eminent historical sense, Marx once commented on Benjamin Franklin's definition of man as an instrument maker as a product of typical "yankeeness," in other words, typical of the modern era, analogous to the definition of man as a political being, in antiquity. This observation rests on modern era premises intent on excluding the political man from the public arena, in other words, man who speaks and acts as in antiquity, homo faber, was sought to be excluded."[73]

Social repression annihilates all that is human in man. It is Erich Fromm who states that "…repression, whether conditioned individually or socially, deforms fragments and robs man of all his humanity."[74] Therefore, it is worth asking whether humanism has run its course, if humanism has become unable to come up with any proposals, if humanism, nowadays, is devoid of any purpose. To answer these questions with Herbert Marcuse it is necessary to say that humanism "…must remain an ideology as long as society depends on continued poverty, arrested automation, mass media, prevented birth control, and on the creation and re-creation of masses, on noise and pollution, on planned obsolescence and waste, and on mental and physical rearmament."[75] The same concerns occupy the mind of Erich Fromm: "The revival of Humanism today is a new reaction to this latter threat in a more intensified form—the fear that man may become the slave of things, the prisoner of circumstances he himself has created—and the wholly new threat to mankind's physical existence posed by nuclear weapons."[76]

In the sense here invoked, today's culture of humanism would be assuming a new role if it proposes to stand watch against technology, in the sense that Heidegger describes the problem.[77] Therefore, he states: "What else, in turn, does that betoken but that man (homo) become human (humanus)? Thus, humanitas does remain the concern of such thinking. For this is humanism: meditating and caring, that man be human and not inhumane, "inhuman," that is, outside his essence."[78] Despite Heidegger's attempts, in his Letter on Humanism, to find fault in other humanists' concepts and, in turn, in Sartre's Existentialism is a Humanism, he does not neglect to warn against the excessive humanism of the moderns,[79] he does not fail to consider that the empire of technology is the present-day threat to human existence itself, in essence, because it leads humanism itself into a crisis. Therefore, Juliana González states: The alternative for today's ethics is, in our judgment, to deny humanism and its distortions and re-find it, in its original and radical meaning, with the new essential features that it has acquired in modern and contemporary times."[80]

If the human being represents its material and historical existence, and the cultural world bears the symbols of its existence, then reification may well provoke the gradual disappearance of human traits, replaced, as before, by technical reproduction.[81] Consequently, our current times may offer man "…the danger of annihilating his essence," as states Heidegger in Nietsche IV.[82] And, Hannah Arendt, in line with Heidegger, in her text On Violence, 1969, a reflection written during the Cold War and the Vietnam War, in respect to thermonuclear weapons that are added to cybernetic terrorist threats, also echoes this idea, saying that the use of technology itself in war has enabled the confrontation between opponents to take on apocalyptic dimensions. "Thus, war – from times immemorial, the ultimate and ruthless arbitrator over international disputes – has lost much of its efficiency and almost all of its fascination. The apocalyptic chess game of superpowers, in other words, between those who operate the highest levels of our civilization, is played under the premise that, if there is a winner, both shall perish; it is a game that does not show any resemblance with any of its predecessors."[83]

If the relationship of man and nature expresses the passage from the objective to the subjective world through language, and if the passage from the subjective to the social world occurs through language, then existing or coexisting outside the realm of language is not an option. It follows that human preservation occurs through the preservation of language. In a process that defines the ego-alter relationship in terms of marketability, and annihilates the richness of symbolic exchanges, man's self-remission depends on his approximation to his own anthropo-linguistic and communicative nature, as a viable form of reason for our times. Humanism does not exist outside the preservation of human symbols. What clearly identifies and distinguishes man is his symbolic dimension, as language allows man a passageway to his calling, with communicative interaction describing his social-human coexistence. Habermas' observations regarding technological introjections into the life-world causing the impoverishment of symbolic interchange, explains his reaction, through discourse theory, against the loss of meaning in experience and against forms of degradation of human conditions. "This intention is to be found not only among technocrats of capitalism but also among those of bureaucratic socialism. It so happens that technocratic consciousness obscures the fact that institutional frameworks, while mediated through common language, can only dissolve themselves following rational action schemes, else running the risk of being excluded from essential dimensions, which ultimately offer access to humanization."[84] There, one wishfully envisions the creation of a new form of humanism.[85] Therefore, he states: "The liberating force of reflection cannot be replaced by the spread of technologically applicable knowledge."[86]

In the words of Weber, potential and safeguards of humanitas, which legitimate justice seeks to protect, are crushed under the effects of staunch dominance. In the absence of these elements, the result is, clearly, dehumanization.[87] How to react to a state of being in which interaction is smothered by work, the world of life is sapped dry by dominating systems, wilting away the sense of experience? How does the humanization of justice respond to its existential circumstances in the process of modernizing the paradoxical role from creator to annihilator?[88] And this, considering that modernity opens itself at a time in history in which it is necessary to name human rights, distinguishing them from mere technical knowledge. Modernity celebrates the rise of technique and sinks the ethics vessel as, dialectically, it invents the imposition of human rights, as a restriction in terms of the advancement of technology

(Technik) that leverages power (Macht). Where the life-world is determined by the value of money (Geld) and of power (Macht), the defeat of ethics represents the victory or barbarity. Therefore, in the admonitions of Max Weber, within the logical framework of modern rationalization, ethical issues become irrational when faced with a world beleaguered by target-related logic: "From an end-driven rational stand point, however, rationality which refers to values will always be depicted as irrational, increasingly so as the bar is raised to absolute standards; for, the more one focuses on the actual value of action (pure moral attitude, beauty, absolute kindness, total fulfillment of duties) the less the consequences of these actions will be reflected".[89]

Therefore, ethical concerns inherent to a social and cultural critique of human rights do not merely involve operative knowledge of technical-legal issues, but a knowledge that is focused on self-comprehension based on humanitas itself. A legal culture whose main concern contemplates complementary elements within a number of human rights dimensions, is a judicial culture committed towards emancipatory goals in harmony with the mission to humanize a society, reified by the lack of consciousness regarding its own ethos. In times when the art of practicing law is squandered through the aseptic tools of market needs, legal science itself becomes an instrument of action and, thus, loses its meaning, especially as an instrument of domination, increasingly forfeiting its more noble functions – safeguarding human dignity and combating unbridled challenges to the principle of reality. One cannot form people for a democratic, pluralistic and tolerant culture outside the framework of human rights, which becomes the driving force in establishing ethical boundaries within contemporary legal premises. If the law, as a category, belongs to the life-world (Lebenswelt), then the current legal system will have to avoid becoming a victim of technology, resisting colonization and reification; furthermore, jurists will face the challenge of engaging in humanistic resistance ethics[90] countering the emergence of the latest forms of terror which threaten the survival of the Dasein itself.

If 'humanism' infers 'humanity' (humanitas; humanity; humanité; humanität; umanità), what then is humanity? Well, humanity is the common, inalienable destiny to which every person who lives in this world is attached, a fact that, in and of itself, demands the necessary worldly administration within the sphere of the same common oikós. This reciprocal co-existential dependency is heralding a new logic of sharing that will pave the way towards every action, gathering momentum to make it all feasible, in other words, the subjective world subject to a strict dependency on the objective world, structured within the political framework of social life. In this sense, Cicerus' maxim comes into evidence: "Great is the force of humanity" (Magna est vis humanitatis). Humanitas is not a formal attribute of human beings, but a characteristic of its identity, of its own turf and, therefore, of historical, social and political relevance. The understanding that man is the author of his own existence is a part of this path towards human emancipation itself. At his famous Paris conference, October 29th, 1945, congruent with his existential perspective, Sartre notes: "If man, as the existentialist sees him, is not definable, it is because, to begin with, he is nothing. He will not be anything until later, and then, he will be what he makes of himself."[91] A product of his own actions, man is capable of conditioning his own existence and, therefore, he becomes the author of one's own history, and not the instrument of technological history within emancipatory struggles in the framework of a technological society.

Humanism is, in essence, a form of ethical engagement. Ethics is merely the framework depicting responsibilities that affect us, connecting everything and everybody. If ethics is, etymologically, the habitat of man, then man's own destiny, as noted by Heraclitus ("Character is Destiny" – Ethos antrhwpw daímwn - Heraclitus, Fragments, 119), engaging in ethics is to renounce one's own destiny. The culture of humanism takes place through forms of engagement that seek to establish homo humanus' predominance over homo bestialis, considering that man only reaches his self-identity when his human aspect fulfils his daimon, his destiny, and cares for his habitat (ethos).[92] It is not the distancing from what is human, but the approximation towards what is human that can provide us with solutions for the feelings of depletion of our times. Man who does not take ethical ownership of questions affecting himself and dwell on the identity of humans, can join in with Roman comic playwright, Aristophanes, of the 2nd century b.C.:"Homo sum; humani nihil a me alienum puto" – "I am a man: nothing human do I consider alien to me" (Terrence, The man who punishes himself, 77). It is only the raging fury of unbridled advances that breaks the pact with ethos. The result of this fury is a dislodgement of the being from within itself for, actually, ethos as a house, represents a return to self-identity and self-knowledge. Ethics is the responsibility of man in what affects man and his environment, in the sense that man may not be viewed as foreign to his responsibilities in terms of engagement and social action.[93]

[92]González, El Ethos, Destino del Hombre, 1996, p. 19.

The formation (paidéia) of man's towards virtue is integral to a society in which concerns for the human being are above concerns for technology and the material world.[94] Following Erich Fromm's critical thought, the core concept in developing a human rights culture may lie in the engagement in emancipatory struggles and resistance ethics, pitted against man becoming a one-dimensional being, reclaiming human elements lost in history and overwhelmed by technological civilization. The holism of critical and formative consciousness tackles the complexity of what is human to echo Democritus in: "Man is a miniature version of the universe" – "Anthrwpos mikros kósmos" (Democritus, Fragments, B 24 Diels), representing the first step in staying the spread of ideologies distancing man from himself and, therefore, from his own habitat (ethos).[95] Thus, "humanism and ethics constitute, clearly, an essentially inseparable unit. Humanism is, in essence, an ethical concept."[96]

Humanitas does not take place through an isolated individual, nor does it take place through an individual for his private interests; humanitas inhabits social latitudes of life. Therefore, individualistic humanism is the opposite of socialist humanism, out of which a framework of legitimate human rights culture emerges as a praxis of social solidarity, reconciling man with the other and with nature. Social humanism distinguishes itself, therefore, from all other trends within Western humanism.[97] Social humanism is critical of market logic, of fetishized merchandise and of the reification of the life-world. A contemporary, social and post-metaphysical humanist is critical of alienation, of reification, of ontologism and finds, in the dialectics of history, his support for the comprehension of man and his human condition. Even if post-metaphysical humanism renounces the classic attempts to define man based on his essence, it continues to link solidarity and ethics as intrinsic to a form of engagement that prioritizes humanitas. It is not through depleting the ethos that this reactionary process against technology will take place – the technological foe that voids all things and dissolves the web of human solidarity.[98]

The ethical responsibility backing human rights today seeks to debunk technical mystification, indicating alternative routes for humanizing life in spite of technology. Therein resides a humanization task to be advanced by the culture of human rights. However, at the same time, as emancipatory forces are active within the field of critical humanism, science and technology itself cannot be excluded from the equation.[99] Within humanistic parameters, technology itself elicits new meanings. The use of technology that is not associated with human liberation becomes illegitimate and dominating while social applications of technology take on relevant human and political connotations.[100] Serving emancipatory needs, technology faces a wide range of challenges regarding the fulfillment of human vocations.[101] Thus, notes Marcuse: In terms of the established industrial societies, nothing is more sensible than the fear of that stage where technical progress would turn into human progress: self-determination of life in developing the needs and faculties which may attenuate the struggle for existence—human beings as ends in themselves."[102] There are so many goals and objectives in terms of the establishment of human rights that it is hard to know where to begin; were technology to serve humanization, its task in serving this cause would take some time to complete. At the core of ideas relating to a human rights culture is the concern with the development of human potentials that have been obliterated by a society of possessions, individualism, competition and the logic of amassing wealth.

So, one can glimpse in social humanism a consistent and systematic form of reclaiming what has been buried by technology with a thought agenda that necessarily involves a commitment towards safeguarding human rights in its different latitudes, when the law is there to carry out its role in protecting human dignity (Menschenswürde).[103] The social humanism program ends up as a remedy and a refuge against the tribulations of these unusual times. Therefore, critical humanism resorts to the legal framework as an important shield to preserve the order of, possibly, the most essential elements of existence and co-existence and, consequently, it must preserve, within its core, a consistent reflection regarding humanism as a form of strengthening its resistance against its own inclination towards self-alienation.[104] The empire of technical resources reflects in a number of facets the loss of both autonomy and the capacity of utilizing the potential contained in emancipatory reason and, on a practical level, it involves ethical, legal and political frameworks. Therefore, in light of early Marxian teachings, it is possible to optimistically develop a set of active resistance ethics within modernity. There is no need to abandon the ship of modernity, bearing in mind the longevity of the humanist critique initiated by the young Marx in Critique to Hegel's Philosophy of Right, and shared by the critical thought of Benjamin through to Adorno, of Horkheimer to Habermas and of Erich Fromm, in view of the sights projected over mankind in its diverse activity venues.[105]

Human dignity in the moral discourse of social justice for people with severe or extreme mental disabilities

Ana Paula Barbosa-Fohrmann[1]

Abstract: As a departing point for this paper, three different positions were identified: a liberal one, which defends autonomy and independence, a second one, which is grounded on dependence and vulnerability and a third one, which lays emphasis on human capabilities. None of them, however, includes people with mental disabilities. In this paper, we will therefore analyse whether Kant's moral philosophy represents – in opposition to these three positions – an inclusive theory. According to the Grundlegung der Metaphysik der Sitten autonomy is the capacity to accept freely and with self-determination moral laws and to obey them. By providing himself with laws based on reason, man is endowed with absolute value, and this is what constitutes his dignity. Therefore, autonomy is the basis for the dignity of human being and of every rational human nature. Furthermore, human dignity grounded on the absolute value of man presupposes that he is an end in himself. As an absolute end in himself every rational being shall therefore admit that everyone else equally is. Thus, reason, autonomy, equality and dignity form a relation based on motives. This paper will discuss if this discourse on human dignity also includes people with severe or extreme mental disabilities, i.e., if it regards them not only as men, but also as moral persons. Based on the assertion that human dignity is inherent to a rational human nature this paper will demonstrate that every man with no exception has human dignity. Therefore, all people with severe or extreme mental disabilities can be considered "men" in Kantian sense, and to that extent, they are endowed with dignity. However, this paper will tackle another intricate question: if the human dignity of people with severe or extreme mental impairments enables them to be regarded as "men" in Kantian sense, can they also be included in the Kantian conception of moral person?

Keywords: Autonomy. Dignity. People with Severe or Extreme Mental Disabilities.

I. Introduction

According to several philosophers, the conception of "person" is until today one of the most difficult issues in the modern moral philosophy (e.g. QUANTE and SCHWEIKARD, 2012, p. 90-104; WOOD, 1998, p. 172). Taking the confusion that dominates the research literature concerning the conceptions of "moral person" and "human being" as a starting point, we will examine these two conceptions grounded on Kant's Grundlegung der Metaphysik der Sitten. For this, we will use the group of people with mental disabilities, in particular those with severe or extreme mental impairments as case study. If they can be understood to be embraced by the Kantian moral conception of person, they consequently have self-legislative capacity to respect the moral law and to act having it as a sole sufficient motive of their will. They are hence provided with autonomy and subsequently with dignity. In order to establish the differentiations between "human being" and "moral person" and also to respond to the question whether people with severe or extreme mental disabilities are endowed with autonomy and dignity we propose as a departing point in this paper 1) to analyse three different theoretical positions on social justice for people disabilities and 2) to present some criticism on those theories. Subsequently, we introduce 3) some conceptual interpretations of Kantian autonomy as well as 4) an alternative interpretation of dignity based on (3). As a final point 5) we propose the application of (3) and (4) to some cases of people with severe or extreme mental disabilities.

II. The Current State of the Issue

1. Procedural Justice

1.1. John Rawls

The starting point of the discussion on social justice for people with mental impairments is the thesis developed by Rawls, which aims to found a universal and inclusive theory of justice (RAWLS, 1971, 1993, p. 5-6). In Rawls all individuals with no exception are initially under a so-called "veil of ignorance or unawareness" (KOLLER, 1996, p. 371), in which the contracting parties stripped of individualizing characteristics choose the foundational principles of justice for the political society.

However, under the veil of ignorance individuals are already endowed with a certain or a basic sense of justice although they do not know their origin, basic skills, natural abilities and social status:

> "First of all, no one knows his place in society, his class position or social status; nor does he know his fortune in the distribution of natural assets and abilities, his intelligence and strength, and the like. Nor, again, does anyone know his conception of the good, the particulars of this rational plan of life, or even the special features of his psychology such as his aversion of risk or liability to optimism or pessimism." (RAWLS, 1971, p. 137)

Still, as referred, individuals already have a sense of justice when they choose the principles of justice. This is an attribute that characterizes the person as moral, a concept introduced later on by the author in his seminal work (Ibid., p. 505). Another attribute of the person is the capacity for a conception of the good that is concretized in rights, freedom, opportunities, income, welfare and the social basis for self-respect (Ibid., p. 92). Therefore, in Rawls's theory, a basic sense of justice and a conception of the good constitute the so-called "two moral powers" of the person (Ibid.).

The distribution of the mentioned goods takes place according to the major principle of justice, which is divided into the principle of liberty, equality of opportunity and difference (RAWLS, 1993, p. 5-6). Such principles obey a serial or lexical order: when the list of the rights relating the first principle is set, it is sequentially followed by the list of the second principle composed by equality and difference. There is thus a progressive realization of the principles and corresponding rights. One of these principles, the one relating difference, which affirms that economic and social inequalities are fair if "they are to the greatest benefit of the least advantaged members of society" (Ibid., p. 6-7) draws our attention. Rawls's theory does not advocate a strict and equitable distribution of equality, but rather the reduction of existing social inequalities. This is a type of compensatory equality. Therefore, although apparently not all individuals with disabilities, particularly those with serious mental disabilities, can be included in the Rawlsian concept of moral person, the difference principle can be interpreted as rectifying, by means of compensatory equality, the non-inclusion of a great number of people with disabilities.

Still, it is to be asked whether Rawls's thesis need such a correction. Inclusion is perhaps embedded in his concept of moral person. This is so because all individuals can have a certain or minimal sense of justice. Sophia Wong, for instance, in a lecture given in 2008 in New York during the international conference on cognitive disabilities interpreted the concept of moral person in Rawls by referring to the idea of potentiality of all human beings. In her opinion, everyone has the potential to become a moral person in the original position under the veil of ignorance (WONG, 2012). But can this interpretation of Rawlsian theory based on potentiality be truly applied to the specific case of people with severe or extreme mental disabilities?

Another issue calls our attention: In Political Liberalism Rawls replaces the discourse of the moral person by the discourse of the citizen. As a member of the society the citizen cooperates limitlessly and throughout his life with it. Rawls asserts:

> "Beginning with the ancient world, the concept of the person has been understood, in both philosophy and law, as the concept of someone who can take part in, or who can play a role in, social life, and hence exercise and respect its various rights and duties. Thus, we say that a person is someone who can be a citizen, that is, a normally and fully cooperating member of society over a complete life." (RAWLS, 1993, p. 18).

In this discourse of full cooperation exercised by every citizen in the society, acknowledgment can be inserted. The acknowledgment, which is intersubjective, would thus be connected on the one hand to the fact that a citizen must respect the rights of others and fulfil his duties towards them. On the other hand, he is entitled to have his rights respected by others as well as to demand that these others comply with their duties towards him. Acknowledgment construed this way can, nevertheless, exclude people with mental impairments, since they are in most cases dependent throughout their lives of high levels of care and support.

However, by assuming that all individuals can potentially become moral persons because they have a basic sense of justice – but can people that suffer from a severe or extreme form of mental disability have a basic sense of justice? – , it could also be assumed that all persons in society can become citizens by means of an interpretation of the meaning of full social cooperation. The interpretation of full social cooperation is grounded on how the difference principle gains social concreteness, i.e. how it is enforced. The provision and granting of social fundamental rights, which are at the heart of the so-called social minimum (Ibid., p. 228-230), give the difference principle social concreteness. The social condition of people with disabilities in general, and those with severe or extreme mental impairments in particular, gains social acknowledgment – although there remain some doubts about the potentiality of people with severe or extreme mental disabilities to be regarded as moral persons according to Rawlsian theory – by accepting that they need care and support throughout their lives, in sum, that they are entitled to social minimum.

2. Dependency and Vulnerability

2.1. Michael Walzer

Communitarians emerged in the eighties as a movement of reaction to the liberal view proposed by Rawls. The communitarian model is grounded on the core idea that the individual belongs to a historical political community and because of that individuals are bound to each other by community values.

In line with this view the inclusion of all people with disabilities is defended by a discourse founded on the dependence of the vulnerable individual on the community and the community's obligation of generosity towards him.

In Spheres of Justice (1983) Michael Walzer distinguishes – in accordance with the idea of 'belonging' to a human community – between those who are members, who are bound to the community and therefore dependent on it, and those who are strangers, foreigners, and who therefore show vulnerability and defenselessness. In the latter case the community only has the obligation to offer hospitality and relief as well as to express good will towards them. This characterizes according to Walzer the so-called "principle of mutual assistance". However, a philosophical basis for this principle is, in author's view, difficult to specify (WALZER, 1983, p. 31-35). In our interpretation of Walzer's theory such principle would not be applied to people with disabilities who have been born into a particular political community. This is justified because they hold since their birth the status of members. These individuals are – this is clear – dependent on the community due to those ties established with it when they were born. For instance, if the political community, where the disabled person was born, did not have care as one of its values or could not afford with it, he would not possibly obtain it from the community. But within a smaller community, such as family or charity associations or those with religious nature he could possibly have access to this kind of provision.

2.2. Alasdair MacIntyre

Another view that is worth mentioning in this context is that of Alasdair MacIntyre. Vulnerability and dependence are virtues that underlie the author's discourse on social justice for people with disabilities. At different stages of life, in childhood, sickness, disability and old age, MacIntyre states, we are dependent on others or develop vulnerability and dependence on them.

According to him, the aid provided by one individual in a community does not imply necessarily a direct counter-provision of the individual that received attention, support or affection, but perhaps a debt that will be fulfilled in a future relationship established with other individuals. This makes the community, in which we are found, a complex network of mutual debts, by means of which we become attached to and dependant of each other. In the words of MacIntyre:

> "[we] become independent practical reasoners through participation in a set of relationships to certain particular others who are able to give us what we need. When we have become independent practical reasoners, we will often, although not perhaps always, also have acquired what we need, if we are to be able to give to those others who are now in need of what formerly we needed." (MACINTYRE, 1999, p. 99; see also GRAUMANN, 2011, p. 148)

According to MacIntyre a culture of giving and receiving based on the so-called "virtues of acknowledged dependence" (MACINTYRE, 1999, p. 119-128) should be built in today's society. Such virtues are synthesized in fair generosity. They are "the virtue of charity, or friendship towards God and human beings, (…) the virtue of taking pity, misericordia, and (…) the virtue of doing good, beneficentia" (Ibid., p. 121). These virtues are not dependent on our pure act of will or any legal norms, but only on our willingness to cultivate, develop and transmit them in community. All people with disabilities then have moral right to that fair generosity. The author is, however, completely reticent on the specific issue of codification of virtues and moral rights as legal rights. He asserts, in an excerpt of an earlier work from 1981, entitled After Virtue: "… the truth is plain: There are no such things as rights, and belief in them is one with belief in witches and in unicorns." And further on: "The best reason for asserting so bluntly that there are no such rights is …. Every attempt to give good reasons for believing that there are such rights has failed." (MACINTYRE, 1981, p. 69)

3. Human Capabilities

3.1. Martha Nussbaum

Lastly, Martha Nussbaum founds her discourse on social justice on "human capabilities", which since 1993 have been employed by the Human Development Reports of the United Nations Program for Development (UNDP) (NUSSBAUM, 1997, p. 275). The idea of capability refers to a concern for equality, specifically an equality that provides certain people with an improved quality of life. Nussbaum clarifies: "This focus on capabilities, unlike the focus on GNP, or on aggregate utility, looks at people one by one, insisting on locating empowerment in this life and in that life, rather than in the nation as a whole." (Ibid. p. 285)

On that basis the author proposes a list of capabilities and corresponding rights, which aims to collaborate in practical terms for the planning of public policies. The list presented by Nussbaum corresponds to the role of primary good in Rawlsian theory. The list of primary goods in Rawls embraces basic rights and liberties, freedom of movement and free choice of occupation against a background of diverse opportunities, powers and prerogatives of offices and positions of responsibility in the political and economic institutions of the basic structure, income and wealth and the social bases of self-respect (RAWLS, 1993, p. 181). This list thus supports powers of human reason and practical choice and has consequently a special importance for making any choice of a life plan possible (NUSSBAUM, 1997, p. 286). The capabilities and corresponding rights proposed by Nussbaum are:

> "1. Life. Being able to live to the end of a human life of normal length; not dying prematurely, or before one's life is so reduced as to be not worth living. 2. Bodily Health. Being able to have good health, including reproductive health; to be adequately nourished; to have adequate shelter.

3. Bodily Integrity. Being able to move freely from place to place; to be secure against violent assault, including sexual assault and domestic violence; having opportunities for sexual satisfaction and for choice in matters of reproduction. 4. Senses, Imagination, and Thought. Being able to use the senses; being able to imagine, to think, and to reason – and to do these things in a 'truly human' way, a way informed and cultivated by an adequate education, including, but by no means limited to, literacy and basic mathematical and scientific training. Being able to use imagination and thought in connection with experiencing and producing expressive works and events of one's own choice, religious, literary, musical, and so forth. Being able to use one's mind in ways protected by guarantees of freedom of expression with respect to both political and artistic speech and freedom of religious exercise. Being able to have pleasurable experiences and to avoid non-beneficial pain. 5. Emotions. Being able to have attachments to things and people outside ourselves; to love those who love and care for us, to grieve at their absence; in general, to love, to grieve, to experience longing, gratitude, and justified anger. Not having one's emotional development blighted by fear and anxiety. Supporting this capability means supporting forms of human association that can be shown to be crucial in their development. 6. Practical Reason. Being able to form a conception of the good and to engage in critical reflection about the planning of one's life. This entails protection for the liberty of conscience and religious observance. 7. Affiliation A. Friendship. Being able to live for and to others, to recognize and show concern for other human beings, to engage in various forms of social interaction; to be able to imagine the situation of another and to have compassion for that situation; to have the capability for both justice and friendship. Protecting this capability means, once again, protecting institutions that constitute such forms of affiliation, and also protecting the freedoms of assembly and political speech.

B. Respect. Having the social bases of self-respect and non-humiliation; being able to be treated as a dignified being whose worth is equal to that of others. This entails provisions of non-discrimination on the basis of race, sex, ethnicity, caste, religion, and national origin. 8. Other Species. Being able to live with concern for and in relation to animals, plants, and the world of nature. 9. Play. Being > able to laugh, to play, and to enjoy recreational activities. 10. Control over One's Environment. A. Political. Being able to participate effectively in political choices that govern one's life; having the right of political participation, protection of free speech and association. B. Material. Being able to hold property (both land and movable goods); having the right to employment; having freedom from unwarranted search and seizure." (Ibid., p. 287-288).

This list of capabilities and rights also applies to people with disabilities. In Frontiers of Justice (2006) Nussbaum criticizes Rawls's theory in particular because according to her Rawls does not include this group of people not only in his conception of moral person, but also in his conception of a citizen able to cooperate socially: "I shall argue that Rawls's treatment of the problem of disability is inadequate, and yet not easy to rectify. The full inclusion of citizens with mental and physical impairments raises questions that go to the heart the classical contractarian account of justice and social cooperation." (NUSSBAUM, 2006, p. 18)

Martha Nussbaum's view is thus exactly in midfield between John Rawls's and Michael Walzer's and Alasdair MacIntyre's theories. On the one hand, she is as liberal as Rawls in view of many roles played by liberty in her theory (NUSSBAUM, 1997, p. 277). On the other hand, she emphasizes dependence, communitarian attachment and individual vulnerability like Walzer and MacIntyre do. On her list, liberty plays, for instance, a central role in those capacities related to life, bodily integrity, senses, imagination and thought, practical reason and affiliation where it refers to self-respect and political and material control of individuals over their environment. Dependency and vulnerability take the form (or are acknowledged) of capacities to express emotions through attachments among individuals, and affiliation where it relates to friendship, concern and compassion for others.

III. Some Objections to the Arguments Examined

In sum, three different positions can be identified: a liberal one, which defends autonomy and independence, a second one, which is grounded on dependence and vulnerability and third one, which lays emphasis on human capabilities (ELLIS, 2004).

The liberal conception reveals that rights are connected to the fulfilment of responsibilities, and personality is understood under the perspective of autonomy and independence. In terms of implementation of public policies the liberal model stresses, for instance, productivity, paid employment and other income generating activities. Those who cannot fulfil the conditions of this model often remain in the periphery of the society. Invalidity, aging and dependence, for instance, are on the opposite side to a dichotomy that shows that individuals are measured according to their skills to produce revenue.

On its turn, the second, communitarian conception is characterized by assistentialism (or welfarism), since it stresses the vulnerability and dependence of people with disabilities. According to this model, care is recognized as relevant. People are regarded as independent social entities, who give and receive support and assistance during their lives. The acknowledgment of the conditions of dependence as well as the support to social relations and interconnections are, according to this view, part of human existence. In this sense, dependence is not a condition detached from being, but a very common condition of life, sometimes temporary, sometimes permanent. Furthermore, some other aspects of humanity can be revealed through it, such as connection among people, and the acknowledgment that care is need in different life stages.

In the third model, the capabilities approach can serve to build a structure of rights that empowers people with disabilities to reaffirm their own capabilities by means of social provisions, assistance and care. However, this is not an inclusive theory because it does not embrace grave, profound and extreme forms of mental disabilities, such as the extreme cases of people with advanced dementia, patients in permanent coma and children with anencephaly. Under these conditions, the individual's rational capacity, his capacity of emotional expression and his capacity of establishing social attachments is progressively reduced (e.g. patients with advanced dementia) or intensively reduced to a minimum stage of consciousness (e.g. a great number of patients in permanent vegetative state), i.e., he only has the capacity to perceive minimally – or not at all – his environment and to be attached to it (NUSSBAUM, 2006, p. 181). The universal inclusion claimed by this conception is therefore just as little inclusive as the liberal model criticized by Nussbaum. In this sense, Sigrid Graumann remarks:

> "This… means that the capabilities approach does not include all people with disabilities as Nussbaum herself claims. Indeed, anencephaly and permanent vegetative state can be considered extreme forms of damages. The determination of the limits of possibility of implementing basic skills, below which one can speak of a > human being, is, however, entirely a matter of interpretation, and it should not be understood as narrowly as Nussbaum proposes in Frontiers of Justice." (In the original: "Das … bedeutet, dass der Capabilities Approach nicht alle behinderten Menschen einschließt, wie Nussbaum selbst behauptet. Sicherlich müssen Anencephalie und dauerhaftes Wachkoma als Extremformen von Beeinträchtigungen angesehen werden. Die Bestimmung der Grenze der Verwirklichungsmöglichkeit von Basisfähigkeiten, unterhalb derer nicht mehr von einem menschlichen Wesen gesprochen werden könne, ist allerdings durchaus interpretationsfähig und muss auch keineswegs so eng gezogen werden, wie das Nussbaum in Frontiers of Justice tut.") (GRAUMANN, 2011, p. 168; translation by Barbosa-Fohrmann)

IV. Interpreting the Kantian Conception of Autonomy through the Conceptions of Existent Autonomy and Potential Autonomy

In our view none of three models is appropriate to respond to the main question whether people with severe or extreme forms of mental disabilities can be considered moral persons. (BARBOSA-FOHRMANN, 2013). We argue, instead, that it is possible to find a foundation in the theory developed by Immanuel Kant on human dignity.

Autonomy, in Kant, is the attribute to accept freely and with self-determination moral laws and to obey them (SCHÖNECKER and WOOD, 2004, p. 143). All values and principles that determine human actions should only be drawn by man himself. By providing himself with laws based on reason (MAURER, 2005, p. 75; EISLER, 1961, p. 82-83), man is then endowed with absolute value, and this is what constitutes his dignity (KANT, 1786, Ak: 434; SCHÖNECKER and WOOD, 2004, p. 142). Therefore, according to Kant, in Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten, "Autonomie [ist] (…) der Grund der Würde der menschlichen und jeder vernünftigen Natur" (KANT, 1786, Ak: 436). Furthermore, human dignity grounded on the absolute value of man presupposes that he is an end in himself. In their comment on Grundlegung D. Schönecker and A. Wood state: "Es ist diese [Autonomie] und keine andere Eigenschaft, die den Menschen zum Zweck an sich macht und damit zu einem Wesen, das Würde besitzt…" (SCHÖNECKER and WOOD, 2004, p. 143). In Kant's own words: "Der Mensch, und überhaupt jedes vernünftige Wesen, existiert als Zweck an sich selbst, nicht bloß als Mittel zum belie-bigen Gebrauche für diesen oder jenen Willen" (KANT, 1786, Ak: 428; see also BRUGGER, 1991, p. 895). As an absolute end in himself every rational being shall therefore admit that everyone else equally is (SCHÖNECKER and WOOD, 2004, p. 147).

Accordingly, reason, autonomy and dignity form a relation based on motives in Kantian theory. In this respect, we can ask if this discourse on human dignity also encompasses people with disabilities in general, i.e., if it regards them as men and moral persons.

Such considerations can, however, entail further questions. If we admit that people with disabilities – and in particular also those with severe or extreme mental impairments – are with no exception included in the Kantian conception of moral person, this affirmation leads to the acknowledgment that all those individuals are provided with enough reason to make their own choices autonomously and thus obey the moral laws.

Here, it seems that we should interpret the conception of autonomy that grounds human dignity in Kant's theory on two levels. On the first level, autonomy should refer not to the act of effectively using reason or intellect, but rather to an existent autonomy that every man or human being has. Furthermore, it refers to the potentiality that almost every man or human being has to develop it or not. In our view this existent autonomy together with potentiality make a man a moral person. In our understanding, such an existent characteristic provides every man or human being with existent autonomy as well as potentially provides every person with potential autonomy.

On the second level, existent autonomy originates the so-called "internal autonomy". Likewise, potential autonomy gives rise to "external autonomy". On the one hand, internal autonomy is grounded on the existence of human being. This existence by itself differentiates each human being from any other non-rational and non-human beings. Internal autonomy is therefore directly connected with our identity as a unique being, in short, with the fact of being born as a man. It also refers to the humanity in ourselves, which means, to our wide intrinsic distinctive trait of being able to establish ends in general, to orientate our lives according to those ends and not to make differences between us and other members of own species (WOOD, 1998, p. 172). Here internal autonomy is identified with an existent rational attribute that enables us to be qualified as men.

On the other hand, external autonomy is an attribute of every human being in their action with the environment. It is characterized by its visibility and by turning concrete what is particularly human. It presupposes what is human in us and the special condition of using or not our rational attribute to respect the moral law. In other words, it presupposes the special condition of acting according to the duty imposed by moral law or even of making use or not of autonomy as the sole and sufficient motive of our will to respect the same moral law (Ibid. on the specific meaning of personality). Here, external autonomy is identified with the use or not of our rational attribute that enables us to be qualified as a moral person.

V. Human Dignity in Kantian Theory founded on the Distinction between Existent and Potential Autonomy

As asserted previously, human dignity is grounded on Kant's conception of autonomy. Furthermore, it is also understood as a prerogative of a person that is his own or self-legislator. For that reason, this person has motives to accomplish with his own duties resulting from moral law (Ibid.). To quote Kant:

> "… imgleichen, daß dieses seine Würde (Prärogativ) vor allen bloßen Naturwesen es mit sich bringe, seine Maximen jederzeit aus dem Gesichtspunkte seiner selbst, zugleich aber auch jedes andern vernünftigen als gesetzgebenden Wesens (die darum auch Personen heißen), nehmen müssen. Nun ist auf solche Weise eine Welt vernünftiger Wesen (mundus intelligibilis) als ein Reich der Zwecke möglich und zwar durch die eigene Gesetzgebung aller Personen als Glieder". (KANT, 1786, Ak: 438)

And further:

> "… wir uns … eine gewisse Erhabenheit und Würde an derjenigen Person vorstellen, die alle ihre Pflichten erfüllt. Denn sofern ist zwar keine Erhabenheit an ihr, als sie dem moralischen Gesetzte unterworfen ist, wohl aber, sofern sie in Ansehung ebendesselben zugleich gesetzgebend und nur darum ihm untergeordnet ist". (KANT, 1786, Ak: 440)

Three different interpretations of these quotations can be inferred. A first wide one resides in the presumption that human dignity is inherent to every rational nature. In this sense, every man with no exception would have this status. Kant does not refer only and strictly to a being that thinks or effectively uses his reasoning, but rather to a rational animal nature, human being that differs from a non-rational animal nature, non-human being. A second strict interpretation presupposes that only rational beings that can self-legislate are endowed with dignity, and this attribute of self-legislation can be understood as a predicate only of rational beings that can use their intellect to elaborate the moral law and consequently to respect and obey it. A third alternative interpretation consists of admitting that every human being with no differentiation has dignity. But the reason for this assumption is not the same underlying the first wide interpretation. According to my conception of existent autonomy, every human being is born with an internal not exercisable autonomy. Assuming that every man with no exception has internal autonomy, everyone has as a consequence human dignity. Human dignity gains, however, concretion only in the field of potential external autonomy, when every man receives the more specific status of the person. Being qualified as a person he then can actively self-legislate and pay obedience to the moral law. Here, dignity means the dignity of the person. Accordingly, from both conceptions of internal and external autonomy we can deduce that not every man that is born with human dignity has necessarily the dignity based on the status of the person.

VI. Applying the Conceptions of Existing and Potential Autonomy and Human Dignity to People with Severe or Extreme Mental Disabilities

To illustrate the topic above we go further in our argumentation by applying the conception of existent autonomy and its equivalent 'human dignity' as well as the one of potential autonomy and its equivalent 'dignity of the person' to three different groups of people with severe or extreme mental disabilities. We discuss whether patients in permanent vegetative state, with advanced dementia and children with anencephaly can be regarded as endowed with autonomy and dignity according to our interpretation of Kantian moral theory.

1. Patients in Permanent Vegetative State or with Advanced Dementia

Here, we will sustain the position that these two groups of disabled people have existent internal autonomy and are born with human dignity. Thereafter, we will sustain that they have potential external autonomy and are therefore endowed with the dignity of the person.

The starting point of this construction is to ask whether we cease to be who we are in essence, in other words, whether we can loose our identity as a consequence of a severe medical condition or illness. A possible answer can be delivered based on our interpretation of Kantian moral philosophy. We understand identity as a unity with two facets: a static and a dynamic one. The static one we are born with and we do not loose it in the course of life. It distinguishes us as a human being from what we are not, a non-human being. The dynamic one depends on the static one and can influence it but cannot annihilate it. In other words it cannot make a human being a non-human being. The dynamic identity refers to our interaction with the environment.

There is, of course an immense literature on personal identity in the field of the philosophy of the mind, but we shall here only refer briefly to two contributions, namely those of D. Parfit (1984) and C. Belshaw (2000). Parfit establishes a psychological difference between the so-called "numerical and qualitative identities", an idea followed by Belshaw. According to Parfit, numerical identity is, on the one hand, based on the fact that each person is intrinsically unique and for that reason he is not identical to another one, even if this other one is his twin. On the other hand, qualitative identity consists of an identity resulting from the fact of having the same appearance as another person. In this sense, two twins are identical. Belshaw shares this position by asserting that the persistence of a determined psychology is necessary and sufficient to the continuous existence of a certain individual (BELSHAW, 2000, p. 266; see also HOLLAND, 2008, p. 163). Applying this categorization to the two specific cases examined here we can deduce from Parfit and Belshaw that the person who is in permanent vegetative state or has advanced dementia is, in terms of qualitative identity, the same he/she was ten years ago before he/she became ill, but, according to their views, who he/she was in the past does not correspond to the person he/she is now in the present.

We would, however, like to stress that Parfit and Belshaw's contributions are in fact psychological views of the identity founded on the person. However, if we – following Kant – admit a necessary conceptual philosophical distinction between, on the one hand, what human being is and, on the other, what moral person means we are able to make modifications to their position. We understand patients in permanent vegetative state or with advanced dementia to be constituted with a unique sole static identity that does not differentiate each of them from every other human being. The fact that they are unique human beings that exist for the sole reason of being humans and their existence is motivated by the same human end make them an absolute in themselves (reason and end). This understanding that we are at the same time reason and end in ourselves, which implies that we cannot be transformed into something else, a non-human being, configures our identity in every phase of our lives. Here, the constitution of identity is not founded on the person, but rather on the human being. At this point, we think what both authors call the numerical identity of a person can be conceptually corrected by using the designation of 'the internal identity of a human being'. In this sense, both patients in permanent vegetative state and with advanced dementia have internal identity as a result of their human status. They do not loose their identity or are not transformed into another non-human being because of their illness. Furthermore, the internal identity based on human status provides us with a single inner 'code' that makes us original. It does not permit our internal identity to be changed later in life due to illness or disability. After all, by asserting that a person who is in an advanced stage of dementia or who lies in a hospital bed for years in a permanent vegetative state is someone else different from who he was in the past does not take into consideration the identity understood as his single, unique and original code that was born with him and that made him who he is, reason, end and absolute in himself in different phases of his life. Being born as he is he has not only an internal identity but also existent autonomy and consequently human dignity.

We agree, however, partly with Parfit and Belshaw when they say that changes in appearance can happen throughout our lives and this can generate effect on our qualitative identities. We also agree that qualitative identity relates to the meaning of the person, however, not grounded on the same reasons proposed by both authors but on the fact that identity can have a dynamic, concrete facet that depends on our interaction with the environment, is based on the potential external autonomy and constitutes personhood and the dignity of each person. We argue, therefore, that people with advanced dementia or in permanent vegetative state also have external identity. We prefer the designation "external identity" to "qualitative identity", since the first one depends for its understanding on the conceptual moral construction of "potential external autonomy" and personhood, and the latter, according to its defenders, refers only to apparent traits of a person. In our view, those two groups of disabled do not either lose their external identity in reason of the illness or accident that led to their disability. Here, it is possible to consider that in these cases the interpretation of potential external autonomy can be extended to the memory of such persons. Let us explain: The preservation of the memory of patients with advanced dementia or in permanent vegetative state could be exercised autonomously, not properly by them, but with the assistance of other individuals, with whom they were connected before losing their memory. Stories told by such patients in the past or writings left by them can contribute to preserve their memory in the present. They can by such means affirm their own external identity and reveal their before-the-accident-values or illness that caused the coma or the advancement of dementia. The potential autonomy of these people can be here extended to the circle of people that were or are still close to them. Such understanding can lead to the exercise of their autonomy through others. This is what I call extended autonomy. The exercise of such autonomy does not imply the replacement of the will of the patient, but the acknowledgment that his will was known by his family, friends and/or acquaintances in the past. The past of the person can therefore serve to ground his external identity, his potential external autonomy and his dignity as a person in the present.

2. Children with Anencephaly

The external identity and the potential external autonomy of children with anencephaly are, however, much more limited or even unknown than the one of patients in permanent vegetative state or with advanced dementia, since the will of those children is and will not be known. It seems impossible to assess any will with potential external autonomy in such a case. Therefore, the autonomy of children with anencephaly will be fully transferred to their parents or tutors that according to "the interest of those children" will exercise it in society. Strictly speaking, children with anencephaly cannot be included in the conception of Kant's moral person, although from a broader perspective they could have potential external autonomy, which would be exercised by their parents. Just in this second sense they might be regarded as moral persons. But this interpretation would imply such a wide enlargement of the Kantian conception of moral person that the core meaning of the Kantian conception of a person, i.e. the capacity for self-legislation, to respect moral law and to act due to this sole sufficient motive, would have no more meaning. Opposed to the first two groups of severe mental impaired people, here, the past – and even the present – cannot serve to ground their external identity, their potential external autonomy and consequently their dignity as moral persons.

However, we can still reflect upon existent autonomy or the existence of autonomy in itself and internal identity in the case of children with anencephaly. Here, the conceptualization of existent autonomy and internal identity applies to these children motivated by the fact that they are born from a man and as men, and, therefore, they are different from a non-man or a non-human being. According to our interpretation of Kant, as human beings they are self-constitutive, since they are an absolute (reason and end) in themselves. And it is exactly what is human in them that constitutes their unique internal identity and justifies in the last instance their human dignity.

This construction of the internal identity and existent autonomy of children with anencephaly can also be further developed by drawing upon a number of propositions formulated by Johann Gottlieb Fichte. It is known that he deepened and sophisticated some of the Kantian conceptions, such as those upon which we elaborate in this paper. In his Wissenschaftslehre he proposes, for instance, that the "I that posits itself absolutely" is not a static fact (Tatsache) with fixed properties, but rather it is a self-processing fact-act (Tathandlung) (FICHTE, 1997, p. 16).

If the "I that posits itself" is a being that produces itself, so just for that reason it should be autonomous, since it owes its existence to nothing but to itself. Therefore, we can conclude that the "I that posits itself absolutely" only exists, since it has an intuitive immediate perception of itself, i.e., it acknowledges itself not as an object, but rather, according to J. Lèbre's commentary on this assertion of Fichte, as a subject that "redirects its identity to a unity: an I that posits literally itself as an absolute principle" (LÈBRE, 2011, p. 350; STÖRIG, 2002, p. 504-510). For Fichte autonomy seems therefore to be connected with a subjective attribute of self-acknowledgment, self-identification, which can – in our view – be translated into an intuitive (DÖRFLINGER, 2012, p. 213-234) self-perception of our own existence, which all of us with no exception are endowed with.

VII. Conclusion

In this paper we proposed an interpretation of the Kantian moral conception of autonomy on two levels: the first one relates to the difference between existent autonomy and potential autonomy, and the second one, which is founded on the first one and is dependent on it, establishes a difference between existent internal autonomy and potential external autonomy.

We also proposed an alternative interpretation of Kantian moral dignity grounded on those conceptual reconstructions of autonomy: human dignity justified by the conception of existent internal autonomy and the dignity of the person based on the conception of potential external autonomy.

Such conceptualizations were then applied to people with severe and extreme mental impairments, particularly those in permanent vegetative state, with advanced dementia and children with anencephaly. Concerning the two first groups of people we conclude that they have not only existent internal autonomy and human dignity, but also potential external autonomy and dignity derived from their status of moral persons. Concerning the last group, the one constituted by children with anencephaly, we conclude that they have existent internal autonomy and human dignity.

Human Rights: Pragmatic Utility, Theoretical Approach and Complex Societies

Giovanni Bombelli

Abstract: Globalization is a typical process of the complex societies and it has enabled the wide diffusion of the notion of 'human rights' related to different issues (multiculturalism, economic-social differences, gender issues and so on). Nevertheless this notion is very discussed and in this paper I will focus on two aspects: the pragmatic level and the theoretical perspective. Human rights have a pragmatic utility since they put in evidence 'subjective positions' and give them a legal protection through different tools (national law, international declarations, constitutions, non-governmental organizations). On a theoretical level the question concerning the foundation of human rights is problematic, with relation to their philosophical origins and historical application. So, on the one side human rights are really a new legal language but, on the other side, they call for the recourse to the legal positivist instruments (especially international Courts). We should shift from the traditional notion of 'human rights' to the protection of 'anthropological (universal) dimensions' as they emerge into complex societies. Hence the necessity to rethink the modern paradigm of human rights (based on the equivalence 'individual rights'-'human rights') and the contemporary one, which took shape during the last century and extended the 'list' of human rights to fields as education, labour and individual dignity. Complex societies require a more sophisticated paradigm and a new 'list' of human rights, grounded on new 'goods' to be protected concerning economics, the new labour sphere, environmental protection, genetic revolution and communication (i. e. the access to new technologies). This 'evolution' has to face the process by which the new pair 'soft law-hard law' progressively destroys the traditional vision of law as a 'complex' dimension raising, in this direction, the question about its western nature.

Keywords: Utility - Theory - Complexity

1. A Premise

As it is universally recognized, globalization represents a typical process within the contemporary and complex societies. It has allowed, maybe a little bit paradoxically (and vs. some perspectives[1]), the wide diffusion of the 'notion' of 'human rights', certainly more widely if we compare the current debate to the discussion held during the last century.[2]

Nevertheless, from a theoretical point of view the concept of 'human right' still seems very generic because of its association with many and different questions or claims. So, this notion is pragmatically referred either to multiculturalism[3], or to economic/social or religious difference[4] and to gender/sexual issues[5] and so on. For this reason it has proved difficult to conceptualize, on a theoretical level, the notion of 'human right', starting from the sixteenth century (and, then, from the origins of modernity represented by the Grotian De jure belli ac pacis (1625)[6] and, in some way, starting from Peace of Westphalia 1648).

This paper will proceed in three steps.

First, I will try to put in evidence, from a philosophical-theoretical point of view, the double profile of human rights: their pragmatic 'utility', on the one hand, and some classical and new questions related to their difficult theoretical foundation and legitimateness on the other hand.

Secondly, I would like to discuss a sort of paradox underlying the current debate about human rights and to outline a possible new conceptual perspective starting from an anthropological point of view and based on the concept of 'duty'.

Thirdly, in the light of this twofold dimension (i.e. pragmatic and theoretical) and also by drawing a brief historical perspective, I will refer more strictly to contemporary sociological contexts in order to put in evidence both the transition from a classical (melius modern) model of human rights to contemporary perspective and, most importantly, the necessity to elaborate a new and wider paradigm or spectrum of human rights, in some way more suited and adequate to complex societies and with reference to their philosophical and political-legal sceneries.

2. Pragmatic 'utility' and theoretical dimension

From a philosophical and legal point of view, my opinion can be summed up in two points (strictly related with two aspects of human rights): a pragmatic level and a theoretical dimension.

The first point concerns the pragmatic utility of human rights.

In other words, what we traditionally name 'human rights' have an important pragmatic or, better, performative utility (efficacy) in order to give, and to guarantee, a legal protection to many 'subjective (individual) positions'. Nevertheless, this point (and always on a pragmatic level) presents some problems, particularly with regard to the difficulty for their extension to some peculiar subjects, namely the so called 'collective' or 'general' subjects. So think, for instance, of the political and social relevance achieved by many minority groups referring to different cultural, religious or political perspectives (and so on: this is a problem, [6] Hugo Grotius, De jure belli ac pacis (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr-Paul Siebeck, 1990).

I think, also in Taylor's perspective previously mentioned[7]).

More precisely, the point is the following one.

Human rights, pragmatically and generally, put in evidence 'positions', 'situations' and questions concerning the individual sphere which, normally, can be protected by legal and institutional instruments. From this point of view we can sometimes observe a superimposition of many levels and degrees, which frequently are not distributed according to a hierarchical order[8]: national law, national Constitutions, international Declarations, non-governmental organizations (NGO[9]) and so on (this phenomenon originates many contradictions[10]).

Obviously the claims of human rights can be rhetoric and politically abused, but they certainly offer a sociological-cultural enlightenment and endorsement to many different situations: sexual/genders discriminations, cultural or religious subordinations or, also, claims of the relevance of historical heritages.

These brief remarks show how difficult is to define, also on a pragmatic level, the 'content' of the notion of 'human right' and, consequently, to provide a legal protection. In other words, the pragmatic dimension raises the necessity to consider and to re-examine the conceptual profile of the question, starting from the problematic foundation of human rights on a theoretical level.

Roland Minnerath, Ombretta Fumagalli Carulli and Vittorio Possenti (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 2010): 171-187.

In fact, and in spite of their pragmatic utility, from a conceptual point of view human rights are a very discussed matter (and, in some way, they must be discussed): from the earliest Declarations of the XVIIIth century human rights have been continually elaborated and defined. In very few words, the points in question are: what is a 'human right'? What do we really mean by the words 'human' and 'right'? Furthermore: even though the western origin of the concept of 'right' is generally referred to an 'individual subject', nowadays can we talk about a sort of 'humankind right' nowadays? From this point of view, the analytical perspective can certainly offer interesting reference points perspectives but, in some way, it seems unable to gather the current debate about human rights.

Hence, within this conceptual framework, I would like to put forward some considerations about classical-theoretical (but at the same time, at least partially, operative) questions which, nevertheless, are more and more discussed.

More precisely, I will focus on the following points: a) the philosophical origins of human rights, b) the anthropological model underlying the classical-modern notion of 'human right' and c) the historical (or pragmatic) articulation of the model of human rights.

a) The first question concerns the philosophical origins, or the conceptual foundations, of 'human rights'. As is well known, this point represents a classical question, since the Classical age to the modernity.

The problem was frequently understood trough the pair 'natural law-positive law' or similarly 'natural reason (phusis)-political (violence) power'. Within these conceptual pairs the notion of 'human right' was referred to the first level, that is to say to the 'natural reason (law)', as notoriously we can see in Antygone (tough along a very questionable interpretation dating from the Hegelian tradition) and also, along different lines, in Stoicism and Christian tradition.

But this question received a more precise definition starting from the modern period.

This passage represented a crucial transition since the new political scenery, dominated by the role of the State as a creator of law, encouraged a new and rich reflection about the nature and the legitimateness of human rights. More precisely, the necessity to (re)discuss, in the light of new paradigms, why and how we can talk about 'human rights' emerged: in other words, the necessity to deepen the conceptual bases of human rights. Hence the rethinking of some classical schemas and, consequently, the proposal of new models.

Very rhapsodically, within the modern debate we can observe at least four models: the natural justification of human rights, only partially understood along the line of the classical tradition and, more explicitly, referred to the rational paradigm based on the concept of reason as a 'natural dimension' (Grotius); the historical model (lato sensu according to the Hegelian perspective), whose pivotal idea was the notion of 'human right' as a result of the historical movement; the utilitarian perspective, in some way underlying to the pragmatic perspective previously mentioned, and inspired by British tradition (especially from Bentham) and, finally, a vision of human rights as a theoretical framework legitimated by a widespread and socially shared public opinion[11].

The point is that all these paradigms appear unable to interpret the contemporary sceneries. This for two reasons. The first one concerns the crisis of their conceptual bases, that is to say respectively the categories of 'reason', 'history', 'utility' and 'shared opinion'. Furthermore, we have to consider the 'multicultural question': in other words, the relevant presence in western societies of many cultural models, and very differently from the western tradition, in some way implies a radical rediscussion of the entire western heritage concerning human rights.

b) A second aspect, strictly related to the previous one, concerns the model of human being underlying the doctrine of human rights. In fact, from a strict legal and philosophical point of view, the previous remarks highlight, in particular, the 'anthropology' implied by human rights.

In other words, the (modern) model of 'human right', if we accept the French Revolution as its recent historical origin, is grounded on a very peculiar notion of 'human being', which is still fundamentally based (in the state of nature) on an atomist or individual model. This point clearly emerges even before the French Revolution in The Second Treatise of Government by John Locke:

> "To understand Political Power right, and derive it from its Original, we must consider what State all Men are naturally in, and that is, a State of perfect Freedom to order their Actions, and dispose of their Possessions, and Persons as they think fit, within the bounds of the Law of [11] Burton M. Leiser and Tom D. Campbell, Human Rights in Philosophy and Practice (Aldershot Burlington: Ashgate, 2001); Francesco Viola, I diritti umani sono naturali? (Milano: Vita e Pensiero, 2009); Francesco Viola, Diritti umani e globalizzazione del diritto (Napoli: ESI, 2009); Francesco Viola, Diritti umani, diritto naturale, etica contemporanea (Torino: Giappichelli, 1989).

> Nature, without asking leave, or depending upon the Will of any other Man. A State also of Equality, wherein all the Power and Jurisdiction is reciprocal, no one having more than another: there being nothing more evident, than that Creature of the same species and rank promiscuously born to all the same advantages of Nature, and the use of the same faculties, should also be equal one amongst another without Subordination or Subjection[...]"[12]

In substance, the main anthropological model implied by the doctrine of human rights was shaped within a western image of 'human being', which is historically and culturally determined (we will see this point in depth hereinafter). Once again, this question emerges particularly within the contemporary multicultural social contexts: in fact, the mentioned presence of many and different cultural models implies the diffusion of as many anthropologies (i.e., for a legal case, the widely debated 'excision question' and their criminal consequences[13]).

Beyond the debate about the notions of interculturalism and multiculturalism, which is sometimes politically oriented, the doctrine of human rights will have to face anthropological models, as well as notions of 'human right', that are very different compared to our cultural tradition.

c) From an historical point of view, the previous contradictions and aporias, related both to the pragmatic and theoretical level of human rights, become more evident. In particular, we should briefly consider some historical cases of the twentieth century and, in particular, the condemnation of Nazism and the critic to Communism.

In both cases there is no doubt about the pragmatic violation of human rights but, on a philosophical-legal level, the question involves the theoretical justification of the condemnation.

As is known, in the first case during the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials the legal basis for the condemnation of many Nazis was represented by the discussed notion of 'crimes against humanity' (which presupposed the concept of human dignity)[14]. But this latter notion was a [14]About this point we have to remember the Resolution 95/I (1946) of the United Nations General Assembly and the so-called Nuremberg Code (or Nuremberg Principles):

very problematic one: both from a legal point of view (because it was a formal violation of a principle of criminal law based on the axiom nullum crimen sine lege), and from an historical point of view (Nazis were sentenced by the winner countries).

The question about Communism or, better, Stalinism was treated in a similar way. Obviously, no doubt about the pragmatic violation of human rights perpetrated during the Stalinist period but, once again, the question involves the legal (and philosophical) reason of this violation. So, starting from the famous denounce of the Stalinism by Khrushchev (the so-called Khrushchev's Report: 1956), the condemnation of Stalinism became a political condemnation, whereby the legal reference to the concept of human rights turned into a political condemnation of the socialist movement as a whole all to the (supposed) 'political good' embodied by Liberalism.

In other words: once again both cases show the pragmatic utility of the notion of human right, especially in order to provide a legal protection for 'weak subjects', but, at the same time and from a theoretical point of view, they reveal the difficult foundation of the doctrine of human rights. Somehow the evocation of human rights frequently becomes contradictory: born to be a theoretical tool to protect 'weak subjects', human rights might end up turning into a strong tool for political powers or ideological movements.

The point does not involve only some tragic historical transitions, but concerns also the crucial relation between human rights and democratic systems. This is a much less developed question. More clearly: are we sure that democracy is always a sort of 'bulwark' (or the appropriate defence) of human rights[15]?

Notice that this relation should not be confused or mixed with the relation between democracy and capitalism: discussing democracy does not imply discussing capitalism and vice versa. In other words, from a historical and theoretical point of view there is no necessary equation between the former and the latter: as a matter of fact, there are democratic systems substantially lacking of capitalist development (i.e. some western countries) and, on the contrary, totalitarian assets wherein a form of capitalist structures has flourished (generally a State-capitalism) with a clear violation of human rights (for instance, and paradigmatically, China).

3. A paradox and a proposal

The previous remarks not only reveal the difficulty of conceptualizing appropriately the notion of 'human right' but, maybe, produce a little paradox.

On the one hand, 'human rights' really represent a new (international-transnational) legal language[16]. In some way, they try to go beyond (along the lesson of the 'Radbruch formula'[17]) the positivist model of 'rule of law' based on the role of the State and, hence, beyond its limits: in other words, the doctrine of 'human rights' aims to be a step for a more just society. In other words, human rights aim towards a 'new global order' and, hence, new forms of sovereignty[18]: in fact, how could we protect human rights without radically new (and non-state) institutions? The goal of this process, I guess, is a cosmopolitan scenery[19] and maybe, ultimately, a sort of kantian legal–philosophical order[20].

But, on the other hand, human rights necessarily imply and evoke (at least: at the moment and in many cases) the recourse to the legal 'positivist' tools: that is to say, the protection of human rights is still essentially based on the central role played by international Courts, which are sometimes (or, better, almost always) a mere 'emanation' of politics and power of national States[21].

Just this paradox, and the pragmatic and theoretical dimensions of human rights, push to deepen the question and to sharpen the solutions. In fact, this perspective maybe makes room for a theoretical proposal based fundamentally on an anthropological rethinking of human rights and on the idea of 'duty'.

From a philosophical point of view, we may need a new interpretation of human rights. In other words, we should discuss the 'traditional' perspective: this implies a transition from the usual notion of 'human rights', in some way frequently grounded on a 'classical (i.e. western and modern) list' of clearly recognized/legalized 'subjective positions', to another and wider perspective. It should aim to the protection of what we could name 'anthropological dimensions' (i.e. identity, freedom of worship, and so on[22]), which, unlike the traditional legal notion of human rights, present an unquestionable, universal, recognizable and intercultural nature.

In a few words and more precisely: what we should protect are not legal positions (rights) but, first of all, human (universal) dimensions. Obviously, they can have many different historical and legal articulations: hence the possibility to conceive 'new' human rights (see better below). This transition could be described as follows: we should move from the concept of 'human right', frequently and positively codified, to the notion of 'right to the respect of (human and universal) dimensions'. Moreover, we have to place this perspective into a wider, general and progressive cultural transition (equally sociological and legal): the transition from the prevalence of the 'objectivity' of law, grounded on an ontological or rational legitimateness, to the centrality of a sort of 'subjective perception' of law as a 'personal or individual' dimension.

Hence the role of duties, that is to say the other side of rights. Within contemporary complex societies, maybe we should start thinking about the centrality of duties: so we should focus primarily on the idea of 'human duties'. In other words, 'risk societies'[23] reintroduce the crucial and traditional nexus 'right-duty' and, then, the necessity of its global rethinking (where the stress should be put, now, also on the second element: the 'duty'). Furthermore the notion of 'human right' logically implies, more and more, the notion of 'human duty' or, more widely, the dimension represented by 'inter-subjective (social, collective) responsibility': only in this way we can elaborate a doctrine of human rights really consistent with our social contexts. This is an absolutely decisive point within a scenery dominated by complex societies.

4. Complex societies and paradigms of human rights

The conceptual framework hitherto suggested, including its historical background and its many conceptual contradictions, might be a useful conceptual model in order to discuss the evolution of the contemporary western countries or, by a common expression, complex societies. In fact, within these societies the conceptual and operative difficulties implied by the strict interlacing between theoretical and pragmatic dimension of human rights clearly emerge.

Unlike the 'traditional' social models, the contemporary and globalized complex societies[24] present a close superimposition between many social spheres (or ambits). In other words, there is a sort of recombination among the distinct levels. In fact, complex societies are characterized by the progressive development of a circle including politics, economics, law, and (last but not least) the just mentioned difficult coexistence of many cultural models (multiculturalism). These are the main reasons to rethink the traditional 'paradigms' about 'human rights'[25].

In this direction, and in order to better understand the new complex sceneries, maybe we can try to trace (by a very brief historical glance) a short typology of the recent (i.e. modern) conceptual and operative models or paradigms underlying the theory of human rights. So, in a very schematic manner and from a philosophical-legal point of view, the conceptualization of the notion of 'human right' is grounded [23] Ulrich Beck, Risk Society: Towards a New Modernity (London: Sage, 1992).

[24] For this notion see for instance: Malcom Waters, Globalization (London-New York: Routledge, 2001): especially chapters 5, 6, 7; but see also the classical Niklas Luhmann, Rechtssoziologie (Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1972).

[25] Human Rights: an Agenda for the Next Century, ed. Louis Henkin and John Lawrence Hargrove (Washington D. C.: The American Society of International Law, 1994).

at least on two paradigms: a) the 'traditional' (or classical-modern) one and b) the contemporary perspective.

a) What we could define the 'classical paradigm' was a typical product of the 'traditional' contexts. It developed, in particular, within modern societies and, above all, within western social models, grosso modo starting from the beginning of the twentieth century but with their philosophical premises dating back to the seventeenth century.

In fact, in these contexts it was relatively easy to 'recognize', on a sociological level, the fundamental subjective rights and, hence, 'human' rights. On a conceptual level, this identification of human rights based on an anthropological equation between 'subject/legal subject' and 'human being', in some way chiefly according to the just mentioned Locke's lesson (but, in some way, similarly to Kant) which was notoriously based on the crucial role played by the protection of three original individual spheres: 'life', 'property', 'freedom'[26].

In this paradigm you can notice a sort of perfect equivalence between 'individual (subjective) rights' and 'human rights': that is to say, and more precisely, a close relation between 'citizen (citizen of a State)' and 'human being' (but for this point see also the universal Declarations of the eighteenth century and many other Charters of the nineteenth century).

b) The contemporary model of human rights, which somehow has characterized the western societies during the last century, extended the 'list' of human rights created during the first generation of theorization in this field and, then, the apparatus of their legal instruments.

More precisely, during the twentieth century, because of the crucial role played by the so called Welfare State (for this point see, for instance, the entire work developed at the Centre of Rights Development of the University of Denver), the debate focused on new 'human rights': in other words, on a new typology of human rights. The western societies of the last century were characterized by a great attention to the crucial relevance of some dimensions: education, labour sphere (principally understood in terms of right to have a job: about this aspect let me also refer to the Italian Constitution, art. 1) and individual dignity, particularly for disabled persons[27].

[27] Human Rights and Disabled Persons: Essays and Relevant Human Rights Instruments, ed. Theresia Degener and Yolan Koster-Dreese (Dordrecht et al.: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 1995); Clarence Wilfried Jenks, Human Rights and International Labour Stan-

This cultural turn, from the classical-modern paradigm to the contemporary model, presents at least two corollaries.

From an anthropological point of view a different model of 'human being' emerges. In some way, and differently from the classical-modern framework, the new human rights focus on a more 'dynamic' and complex concept of 'human being', which is to be understood in the light of all its historical articulations and social differences.

At the same time, we can also highlight a legal-philosophical corollary. This new perspective concerning human rights produced, symmetrically, a great increasing (in number and relevance) of new legal instruments (Charters, Declarations, Constitutions et cetera) and, finally, the more and more decisive role played by international Courts in order to identify and protect human rights[28].

5. Towards a New Paradigm?

Nevertheless complex societies, that is to say our (and, especially, future) societies, may postulate another and yet more sophisticated paradigm of human rights: in other words, a (possible) future model.

By a pragmatic approach, this paradigm should focus on new human subjects, spheres and dimensions, which are very different if compared to the previous western models based on recognizable social contexts and on a typical figure of 'human being'. Hence, only for instance, we can understand not only the future relevance, with reference to the doctrine of human rights, of 'new' subjects as migrants and, more generally, people coming from the poor areas of the world[29], but we can also appreciate, on a theoretical level, the crucial role played by some new concepts of 'solidarity' or 'mutual subsidiarity'[30].

Then, along this direction, we need a new radically different 'list' of human rights and a new paradigm of human rights. It symmetrically presents new and unedited 'legal goods' to be protected, with the great problem connected to their proliferation[31]. So, this new list should include, only as a proposal and drawing a sort of open list,the following levels or issues closely related to each other: a) economics, c) labour sphere, c) technology, d) environment and some new horizons. This list, understood as an ideal guide, could represent a political agenda in order to elaborate more updated public policies.

a) Economics and human rights. Economics is a decisive field for human rights. In fact, the recent and deep development of the economic dynamics calls into question the traditional schema of human rights. More precisely, from an economic point of view the recourse to human rights should be articulated at least in two directions.

On the one hand, human rights should provide a legal protection for 'weak subjects' involved in business transactions: that is to say, not only for the so called 'stakeholders' but also, and generally, for common people in some way affected by the actions of business as a whole. In other words, the global and disarticulated dynamics of the modern financial economics may imply the introduction of the notion of 'economic human right', above all in order to guarantee protection from finance speculations.

But, on the other hand, this point naturally implies a radical questioning about the legal responsibility of national or transnational corporations, also by rethinking the dogma of criminal law based on individual responsibility. More clearly: the extension of the philosophical notion of human rights to economic processes postulates, at the same time and from a strict legal perspective, a deep rediscussion about the nature of corporate liability[32].

b) Labour sphere and human rights. Labour sphere represents another and relevant field related to human rights. Once again, we can evaluate this aspect from two points of view.

First of all, within a 'market economy' (i.e. the current prevalent economic model of western societies) the doctrine of human rights can provide, chiefly through the concept of 'human dignity', a minimum protection to many workers. In fact, as is well known, the contemporary processes of delocalization and fragmentation of economics involve a radical and progressive disarticulation of the traditional organization of the labour market as well as of its legislation. Hence the crucial role of human rights which, in parallel with national laws, play a double role: both in order to promote a more just new legislation and 'to control' the new legislation as a guarantee for a basic or minimum protection.

But this point is also intertwined with some recent and new processes like, for instance, the so called 'land-grabbing', that is the practice based on buying or leasing (by transnational companies or governments) large pieces of land in developing countries. In similar cases, human rights have a double role. They can be pragmatically a sort of guardianship of the dignity of populations involved in these new phenomena, with particular reference to the labour conditions. But, at the same time, processes as 'landgrabbing' are concerned with the possible access to natural resources as a human right and, in this way, the protection of the historical and cultural heritage of many populations.

c) Technology and human rights. The recent development of technology represents another and very important dimension for a future and mature doctrine of human rights. More precisely, we can distinguish at least two different levels strictly connected to each other.

The first one is concerned with the fundamental question of the conditions of access to new technologies. In other words, the wide but different diffusion of technologies and, at the same time, the persistent 'digital divide' between western countries and the rest of the world, demonstrate the key relevance of the problem of the access to new technologies. This not only in view of the usage of technologies but also, and above all, in prospect of the sharing of scientific knowledge (or, more precisely, the technological know-how). This obviously represents a crucial precondition for an updated doctrine of human rights and, hence, to articulate a 'technological human right'.

The second level generally concerns the economic and legal repercussions related to technological development. So, let's think for instance about the question related to the legal notion of 'intellectual property', that is what elicits both providing legal tools to protect the scientific research results (i.e. the question of the patent right concerning some fields, as pharmaceutical industry[33]) and a serious comparison among different legal systems.

d) Environment and human rights. As is well known technological evolution involves the 'environmental question', which represents another and relevant horizon for a future doctrine of human rights. Apart from some old positions (as the distinction between Welt and Umwelt traced some years ago by Nicolai Hartmann), from a philosophical-legal point of view the conceptualization of the notion of 'environment' is very recent because it developed within the post-industrialization processes.

In particular, the awareness of the crucial role of 'environment' recently spread out as a result of the crisis and failure of some relevant international documents (i.e. the famous Rio Declaration on Environment and Development (1992)[34]and the subsequent international documents), which implies the configuration of new models of social responsibility.

Hence the possibility to think about a 'human right' to the protection of environment which is rooted, at least, on two reasons related to each other. The first one, in some way in a utilitarian perspective, is grounded on the necessity to preserve natural resources (water, air and so on) in order to guarantee the future economic development (see also the mentioned question about the 'landgrabbing').

But, beyond this 'utilitarian' reason, the relevance of the concept of environment within a doctrine of 'human rights' implies also a new model of individual and social responsibility. In other words, from a philosophical-legal point of view we should pass from a synchronic (and substantially traditional) model of responsibility to a diachronic perspective, focused on the central role played by the new generations

e) New frontiers and new'human rights'? The next doctrine of human rights will have to face new frontiers and fields, in addition to the just mentioned general relevance of new technologies and the problem concerning the access to technological knowledge[36]. More specifically, we can briefly outline the relevance of other and future dimensions for a theory of human rights such as biology and, for instance, robotics.

The ongoing genetic/biological revolution (i.e. particularly genomics) puts into question some theoretical presuppositions of the 'traditional' doctrine of human rights[37]. Thus, this scientific evolution, as well as the increasing relevance of neurosciences, can compromise some conceptual premises of the traditional perspective concerning human rights, usually based on the idea of personal and unchangeable 'identity'. In other words, the future question will be: is there a 'human right' to the genetic (that is to say: personal) identity?

Similarly, some particular technological developments directly involve human rights. For instance, we will have to take increasingly into account the developments of robotics[38] and the consequent problem concerning a comparison between 'human being' and 'machine'. Hence we will have to face some unedited questions as: is there a human right not to be technologically reproduced? Or also, and in a deeper sense: can we think about a doctrine of human rights (i.e. ethics) adequate to robots?

6. Some Future Legal-Political Questions

In conclusion, from a philosophical and legal point of view all the previous considerations show how the past (and, above all, the next) 'evolution' of the doctrine of human rights is articulated along radically new dimensions[39].

This implies the widening of the theoretical perspective as well as the operative ambits of human rights. Thus, starting always from a pragmatic perspective and overlooking the fundamental theoretical dimension, I would like to suggest some brief final remarks concerning two closely related legal-political questions regarding the doctrine of human rights understood as a 'global challenge'[40].

a) The first point concerns the 'concept of law' (by lexicon deriving from H. L. A. Hart[41]). The new sociological and political sceneries imply not only a rethinking of human rights but also, and above all, of the nature and the role of law, with particular attention to the new pair 'soft law-hard law' and, more generally, to the western nature of law.

In other words, the new conceptual pair 'soft law-hard law' (including its theoretical contradictions: what really means 'soft'?) not only progressively destroys the traditional vision of law as a 'complex' (hard, conceptual)' dimension but, along these lines, it raises the crucial question about the western nature of law[42], including the western doctrine of human rights. Hence, more clearly, the problem can be reformulated as follows: human rights are to be considered merely soft law or, in some way, they can be understood as 'hard law'? And what is their relation with other cultural models? In a wider perspective: what's the new relation between law and ethics?

From this latter point of view, if we look closer, the nature of law to come is at stake: or, better, which law are we talking about? Then, on a theoretical level, we can better appreciate the limits of some philosophical perspectives as, for instance, the classical rationalist paradigm elaborated by Jürgen Habermas[43] or, more recently, by Robert Alexy[44].

Of course, on a pragmatic level all these questions present some precise consequences in view of the elaboration of a doctrine of human rights (and well highlighted by philosophy of law): for instance, let's think about the vagueness of legal language, the difficult 'practicality' of human rights and, finally, the relaunch of their questionable nature. From this point of view, as partially just observed, the role of national (and especially international) Courts has become crucial, because they not only interpret law: they create law. With particular regard to human rights, Courts have elaborated the central, and at the same time problematic, concept of 'human dignity', whereby the theoretical question concerning the philosophical foundation of human rights emerges again.

b) The second point concerns the role played by this undetermined law in future social sceneries and, in particular, the nexus 'human rights-legal prevention': in other words, the new forms and sceneries of the relation between human rights (also in the light of the suggested new paradigm) and legal prevention/protection.

In fact, if we live within 'risk societies' (according to Beck's perspective), within a global horizon[45] the classical relation 'security (law)-violence' dating back to Hobbes has come to light as a crucial matter also in the context of western countries (at least starting from 9/11/2001). In this perspective, it should be reformulated not only in relation to the nexus 'human rights-terrorism'[46]but, more generally, paying attention to the problems aroused by humanitarian interventions and the involved political powers: once again, the pair 'political (legal) power-human rights'.

So, the final question is: whose human rights?

Human rights: has the present economic crisis proven Bentham was right?

Maria Clara da Cunha Calheiros de Carvalho

I. The present economic crisis and ideology. Notes from the Portuguese experience

The present economic crisis has set a scenario, especially in the southern countries of Europe, for the unfolding of a social tragedy that seems far from ending.

The financial troubles and the intervention of European institutions along with the IMF in countries such as Greece, Ireland, Portugal or, more recently, Cyprus has led to the implementation of austerity measures designed to allegedly stabilize the economy and public budgets, thus regaining the credibility lost with international creditors.

One of the common features of the intervention programs has been the adoption of legislative initiatives towards the reduction of the welfare state.

Hence, it comes with no surprise that Courts have been asked to judge if such regulations/rules are in conformity with the constitutional laws of each country. Frequently the issues at stake concern the violation of individual rights once regarded as the result of previously accomplished social and human development. For the purpose of this paper it is particularly relevant that we start by analyzing the arguments that have been used by partisans and detractors of austerity measures. For brevity's sake, we will only focus on the Portuguese debate that arose from the late Constitutional Court decision declaring that a set of regulations adopted by the Portuguese government violated the constitution.

First, let us briefly summarize the content of such regulations. At the end of 2012, the Portuguese government attained the parliamentary approval of the 2013 budget law containing several articles whose conformity to the Portuguese constitution seemed dubious. In fact, the President of the Republic himself, as well as several deputies of the opposition, submitted a request for the Constitutional Court to rule on the matter.

Following the issue of the court´s decision, the international press quoted some Brussels officials, allegedly disappointed with the outcome of the procedure, to the point that they "could barely disguise their contempt for the black-robed judges" who had just decided "that cutting the 14th month's pay for public sector workers and pensioners constituted unfair discrimination"[1]. One Eurocrat was even quoted to have said that the Portuguese constitution was the last socialist constitution of Europe[2].

The Portuguese government, having been asked to apply budget cuts worth 5.3. Billion euros, in order to keep the bail-out programme on track, had planned to do so by reducing public-sector salaries, pensions and benefits. The Constitutional court struck down four out of nine budget cuts before it. The elimination of one extra bonus month paid in the summer was found to flout the equitable treatment of public and private sector workers, the latter maintaining the right to the extra bonus payment. Additionally, the court also rejected the cuts in sickness and unemployment benefits on grounds that minimum payments established by law cannot be lowered.

In the aftermath of the Portuguese constitutional court decision, public opinion was divided between those supporting the government's point of view, and those applauding the reinstatement of the citizens' constitutional rights under threat.

This debate has moved rapidly towards the ideological field. On one side we have seen the use of arguments defending the revision of the Constitution in order to downsize the welfare state. Cuts on public employment, especially in educational and health areas are in order. On the other side, we find criticisms to what has been already defined as an ideological attack on social rights in disguise.

On matters of political philosophy, the debate that arises from the definition of the State's social role comes with no surprise. In fact, one should acknowledge that "since the eighteenth century [the distinctive political issue] has been whether government should do more or less."[3]

If we could consider to be true that in modern politics the debate between more or less government is being replaced by the discussion about what sort of activity politics is[4], we should admit that the former has now regained relevance. This debate has generated prodigious amounts of academic discourse that cannot be dealt with here. Nonetheless, for the purpose of this paper we are particularly interested in ascertaining what implications the reduction of the welfare state will have on people's rights and especially how it will reflect on the theory of rights.

At this point it is necessary to turn our attention towards the history of modern human rights as some of the arguments used in the above mentioned discussion that currently takes place in Europe seem oddly familiar to us, in spite of the fact that today's politicians are apparently unaware of the pedigree of the ideas they are overseeing.

II. Bentham's assault on natural rights

The well known "Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen" stands as a landmark for the building of the modern concept of human rights. It was the product of France's national endeavours to summarize, in a single text, the rights of all persons. However, its revolutionary proclamation of the existence of a set of inalienable rights that every man or woman ought to be acknowledged by did not cause a general and immediate applause.

In fact, it generated a choir of criticism instead; one can better understand why when we recall the tragic events that took place in France during the historical Terror period.

Among the critics, Jeremy Bentham stands as one of the fiercest. Although we can find Bentham's ideas on natural rights throughout his works, his main assault on the topic is contained in a posthumous work published first in French, and later in English, under the title of Anarchical Fallacies[5]. In this text, the author condemns not only the very idea of the existence of natural and imprescriptible rights, but also the listing of liberty, property, security and resistance to oppression as such. It is here that Bentham writes his famous contention towards the concept of natural rights saying it consists of "nonsense upon stilts".

Jeremy Bentham's scepticism about natural rights is rooted in his particular vision of the world and the law. We agree with Hart's view on the matter when he argues that Bentham's opinion on human rights has to be understood in articulation with his formulation of the principles of Utilitarianism. In his work A Fragment on Government, he expressed his theory justifying the limits of government by resorting to the goal of achieving the "greatest happiness of the greatest number" rather than by means of acknowledging individual rights.[6] This work appeared only a few months after the issuing of the American Declaration of Independence and Bentham reiterated his rejection of the very concept of human rights later in another paper published under the title of Answer to the Declaration of the American Congress.[7]

Despite being critical of philosophical conceptions that underlie the American and French Declarations, BENTHAM sympathizes with the republican and democratic revolutionary spirit that animates the Americans and the French. In fact, his ideas have exerted considerable influence in these parts, and particularly in France, where he translated his works. Moreover, BENTHAM receives the title of citizen of France, in the year 1792[8].

We will therefore briefly review here the various arguments that align Jeremy Bentham in his attack on the French Declaration of Human Rights. We will base our main object of analysis on the BENTHAM works titled Anarchical Fallacies, with the occasional mention of ideas and positions contained in other works. The thesis we seek to sustain is that Bentham's text currently continues up-to-date, since it is an excellent showcase of a set of objections to human rights that are still brandished by their detractors. Opinions are divided on whether the same criticism would remain valid today, given the subsequent Declarations of Human Rights which have arisen, notably the Universal Declaration[9].

We shall not deal with analysing this question, but rather seek to demonstrate that, in theory, many of the criticisms that have continued to be addressed today to the natural rights or human rights follow, to some extent, the line of thought of BENTHAM and many of the human rights theories themselves move within the legalistic pattern he used to analyse and criticize natural rights. It is clear that many of the current critics of human rights have the benefit of being able to take into account the actual practice of human rights, with special emphasis on that which has marked international relations. For that reason alone, there would always be room for disagreement. The focus will be the Anglo-Saxon tradition of criticism of the Bills of Rights, in particular, with noticeable influence of utilitarian philosophy. Later, we will briefly comment on these criticisms.

In the interests of greater clarity of the exposition of ideas, we prefer to bring together the main arguments used by the British author under three distinct sections, which were given the following designations: logical objections, political objections, and legal objections. This is our arrangement and does not reflect any division the British author included in his original text.

1. BENTHAM's arguments against the Declaration of Human Rights

a) Logical objections

In the text of the Anarchical Fallacies, as in many other works, the British author clearly expresses the intellectual contempt he feels for the "doctrine" of natural rights. This is, in his opinion, the result of a series of errors of reasoning that he analytically looks to deconstruct. These errors in reasoning are enhanced by the poor quality of the drafting of the text, aspect which we focus here as well, given that it is difficult to maintain a line between the purely procedural and substantive aspects involved in the critical exercise of the British author.[10]

sions: he starts with the analysis of the text itself, and then comments the adverse consequences that he envisions can derive from it. So he begins by identifying several flaws of the Declaration of Rights, from a logical point of view. One aspect relates to the use, criticized in the text, of propositions with a high degree of abstraction. In his opinion, the more abstract a proposition is, the higher the degree of probability of containing a sophism[11]. This is a flaw in the logical plan that, on the contrary, the English House of Commons would be free, thanks to the known British aversion to adopt provisions of an abstract nature[12].

The wording of the text in itself is the subject of particularly virulent criticism. The author considers that particularly bad, accusing it of being vague, imprecise, inaccurate and full of truisms. He even claims that it is a perpetual stream of absurdities deriving from a perpetual abuse of words.[13]. Indeed, the ambiguity would start with the very status of the Declaration as it appeared separated from the Constitution, but preceding it. BENTHAM, as we know, considered that the appropriate place to establish mechanisms for executive control of the legislature

[11] "But the more ample the extent given to any proposition or sorting of propositions, the more difficult it is to keep the import of it confined without deviation, within the boundaries of truth and reason. […] The more abstract – that is, the more extensive the proposition is, the more liable is it to involve a fallacy." BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy Bentham, John Bowring ed., 1843, p. 496.

[12] BINOCHE e CLÉRO, op. cit., p. 24, 21. BENTHAM says: "In the British Houses of Parliament, more especially in the most efficient house for business, there prevails a well-known jealousy of, and a repugnance to, the voting of abstract propositions." BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy Bentham, op. cit., p. 497.

[13] The British author considers particularly important the careful choice of words used in legislation, otherwise the result could be civil war. However, the expressions that the Declaration employs, seem particularly unsuitable and objectionable to him: "The logic of it is of a piece with its [the incendiary of the Efesian Temple] morality: - a perpetual abuse of words, - words having a variety of meanings, where words with single meanings were equally at hand – the same words used in a variety of meanings in the same page, - words used in meanings not their own, where proper words were equally at hand, - words and propositions of the most unbounded signification turned loose without any of those exceptions or modifications which are so necessary on every occasion to reduce their import within the compass, not only of right reason, but even of the design in hand, of whatever nature it may be." BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy BENTHAM, op. cit., p. 497. The great inspirer of utilitarian philosophy had, moreover, particular care with terminology issues and even created neologisms in English from Greek matrices. Some later became integral part of this language: vg. international, utilitarian, codification, minimize. GETTEL, op. cit., p. 398.

was the Constitutional Code[14].

The author points out in particular the blatant contradiction towards a tendency to affirm the existence of absolute rights and then make exceptions and limitations to those with an indefinite nature.[15] That is instantly evident to him in the analysis he performs of Article 1 of the Declaration: "All men are born and remain free and equal in rights. Social distinctions may be based only on common utility." BENTHAM criticizes the falsity of the statements contained in the first sentence and the ambiguity of the second one.

The first sentence is analytically unfolded by the author in four propositions: that all men are born free, that all men remain free, that all men are equal in rights, and that all men remain equal in rights. The author invokes the multiple subjections, as well as the family, social and legal ties that all are subject to in society[16], as well as the differences in wealth and hierarchy existing in society (between master and apprentice, for example) to support this accusation of falsehood[17].

He then proceeds to review the alleged ambiguity in this phrase "social distinctions can only be based on common utility," stating that a contradiction exists with the previous statement of equal rights for all. In fact, says he, one does not even understand what these social distinc-

[15] Cf. QUAH, The continuing Relevance of Anarchical Fallacies to Modern Rights Discourse, in "UCL Jurisprudence Review", 2002., p. 218.

[16] BENTHAM says: "All men are born free? All men remain free? No, not a single man: not a single man that ever was, or is, or will be. All men, on the contrary, are born in subjection, and the most absolute subjection – the subjection of a helpless child to the parents on whom he depends every moment for his existence. In this subjection every man is born – in this subjection he continues for years – for a great number of years – and the existence of the individual and of the species depends on so doing." The works of Jeremy Bentham, op. cit., p. 498.

[17] Cf. BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy Bentham, op. cit., p. 498. Among the many differences that the British author lists are those that are created by the differences of fortune, hereditary privileges, gender and hierarchical relationships in nature, as are the sovereign and subject, master and apprentice, doctor and nurse, among others. In the particular case of the relations between husband and wife, BENTHAM leaves no doubt as to his thinking about the recognition in this field of equal rights: "Amongst the other abuses which the oracle was meant to put an end to, may, for aught I can pretend to say, have been the institution of marriage. For what is the subjection of a small and limited number of years, in comparison of the subjection of a whole life? Yet without subjection and inequality, no such institution can by any possibility take place; for of two contradictory wills, both cannot take effect at the same time." Ibidem, p. 499.

tions are, or how to make them compatible with the previously proclaimed equality. In his view, if they are distinctions that affect equality, they override it; if they are in compliance with equality, one cannot see how they can exist as such[18].

On the other hand, the British author criticizes the list of natural and imprescriptible rights recognized - liberty, property, security and resistance to oppression - and that their establishment, without limits, makes them incompatible. Thus, pointing out, for example, that private property can only be established and be conceived as a limit or restriction on the freedom of others. [19].

All in all, however, it is not these more formal criticisms that constitute the fundamental objection to the theory of natural rights. As we will see, thenceforth, from a political point of view, those articulate with the deeply damaging consequences that this entails, according to the leader of the utilitarians.

b) Political objections

One of the fundamental reasons for the opposition that BENTHAM offers to the idea of the imprescriptibility of natural rights is political in nature. In his eyes, there is a manifest inconsistency in establishing natural rights conceived as negative limits for government action and, at the same time admitting that that same government is allowed to establish exceptions and limitations to those.[20] That is to say that its role (natural rights) as a desired brake to the arbitrariness of those in power was far short of what would necessarily be the intention of those who conceived the doctrines of natural rights.

However, if this is still an objection logical-political in nature, the truth is that criticism of BENTHAM does not end here. It is no coincidence that the text from which we have carried out our analysis has been rightly titled "Anarchical Fallacies". So the question is where the fallacies contained in the Declaration of Human Rights (or more correctly, the theory of natural rights that underlies it and that is truly the target of BENTHAM's attack) are likely to lead to anarchy. Or, put differently - borrowing the exact words of the author - are a threat to the entire government and the stability of society itself[21].

It seems to us that there are two main reasons why BENTHAM saw therein the existence of a threat. Firstly, the author considered that the Declaration was a standing invitation to insurrection as it made it almost a duty that the people should resent any violation of their natural rights[22]. Let us remember that one of the rights established was the resistance to oppression, which BENTHAM interpreted in the broader and most radical of terms. It is true that, even though they make no reference to the terrible events that characterized the era in France, they would not be oblivious to this interpretation made of the Declaration. As well remember some of the critics of BENTHAM's thinking, he lived a troubled moment of history, in which the fear of the "mob" was a constant concern of the upper classes of England[23]. Hence perhaps some exaggeration in the very radical interpretation which carries out the intentions behind the Declaration and its effects.

Otherwise we could not understand, for example, the analogy used by the English author to illustrate the harmful effect of the Declaration: this could resemble the legendary law that the murder of the prince on his throne gave the killer the right to succeed him[24]. All in all, it is to argue with the thesis that either "you always comply or never (comply) at all," accusing the revolutionaries of irreparably weakening the authorities of the present and future, to justify the destruction of order and previously existing authorities.

Obviously, Bentham was fully aware that the laws are not always good and that there would, therefore be cases in which disobedience would seem justified[25].

[21] Also in this sense, HART, H. op. cit., p. 79.

[22] That is clear in this passage: "People, behold your rights! If a single article of them be violated, insurrection is not your right only, but the most sacred of your duties." Such is the constant language, for such is the professed object of this source and model of all laws – this self-consecrated oracle of all nations." BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy BENTHAM, John Bowring ed., 1843, p. 496.

[23] Cf. BEDAU, Hugo Adam, Anarchical Fallacies: BENTHAM's attack on Human Rights, in "Human Rights Quarterly", 22, 2000, p. 268 HART also stresses the influence of these events in France and the fears they inspired in regards to the spread of social unrest, as a result of "contagion," to England itself, as a justification for the particularly vehement tone of criticism.

[24] BINOCHE and CLÉRO, op. cit., p. 20, 21.

[25] BENTHAM makes a distinction in this respect, between the "rational" or "anarchic" attitude that could be taken against an unjust law: "The rational censor, acknowledging

But what disgusted him was the idea that any law could be disobeyed, for no reason, without adequately addressing the consequences of this disobedience, also harmful to the peace and public order. Hence it is critical to emphasize the word "cannot" that limits the action of the legislature, in view of the protection of natural rights[26].

The second reason that the introducer of utilitarianism would have to identify an "anarchic" threat in the Declaration, has precisely to do with the recognition of the inalienable character of natural rights and therefore absolutely binding of the government. In his view, the entire government would forever be severely shackled in its ability for action.

BENTHAM's objection in this regard is better understood by reading another of his subsequent works[27], the Book of Fallacies that aims to carry out the analysis of the fallacies to which political discourse was particularly exposed. Now while we do not find any reference to anarchical fallacies there, there is an explicit statement of the fallacy consisting in the recognition of irrevocable laws. BENTHAM vehemently rejects the possibility of defence and consecration of these, stating, in a very eloquent and meaningful way that this would be worse than the despotism of Caligula and Nero.[28] However, the fallacy behind the French Declaration was precisely as stated, the one that induced anarchy:

"What then was their object in declaring the existence of impre-

the existence of the law he disapproves, proposes the repeal of it: the anarchist, setting up his will and fancy for a law before which all mankind are called upon to bow down at the first word – the anarchist, trampling on truth and decency, denies the validity of the law in question, - denies the existence of it in the character of a law, and calls upon all mankind to rise up in a mass, and resist the execution of it." BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy BENTHAM, op. cit., p. 498.

[26] In this sense, HART, op. cit., p.p. 81, 82. Says BENTHAM: "For such is the venom that lurks under such words as can and cannot, when set up as a check upon the law". The works of Jeremy BENTHAM, op. cit., p. 499.

[27] Subsequent in writing, not in the publication, of course.

[28] BENTHAM states: "Suppose this irrevocable law, whether good or bad at the moment of its enactment, is found at some succeeding time to be productive of mischief – uncompensated mischief – to any amount. Now of this mischief, what possibility has the country of being rid? A despotism, though it were that of a Caligula or a Nero, would be less intolerable than any such immutable law. By benevolence (for even a tyrant has his moments of benevolence), by prudence, in a word, by caprice, the living tyrant might be induced to revoke his law, and release the country from its consequences. But the dead tyrant! Who shall make him feel? Who shall make him hear?" BENTHAM, BENTHAM's Handbook of Political Fallacies, Harold Atkins Larrabee, ed rev., 1952, p. 56.

> scriptible rights, and without specifying a single one by any such mark as it could be known by? This and no other – to excite and keep up a spirit of resistance to all laws – a spirit of insurrection against all governments – against the governments of all other nations instantly, - against the government of their own nation - against the government they themselves were pretending to establish – even that, as soon as their own reign should be at an end."29

It should not be forgotten that BENTHAM, with the publication of his Fragment on Government, introduces the utilitarian philosophy that refuses to recognize the existence of natural rights, replacing them with a utilitarian principle of the greatest happiness of the greatest number. Thus, although he did not exactly enunciate a theory of rights, one can consider that the concept of collective utility[30] will act as a filter for the individual rights to be maintained and created. This is summarized in the following passage:

> What is the language of reason and plain sense upon this same subject? That in proportion as it is right or proper, i.e. advantageous to the society in question, that this or that right – a right to this or that effect – should be established and maintained, in that same proportion it is wrong that it should be abrogated […] there is no right, which ought not to be maintained, so there is no right which, when the abolition of it is advantageous to society, should not be abolished."31

That is to say that our rights should or should not be recognized in accordance with the benefit arising therefrom, in the light of government for the social whole, or rather, for the majority[32]. In fact, we must remember that BENTHAM has a pragmatically pessimistic view of human nature, considering that there are two enemies of public peace: the hostile passions and selfish passions. In this context, the role of government should be to achieve the necessary sacrifices to social cohesion and ensure safety[33]. However, from his point of view, the French Declaration emphasized both passions thus threatening social peace[34].

Furthermore, the British author does not believe that any existing government- past, present or future - ever has the ability to perform such duties and expectations. There is therefore also a problem here of effectiveness that emphasizes the need for its rejection[35].

c) Legal objections

For Jeremy Bentham no rights exist other than those that positive law provides citizens with, at all times. It must be said that to understand the concept of rights for BENTHAM one must keep in mind his Theory of Fictions[36].

According to this, the "right" and "obligation" are two fictitious entities, the first of which is a consequence of the second. That is, I can only claim to have the right X, when the law imposes a corresponding obligation Y. This means that the subject be forced to suffer a penalty imposed by law, should he not adopt the behaviour that such imposes and demands. The underlying reasoning is this: all rights derive from the Law, the Law results from the government, so there are no rights beyond the positive rights.[37]

The same is to say, in his opinion, "there are no rights without law- no rights contrary to law – no rights anterior to law."[38] The British author

[34] Cf. BINOCHE e CLÉRO, op. cit., p. 22.

[35] "A government which should fulfil the expectations here held out, would be a government of absolute perfection. The instance of a government fulfilling these expectations, never has taken place, nor till men are angels ever can take place." BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy BENTHAM, op. cit., p. 506.

[36] BENTHAM maintains that the word "law" is a fictitious entity that is used for purposes of discourse and is indispensable for it. He also states that the law depends on the idea of obligation for its understanding, since the efficient causes of the individual rights are two: first, the absence of an obligation imposed upon the holder of the right and opposite to the latter (i.e. each has the right to do what he is not obliged to do), and secondly, the presence of a correlative obligation on the other person (s) to refrain from disrupting the exercise of law.BENTHAM, Teoría de las Ficciones, Spanish trans. Madrid/Barcelona: Marcial Pons, 2005, pp. 165 e ss.

[37] In this sense, the analysis and opinion we follow here, offered by TWINING, W., op. cit., p. 703.

[38] Also in this identical sense, states BENTHAM: "there are no such things as natural rights – no such things as rights anterior to the establishment of government – no such things as natural rights opposed to, in contradistinction to, legal: that the expression is conceived the Law merely as positive law, namely as a command of a particular sovereign. In this sense, and borrowing from another of his expressions, the subjective right is the son of the law[39]. Although Hobbes's philosophy was not alien to his thinking, BENTHAM rejects the idea that the existence of a natural law of self-preservation in the "state of nature" could be conceived (Hobbes, however, admitted to such). There are two reasons for this: first, such a right to exist, would lead to the war of all against all (what is every man's right is no man's right[40]); and, secondly, there not being fulfilled an essential requirement, in his view, to all rights, which was the nexus of correspondence with the corresponding obligation. Who was the obliged of this right? BENTHAM denied that the corresponding obligation could be identified there and its unequivocal holder[41].

Indeed, in his theory of rights, the connection between rights and coercively enforceable obligations, due to the threat of a penalty, therefore plays a central role[42]. This is an aspect that is also associated with his concern about the effectiveness of rights. To BENTHAM, recognition of any system of rules cannot take place without the conditions of its existence being met.

Now the natural and imprescriptible rights which the Declaration spoke of did not seem at all to meet such requirements. In fact, the declared rights were so, regardless of acceptance or compliance, thus it merely figurative; that when used, in the moment you attempt to give it a literal meaning it leads to error, and to the sort of error that leads to mischief – to the extremity of mischief." BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy BENTHAM, op. cit. p. 500.

[39] "Right, the substantial right is the child of law: from real laws come real rights; but from imaginary laws, from laws of nature, fancied and invented by poets, rhetoricians, and dealers in moral and intellectual poisons, come imaginary rights, a bastard brood of monsters, "gorgons and chimaeras dire". BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy BENTHAM, op. cit. p. 523.

[40] BENTHAM does not have a contractual view of the origin of government (considering that the strength of contracts comes from the government and not otherwise) and does not endorse a vision of a state of nature in which everyone would be entitled to all: "Nature, say some of the interpreters of the pretended law of nature – nature gave to each man a right to everything; which is, in effect, but another way of saying – nature has given no such right to anybody; for in regard to most rights, it is as true that what is every man's right is no man's right." BENTHAM, The works of Jeremy BENTHAM, op. cit. p. 502.

[41] Here we follow closely the observations of BEDAU, op. cit., p. 271.

[42] HART, Essays on Bentham. Jurisprudence and Political Theory, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982, p. 86.

was impossible to equate them to "real rights", whose normative force came from the mandate of the law, and ensure the forcible compliance of the corresponding obligations that their effectiveness depended on. Which authority did the rights of man come from? The only justification led to theories that the British author rejects: those of natural law[43].

In the opinion of HART, which we closely follow, his rejection of the "doctrine" of natural law is based on what he calls "the criterionless character of alleged natural rights". This lack of criterion was an expression of the assumed separation of rights (subjective) and law (objective) and would have the terrible consequence of permitting that any political whim be confused with a right[44].

To some extent, BENTHAM is not insensitive to the idea that all men should have some and certain rights, but he believes that the defence discourse of the innate natural rights, as a way to claim those rights for all (of universal character therefore), is misleading. The author says: "But reasons for wishing there were such things as rights are not rights: a reason for wishing that a certain right were established is not that right – want is not supply, hunger is not bread".[45] One realizes why he employs the term "fallacy" to classify the propositions contained in the Declaration, as BENTHAM would precisely define this concept in his other work, as an argument employed with the intent to deceive (which is moreover, a questionable definition)[46].

The alternative, that Bentham gives us some insight to, is a theory of rights built on the principle of utility, which can be understood to be alluded to in the passage of the text referred above[47].

[45] Cf. HART, Essays, pp. 88, 89.

[46] Vd. BEDAU, op. cit., p. 265. A fallacy can be something that a speech suffers involuntarily.

[47] HART rejects that Bentham has somehow stated, a theory of utilitarian not legal rights that utilizes the principle of utility as a criterion for establishing and identifying the rights that man should have in addition to the positive. According to his view, the British author merely identifies two types of positive rights: the rights of freedom and rights to services. The reasons for this choice are, in his view, double in order: first, the principle of utility would also not be immune to social variations and nuances, not providing a more stable anchor point for the reasons for a rights theory than of the criticized "human nature" and, secondly, because such a theory of not positive rights would contend with his characterization of positive rights, in particular with its necessary correspondence to obligations that could be required to be satisfied by fear of suffering a

The interpretation that HART makes of the British author's thinking, the acceptance of the existence of moral rights (alongside real rights – the positive ones) was compatible with his utilitarian philosophy. Moral rights would emerge from positive morale created by each society and therefore from human conduct. Thus, continuing to pursue this train of thought, what BENTHAM denied was not that there were not only positive rights, but rather that there could be rights universally held by all, in a threefold sense: them not being the product of man or God, their existence not depending on social convention or recognition; nor constituting the reflex of certain features of human nature[48].

III. The Anarchical Fallacies and the crisis "discourse"

Let us look go back to our analysis of today's economic crisis.

The arguments now presented by those who are defending the downsizing of the welfare state are, in my point of view, very similar to the ones used by Jeremy BENTHAM in his works, and in particular in the "Anarchical Fallacies" even if, as I have said before, they do not seem at all aware of this similarity. Of course, not all the justifications given to us by Jeremy Bentham to offer a rejection of the concept of human rights are in place, nor has anyone ever been bold enough to publicly defend that human rights are just "nonsense upon stilts".

However, the fact remains that the suppression or reduction of the welfare rights are being defended as necessary sacrifices that government must inflict on part of the population for the benefit of a greater good. Ultimately, we are being told that what must guide government is nothing but "the greatest happiness of the greatest number". Moreover, the very existence of imprescriptible and unalienable rights is being questioned in a "Benthamian" sort of way as something which is incompatible with the free exercise of the powers of government.

As one should expect, the same supporters of the welfare state's downsizing are fearful of the ordinary functioning of democratic mechanisms, especially the expected outcome of general elections taking place. And again this recalls Bentham's first negative views on democracy.[49]

He changed his opinion later on, but there is a logical connection between the scepticism on human rights and the advantages of democracy.

To some extent the present economic crisis has put to a test Bentham's assertion that "reasons for wishing there were such things as rights are not rights: a reason for wishing that a certain right were established is not that right – want is not supply, hunger is not bread". Indeed, the lack of sufficient economic resources has made the public aware of the frailty of individual rights. Furthermore, there was continuous public pressure on the Portuguese constitutional court in order to convey with the restriction of rights. The reiterated statement that the people were living in a way "they had no means to afford" conveyed the idea that having rights costs money.

In consequence, the public disbelieve in the protection offered by any system of rights has increased. This is particularly so in what concerns economic and social rights. The question now is no longer to understand how to work towards expanding those rigths, but rather acknowledging that no progress ever made seems to be granted.

Fundamental social rights and existenzminimum[1]

Cláudia Toledo[2]

Abstract: While fundamental individual rights are unquestionably taken as subjective rights, the same does not happen with fundamental social rights. If they are subjective rights, they are justiciable. The main argument in favor of this understanding is based on liberty. The main argument against is the so called formal argument. In this article, fundamental social rights are stated as prima facie subjective rights. Nevertheless, one of them is an a priori definitive subjective right: the right to Existenzminimum (existential minimum). Its content is not settled yet. According to Robert Alexy, they are the rights to simple housing, fundamental education and minimum level of medical assistance. Existenzminimum is then related to the minimum necessary for factual liberty. Against the justiciability of fundamental social rights, there are also arguments related to the juridification of politics, the administrative discretion and the possible reserve clause. The counter-arguments refer to the original and exceptional competence; the necessary objective proof of state's economical incapability; the prohibition of State's will; the principles of legality and of the non-obviation of Judiciary jurisdiction; the Existenzminimun untouchable guarantee.

Keywords: Prima facie subjective rights; Justiciability; Human dignity.

I. Fundamental social rights and human dignity

Fundamental rights are the positivation of human rights (which have a moral character) in the national Law. Such juridicization is the result of secular political struggles. According to Robert Alexy[3], the moral constructions and claims from which the positivation of human rights result go back to the Classical Antiquity with, for example, Seneca texts, stoic who preached the cosmopolitism—everyone is the manifestation of a universal spirit. In turn, the ideas of dignity and equality were developed by Christian theology (Genesis, New Testament and especially Paul), until the 18th Century Enlightenment, when finally it has got to its peak with the Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen.

While fundamental individual and political rights were consensually understood as subjective rights since the first moment of their positivation, the same did not happen with fundamental social rights, which appeared after those ones, only in 19th century. Until today, it is still polemical if fundamental social rights may be identified as real subjective rights or mere objective norms. As subjective rights, they are judicially demandable, that means they are justiciable[4]. As objective norms, they are an orientation directed to Legislative and Executive Powers for the elaboration and implementation of State's goals or its political programs.

According to Alexy, fundamental social rights are "rights of the individual before the State, to something that the individual, if had enough means and if there were sufficient offer in market, could also have from particulars"[5]: right to health, education, work and housing—all of them substantially guided by the idea of human dignity.

Dignity is a semantically open concept, i.e., a concept whose definition does not present a high accuracy level, but only joins a non-exhaustive group of related characteristics. Alexy states that the concept of dignity goes beyond the generic formula according to which the human being can not be transformed into an object. There are a lot of subjective rights related to it: life, liberty, equality, physical integrity, privacy rights and many others[6]. Because of this, Alexy synthesizes the wealth of adjectives and nouns related to the concept of dignity which, although exuberant, do not formulate a definition, due to the randomness of their choice, saying that dignity can be expressed by a joint of concrete conditions, which must be present for its assurance. It is certain that the content of this joint is not unanimous, but it is not completely different either. There is convergence of many aspects, so that many times the differences are related only to the weight given to some conditions of the same joint[7].

[4] Language is recognized as a cultural manifestation of the society, reflecting its ethos. This ethos is in constant formation and modification. So, the language is necessarily flexible, adaptable and passive of enrichment according to the growth of the complexity of the society's intersubjective relations. The creation and posterior demanding of concretization of fundamental social rights are examples of this social transformation. The development of language vocabulary makes the social transformation clear. The arising of the terms "justiciability," "justiciable" and "juridicization" is an illustration of this process.

II. Fundamental social rights: prima facie subjective rights and human dignity

There are arguments in favor and against the consideration of fundamental social rights as subjective rights. The main pro argument is based on liberty. The main argument against this understanding is the so called formal argument, even though there is also the substantial one[8].

Liberty can be either juridical (right to do or not something) or factual (the concrete possibility of choosing among the allowed alternatives). According to this argument, juridical liberty does not have any value without factual liberty. The German Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht) states that "the right of liberty would have no value without the factual preconditions for its exercise"[9]. Material and intellectual goods are then preconditions for selfdetermination. Though, factual liberty is not a matter of everything-or-nothing, but a matter of degree.

The formal argument against the definition of fundamental social rights as subjective rights is that they dislocate the competence of the establishment of social policies from Legislative Power to the Judiciary one. This would cause a judicial determination of the budget plans, which is incompatible with Constitution.

The substantial argument against this understanding refers to the material principles: juridical liberty of the third party[10], the other's social rights[11] and the collective interests[12].

Nevertheless, according to Alexy, fundamental social rights are subjective rights indeed and this is today pacific understanding of the Bundesverfassungsgericht. The author develops his thought based on his theory of principles, considering fundamental social rights as prima facie subjective rights. These are rights established by norms that have a surplus content or an ideal one. A fundamental social right only becomes a definitive one when the factual liberty principle has a heavier weight than the colliding principles in the concrete case.

III. Fundamental social rights: positive rights under principle structure Fundamental rights are presented under the principle structure[13]. Their mandatory characteristic is stipulated by the biding clause in the German Constitution (art. 1, paragraph 3) which denies their programmatic character, stating that they are immediately in force.[14]

According to a detailed and rigorous conceptual specification, Alexy classifies fundamental social rights as rights to something, as positive rights. Their positive action can be either factual or normative. On one hand, they are absolute rights, because they oblige the generality of the society members. On the other hand, they are general, because they do not need acquisitive deed. They are universal from the holder's point of view, because they are rights before everybody. From the logical point of view, they are abstract rights, i.e., rights that are determined only in the concrete situation.

Fundamental social rights have a wide range, once they are fre-

[11] Everyone demanding the equal exercise (in the same degree) of fundamental social rights turns unfeasible the rights themselves, because the State cannot bear the costs of the requirement of the exercise of fundamental social rights by everybody in the same measures, as high as possible, that is, with the highest patterns of education, health, housing and work.

quently identified through the interpretation of juridical norms conjunctions, in which they are explicitly or implicitly presented. The understanding that there is a fundamental right only if there is a correspondent normative provision about it is an extreme positivist vision of Law, that promotes the literal or genetic interpretation rather than the systematic one, which is broader and more complex. In German legal theory and case law, the integral and wide comprehension of the constitutional text is dominant.[15] This is the kind of interpretation required by the high semantic openness that not only fundamental social rights, but all fundamental rights have, due to their high value density (they rule the values socially taken as essential).

Many times, the recognition of fundamental social rights happens through a counterfactual argumentation: if the non-recognition of a juridical position leads to an irreconcilable consequence with the constitutional order, such juridical position must be recognized. Thereby, the criterion for the correction of the justification of a fundamental social right adscription to another positive right is the demonstration that the denial of this adscription is wrong, because it contradicts the juridical system as a whole[16]. This is possible through a correct constitutional justification.

Alexy's theory of legal argumentation aims precisely the correction in the justification of the value judgments that integrate juridical norms and the juridical discourse. So it delineates forms and rules to be complied, which act as objective criteria, procedures to achieve the maximum rationalization of the juridical discourse.[17]

IV. Existenzminimum as definitive subjective right

There is a core of rights, which appear a priori as definitive. It stems from the totality of fundamental social rights. The set of these rights form exactly the Existenzminimum. As a definitive right, the Existenzminimum is justiciable, i.e., its immediate compliance is demanded from Public Pow-

[15] The classic-liberal interpretation of fundamental rights identifies them only with liberty, i.e., negative rights, from which results a marked limitation of their content.

If its content is not pacific even in Germany yet, which was one of the first countries to create this concept, it is for sure controversial in Brazil. Alexy understands that it is compounded by the right to simple housing, fundamental education and a minimum level of medical assistance[19]. It is certain that the content of the Existenzminimum varies according to the cultural, local, economical and historical context—the richer the country is, the broader is the Existenzminimum.[20]

It is a concept oriented by the idea of factual equality. Juridical liberty is empirically enabled based on it. Nevertheless, it is difficult to define precisely in relation to which aspects this factual equality must exist. The recourse to historical comparisons and also comparisons with the reality of other countries is necessary. Its content is always related to the present conditions, guided by the effectively existing life level, once the equality principle appears as means to assure human dignity.

Indeed, everything turns to be a matter of pondering, indispensable in cases that involve fundamental rights.[21]

The German Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht) relates the Existenzminimum to the principles of human dignity, free development of personality, equality, Social State and right to life and to physical integrity. Although sparse references to the Existenzminimum had already been done in the 90's, its precise determination was done by the decision BVerfGE (125, 175, on February 9th 2010), which specified the amount of money that corresponds to that minimum and must be paid by the State to the individual, according to each specific factual situation.

In Brazil, the first reference to it was done by the Constitutional Court (Supremo Tribunal Federal) in 2004 (ADPF 45/DF, 2004).[22] From then on, the use of Existenzminimum notion in Brazilian constitutional case law is increasingly present. Only between 2004 and 2008, there was a growth of more than 300% in relation to its assertion and protection.[23]

This first decision related to Existenzminimum in stated the necessity of its preservation "in favor of individual's integrity and intangibility." The new Brazilian constitutional hermeneutics began to assure immediate effectiveness to all fundamental rights. They are considered "full effectiveness norms".

Brazilian Constitutional Court (Supremo Tribunal Federal) considers that there must be protection against "situations that threaten the Existenzminimum," because without it, human dignity is "mere utopia" (AI 583594/SC, 2009).

The insurance of "human dignity conditions", which is presented as a "central constitutional goal" (AI 583594/SC, 2009), means not only to assure the protection of fundamental individual rights, but also the "minimum material conditions of existence" (ADPF 45/DF, 2004). Thus, Existenzminimum appears as the "joint of fundamental rights without which human dignity is confiscated" (AI 684829/SP, 2008).

State's omission in complying with fundamental social rights which are part of the Existenzminimum constitutes an "illicit conduct," whose consequence is the judicial establishment of deadlines for the State's provision through "imposition of daily fines".[24]

V. Fundamental Social Rights: justiciability and existenzminimum

V.I . Arguments against

Here comes the polemic questioning about the judicial decisions which order State's compliance with fundamental rights—especially the social ones. The argument is that these decisions would be improper due to these main reasons:

(1) This situation would configure a politics' juridicization, since Judiciary Power would be determining the acts of the other powers, what would assail the principle of separation of powers;

(2) The principle of democracy would be affected too, because the political decisions' legitimacy belongs to Legislative and Executive Powers, compounded by popular representatives;

(3) Public power has administrative discretion, which would be taken away by Judiciary Power acts;

[24] According to art. 644 and 645/CPC, Brazilian Code of Civil Procedure.

(4) The recourse to the possible reserve clause is suitable, when the effectiveness of fundamental social rights is financially unviable for the State, due to their high costs.

V.II . German Constitutional Court case law and Alexy's Thought

Both German and Brazilian Constitutional Courts consider and answer these arguments in the same way. Once the concept and the demand of Existenzminimum are older in Germany, the position of German Judiciary Power is more consolidated in this respect.

These are some of the German Constitutional Court positions:

(1) Indeed, Legislative Power has the original competence to decide about the limits of social assistance, how it can and must be done, according to the existing means of the State and its other equally important obligations;

(2) Nevertheless, when the question is about the assurance of the minimal conditions for a dignified existence, Judiciary Power is competent, because this is duty of the "public community" of which it takes part.

Alexy analyzes the arguments in favor and against the justiciability of fundamental social rights and its implications. He states that:

(1) Fundamental social rights are so important that their assurance cannot be left to the decision of a simple parliamentary majority;

(2) There is no previous determination of which fundamental social rights are definitive;

(3) This determination is a matter of pondering among principles—on one hand, there is the principle of factual liberty, on the other hand, the formal principles of democracy and separation of powers, besides the material principles of third party's juridical liberty, of other's fundamental social rights and of collective interests.

V.III . Brazilian Constitutional Court case law

Brazilian Constitutional Court has stated that:

(1) Fundamental social rights are justiciable. Since the decision of 2004, Judiciary Power is asserted as competent to decide claims related to the non-compliance with fundamental social rights;

(2) These rights are not only a matter of social politics derived from programmatic and non-imperative norms, subordinated to Execu- tive Power. They have immediate effectiveness;

(3) They are subjective rights really, not mere objective norms, which oblige the State only objectively, that means, they justify duties, but do not grant rights;

(4) They represent an inalienable constitutional prerogative, which is not subordinated, during its concretization process, to reasons of pure governmental pragmatism;

(5) Even though the prerogative to formulate and execute public policies is primarily of Legislative and Executive Powers, if the public bodies primarily competent do not comply with the political-juridical charges mandatorily imposed to them, coming to compromise, with their omission, the effectiveness of fundamental social rights, Judiciary Power is exceptionally competent to determine the implementation of public policies especially if they are defined by Constitution itself;[25]

(6) The simple allegation of the State financial incapacity followed by the recourse to the possible reserve clause is not enough for the non-compliance with fundamental social rights. The referred material limitation must be objectively demonstrated. Otherwise, the behavior of Public Power is illicit. After all, taking the rights seriously means taking the shortage seriously. State's shortage must be articulated with the "allocation choices" of public spending. However, the demanded pretension mentioned as content of the Existenzminimum by the individual must be reasonable, i.e., reasonability is the judgement criterion for the analysis of the requested right;

(7) Judiciary Power is competent to determine the compliance with fundamental social rights:

(7.1) In case of State's abusive behavior, such as State's inertia, unreasonable procedure or procedure with clear intention to neutralize the effectiveness of fundamental social rights;

(7.2) In case of State's arbitrariness towards the compliance with fundamental social rights, extrapolating the legal discretion power;

(7.3) On the basis of the fact that the conformation liberty of Legislative and Executive Powers is not absolute, but have a relative character;

(8) There is the necessity of harmony of the public administration

[25] The identification of omissions or State actions that violate fundamental social rights corresponds to the determination of what is legally due and what is only legally acceptable. The border between both hypothesis is markedly fluid, depending on the conditions and circumstances of the concrete case, as all the situations that involve fundamental rights.

acts with the principles of legality and of non-obviation of judicial control. Public Power is subordinated to a legally biding constitutional mandate, which represents a factor of political-administrative discretion limitation;

(9) Judiciary Power interference in public administration does not necessarily implies offense to the principle of separation of powers, because the Legal State is subjected to jurisdiction. Due to the high biding degree of Public Power to the satisfaction of fundamental social rights by virtue of its essential character, it is possible that Judiciary Power, if State is in default, determine it to implement public policies constitutionally provided. After all, public spending with public policies is subordinated to the administrator's convenience judgment and opportunity, but not to his arbitrariness;

(10) The conception of Existenzminimum prevails over the possible reserve clause one (ADPF 45/DF, 2004; AI 658491/GO, 2011; RE 667745/SC, 2012);

(11) The necessity of satisfaction of the minimal conditions for a dignified existence, i.e., of the Existenzminimum is untouchable. Thus, the establishment of priority aims is due. The discussion about which other projects might receive investment must be related only to the remaining resources.

In virtue of all these positions, Brazilian Constitutional Court considers that there is really a political dimension (ADPF 45/DF, 2004) in constitutional jurisdiction, which ultimately controls the subordination of all State acts to the Constitution. Constitution is precisely the materialization of the encounter between Politics and Law. The observing and compliance with fundamental rights are exactly the result of the Public Power subordination to constitutional norms.[26]

VI. Concluding Remark

In short, two conclusions are clear in relation to fundamental so-

[26] Nowadays in Germany, the Existenzminimum concept transcends the juridical sphere and it is an idea that guides the Executive Power measure called Hartz IV, a program created in 2005, whose aim is the support to the unemployed. However, its sense goes beyond, once it seeks the stipulation of the due values to each specific concrete case, in order to ensure the minimal material conditions necessary to the assurance of human dignity. That is, the pecuniary amount corresponds to the Existenzminimum. The amount of 391€ is monthly due to the individual, added to the financial cover for proper housing and health care. In Brazil, there is a similar government program called "Bolsa-Família" since 2004. It is also guided by the idea of human dignity and ensures the minimum benefit of R$ 70,00 (about US$ 30) to the individual.

cial rights:

(1) All fundamental rights are subjective rights. So they are justiciable. They are prima facie rights that become definitive in the concrete case. Alexy emphasizes this understanding by stating that "non-justiciable fundamental rights are a lie"[27]. He adds that the justification specifically of fundamental social rights is to promote to those who were not lucky to be born in a family with a reasonable economic situation, the access to similar opportunities and material goods;

(2) The effectiveness of fundamental social rights depends on the way the individual is seen by the society to which he belongs: if as a legal subject or as a juridical order object.[28] Increasingly, the countries, in the search of democracy – which always develops as a process and therefore it is built by forward and backward –, consider the individual as a holder of subjective rights and progressively no longer as an object of public interest to be treated by State's social assistance service, in such a way that public security and social order are ensured. In other words, individuals always seen as disturbing objects. Individuals not endowed with a value on their own, but a social problem to be solved. Briefly, to respect individual's fundamental rights means to take the individual seriously.

The rhetoric of resignification:
The hidden face of spiritualist scientism in Pontes de Miranda and the effect of opacity

André Lucas Fernandes[1]

Abstract: The construction of a historical-rhetorical research, along the lines placed by Adeodato, follows a series of reconstructed categories from Aristotle, Ballweg etc. So are analyzed within specific methodology: pathos, ethos and logos in the Pontes de Miranda's works. In addition, the triadic structure (material, strategic and analytical rhetoric) is designed for a more suitable reconstruction of the history of ideas of the Brazilian jurist. In addition, a metaphor of "play of lenses" is designed to facilitate the presentation of the conclusions. The "metaphors operator" is a cultural figure that appears in today's complex society, a flagrant reaction to the high degree of fluidity of their social environment and fragmentation that characterize our time. Thus the subject-observer postmodern lives in an environment of constant provocations and proposals. In this way, values such as subversion will be of great value to this paper. Metaphor here is the human capacity to move of its axes preestablished meanings in cultural constructions earlier. The metaphor then is, itself, a constant innovation. What was dynamic energy dies, being fixed on winning story through symbols which together form, in the first instance, the phenomenon of tradition. This paper aims to demonstrate the gap between what "was said" about Pontes de Miranda and what was actually "written" in his works. Starting with the philosophical classification of the Brazilian jurist, consolidated as "logical positivist" and later "critical nominalist". Despite of being an heir of thought coming of the Vienna Circle, Pontes de Miranda exceeded expectations and ways of thinking about the world that the philosophical group used. The ontology in Pontes de Miranda is a "provisory ontology" that attentive to the limits of science. "Ontology" with quotes differs fundamentally of Ontology, without quotes, ie the classical ontology. Going forward I intend to launch reflections on the work of the jurist and his transition from a "faith in science model" to an operationalization of law based on science.

So I need to introduce specific terms used in my research: as metaphor, metaphor operators and others.

The "metaphor's operator", or observer, is a cultural figure that appears in today's complex society, since it is a reaction to the flagrant high degree of fluidity, of the dilution of social environment and fragmentation that characterize our time. Thus the postmodern subject-observer lives in an environment of constant proposals and provocations. So, values such as subversion will be of great value to the lecture placed here.

The notion of the operator is also a metaphor. But what is a metaphor? Metaphor here is the human ability to displace the axes of predetermined meanings in earlier cultural constructions. The metaphor then is, itself, a constant innovation. The meanings established are merely metaphorical constructions that were plastered. What was dynamic energy dies, being fixed on a winning story through symbols which together form, in the first instance, the phenomenon of tradition.

The metaphors' operator is also a skilled handler of lenses. It is the qualification of the lens (opaque, crystalline, concave, convex) that modifies the mode of social action of the subject, all this from a metaphorical perspective rebuilding the world from the schemes of images.

By the arrangement of lenses is possible for man to build various combinations to observe society with unlimited possibilities, because the lenses are also modifiable. We have then the social actor. Acts as a unit operating within an organizational whole, independently but within the margins of a preterit script whose guidelines were demarcated by the cultural construction of the previous generation - the generation that designed its symbolic framework about the world in which operates the current generation.

On what gnoseological premises this essay intends to build its conclusions? Determinism and combination possibilities or subject-object conjugation? The vision of the metaphor might imply that the subject, who operates his lens, performs an action without limits. That is not the sense proposed here. There are limits on the duplicitous gnoseological relationship: on one hand, it requires the object, on the other, empece the subject.

Has endorsed opinion, decades ago, the very Pontes de Miranda, Brazilian heir of logical positivism of the Vienna Circle, whose work is exemplary case of this lecture, showing the form of combination of lenses and one of his most perverse rhetorical effects which is the opacity.

Opacity is the adjective of the noun "lens" here as a metaphorical instrument that shows how the subjects construct their questions by looking at the history of ideas. The phenomenon of opacity can specialize in five different formats that take into account the interference of the subject in examination of the object. Quintuple subdivision is also artificial, so we have: mythmaking, depreciation, subordination, decontextualization and juggling. By analyzing "the symbol Pontes de Miranda" in National Legal History of Ideas, I will concentrate on showing: mythmaking and the juggle.

The mythmaking makes reference to the effect of opacity that builds around the object observed a laudatory story, mystifying and at the same time making inaccessible the thinker ideas. The metaphor of lenses here comprises an opaque lens in its periphery that directs a huge amount of light concentrated. The mythmaking is a burning opacity.

"The juggle" is the specialization with the most nefarious effect. This is in any observation of world. Presupposes the mere use of opaque lenses and unguarded with appropriated light. This specialization removes of the "medium culture" the particular author's ideas in a historical period without causing weirdness. Psychological component here functions as the cloak of the magician who makes them disappear without giving an explanation to the auditorium. Without a step by step reconstruction – opposing a scientific attitude.

Every specialization can be combined with another. The case presented here illustrates the point. So is that, like physical lenses, observer's cultural lenses can be "added" to each other creating new effects and increasing the crystallizer potential of a specific observation.

There is a real gap between what "was said," and what is effectively "written" in Pontes de Miranda's Work. Starting by the classification of the jurist, in the history of philosophical ideas, consolidated as "logical positivist" and later a "nominalist", in a "critical way". Though, being an heir of the Vienna Circle ideas, Pontes de Miranda exceeded expectations and ways of thinking about the world of that philosophical group.

The theory of knowledge that Miranda discusses in his essay O problema fundamental do conhecimento - Fundamental Problem of Knowledge (1999) cannot be understood as adherence to nominalism, yet critical. There is confusion, especially involving the "jective equation" (equação jetiva, a neologism used by him), and the scientific model, that is explanatory, logistical in a way that Pontes de Miranda proposes. The model is used to "track" the knowledge and the idea that universals are simply names, unmatched in the real world.

Nominalism[2] denies the existence of the universal in the world of experience, or thought - it is mere flatus vocis. Miranda thinks ject, not universal - and the use of a new name is a rhetorical strategy of the jurist - is extracted from an operation that relates the two aspects: it is not realistic, is not conceptualist. The operation of the extraction, the mental operation, necessarily passes through the two poles: the object and the subject. Not present one of the poles increases the inaccuracy of the knowledge process.

Books and books on the history of philosophical and legal ideas share a common pattern that resembles a kind of "zeitgeist" restricted to a few decades of the twentieth century in Brazil and can be detached historically as a unit - so the twenties until the seventies. The proposed suggestion is to think a new category called spiritualist scientism, which meets pragmatic conclusions, rhetorically self-referential, in a rhetorical methodology.

By spiritualist scientism I mean nothing beyond the commitment with scientific methods, especially the induction, the relativity of scientific knowledge, the positive view of the world and complex relationship with the subject. Spiritualist scientism proposes a political action having the science knowledge as a background to manage the society. Its biggest function is to generate models that translates the real and make us able to operate logistically the society to achieve the greatest degree of happiness possible. The theory of Pontes de Miranda is systemic.

So, I would like reiterating that Miranda does not commit "intellectual imposture" in the sense proposed by Alan Sokal in his book. He is not inserted into the epistemological dimension of postmodernism, which Sokal analyzes. He remained loyal to his thought, whose adaptations always made reference to the same "theoretical paradigm" preceding the fifties. Pontes de Miranda understands, from the Cartesian premise that human knowledge is one and the division in scienceS is a didactic "play", however, make sure to point out that the conceptual transposition between the sciences is an "artifice" to better express ideas and understand the phenomena of the world.

[2]The doctrine that universals or general ideas are mere names without any corresponding reality, and that only particular objects exist; properties, numbers, and sets are thought of as merely features of the way of considering the things that exist. Important in medieval scholastic thought, nominalism is associated particularly with William of Occam.(OXFORD DICTIONARIES, 2012).

The ontology in the work of Miranda is an "temporary ontology" aware of the limits of science. "Ontology" with quotes differs fundamentally of Ontology, without quotes. Conceptually different, the first is attached to the principle of relativity, attached to the idea of science: science as a "posture" to know and that is very close to the position of Adeodato, and the analytical Rhetoric. The question that led to the conclusion in the research: we must also use the term ontology taking into account an entire historical collection it carries?

The "jects' theory" serves as an explanatory scheme to methodological explanation of science and the world itself. It is worth taking into consideration that "the fundamental problem" is an essay on science, but would not be inside a scientific practice. It is like the theoretical basis or a starting point.

I think Pontes de Miranda is situated in a "diffuse" middle term of the dichotomy between: rhetoric (being cognitively poor) versus ontology (being cognitively rich). Scientific knowledge for Pontes de Miranda is an attempt of knowing in a probable and rectifiable way. Is not "the correct" or "the just" but only "tendencies" of correctness and fairness.

So, the opacity functions as a differential in the observation when we talk about the history of ideas. Pontes de Miranda was always known by the project to construct a Brazilian science, specifically a science of law in Brazil. This "tag", the scientific tag, attributed, rightly, to the jurist concluded the phenomenon treated in the exhibition of these ideas. As in sociology, opacity operates an effect of the inclusion by exclusion, in a cyclical relationship: the work of Miranda receives the filter of opacity that qualifies as "scientific", and ontological.

It is precisely through the mythmaking (and here would be adjectives like "genius" or "brilliant"), that the opacity was formed and crystallized, excluding the real and objective appreciation of what he wrote. The consequences are, and were the most damaging. By the opacity, several misunderstandings about his thinking took place, blocking a balanced view that recognizes the limitations and contextual true thought of the jurist.

Combining mythmaker effect, the lens of juggling reached maximum crystallization effect extracting and stabilizing senses with low "scientificit degree" or "scientific prudence." In other work I intended to demonstrate how the thought of Pontes de Miranda was more complex and avant-garde than the narratives about his work make it seem. This conclusion does not work from the "genius", but from the objectivity with which the work of Miranda is analyzed.

The Juggle also overshadowed the political, educational and prescriptive dimension of Miranda's work. He that all the time insists on the possibility of, with the adoption of those ideas, builds a better future for the man. Opaque lenses are a fine strategy of observation, but cannot escape a common denominator: always act with greater efficiency when greater is the lack of knowledge about some work, on which focus its affects. Every strategic observation by opaque lenses and their specializations generates a refractive effect which apex is the maximum crystallization.

In this direction, the metaphorical effort "dies" to give rise to a catachresis - figure of speech that represents the end or sharp decline in metaphorical power and consolidation of a sense for a particular expression. The catachresis no more moves spaces of socially constructed meaning; it is a hard space, immobilized by the acceptance of the use. The comparison here is made with a catalyst that boosts certain reaction, but crumbles when make this work: the metaphor of the observer who operates with lenses is a "catalyst" that performs a rhetorical optimization in the observation - though not objective - of history of ideas.

The high intensity of the refractive effect feeds on ignorance, as I have said, and stimulates it. Producing a certain "story", the observation incorporates the narrative as a code, re-producing a sequence of imprisoning reports in a process programmed to stop and die in a historical catachresis.

How break the winner report/winner story/winner narrative and their crystallization? My suggestion pursuit an effort to think about the question of historical revisionism, after the "dive", analyzing the work in his context, with scientific prudence. It should be noted, finally, that the work of Miranda is huge. If ignorance prevails, also reins unavailability – of books and readers. The "system" is spread all over dogmatic writes, but, and that's fundamental, in philosophical and literary works in which establishes an "aphoristic", influenced by Nietzsche.

Lourival Vilanova noticed a partial disruption between the "system of positive science of law" and "private law treaty", key works of Pontes de Miranda. But recognizes the guideline of what he called "jurist scientist" - in the sense of "attitude / posture" mentioned earlier. Such discontinuity, in my view, comes with old age and his distance from attitude of "jurist scientist" to prestigious "lawyer referee" committed to dogmatic solutions.

So now i bring synthetic conclusions from the use of the categories of a rhetorical methodology:

At the level of material rhetoric: Pontes de Miranda was inserted in the vicinity of the Old Republic, in an environment of early national science foundation. At the strategic level of rhetoric: is fundamentally the use of broad categories and in his attitude to influence the world with their theories. Theories always focused on the clash between the attitude of spiritual scientism and an attitude of creating models committed to democracy, with a liberal moral and also with a specific scientific socialism. Pontes de Miranda has not entered into open clashes of opinion. At the level of analytic rhetoric: the conclusions lead to the foundation of a new classification category in a national legal history of ideas, spiritualist scientism.

Regarding the ethos is possible to refer to the financial power of his rich family in Alagoas, especially in the context of the Old Republic. The very embodiment of sarcasm and irony in the texts. Besides the call to humble and incessant labor.

As for pathos we have the flagrant high level of scholarship, the aphoristic and scientism. All mixed into a common language, seeking to persuade and educate a population to a science project. Thus, fit using metaphors and allegories.

For logos: the use of alethic logic generating the apparent break with the modeling logic treated in System of Positive Science. But in the end the theory of juridical fact of Miranda that guides and architect his general theory of law is ordered by a alethic logic? With a necessarily break that Vilanova teachs? It is not possible to give a conclusive answer yet, but it seems to me that the answer would be negative. No category functions well in front of Pontes de Miranda eclecticism: perhaps the category that is designed for its own name "ponteano"/pontesian? Ideas with intertexts and associations, but extremely critical and unique. The theory of juridical fact of the Private Law Treaty, is a "dogmatic issue" - belongs to a dimension of law as practice. The science of law which is in System of Positive Science is a metalanguage, or perhaps, for greater accuracy, is a dynamic background that crosses and guides all thought of the author. For sure, it is a controversial historical figure.

Preserved sophistic rhetoric as part of Aristotle legacy to the history of legal persuasion

Lourenço Torres[1]

Abstract: This paper presents a study on the concept of legal persuasion and, in particular, the possible transition that this practice suffered over a considerable period of time, specifically, during the Sophistic period to the Aristotelian one. It studies the concept of legal persuasion over the time. Presents Plato's ambiguous relationship to Rhetoric and asks if the concept and practice of persuasion have suffered the same disbelief that received the Sophists in that lapse of transition. Also studies Aristotle's compilation phase in his book Rhetoric and his rhetorical persuasive emphasis. It concludes that Aristotle preserved the main Sophistic arguments on persuasion.

1 Introduction: The concept and importance of persuasion.

The matter of the persuasion is something argued long time ago and, with certainty, it is not restricts to the sudden interest that have been given to this subject in the recent years, with the attempt of understand or to analyze it in an instrumental way as abilities directed to reach speech success or the decision success. This interest had made possible the institutionalization of its study in such a way that it is possible to find specialized courses in important universities that are only dedicated to its reflection.

Persuasion is mixed with decision according to some definitive conceptions, both been used some times as synonymous. Therefore, persuasion is relevant in the legal sphere which is flooded with decisions of many kinds. This is because the persuasion that does not have for target the decision, is empty, and all decision are drift from an internal personal persuasion or from an external influence; this deliberative capacity of choosing judgments. Moreover, persuasion also is intrinsically related with argumentation and rhetoric. Its entire argumentative load is a permanent social phenomenon and, historically, it was always there in all epochs and in all great cultures. Its variation level is what awakens greater or minor interest. To study it is important because, even so the forms and the degrees of intensity of its application could varies, always it will be non-separable from communication and language, important factors in the world of Law.

Therefore, the object of this study is persuasion and my purpose here is to present in short a study on the development of the concept of legal persuasion and, in particular, the possible transition that this practice suffered over a considerable period of time, specifically, during the Sophistic period to the Aristotelian one. So, this work aims to study the concept of legal persuasion over the time. Having in mind Plato's ambiguous relationship to Rhetoric, I question if the concept and practice of persuasion have suffered the same disbelief that received the Sophists in that changeover lapse. It goes by and through the ideals and the practice of relativism of the Sophistic movement, until Aristotle compilation phase on restrictive persuasion in his book Rhetoric. That generated a concern about an (unfounded) prejudice against the Sophists and the large volume of Aristotle's work which preserved only the persuasive rhetoric from the Sophists. To accomplish this objective I go through the considerations of authors such as Werner Jaeger, Romeyer-Dherbey, and Guthrie, in addition to Aristotle himself.

I find, on one hand, that the rhetorical Sophists preferred to leave any objectivity and certainty to open an unlimited space for communication, language and freedom of thought; their most powerful weapon to persuade in their speeches. And I concluded that Aristotle, on the other hand, despite the influence he receive from his teacher Plato against the Sophists, do not ignored the importance of aesthetics nor the strategic relevance of persuasion in their rhetoric speeches. Thus he preserved the main Sophistic arguments, describing and developing them, objectively, as technical means, for legal discourses.

2 The Sophists

The concept and practice of persuasion was already developed in the Antiquity and its study invaded the day-by-day use of the citizens living in the Greek polis, who were familiar to the Sophists and its rhetoricians' political, legal and exhibitive speeches. However, although such analyzes were so old, until today a preconception persists with respect to the Rhetoric and the Sophistic, also resulting in an absurd ill-confusion.

Guthrie gives to us a view out of the Greek definition for persuasion by some of their teachers, the Sophists:

> Peitho, Persuasion, was for them [the Greek ones] a powerful goddess; 'the charmer to whom nothing is denied', Aeschylus called her (Suppl. 1039f), and Isocrates a century later reminded his Athenian audience that it was their custom to offer her an annual sacrifice (Antid. 249). Gorgias in his Encomium of Helen – a school exercise in rhetoric, sophistic in every sense – names speech and persuasion as the two irresistible forces[2].

In the Athena of the 5th century B.C. there were an educational system that allowed any citizen to assure that its children studied with great scholars, so that, when they were free men (adults), they could fulfill adequately their rights and duties as citizens. Before the Sophists, the educators of Greece were the poets[3]. Notice that formal education were an exclusiveness to castes and social privileged ones, but the State tried to surpass the system of privileges of the old education that believed that arete should be accessible only to those who had divine blood. Moreover, it was the State who organized periodically open matches to the citizens where they also practiced singing, poetry and athletics as complementary forms of education[4].

In sprouting (emerging, rising) the democratic State was concomitant the practice of public assemblies and freedom of word or expression. This became indispensable the oratory endows and it was converted into an "authentic helm at the hands of the man of State". In the Classic age and for some centuries that had followed the legal or the politician orator was called rhetorician, rhetor (ῥήτωϱ), and that word did not have the formal meaning that it acquired later. The political education of the heads was based on eloquence which was necessary for the orator's formation. It had in the logos a higher mingling of formal and material. That's how it is understood the emerging of a class of educators who offered publicly, for money, the teaching of "virtue", as previously described[5].

It was a period of prestige of knowing. Only after the critics of Plato and Xenophon is that the term "sophist" would start to be synonymous of "possessor of a false knowledge", and that knowledge searched only for those who wanted to deceive, making for this considerable use of the paralogism[6]. The "sophist" term would not only be discredited, but its master teses also had been tarnished by the platonic refutations since many were displayed in distorted way to make that the sophists appeared of beforehand as perpetual loosers[7]. But, traditionally, Sophistic always were consisted as an organic member of philosophical development[8]. There also enclosed its practices of persuasive rhetoric.

3 The Sophistic's offer in relation to persuasion

Pursuing the previous thought, one sees that this controversy is not based on the modus operandi of the sophists, but in its fundamental epistemology inserted in each of its speeches. Greek Sophistic had another offer with sights to persuasion. The Sophists considered that: on each subject there could be always some proposals, and not only one. In these proposals contrary thesis could be found coexisting side by side. This position can be seen in Protagoras, that together with Gorgias, express the best intellectual power of those earlier times when said: "the man is the measure of all the things, of that they are that they are, of whom they are not that they are not [Teeteto, 152a]"[9]. Certainly, this was somewhat inconceivable and unacceptable for those who desired to keep a certain criterion of objectivity, as Plato. The rhetorician preferred do not make use of this objectivity. The subjects could be considered by two or more sides, and, would be capable to follow two opposing directions simultaneously. That paradigm followed to Rhetoric bid too. Either in its positive definition or in its negative definition, Rhetoric offers itself as a multiple possibility; becoming a vehicle for many kinds of persuasion in vary genres and contexts[10]. And, therefore, could have good or bad use.

Gorgias himself in his famous proposition from the On Non-Existent (or On Nature) Treaty affirmed that: "Nothing exists. Even if existence exists, it is inapprehensible to humans. Even if existence is apprehensible, nevertheless it is certainly not able to be communicated or interpreted for one's neighbors" (Frag. B_3. 979b20 – 980a1)[11]. Text interpreted, since early times by the Greek philosopher Sextus Empiricus as being the expression of the impossibility of making use of truth by means of one only criterion, refuting "the standard of truth" (to tes aletheias kriterion). He eliminates a constant standard of judgment, of criterion. According his interpretation, the speech is composed for perceptions, as that in which is not the speech or language that communicates the perceptions, but are the perceptions that create the speech or the language[12]. Thus, it is clear that for the sophist Gorgias, the argumentative speech does not depend on an objective reality, impossible to be apprehended. And, as other sophists, he broke the coherent and uniform texture of the ontologic optic, uttering a declaration favorable to diversity, not totally divorced from ethics and not less worried with justice, although Rhetoric was wide used inside the limits of legal persuasion procedure[13].

4. Aristotle and the discursive means of persuasion.

On the other hand, Aristotle comes to demonstrate the discursive means of persuasion, initially, to some applied technician aspects referent to speech. He used for these technician aspects the terms ethos, pathos and logos. The term ethos indicates the personal character of the orator, its presentation, its experience. That, derived out of the orator himself, which gives weight to his words. The orator's power to set his personal character in evidence. The pathos is what causes in the audience some type of emotion, a reaction and a state of spirit. No doubt, this is one of the objectives of the orator: to control the reaction of the audience; to control the pathos, but not any pathos, only that one that the orator desires. It is also the awakening power of emotions. Further, there is the logos, which is the proof, or the apparent proof, the speech's content properly said, the objective rational argument[14], the power to prove a truth, or an apparent truth through persuasive arguments. Aristotle describes them as "species" of "persuasion supplied by the verbal speech"[15]. It is here when Aristotle took the sophistic technique of persuasion. That is, the not objective technique for objective arguments.

When Aristotle enumerated the discursive means of Rhetoric, he also used the same systematic used in his Topics to distinguish the dialectic syllogisms from the apodictic ones, dividing them in inductive and deductive. But with the difference that in Rhetoric they take for base verisimilitude. The inductive way is called paradigm, the example, known as rhetorical induction. The deductive way is entimema, known as rhetorical syllogism, and distinct from erisma or eristic syllogism[16].

Hence, when we speak about "syllogism" it demands specification. The term syllogism is a generic term. The deriving premises from entimemas are constituted of probabilities and signs. And as Aristotle said, catching the So: "this is the more effective way of persuasion", because "the man who makes good conjectures concerning the truth assimilates himself in making good conjectures concerning probabilities (Ret. 1355a)"[17]. Paradigmatic entimema gains all its persuasive content from the examples, being predominantly demonstrative, whereas the rhetorical syllogism or entimema has its persuasion based on signals or indications (indicium). Entimema is formally defined as a syllogistic structure which lacks one of the three formal elements, possessing "occult modal unfoldings"[18] and Quintilian called it: epiquerema[19].

5. Conclusion.

Thus, Rhetoric consisted too in one techne (τέχνη), a technic to speak well, to enchant and to seduce an audience. Among others meanings: an instrument that becomes possible the persuasion. Therefore it is why much is said that Rhetoric is the art to persuade. Although this is not out of place, it is necessary to have in mind that to confer a bigger precision to the term, the meaning of art for the Greeks also assigned one technique, that is, a capacity that appears as the product of the application of one to know, and not that one of gift or inexplicable talent, as usually the word "art" is understood.

Hence, Rhetoric is similar, on one hand, to dialectic, on the other hand, to sophistic arguments. In other words, Rhetoric do not occupy itself only on what is persuasive, but also of what seems to be, that is, "the truth and the approached truth" [Rhetoric, 1355a17][20]. What means that, for Aristotle, Rhetoric is more a faculty to consider theoretically the possible means to persuade or to attribute verisimilitude to any theme or subject that comes to be deal with.

So, the core here is to perceive that the object of Rhetoric are not the truths, but the pronounced words and speeches, the practical domain of certain techniques to obtain a persuasive language so prevailing in the forensic sphere. Therefore, it was through Rhetoric that Aristotle preserved the Sophistic technique of persuasion, although, some lack of objectivity and certainty would give space to freedom of thought.

Universal International Law?
A challenge and a contribution from the peoples in the South

Henrique Weil Afonso[1]

Abstract: This article explores the role of the Third World in international legal affairs vis-à-vis post-colonial readings of the history of the discipline. It sets of by examining the liberal legacy in present International Law to propose a critical survey of the methodological aspects of historical approaches to the field, namely historicism. It develops an argument according to which the Third World represents a valid, yet thoroughly diverse and complex, category of resistance committed to the interrogation of present-day projections of colonial relations and imperial agendas. After engaging with Indian Subaltern incursions in history along with Latin American post-colonial thought, the article concludes by arguing for a sustained appreciation of the methodology of history and the viability of emancipation discourses it forecloses.

Key-words: TWAIL; post-colonialism; International Law.

1. Introduction

One prominent consensus within mainstream international legal scholarship became evident in the immediate aftermath of the Cold War. The old Bipolar struggle, facts reviewed, had at last come to an end to the benefit of capitalist world economy, driven by developed countries who found in the USA the adequate leader to set the road ahead. Whatever meaning the Cold War period had to the Third World, the debacle of the URSS along with its global agenda could have had but one interpretation: all States, regardless of evident peculiarities, could – and would – take advantage of the capitalist market driven economy in order to bring about that very elusive quest: development and prosperity. Hardly a surprise, international law was profoundly influenced by these events, though not necessarily prone to the interests of less economically developed States.

This study intends to examine the intricate relationship, on the one hand, between the ways international law perceives its history and, on the other one, the construction of its universal design. There is reason to suppose that recent perceptions of traditional international legal scholarship rest firmly on a particular understanding of the historical phenomena that posits present-day developmental schemes at the top of international community's agenda. Turning one's eye to the past, it is suggested, has the effect of understanding current discourses about how the world is and how the world should be, and the very method adopted in this exercise should unfold international law's proneness towards universality.

A brief survey of early theorists, namely 16th Century Spanish theologian Francisco de Vitoria and 19th Century liberals such as John Westlake, should add to the understanding of this intricate and complex relationship. It should be argued that international law's history is thoroughly based on particular perceptions of the international, and non-European peoples only marginally figure in this narrative. In response, it is by reviving the relevance of the Third World in international affairs that counter-hegemonic alternatives to established modern thinking may gain voice. The Third World today materializes the outcomes of colonial and imperial practices upon which the discipline is so intrinsically connected. Confronting the ways these conditions have reached the 21st Century acquires resonance within academic movements engaged with new designs of the international plane that are more inclusive when it comes to diversity and more receptive of plural forms of the legal and the historical narratives.

2. Universalism and International Law: historical views in debate

The new "age" in international affairs launched in the beginning of the 1990's is presented by doctrinal elaborations regarding both norms in practice and the justification for revisiting certain legal institutes. The idea and praxis of liberal democracy symbolizes the grindstone for a large number of accounts of this new moment[2], as an examination of the writings of theorists like Thomas M. Franck and Fernando Tesón should disclose. Professor Franck sustains a defense of liberal democratic values as the ideal form of political participation in State level, to be transplanted to the international plane: the latter is powerfully connected to the former, and the more democratic States become, the more democratic the transnational sphere would be. Accordingly, Franck speaks of an "emerging 'law'" that corroborates domestic governance and reflects in the cannons of international law. "This newly emerging 'law'", the author explains, "– which requires democracy to validate governance – is not merely the law of a particular state that, like the United States under its Constitution, has imposed such a precondition on national governance. It is also becoming a requirement of international law, applicable to all and implemented through global standards, with the help of regional and international organizations."[3]

Argentinean professor Fernando Tesón is in line with Franck's insights regarding the nature of this supposedly new international law. In his work A Philosophy of International Law, Tesón elaborates a comprehensively liberal theory of international law based on Kant's essays Towards Perpetual Peace and The Idea of a Universal History From a Cosmopolitan Point of View. The merits generally accredited to democratic forms of government appear to be based, initially, on the assumption that "[…] the very point of democratic institutions is to keep political power (with all its corrupting potential) under check"[4], coupled with Kantian universal imperatives that deposits certain duties to be carried out by States: "the categorical imperative is universal and holds for every civil society regardless of history and culture. Liberal democracies, ranging from laissez-faire states to welfare states, are the only ones that secure individual freedom, thereby allowing human beings to develop their potential fully".[5] In short, liberal democracies, according to these

With the end of the Cold War, some would claim, so did the Third World come to its term and, consequently, the category no longer deserves historical significance while regarded as an entity in itself. According to specialist Mark Berger, who writes in the 1990's, a central point to be considered is that the mentioned group of States is not suitable to fit its purposes in a globalized world. In face of the trump of globalized market economy, all less economically developed countries have been put in the developmental route. Taking the Asian Tigers as a role model to be followed by other nations, Berger emphasizes the timely need to set aside this old-fashioned, Cold War response-type classification – a group of States struggling for existence outside US-Soviet dichotomy –, in order to foster economic growth and political stability via consolidation of democratic practices and processes. As Berger states, "'Third World' now serves primarily to generate both a dubious homogeneity within its shifting boundaries and an analytically irrelevant distinction between the 'Third World' (developing) on the one hand and the 'First World' (developed) on the other hand".[6] Additionally, the author suggests replacing the category for an all-inclusive treatment brought about by liberal world views that may have better results or, in other words, "an emerging approach to 'development' which privileges historical particularity, but also adopts a global perspective".[7]

Adopting a similar argumentative strategy, though enriched by universalist ideals, it is worth taking note of the influence that standard end-of-the-world, Fukuyaman-based ideologies, have taken concerning decisive steps towards the consolidation of certain practices and norms, either by means of legal reform – today's legal responses to terrorism, such as military intervention to end terrorist threats[8] – or reinterpretation – in the case of ius ad bellum, the debate on preemptive and preventive self-defense.[9] It follows that the scope of participation of the Third World in international legal affairs is downplayed by an apparently natural surpass of capitalism and liberal democracy.

In other words, the end of the Cold War fomented a new universal beginning to international law, and it achieved this point by retrieving the spirit of world community that illuminates the doctrine of human rights and transnational solidarity. Third World claims, while up to a certain extent representative of interests located outside US-Soviet disputes, are labeled to be outdated when confronted to this new paradigm. In this sense, so reads the passage from Akehurst's Modern Introduction to International Law:

> Nevertheless, major changes in international law have occurred since 1945. Western states were anxious not to drive Third World states into the arms of communist states, and have therefore agreed to many of the alterations sought by the non-aligned countries. Most of the rules which developing countries used to regard as contrary to their interests have changed, or are in the process of being changed. Similarly, when the interests of Western states change, such states are often just as ready as other states to abandon the old rules and to replace them with new rules which are more in keeping with their own interests. Modern international law is not static, but has a dynamic nature and is in a continuous process of change. The accusation that international law is biased against the interests of Third World states is, on the whole, no longer true.[10]

These remarks on the status of the Third World are woven into a specific view on history and its mode of production. It is often acknowledged that the study of the history of international law represents a relevant aspect of the study of the discipline itself. Nevertheless, some specialists tend to approach history through rather limited lenses, embracing certain views on history as self-evident statements, or, though not without difficulties, as a natural fact that dismisses proper methodological scrutiny. Within these premises, the act of turning one's attention to the past could be initially associated with a narrative focused on the progress of the discipline, a narrative that elucidates key moments, setting aside the ones that are of less relevance, in order to finally reach the present times in a triumphant style.

Internationalist Lassa Oppenheim insists on the importance of surveying the history of the discipline, for an adequate knowledge of its history provides the international lawyer with the tools to cope with current legal or institutional challenges. International law makes its own history side by side with the evolution of the international society: together, they compose a promising portrait of the narrative of international law's institutions and norms in an ever changing world where conflicts are inevitable. In any case, there remains one steady, uncompromising fact: to speak of the history of international law means precisely to speak of the successful narrative of the discipline towards progress and universality, or, to put it differently, the triumph of international law over international anarchy. In this sense, Oppenheim asserts that "the master-historian […] will in especial have to bring to light the part certain states have played in the victorious development of certain rules and what were the economic, political, humanitarian, religious, and other interests which have helped to establish the present rules of international law."[11]

The method outlined by Oppenheim has been measured in detail by David Kennedy, to whom such an approach to history plays a central role in conventional scholarship, which is "[…] to reinforce the fantasy that some thing called 'international law' has had a continuous presence across differences in time and place."[12] Telling history according to these parameters, Kennedy points out, reflects in the act of investigating the precedence of a given rule or institution. In the same way, such a task can also be understood as an inquiry over history in a very peculiar sense: the rule or institution reaches out present day international relations through an evolutionary road that departs from the sphere of politics and, by a series of events, intentional practices, advances and drawbacks, is finally inserted in the domains of the legal world.

Professor Kennedy stresses the functional nature of the act of addressing the history of the discipline in this way. Paradoxically, though, this implies a process of writing history by selecting certain events that meet the requirement of having what it takes to leave the historical and political spheres to join the prestigious hall of legalized practices and institutions – for instance, 1648 Treaties of Westphalia –, or, in Kennedy's terms, "an argument about a rule or principle, or institutional technique in international law is almost always an argument about history – that the particular norm proffered has a provenance as law rather than politics, has become general rather than specific, has come through history to stand outside history."[13]

Writing history within the boundaries pointed out by Kennedy evidences the influence of positivistic philosophy – historicism – over international law's historians. Assumed to be a fact, the distinction between the historical world and what we say about it works as the framework for the much preferred scientific understanding of history vis-à-vis the broader complex and contradictory worldly processes. According to Kennedy, "the conventional tale of international legal history is a progress narrative, a fable about how the discipline grew and who its enemies are – above all, this history teaches, turn your back on politics and ideology, and then also on philosophy, theory and form."[14]

Historians seek to provide epistemological foundations to the discipline, and, as Michel-Rolph Trouillot highlights, "the more distant the sociohistorical process is from its knowledge, the easier the claim to a 'scientific' professionalism."[15] Once the craft of writing – and producing – history, as positivist tradition reveals, is determined by scientific assumptions, some preliminary conclusions should be considered regarding the positivist methodology. First, the qualification of a set of events that are likely to compose the historical narrative is a task to be performed with scientific criteria. It follows that, even though some claim to produce their own history – for instance, the Third World, social movements, minorities, etc –, it is not up to them to decide whether their tales should join 'official History'. As post-colonial Indian historian Dipesh Chakrabarty points out, "[historicism] tell us that in order to understand anything in this world we must see it as an historically developing entity, that is, first, as an individual and unique whole – as some kind of unity at least in potential – and, second, as something that develops over time."[16] Secondly, and as a consequence of the former statement, the very act of writing history embodies a precise, yet disguised by language, act of power and violence.[17] Here comes necessary the question posed by Trouillot: "what makes some narratives rather than others powerful enough to pass as accepted history if not historicity itself?"[18]

Taking Trouillot's insightful remarks, one should ask his question to contemporary international lawyers. At a first glance, one should reckon it to be a highly demanding task, though, to draft a comprehensive critique of the historical biases, the occluding processes or oppressive institutions and norms. Yet, any critical understanding of international law must come to terms with the urgent commitment to tackle history. The entrepreneurship would require diverse mechanisms that are capable of, but not only, exposing the flaws, continuities, discontinuities, and an understanding of the language that narrates history, and confront it with a vocabulary that escapes conventional scholarship. It is argued that such a vocabulary may be available in alternative readings of modernity, in social movements that permeate the peripheries of modern rationale, even perhaps in local democratic and political practices that defy the single-minded developmental model.

3. The Third World: stories of resistance and emancipation in XXI Century international law

The search for alternative readings of international law's foundations, history and subjects, conventionally taken for granted by mainstream research, has encouraged promising investigative legal approaches.[19] Present-day world relations are unquestionably complex,

In this remarkable and highly provocative monograph, Trouillot dedicates the third chapter to discuss the mechanisms by which the 1790 Haitian Revolution has come to be labeled by historians of its time as a non-event that was not apt to enter history.

[19] Among these approaches, one could cite the feminist, international relations theory, broad-ranging and conflictive, which places international law in the intricate yet unavoidable position of providing normative regulation for innumerous competing perceptions of the international phenomena. Among these, the Third World Approaches to International Law (hence, TWAIL) movement has recently attracted considerable attention from international lawyers who display concern with the situation of developing countries in the global landscape.

TWAIL scholars are engaged in a number of projects ranging from the complex relations between colonialism and imperialism to contemporary surveys aimed at deeper transformations of the international plane. The movement embraces a very distinctive departing point: rather than assuming international law to be a thorough and finished project based on a conjugation of universal ideals claims and State behavior patterns, TWAIL perceives international law to be a culturally and historically constructed scholarship.[20] Conceiving classical international law as the normative product of an international order drafted by the European powers over the last five centuries, TWAIL aims at exploring the mechanisms by which colonialism, imperialism and economic dependency have framed the international order in detriment of developing and Third World countries, social movements, minorities, and other innumerable forms of communal life. International theorist Obiora C. Okafor provides a sound description of the movement:

> TWAIL scholars (or "TWAILers") are solidly united by a shared ethical commitment to the intellectual and practical struggle to expose, reform, or even retrench those features of the intellectual legal system that help create or maintain the generally unequal, unfair, or unjust global order […] a commitment to centre the rest rather then merely the west, thereby taking the lives and experiences of those who have self-identified as Third World much more seriously than has generally been the case.[21]

Telling the "untold stories" of international law, as Pooja Parmar asserts, materializes one the main imaginative purposes of TWAIL researchers. The widely perceived notion that modern international law was born out of the European order conceived by the 1648 Peace of Westphalia has driven the discipline into a particular set of postulates and legal theories revolving issues such as sovereignty, recognition of States, regulation of war and appeasement of conflicts. Keeping the international realm in order has attracted international law's attention for over four centuries, whereas the claims for international justice, emancipation of Third World nations and protest against economic dependency have been largely neglected. A change in the manner international problems are traditionally conceived, so as to include alternative solutions based on alternative epistemologies – non-European modes of thought, values, institutions, practices – is at the heart of TWAIL's inquiries.[22]

Whereas coming to grips with the formation of international law in its structural, ideological and normative aspects compose the mosaic in which TWAIL scholars focus their research, a further proposal in the movement aims at providing alternative solutions to contemporary socio-legal problems – underdevelopment, hunger, domestic conflicts, dependency, AIDS, to name but a few. In order to accomplish this dual objective, it adopts "[…] distinctive ways of thinking about what international law is and should be; they involve the formulation of a particular set of concerns and the analytic tools with which to explore them."[23] Taking history seriously and critically is one of these "tools".

3.1. Who is the Third World in International Law?

The 1970's symbolizes a turn of the tide on the surveys of the role of the Third World in international legal knowledge. The aftermath of decolonization and the immediate debates that emerged concerning newly independent States that were joining the international arena and being granted international legal recognition provided the scenario for political contestation and cooperative initiatives. Taking a standard account as a starting point, it could be argued that the main concern addressed by Third World internationalists was the proposition of fair rules of commerce and perspectives of economic development that could meet these countries long-awaited expectations. Nevertheless, theorists would soon come to grips with the more profound structures and processes disrupting Third World nations' expectations.

In this large picture, Indian internationalist R. P. Anand, among others, has sounded a note in favor of the interests of Third World countries. Prof. Anand points out the perpetuation of colonial and imperial relations despite the promises of political decolonization. International economic institutions, such as the IMF and World Bank, on the one hand, and international legal forum, such as the WTO and even the UN to a certain extent, on the other hand, were drafted upon a world consensus that acted in favor of inequality, exploitation and control over the populations in the South. Despite well-known cooperative efforts, namely the Non-Aligned Movement (G-77) and its drafting of a New International Economic Order as an alternative developmental path independent of the Cold War ideological settings, colonial relations have taken new forms of influence and control over the Third World, as well as the articulation of the imperial reason has been reshaped so as to fit economic interests of rich nations. These remarks notwithstanding, Anand insists both on reforming world institutions in order to address developing nations interests and developing countries' balancing positions to confront anti-reformist discourses: "The only way the poor countries can better their lot is by increasing production and by industrialization. It is now generally recognized that the only way to have a stable and peaceful world is to help the poor countries in their development."[24]

Anand's ideal international system would embrace everyone's interests. In this sense, important documents such as the 1974 Declaration on the Establishment of a New Economic Order[25] emphasized the need to cope with injustices and the ever-widening gap between developing and developed countries. Similarly, the Preamble to the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States[26], also approved in 1974, stated "it is a fundamental purpose of the present Charter to promote the establishment of the new international economic order, based on equality, sovereign equality, interdependence, common interest and cooperation among all States, irrespective of their economic and social systems". In light of these developments, international theorist Mohamed Bedjaoui argues for an international law of participation "[…] genuinely all-embracing and founded on solidarity and cooperation [which] must give great prominence to the principle of equity (which corrects injustices) rather than the principle of equality".[27] Both Anand and Bedjaoui acknowledged the dangers that arise from treating international norms – e.g, sovereignty and sovereign equality – uncritically, being it for international law remains deeply structured and influenced by imperial and colonial relations.

This seminal treatment of the Third World in international legal affairs is well deserving of its dues. This recognition notwithstanding, recent TWAIL scholarship have been focusing its efforts, on the one hand, in the direction of a deeper understanding of the specificities of this heterogeneous assembly of States that shapes varying legal arrangements, and, on the other hand, TWAILers have been drawing upon what Karin Mickelson labels "interconnectedness". As for the former, research is being carried out in major areas, namely (i) the articulation of different legal orders – and varying cultural traditions – to fashion a less Eurocentric oriented international law[28] and (ii) the accommodation of cultural diversity both within present legal institutions and around new designs of the national/international legal frameworks, especially in form of epistemic resistance[29]. Mickelson, in her turn, argues in favor of authentically interdisciplinary approaches aimed at composing a distinctive Third World approach. "Interconnectedness", in light of interdisciplinarity, cannot mean anything but an engagement between international legal institutions and norms, on the one hand, and a threefold analysis of justice, morality and history.[30]

Following Mickelson's analysis, the resurgence of historical studies in international law is highly noticeable. Over the last two decades, an increasing interest in the history of the discipline has given rise to academic courses and disciplines dedicated to several aspects of such a broad-reaching interconnectedness.[31] Once historical studies were back in the scene, theorists have been committed to understanding the foundations of the discipline, its disputable relations with specific historical contexts and processes and, last but not least, the formation of the nation-State along with its worldwide spread. Finally, the treatment of colonialism and imperialism, often coupled with historical approaches, emphasizes the critical twist that some contemporary internationalists imprint in their works.

3.2. Colonialism, imperialism and International Law

TWAIL benefits extensively from these propositions. For instance, the examination of colonial relations, the formation of specific historical biases – one-sided official Histories – and its repercussions to present-day global institutions and norms consist in one of the ways in which international law is seen through critical lenses. Consequently, there is reason to question the role played by early thinkers towards the consolidation of its universal vocation: the dynamics of colonial and imperial relations from the 16th to 19th Centuries, and up to our times, are generally left untouched by conventional scholarship.[32] Since the latter usually employs universalist arguments in their description of international law – in Koskenniemi's words, their "sensibilities"[33] –, and since a certain view on history seems to spring from such an approach, the study of history within critical parameters becomes a much needed undertaking. The production of history, or the processes by which the discipline has come to be around a certain selection of events, often conceals, or even discredits, the o*ther* non-European, his/her values and world views.[34]

Taking account of the very first questions posed by theorists such as Francisco de Vitoria – and other early "founding fathers", such as Suarez and Grotius – in his quest of providing both moral and legal justifications to the just title of Spanish colonial actions in 16th Century Americas, as well as the solutions advanced by him, encapsulate an effort to apply TWAIL's postulates to an early legal scholar within the dictates of the historical domain. Humanistic interpretations of Vitoria's ius gentium, despite being postulated by eminent internationalists[35], have nevertheless had contending aspects of their studies questioned and deconstructed. The purpose of these investigations must not be a complete deconstruction of these authors' opinions, placing them – entirely out of context, it should be said[36] – as co-responsible actors of colonial and imperial practices. Instead, this process discloses Eurocentric minded assumptions, particular modes of thought that are granted global access, and a highly enthralled, yet at times disguised in universalist fashion[37], imperial discourse in the making that represents the standard attitude or inclination of the discipline, an attitude that it avoids facing directly.[38]

The duty to bring civilization to the peoples of the New World, in different ways present in the writings of these authors, is rooted upon a belief of the superiority of European institutions, economy, religion, values and ways of life. An occluding attitude towards the Other – the Indian, the Oriental[39], the inferior –, as pointed out by Latin American philosopher Enrique Dussel[40], is a key component of modern reasoning, which unfolds the myth of modernity coupled with its underside, relentless subjective and, perhaps more troubling owing to its deceptive nature, objective violence, to use Žižek's terms[41]. This comprises a tion of the other are some of the elements that allocates the Indians and the Spanish. In this sense, when in 1492 Columbus sent to Spain his primary descriptions of the New World, it should not come as a surprise the fact that these accounts were immersed in the Christian tradition. The reality the explorer encountered was perceived, understood and interpreted through a method named by Tzveran Todorov as finalist hermeneutic, in which the most significant argument is the one derived from authority, rather than the one based on personal experience: "[Columbus] sabe de antemano lo que a encontrar; la experiencia concreta está ahí para ilustrar una verdad que se posee, no para ser interrogada, según las regras preestablecidas, con vistas a una búsqueda de la verdad." TODOROV, Tzvetan. La Conquista de America. El problema del otro. Mexico: Siglo Veintiuno Editores, 2003, p. 26. In Vitoria's works, such a set of values is unquestionably the values of the Spanish society. Whenever the theologian was confronted with the question whether the Indians could be considered civilized, he would not hesitate to compare the colonized peoples' institutions and practices with the correspondent element within his own cultural patterns, which forged "a standard based on the capacity of socio-political organization and self-government whereby the Spaniard's system of governing is the natural benchmark." [41] Slovenian philosopher Slavoj Žižek differentiates two types of violence. Subjective violence derives from day-to-day relations concerning the physical or regular conflict bedistinctive feature of international law vis-à-vis its colonial and imperial roots, as internationalist Brett Bowden asserts:

> The very essence of the function of a standard of civilization. If in the eyes of the Spanish, the Indians are unable to measure up to European social and cultural practices, and more importantly, systems of political organization and government that are assumed to be the universal norm, then they are deemed as 'barbarous', 'uncivilized', or 'infantile' – in any event, inferior.[42]

The standard of civilization was the legal mechanism that admitted or excluded peoples and nations into the international society, "the cultural values and practices of Christian societies are taken for granted and are the infallible yardstick."[43]A particular focus at this stage is laid on tween individuals or societies, e.g. crime and terror. This kind of violence is self-evident and can be noted by the nude eye. Conversely, objective violence operates inside symbolic signs – namely, language, racism, hate-speech – or structural elements – economic, political, legal relations. Žižek's point is to explore the ways we perceive and misperceive violence. See ŽIŽEK, Slavoj. Violência. Seis notas à margem. Lisboa: Relógio D'Água Editores, 2008 (English version: Violence. The mechanism is described in detail by Todorov, in his compelling survey of the "discovery of the Americas". Todorov tackles Spanish attitudes regarding the native peoples, which, as he points out, are based on a previous and definitive conception of the role the colonizer plays vis-à-vis the backwardness of the colonized populations, which may depart from a viewpoint of the similarities between the two peoples or the its differences. In either case, there exists an excluding and eclipsing approach towards the other. Columbus' writings and actions are representative of these interpretations: "La actitud de Colón respecto a los indios descansa en la manera que tiene de percibirlos. Se podrían distinguir em ella dos componentes, que se vuelven a encontrar en el siglo seguiente y, prácticamente, hasta nuestros días en la relación de todo colonizador con el colonizado; ya habíamos observado el gérmen de estas actitudes historical studies dedicated to 19th Century internationalists. The ideas of progress, civilization and economic freedom are generally regarded as distinctively present in international lawyers of that period. Rising nationalism contrasted with mounting awareness of world affairs, as the European continent experienced relatively peaceful times.

One should note, however, how theorists confronted questions of international society and universal values in quite troubling terms. As Martti Koskenniemi explains, internationalists engaged in fierce debates over the characterization of international society often advanced proposals about what should international law become. Despite obvious theoretical divergences, e.g. among people like Von Martens – who confined his reflections around positivist-minded assumptions – or John Westlake – who advanced an organic understanding of international law –, Koskenniemi highlights a common belief in them: European society and civilization materialized the cornerstone of any project of the international arena, which echoed in European attitudes towards peoples outside Europe, or, in other words, "even as international lawyers had no doubt about the superiority of European civilization over 'Orientals', they did stress that the civilizing mission needed to be carried out in an orderly fashion, by providing good examples, and not through an unregulated scramble".[44]

Non-European peoples were granted access to international life provided certain conditions were met. In these accounts, Europe occupies the vertex of an allegedly natural – a fact of nature – evolutionary pyramid encompassing all the peoples in the world. In his 1894 Chapters of the Principles of International Law, John Westlake puts forward the nec-en la relación de Colón con la lengua del otro. O bien piensa en los indios (aunque no utilice estos términos) como seres humanos completos, que tienen los mimos derechos que él, pero entonces no sólo los vê iguales, sino también idênticos, y esta conducta desemboca en el asimilacionismo, en la proyección de los propios valores en los demás. O bien parte de la diferencia, pero ésta se traduce inmediatamente en términos de superioridad e inferioridad (en su caso, evidentemente, los inferiores son los indios): se niega la existencia de una sustancia humana realmente otra, que puede no ser un simple estado imperfecto de uno mismo. Estas dos figuras elementales de la existencia de la alteridad descansan ambas en el egocentrismo, en la identificación de los propios valores con los valores en general, del propio yo con el universo; en la convicción de que el mundo es uno." essary attributes by which a certain people is considered a State – thus admitted to the society of States. Westlake calls these attributes the test of civilization. To him, the peoples in the world are expected to take European civilization as a mirror, should they look ahead to acceptance and active participation in international affairs. Accordingly, the differences between the civilized and the uncivilized cannot be bridged unless the latter is capable of being approved in the test of civilization. The test involves a given people's capacity to manage reasonably working institutions, such as law, administration and commerce, and inspire confidence that they can perform well without foreign "assistance". Westlake writes: "Can the native furnish such a government, or can it be looked for from the Europeans alone? In the answer to that question lies, for international law, the difference between civilization and the want of it."[45]

In Westlakes's view, international law should mediate the treatment of non-civilized peoples so as to expand the standard of civilization throughout the world. The sort of legal discourse performed by early internationalists such as Vitoria, works through 19th Century international affairs, though in more elaborate and contemporary arguments, usually concerning sovereignty, sovereign equality and basic principles of government and Constitutional achievements. In this aspect, if one considers the legal relevance of sovereignty, a cornerstone of legal subject hood for European countries, it could be argued that it is framed upon universalist assumptions: on the one hand, the peoples who are not granted with such a gift[46], because stuck in inferior scales of human progress, do not deserve recognition by the society of States; on the other hand, progress and civilization are to be brought by European interventionism, an inevitable step towards the maturing of less-developed peoples:

> Accordingly, international law has to treat such natives as uncivilized. It regulates for the mutual benefit of civilized states, the claims which they make to sovereignty over the region, and leaves the treatment of the natives to the conscience of the state to which the sovereignty is awarded, rather than sanction their interest being made an excuse for more war between civilized claimants, devastating the region and the cause of suffering to the natives themselves.[47]

This seems to display the standard, or the legitimate fashion, for the violence that has been committed towards native populations in America, Africa and Asia since early 16th century and continued onwards, reaching the 21st century through varying mechanisms and structural imbalances. In Anghie and Chimni's remarks, "violence has been displaced in part from the first to the Third World by a number of international practices that have resulted in the South's subjugation to a range of unsustainable economic and social practices policed by international institutions and trade institutions that enrich and favor the North."[48]

4. The international and the post-colonial: dissident voices and the vocabulary of decoloniality

If Anghie and Chimni make a strong a point, that is to say, if colonialism and imperialism, rather than a feature of a distant past, but a component of legal Western tradition, then by what mechanisms do these aspects endure in contemporary international law? An attempt to answer this elusive question could stand upon the contributions, first, of post-colonial Indian historian Dipesh Chakrabarty[49] surveys along within the Subaltern Studies movement members on the alternatives to confront historicism with a commitment to provincialize Europe give life to the subaltern voices, and second, Latin American philosophers like Aníbal Quijano[50] and Walter Mignolo[51] and their critique of Western modernity through epistemic mechanisms known as coloniality of knowledge.

The conceptual framework that forges modernity, Chakrabarty outlines, "[…] entail an unavoidable – and in a sense indispensable – universal and secular vision of the human", that meaning a totalizing narrative that makes a particular reality the only reality. Departing from it, "the European colonizer of the nineteenth century both preached this Enlightenment humanism at the colonized and at the same time denied it in practice"[52], which reveals a hierarchy of values and the geographical site of the production of historical events. The logical conclusion, the cunning of reason tell us, is that all should converge to a desired point in history despite evident historical particularities.

Historicism is a product of modernity and functions by presenting certain evolutionary stages that, once achieved, should grant the necessary credentials to join official history. This reasoning is perhaps somewhat present in legal institutions like the recognition of States, the principle of self-determination and the idea of the nation-State itself. In order to tackle these assumptions, Chakrabarty suggests provincializing Europe, that is, examining the hidden ideological-historical-legal-political-cultural mechanisms responsible for projecting, to the globe, a determined local sensitivity, while downplaying other conceptions of diversity: "to 'provincialize' Europe was precisely to find out how and in what sense European ideas that were universal were also, at one and the same time, drawn from very particular intellectual and historical traditions that could not claim any universal validity".[53]

Anibal Quijano's reflections on modernity, too, display a permanent concern with making sense of the byproducts – violence, poverty, dependency – of the historical process. Western modernity presents itself linked with its totalizing counterpart, a specific mode of production of knowledge labeled coloniality. The relations between the colonial mode of thinking and reasoning – coloniality – and modern social-legal dynamics are reflective of a permanent exercise of power and violence directed at plural visions of knowledge that escapades or defies modern/colonial parameters. These forms of subjugation and occlusion of diversity inevitably colonize knowledge, in the precise sense that valid knowledge must abide by a set of standards should it be willing to be accepted globally. Modernity/coloniality, together, comprise a structure of power that is virtually inescapable because it creates a hierarchy of knowledge and dictates the parameters of recognition within the realm of valid knowledge:

> That specific colonial structure of power produced the specific social discriminations which later were codified as 'racial', 'ethnic', 'anthropological' or 'national', according to the times, agents, and populations involved. These intersubjective constructions, product of Eurocentered colonial domination were even assumed to be 'objective', 'scientific', categories, then of a historical significance. That is, as natural phenomena, not referring to the history of power. This power structure was, and still is, the framework within which operate the other social relations of classes or estates.[54]

Large scale political decolonization that took place in the 1960's and 1970's did not represent, based on Quijano's insights, the end of epistemic and systemic colonization. Colonial logics sustains action through the imposition of political, economic, social, cultural and epistemic patterns, on the one hand, and the empowerment of a matrix of power55 that is permanently categorizing knowledge and life, and it does so by the unilateral implementation of values with universal appeal. Coloniality disguises itself in universal/cosmopolitan clothing, forging a "mystified image of their own patterns of producing knowledge and meaning."56 The universal categories put forth by Western modernity through colonization and informal imperialism produce universalism by claiming the exclusivity of its epistemic position despite the contingency of the historical and cultural and social biases.57

[57] The working of the parameters of universality in 16th century legal thinking was examined by Peter Fitzpatrick. The author defends the thesis that Spanish Scholastics, like Francisco de Vitoria, have developed a vocabulary that placed political-theological concepts within the rationale of modern imperialism. It follows that legal practices and norms become secular features of modernity whereas the theological remains active as it absorbs and reenacts the religious continually. FITZPATRICK, Peter. Working in similar argumentative structures, Walter Mignolo develops further the concept of coloniality so that it could give rise to decolonial strategies capable of unraveling, deconstructing and reconstructing those tales, experiences, forms of life and knowledge that have been silenced for the past five centuries. Decolonial strategies, in Mignolo's words, set the road to new modes of thinking, "a delinking that leads to de-colonial epistemic shift and brings to the foreground other epistemologies, other principles of knowledge and understanding and, consequently, other economy, other politics, other ethics."58

So as not to drift into unnecessary excavations that may lead this study astray, two main conclusions should be made up to this stage. Firstly, international law's foundations face severe criticism by the craft of theorists who display a commitment to disenthralling given assumptions, biases and differentiations upon which legal doctrine takes root. The reasons for revisiting key thinkers such as Vitoria or 19th Century liberals are unfolding before us: these studies tackle both the history of the discipline and the broader social context in order to come to terms with the so often elusive, at times misleading, quests for decolonization and promotion of diversity in global reach. Secondly, once history has become a prominent element in TWAIL's methodology, internationalists ought to come to terms with the difficulties, limitations and perspectives woven in the task of taking the history of the discipline seriously. In other words, the Third World searches for its own voice inside international law and, while they seek to write history from distinctive perspectives, such histories may be located outside the discipline's classical accounts.

It is the extent to which violence, be it subjective or objective to use Žižek's terminology, becomes institutionalized within present practices and norms, that raises notes about the urgency of revisiting the history of the discipline and the unfolding of acts of power, occlusion or exclusion that grants a particular culture – Europe – its universal status. International law, as the discussions above may reveal, often projects particular modes of life, culture and politics to the detriment of multiple modes of life, culture and politics that are strange to its language and appeal. In this sense, the accounts that dismiss the relevance of the Third World in post-1990's international affairs work in tandem with all-encompassing historical views that flattens pluralism and diversity, yet spreading a belief on current norms' proneness to address the interests of all peoples in a liberal-fashioned community of States.

The road to development becomes evident in the horizon of official History as the alleged fragmentation of the Third World gains prominence. In face of this, TWAIL advances vocabularies, practices and pluralism aimed at a double movement of, first, confronting established scholarship in their own foundations and, second, of bringing to the fore epistemic alternatives, the excluded voices of the Others, the subalterns, in international level. By embracing this critical methodology, the movement takes seriously the need to expose the limits of mainstream thinking, its promises of emancipation and development, in order to give room to academic approaches firmly grounded on social movements, alternative thinking and a commitment to act otherwise.

Critical theories, such as TWAIL, reject linear perceptions of time and history, and allow for epistemic strategies capable of recognizing counter-hegemonic conceptions of society, culture and diversity. International law, in light of TWAIL's remarks, insists on a hegemonic discourse firmly rooted on historicism. Therefore, by interpreting colonial relations both beyond temporal limits and alongside the dimension of coloniality, as proposed by Latin American and Indian post-colonial thinkers, international lawyers are able to perceive their discipline in more diverse ways. Silenced stories, oppressed subjects and diverse manifestations of legal pluralism will find room for a broader democratic debate that outdoes the boundaries of historicism and its embedded postulations.

Sovereignty in a world of tangled legal orders

Mirlir Cunha[1]

Abstract: Unlike the traditional view amongst legal theorists about the international order, this paper argues that we do not live in a world with global institutions able to enforce their standards to our social practice. This observation is based on the fact that the international relations are developing at the same rate as the sovereignty of the state is being reinforced. This is happening because global governance requires the state's infrastructure to make the international directives obligatory and respected by ordinary people.

This new situation can be described as a division of labour where every global instance of rule-making recognizes the others as important and limited. Nevertheless, the power to constrain is exclusive of the state's legal system, especially when human rights cases are under consideration, as some authors such as Marcelo Neves, Thomas Nagel, Amartya Sen, Joseph Raz, and Jurgen Habermas have argued.

Yet in the contemporary legal order there is no consensus about how this account of sovereignty is able to provide certainty and predictability. While Neves, for example, treats the "shared or divided sovereignty" as a set of constitutional interactions of tangled legal orders, where different cultures reflect about themselves and other analogous cultures with a view to learn something from the analysis of the other people's experience, Habermas focus on the level of democracy and how far politics becomes from citizens in this new context, and tries to identify the means to develop the idea of a dual citizenship, in which one can be at the same time a citizen of the country and of the international community.

However it may be, the solution to these problems must start from the acceptance that with a fragile international authority, state sovereignty is necessary to enforce the international standards, while, at the same time, cannot be seen as an excuse to disrespect that authority. Hence, the international community should move beyond the current strategy of reducing international aids for countries where international regulations are disobeyed. It should put theses countries under pressure until their governments and their society revise their policies to respect the authority of the international community and the argument of human rights.

In the context of this interesting debate about the authorities of the international community and the state, this essay attempts to develop a jurisprudential theory of justice in a global world and to realize its effects on traditional concepts which figure in legal theory and in theories about the state.

Keywords: Global Justice, Sovereignty. Legal Theory.

1. The facts.

With the progress of international trade, interaction between people from all over the planet, global communication through the world wide web, and an increase in non-state institutions' regulatory activities, with different levels of entanglement between communities, it is possible to identify an interesting phenomenon—one that, until recently, had been making itself present in a rather shy manner. Around the discussions on globalization and its effects orbits the questioning of the realization of justice and promotion of human rights on a global scale. Furthermore, one must recognize its reflections on traditional conceptions of law that are the results of the theory of law and constitutional law, such as sovereignty, authority, and political self-determination of a people in its territory. Therefore, this is the important issue that guides the development of the present work.

When reflecting on the realization of human rights on a global scale, major contemporary philosophers and jurists, such as Jurgen Habermas, Amartya Sen, Anthony Appiah, Thomas Nagel, Joseph Raz, and Jeremy Waldron, made significant advances towards new interpretations that associate the aforementioned concepts regarding the protection of human dignity, the establishment of forms of political control that prohibits degrading treatment of human beings, and the institutionalization of the existing order beyond State borders. The recurrence with which the said concern is raised and the reasonableness of the analyses presented by these authors highlight the importance of this debate for understanding the legal practices adopted by our society.

Due to the importance and topicality of this issue, one can observe that the present discussion has been raising the interest of broad groups from the international community as the integrative effects of globalization policies are felt in a rather impactful manner, both inside the residences and over foreign policy-making. As can be seen in section two, this new approach significantly changes how the theory of law deals with international law and promotes the upgrading of traditional legal institutions based on concern for human dignity and human rights.

In section three, the author continues to delineate reasoning through the reflection on current solutions of control and the use of force in the international arena, in the face of the actual inefficiency of political and legal systems with regard to the current legal and political globalized practices. These developments are perceived as common constitutional problems that serve as foundations for serious issues that affect the globalized States, especially the democratic ones. Such issues are deemed too dangerous for the social stability of countries and will progress rapidly if political reforms are not effectively applied to various regulatory bodies whose decisions interfere in the relationships between individuals, organizations, and institutions.

As will be outlined in section four, mainly due to the economic crisis of 2008—which was the first major challenge to be addressed by the international community—and its consequences, the inequalities of the current practices of globalization denounced by intellectuals, not only in economic terms but also in social, humanitarian, and environmental, have become even more evident and have generated diverse reactions from the public policies of the community of states. This hard reality has set out a new form of organization of the National States, exposing a new concept of sovereignty. Contrary to predictions of great legal theorists of the first half of the twentieth century, there were no valid hypotheses intensifying national borders, nor letting them go altogether in favor of a central institution endowed with coercive power and control over political, legal, economic, and social issues. There was no central hypothesis in favor of a central institution that was skilled enough to develop core standards of recognition, change, and standards of judgment upon all States.

What happened, as discussed in section 5, was the realization that the solution to the current problems affecting political States and communities will not be arrived at unilaterally. There is a strong trend towards collective proposals, which require some loosening of the notion of sovereignty focuses on dialogue, cooperation, and negotiation with other States and peoples and is strengthened by enhancing its role as the guarantor of legal institutions within each nation. As a result, these collective proposals are able to protect the human dignity of the citizens of political States and promote human rights. This new direction shows that without the proper functioning of State institutions and official statements, as well as spaces for debate and discussion, any notion of global justice is an illusion too utopian to become a reality.

Therefore, the main thesis defended in this paper focuses on the issue of the reinterpretation of the notion of sovereignty under the influence of the phenomenon of transconstitutionalism, understood as the entanglement of constitutional orders and their impact on the design of a theory of justice in the international arena.

2. Law, coercion, and morals in international law.

Unlike the theoretical constructions about legal systems and the traditional theories of justice, which are well developed because they are linked to political and legal orders of States, the discussion on the functioning of the international order is surrounded by doubts and uncertainties. These doubts and uncertainties arise because any claim towards a theory of decision or a proposed theory for justice on a global level presents an obstacle. The obstacle is the idea that this field of human social relations is still in the early stages of development (NAGEL, 2005, p. 113), and therefore, suffers from a lack of basic constructions, such as the notion of authority and legitimacy of decisions.

For Bentham, the founder of the term international law (HART, 2009, p. 305), the idea of an order that regulates the actions between States should be devised in a manner analogous to the operation of the existing law in them. By transposing the notions regarding the rights of delimited space and groups, Bentham was faced with a number of incongruities that was inadmissible under the traditional General Theory of Law, such as the absence of coercion and institutions with authority to impose sanctions on transgressors whose behavior is regarded as deviant. In addition, there was no easy way to reconcile the notions of sovereignty with the imperative nature of a foreign legal system. These and other issues were the reasons that motivated the understanding that international standards should be taken as the rule of law only through their common use or convention, and therefore not constituting a proper legal system. The objections to this proposal, as Amartya Sen noted, led to an opposite understanding of what Bentham advocated. The said objections placed international law under an ethical perspective, the perspective of human rights that follows in the opposite direction, instead of understanding them as requirements and legal claims (SEN, 2011, p. 398).

The first contact with the debate on the ethics of international law in the General Theory of Law is a bit rough and generates a series of questions about legislation, legality, and coercion in international law. There are many doubts about the existence of a political community and international institutions that are able to coordinate the interaction between States and peoples. The more traditional texts, with a positivist view, do not address the issue with due importance. These texts are restricted to discussions either regarding the preparation of legislation in each State concerning the protection of individuals, or about the development of mechanisms for peaceful coexistence between States and peoples. Even sophisticated readings that critically address these standards, such as Hart's paper on International Law, start the analysis with the comparison between the former and internal law. In these papers, international law is compared to a simple system of primary rules of obligations. International law is then at a far less developed stage than domestic laws of national states, in which we see political and legal structures that are more organized and "sophisticated," and are regarded as a "luxury" (HART, 2009, p. 303). These domestic laws are the result of the hierarchical political organization of national states—something that is not perceived internationally.

Considering the long time lapse between the historical moment in which positivist conceptions were developed and the social realities of today, we see that historical facts overtook the assumptions of this theory on international law. Currently, they are an inadequate basis for contemporary reflection of the study of law, since international law can no longer be understood as "a set of standards accepted by States as binding norms" (HART, 2009, p. 304). Due to the failure of positivism in offering an appropriate proposal for the study of international law, some important jurisprudence philosophers became interested in the subject, and presented their contributions on it. Among these jurisprudence philosophers, we highlight the contributions of John Rawls.

Like Hart, Rawls also brings the elements of his theory to the international level. With this initiative, he goes on to defend the assumptions of political liberalism in the international order and the moral character of "International Law," which he called the "Law of Peoples." According to its design, the first step in the development of the Law of Peoples is the elaboration of principles of justice for a national society, according to which government, as a political organization of the people, is not the author of all its powers. That is because in reshaping the powers of sovereignty in the light of a reasonable Law of Peoples, the State would abdicate traditional rights to war and unrestricted internal autonomy (RAWLS, 2001, p. 34–5) when it comes to the protection of human rights.

Rawls' argument overcomes former positivists views according to which international law would be a simple set of rules of a factual character, denying an essential point for discussion about international law: the importance of moral character[2] contained in the notions of ius cogens and human rights. From then on, they are abandoned or reformulated, rendering space to the theoretical constructs compatible with the issues of justice and transconstitutionalism conflicts involving human rights.

This observation leads to the understanding of international law, today, not as a series of treaties and intergovernmental agreements (NEVES, 2009, p. 133), but as social and legal practices whose intentions express concerns mainly on issues relating to the defense of human rights. At the heart of the debate about constitutional aspirations, increasingly influenced by events and reflections developed around the world, is the concern for the protection and promotion of rights that tend to be seen as universal achievements. This fact leads to the recognition of a transconstitutional web established through the exchange of information and critical legal content.[3]

[2] In the view of Amartya Sen, Hart is one of the major proponents of the idea and the usefulness of human rights as a source of inspiration for legislation, according to positions presented by the jurist in the article "Are there any natural rights?" (SEN, 2011, p. 398–9). In this paper, there are no agreements with this interpretation of Hart's work. The proposal developed herein identifies the author as someone very concerned about the rights and fundamental guarantees of equality and freedom under the formalism of moral critique of law that may be held by official institutions, hence a coherent stance with the text of the known work. "The concept of law" (HART, 1955, p. 189). Regarding international law, our shared interpretation is that Hart argues (1) the thesis of separability between law and morality, since although the contents of international law resemble that of the primary standards (standards of conduct that establish obligations), it is improper to insist that all standards not supported by threat are a form of "moral" (Hart, 2009, p. 292); (2) the law critically accepted as a standard; and (3) the denial of the law as only a set of coercive orders.

Renowned jurists in the last thirty years, such as John Rawls, Jurgen Habermas, and, Amartya Sen, pointed out in their work on the notion of international law under the conception of human rights, which is taken as the basis of international law and therefore, as a connecting element between morality and law. In this way, human rights, when understood as coercive subjective rights that assure individuals a space for freedom and self-determination, would present two faces, much like Janus: one faces morality while the other faces the right itself (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 18).

Nowadays, support for the moral character of international law stems from the perception that one should care for the idea of justice in the context of international law, not only the differences involving conflicts between States, but also those that involve the State and its citizens in interdependent common cases that are often recognized in different legal systems. This interpretation makes the positioning of Rawls described above, although innovative, the target of much criticism, one of which came from Habermas. For the German philosopher, the theory presented by Rawls in his work "The Law of Peoples" is limited to the relations between people in the context of war, resulting in a subsidiary and insufficient protection of human rights in everyday relationships within States. It fosters a mild deflation of human rights into a new minimalism that ends up loosening the strength of human rights, by separating them from their essential moral impulse represented by the protection of the equal dignity of each. "This minimalism forgets that the continuous tense relationship, internal for the State, between universal human rights and the rights of private citizens is the legislative basis for the international dynamics" concerning human rights (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 35).

By developing a theory of justice in international law that strengths the relations between Peoples represented by States, Rawls underestimated the importance of the political participation of individuals that incorporates them into a collective will. The peoples conceive political participation and derive said participation from a binding contract. The advantage of the liberal democratic peoples is treated as inherent in this culture of political participation, leaving the analysis of the reason of success of these or the inhibiting factors of the development of other peoples, classified as "decent," "developing," or "outlaws." Rawls' rating system, besides being airtight and somewhat idealized when it comes to the nobility and morality of liberal peoples, presents a descriptive reason. This descriptive reason builds an international order lacking both mobility and the participation of individuals, through their critical positions, on the events happening around them.

Another important criticism of the proposal formulated by Rawls came from the acclaimed positivist Joseph Raz whose text, "Human Rights without foundations," posits that state autonomy was mistakenly appreciated by Rawls. Because state autonomy was mistakenly appreciated by Rawls, Joseph Raz insists that Rawls' doctrine of basic justice (structured on the State) cannot simply be extended to the international arena. The principles of justice that govern domestic relations cannot be extended to international relations. The criticism of Raz concludes that moral principles that determine the limits of sovereignty should not only reflect the limits of State authority, but also, relatively, set (establish) limitations on the possibility of justifying intervention by international organizations and other States in what concerns the offended State (RAZ, 2005, p. 16).

Notwithstanding the undeniable contribution made by Rawls' view about the law in the international arena, and through the criticism of his theory, it is possible to think of a theory of justice at the international level that does not depend only on the State. It is possible to identify the social and institutional practices that work in an inductive manner from the events and reflections from various locations around the world, which allow us to identify the occurrence of cross-pollination between constitutional challenges. Thus, on a case-by-case basis, it is possible to evaluate the aggregate result of this succession of episodes that affect the construction of moral concepts discussed by all spheres of the international community in a legal-constitutional political debate that is fostered within each State. From this point on, we must not only discuss the emancipation of the peoples, but also of individuals through citizenship, political, and democratic actions. Current theories are committed to the pursuit of interpretations that balance the ideas of shared sovereignty, public reasoning in the international community, institutions and control of transnational economic practices, and social policies that benefit the development of the dignity of individuals.

3. The concentration of force.

Instead of promoting a federalist hierarchy among nations that concentrates on, and is organized around, a center of power endowed with supranational authority, the discussion about the organization of the States of the international community has made good progress towards the defense of transconstitutional hierarchical cooperation between the international, national, and supranational structures that are in place today. This progress, however, has not yet allowed for a proper understanding of the social, political, and legal scenarios currently developing in the international community due to the exchange of practices stimulated by globalization.

As an achievement of the last fifty years, one can point to the deflation of the concern regarding the issue of the understanding of international law or human rights as law, as constructs that did not fit in the model of law as commands constrained by threats. The debate was overcome after the State concentrated coercive functions, concerning issues of human rights, in structures set up by the State. This means that, according to the history, as long as there is the absorption of the ideals shared universally by constitutions and the strengthening of transnational regulatory bodies, one can verify the importance of state institutions in the process of the achievement and creation of acceptable legal behavior by the international community.

In a multilateral legal and political cooperation, it is possible to observe that the external decisions of States are evaluated and interpreted for them through the institutions of such cooperation. The States only then later incorporate the external decisions in the laws of the inner plane. After performing an evaluative step, the reason constructed in the external arena is critically introduced within the internal orders by state institutions, which are able to welcome and legitimate demand, through the imposition of sanctions. The compliance with legal practices results from interpretations contained in external decisions, especially when these decisions relate to human rights (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 62).

Thus, the theme of human rights, which was viewed with some suspicion,[4] finds protection in the constitutional powers that mention re-

[4]Habermas, mentioning Neves, warned that "regardless of the strength merely symbolic of fundamental rights in many of the façade democracies of South America and other places, the politics of the United Nations' Human Rights reveal the contradiction between the expansion of rights rhetoric humans, on the one hand, and its misuse as a spect for fundamental rights. At the same time, in order for the violations of these guarantees not to be hidden and therefore become invisible because of the sovereignty of each State, the defense of human rights must be shared with agencies and supranational entities or interstate bodies. From the point of view of the intertwining between legal systems, these agencies, entities, or bodies monitor and control the episodes of offense and divulge them through their agencies and media. Therefore, they are able to pressurize States, entities, or individual transgressors.

Due to the problems of efficiency and legitimacy faced by organizations and international institutions that have the duty to oblige various States to respect and promote human rights, the international community has been structured in such a way that there was no concentration of political and legal debate about human rights in various forums. In spite of this lack of concentration and political debate, the implementation of coercive and corrective measures necessary for the realization of human rights, remained tied to the local forces and legal structures of each State (NEVES, 2009, p. 165).

As pointed out by Anne-Marie Slaughter (NAGEL, 2005, p. 139), one can verify that the recognition of the new order in the consolidation process involves the understanding that international governance must be conducted in accordance with the capacity and responsibility of the various actors belonging to the communities that make up the international community. In this scenario of constant negotiation and communication among stakeholders, a chain of "shared labor" is instituted by the articulation between external and local authorities. This exchange takes place within the sovereignty of the States. This type of network process connects disintegrated parts in transterritorial structures that share common responsibilities and powers beyond the boundaries of individual States.

In this sense, it is possible to agree with the understanding that there is a strategic gain by stimulating the defense and realization of human rights as a national project, built by the critical legal debate about the interpretation of these rights, according to the cultural perspectives and political community whose practice is under evaluation (NEVES, 2009, p. 153). It is believed that this attitude allows greater legitimacy of the decision making process, given that the interpretation of human rights is promoted through an adjustment of the claims inherent in the content of these regional expectations.[5] Concerning this point, the aforementioned author establishes that even with the diversity of the doctrinal and jurisprudential repertoire, Constitutional Courts of the countries or supranational communities seek legitimacy for their decisions through a process of questioning institutional practices that are contrary to the protection of the freedoms and rights of individuals. It can be observed that Constitutional Courts are becoming increasingly self-referential in the solution of common constitutional cases, in a typical case of migration of constitutional ideas. More than a phenomenon of reciprocal influence between legal states, or a case of transjudicialism where courts promote reciprocal referrals, transconstitutionalism between legal systems implies that, in typically constitutional cases, the decisions of Constitutional Courts invoke the decisions of other states, cited not only as obiter dicta, but also as elements of the rationes decidendi. This phenomenon implies a reinterpretation of foundations not only of the starter line, but also of the finishing line (NEVES, 2009, p. 166–167).

In the examples presented by Neves, it is interesting to note that even the more closed courts, such as the United States, have some concern with the debate being conducted in foreign jurisprudence (NEVES, 2009, p. 168). This demonstrates that Americans are not so oblivious to world events and hermetically focused on their propositions. They also accept the persuasive force of the arguments advanced by other peoples, although they are more reluctant to accept political reflections undertaken by other communities. Contrary to this American position, Courts in South Africa, Canada, India, Zimbabwe, Israel, New Zealand, Ireland, Switzerland, England, and Brazil, among others, did not adopt the stance of the immediate deployment of foreign law. Instead, they adopted a reception of foreign law through internal processes of critical self-validation (NEVES, 2009, p. 171). Thus, they turned the reception into a dialogue capable of representing the development of reflective self-consistency while maintaining itself constitutionally open to learning from the experiences of others Courts, in judicial practice or presentation of models based on the study of comparative law.

Based on the study carried out by Slaughter (cited NEVES, 2009, p. 184), we find that there is a form of rejection verified in less efficient [5] Neves writes about the search for a model to "reconcile the dissension" between constitutional orders involved in the conflict and how to allow that there is a minimum balance between legal consistency (internal) and legal adequacy (external) in a transcontitutional "conversation" (NEVES, 2009, p. 165).

Courts in the transconstitutional process that are characterized by the absence of a minimum standard with respect to fairness. This situation, however, is not so simple, since whenever a country does not accept transconstitutionalism, due to not adopting constitutional institutions in their modern sense, but radically rejects it, there is an almost an insuperable difficulty for the transconstitutional conversation that will change the status quo. And so proposes Marcelo Neves, following the trails of Slaughter, is the overcoming of this event and the search for interaction with these courts averse to constitutionalism, even though passive agents initially, through face-to-face meetings between judges. The success of this proposal is due to the assumption that the transconstitutionalism model imposes respect for the differences between constitutional orders and their particularities with regard to the normative content as well as procedures.

The realization of constitutional dialogue between legal State depends on the emergence of a "judicial comitas" and on judicial trading through which one might establish the following chain of events—while the former can provide the structure and rules for a global dialogue between judges in the context of specific cases, the latter is more limited and reflects the overall bankruptcy of cases that go beyond borders. This transconstitutionalism should not be confused with an overarching global order (NEVES, 2009, p. 186), but should be recognized as the provision of legal entities engaged in resolving disputes, interpreting, and applying the law in the best manner possible. The starting point of transconstitutionalism is not a denial, but the opening of State constitutionalism to other jurisdictions, either similar or from a different species.

Thus, one will deem a decision adequate, perennial and stable, and thus legitimate, when it was guided by dialogue and accessible arguments able to represent the desire of local people for pursuing the protection of individuals. Considering the peculiar aspects of the history of the regional community inside in a global context of the protection achievements by the international community, the achievements guide the ongoing debate, with the occurrence of internally influenced episodes that allow the change in parties' conceptions (NEVES, 2009, p. 228).

With the author of "Transconstitutionalism," it is manifested interest in this essay, but also demonstrates the concern about what he calls the development of a right "no punctual" (contrapontual in Portuguese) (NEVES, 2009, p. 154). A nice overview of this phenomenon is the realization that, at first, it promotes the adjustment of the tension between internal and external perspectives held by a constitutional entanglement founded in the conversation needed for reciprocal learning for the actors of an interpretive community, which is very positive. Although, at a different time, it authorizes the relativization of the normativity of human rights under the same matter between the States on the grounds of "direito contrapontual" (in Portuguese), a promoter of the autonomy of national melodies and shares with misaligned institutional practices that are being promoted by the community.

The harmful behavior, builder of fear, perpetuates cynical interpretations that deny rights and restrict the efficiency of the design rules provided by the history of these achievements. On this issue, Habermas also does not fail to expose the problematic side of the attempt to establish a world order made up of fragmentary institutions, because these, can be unsuccessful, can cause ambiguity of human rights, which makes its own standards suspect (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 32).

4. The new conception of sovereignty.

Regardless of the risks, the scenario that is set for States and international organizations and transnationals is that they are closely related in their actions and attitudes through a legal code, not just a moral code, in that this scenario is open to the experiences and social practices, political and economic facts, and interpretations, which are derived from its constitution. From start to finish, we verify that the various contemporary legal systems share a common identity since all of them share the same binary code of the common legal system, legal/illegal, and the problems they face (NEVES, 2009, p. 115).

However, what is legal or illegal and how the legal systems of a modern world society within a plurality of orders work, each with their different legal requirements and programs, in a theory of law, remains an empty question, as it is no simple task to correlate the basis of various legal barriers for cooperation. Thus, the relationship between systems must be done first before the possibilities of building a cross rationality through reciprocal learning and creative exchange can be optimized. In this way, the internalization and externalization of information arising from social spheres play various roles in the efficient realization of the binary code, legal/illegal. The internalization and externalization of information is reciprocal in a multitude of orders. The fact that there is a multiplicity of orders does not mean they should be isolated. Since always, even in classical international law, input/output relations and the interpretation of legal orders have been observed through treaties, the international legal order of representatives, and practical and legal perspectives.

As set forth by Marcelo Neves, Jurgen Habermas and Amartya Sen, the point of convergence between these multiple orders is the ability of people to question and act in a critical manner. The action should have political reflections when considering "problems" of their community and the achievements of other communities. The dynamics mentioned are moved by a sense of reciprocity that grounds the idea of equality between individuals and makes them act in pursuit of treatment and conditions similar to others.

For their potential in fostering a political-legal regime in which people are viewed equally, self-determination, political liberalism, and the democratic rule of law are seen as social constructions that contribute to the consolidation of the notion of human dignity, the central point of the fight for human rights claims today. This positive perception of these social constructions stems from the fact that these 1) highlight tolerance to individual choices regarding religion, sexual choice, 2) and are endowed with institutions that seek to suppress possible offenses based on gender, race, background, or financial ability, allow social advances, through the inclusion and participation of people in the design of community projects. It does not hold here that the aforementioned social constructions are not prone to institutional errors, but, if there are distortions, these have the environment conducive for corrections.[6]

In this respect, in his work "On the European Constitution," Habermas[7] defends a cosmopolitan attitude in which human rights, col-

[6] Nicolas Berggruen and Nathan Gardels, however, present a position somewhat skeptical about the ability of liberal democracies and participatory self-regulation. In their work, Intelligent Governance for the 21st Century, the authors point out flaws in the self-regulatory process of liberal democracies, which often fall prey to a "consumption citizenship" that presents populist policies unable to promote policies and structural unpleasant reforms to the population that are necessary for fundamentals of good governance in the long term. They question whether, like the market, a liberal democracy is able to regulate itself to preserve its system from malfunctioning (BERGGRUEN; GARDELS, 2013, p. 69).

[7] In the aforementioned work, as highlighted by Alessandro Pinzani in presenting the Brazilian edition of Habermas' book (2012: p. XIV), unlike earlier works, the German philosopher adopts a decidedly normative position on the concept of human dignity, one that theories of justice have always avoided. This attitude can be illustrated by the lectively constructed through institutional achievements[8] has always found in its core the notion of human dignity. He regarded human dignity as "the conceptual hinge that connects the morale of equal respect for each with the positive law and the democratic legislation so that, in their cooperation under favorable historical circumstances, can emerge a political order based on human rights " (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 17–18).

Compatible with the thought presented by Habermas, Kwame Anthony Appiah highlights that the commitment to human dignity, built by local political movements with outpouring of support from the international community, is the attitude that avoids disrespectful actions towards others and allows the evolution of a legal system toward the preservation of individuals (APPIAH, 2012, p. 140). On the notion of human dignity, Jeremy Waldron argues that the spread of the concept of dignity offers one promising idea to envision to all people the right to the same noble treatment, previously restricted to the high caste. That means, he continues, building concepts that give everyone the same respect and equal rights, ideas worthy of egalitarian liberalism (WALDRON, 2009:28).

For a sense of reciprocity, it is necessary that before an identity geared towards guaranteeing the right to respect is established for the democratization of criticism, it is important to make the criticism a popular and common practice, thereby spreading reflexive thoughts. Thus, the concern is with respect to what makes the connection between the good life, built by the individuals' participation in government, and the place they occupy in the world. The universal dignity, which Habermas also attributes to all persons, supports the connotation of self-respect in social recognition, an attitude referred to by Appiah as one of honor. According to the philosopher,

> (...) The honor is not a vestige of a decadent pre-modern order, for us, it is what it always was: a mechanism driven by dialogue between our self-conceptions and consideration of others, which can propel us to fade seriously our responsibilities in a world we share. A person with integrity will care to live according to their ideals. If you can, we should respect it. But worry about doing the passage according to which human dignity, for the author, is one and the same everywhere and for each, based on the indivisibility of human rights (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 16).

[8] According to the author, "Human Rights resulted from violent historical struggles for recognition and sometimes revolutionary" (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 28).

> right thing is not to worry about being worthy of respect. It is the concern with the respect that makes the connection between living well and our place in the social world. The honor makes the integrity public. (APPIAH, 2012, p. 184)

In the same sense, Waldron also talks about honor, distinction, and position when dealing with the legal notion of dignity as it is conceived today. However, for him, unlike the majority of philosophers who believe in the loss of certain habits distinctive of value as the gain for the construction of the notion of dignity, there was a unification of the social classes. They share the same habits of nobility and equal respect as universal rights, and reject special privileges or honor as corresponding rights (WALDRON, 2009, p. 27).

Since human dignity is a concept about equal respect, it is grounded in a sense of belonging to a community that is organized geographically and temporally under the banner of a civil status. Hence, the concept of human dignity is promoted by combining the moral contents, with equal respect for each other and an order of citizens who are subjects and are endowed with rights that are recognized as equal and claimable (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 24).

Thus, the philosopher predicts that the validity of positive human rights is only perceivable when situated in a particular community, primarily within a state, in the form of fundamental rights. However, for Habermas, they are endowed with a claim to universal validity that transcends national boundaries and towards a "cosmopolitan inclusive community" based in a "democratically constituted world society," which does not need to develop the same characteristics and structures of the State itself (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 24). Right now, what we observe is an idea of "shared or split sovereignty."Throughout the debate on the topic, especially based on the experience of community law of the European Union, the notion of sovereignty was reinterpreted through the concept of "shared or split sovereignty" between legal systems that intertwine in what can be referred to as the "transnationalization of popular sovereignty" (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 50), or the "transconstitutionalism between supranational law and state law" (NEVES, 2009, p. 152). The new paradigm means the transfer of a part of "competence of competence" for a more comprehensive legal domain present in a relationship of complementarity that is located in a "network of constitutional elements" in the view of the citizen (NEVES, 2009, p. 153–154). This phenomenon points to a constitutional conversation focused on mutual learning, rather than a monolithic hierarchical way, whose process consists of three components. These are: (1) the democratic communitarisation of the idea that the subjects of Law are free and equal, (2) the organization of collective action capabilities, and (3) the means to integrate a civil solidarity among strangers (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 50).

The similarities between Neves and Habermas concerning the matter in question go only as far as its identification, as they differ on the understanding of what it represents. Neves values the intertwining of orders through the process of reciprocal learning between the legal orders established in multilateral discussion forums, mostly officers, about certain shared constitutional matters. Habermas' argument about constitutional change focuses on dual citizenship accumulated by citizens of European nations in a unique process in which it is possible to follow the formation of a new form of sovereignty where the individual is at the same time a citizen of the nation and a citizen of the Union.[9]

Thus, Habermas supports the idea of transnationalization of popular sovereignty as a democratic alliance between nation states so that, on the one hand, nation states accept to undergo rights established at a supra-national level, and on the other, give citizens the constituent power of the union with a limited number of "constituent States," receiving a mandate from their people to be consistent for the foundation of a supranational community (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 49).

Thinking in terms of Habermas, according to whom honor and value the political capacity of each individual as a conductor of his own life project, raising it to the merit of the writer and interpreter of legal and constitutional history to be inherited by their peers, is to also report that the process of global governance performed by intertwining institutions and governmental entities, and non-governmental, lacks a deficit of democratic legitimacy. This deficit results in the gap between those endowed with power to decide and will be influenced by the consequences of political decisions. The reflection of this political abyss generates a series of distortions increasingly complicated and impractical to overcome with only localized measures (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 85).

This same observation is made by Berggruen and Gardels (2013:48), when they analyzed the changes in globalization, from the 1990s to the present day. According to them, the "economic power" experienced pre-2008 crisis resulted in a cultural and political assertiveness that led to a "pluralism normal" in the history of humanity. However, the complexity of a greater global integration in trade, investment, production, consumption, information flows, has pressed authorities to demand greater involvement of governments at the technical and policy levels, mega urban regional, national, and supranational level in order to manage systemic linkages of interdependence that exist today. In conclusion, everyone will lose if it all falls apart.

Thus, according to the authors, "the political awakening that is noticeable in many places requires the dignity of meaningful participation. The failure to find an institutional response to this challenge will result in a crisis of legitimacy for any government system, for the inability to function enabling inclusive growth and employment, or it is because a 'democratic deficit' that silent many voices of the population will harm an effective consent" (BERGGRUEN; GARDELS, 2013, p. 49).

The expressions above represent the current responses to writings, such as that of Thomas Nagel, in which institutions are sustained in a stage of pre-organization of world politics which, despite the abovementioned democratic deficit and in spite of being deemed "unfair" for not having passed democratic process, have the capacity to implement measures of common interest among States imposed by bargaining power between them, thus being able to minimize the problem of global justice in a system that may be centralized and then critically questioned (NAGEL, 2005, p. 146).

5. Politics in the contexts of life.

The pessimistic scenario described by Habermas (2012:85), derived from the unfolding of the global crisis of 2008, is about a society in which the political elite is far from the population, which in its turn, ignores the real intentions of those who made these policies that are followed by Nations; who change the rules unilaterally, focusing on efficiency, and deconstructing, in the wake of their advance, the guarantees and rights of individuals. About this Habermasian concern, Amartya Sen affirms (2011:377) that democracy, through the representation that it causes between citizens and government, allowed the development of measures that guaranteed freedoms and reduced social inequalities, which can stimulate the healthy growth of the individual. Without the controlling instruments of existing decisions in a democratic context, global governance would possibly become nothing more than a government of bureaucratic political elite, insensitive to the needs of particular communities and involved only with its power and institutional arrangements.

Discussing democracy, Sen (2011:359), citing Habermas, describes the need for a public arena where arguments can be defended freely during the process of decision making. This is recognized not only in solemn moments of the procedures of democratic decision-making, but also in the day-to-day speech and actions of the people of a political community that reinterpret social practices, allowing for reflection and improvement of these through transit of information and demands between stakeholders and those with power to decide (SEN, 2011, p. 438).

Because they are bound to the community they represent, the holders of political power should be aware of the fact that when the gap between what is said and what is perceived increases; when the difference between truth and propaganda is so great, people eventually simply cease to believe in the system—a system that will take only as much as a push to fall (BERGGRUEN; GARDELS, 2013, p. 81). Therefore, at any level of State action, authorities should cherish acting in accordance with the desires and expectations of their populations, favoring space for debate and accountability as a means to avoid being targeted or criticized by the public. Thus, the public sphere of debate is the environment wherein one will find the possibility of good governance that allows for an environment where plans capable of producing patterns of conduct and standards, and with the ability to ensure the promotion of human dignity and citizenship are discussed (SEN, 2011, p. 383–384).

To perform in the arena where public reason can be conducted, certain institutions are needed. As Nagel points out, the individual and political action of the people only makes sense in a manner capable of changing consolidated social practices when they are contextualized in a mechanism endowed with structures in motion, with the potential to be targets of the insurgency. Anarchy does not allow for progress as it seeks to restrict the ability of individuals to move toward a definite proposal for the long term. However, contrary to what the American philosopher supports, one should not be compelled to accept illegitimate and unjust institutions as a necessary evil to achieve global justice (SEN, 2011, p. 362).

As the capacity for action and communication is not limited to national borders, the preservation of the media and free press represents the maintenance of important arenas for the promotion of public argumentation and protection of human rights in transnational forums (HABERMAS, 2012, p. 84). After all, among the achievements of democracy and its inclusive process of participation is the ability to "make people interested, through public discussion, in the difficulties of others and have a better understanding of their lives" (SEN, 2011, p. 378). Defending the standpoint of Appiah, based on Habermas' communication and discourse theory, Sen (2011:427) explores the importance of pressure from the world media and human rights organizations in the protection of fundamental rights in the local communities, where hierarchical exclusionary practices disrespects the constitutional freedoms of weaker individuals by reason of their condition, subordination, or minority.

Thus, one can conclude that legal orders based on subjective rights, protected by the freedom of expression and the ability of political action of individuals, are indeed endowed with sovereign institutions, which can be deemed legitimate, as they are constantly subject to correction by their population. Although regarded as the most efficient ones to date, even these institutions face major challenges over the economic and political entanglement in the international arena, which despite being touted as a stage for decisions with serious effects on national constitutional spheres, are characterized by the absence of any form of coordinating or legitimately established power that hinders the development of responses to shared problems.

There is no denying that all sovereignty nowadays is open to transnational learning, even though some are more than others are. It is observed that such opening has as its foundation the quest for efficiency that reflects the quality of life of society and its political maturity, economic and social. Such is the new format of State sovereignty that needs to be articulated at various levels—national, international, and transnational, which can develop individuals and make a system thrive. Due to the tangling of very similar and interconnected dilemmas, in all corners of the planet, States must share the idea of the realization of the protection and promotion of human rights as a type of justice in the international arena, endowed with reflexivity, impartiality, and transparency.

6. Conclusion

The discussions on global justice have progressed towards the ability of societies to associate the regional interests of their population in broader perspectives that affect all others. From the moment one verifies the existence of connected practices through a network that surpasses the code of sovereignty with relative ease and familiarity, one might notice the consolidation of other decision-making arenas in different environments which, with or without mature Institutions, will require a new attitude from the traditionally practiced policies in the current constitutional States of nowadays. This evidence left behind the limitations and doubts posed by legal positivism of the first half of the twenty-first century as to the existence of international law and the sharing of common ideals such as human rights.

That which affects the populations of the world today the most is directly linked to their ability to generate welfare societies, or efficiency societies, and to promote a sense of dignity. Socioeconomically stable societies tend to persevere in their territories without serious conflicts and promote the strengthening of institutions endowed with legitimacy and credibility. Their development is so great that it renders them able to generate patterns capable of influencing other societies, to the extent to which they are presented as viable after an incorporation process through procedures and local interpretations.

As pointed out by Marcelo Neves, who innovatively verified the strengthening of what he called "cross-pollination" between constitutional systems of the world, pointing out the decisions reached by major courts of the world that were in full dialogue, we now realize that there is more than dialogue in this new social formation that affects the interdependent global society as a whole. There are legitimate demands for representation, in different spheres of power, that use of the media as grounds for action and political pressure.

It is unsettling to acknowledge that there is a mismatch in the international arena between the economy and law, on one the hand, and politics on the other, the latter being practiced in an unsatisfying manner—or none whatsoever, depending on the subject. Flowing from the thought of Habermas, it is seen that this gap has caused political instability in many countries, even liberal democracies, whose systems, by themselves, are not capable of generating responses to the welfare demands of the population.

The actions outlined until now by political leaders have been insufficient or hopeless since their early stages, due to the lack of ability from the structures to articulate internationally concrete policies that combine efficiency and legitimacy. Although limited and with little success, in Europe, as pointed out by Habermas (2012:62), there are already global forums such as the G20 in which, according to appointment by Nicolas Berggruen and Nathan Gardel (2013:53), one can point to an outline of international coordination skilled to control organizations and practices that erode the national structures, thereby causing serious imbalances and constitutional problems.

We can refer to this phenomenon as politics being required to expand its borders beyond sovereignty boundaries in a process of "political globalization," arising from economic and cultural globalization. This historical moment is characterized by diffuse uncertainty due to the lack of market transparency, to government omission, as well as to the convenience of various governments regarding risky and ambitious economic practices. Faced with the current disarray of institutions in the face of adversity, the actual stage demands a concern with stable and sustainable growth. Therefore, the capability of survivability of States and their institutions depends directly on the willingness of their societies to self-correcting in an articulated and critique-wise way, mixing regional, supranational, and international actions that both seek results and focus on the development of people and strengthening of human rights.

This means that if at first national policies stimulated economic globalization, resulting in an opening of markets and cultures, which established a certain easing of sovereignty, now the same policy sees the need to share this sovereignty and to render accounts to external parties, or risk having to forfeit the credibility and trust of the international community, risk-averse, and eager for growth.

As a new chapter in the history of mankind begins, we perceive that the current form of organization and production will tend to stabilize this cycle when the sense of belonging to a broader community becomes more encouraged in a way that the highest standards of human development goals are taken seriously by any government. When the expansion of rights and the rule of law occur in a sustainable manner, public demonstrations and popular political demands shall be taken seriously by governments and institutions, as they will be supported as sources of information about the system malfunctions that may contain the key to improving governance and the development of the peoples.

Subjectivity and judicial decision:
A philosophical approach

André Martins Brandão[1]

Abstract:This paper seeks to clarify the relationship between subjectivity and judicial decision making. It can be said the majority of judicial decisions have something in common, a simple sentence: "I decide." The investigation of this phrase brings up two essential questions to be answered in order to justify an entire conjecture of interpretation and application of law: who is this "I" who decides? And how that "I" ought to decide? This work has for hypothesis that the way of deciding depends on the manner the person understands oneself. From the first question - who is this "I" who decides? - It is perceived, especially since philosophy's linguistic turn, that the subject is no longer seen as the creator and epistemological starting point for knowledge of the world, as the moderns Cartesian cogito and Kantian transcendental proposed, and came to be understood as a historical subject, being-in-the-world, participating in a world of intersubjective meaning, heavily influenced by history and tradition, according to contemporary continental authors such as Heidegger, Gadamer and Foucault. From the second question - how that "I" must decide? - It was noticed that in a positivist view, by authors like Kelsen and Hart, the judicial decision making process, that defines interpretation of law as an act of will and uses discretion as a way to fill the "gaps" of the legal system, is closely related to the modern perspective of understanding subjectivity, because the judge is elected as an epistemological starting point for knowledge of the world, therefore creator of law, who can say what the law is based on his individual conscience. Likewise, Alexy's attempt to overcome positivism ends up falling into a similar problem, because it permits the judge to use discretion in choosing the most relevant principle for decision, through the proportionality method. Finally Dworkin, with his vision of law as integrity, offers an alternative for interpretation and application of law consistent with subjectivity´s contemporary notion, given that the judge's main task is to order coherently and responsibly a system that pre-existed him, guaranteeing previously existing rights. From these findings, it is seen that the way of understanding one's place in the world is a prerequisite for making judicial decisions, based on the link between the transcendental subject, the cogito and the positivist interpretation and discretion, and the proximity between the historical subject and contemporary theses of interpretation and application of law, such as law as integrity.

Keywords: subjectivity; judicial decision; interpretation and application of law.

1. Introduction

Judicial decisions are ways to put an end to legal disputes, whoever are their participants. They are largely responsible for the concretization of law in the world of life. From a linguistic perspective, it is possible to assume that at least the majority of judicial decisions have something in common, a simple prayer, consisting of a subject and a verb: I decide.

Generally judges rely on such a statement at the final moment of their decisions. When, based on the normative system and circumstances of the case, through interpretation, decide the application of the law to the case, thus settling the dispute at hand.

The investigation of such a phrase brings at least two key questions to be answered in order to justify a whole conjecture of interpretation and application of law: who is this "I" who decides? And how that "I" ought to decide?

The first question has descriptive claims: subject´s meaning in the world must be ascertain in order to answer who is the "I" who decides in legal judgments; the second, in its time, normative claims, after all, to better enable law´s concretization it must be sought a form of decision that allows a method of interpretation and application of the law at the same time minimally safe and that claims correction.

This work has for hypothesis that the way of deciding (in any normative system, including law) depends on the way the human being understands himself, i.e., the manner that humans see the world directly influences their way of deciding.

From this possible statement, the answer to the two questions above complete each other, and are necessary for a better method of interpretation and application of the law, because the "I" who decides is the way that the human being sees the world, and how this "I" ought to decide shows us the path he must tread to reach the decision.

Thus, it is proposed to seek the answer to both questions from a philosophical point of view, in order to clarify the relationship between the human being and the way to decide within a normative system of law.

2. The First Question - Who is the subject in decision making?

The first question - who is this "I" who decides? – will be answered through the clash between the classical notion of kantian transcendental subject, strongly influenced by the cartesian subject or cogito ergo sum, and a contemporary way to understand the subject as a historical entity, within the structure, mainly based in continental authors such as Martin Heidegger, Hans-Georg Gadamer and Michel Foucault.

From the study of the kantian transcendental subject (KANT, 2001, 2002, 2003) or the cartesian cogito (DESCARTES, 2001) in a context of modernity it was found that subjectivity was elected as the birthplace of all knowledge. All the world's meanings comes from men (I think, therefore I am), which has the supposed ability to draw from their own history and factuality system for better research of mundane objects. In that way, it was established a subject-object relationship, where man is the subject, birthplace of all knowledge, key point of knowing the world; and the object is the target of that knowledge. Establishing a relationship in which the object is known, and the subject is the knower; the object is manipulated, and the subject manipulates. The notion that the subject is able to extract an object from its environment to know it, understand it, interpret it, manipulate it better permeates this way of thinking.

From a contemporary point of view, based on the ontological-linguistic turn on philosophy, Heidegger (2005, 2008, 2009) demonstrates the ability to see the human being through an existential being - Dasein, as being-in-the-world, which reverses the cogito. "I think therefore I am" is replaced with "I am in the world, therefore I think." (NUNES, 2004) Heideggerian Dasein is the human presence, is being (Sein) there (Da). For Heidegger the human being is not something general, abstract, but something concrete, that takes place in the world. The essence of Dasein is in existence, in the concreteness of experience, where he creates bonds with being, with entification man. Dasein, for Heidegger, explains existence as an existential situation. It is only to be until stop being. When death comes to be is no more. Time governs being, that is finite in its essence. Making a language game with the title of Heidegger's seminal book, it can be said that being is time (HEIDEGGER, 2005).

From this new sense of self, Heidegger tried to end with the cartesian myth of being encapsulated in itself and in the present tense. Kant and Descartes believed that the best way to understand the object was to extract it from its midst, removing it from its environment in order to know it really by itself, without interference from the environment. But Heidegger says that Dasein is always being in the world, in the world of projects, in the world of concerns. He is being in it´s midst, questioning the very being of the other. Dasein essentially exists in the world, raising questions about being and open in possibilities. The subject is not something isolated, pure, but immersed in an existential situation. All cultural, historical, local, situational factors are immersed in being. Thus, one passes, through the Dasein, from the singular subjectivity offered by theoretic models presented to an intersubjective existence.

Dasein is always being in the world. The world is it´s there. He is always situated, having no cartesian metaphysical capacity to be an abstract entity, he is not extractable from the world. He is also temporal, is projected in the future possibilities, but thrown into a world that was already there before him. Heidegger's philosophy has the characteristic of being historical, always expressing itself in a temporal form. The time, in turn, is not just a metric system, but a necessary data for the understanding of existence. Dasein is the temporal presence of existence.

Hans-Georg Gadamer (2008, 2009), in turn, remembers the Aristotelian philosophy, in which the expression for subject was Hypokeimenon, which means "that which persists throughout all change". It is not the human being responsible for the existence and designation of the world; he is a being in the world, a being-thrown, a being-there, in Heidegger's fundamental ontology. In that way, all the truths and interpretations produced by the subject are, in one way or another, a product of the time in which he lives, a product of history and tradition.

Michel Foucault (2000, 2002, 2007, 2009) is also a big opponent of Descartes and his man extractable from the world, which dominates all knowledge and reality. No wonder that the French philosopher declared in one of his first works, called 'Le mots et le choses', that man is dead (FOUCAULT, 2000). It is dead the cartesian centralized man, cogito ergo sum, to make room for the subject within the structure, to open space to the temporal subject. In this way, as well as Heidegger, Foucault sought to flee from the subject as the epistemological starting point, and became concerned with the structure, placing the subject within that structure.

In this sense, from the clash of perceptions of subjectivity offered by the contrast between the cartesian cogito and the kantian transcendental in one side, and the heideggerian Dasein, the gadamerian historic and the foucaultian structural in another; it is realized, especially from the linguistic-ontological turn on philosophy, that the subject is no longer seen as the creator and epistemological starting point of knowledge of the world, as in modernity, and came to be understood as being in the world, participating in a world of intersubjective meaning, strongly influenced by history and tradition.

3. The Second Question - How the subject decides?

The second question - how that "I" ought to decide? - will be answered based on philosophy of law, especially taking into account methods of interpretation and application of law, and the issue of discretion. It will be investigated the legal positivist notion of judicial decision and interpretation, by authors such as Hans Kelsen and Herbert Hart, in order to contrast it with contemporary forms of understanding them, based on authors such as Ronald Dworkin and Robert Alexy.

From the kelsenian normativist notion (KELSEN, 2000, 2006), legal positivism elected subsumption as the main form of application of law. It would be up to the judge to make the case fit the pre-existing rule, so to resolve it. However, it identified the problem of semantic closure in the system of law, i.e., the existence of cases that could not be solved by the positive rules. Thus, it relegated the issue of interpretation and application of the law to a minor problem, aiming primarily on logic-deontic conditions of validity of norms (rules). This fact can be seen by the kelsenian construction of the normative pyramid that defines the validity and concretization of law, and his hypothetical basic norm as a condition of closing the system (KELSEN, 2006). Hart (2007) also noted such a construction, as the system of primary and secondary rules, which has as support a rule of recognition, based on the social acceptance of the presented system.

According to this vision, legal positivism admits the discretion of the interpreter as a way of solving the problems of factual insufficiency of law to respond to all cases. Kelsen (2006) poses the problem of interpretation of the law as an act of will of the judge, who in front of the frame of the legal rules, decide according to their conscience. Thus, if there is no clear rule to a situation - a "gap" situation for the positivists - the judges would be the ones responsible, through their own discretionary judgments, from their own individual consciousness, for integrating the system, creating law from their subjectivity, legislating retroactively.

The positivist view of interpretation and application of law combines, in an essencial form, to the meaning of subjectivity of the Kantian transcendental or Cartesian cogito, as it invests in human consciousness, as creator of the world, to solve problems of practical application of law, making use of discretion as the system´s closure valve. In this sense, the individual consciousness has the power to integrate law from their own judgments, without connecting to intersubjective practices - law is what the interpreter, from his interpretation as an act of will (and why not power), says it is.

Contemporary authors like Robert Alexy and Ronald Dworkin, each from their own theoretical frameworks, noted the problems of positivism, particularly regarding the insufficiency about the method of interpretation and application of law, and discretion as an "inevitable" way to give responses to cases not covered by the system.

Firstly it is verified that Alexy's (ALEXY, 2008) legal argument thesis is insufficient to try to go beyond positivism, because with his way of solving hard cases - those cases of "gap" in positivism - through legal principles seen as optimization commands, which uses the maximum, principle or rule of proportionality for achieving a balance of values, ends up falling back into the abyss of discretion, considering that it is the duty of the subject, from their individual conscience, to choose the most relevant principle for the case, which will be used as the decision main criterion. Thus, Alexy´s method does not leave the basic structures of positivism - discretion - choosing the subject as an epistemological starting point of knowledge, just as the transcendental kantian or cartesian cogito.

Ronald Dworkin (2005, 2008, 2011), mostly from his mature critique of positivism (or law as a matter of fact, the nomenclature used in the book "Law´s Empire"), weaves his way of seeing the practice of law as integrity. For the author, legal judgments are interpretative judgments which must face the past and the future in order to continue the system, while creating something new. In this sense, the doctrine of judicial decisions closely resembles a chain novel, where several authors write the same work - rests with the new author the obligation to continue what has already been written and add new things. Thus, the task of the interpreter of law is to try to balance the past and the future, trying to give moral coherence to the legal system.

In the American philosopher´s view, from the perspective of law as integrity, discretion of judges would not fit as a way to address the shortcomings of the legal system (GUEST, 2010). The task of a judge is not to legislate retroactively, so this would be a political irresponsibility. The judge has the duty to solve cases always within the legal system, using other legal patterns, like principles, when there are no rules for deciding a case. However, this does not mean a freedom to decide from his own conscience, in isolation – it means to decide the case according to the system of law, mediating past and future, trying to give coherence to legal practices responsibly. For this reason that Dworkin (2008) refers to integrity as the internal morality of law - because it's up to integrity to guide the work of judges, that is to build the system. Thus, the judge can never create law in the task of interpretation and application, but merely guarantee preexisting rights.

It is noticed that the dworkinian formula of seeing legal practice is coherent with the notion of contemporary intersubjectivity, since the judge's conscience is no longer the epistemological starting point to solve the insufficiency problems of the legal system. From the teachings of Dworkin, the judge can be seen as being in the world of meanings - a person who is responsible for giving coherence to the previously existing system. The subject is no longer creator of the world, as the cogito or transcendental, but a subject within history, tradition, and previously existing structures, which has the duty to interpret them as best as possible (coherently), in order to solve the practical problems of interpretation and application of law.

4. Conclusion

In this study it was observed that at least the majority of judicial decisions have a common bond - the phrase "I decide". This work started from the hypothesis that the human being´s form of perceiving the world directly influences the way they decide. Thus, it was elected two questions as a manner to demonstrate the influence of the way of perceiving subjectivity in the decision: who is this "I" who decides? And how that "I" ought to decide?)

It was seen that in modernity the subject was perceived as epistemological starting point for knowledge of the world (or creator of the world), from the notion of kantian transcendental and cartesian cogito; while in contemporaneity the subject is seen as being in the world, someone who participates in a world of intersubjective meanings.

In this sense, within the system of law, it was realized that the positivist notion (in its normative bias) of judicial decision, and mainly discretion as a way to address gaps in the legal system, are strongly related to the modern way of seeing subjectivity, because the judge is elected as epistemological starting point for knowledge of the world, therefore creator of law.

Similarly, Robert Alexy´s attempt to overcome positivism falls into a similar problem, because it opens doors for the subject to use discretion in choosing the most relevant principle to the decision of the case, using the method of proportionality.

Finally, Dworkin offers an alternative for interpretation and application of law consistent with the contemporary notion of subjectivity, given that the subject is no longer responsible for the world´s designation (like the kantian transcendental), therefore for the creation of the law in the concrete case, but his main task is to order coherently and responsibly a system that pre-existed him, ensuring existing rights.

From these findings, it is seen that the way perceiving oneself in the world is an indispensable condition for decision making, based on the link between the kantian transcendental subject, the cartesian cogito and the creative force of law living in the positivist discretion; and linking between the historic-structural subject and contemporary constructions of interpretation and application of the law, such as the law as integrity formula.

Finally, it must be stressed out that this paper is not based on a theory of truth as correspondence, thus it does not claim to be the correct mirror of nature. This is an incitement to debate and to democratic dialogue. In that way, the positions taken here cannot be, nor intend to be, the natural truth. Within a society one should, at least, listen to the other, open up for discourse, and not get locked in the tower of blind absolutism. As said by Levinas, in his work Totality and Infinity - between our totality, and the infinity of the other, the most ethical way to behave is to hear what the other has to say until the end, and not assume what he should have said from what one believes.

The role of procedural dialogue in the democratic system and the risks of judgment standardization in Brazilian Law

Flávia Almeira Pita[1]

Abstract: In the last decades, the Brazilian Judiciary has faced a large increase in its demand, and has shown its inability to live up to the expectations of its service users, revealing the inadequacy and failure of its administrative structure to timely process and adjudge suits. Given this context, proposals have been presented to accelerate proceedings, proposals that have in common the emphasis on ways to standardize judgments. One of the relevant examples is the assignment of binding effects to Brazilian Superior Courts decisions. Such proposals demonstrate a trend to depreciate the dialogue procedure established in the case, considering the parties objective e subjective peculiarities and real circumstances, prioritizing instead standardized solutions usually given by the higher courts of Judiciary, whose application prioritizes general over specific. Based on this evidence, this paper discusses the role of the judicial process in a Democratic State governed by the Rule of Law. The democratic ideal is politically represented, as a system of government, by the popular choice of rulers and legislators, responsible for translating, through the laws, socio-political-economic choices made by society. The "complete" construction of the rule of law, however, to the extent that it can be imposed specifically to individuals, prescribing them behaviors, limits or penalties coercively, depends on a second order of value choices, which will happen in court proceedings, lead by the judicial authority that conducts a process of information gathering and interpretation of facts and legal texts. For this, any lawsuit must obey principles such as the adversary system, the legal defense, the right to equal protection of the parties, justification for judicial decisions and the system of appeal, which aim to ensure the conscious participation of the parties in the construction of the concrete rule of law to which they will be submitted. Considering the absence in Brazil of democratic regimentation and control mechanisms to which judges are submitted, the democratic nature of the concrete rule of law lies in the procedural dialogue of the parties in the lawsuit, and in the expectation that it can influence the hermeneutic process of judgment. To what extent, then, does this observation conflict with the mechanisms of judgments standardization introduced in Brazilian judicial system in recent years? It is assumed, as a hypothesis, that they, in the way they are being conducted, weaken even more Brazilian Democracy. As a starting point for discussion the paper will examine the thinking of Calmon de Passos, Brazilian jurist.

In the last decades, the Brazilian Judiciary has faced a large increase in its demand, and has shown its inability to live up to the expectations of its service users, revealing the inadequacy and failure of its administrative structure to timely process and adjudge suits.

Given this context, proposals have been presented to accelerate proceedings, proposals that have in common the emphasis on ways to standardize judgments. One of the relevant examples is the assignment of binding effects to Brazilian Superior Courts decisions. Such proposals demonstrate a trend to depreciate the dialogue procedure established in the case, considering the parties objective e subjective peculiarities and real circumstances, prioritizing instead standardized solutions usually given by the higher courts of Judiciary, whose application prioritizes general over specific.

Based on this evidence, this paper discusses the role of the judicial process in a Democratic State governed by the Rule of Law. The democratic ideal is politically represented, as a system of government, by the popular choice of rulers and legislators, responsible for translating, through the legal rules, socio-political-economic choices made by society. The "complete" construction of the rule of law, however, to the extent that it can be imposed specifically to individuals, coercively prescribing them behaviors, limits or penalties, depends on a second order of value choices, which will happen in court proceedings, lead by the judicial authority that conducts a process of information gathering and interpretation of facts and legal texts. For this, any lawsuit must obey principles such as the adversary system, the legal defense, the right to equal protection of the parties, justification for judicial decisions and the system of appeal, which aim to ensure the conscious participation of the parties in the construction of the concrete rule of law to which they will be submitted.

Considering the absence in Brazil of democratic regimentation and control mechanisms to which judges are submitted, the democratic nature of the concrete rule of law lies in the procedural dialogue of the parties in the lawsuit, and in the expectation that it can influence the hermeneutic process of judgment.

The primary objective of this work, then, is to propose the following question: to what extent, then, does this observation conflict with the mechanisms of judgments standardization introduced in Brazilian judicial system in recent years?

The discussion proposed particularly makes use of the thinking of José Joaquim Calmon de Passos (Salvador, Bahia, Brazil, 1920-2008), jurist that, although more remembered for his production in the context of Civil Procedural Law, he also won admiration for the criticality and strength of his philosophical and political thought, as well as by its sweeping rhetoric, that " ...used to make huge audiences change over from laughter to tears, in the rhythm of emotion that he used to transmit with his images, sometimes comical, sometimes dramatic, but always extremely personal", always with the objective of "[...]reveal the weakness of institutional arrangements, lacking support in effective conditions of political society and economy, indicating citizenship as a decisive factor for effective change". (MURICY, 2012, p. 27)[2].

Because it is understood that the importance and opportunity of the thinking of Prof. Calmon de Passos – especially when he is concerned to alert to the peculiar problems of Brazilian political organization – deserves due attention and reflection, this work has explicitly also the sense of homage.

Therefore, based on the reflections of Prof. Calmon de Passos, this paper wants to state that the exacerbated adoption of standardization mechanisms weaken even more Brazilian Democracy. The emphasis of the work, however, doesn't lie in the defense of an answer, but in the relevance and opportunity of the question which is made.

2.1 Democracy

Democracy is one of those words that can suscitate a certain feeling in the interlocutor, but that is not easily translated into words, or at least in few words. Such difficulty probably derives from the fact that its concept depends on the allusion to several elements, "although loyalty to etymology (demos, Kracia) and the knowledge of the realities do situate the notion of people as its essential note" (SALDANHA, 1987, p . 66)[3].

In the reflections proposed in this work, the emphasis is, initially, the traditional sense of Democracy as a form of government in which there is the participation of the people in the choice of those who exercise political power [4] (which justifies its current relationship with the ideas of universal suffrage, political equality and representation and, on the other hand, its antagonism with the idea of dictatorship and autocracy).

However, another idea can be extracted from that, with a more general character, which is the idea of participation, directly linked to the values of equality and freedom. The element of isonomy is resumed, in the sense of civil and political equality of all before the law, one of the three principles that comprised the basis of Athenian democracy, beside the isocratia (allocation of sovereignty and power to the demos) and the isagoria (freedom of opinion and equal rights) (GUERRA FILHO, 1997, p . 16)

We need to highlight two other senses to the word Democracy, because they are especially important to the conclusions to which we want to reach. The first one concerns the meaning of Democracy as a peculiar form of political organization that assumes that the power is controllable. Democracy, therefore, to the extent that "the contemporary political structures are not understandable without reference to legal frameworks (also because of the so-called State-of-the-Law)" (SALDANHA, 1987, p. 70)[5], also presupposes the constitutional legal system organization based on the separation of powers (coming close to the concept of Republic), and the prediction of mechanisms for participation and democratic control in decision-making processes of all powers. In his definition of Democracy, Norberto Bobbio proposes, on the same line:

> I preliminarily say that the only way to reach an agreement when we speak of democracy, understood as something opposed to all forms of autocratic government, is to consider it characterized by a set of primary or fundamental rules that establish who is authorized to take collective decisions and with which procedures. Every social group is obliged to take binding decisions for all its members with the objective of providing their own survival, both internally and externally. But even the decisions for the group are taken by individuals (the group as such does not decide). For this reason, so that a decision taken by individuals (one, few, many, all) might be accepted as a collective decision, it must be based on rules (no matter whether written or customary ones) that establish who are the individuals authorized to take binding decisions directed toward all members of the group, and through which procedures. (2002, p. 30-31)[6]

Finally, it is possible to extract from the idea of control the sense of accountability. This is the last consequence of the possibility of control, its form of concrete realization. The representation provided by democratic mechanisms of political agents choice only can be legitimated, ultimately, if the mechanisms of accountability of these same agents are effective. In this regard, says Jose Joaquim Calmon de Passos:

> The civilizing gain that comes from the Democratic Rule of Law imposes that the production of the Law process is planned in line with its principles. Being its basic premise the equality of all men, so that no one can exercise power over another man that is justified by divine will, personal qualities or social condition of the dominator, only in terms of service is acceptable the exercise of political power in a democracy. So, the political power must be used within the limits of competence defined for this and in accordance with the rules imposed by the holders of single and true sovereignty - the members of the politically organized social group. (1999, p. 44. 70-71)

2.2 The Enlargement of the Judiciary Power

It can be noticed, since the 20th century, a process of political power concentration in the hands of the Judiciary, which has been inspiring reflections on its role, not only in Brazil, but in the whole world.

Starting from what we comprehend as the bourgeois liberal State – whose characteristics explain the Brazilian State itself – it is possible to recognize, in its origins, in contrast to previous experiments, a transition of the core of political power from the Executive Branch in the direction to the Legislative Power. The continental European historical circumstances, which marked the end of feudalism and the inauguration of what is usually called modernity, seem to have required the concentration of power in the hands of monarchs, that come to be, in certain moments, "the only source of creation and implementation of Law, as far as Louis XIV is always remembered for his famous phrase: L'Etat c'est moi" (TOMAZ, 2008, p . 98)[7].

We can see, then, a change in the balance of powers previously established, and, from the second half of the 18th century, it is the Legislative Power that assumes the centrality of political power. It embodies the "third state", that is praised by abbot Sieyes in his manifesto Qu'est ce qu'est le tiers État?, echoing a set of values and liberal ideals, related to thinkers like Rousseau, Locke, Voltaire and Montesquieu. The core of power migrates toward the Legislative, which submits other powers to the primacy of the written legal rule, that would represent rationality and people's will. Well known are, in this sense, the words of Montesquieu, for whom "les juges de la nation ne sont que la bouche qui prononce les paroles de la loi; des inanimes qui n'en peuvent moderer ni la force ni la rigueur."(on line).

The construction of the Modern State can be recognized as one of the various consequences of profound changes in man's way of thinking and living in continental Europe, which took place from the 15th century, with the end of the middle ages. Especially the development of renaissance humanism in the 15th century, the Protestant Reformation in the 16th century and the Scientific Revolution in the 17th century, have meant a turning point in structural pillars of western societies and prepared the man for a new form of political, economic and cultural organization, very well represented by the Enlightenment of the second half of the 18th century. The highlighting of the human will, the secularization of social relations, the appreciation of free initiative and individual freedom, the replacement of medieval mysticism and contemplative attitude by experimental method and by the rational systematization of knowledge: these are all traces of modern man that shaped its actions on multiple aspects of life in society, especially in Law.

At that time the rationalism will occupy the central position in the way of man understand his world. Security[8] is now the primordial value of Law, justifying the overvaluation of the legal rule, which needs to be understood as a closed system, complete, ubiquitous and rationally understood and applied, in order to be accept under the new set of values of modern man. This scenario will reach its climax in the 19th century, when the scientific positivism boosts, in Law, a widespread tendency to scientific systematization of legal rules.

It is in the 20th century that begins, then, another turnaround, that has been unfolding since then up to the present moment. If the core of power has first migrated from the Executive Power to the Legislative Power, now it walks toward the Judiciary, for reasons that have been identified and discussed in the last few decades, and whose consequences wait yet to be properly understood and scaled.

This time, it is the so-called linguistic turn of Philosophy that represents changes in the way the man philosophically understands his reality. Wittgenstein, Frege, Russell, the logical neopositivists of Vienna Circle, Karl Popper and Gadamer are names that can be mentioned among those who shed light on the constructive role of language in the formulation of the world.

Since then, it is increasingly relevant the role of the work carried out by the Judges in the definition of the rules of law, as a result of the recognition of the creative character that assumes the hermeneutic task undertaken by the magistrate. It is recognized that there is subjectivism in the act of judging, and that the judge is responsible for the construction of a new rule, result of a peculiar reading of the legal text, of a

[8] "If we investigate the ideological roots that sustain our paradigm, we see that the modern law, from 17th century Philosophy, it prioritized the value 'security', as the fundamental requirement for the construction of the modern 'Industrial State'. As a remarkable English writer said [Jon Elster, Juicios salomónicos – Las limitaciones de la racionalidade como principio de decisión, translation 1985, Cambridge, Barcelona: Gedisa Editorial, 1989, p. 40 et seq.], the modern Legal Science instituted, as fundamental task, 'taming the gambling', gettting Law results as accurate as it can the solution of an algebraic problem. Before Savigny geometricizes Law, creating a 'Law world', far from the "no imaginables diversidades" of the concrete case and, therefore, of the social reality, Leibniz had said that not only Law, but also Moral, would be so demonstrable as math [Ensaio acerca do entendimento humano, Brazilian translation, 1973, Chapter III, n. 18]" (SILVA, 2002, p . 40) (Translation provided by the author) peculiar understanding of facts and also a result of the participation of parties in the procedural dialog that precedes the judicial decision. The judge is no more the "mere mouth of the law" (that only "say" the Law), extracting a right and unique answer from the fact under trial. Even assuming the necessary existence of limits to the hermeneutic subjectivism of magistrate (and one of them is the legal text itself), this change of perspective opens to the Judiciary a creative space that requires a fresh look at the correlation between the powers of the State.

Alongside this new understanding of the judicial judgment itself, authors indicate other reasons for the growing recognition of the creative character of the work of judges. Mauro Cappelletti (1993) points out aspects such as massification, complexity and unpredictability of post-industrial revolution social relations, demanding more fluid and vague norms, drawn up with the aid of open and indeterminate concepts. This kind of rules depends on a more integrative actuation of the Judiciary in the solution of the case. On the other hand, the enlargement of the Welfare State9, with the growth of demands for actuation of the Executive and the Legislative, requires the Judiciary "raises itself to the level of other powers, becoming the third giant, capable of controlling the behemoth legislator and the leviathan administrator" (CAPPELLETTI, 1993, p. 47)10. The judicial review (the power of courts of law to review the actions of the executive and legislative branches considering the provisions in the Constitution), function recognized in continental Europe only from the mid 20th century, is an example of consequence of what has just been said.

Also Boaventura de Souza Santos, having under analysis the enlargement of power of Brazilian Judiciary in particular, speculates about the peripheral countries reality, in which the recognition of rights by legal orders, deriving from a wave of redemocratization at the end of the 20th century, has generated an expectation of rights, provided for [9] "The first steps have been taken in social policy area, through relevant legislation about the right to work, right to health and social security; but gradually the interventions spread to the economic sphere, through antitrust acts, to the concurrence, transport and agriculture; and, finally, we come to the present situation, with the extension of the public sector, the widespread exercise of state control over the economy, the assumption of responsibility of the state in matters of employment, social assistance planning and the financing of non-profit activities, such as, for example, arts, public works and renewal of decadent urban centers". the positive Law, but not answered by the State, whose implementation is being required, then, through the Judiciary Power:

> In the transition from authoritarian regimes to democratic regimes, the peripheral societies and semi-peripheral passed by what I call short-circuit history, i.e. by recognition of rights at a single constitutional act, while, in central countries, they were conquered in a long historical process (hence, we talk about several generations of rights). It is true that the constitutionalisation of a so extensive set of rights, without the backing of consolidated public and social policies, makes its effectiveness difficult, but it is no less true that this broad catalog of rights opens space for a larger judicial intervention from the constitutionality control of ordinary law (2007, p . 20)[11]

The enlargement of the responsibilities of the Judiciary has been the cause of several problems (such as, for example, the multiplication of the demands and the consequent inability of the Judiciary to timely respond to them with quality) and requires deep reflections, aiming at understanding the role that assumes this Power in the context of Democratic States, the limits to its performance and the solution of its shortcomings. In the same way, once more, Boaventura de Souza Santos:

> For these reasons – different from country to country, but converging in the general sense – we have even come to watch, in some countries, a displacement of the legitimacy of the State: from the executive and legislative power to the judiciary. This transfer of legitimacy is a gradual process, faster in some States than in others. This movement creates increasing expectations over the judicial system, which is expected as the one that solves the problems that the political system is unable to resolve. It happens that the creation of exaggerated expectations about the possibilities of the judiciary is itself a source of problems. When we analyze the comparative experience, we see that, in large measure, the judicial system does not match the expectation (2007, p . 21)[12].

3. The role of the due process of law in democratic control of judicial activity

Weighing Up, on one hand, the recognition of the creative character of judicial activity and, on the other, and as a consequence of this first statement, the growth of Judiciary political power, leads to the observation that is needed, today, a review of the bases on which the Modern State was signed and, especially, a broad discussion on the ability of the Judiciary to meet the requirements of Democracy.

Thus, recognizing that the Judiciary is an instance of normative production – in other words, accepting the political nature of its activity, as far as it implies choices between the different values – makes imperative, also, to identify to what extent the necessary elements of democratic exercise of power are present in the performance of its duties.

The theme is, today, one of the most fruitful of Political Science and Philosophy, not only in Brazil, as all over the world, since those characteristics cited above, indicative of a greater expectation of society in relation to the product of judicial work, are not exclusive to this country.

Although the recognition of political power exercised by the Judges may seem obvious to the eyes of those who live under common law legal systems [13], in Roman-Germanic tradition countries, such as Brazil, the understanding of the judge as a "technician", who should only "apply" the law to the actual case, still seems to be predominant. Judges are appointed after highly technical examinations, in which they should choose "right answers" in multiple-choice questions. The candidates are trained with the help of manuals that reproduce the legal text, without emphasising on the actual case, on the ability of argumentation and understanding of values, tensions and political implications behind the facts. It is stimulated, still today, the social isolation of the magistrates, to the advantage of a supposed immunity before values, interests, social pressures. As remarked by Ovidio Baptista da Silva, seek the magistrates "[...] distance even from the lawyers of the trial [...] ", ending by strengthening, in another hand "[...] the sharp corporatism of the institution [...]" and encouraging "[...] the bureaucratic spirit, so markedly present in our Judiciary, to the extent that the judge, by virtue of that social isolation, keeps an 'element of the organization', of which becomes dependent, through a suffocating administrative and recursal control system." (2006, p . 45)[14].

If this does not happen in the midst of the academic discussions, it is certain that the professional practices, the university teaching of Law and even the expectations of society before the judges work, reproduce a vision of judicial activity still clinging to positivist rationalism:

> As long as we think the Law as a matter of logic, capable of being solved as any math problem; while we do not lose the illusion that the legal rule - fruit, as the system presupposes, of a illuminated legislator – has an unambiguousness sense, the University education will remain immutable in its legal methodology, providing the system quotas of servers, suitable for the task of discovering the ineffable "desire of the law", to which Chiovenda used to refer, and that, for our time, entwined with the "desire of power".
> Although everyone can see that the Law, in a democratic society, is established by the judicial courts; in spite of the disposal of the ideological and politicians presuppositions who provoked the distrust in magistrates, nourished by the ideals of the French Revolution, the harsh reality - no more the speech - is that the University remains servile to the methodology recommended by the jurists and philosophers of the 17th and 18th centuries. (SILVA, 2006, p. 53)[15]

Nevertheless, it is a fact that it has been more and more required of Brazilian magistrates, no matter in which instances, choices that have strong political implications, either with regard to the set of values in private relationships (such as decisions about limits of the use of the property, about freedom of expression and manifestation, about recognition of same-sex couples rights) or with respect to the relationship between Judiciary and other powers (such as judicial review decisions and decisions that enforce Executive Power the fulfillment of constitutional duties, e.g. supply of health services and medicines, construction of public facilities, provision of essential services etc.).

Considering the implications of such tasks, to what extent does the activity of the Judiciary fulfill the required characteristics for the democratic exercise of political power?

If what you have in mind is the sense of Democracy that favors the popular participation in the choice of political agents, it would be recognizable only in the context of Brazilian Higher Courts, even if indirectly, in so far as Executive and Legislative Powers[16] (whose members are in their turn submitted to popular choice) take part in the choice of its judges.

These courts, however, usually do not decide about facts, being their responsibility, in almost all cases, only the abstract interpretation of the written law. On the other hand, it is a task of the initial instances judges to deal with what it is considered the more representative part of the judicial function work: direct contact with parties and with the facts that are the origin of the claims, evidence production and, finally, the creation of the concrete rule that will discipline the human relations that were the cause of the judicial claim.

To what extent, then, such judges do legitimize the exercise of their power as political agents of a State that claims to be democratic?

The reflections around this question are particularly inspired by, as already announced, the thinking of the jurist Jose Joaquim Calmon de Passos. Emeritus Professor of the School of Law of Federal University of Bahia, and after his retirement, teacher of many generations at the post-graduate programme he used to coordinate in Bahia:

> [...] Calmon de Passos is remembered more for his personality and charisma rather than by its epistemological contribution interdisciplinary connected to philosophy. In fact, his rhetoric was so remarkable, that here we chose transcribing an interview available on video over the Internet, instead of his books. In his words: "I've never been able to be exclusively dogmatic. My pragmatics made me dogmatic; but my philosophical side compelled me to overcome my dogmatic training [...] I am this contradictory person and I'll die contradictory".

With this, the author demonstrates that, despite being a man fac> ing the practice, he was not satisfied with the answers offered by dominant legal culture. To overcome this limitation, he sought aid in philosophy in order to understand the procedural problems in addition to their own limitations.

[16] In this sense, the Brazilian Federal Constitution, in the single paragraph of art. 102, determines, as regards the composition of the Federal Supreme Court, that "the Ministers of the Federal Supreme Court shall be appointed by the President of the Republic, after being approved by the absolute majority of the Federal Senate". Similar logic, with some variation in each case, presides over the composition of the Superior Court of Justice ("Superior Tribunal de Justiça") (art. 104), the Superior Court of Work ("Superior Tribunal do Trabalho") (art. 111-A), the Superior Electoral Court ("Superior Tribunal Eleitoral") (art. 119) and the Superior Military Court ("Superior Tribunal Militar") (Art. 123).

> This proposal led him to develop a thought that goes beyond the Law and explores connections with Philosophy and also with Economy and Political Science" (COSTA. COSTA, 2011, p . 424)[17].

We specially emphasized, in the work of Calmon de Passos, for its eminently philosophical character, the book Direito, poder justiça e processo: julgando os que nos julgam (1999)[18], about what he himself clarifies:

> The Law has everything to do with power [...]. My line of research was always to try to demystify this neutrality of Law, this scientificity of Law, this neutrality of the magistrate and try to understand the Law in its indissolubly political dimension. The Law is the discourse of power. My entire professional life was dedicated to deepen this research. And in a certain way a book – that does not satisfy me so much that I'm preparing another[19] – which I consider my testament, translates this concern: Law, power, justice and process. (apud Costa; Costa, p. 424)[20]

Many and subsequent "reducing complexity procedures" of human coexistence – referring to the Luhmann's expression (1999, p. 85) – are identified by Calmon de Passos in the process of production of Law. They occur in so far as the democratically institutionalized political powers choose the general standards, substantial ones (Substantive Law) and procedural ones (Procedural Law), as well as the ones that determinate the administrative organization and the competence of the agents that will recognize and interpret these same standards before the conflicts arising out of social relations (organization standards). Such procedures, however, result in texts that, faced with the obstacle-situations to human coexistence, require a final procedure for reducing complexity, which happens, after all, inside the Judiciary.

In his playful way of say that the "Law is not solid, neither liquid nor gaseous, it does not have atomic or molecular structure" (1999), Prof. Calmon de Passos bring us an essential warning:

> The Law is not given to us as they are given the realities of the physical world (organic and inorganic). It is man-made, but it can not be reified – become a product – , it only exists while produced. It is always the result of the communicative action of men, a sectorial part of global communicative action that is the society, never reifying, never becoming a being, it can not be decoupled from its production process because it can never be separated from the human will, both to be spelled out as to be applied (1999, p . 22)[21].

Then, from this observation, Calmon de Passos points out the fundamental importance of process for the Law, cultural phenomenon par excellence, product of the dialog between the values inside the messages exchanged between the procedural subjects. Thus, he concludes:

> The relationship between the production process of the Law and the Law that is produced, whether as legal texts or as decisions (say the Law and apply the Law) does not have an instrumental nature, means-end nature, but a substantial, integrative nature. The Law is the result of its production process. This warns us that it is never something given, ready, pre-set or pre-produced, whose implementation is possible, through simple use of certain techniques and instruments, with secure prediction of its consequences. The Law, in fact, is produced in every act of its production, it becomes concrete with its application and it is only while it is being produced or applied. (1999, p. 44. 68)[22]

It can be seen, therefore, although the judges do not have the democratic legitimacy of the ballot box or are submitted to external bodies of popular control, the process of judicial production of rules, on the other hand, is democratically valued in so far as it is the result of direct participation of recipients of the judicial decision. The judicial decision text is a consequence, in other words, of the messages produced in the proceedings: those through which postulate the parties, those that integrate the evidence produced, the dialogs that take place at the hearings, even the dialogs that informally occur between the subjects, by means of written or spoken texts, but also by means of facial expressions, gestures, posture. Each judgment or sentence, after all, must be the fruit of this peculiar meeting of minds and reflects not only the values already chosen by the legislator in legal text, but also, to some extent, reflects the circumstances of time, place and the values of the human beings that participates in the procedural dialog.

It is not any process, however, which provides the necessary democratic qualification to the standard produced by the judge. Certain characteristics must be present in the judicial process, grouped under the term that is commonly called due process of law, and that is explained by Calmon de Passos like this:

> Constitutional due process of law [...] is not synonymous with formalism, or excessive attention to rite, but a complex of minimum guarantees against subjectivism and the arbitrariness of who has power to decide. It is required, without exception, the prior competence definition of those who have the power to decide the case (principle of the court with jurisdiction under the law), the respect to the adversary system (no one can suffer restriction in its heritage or in its freedom without previously being heard and have the right to offer their reasons), the respect to the divulgation principle (elimination of any secret procedure and accessibility to the interested public of all the acts carried out in the process), the reasoning of decisions (allowing the objective evaluation and criticism of the decision maker actions) and the control of this decision (making always possible the correction of illegality practiced by decision makers and accountability by their inexcusable errors). (1999, p. 69)[23]

Thus, it was not inadvertently that we related the concept of Democracy, at the beginning of this exposure, to the ideas of participation, equality, freedom, control and accountability. This has been done precisely because, at this point, we want to demonstrate the reproduction of such values in which we consider a democratically qualified judicial process: either by isonomic participation of parties (principle of equality of the parties), that must have the right to free and timely manifestation (principles of the legal defense and adversary system); or by the transparency provided by the prior definition of the judicial body, by the publicity and reasoning of procedural acts and decisions (principle of the court with jurisdiction under the law natural, principle of publicity and principle of reasoning), making possible that the ones that must obey the decision also keep under control the judicial power, including the possibility of accountability by magistrates deviations (principle of expediency, system of appeal and mechanisms of external control of Judiciary Power).

Between the presence of such principles at the Brazilian Constitucion – what is a fact[24] –, and its effective fulfillment, it is true that there is often a yawning gap. Obstacles ranging from the lack of administrative structure of judicial bodies (insufficient number of judges and other public servants, questionable regimentation methods of these servers, lack of administrative control of their activities, inadequate facilities), to the difficult access to Justice for considerable part of the population, by virtue of their economic deprivation and information, make useless, most of the time, the constitutional guarantees.

However, the alleged submission of the judicial process to such ideals by itself, ensuring that, at least, "the participation in the decision-making process, in all its presuppositions and phases, it is a constitutive element of the democratic dimension of the rule of Law, a guarantee for the citizen and a real space of freedom and self-determination, indispensable for the real citizenship" (CALMON DE PASSOS, 1999, p. 44. 71-72)[25].

4 Democracy and the emphasis on judicial decisions standardization in Brazilian law

Considering this particular understanding of the judicial process, which alerts to the importance of submission of Judiciary to the democracy requirements, we reach the central question of this work.

The Brazilian legal system, heir of continental European Law, as seen previously, keep some characteristics born in the historic, political and socio-economic atmosphere that resulted in the juridical positivism.

[24] Article 5th, subparagraphs XXXV, XXXVI, LIII, LIV, LV, LVII, LX, LXXIV, LXXV, LXXVIII of Brazilian Federal Constitution.

[25] Translation provided by the author.

Greatly influenced by France and as it would be possible to assume, by Portugal, Brazilian Law is among the systems that Rene David has enlisted within the Roman Germanic family (1993).

Among the main notes that distinguish the systems of civil law of ones of common law is the idea, present in the first ones, of unrestricted supremacy of written legal rule. The principle of the supremacy of the legal rule was always present in Brazilian constitutional history. The formula "no citizen can be forced to do, or not to do, something, except by virtue of legal rule", appearing in the art. 179, I of the Imperial Constitution, was repeated, without major changes, in §1º of art. 72 of 1981's Federal Constitution, in 2nd Subparagraph of art. 113 of 1934's Federal Constitution, in §2 nd of art. 141 of 1946's Federal Constitution, §2 nd of art. 150 of 1967's Federal Constitution, §2 nd of art. 153 of the First Amendment to 1969's Constitution, and finally, in Subparagraph II of Art. 5th of the current Brazilian Constitution (1988). Only the Federal Constitution of 1937 did not deal with this matter.

A more careful research in Brazilian legislative history, as well as in its current legal system, however, does not seem to lead exactly the conclusion set out in paragraph above. It is possible to identify, over the course of time, rules which assign to judicial decisions a role much more determinant than we suppose at first sight. It is observed, however, that this is a trend that has been strengthened in recent decades and has been the object of fruitful doctrinaire discussion, especially from Constitutional Amendment Proposal No 96/1992, which, after more than a decade of negotiation, resulted in Constitutional Amendment no. 45 of December 30th, 2004 and, more precisely, in the art 103-A of the Brazilian Federal Constitution, that provided erga omnes binding effect for some Federal Supreme Court (STF) decisions (stare decisis).

The so-called "súmula vinculante" (binding precedent) of the Brazilian Federal Supreme Court, borrowing a model inspired by the stare decisis of Anglo-Saxon Law, stimulated, between us, a large doctrinaire production, that shows how the theme of the role of judicial decision in Brazilian Law has been subject of particular concern and many debates in this country.

It should be emphasized, however, that the concern with judgments standardization methods was always present, even in civil law systems, which indicates that the principle of the supremacy of legal rule is not incompatible with the search for "tame" mechanisms to the natural multiplicity of meanings available to the judicial interpreter, establishing more continuous judicial lines in solution of the issues of Law. If before it was believed that the desirable uniformity would come simply from the fact that the judge would withdraw of the legal text a (single) interpretation true, a better understanding of the hermeneutic mechanisms and the advances in semiotics studies showed the inevitable equivocalness of language.

Thus, legal systems have been adopting standardization techniques (such as the assignment of binding effects to certain judicial decisions) with a view to maintaining its coherence and functionality. This is particularly true if we think about Case Law arising from judicial review of constitutionality.

By its tradition, the judicial review courts do not examine and decide about fact issues – they should not review the version of facts that judges of lower courts have recognized through the evidence present in the records. Its function is not dealing with the actual peculiarities of each case, but interpret the abstract legal sense present in legal text and, through its decision, give to this interpretation the more univocal sense as desired for a greater harmony of legal system.

In theory, therefore, the existence of a binding effect for repeated decisions of courts which have this profile – i.e., the constitutional courts, as our Federal Supreme Court (STF), Superior Court of Justice (STJ) and other Superior Courts, all competent to judge appeals with obvious standardization function – does not seem to hurt the consistency of systems based on the principle of the supremacy of the legal rule, operating, on the contrary, even as a mechanism for maintaining its congruence.

It is believed, also, that such techniques of standardization - emphasizing especially the stare decisis technique within superior courts - would not, in theory, threaten the lower court judges autonomy, if it takes into account the singular characteristics of judicial hermeneutics, as it had been already highlighted above. The judge is not the "mere mouth of the legal text", as much as he could not be the "mere mouth" of higher courts decisions. The binding precedent, as far as the legal text, will be interpreted and adapted to the facts and to the specific question that the judges have before them. This operation, no matter what say the legislator, will result in a new juridical standard, which may repeat faithfully the contents of the precedent, or, as long as rigorously reasoned, may innovate its content, promoting the natural and inevitable mutability of Law.

This is what also concluded Prof. Calmon de Passos:

> Thus, it is unacceptable to withhold the judge freedom to interpret the general standard of the binding precedent that he must apply to the specific case. Therefore it is admissible its inapplicability to concrete case since that the magistrate justifies his position, as occurs when he interprets the legal text. Everything will be a problem of clarity and pertinence of the offered reasoning. This parity between the legal rule (general rule) and the binding precedent (general interpretative standard) is indispensable and seems to me, as I have said before, a consequence of the system (1997, p. 650).

However, we must emphasize, on the other hand, that the increasing and strengthening of binding precedent mechanisms in Brazilian Law were erupted because of the concern with the worsening of the Judiciary Power crisis, with special focus on the slowness of its services. In nearly all cases this kind of technique was introduced in the legal system in order to speed up judicial proceedings.

We can notice a series of amendments in Brazilian procedural legal system, which began systematically from the 1990s, especially in the context of Civil Procedural Law, both in constitutional text (Constitutional Amendment No 45/2004 is a good example), as in legislation.

More than a decade ago, Calmon de Passos had already predicted:

> Distortion not less serious, however, was to have placed as the single goal to achieve with the reforms a solution, whatever, for the "stress" of Judiciary Power, given the inadequate, undemocratic and bureaucratic constitutional model of its institutionalization. The question that must be made - what are the real causes of this crisis? - has never been formulated. The only question made was: what do we should do to get rid of the plethora of suits and appeals in which we drown? And the answer was given by the magic word 'instrumentality', married to other magical words – 'quickly', 'effectiveness', 'deformalization" etc. And thus, magic word by magic word, we join a Law production process that risks becoming mere conjuring tricks. We should not forget, however, that every magic show has limited duration and a time of disenchantment. (2001, p. 66/67)

In addition to the already-mentioned binding precedent of the Supreme Federal Court, several other legal rules adhere to the same logical and objective, of which examples are:

(A) Added to the text of the Brazilian Civil Procedural Code (CPC), respectively in 1998, 2001 and 2010, by Federal Act No. 9756 (December 12th, 1998), Federal Act No. 10352, (December 25th, 2001) and Federal Act No. 12322 (September 09th, 2010), the articles 557, § 1[26] (generically applicable to "proceedings in the courts"), 527, I[27] (disciplining the "agravo de instrumento", a kind of bill of review) and art. 544, §4, II, «b» and «c»[28] (which deals with the "agravo de instrumento" against the decision that do not grant the review – "recurso extraordinário" e "recurso especial"), make possible for rapporteur decides the merits of the appeal when it contradicts a precedent or the prevailing case-law.

(B) The art. 285-A , added to the CPC by Federal Act No. 11277 (February 7th, 2006), makes possible the trial, without prior citation of the accused, when it is "solely matter of law and there is a prior dismissal judgment in identical cases".

(C) In 2001, Provisional Act No. 2180-35 (August 24th, 2001) added a paragraph to art. 741 of CPC, making unenforceable judicial sentence "founded in legal rule or normative act that has been declared unconstitutional [even that subsequently] by the Supreme Federal Court or in application or interpretation recognized as incompatible with the Federal Constitution". The same rule was subsequently confirmed by ordinary legislator and today it is written in the single paragraph of art. 475-L of the CPC[29], added by Federal Act No. 11232 (December, 22th, [26] "Art. 557. (D) Finally, the Federal Act No. 11672 (May 08th, 2008) added the art. 543-C to the CPC[30], disciplining what will be called "Recurso Especial Repetitivo", within the Superior Court of Justice (STJ). In this case, the decisions took under this specific proceeding will be an obstacle to appeals that do not confirm the understanding of STJ. In other words, it will be automatically rejected appeals ("Recursos Especiais", in fact) against decisions of lower courts that suit the understanding of STJ.

In common, the rules listed above attribute to previous decisions, precedents or prevailing case-law (without there being, it is quite true, a more objective parameter to determine to what extent a certain judicial understanding become "prevailing" in Brazilian Law) effects that go beyond those ordinarily expected in a judicial decision, and that bind on not only the parties who participated in the procedural dialog.

For that we can scale the potential of such rules, it is important to note, for example, that, since Art. 543-C of the CPC came into force, in August 2008, were submitted to the procedure of "recurso repetitivo", according to the data available on the website of the STJ, 851 "recursos repetitivos". This means that, for each one working day and half a new theme was submitted to the STJ in recent 5 years.

Although , strictly speaking, the judgment resulting from the "recurso repetitivo" does not bind the magistrate of lower courts, the decisions that do not adhere to the understanding of STJ, it is known in advance, may not be submitted to the STJ by unsatisfied part.

The same logic takes place, moreover, as indicated above, and in a even more comprehensive way, in the trial of appeals by second instance courts. In them, the rapporteurs themselves (that is, the single judge responsible for reporting the antecedents of the cause and uttering the first vote at the collegiate trial), without it being necessary the participation of the others members of the court, will uphold the action brought by the appeal, if the decision of first instance does not follow the understanding previously signed by Superior Courts.

The Brazilian procedural system, thus, seems to be closing down the space for interpretation by the first instance courts, "forcing them", under penalty of ineffectiveness of their decisions (given that their effects only will be confirmed if the decision does not confront the case law established by the second instance courts), to join the interpretation built outside the process that is under trial.

This observation gains particular importance if combined with the difficult working conditions of Brazilians judges. It must be assumed that, in the face of courts crowded with proceedings, lack of administrative structure, personal pressure resulting from the urgency of ever more complex issues, the agreement to a "done" argument, many times synthesized in an abridgment, is the possible solution, even if not necessarily the more reflected and democratic one.

Thus, even if we consider the advantages that seem to arise from mechanisms of judgments standardization – synthesized by ideas such as speed, security, systematic coherence – , it is required that they are contrasted with its undesirable effects and, especially, with the degree of essentialness of values that they relativise.

The first of them, which is even the core of the idea presented in this paper, demand to come back to the role that the process takes on the democratization of the judicial function. The adoption, as a general rule, of hermeneutic solutions built on superior instances of Judicial Power, minimizes, dangerously, the role that dialog developed from the specific case must have in the construction of concrete rule of law. The hermeneutic process loses, this way, the contingency which, although enemy to a certain extent of security or certainty, is inherent and essential to human life. This contingency is an inevitable result of space, time, values, whose multiplicity is even more pronounced in a huge and culturally diverse country as Brazil.

This greater and greater possibility of imposition, top to bottom, of judicial standards, ends up to take the legitimacy away from judicial decision in face of its recipients, rooting out from it, gradually, the remains of life between the judicial records, and the remains of democracy where its values already cost to be recognized.

Yet another reflection, however, shows negative effects of such mechanisms.

The history of the Brazilian Judiciary Power, being itself a consequence of "a culture marked by political individualism and by legalistic formalism" (WOLKMER, 1999, p. 44. 98) and also a consequence of a professional training that favors the "legality dissociated from the concrete society and from the grassroots" (WOLKMER, 1999, p. 44. 101)[31], reflects the liberal "bachelorism"[32] that has characterized, since the beginning, the first Brazilian Law Schools, and that explains, until today, the predominant conservatism of judicial staffs.

The Judiciary neither seems to distinguish itself by compromising with the democratic ideals. There is not record, for example, of an institutional positioning of the Brazilian Judiciary against military coups[33], nor a statement in opposition to the decline of democratic institutions (especially of the Legislative Power) in these dark periods of Brazilian history. Quite the contrary, it seems indeed that the states of exception of Brazilian political history sponsored an enlargement of power in the hands of the Judiciary. Example of that is the Constitutional Amendment no. 07/77 to the text of the Constitutional Amendment of 1969, which gave to Federal Supreme Court jurisdiction power to prosecute and judge "representation of Attorney-General of the Republic due to unconstitutionality or to misinterpretation of federal or state normative acts". The decision took in this kind of proceeding use to have a binding effect. Constitutional Amendment no. 07/77 still introduced in Brazilian Law the "avocatória" (a type of mandate): STF could avocate, after a request of the Attorney-General of the Republic, the proceeding and the trial of claims where there would be "immediate danger of serious injury to public order, health, safety or finances", suspending the effects of any decision rendered by another court.

We can add to all these findings the absence of a democratic external control on Brazilian Judiciary, the timidity of the internal controls and accountability of judges, the close submission relationship and proselytism among the Judiciary and Executive Power, especially due to the lack of transparency of nominating and appointing the members of the Courts.

The concentration of power in higher instances of the Judiciary and the corresponding weakening of the single judges, seem, finally, to stimulate its tendency to inertia and impermeability to counter-hegemonic values.

This happens because it is in the lower instances of judicial system where there is a greater likelihood of decisions that break the logic imposed by economic power and by the ideology that sustains the maintenance of social inequalities. After all, due to its proximity and dialog with the reality of the facts, and even due to the natural personal diversity of thousands of judges scattered throughout the country, the chances of interpretations that are more sensitive to the interests of the working classes or minorities are naturally less rare.

5 Conclusion

Imposing on first instance courts, to an increasing extent, the adoption of the higher courts standards of interpretation will ultimately reduce the already small space for diversity, for minorities, and for the economic disadvantaged majority. It ensures, in this way, that the reduction of complexity arising from the judicial decision probably will point towards conservation, instead of opening to new values and new forms of power correlation in society. At this point, then, we should recognize that favoring status quo means, ultimately, disrespect for Democracy, especially if we think about how unequal Brazilian society is.

The essentiality of such reflections is even more evident if we remember, with Calmon de Passos, that:

> […] any normativity, while prescription, has any validity, if divorced from the process of human communication, therefore of its protagonists. The most relevant thing is the reading of the communication, and when the communication results in a decision, the most important thing is the process that it came from, markedly dependent on its protagonists." (2012, f. 296)[34]

The essence of Democracy is not the certainty about the content of legal rules. Even predictability and security – that are valued, without doubt, by mechanisms of judgments standardization – are values dear to social life, they do not share the nuclear region of the concept of Democracy. There is Democracy, otherwise, when "all forces must fight continuously by satisfaction of their interests. Nobody finds refuge in his political positions. Nobody can wait for the results to modify them after; everybody must subordinate their interests to competition and uncertainty" (CALMON DE PASSOS, 2012, p . 155).

Certainty must be find, in truth, in the inevitability of the effects of decisions and in the possibility and quality of political participation – that, in the judicial process, is a consequence of the respect for the due process of law. In this regard, Calmon de Passos says:

> This transfer of power over the results is exactly what constitutes the decisive step toward democracy; the power is transferred from one group of people to a set of rules, of which derives that in a democracy - and this is one of its essential characteristic – nobody has the effective capacity to avoid political consequences that are contrary to his interests, no matter if this someone is a person (the leader) an organization (the armed forces, trade unions etc.), the police, the party, the bureaucracy or even something less easily identifiable, such as to be part of a "clique", of a selected group. (2012, p . 155)[35]

Such characteristics distinguish democratic regimes not only from frankly authoritarian ones, but, in which interests us more precisely, also from falsely democratic ones – "formally called democratic, but substantially organized in a authoritarian way" (CALMON DE PASSOS, 2012, p . 155). It is this last hypothesis that seems to meet with the circumstances experienced in our country, where it is believed that, in view of our political experience history, "[...] the mechanisms of power are able to prevent certain political results, through the exercise of control over the society, not only ex ante, but also ex post, exerting, in addition to the procedural control, also the substantive control over the decisions [...]" (CALMON DE PASSOS, 2012, p . 156) [36].

This seems to explain why, even though Brazilian statutory law ensures the elements of democratic ideal, we are very far from achieving what Calmon de Passos considers the point of transition between Democracy and the lack of it: "the passage of the threshold beyond which no one can intervene to reverse the results of the formal political process" (2012, p . 156)[37].

The abuse of techniques of standardization of Brazilian Case Law, in face of what we saw, does not contribute to the solution of such problems. Much to the contrary, it is one more element to bring the promises of constitutional legislator out of the actual experience of Brazilian society, by dangerously relativising the role of procedural dialog – subordinated to the principle of due process of law – , in ensuring democratic legitimacy to judicial decision. This way, even though the legal system is theoretically open to free and fair clash of different interests that are opposed in society, one of the sides has always guaranteed, beforehand, the victory at the end of the game.

The judicial activism as an evidence of the fragility of fundamental rights towards the Weberian political-administrative system

Sérgio Luiz Barbosa Neves[1]

Abstract: The constitutionalization of rights and their recognition as fundamental rights led to the questioning of legislative omissions and policies by the Judiciary Power, which is being accused of activism and exacerbation of its duties while making decisions to correct policies and to supply those omissions, i.e., the Judiciary Power would be invading the competence sphere from the Legislative and the Executive. Considering this Judiciary activism as an unusual function of this Power and realizing the civil society's need to avail itself of that Power for the purpose of achieving its fundamental rights, the objective of this work is to verify if such rights are strong or weak, not for the fact they took chair in the Republic Constitution text, but in reason and under the perspective of the democratic state of law that continues to adopt a political-administrative weberian model unable to ensure fundamental rights, which would be further hampered by a system of functional division among the three spheres of power, constantly driven by political and electoral conveniences, that contributes for the lack of performance of these functions and delays the attainment of fundamental rights by citizens, who are forced to resign themselves to lengthy court proceedings. This is not intended to analyze whether or not the Judiciary is usurping powers of other branches, but taking that role as a symptom that representative democracy and separation of powers are suffering irresistible pressure of other factors such as market and information, which impose a reevaluation of these dogmas about the state ideal structure. In this scope, this paper will: (i) analyze the origins and adoption of separation of powers, (ii) ascertain the reasons for the transmutation of direct democracy to representative, (iii) question the way in which he conformed to the State separation of powers; (iv) propose a new perspective based on democratic control, more preoccupied with meeting the burdens and obligations arising from ownership of power than its distribution and arbitrary exercise, and (v) pursue a restructuring proposal to the Legislative and to the Executive to strengthen the fundamental rights which, without subtracting functions from the Judiciary, make the performance of this Power conformed and restricted to law enforcement, without having to create it by supplying legislative omissions or by setting public policy.

1. Introduction

The Prussian army and its reorganization by Frederick The Great was the inspirational source for Max Weber works about organizations and the bureaucracy required for their success. The bureau would be the foundation of his theory and responsible for many administrative functions in the industry. Precision, speed, clarity, regularity, reliability, and efficiency were to be expected from the actors who wanted to achieve the best results. The organization would have to follow Weber's recipe: a fixed division of tasks, hierarchical supervision, and detailed rules and regulations. This leads us to the principle of legal certainty, which is internationally recognized as a central requirement for the rule of law.

As we can see, legal certainty and the rule of law are valuable principles up till now, hence they have grounded societies all around the world, creating a fertile soil for the market and economic liberal ideals, for whom predictability and a State limited by national and international law were fundamental to their objectives. The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) defines the rule of law as the principle that "first and foremost seeks to emphasize the necessity of establishing a rule-based society in the interest of legal certainty and predictability".

Bureaucracy consists in a rational mode of organization, based on law and regulations that, in Weber's time, nailed down arbitrary decisions and the world of work. This model applied to the public administration legitimate the public authority, sheltered by the belief in the inviolable nature of administrative routine and certainty of predictable reactions of all elements of the public apparatus. This way, Weber pursuits absolute objectivity in decision-making, giving total independence for the political power organization and fixed, at the same time, a disciplinary framework. His rational bureaucracy was founded on four principles: (i) the division of labor in order to increase productivity; (ii) the hierarchical structure of any organization, establishing different levels of authority in it, the way information takes and how, when and for whom it would be released, and, at least, the role exercised by each member of the organization; (iii) vertical communication as the way to disseminate information respecting the hierarchy from top to bottom; and, (iv) written information disciplined – like internal rules, procedures and memos – in order to avoid misinterpretation.

The bureaucratical organization is not a privilege of the public administration or a success scheme for corporations. Bureaucracy became a characteristic of the occidental societies, rationalizing their procedures, despite their economic, political, administrative, social or cultural nature, in aim to be more efficient. For Weber, the ideal kind of public servant is the rational oriented to the accomplishment of pre-established objectivities.

Oriented like that, the occidental states and their administrative machine were predictable enough to work with and for capitalists. The connection between Weber's theory and capitalism is conspicuously clear. However, his theory has been adopted by the Public Administration since then. That outputs a question related to the notion of the post-modern State: more pluralist, more complex, less centralized than the bureaucratic modern state, whose institutions should be able to ensure its citizens the so-called fundamental rights and beyond all that, with a loss of sovereignty and unable to fulfill its citizens' expectations from the social contract, what, in thesis, States were made for. The question is: Is the Prussian army a reliable source to ensure citizens their fundamental rights? And so, has the weberian political-administrative system the right tools to endorse the fundamental rights or something is missing?

Constitutionalization of fundamental rights is a recent phenomenon that impacts the weberian political administrative state, while these rights were put into constitutional law without been regulated by Executive and Legislative branches, which were accustomed to label then as programmatic norms. Notwithstanding, the impact of these constitutionalized rights was perceived when Courts issued decisions granting such rights, yet they were not regulated or diversely established by the law and by public policies. Predictability, law certainty and the rule of law were gaining a new perspective and even the separation of powers and its structure proposed centuries ago were shaken. It seems also important to underline that many of these fundamental rights came to life by the hands of principles and values. It's the kind of norm avoided by the weberian system, which standards are explicit rights and positivism. While these kind of rights do not admit a wide range of interpretation, on the other hand, principles and values give a white paper to be draw and colored by the interpretation from someone, unelected, from the Judiciary branch.

Decision-making by the Judiciary Power took a different road and, since then, this branch has been accused of being activist and of exacerbation of its duties while making decisions to correct public policies and to supply those omissions, i.e., the Judiciary Power would be invading the competence sphere from the Legislative and the Executive.

Considering this judiciary activism as an unusual function of this Power and realizing the fact that the civil society's need to avail itself of that Power for the purpose of achieving its fundamental rights, we must question if the problem really lies on the Judiciary and its decision-making procedure has changed or if the roots of that "people's need" to rely on the Judiciary to get their fundamental rights in concrete are embedded somewhere else. It's easy to stare at a tree and describe their leaves and branches, therefore anyone can see then, but to study and tell people where and how their roots are underneath the soil demands the removal of many obstacles. In the same way, it's easy to exam the Judiciary decisions and, as we figure out some kind of elevation over the decisions of the Executive or Legislative Powers or as we view a judicial rule supplying these Power's omissions, but it is difficult to disclosure what unleashed that kind of judicial decisions. We would never find the actual reasons of that judicial behavior unless we go further, beyond the process, looking back and try to discover what situations caused such a twist of functions, considered legitimate by almost all the doctrine.

Understanding what is happening requires a long journey from the Prussian army in the nineteenth century, walking by Weber's theory and the constitutionalization of fundamental rights, taking a detour to analyze the separation of Powers, representative democracy and elections, till we finally reach our goal: the judgments of the Judiciary reputed as activists.

2. A little gaze at separation of powers.

Tyranny was the great villain who leaded man to think about a separation of functions and to avoid its accumulation in the hands of one to exercise power. The executive, legislative and judiciary functions should be shared among different persons distributed in specific branches, which would be properly created in this meaning. As James Madison Jr. – the fourth President of the United Sates – have said about the theme, "The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny".2 That means, if there is a system where all these powers are attributed to one human-being or even to only one institutional body, that system would be a tyrannical one. Therefore, that also links separation of powers with democracy.

Nevertheless, separation of powers and the check and balance system were not unanimous principles. For parliamentarists, the accumulation of functions in the cabinet does not turn the power exercise from democratic to tyrannical, while, for presidentialists, the check and balance system was a great mistake, since it was not necessary, contrary to democracy and a way of turning government ineffective.

The origin of the idea of shared governmental power and even constitutionalism dates back to medieval writings, where concepts of governmental functions and theories of mix and balanced government were evolved. The idea embodied in seventeenth century (1642-1660) during the English Civil War period, when it turned to be a "response to the need for a new constitutional theory, when a system of government based upon a 'mixture' of King, Lords, and Commons seemed no longer relevant"[3]. In fact, power and its exercise were in the center of the debate and contributing to evolve this theory. As Vile says, a set of values conform our political society, such as justice, liberty, equality, and the sanctity of property, which favored the separation of powers. At the end of his book, Vile added to his original list the conversion of these principles into justice, democracy, and efficiency, but the foremost value of twentieth century would be social justice.[4]

To establish a concept the boundaries of the theory of the separation of powers, Vile says:

> "A 'pure doctrine' of the separation of powers might be formulated in the following way: It is essential for the establishment and maintenance of political liberty that the government be divided into three branches or departments, the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary. To each of these three branches there is a corre> sponding identifiable function of government, legislative, executive, or judicial. Each branch of the government must be confined to the exercise of its own function and not allowed to encroach upon the functions of the other branches. Furthermore, the persons who compose these three agencies of government must be kept separate and distinct, no individual being allowed to be at the same time a member of more than one branch. In this way each of the branches will be a check to the others and no single group of people will be able to control the machinery of the State."[5]

Each branch would have its own procedure in which would be embedded a set of that values and in the representation of an array of interests. Talking about men behavior as political representatives, shall we take their administrative or legislative acts on people's behalf? After all, these branches can marshal their legal power, administrative decisions and law making process to their advantage. What kind of values and interests will prevail and frame their acts? Can a judge analyze this frame to evaluate values such as legitimacy and social justice aiming to quash the effects and the proper act? Or would be this judge accused of being overly activist?

It's beyond the scope of this essay to go further in the study of the separation of powers, finding answers to those questions. Nonetheless that theory was the first to organize the state as we comprehend it in our days. For sure it was built over the basis of the set of values mentioned above, which are also the fundamental values from capitalism. Nevertheless, representation, democracy and social justice were lifted by the principle of separation of powers and must be investigated by us targeting to verify if citizens reached and reach the social justice, enshrined by Vile as last century's main value. Insofar we consider fundamental rights as a necessary way to achieve social justice, we have to argue if separation of powers and representative democracy enables small and incremental steps towards that achievement or, on the contrary, if they obstacle it. Another question to be responded refers to the so-called judicial activism and if it can be considered as a usual function of the Judiciary or if this branch is usurping share of power from the other two.

3. Representative democracy: does it actually represent people?

Originally, democracy consisted in citizen's direct participation in the political life of their community. Representation was never considered as democracy. At this time, it was easier to find communities with (i) citizen's harmonious interests in the aim of general wealth; (ii) religious, economic, language, educational level, ethnical and cultural homogeneity; (iii) small number of citizens, facilitating their direct participation in a public decision making process, in politics and in the legislative process; and, (iv) autonomy regarding to other cities. This autonomy was fundamental to a good life for the citizens, ie, dependence from other communities and cities would diminish that high pattern of life. To avoid a strong dependence from the external trading due to ensure "dignity" – as we would say in present days – to their citizens, economic life should be frugal.6

[5] Op. cit., p. 14

In conclusion, the virtue of frugality was intrinsically linked to democracy, which could be fatally wounded by an intense economic life embodied in consumerism. Today's view of democracy is the opposite. Political science tries to conciliate representation with democracy and a consumerism society with the dignity of all citizens. Direct participation and frugality seemed to disappear a long time ago. Do we have actual democratic governments in the twentieth-one century? Is democracy possible in a neoliberal government?

4. Unelected bodies reshaping the role of the traditional branches and the separation of powers.

As elections cost a huge amount of money, some accuses governments of handing over power to the market and to bow to corporate interests, that may translate their ideologies and interests into laws and governmental acts without regard for any interest of the society. Beyond this issue, we live in an informational society, where expertise and capacity to get, process and absorb information, taking decisions in a second are a "must do" for any kind of enterprise and administration. The political bureaucratic system proposed by Weber is not capable to respond to those new instances, condemning the public administration to be anachronistic, slow and ineffective, remaining several steps behind the private economic actors.

Representative democracy may be the given process, yet it is not anymore an effective solution for the citizens who claim the achievement of their social interests and fundamental rights. Corporations and laws concerned to economic, financial adjustments of the State, tax, and in the aim of free market have undeniably more clout than any other constitutional principle or law from any State. Representative democracy is being questioned all around the globe, and there are an increasing number of unelected bodies arising in the horizon, like Central Banks, Quangos in England and Agencies in the USA and Brazil, for instance. Vibert[7] view the unelected bodies as a new kind of separation of powers, which would be integrally responsible for the public policy, while they have expertise, are well informed and know how to take effective and rapid decisions without political bias. Assuming that theory as better than the traditional one, there must be sought to constrain and reshape the role of the Executive and Legislative Powers.

In Brazil, despite the fact that members of the Judiciary Power are not elected, people were hopeful and expected the President of the Supreme Court to be the President of the country. What kind of phenomenon takes place in such country and leads to a paradoxical political trend like that?

Presidential polls surveys 2014 indicated the President of the Supreme Court from Brazil, Minister Joaquim Barbosa, as the number one in people's choice. This is the first time in the history of the country that a member of the Supreme Court leads a political poll survey or even has been spontaneously nominated. The vote has shifted from traditional political groups to someone whose biography does not show any kind of political involvement and wasn't even candidate. This phenomenon can't be analyzed by itself, it must be considered among many social, economic and historical factors. Juridical instance however cannot be dismissed. Since 1988 Brazilian Republican Constitution expresses that in any kind of question the last word competes to the Judiciary Power, what made it stronger and able to take decisions about legislative omissions and public policies, using principles, a set of values and the constitutionalization of fundamental rights, despite the fact these rights are still written as programmatic rules.[8]

creases whereas grows the credibility of the Judiciary. We can also exam the issue by the perspective of the relationship among State Powers. In fact, Legislative and Executive did not hand over power to the Judiciary. Independence and harmony of State Powers continue to be a fundamental principle in Brazilian Constitution [Article 2. The Legislative, the Executive and the Judicial, independent and harmonious among themselves, are the powers of the Union].[9] For this principle, it would be a wrong perception if someone tries to demonstrate the Judiciary Power as the one with more clout than the others. Many countries around the globe have done constitutional reforms that amplified the role of Judiciary, since enabling to go further in the interpretation of law by using principles and a set of values to ground judicial decisions. Nevertheless, it was not a global reviewing of the system of checks and balances and the separation of powers, and did not take the fundamental rights from the paper to real life automatically. That role continues to fit among the functions from the Legislative and the Executive, but omissions characterized by not turning fundamental rights into concrete ones nor into public policies figure out as common place. The constitutionalization of rights and acknowledgement of judicial review are widely accepted and considered as a new path for society to thrive, but, in fact, there is a long and wide road to be traveled, therefore fundamental rights are normally programmatic while economic rules are well defined. In a pejorative way, trying to constrain the role of the Judiciary, some accuses the Judiciary as activist, whereas "the characterization of a decision as activist depends on the politics of the person doing the characterizing, "judicial activism" is merely meaningless pejorative".[10]

Within their structure, based on the weberian political-administrative theory, States are unable to ensure fundamental rights, which would be further hampered by a system of functional division among the three spheres of power, constantly driven by political and electoral conveniences, that contributes for the lack of performance of these functions and delays the attainment of fundamental rights by citizens, who are forced to resign themselves to lengthy court proceedings. This essay is not intended to analyze whether or not the Judiciary is usurping powers from other branches, but taking that role as a symptom that representative democracy and separation of powers are suffering irresistible pressure of other factors such as market and information, which impose a reevaluation of these dogmas about the state ideal structure, as, for example, the presence of other actors such as autonomous unelected bodies.

5. Judicial activism.

The term "judicial activist" first appeared in an article released in 1947 in Fortune by Arthur Schlesinger Jr. about Justices on the Supreme Court and initially forged to label liberal judges. Judicial activism is not an expected role from the Judiciary and nor its foremost function. Yet it became quite common to be found in judicial decisions that were criticized as 'activists'. If people do not obtain their fundamental rights straight from the state, there would be no other way than fighting for then in the Judiciary Power. In the tenor of judicial debates ensued in Brazil such as (i) abortion of anencephalic fetus, (ii) use of stem cells in scientifically research trying to heal the handicapped citizens, (iv) homo affective marriage, (v) claims about bed-vacancies in hospitals, (vi) vacancies at the public educational system, and (viii) free of charge medical procedures, and medicines that are too expensive in private systems, the omissions of the Brazilian government in such matters explain the crescent phenomenon of judicial activism in this country and people's expectation for a judge to become president.

Judicial activism is seen most clearly when judges elevate their own judgment over that of other constitutionally significant actors, in circumstances where a formal model of law would predict otherwise.[11] Definitions of judicial activism and judicial review are so many as the number of authors who have written about the theme. Sherry gives us a concept involving both of them:

> Judicial activism occurs any time the judiciary strikes down an action of the popular branches, whether state of federal, legislative or executive. Judicial review, in other words, produces one of two > possible results: If the court invalidates the government action it is reviewing, then it is being activist; if it upholds the action, it is not.[12]

In other hand, worldwide, judicial activism has been studied as a postmodern phenomenon and law philosophers has been given huge importance to its study. This is not different in Brazil, where we can add to this consideration the fact that, only recently, fundamental rights have been raised to constitutional rights. Brazilian jurists are somehow tempted to consider this foreign and global influence and the juridical novelty of those rights as the reason that leads Judiciary to interfere in instances which, in the recent past, this Power would consider itself unable to decide about political issues and affected to the sphere of convenience and opportunity of the Executive.

Ran Hirschl challenges this conventional wisdom. Hirschl makes a comparative inquiry into the political origins and legal consequences of the recent constitutional revolutions in Canada, Israel, New Zealand, and South Africa. Politicians are not committed with that trend toward constitutionalization of rights. Despite their speech before elections, politicians rarely act in the aim of democracy, social justice, or universal rights. As observed by Hirschl, the elected members of the legislative and executive branches produce law and public policies more commonly as a "product of a strategic interplay among hegemonic yet threatened political elites, influential economic stakeholders, and judicial leaders".[13] The political discourse has already incorporated fundamental rights and social justice, but we still have to look forward longing to witness laws and policymaking actually in behalf of social justice without traces of political and economic elites' interests.

Judicial activism has a democratic foundational ground, as far it has a counter-majoritarian role. So it's easy to figure out the reasons for the attacks Judiciary branches are suffering from majority elites and their representative members in the legislative branch, whose discourse enacts a motto aiming to take the Constitution away from the courts and to give it back to the people or their democratic representatives. In fact, they struggle unduly for a pure democracy that do not care about minorities and do not recognize pluralist society. On the contrary, Seidman contest this electoral opportunistic statement, contending that an "'unsettling' constitution helps to build a community founded on consent by enticing losers into a continuing conversation".[14]

This essay aims neither to argue in favor of the judicial activism nor against it, but to answer its foundational question, i.e., if that activism is necessary to citizens in order to obtain their fundamental rights. As we notice that the Judiciary Power acts in a counter-majoritarian way to ensure constitutional democracy that leads us to a favorable conclusion about the judicial activism and its importance. However it continues to be an anomalous function and should be avoided by a simple change in the behavior of the Legislative and the Executive Powers. After all, the word "activism" can be associated to its opposite "passivism", what indicates that while Judiciary is being activist, Legislative or Executive are being passives.

6. Conclusion.

While studying about judicial activism it's hard or even impossible to find a decision involving economic goals, which were not yet regulated by the other branches. Judicial activism is useful to ensure fundamental rights, which would be forever forgotten over a dusty shelf of undesired laws.

The current political administrative system is the same proposed by Weber more than a hundred years ago. That authoritarian and hierarchical system, allied with a defective democracy based on a false representation that ignores pluralism, does not enable our society to achieve their legitimate aspirations on exercising fundamental rights. It's the kind of problem a stockholder does not have, once it is easy for that caste of citizen to exercise his rights and even privileges, which are well protected by predictability and law certainty.

It would be a turning point in the bureaucratic system suggested by Weber if the Public Administration becomes permeable to a set of principles and values, which would turn certainty into doubt. The members of this system are familiarized with a range of predetermined outputs, which they use as an answer to the inputs trying to obey to a centralized source of power. As Saint-Pierre says the weberian system, it's the kind of "sterilized knowledge by its blindness to values"[15]. Therefore, aiming that change in administrative decision making process, we have to transform that "sterilized knowledge" into a fertile soil that enables the system to make the new set of constitutional principles and values useful.

The fragility of fundamental rights is evident and judicial activism is the only way citizens have to take their rights from paper to real life. It's unfair to accuse Judiciary of usurping functions from the other branches and of being overly activist. Judicial activism is a guarantee of constitutional democracy protecting minorities against the majority tyranny and protecting people against politically and electorially informed branches, whose objectives are not always confessable. The excess of judicial activism is not an arbitrary exacerbation of power, but a symptom of the fragility of fundamental rights. As it is not the cure of that kind of disease caused by an anachronic administrative system in which time seems to have stood still.

In comparison with the rights of a stockholder, fundamental rights are fragile and cannot be exercised with the help of the Judiciary, which activism denotes this fragility towards the weberian political-administrative system. Democracy, separation of powers and the administrative structure must be rethought, giving enough and adequate tools to the achievement of fundamental rights by citizens without the necessity to avail themselves of the Judiciary Power. It would be a decisive and gigantic step from the ranks of the Prussian army in the nineteenth century to the information society of the twentieth first century. In other words, while economic rights are updated and live in the information society, fundamental rights are still living in the industrial society.

For a judicial decision theory between ontological hermeneutic and epistemological hermeneutic

João Víctor Nascimento Martins

Abstract: In this article, we intend to open a space for debate about the foundations for a theory of judicial decision. To this end, the paper discusses two different fronts, seeking to highlight their contradictions, but also the possibility of their coexistence and eventual complementarity: the first fomented by Robert Alexy in his Theory of fundamental rights, founded on a analytic philosophy and epistemological hermeneutics; and the second conducted by Ronald Dworkin in Law´s Empire, based on the ontological hermeneutics of Gadamer.

Keywords: Theory of judicial decision; ontological hermeneutics; epistemological hermeneutics.

1. Introduction

Robert Alexy proposes a theory of judicial decision in his work A theory of constitutional rights. His work, markedly founded on analytic philosophy, aims, in fact, for a systematization of the different conceptions and modes of application of constitutional rights. However, for the completion of such task, Alexy makes use of a necessary conceptual differentiation between the two varieties of legal norms: the rules and the principles (ALEXY, 2008, p. 90). In order to make clear the distinction between these kinds of norms, Alexy shows, then, how they should be differently applied to the decisions handed down by judges. Therefore, the author makes use of his theory of judicial decision.

In a brief summary, it is possible to say that Robert Alexy's theory aims for the systematization of judicial methods. Its central focus is on a search for a greater rationality in court decisions, considering the whole apparatus formed in his theory of legal argumentation. Thus, through standardization and systematization techniques, Alexy seeks to attribute the greatest rationality to a court decision, always taking its legality into account, as well as its effectiveness and its correction. Alexy therefore seeks the institutionalization of reason, i.e. the foundation and application of Law through discursive rationality (ALEXY, 2011, p. 19).

It happens that the Alexyan theory, despite being widely adopted in judgments of various Western legal systems, has been criticized by several authors. The criticism is based on several arguments over his works, but this paper intends to analyze only one point raised by critics. This point is based, according to critics, on Ronald Dworkin's decision theory.

Dworkin's theory, mainly presented in his work Law´s Empire, is especially anchored in Gadamer's philosophical hermeneutics (DWORKIN, 2010a, p. 62-63). According to Gadamer, the sciences of the spirit (or the humanities) are interpretive sciences and, therefore, are the result of the interpreter's normative construction. Dworkin, glimpsing Gadamer's work, seeks to apply it to Law. Thus, Dworkin constructs a decision theory based on an ontological hermeneutics, according to which the judge, as an interpreter, would be necessarily influenced by their pre-understandings and by the historical context in which they stand. Thus, all methods created by the legal positivism that sought to ensure legal certainty through an objectivity would be bankrupt, considering that they are inevitably vitiated by the interpreter's pre- understandings.

Within the above context, questioning about whether the criticism (imposed by Dworkin) to the philosophical positivism, and especially to the legal positivism – through Gadamer's philosophical hermeneutics – also affects Alexy's post-positivist theory is inevitable. And if it does, would it cause the methods created by legal argumentation and post-positivist theories of Law to be all inapplicable or irrelevant?

Thus, this work intends to make a brief presentation on Alexy's and Dworkin's decision theories, raising the debate about their foundations found in different hermeneutical perspectives – the ontological and the epistemological – also seeking to discuss the possibility of their coexistence and complementarity.

2. The Robert Alexy theory and its grounds: of analytical philosophy to epistemological hermeneutic

Professor Robert Alexy's proposal in writing his Theory of constitutional rights was to construct a general legal theory of constitutional rights of the German Constitution. By saying that his intention was to construct a legal theory, Alexy speaks about the formulation of a dogmatic theory, i.e. a legal science that has what is practiced as Law and what should be practiced as Law as an object of study (ALEXY, 2008, p. 32). With this object of study, the theory presents three different dimensions: analytical, empirical and normative.

The Alexyan theory, therefore, is based primarily on analytic philosophy[1], through which Alexy tries to construct a conception of constitutional rights through the analysis of legal concepts, i.e. to construct a structural theory of Law, a priori. On the other hand, Alexy is also concerned about the practical character of the science of Law (ALEXY, 2008, p. 34), for which he also focuses on the empirical and normative perspectives of Law. Given that the science of Law is constructed from the judge's perspective as an interpreter, Alexy also based on a theory of legal argumentation to construct his decision theory. This theory of legal argumentation is strongly based on epistemological hermeneutics and its interpretation methods. It is the search for a greater rationalization of interpretation methods.

Thus, outlined the intention of the German author when formulating his theory of constitutional rights, it is important to initially understand that Alexy proposes a necessary differentiation between rules and principles. This distinction is a basis for the theory of constitutional rights. Without this differentiation, there would be no possibility of discussion about the collisions between principles. According to Alexy, principles and rules are norms, considering that both say what should be (i.e. they are formulated by means of basic deontic expressions of duty, permission and prohibition). The distinction between rules and principles is, therefore, a distinction between varieties of norms (ALEXY, 2008, p. 88).

In general, the criterion of generality is used to make the distinction between rules and principles. The determinability of cases of application of the norms is also considered, as well as the form of its appearance, the form of creation or development, the axiological content, among others. These criteria, while important, are not alone sufficient to draw a meaningful distinction between rules and principles. Then, three possible theses about the classification of the norms arise: a) that all classification is doomed to failure, given that differentiation could not meet all the differences and similarities between the norms; b) there is only a difference of degree between rules and principles; and c) it is possible to highlight a qualitative difference between rules and principles. According to Alexy, this thesis is correct and he tries to show it.

The main feature of differentiation of norms is:

> principles are norms which require that something be realized to the greatest extent possible given the legal and factual possibilities. Principles are optimization requirements, characterized by the fact that they can be satisfied to varying degrees, and that the appropriate degree of satisfaction depends not only on what is factually possible, but also on what is legally possible (ALEXY, 2008, p. 90).[2]

Rules, in turn, are norms that have determinations within what is legally and factually possible, i.e. norms determine that one must do exactly what they prescribe. Therefore, they can be met or not. The difference between rules and principles is therefore qualitative. This distinction is quite similar to that proposed by Dworkin in his book Taking Rights Seriously, but differs in the characterization of principles as optimization requirements.

One way to better explain the differentiation occurs through the cases in which there is conflict between rules and collisions between principles. At this moment, Robert Alexy's decision theory enters the discussion. When two rules conflict, either one of them is held invalid or an exception clause that eliminates the conflict is introduced. This is because the concept of legal validity is not gradable. A legal norm is either valid or invalid, "it is not possible that two concrete judgments of a contradictory is-ought are invalid between each other" (ALEXY, 2008, p. 92) [3].

The collision between principles occurs differently. When two principles collide, the decision about the application of one or the other is not given within the discussion of its validity, but the precedence of one principle over the other will be established in specific factual and legal conditions. "Conflicts between rules occur in the dimension of validity, while collisions between principles – since only valid principles can collide – occur beyond this dimension, in the dimension of weight" (ALEXY, 2008, p. 94) [4]. Dworkin works well with the "dimension of weight" in Taking Rights Seriously.

The collision between principles therefore generates a need for balance, according to the law of collision. For Alexy, it generates a conception of the result of balance as assigned norms of constitutional right. The solution to the collision consists in establishing a conditional relation of precedence between the conflicting principles, given the circumstances of the concrete case. Considering the concrete case, the establishment of conditional relations of precedence consists in setting conditions under which a principle has precedence over the other. The central question, therefore, is to determine under what conditions which principle should prevail over the other.

Alexy seeks, with the law of collision, to systematize the technique used by the Federal Constitutional Court to judge cases in which there is a discussion about the weights of principles. The problem is that principles do not have "weights" assigned; so, this weight must be constructed in the analysis of the case. Thus, the law of collision can be presented in the following formulation: "the conditions under which a principle takes precedence over another constitute the factual support of a rule that expresses the legal consequence of the principle that takes precedence" (ALEXY, 2008 , p. 99) [5]. The law of collision is one of the foundations of the Alexyan theory of principles. It reflects, above all, the nature of the principles as optimization requirements (norms that do not have absolute relations of precedence over one another).

The law of collision, therefore, handles the case where two norms lead, if considered alone, to results contradictory to each other. None of them is invalid, and none of them takes absolute precedence over the other. Precedence will be decided in the concrete case. The result of this balance is what Alexy will name as assigned norms of constitutional right, which has the structure of a rule, since it determines, in a concrete case, what should be done. Thus, it is possible to see that the norms of constitutional rights are not necessarily only principles.

[4] Our translation of the original in Portuguese: "Conflitos entre regras ocorrem na dimensão da validade, enquanto as colisões entre princípios – visto que só princípios válidos podem colidir – ocorrem, para além dessa dimensão, na dimensão do peso" (ALEXY, 2008, p. 94).

[5] Our translation of the original in Portuguese: "as condições sob as quais um princípio tem precedência em face de outro constituem o suporte fático de uma regra que expressa a consequência jurídica do princípio que tem precedência" (ALEXY, 2008, p. 99).

For Alexy, therefore, norms of constitutional rights are both principles and rules. Like Dworkin, Alexy defends that those rules and principles have different prima facie characters. The final rules contain ultimate requirements, i.e. they determine that one must do exactly what they prescribe. The principles, in turn, are optimization requirements that determine that something is done to the greatest extent possible, given the legal and factual possibilities. Rules are therefore definitive reasons, while principles are prima facie reasons.

> Decisions on constitutional rights presuppose the identification of definitive rights. The path that goes through principle, that is, the prima facie right, until the definitive right, undergoes the definition of a relation of preference. But the definition of a relation of preference is, according to the law of collision, the definition of a rule. In this context, one can say that whenever a principle is ultimately a decisive reason for a concrete judgment of is-ought, then this principle is the foundation of a rule, which is a definite reason for this concrete case (ALEXY, 2008, p. 108). [6]

Principles are, therefore, usually more generic than rules, since they are not related to factual and legal possibilities.

> While reasons for the rules of nature are often quite technical, the axiological content of principles is more easily identifiable than the content of rules; as decisive reasons to numerous rules, principles have a substantial importance for the juridical order; its relation to the idea of Law results from a model of foundation that advances from the broader towards the more special; and the contrast of principles as norms 'developed', to the norms 'created' is due to the fact that it is unnecessary that principles be set explicitly, which may

O caminho que vai do princípio, isto é, do direito prima facie, até o direito definitivo passa pela definição de uma relação de preferência. Mas a definição de uma relação de preferência é, segundo a lei de colisão, a definição de uma regra. Nesse sentido, é possível afirmar que sempre que um princípio for, em última análise, uma razão decisiva para um juízo concreto de dever-ser, então, esse princípio é o fundamento de uma regra, que representa uma razão definitiva para esse caso concreto" (ALEXY, 2008, p. 108).

> come from a tradition of detailed positivation and judicial decisions that, in general, express widespread conceptions about what Law should be (ALEXY, 2008, p.109, italics added). [7]

Alexy later addresses the relationship between the principles and the so-called maxim (or principle) of proportionality. According to him, the nature of the principles implies the maxim of proportionality and the later implies the former.

> Stating that the nature of principles implies the maxim of proportionality means that proportionality, with its three partial maxims of adequacy, necessity (least restrictive means requirement) and proportionality stricto sensu (balance requirement itself), logically results from the nature of the principles, i.e. proportionality is deducible from this nature (ALEXY, 2008, p. 116-117). [8]

The maxim of proportionality is the form used to perform the analysis of the case where a State measure that intends to promote a particular principle comes into collision with another principle, namely, two principles collide and are balanced according to the law of collision. The principles require that something be done to the greatest extent possible, given the legal and factual possibilities of the case. The proportionality test provides exactly the ascertainment of the factual and legal conditions of the case.

In the examination of adequacy, it is important to observe if the measure that is being proposed to conduct or promote a principle can do it, i.e. it is an analysis of the capacity of the measure to promote the desired principle. In a second step, the examination of the necessity of that measure is performed, i.e. the adopted measure is observed in order to see if it is able to promote a particular principle with the same efficiency as another measure, presenting a smaller impact on the colliding principle. The examinations of adequacy and necessity are analyses of factual possibilities for the application of a principle.

The examination of proportionality stricto sensu, in turn, is an analysis of the legal possibilities for the application of a principle in a particular case. In this phase, a balance itself is carried out. "When a norm of constitutional Law with a character of principle collides with an antagonistic principle, the legal possibility for the realization of this norm depends on the antagonistic principle. In order to reach a decision, a balance under the law of collision is required" (ALEXY, 2008, p. 117). [9]

This whole process of decision formulated by Alexy is endorsed in his theory of legal argumentation. The analyses of necessity, appropriateness and proportionality stricto sensu are only met if the rules imposed by the theory of legal argumentation are complied. This is because the search for the rationalization of legal practice requires the application of interpretative methods, in order to limit, as much as possible, the possibility of arbitrariness on the part of judges.

The theory of legal argumentation, in turn, is also founded, as previously mentioned, on the tradition of epistemological hermeneutics, as its objective is the scientific construction of methods and criteria for interpretation. Epistemological hermeneutics came right at the initial moment of hermeneutic science. Despite its origins in ancient times, hermeneutics acquired its scientific character, mainly through Schleiemacher's and Dilthey's studies. This science had the study of interpretation as a motto and was initially carried out in the fields of Philology, Theology and Arts. Hermeneutics, at that time, had a scientific character, by demonstrating itself as a methodological enterprise, i.e. by making a study of interpretation methods in human sciences.

The epistemological hermeneutics aimed, then, the creation of [9] Our translation of the original in Portuguese: "Quando uma norma de direito fundamental com caráter de princípio colide com um princípio antagônico, a possibilidade jurídica para a realização dessa norma depende do princípio antagônico. an interpretive methodology for human sciences, since their followers repudiated the possibility of importing the methods of the natural sciences to the humanities. For Schleiemacher and Dilthey, the philosophical positivism proposed inevitably failed, considering that the center of the humanistic study is in the comprehension of the author's individuality, i.e. not only in a grammatical interpretation, but in a psychological interpretation. The methods of the natural sciences mainly aimed generality and standardization which, according to the epistemological hermeneutics, are inapplicable to the humanities. The humanities depart from the point of view of an individual, be it author or interpreter (RICOEUR, 1988).

For Dilthey, knowledge takes different forms in the fields of natural sciences and the humanities. For the former, knowledge is externally, objectively given, through the observation and comparison of phenomena. In the humanities, on the other hand, knowledge is given through the search for the comprehension of the individual. This comprehension becomes more difficult, since it is comprised of the individual's choices, their history and social context. Thus, according to Dilthey, the different branches of the humanities are necessarily interdependent and all their study is linked to the influences of the socio-historical context (DILTHEY, 2010).

Such hermeneutics of an epistemological bias developed by Dilthey had a great repercussion, since it steadied the bases for the methodological separation between the studies of natural and human sciences, establishing its own interpretative methodology of the human sciences. This methodology influenced several authors, such as Robert Alexy and his theory of legal argumentation debated here.

The epistemological bias of hermeneutics, however, lost ground to the study of the ontological-oriented hermeneutics, subsequently developed by Gadamer from Heidegger's studies. Although Gadamer uses many of the concepts created by Dilthey and his studies to construct Truth and Method, his criticism of Dilthey's search for objectivity is compelling.

3. The Ronald Dworkin theory and the ontological hermeneutic of Gadamer

The ontological hermeneutics initially gained expression through Heidegger's works. From this new perspective, hermeneutics ends the search for methods and tools of interpretation, abandons its scientific pretension and supports its roots in Philosophy. The interest of the ontological hermeneutics focuses on the being who interprets.

> "Hermeneutics becomes a fundamental ontology, and its function is 'to bring up the structure that arises in a methodological plan', designated by Heidegger as a structure of 'pre-understanding'" (Ruedell apud Ricoeur, 2008, p. 81). [10]

Comprehension, from the perspective of ontological hermeneutics, however, takes on a new meaning. Comprehending now means the constant unveiling of possibilities to be constructed by a being, and no more the discovery of an inherent meaning to a text. Thus, comprehension ceases to be focused both on a relationship between two beings (author and interpreter), and in the relationship between subject and object (interpreter and work), but on the being as a living being in the world, which Heidegger nicknames Dasein.

The ontological hermeneutics thus brings out the study of comprehension as a phenomenon and not as the result of a procedure achieved by force or by the use of methods. The study focuses, therefore, on the comprehension of the being and on the need of the perception that comprehension is not a process that can be described through rationalized processes, but rather a phenomenon that occurs with a being, aiming their full potential generated by their experience in the world (RICOEUR, 1988).

Gadamer greatly incorporates Heidegger's ontological hermeneutics to give life to his Truth and method (which can be better read as truth against the method). Gadamer's objective is to demonstrate that the truth (as the phenomenon of the unveiling of possibilities, as introduced by Heidegger) could not be discovered through a set of methods, since the experience of the being and their pre-understandings overlap the intention of rationalization.

Gadamer supports that the impossibility of knowledge of a particular object and its description are not connected to the interpreter's pre-understandings. "Every comprehension is interpretation, and every interpretation is developed through a language that intends to let talk with the object and is, at the same time, a proper language of its interpreter" (GADAMER, 1999, p. 467, our translation)[11]. An interpreter makes use, although unintentionally, of their pre-understandings to interpret a text, and such text will influence their comprehensions of future objects of study. A continuous spiral motion is inevitably formed, and influences the interpreter, as well as determines they exert influence.

> The reference to the text cannot be compared according to this fixed, motionless and obstinate point of view, which only emerged for the one who tries to understand the unique question of how the other person could get to such an absurd opinion. In this context, comprehension certainly is not a historical understanding that reconstructs the genesis of the text. What one understands is what really is comprehended in the text. But this means that, in the resurrection of the meaning of the text, the interpreter's own ideas are always impied. Their horizon results, thus, always decisive, but cannot be understood, in turn, as an individual point of view which maintains or imposes itself, but rather as an opinion and a possibility that is at stake and that will truly help appropriate of what the text says. We described it above as a fusion of horizons. Now we can recognize the achievement of conversation in them, in which a subject consents to their expression, not in the quality of their own things or author, but as something common for both (GADAMER, 1999, p. 466-467, our translation). [12]

[11] Our translation of the original in Spanish: "Todo comprender es interpretar, y toda interpretación se desarrolla en el medio de un lenguaje que pretende dejar hablar al objeto y es al mismo tiempo el lenguaje proprio de su intérprete." (GADAMER, 1999, p. 467).

[12] Our translation of the original in Spanish: "La referencia del texto no se puede comparar según esto con un punto de vista fijo, inamovible y obstinado, que solo planteara al que intenta comprenderlo la cuestión única de cómo ha podido el otro llegar a una opinión tan absurda. En este sentido la comprensión no es seguramente una comprensión histórica que reconstruya la génesis del texto. Lo que uno entiende es que está comprendiendo el texto mismo. Pero esto quiere decir que en la resurrección del sentido del texto se encuentran ya siempre implicadas las ideas propias del intérprete. El horizonte de éste resulta de este modo siempre determinante, pero tampoco él puede entenderse a su vez como un punto de vista proprio que se mantiene o impone, sino más bien como una opinión y posibilidad que uno pone en juego y que ayudará a apropiarse de verdad lo que dice el texto. Más arriba hemos descrito esto como fusión de horizontes. Ahora podemos reconocer en ello la forma de realización de la conversación, en la que un tema accede a su expresión no en calidad de cosa mía o de mi autor sino de la cosa común a ambos." (GADAMER, 1999, p. 466-467).

As Fernandes (2008, p. 192) highlights, Gadamer emphasizes the need to take the historicity of the being into account. It would not be possible to remove an interpreter's knowability of their set of pre-understandings. "Each person is faced with a horizon, mainly a historical horizon, that acts not as a limiting element, but as a 'condition of possibility' of our comprehension" (FERNANDES, 2008, p. 192). [13]

Hence the relevance of the "consciousness of historic being", as proposed by Gadamer. The interpretation of an event can only occur through the action of a being that is inevitably historical and, therefore, influenced by the environment that shaped their comprehensions. According to Gadamer:

> (...) the authentic intention of comprehension is the following: when we read a text, we want to understand it; our expectation is always that the text will inform about something. A conscience formed by an authentic hermeneutic attitude is always receptive to the origins and characteristics which are totally strange to everything that comes from outside. In any case, such receptivity is not acquired through an objectivist "neutrality": it is neither possible, nor necessary, nor desirable to put ourselves in parentheses. The hermeneutic attitude supposes a consciousness taking regarding our opinions and prejudices which, when qualified as such, removes their extreme character. When we accomplish this attitude, we give the text the possibility of appearing in its difference and expressing its own truth in contrast with preconceived ideas that we imposed on it in advance (GADAMER, 2003, p. 63/64). [14]

[14] Our translation of the original in Portuguese: "(...) a intenção autêntica da compreensão é a seguinte: ao lermos um texto, queremos compreende-lo; nossa expectativa é sempre que o texto informe sobre alguma coisa. Um consciência formada pela autêntica atitude hermenêutica é sempre receptiva às origens e características totalmente estranhas de tudo aquilo que lhe vem de fora. Em todo caso, tal receptividade não se adquire por meio de uma "neutralidade" objetivista: não é nem possível nem necessário nem desejável que nos coloquemos entre parênteses. A atitude hermenêutica supõe uma tomada de consciência com relação às nossas opiniões e preconceitos que, ao qualifica-los como tais, retira-lhes o caráter extremado. É ao realizarmos tal atitude que damos ao texto a possibilidade de aparecer em sua diferença e de manifestar a sua verdade própria em contraste com as ideias preconcebidas que lhe impúnhamos antecipadamente" (GADAMER, 2003, p. 63/64).

In this perspective, comprehension occurs, therefore, by the conception that the subject confers on the object of study within their historical horizon - formed by their pre-understandings. "Wherever we comprehend something, we do it from the horizon of a tradition of sense, which marks us and precisely makes this comprehension possible" (OLIVEIRA, 2001, p. 228)

As Oliveira recalls:

> Hence the circular nature of all comprehension: it is always accomplished from a pre-understanding, which comes from our own world of experience and comprehension, but this pre-understanding can be enriched by the collection of new content. Precisely, the roots of comprehension in the field of the object is the expression of this inevitable circle in which any comprehension takes place. For this reason, the hermeneutical reflection is essentially a reflection of the influence of history, i.e. a reflection that has the task of thematizing the reality of "history acting" on any comprehension. In a word, hermeneutics unveils the historical mediation of both the object of comprehension and the situationality of what it comprises (OLIVEIRA, 2001, p. 230). [15]

From there, it is possible to observe the harsh criticism made by Gadamer to the philosophical positivism: the search for scientific objectivity through an alleged position of the interpreter's alienating detachment is factually impossible, given that the interpreter is a living being and, therefore, when interpreting, they will be influenced by their pre-understandings and conditioned by their historical horizon of meaning – always changing. Thus, Gadamer complains about the import of methods of the natural sciences by the spiritual sciences, since interpretation does not have the power to get the objectivity required by the philosophical positivism. Interpretation can not start from an interpreter's desired zero value, because there is no such ideal condition.

Dworkin, in his work Law's Empire, imports Gadamer's ontological hermeneutics to Law, trying to formulate a theory of decision from the perspective outlined. From Gadamer, Dworkin notes that Law is the result of a tangle of theoretical divergences, which are constantly debated, defended and criticized by legal theorists, judges and other participants. These differences allow interpreters to formulate different conceptions about the foundations of the social practice known as Law.

> The interpretation of the works of art and social practice, as I will show, is, in fact, concerned mainly about the purpose, not about the cause. But the purposes that are at stake are not (primarily) those of any author, but the interpreter's. In general, the constructive interpretation is a matter of imposing a purpose to an object or practice, in order to make it the best possible example of the form or genre to which one thinks they belong. It does not follow, even after this brief explanation, that an interpreter can make whatever they would like from a practice or a work of art; that a member of a hypothetical community, fascinated by equality, for example, can in good faith assert that, in fact, courtesy demands that riches be shared. For history either forms it from a practice, or the object exerts coercion on the available interpretations of the latter, although, as we will see, the nature of this coercion must be carefully examined. From the constructivist point of view, the creative interpretation is a case of interaction between purpose and object (DWORKIN, 2010a, p. 63-64).[16]

[16] Our translation of the original in Portuguese: "A interpretação das obras de arte e das práticas sociais, como demonstrarei, na verdade, se preocupa essencialmente com o propósito, não com a causa. Mas os propósitos que estão em jogo não são (fundamentalmente) os de algum autor, mas os do intérprete. Em linhas gerais, a interpretação construtiva é uma questão de impor um propósito a um objeto ou prática, a fim de torná-lo o melhor exemplo possível da forma ou do gênero aos quais se imagina que pertençam. Daí não se segue, mesmo depois dessa breve exposição, que um intérprete possa fazer de uma prática ou de uma obra de arte qualquer coisa que desejaria que fossem; que um membro da comunidade hipotética fascinado pela igualdade, por exemplo, possa de boa-fé afirmar que, na verdade, a cortesia exige que as riquezas sejam compartilhadas. Pois a história ou a forma de uma prática ou objeto exerce uma coerção sobre as interpretações disponíveis destes últimos, ainda que, como veremos, a natureza dessa coerção deva ser examinada com cuidado. Do ponto de vista construtivo, a interpretação criativa é um caso de interação entre propósito e objeto". (DWORKIN, 2010a, p. 63-64).

Thus, according to Dworkin, Law is the result of a constant constructive interpretation, in the sense that the interpreter of the law worries about its purposes, about the idea that they have about the normative order. But this idea, this conception or this point of view, derives from the fact that "(...) the story or the form of a practice or object exerts coercion on the available interpretations of the latter (...)" (2010a, p.64)

> In the following pages, I evaluate the assumption that the creative interpretation must be a conversational interpretation, especially when discussing an idea familiar to literary theorists: that interpreting a literary work means to recapture the intentions of its author. But this assumption has a more general basis on the philosophical literature of interpretation. Wilhelm Dilthey, a German philosopher who was especially influential in shaping the debate about objectivity in the social sciences, used the word verstehen to describe specifically the kind of understanding we acquire when we know what the other person means with what they say (we could say this is a sense of comprehension in which understanding someone implies in reaching an agreement with such person), instead of describing all possible ways or methods to understand their behavior or their mental life. (...) Gadamer thinks that Dilthey's solution presupposes the Hegelian apparatus Dilthey longed to exorcise (See H. G. Gadamer, Truth and Method, in particular PP. 192-214 (…)). He believes that the Archimedean historical consciousness that Dilthey thought possible, free from what Gadamer calls, in the special sense he gives the term, prejudices, it is impossible that the most we can hope to achieve is an "effective historical consciousness" that intends to see history not from any particular point of view, but understanding how our own point of view is influenced by the world we wish to interpret (DWORKIN, 2010a, p. 62-63).[17]

[17] Our translation of the original in Portuguese: "Nas páginas seguintes avalio o pressuposto de que a interpretação criativa deve ser interpretação conversacional, sobretudo ao discutir uma ideia familiar aos teóricos da literatura: de que interpretar uma obra literária significa recapturar as intenções de seu autor. Mas esse pressuposto tem uma base mais geral na literatura filosófica da interpretação. Wilhelm Dilthey, um filósofo alemão que foi especialmente influente em dar forma ao debate sobre a objetividade nas ciências sociais, usou a palavra verstehen para descrever especificamente o tipo de entendimento que adquirimos ao saber o que outra pessoa quer dizer com aquilo que diz (poderíamos dizer que esse é um sentido da compreensão no qual entender alguém implica chegar a um entendimento com tal pessoa), em vez de descrever todas as possíveis maneiras ou modalidades de entender seu comportamento ou sua vida mental. Thus, aware of the influence exerted by the interpreter's historical context (in this case, the judge) over decision making, Dworkin proposes a theory of decision founded on integrity, i.e. on the importance of legal propositions "that provide the best constructive interpretation of legal practice in the community" (DWORKIN, 2010a, p. 272)

> Law as integrity asks judges to admit, as far as possible, that Law is structured by a coherent set of principles about justice, equity and adjective due process, and asks judges to apply them in new cases that are submitted to them, so that each person's situation be fair and equitable, according to the same norms (DWORKIN, 2010a, p. 291). [18]

The theory of integrity in Law, as a theory of decision, postulates, therefore, that the court decision is the representation of a fusion of horizons. The central idea of interpretation is, according to Gadamer, the fusion of horizons: an interpreter who seeks to comprehend a text is vitiated by their own pre-understandings and conditioned by their historical horizon of meaning. But the work and its author also feature a historical horizon of meaning – inside their context and seen from the interpreter's context – which, fused to the interpreter's historical horizon of meaning, will allow their interpretation.

Similarly, Dworkin postulates the court interpretation. The judge must take into account, within a particular community of principles, not only the institutional history (i.e. the foundation consolidated in court for the consideration of similar cases), but also the constitutional morality (which is the interpretation of the Constitution in accordance with damer acha que a solução de Dilthey pressupõe o aparato hegeliano que Dilthey ansiava por exorcisar. (Ver H. G. Gadamer, Truth and Method, em particular PP. 192-214 (…)). Acredita que a consciência histórica arquimediana que Dilthey imaginou possível, livre daquilo que Gadamer chama, no sentido especial que dá ao termo, de preconceitos, é impossível, que o máximo que podemos esperar alcançar é uma "consciência histórica efetiva" que pretende ver a história não a partir de nenhum ponto de vista específico, mas sim compreender como nosso próprio ponto de vista é influenciado pelo mundo que desejamos interpretar". (DWORKIN, 2010a, p. 62-63).

the wishes and traditions of the community in the current historical context). In a court decision, then, the judge, when interpreting, would be performing the fusion of horizons of the institutional history with constitutional morality, always mediated by their own historical horizon of meaning.

4. For a pos positivist theory of judicial decision

The richness of two important theories of decision was demonstrated in previous chapters: Robert Alexy's and Ronald Dworkin's theories. It was also shown that the first theory has its philosophical roots in analytic philosophy and in epistemological hermeneutics, and the second theory in ontological hermeneutics. Finally, the criticism developed by the ontological hermeneutics to the epistemological hermeneutics and to the philosophical positivism were presented.

Given all this, the questions raised in the introductory chapter of this study must be resumed: are the different hermeneutical schools mutually exclusive? Does the criticism imposed by the ontological hermeneutics to the philosophical positivism reach the epistemological hermeneutics? Due to their philosophical foundations, are the contributions of Alexy's and Dworkin's theories of decision mutually exclusive, or may they be complementary?

As we tried to demonstrate in the course of this study, hermeneutical school are not mutually exclusive, but complementary. The development from different perspectives makes the hermeneutical school complementary, and not mutually exclusive. This happens for two reasons: firstly, because the criticism imposed by the ontological hermeneutics to the philosophical positivism does not apply to the epistemological hermeneutics; and secondly, because the criticism imposed to the epistemological school of hermeneutics can be absorbed and amortized.

As previously explained, the hermeneutics developed by Dilthey was based primarily on the defense of the independence of the humanities studies in relation to the studies of the natural sciences. Dilthey's speech was based on the sense of overcoming the philosophical positivism, i.e. overcoming the import of methods of the natural sciences to the humanities. Thus, treating the theories constructed under the canopy of the epistemological hermeneutics as if they were attached to the philosophical positivism is a big misconception. The construction of the epistemological hermeneutics by Dilthey occurred precisely because the author did not find any possibility that the import of techniques of the natural sciences by the humanities would succeed, considering, especially, that these are necessarily interpretive sciences. Thus, the construction of the epistemological hermeneutics occurred exactly in response to the philosophical positivism. Therefore, the criticism imposed by the ontological hermeneutics to the philosophical positivism does not have the power to undermine the theories founded on a hermeneutic-epistemological-oriented hermeneutics.

On the other hand, one must agree on the acceptance of the criticism imposed by Gadamer to the relentless pursuit of objectivity in Dilthey's work and, exactly at this point, the greatest Gadamer's contribution to a theory of decision is found. If one postulates an epistemological hermeneutics which absorbs the Gadamerian criticism, it is possible to distinguish an epistemology concerned with the study of methods that fit the search for the best rational interpretation, since there is the awareness that the rationality of the interpretation will be still vitiated by the interpreter's pre- understandings.

The proposal formulated here aims that interpretation, the way proposed by the epistemological hermeneutics, constitutes a step "ahead" of comprehension – which is a phenomenon, as proposed by the ontological hermeneutics. When the phenomenon of comprehension occurs, it is up to the judge, as an interpreter, to submit their comprehension to a constant and tireless interpretation through the methods proposed by the epistemological hermeneutics, in order to seek to assign it the highest possible rationality. Still, it is impossible to claim that this "second moment" is not vitiated by the judge's historical horizon of meaning, but the methods of legal argumentation themselves will also contribute to a reconstruction of this historical horizon, giving it new perspectives.

Thus, it is possible to see an overlap between the contributions made by the theories of decision founded on the ontological and epistemological hermeneutics. What is proposed is the observance of Dworkin's important complaint: court decisions will never get the certainty sought by epistemology, even if they build a monumental apparatus of argumentation methods, because the decision is inevitably the result of the comprehension of a being that is conditioned by their historical horizon of meaning. But it is also proposed that this comprehension must be relentlessly reviewed by the judge. Within a hermeneutic circularity, a review of comprehension through interpretation results in increasingly consistent new clarifications with what is intended as Law.

The methods proposed by the theory of legal argumentation themselves influence the interpreter. The question proposed by Gadamer seems to mean that one must not abandon the methods of application of Law and of systematization of the foundations in court decisions, but rather emphasize the importance of consciousness taking regarding decision, which will inevitably not be made based only on methods that seek to give it the greatest possible certainty, but, above all, based on the interpreter's pre-understandings, which will shape their comprehension. A greatly important fact brought by Gadamer is that comprehending is prior to interpreting, because we only interpret what we understand within our historical horizon of meaning.

Therefore, the import of the Gadamerian proposal to the theory of decision under the perspective here postulated, can not give occasion to the elimination of methods and tools that are intended to provide a greater security to the court decision. The greatest relevance of the importation of the Gadamerian theory is based on its complaint; i.e. adopting Gadamer's ontological hermeneutics means to realize that, despite the use of all methods of legal argumentation, the decision will always be vitiated by the judge's pre-understandings. Thus, may the judge decide by deliberating among weight-abstract principles or may the judge decide seeking integrity in Law through a constitutional morality and an institutional history, their interpretation of what the weight given to a principle must be or their interpretation of what, at that moment, is the constitutional morality that will be necessarily vitiated by their pre-understandings and therefore conditioned by their historical horizon of meaning.

Thus, it is clear that both theories – Alexy's and Dworkin's – have important contributions to Law, but are not complete, but complementary. The overlap between the theories allows the judicial decision taking, from comprehension and interpretation. If Dworkin's complaint is accepted, one is inevitably aware that the court decision is initially constructed by the judge's comprehension which, by making a fusion of horizons between institutional history and constitutional morality, find themselves inevitably influenced by their own historical horizon of meaning. But the court decision can not be limited to this initial comprehension. So, the judge must undergo an interpretative review process of their comprehension, so as to make it as rational as possible, through the methods of legal argumentation. At this time, the contributions of the Alexyan theory can assist the construction of the decision.

The possibility of debate allows Law enrichment. The debate presented here sought to present two very respected legal perspectives, not as they are commonly presented, as opposing theories, but as complementary theories.

In the manner of the important criticism imposed by some legal theorists, Professor Robert Alexy's theory has extreme scientific rigor and concern with a discursive rationality, which certainly does not rule out the influence of the judge's pre-comprehensions, seeks to assign to the court decision the highest argumentative rigor within a conception of a fair Law, effective and linked to the legal process.

In the same step, Dworkin's theory presents a relevant contribution to the formulation of a theory of decision, emphasizing the importance of the awareness about the historicity of the being. But the need to allow the greatest possible rationalization of the interpretation process leads us to require something more: the application of the methods produced from the epistemological hermeneutics as interpretive means to review the comprehension obtained in a "first step" of the court decision.

Thus, the discussion presented here did not intend to give birth to a new theory of judicial decision, or even formulate a mixed theory of judicial decision (half ontological, half epistemological). It rather intended to demonstrate that both the hermeneutical perspective and hence the theories of decision influenced by them, granted important contributions to Law. These contributions may provide the initial apparatus for the construction of a theory unrelated to the semantic demarcations imposed by theorists and philosophers of Law.

Law, mental health care and the public health system: achievements and vulnerabilities of the Brazilian model[1]

Márcia Araújo Sabino de Freitas[2]

Abstract:While some developed countries of Europe and North America discuss the creation of a public health system, Brazil handles its implemented integral and universal Unified Health System (Sistema Único de Saúde – SUS), which has constitutionally been provided since 1988. However, SUS is challenged to achieve in practice its ambitious project to its full extent. Moreover, it keeps struggling against distorted conceptual viewings of its actual scope. The role of law in carrying out this project and the ethical obstacles that pervade its effectiveness are discussed in the present paper. Its methodological approach focuses on the mental health care, and more specifically, in the law nº 10.216/01, known as the Psychiatric Reform Law. Mental health care faces all the challenges tackled by SUS, and even more: it has been profoundly reorganized after the new psychiatric paradigm. Research has been made in LILACS database, by collecting references that contrast law nº 10.216/01 with the practice of mental health care after its promulgation. The paper also brings an overview of SUS and the mental health care in Brazil.

tems, Brazil reasons on its Unified Health System (Sistema Único de Saúde – SUS) within a new context.

SUS is a public health system, with universal access and comprehensive care covering. Its creation was formalized by the 1988 Constitution, the 8th Brazilian Constitution. It represented the largest movement of social inclusion ever seen in the history of the country (Brasil 2007a). The enormous political and administrative architecture that supports it, integrating with agility the three executive bodies – municipal, state and federal – has no counterpart in the world, and not even in other sectors of the Brazilian government (Brasil 2007b).

However, a system responsible for achieving the constitutional wording that health is a State duty and a right for everyone, certainly faces difficult challenges, especially in an extremely unequal country with complex political structure. Young, SUS is still under construction; and, as a project in progress, it is also under healthy constant discussion.

Making the project real within the social reality is the great challenge of SUS.

In this context, the question to be made refers to the role of legislation in turning effective its own rights content. In other words, in which extent law is able to contribute to social development.

The methodological approach will focus on the mental health care model embraced by SUS. Dealing with this issue, the aforementioned question seems even more delicate, for in addition to its inclusion in SUS, the mental health care has been reformulated in several countries all over the world, including Brazil, after the psychiatric reform movements started in the 70s (Desviat 1999; Amarante 1995). Due to its peculiarities, the mental health care revealed itself as a good study niche for this particular work purpose. It suffers the same difficulties that affect SUS as a whole, and exposes the law to a more subtle effectiveness test, namely, how to integrate legislation in the social setting in order to extract social gain, in this case, improvement of population health.

It is believed that the description of the Brazilian public health system care and management model, as well as its limitations and the role of law in rendering health effective, may bring further data to support the discussion that takes place in other countries regarding the adoption or reformulation of their public health systems.

The Unified Health System and its challenges

SUS can be defined as:

> ... the Brazilian State organizational arrangement that supports the health policy effectiveness in Brazil, and translates into action this policy principles and guidelines (Vasconcelos and Pasche 2006, p. 531)[3].

It is a complex system, responsible for the liaison and coordination of promotional and preventive actions along with the healing and rehabilitation ones (Vasconcelos and Pasche 2006).

It is constitutionally provided, and is legally supported by different norms, among which the following:

i) the law nº 8080 of 1990, that deals with actions and health services in the country, along with the decree nº 7.508/11, which regulates the former;

ii) the law nº 8142 of 1990, which provides the participation of society in SUS management and automatic financial resources transfers for health among the federal spheres[4];

iii) and the recent long-awaited complementary law nº 141 of January 13, 2012, which regulates the constitutional amendment nº 29/00. It determines minimum monetary amounts to be annually allocated by the federal bodies in actions and public health services. It also sets criteria for the Union resources apportionment intended for the states, the federal district and municipalities, aiming to reduce regional disparities.

SUS shares its existence with: i) the Supplementary Health System (Sistema de Saúde Suplementar), which basically refers to both private health plans, regulated by the National Health Agency (Agência Nacional de Saúde – ANS), and also medical cooperatives; and with ii) the Direct Disbursement System (Sistema de Desembolso Direto), by which the user seeks support from the liberal medicine through direct expenditure, and which is poorly regulated and well stimulated by tax exemptions (Brasil 2007b; Ugá and Marques 2005).

[4] These transfers provide great agility to the system, which make it a unique case in the Brazilian public administration and ensure effective partnership between the federal spheres.

The origins of SUS[5] relate to long before its legal formulation by the 1988 Constitution, and go back to the crisis of the privatized healthcare model, since the second half of the twentieth century, when alternatives began to be designed for the model that granted individual medical assistance and in which only remained charity of some philanthropic institutions, such as the Santas Casas[6], for the economically excluded (Brasil 2007b).

Afterwards, and previous to the creation of SUS, Brazil has gone through several health policies that can be grouped under the social security health model. During this period, even though there was more inclusion then in the former model, one can say that nonetheless the exclusion only changed the sector, but continued to cover the same separation between the economically included and the deprived ones. In social security health, the economically included, i.e., those who were formal employees, were under the custody of the National Institute for Medical Assistance and Social Security (Instituto Nacional de Assistência Médica da Previdência Social – Inamps), while the non included still could only rely on philanthropic hospital care, and some units of simplified medicine in ambulatory care (Brasil 2007b).

SUS aims to break off this historical dichotomy. Also it states itself as a model that seeks to overcome the prevailing view that deems health through disease, with prevalence of the biological and individual dimensions (Vasconcelos and Pasche 2006). Thus, SUS incorporates in its legal basis an expanded concept of health that encompasses economic, cultural and social conditions, access to essential goods and services, and the notions of physical, mental and social well-being (article 3 of law nº 8.080/90).

Despite the undeniable progress and benefits for the Brazilian population, SUS still has to go a long way to materialize itself as designed.

The challenge begins with the conception one figures out of the system itself. Despite having been built on the principle of universality, population forms a segmented idea of it. Most Brazilians consider that SUS, when referring to assistance, is intended for low-income people, who cannot afford private health plans (Vianna 2005), and for procedures of high complexity, that are not usually provided by private health plans. However, a system considered aimed for the economically excluded segments will never acquire strength because these underprivileged cannot impose themselves firmly in politics (Brasil 2007a).

[5] For further information about SUS history: Zioni, Almeida and Pereira Filho, 2013; Escorel, 1999; Paim et al., 2011; Lima et al. 2005.

[6] The Santas Casas are religious philanthropic hospitals that are present in several Brazilian cities. Their installation in Brazil is intertwined with the country's history and, nowadays, they also provide care through SUS.

On the other hand, medical procedures of high complexity, which are also used for the sectors with more economic power, are the most expensive for SUS, while serving a smaller portion of users. It should be noted that a primary care with quality decreases the demand for medium and high complexity procedures. Even from the financial point of view, investing in primary care as a priority is more efficient, as it benefits a much more expressive number of users and avoids spending more with expensive care.

Issues regarding the system financing and its cost efficiency constitute another great problem faced by SUS. It is necessary to increase health spending in Brazil (Paim et al. 2011), and at the same time, improve the quality of spending (Gragnolati, Lindelow and Couttolenc 2013). There are several examples of expenses that might be better managed. Most berths are contracted by SUS in hospitals with few beds, which creates scale diseconomies (Brasil 2007a). At the same time, a large proportion of high-cost equipment is installed in municipalities that do not have size to host them (Gragnolati, Lindelow and Couttolenc 2013). Another example comes from uneven pay adjustment procedures, which ends up favoring the realization of highly complex procedures, to the detriment of medium and low complexity ones, forcing SUS to incur in larger expenditures with the high complexity procedures than with the others (Brasil 2007a). Also, the remuneration system of procedures still ends up inducing the occurrence of more expensive procedures, and hospitals can, for example, achieve unnecessary internments to be better paid for the adopted procedures. Furthermore, as already noted, if the primary care fails, it increases the possibilities of users who would not originally require expensive and complex treatments ending up falling into medium and high complexity care, due to the worsening of not treated symptoms, or either by the failure of the primary care network. All these factors generate inefficient spending for a system that already deals with scarce resources.

Thus, a vicious circle is formed, returning to the first problem: the inefficiency of SUS expenditures appears to reaffirm the segmented view of the system, favoring the smaller economically included part of the population which uses SUS for expensive high-complexity procedures.

As to the need to spend more on SUS, it is important to note that the Direct Disbursement System is the most relevant from the point of view of health expenditures in Brazil. In spite of this fact, it is exactly the less regulated one and hardly taken into account in analysis of the country public policy (Brasil 2007a).

This context allows extracting an initial conclusion: the first step to materialize SUS in all its potential is to overcome the distorted conceptual viewing of its scope, believing in the SUS project, in a commitment towards the universal public health system. This process implies involves a difficult mentality change in society.

The mental health care

Due to the fact that the mental health care in Brazil is inserted into SUS, it faces the same great difficulties of the entire system, and even more: it faces the implementation challenges of the new mental health paradigm arisen after the psychiatric reforms[7].

When dealing with the features of the assistance organization, it is important to remember that it is "... not limited to administrative aspects: the logics to effective SUS depends on the way to conceive and provide care to population" (Minas Gerais 2007, p. 39).

It is important, in order to have the project of SUS accomplished, to have in mind that the institutions design and the model of adopted procedures reveal a world view, which includes a concept of health.

So, after the movements of psychiatric reform, the mental health care in Brazil began to be redesigned according to the essential approach that the individual previously simply labeled as "crazy" is to be viewed as a person – who carries his own background and subjective issues –, and must be considered as such.

The mental health care model adopted in Brazil since then seeks to overcome the mental hospital, developing a substitute services network. This is an outpatient clinical care network, which acts in favor of freedom and participation of its users. Psychiatric hospitals would only be destined to the most serious cases, as background support to the outpatient network (Minas Gerais 2007; Guimarães 2010). This is similar to the general model designed by SUS, which proposes to expand a coordinated network of primary care with basic health units prevalence, avoiding the more complex hospital procedures. Thus, the new mental health approach harmonizes more with the current project health in Brazil.

Briefly, the intended mental health care network is organized as follows:

i) teams specialized in mental health allocated in primary health care units where required;

ii) Psychosocial Care Centers (Centros de Atenção Psicossocial – CAPS) dedicated to intensive or semi-intensive specialized treatments;

iii) psychiatric beds in general hospitals and in psychiatric hospitals for the more severe cases.

The CAPS are novelty of the current health care model. They are designed as open therapeutic spaces, focused in the user autonomy and in constant connection with the social environment. They operate mainly through the welcoming and the links established with the users, under the principle of being not places in which the overnight stay becomes a permanent living, but a transient step to an improved well-being (Minas Gerais 2007).

Under the legal framework[8], the law nº 10.216, of April 6, 2001, formalized the redirection of the assistance model, also providing the protection and the rights of people with mental disorders. These rights include: granting access to treatment within the health system, aiming the patient recovery through the inclusion in the family and in community; being treated with humanity and respect; receiving information about their disease, adequate treatment and a possible involuntary hospitalization; being treated by the least intrusive means as possible and preferably in the community mental health services (article 2).

The role of law

Generally speaking, one can say that the function of law is to regulate certain sectors of society in behalf of improvements for people and for their mutual coexistence. Hence, the law is made by people, aiming several improvements for their lives.

It is true that the law may play a relevant role in social development, but it is also true that it, by itself, is not able to, in most cases, lead to development and generate actual improvement in people's lives. Indeed, the social reality complexity calls for a systemic approach of various areas of knowledge, in search of solutions to its problems.

When designing and creating foundation for a health system with a size such as SUS, the law carries out important changes in public administration, with direct effects on social life. Furthermore: as SUS is warranted by the Constitution of Brazil, the essence of the public, universal and comprehensive health system cannot be modified, unless by means of a coup d'état. This carries great significance: the fundamental configuration of SUS remains, regardless of the elected government, dominant political party or economical context.

On the other hand, the law, notably one that aims to modify the mental health system, can tackle limits to the possibility of change due to its intrinsic ideological foundations, the underestimation of social-political resistance that would arise, and the unexpected effects of other social forces (Appelbaum 1994). To verify the extent of the proposed change, one should observe how far the ideology behind the psychiatric reform law involves real social change, or if it only embraces modifications that ultimately keep the essence of yesteryear. As to the resistance to change, it may lie, firstly, in the ingrained society prejudices and in the deficient education of a large population portion. And, even as a consequence of the former, the resistance may also occur due to the lack of sufficient political will to implement these legal standards. Such barriers, as Appelbaum (1994) previously warned, cause changes in the law brought by the psychiatric reforms unable to impact the practice as intended, and only an "almost revolution" would be bound to happen.

Within this state of affairs, what is the extent of reach of law regarding health promotion and the consolidation of the new assistance paradigm in Brazil? Specifically addressing the issue that this work intends, how far is the law able to impel society in order to improve mental health care and to overcome the old approach of confinement and dehumanization of the mental disorder users?

Method

Herein, as previously stated, it is proposed to submit this work guiding question to the case analysis of a particular law related to SUS regarding mental health care. Due to its relevance in the area, it was chosen to deal with the law nº 10.216/01, known as the psychiatric reform law in Brazil, whose text mirrors the new mental health approach advocated by the psychiatric reforms.

Even before the law publication, several normative acts have already been made within the field of the States legislature and by the executive, to adequate the health policies to the claims of the psychiatric reforms. And so, the law nº 10.216/01 came to endorse, to unify and to strengthen these initiatives (Minas Gerais 2007; Guimarães 2010). Firstly, the enforcement of the guidelines set out in the law meant an actual revolution when dealing with people with mental disorders: diminishing admissions to mental hospitals, summoning family members to the treatment, greater respect for both autonomy and dignity of the individual, and encouragement for their integration into society.

The law has been in force for ten years. Throughout this period, the structures of the mental health service have been remodeled, by the reduction of berths in psychiatric hospitals and the construction of a substitute care network (Minas Gerais 2007). So, the organizational and structural change have already been initiated. But, has the law also contributed to a deeper change, which is the true change in the approach to mental health, fomenting social development?

Taking into account the proposed question, bibliographic search was made in LILACS database. The choice for this database is justified due to the need to use national sources, since the study focuses in the application of a Brazilian law. LILACS is "the most important and comprehensive index of scientific and technical literature in Latin America and Caribbean" (LILACS).

The search strategy used both the keywords "law" and "mental health", by which 93 results were found among all types of references covered by the database, such as articles, theses and monographs. Only the abstracts of the ones published since the year 2001 have been read, for this is the year of the law under review promulgation, remaining 39 occurrences.

Among the latter, only those who had the entire content accessible with thematic relevance to the work issue were chosen for analysis. Selecting the texts which offered for consideration the analyses of Brazilian cases was one of the most common filters adopted in the search – for this study is not intended to review foreign law. Thus, a total of ten texts was obtained for examination, namely, nine papers and one master thesis.

Through the analysis of the research conveyed in these texts, the intention was to check the particular effects the law has created in social reality, and its consequent ability to assist the social development.

Due to the purpose of this study, it is noteworthy to observe that, among the examined texts, only those who actually brought relevant data concerning the matter under investigation will be mentioned.

Discussion of the outcomes

The paper by Zerwes et al. (2002) investigates the closing process of psychiatric hospitals underway in the country in face of the psychiatric reform. It aims to verify whether the law nº 10.216/01 is being fulfilled with no further damage to the users.

The research brings data about a massive closing of berths in hospitals in the metropolitan area of São Paulo within the range of 1992 and 2001, without, however, a corresponding expansion of the outpatient network of SUS. Between 1998 and 2001 the mentioned network retracted, rather than increasing, as it would be expected before the closing of hospital beds. It also takes into account the significant population increase in that region between 1992 and 2001.

In addition, it points out some difficulties the psychiatric reform faces: the abandonment of the ones with mental disorders by their families, the professionals' fear of losing their power, and the lack of political positioning according to the patient real interests (Zerwes et al 2002). These facts indicate a great need for change in the mentality of the general population, including the professionals, so that the law can be enforced.

The paper concludes that:

> It is not enough to close psychiatric hospitals. ... It is necessary to expand the outside care hospital networks. We must find ways to involve professionals and family members in the fight for the welfare of the patient, and finally, formalize campaigns aimed at ending the general prejudice that involves the designation "mental illness" (Zerwes et al 2002, p. 37).

Indeed, the retraction of the ambulatory network in the period, by itself, would already be unjustified due to the population growth. What aggravates even more the situation is the fact that many hospital beds have been closed, which increases the demand previously in the hospital for outpatient facilities, as mentioned forward.

It seems that the rate of closing hospital beds has not matched the creation of new therapeutic spaces. In principle, this would leave the psychiatric patients in an extremely delicate situation: a deinstitutionalization with no structural ability of redirecting them to other forms of treatment. This may have led to the lack of adequate treatment for many users – mainly considering the recent process of not keeping them in the hospitals – and even abandoning several of them. The research data do not allow effective conclusions about what really happened and other factors may be linked to these facts. However, the scarcity of data on patient monitoring during this transition is already an important information.

Britto's interesting master thesis (2004) aimed to verify the fulfillment of the law nº 10.216/01 regarding the rights of involuntarily admitted patients. Therefore, she carried out field research with participant observation and interviews in a psychiatric emergency of a Rio de Janeiro municipality. In the interviews, not only the doctors of the service were research subjects, but also the expert psychiatrist of the Public Ministry (Ministério Público MP[9]) and the assigned prosecutors (promotores de justiça[10]), since the involuntary commitment, according to the law, must be communicated to the MP, which came to be responsible to deal with these demands.

The participant observation report indicates that, again, the mentality of people, largely prejudiced and unprepared to deal with relatives or acquaintances who have mental disorders, affects too much the accomplishment of treatment in accordance with the law and the guidelines of the psychiatric reforms. The report of the following cases is quoted to illustrate such prejudice:

> … [a] physician was taking care of a woman who was accompanied by both her (teenager) son and her brother. The latter said the woman was not well and that he would like to leave her there "for a few days" in order to "clean her apartment" (brother's words). ... The doctor, showing disgust, told the brother it was not for him (brother) to decide an internment, it was the physician's function

[9] The Public Ministry is a public institution belonging to the Brazilian legislature, which has the task "to defend the juridical order, the democratic regime and the inalienable social and individual interests" (article 127 of the Constitution). To duly perform this activity, it should, among other tasks, prosecute criminal actions and civil investigations and the public actions necessary for the protection of the diffuse and collective interests (article 129 of the Constitution).

[10] In Brazil, the prosecutors are public officials that work in the Public Ministry.

> and a set of conditions should be evaluated and that the woman did not actually need to be admitted. (Britto 2004, p. 128)

> They said they had gone out of São Gonçalo to intern their grandmother ... [The doctor] asked why they had not followed an outpatient treatment. The granddaughters complained and said they were unable to stay with their grandmother in such a state. During the confusion and their screaming, the doctor began to speak up and rebuked the granddaughters. They remained silent. The doctor said that the old lady had never been submitted to a treatment because they only used to intern her, that in such a "violence" he would not participate, that "internment is not treatment", and that they should "worry about treating their grandmother". (Britto 2004, p. 132)

The weakening of family ties creates a critical gap which destabilizes the public policy networks, because the family links ties the ends of the basic health network.

Another diagnosed problem is the lack of education of the general population, which affects the performance of the outpatient treatment:

> Many people who received treatment in the emergency care could not read and write, and had no one to appeal for helping them in the medication control. In several visits, the doctors explained the medicines and their schedules by their colors and the meals of the day. However, these people probably ended up getting confused with the administration of medication and having crises. (Britto 2004, pp. 132-133)

> The mother said they had been praying with the parson, but her daughter had not improved. The doctor spoke in a gruffer tone that they should have searched for a doctor before. (Britto 2004, pp. 126-127)

In several parts of the report, it is clear that the hospital internments problems often flee from the field of psychiatry, and, "therefore, some hospitalizations are derived from social problems such as poverty, drugs, unemployment, misery etc." (Britto 2004, p. 125). That is, there are cases in which the hospitalization (not only the one by mental disorder) would not be necessary, and the person could just be under an outpatient treatment. But the internment is made owing to factors external to mental health, for example: the person, due to extreme poverty, has nowhere to go, or her living conditions are not appropriate, or she has to leave home and "hide" in the hospital to escape from traffickers who threaten to kill her etc.[11]

The mental health policy, and all the legislation that organizes it, get fragile due to complex social problems and the mentality of people, which are beyond reach of these policies. So, it seems that, for the mental health policy to be effective as prescribed by law, many social problems would have to be adequately addressed by other public policies, properly interconnected, and a difficult awareness should be fostered in a population that, rather than imbued with prejudices, is poorly educated. Given this situation, the law, facing unforeseen problems, remains tied up.

Another point worth mentioning concerns the performance of doctors and other health professionals. The researcher stated that, in general, they were considerate with users. Although some negative facts were described, such as their frequent use of cell phones during the medical care, interrupting consultations, sometimes in very delicate moments, to answer their phones (Britto 2004). These occurrences show that a better training to deal with the public is required, especially because people looking for this service usually are in very particular sensitive situations.

In interviews about the activities of the MP, performed both with the service physicians, as with the prosecutors, it appears, on one hand, the convergence of opinions on the theoretical side: the activities of the MP are welcome and closer ties between psychiatry and "justice" (according to the concept that doctors show to have of the MP) are viewed favorably.

Nevertheless, in practice, although it is advocated the positive character of the intervention of the MP, it seems that either prosecutors, as well as physicians, do not see clearly what can be done by the MP. Additionally, both groups report lack of material conditions for more effective interventions in everyday life. According to the doctors:

> "In practice, the service doesn't change anything. But, I think that for the Public Ministry it changes a lot, because they don't have > the slightest possibility of accounting for not even 10% of all the papers they receive. ... The hospitalization, it creates a monstrous paperwork. The Public Ministry, surely, has no possibility to check it." (Britto 2004, p. 137)

> "It doesn't change anything. ... It's too many people. The guys over there are already concerned with other things; will they be worrying about patient? No way!" (Britto 2004, p. 137)
> "The fact of communicating to the MP, I have never seen anything practical happen yet." (Britto 2004, p. 137)

> "I think being forced denotes an interest in preserving individual freedoms. Great, nice, cool. But I don't know what they do with all this paperwork." (Britto 2004, p. 138)

> "… as I say I don't know what they will do with the papers, in fact I think it's a false guarantee … a guarantee that's only in the paper. ... But I believe that if you have a ... law… you create a possibility of guarantee … I mean, a possibility. ... There is the law just to show, you know, the law that is only in the paper, that doesn't really works, well, those kind of things. Oh, that's the problem. The law is not enough, this is a beginning. ... I think that's where really the guarantee happens, through the mobilization of people who are involved in the process. By professionals, of course, by users, obviously ... with the government, somehow, if it's through the MP, whatever. I think we have to give these guarantees by law, but we have to practice these guarantees. Everyone has rights" (Britto 2004, p. 139).

In the last transcript statement, the doctor exposes his perception from the reality he lives, considering the ability of law to cause changes in society, to implement the rights it provides. As to the prosecutors, not much unlikely the doctors, they say:

> "The law says that it [the psychiatric internment] will be communicated to the Public Ministry – communicated, but you don't have power to do much. And even worse, if the law said that the Public Ministry will be communicated and that it can completely monitor the internments, we still don't have material conditions to do it." (Britto 2004, p. 144)

> "The Public Ministry received a notification of an involuntary hos> pitalization. What is to be done about this admission? Is it up to the Public Ministry to consider whether a doctor acted well, and if he prescribed medicine well? No. This is because the prosecutor doesn't have technical training in this area." (Britto 2004, p. 144)

> "It creates a completely new legal situation with strong implications in the life of a person and we have no past legislation about it. It had no prediction in the Federal Constitution, it had no previous law, it has no legal rule that defines it or gives us, law professionals, a parameter a little stronger, tighter for it. So basically, they are only medical standards and guidelines" (Britto 2004, p. 144)

> "no law ... is able to change the reality of life, change the reality of things. It is a piece of paper. ... I believe that the law, it does have an important role. Of course we can not be utopian to think that the existence of the law will make it all happen, make it change. The law is not a magic wand, but at the same time I believe, even because I work at it, I believe that the law does have a power. It has an educative power, of making people rethink, of calling people to responsibility. So I think this is an important role, to set rights, to establish rights, to catch people's eye that they are the holders of those rights. To educate the society, the family that these people are ... all this is a context, all this has to be changed" (Britto 2004, p. 143)

The discussion of the law function and its ability to interfere with social reality arises with common traits: the law would have an important role, mainly linked to the elucidation and awareness of rights, although being incapable to, by itself, change reality. One realizes the lack of clarity and awareness of the prosecutors regarding the possibilities of their own activities. It is especially due to their understanding of the law being too abstract in relation to their performance parameters, and so they verify their cognition limits due to the involved knowledge. In addition, both doctors and prosecutors realize that it would be unfeasible, at least currently, for the MP to respond to the whole demand.

Although in theory the participation of MP is viewed as important and beneficial, and provided by law, in practice, its performance related to the involuntary admissions is still deemed very small, and may even have been emptied due to the presented factors.

The paper by Luzio and Yasui (2010), very appropriately named "Beyond the ordinances: the mental health policy challenges", also highlights the necessary mentality change for the accomplishment of the care model construction. Firstly, it says that the change of the assistance model is urgent, with the overcoming of the paradigm illness/healing. Therefore, it goes further and sustains the development of actions along with the society as a whole:

> Such actions should aim to produce changes in the social imaginary about mental illness, madness, abnormality and mental disorder bearer dangerousness, as well as of the mental health services as a mere repository of "insane people" (Luzio and Yasui 2010, p. 25).

Borges and Baptista (2008), also pointing out the necessary change in the care model conception, referring about the important search for the care, instead of the cure, since "health and disease are not polar opposite phenomena if we comprehend the health as daily production for more health and for better ways of life" (Borges and Baptista 2008, p. 465). The authors defend an interesting posture that assumes not only the change in the health notion, but also shows the idea background that each person would be given the right to say what health is for herself[12]."Better ways of life" certainly vary from people with mental disorders to the ones without, just as they can vary naturally from person to person. The prospective content of this thinking lies exactly in its quality of not pre-judging the others, or trying not to stereotype people, whether they bear a mental disorder or not, according to the seemingly "generally accepted" concepts of society. One should not think about cure, which presumes as paradigm the "healthy" person, but in care. This distinction enables people bearing mental disorders to become better integrated into society carrying on their best forms of life, according to the paradigm created by themselves. Once again, the necessity of mentality change that the previous texts have already pointed out arises.

Both authors discuss the law functions. They state that, even unable to, by itself, achieve the public policy, the law plays an important role in interlocution and as an analysis resource when reflecting in the political agenda:

> It is certain that a policy framework exceeds the boundaries of the rules production, surpasses the formality of a government policy > expressed in ordinances, and builds itself in more or less formal interlocutions, more or less permanent, but certainly concurrent with this process. Notwithstanding the rules output works along with the interlocution and in the configuration either of the assistance model as well as in the set of discussions. It also becomes a rich analysis resource, pointing out the necessity of an inflection in the mental health policy agenda. (Borges and Baptista 2008, p. 467)

Barroso and Silva (2011) address the psychiatric reform in Brazil within the framework of the historical-critical historiography. According to them, such reform has not been implemented in the country yet. The reform process continues, with the reduction in the number of berths and the increase of the specialized ambulatory network. Thus, they warn the following:

> The promulgation of laws and ordinances does not guarantee the materialization of its content. … not all the substitutive services have been implemented. The coverage of psychiatric community services and the financial resources invested on the existent services still remain insufficient. There is a lack of qualified professionals for work and there was no adequate preparation for the families and communities living along with people with psychiatric disorders (Barroso and Silva 2011, p. 74).

In addition to the insufficiency of the practical materialization facing the legal text, a scathing critique that the authors present is that, "without the due reflection, the new Brazilian psychiatric model may only change old forms of social control for new ones" (Barroso and Silva 2011, p. 74). Even in the well-intended new communitarian psychiatry, the same relationship pattern between people with mental disorders and health professionals remains the same. This occurs due to the assumption that it is possible to rehabilitate the other, instead of considering that this subject is the only one able to rehabilitate himself (with the health professionals' aid). The power hierarchical structure of the patient as a passive object prevails. To overcome this traditionally ingrained model, fostering greater gains in social development and also enhance the respect for the patient as person is a major challenge.

In the study of Arejano, Padilha and Albuquerque (2003), influenced by the theoretical framework by Michel Foucault, fieldwork was conducted with interviews of employees who work in a mental health care service. The researchers consider that, in the studied area, the impacts of the law nº 10.216/01 in the employees' way of thinking seem to have been more relevant only in the administrative scope. This is owed to the fact they did not demonstrate having sufficient ethical reflection in the relationship between users and professionals, changed by the implemented law. Indeed, that ethical reflection is the essential component to accomplish the psychiatric reform. The authors state two possible kinds of relationships between professional and users: one with a dominant subject and another that favors an ethical solidary action. The equally empowered subjects of the latter kind characterize a relationship between two free subjects (Arejano, Padilha and Albuquerque 2003). It remains clear, from what has been said, that this kind of ethical relationship is the one that would be recommended as ideal by the psychiatric reform.

So, attention is called upon to the necessary change in the mindset, without which the great change brought by the law, would empty itself. In spite of the fact that the research has been made after the promulgation of the law, its findings show that the relationships between professionals and users of mental health services still remain fuzzy in the minds of those professionals.

When reading some testimonies, an effort seems to have been made by some professionals to change their way of viewing mental disorder. When talking about how much that change is difficult, one of them even says that they, professionals, also create prisons in their minds against which they have to struggle:

> "They believe everything is solved, there are no walls, such a strong society and world, but with barriers just as the one of the asylum walls. People, as well as we do, have our own prisons that we also have to face daily." (Arejano, Padilha and Albuquerque 2003, p. 551)

Hence, it can be said that we all are somehow "prisoners" of our minds. While users have mental disorders, the professionals who deal with them, and the whole society, also have "prisons", which in this case, are the prejudices, the limitations when dealing with alterity. Similar to any prison, it is not easy to release yourself, for even if we leave the enclosure of bars, the bars which are within ourselves stick more deeply and require great strength to be surmounted.

Meanwhile, and speaking of bars, the very conception of ambiance of the psychiatric reforms, which is an environment with no walls, bothers some of the interviewed professionals. Even the outside bars, to those who are familiar with the disciplinary pattern of the previous model, is a confounding factor, because people have not even adapted their mentality to the new architectural structure of the service. They have difficulties dealing with the presence of bars in their minds and their absence in the physical space:

> … facing a no wall environment, people do not know how to relate with one another, the relationship between mental health workers are confused because the discipline requires "closing spaces" to maintain control and body utility. This absence of spatial closures space, according to the researched group, disables people to define themselves by the place they occupy in a ranking, or even by the distance that separates them from the others. (Arejano, Padilha and Albuquerque 2003, p. 551)

This is how the emancipation of people with mental disorders is only going to occur when also the health professional emancipates himself (Arejano, Padilha and Albuquerque 2003).

However, foreseeing that the actual learning and emancipation are experienced processes that require elapsed time, one of the interviewed professionals declared, by using a ludic metaphor, that this change of mentality can be established as time goes by:

> "One of the very remarkable things found out in our meetings is that the Reform is a process and, as a process, it means construction. And currently it became very impressive, through the analogy with coffee, that it is daily built. Nothing is finished. It is up to each and every one, by tasting a dose, some appreciate it stronger and others, lighter, or mixed, as you say referring to a tea-coffee" (Arejano, Padilha and Albuquerque 2003, p. 552)

The content of the psychiatric reforms is not completed in the law. It will be built through everyday assistance to mental health, through the relationship among users and health professionals. And the individuals are still getting to understand their roles in this new ethical relationship. In order to boost this process it is crucial to invest in ongoing training of health professionals, and also in the user and his family participation in the health policies (Arejano, Padilha and Albuquerque 2003).

Concluding remarks

The law nº 10.216/01, with its twelve completed anniversaries, is still too young to accomplish the great revolutions that it carries in its ethical content. In addition to the major structural change in mental health care under implementation, its greatest revolution lies in its ethical content, related to the change of population mentality. And this is a difficult task because that transformation does not occur complying with legal or temporal frameworks. It does not take place all in a sudden. It is gradual and requires small interlinked daily actions and behaviors. So, it is not only of the hospital environment: for this big change to happen, it needs to be spread throughout the whole social environment. The change pattern is processed through the mutual learning between health professionals and patients, through empowered relationships people keep with one another, through the spread of ideas and enlargement of culture.

Law has its role, and the law nº 10.216/01, as a regulatory touchstone, has great importance. Not only did it serve the formalization of the idea of psychiatric reform in Brazilian state apparatus and standardized as well rules that were already being made in the states or at the central executive level. It also performed functions related to communication, dissemination of content and acted as a decoy for discussion topics, including with its mistakes and successes, of discussions about the rethinking of new policy agendas and of strategies for health planning.

However, to effect the content of the law and achieve the desired development in health, it is required a larger financial resources input and the strengthening of the political will to comply the entire physical structure demanded by the new care model. More than this, it is essential to invest more in the training of health professionals and, broadly, in the Brazilian population education, since no major change can actually be achieved without education.

SUS, due to its scope design ambition, similar to the law nº 10.216/01, can also be considered young, and goes through the same fundamental difficulty: to be successfully implemented, it depends not only of a better overall infrastructure of the country, with sanitation, irrigation of the drought and famine areas, quality transportation of goods and people, but also, and mainly, of education. The SUS and the psychiatric reform will only materialize in their fullest potential when Brazilians become more enlightened, educated and less biased, and if, with full capacity and information, society believes in SUS, in the psychiatric reform, in the patients with mental disorders, and in itself.

The countries that currently discuss their health systems should keep this in mind: for any health system to develop, people need to have education, but also need to share the health project in which they are involved: they need to firmly believe and invest in themselves and in their countries.

Posthumanism and equality

Denis Franco Silva

Abstract: This paper discusses the problem of an enhancement enterprise towards a posthuman stage and its impacts on legal thought concerning the context of society marked by the increasing role of technologies in all dimensions of everyday life. The theories about how a legal system should deal with the idea of human enhancement are still in dispute, but can be grouped in two tendencies: the bioconservatives and the bioenhancement supporters. It must be noticed that procedures and technologies for human enhancement are becoming more and more available, despite the legal grounds for its institutionalization is not completely established and rooted in society and legal circles. Human enhancement procedures can have profound impacts in society, like problems related to the inequality of means that do not grant a universal access to them or the substantial inequality that they can provoke among persons. Enhancements like bionic hands, drugs that increase intellectual performance and, specially, procedures for liberal eugenics are becoming more and more feasible. Thus, they are object of questioning by philosophy and legal theory according to its impacts on traditional concepts such as person and equality. The first tendency mentioned above (Bioconservatives) do not accept any kind of enhancement procedures, based on a naturalist approach in which human nature should be untouched and preserved. Habermas, for instance, and also, Francis Fukuyama, presents a great variety of arguments against enhancement procedures. It is remarkable that these arguments depend upon the idea of a human essence or nature that should not be changed, which means, their arguments are based on a normative essentialism with biological grounds. As mentioned above, there is also a criticism toward processes of human enhancement because they can lead to a situation of unsustainable sociopolitical inequality among persons. On the other hand, the second tendency states that there is a duty to enhance and morals or law should not curb it. This group is represented by scholars like Julian Savulescu, Nick Broston, Alex Buchanan and John Harris, that assumes that morals and law must be disconnected from any biological determinism, denying such a human nature or essence and claiming that inequalities generated by enhancement technologies are not a bigger problem than other substantial inequalities already existing. This paper suggests a new approach to this debate in an attempt to elucidate if, after all, the idea of human enhancement threats the value of equality.

Key-Words: posthumanism; human enhancement; person; equality.

1. Introduction

One must assume that humans have always tried to enhance themselves by improving their mental, physical and emotional capabilities. The very invention of writing, for instance, was a considerable enhance to our natural cognitive abilities (CLARK, 2003).

Biotechnologies already on the horizon can enable humans to be smarter, to have better memories, to be stronger, to live more and even enjoy richer emotional lives. One can say that, for the fist time, our evolutionary future truly lies on our own hands and several modes for biomedical enhancements can be foreseen, like the administration of drugs, direct brain-computer interface, bionic implants, genetically engineered implants and, of course, genetic engineering of embryos (BUCHANAN, 2009).

It must be noticed that procedures and technologies for human enhancement are becoming more and more available, despite the legal grounds for its institutionalization is not completely established and rooted in society and legal circles.

Thus, how should a legal system deal with the forthcoming possibility of bioenhancements, leading society to a posthuman stage, is still in dispute. The claims can be roughly grouped in two tendencies: the bioconservatives and the bioenhancement supporters.

Of course, human beings can be described as a "marvel of evolved complexity" (BROSTON, SANDBERG, 2007). When manipulating such complex evolved systems, which we poorly understand, our interventions may often fail or backfire, even jeopardize, in the opinion of some scholars, the very idea of being human, and thus, a person. Given how superficial is our knowledge about this peculiar system – the human organism, particularly our brains – how could we have any realistic expectance on enhancing it? For these scholars a dark spectrum of dehumanizing procedures, eugenics and substantial inequalities rises in the horizon when one talks about human enhancement.

Considering such possible outcome, should society allow human enhancement procedures? This question underlies the debate between the so-called bioconservatives and bioenhancement supporters and it is not an easy one.

2. To enhance humans or not?

Bioconservatives can be said not accept any kind of enhancement procedures. They rely on a naturalistic approach in which human nature should be untouched and preserved.

To understand this point of view it is necessary to identify the reasoning underneath bioconservative claims.

As mentioned, the objection to any kind of enhancement procedures seems to be rooted on a naturalistic approach in which human nature should be untouched and preserved, but this assertion presents itself in a variety of forms and arguments. The most frequent is the appeal to the idea of human nature or human essence as a normative claim.

2.1 Appealing to human nature

Appeals to human nature usually play different roles on the enhancement debate.

Some of them seem to be mere supporting roles, like the assumption of human nature as a precondition to moral agency. Practical rationality in Kantian terms would be deeply embedded and, at the same time, regarded as constituent of human nature. Any enhancement attempt would put at risk our capacity to moral agency by endangering the common shared features of human beings that enable practical rationality. The argument is clearly tautological and presumes an empirical assumption that when facing a situation where a so called biomedical enhancement jeopardizes practical rationality it would still be considered an enhancement, not a "backfire", and systematically pursued[1].

Arguments of such kind can be better understood if related to the idea of human nature as a feasibility constraint on morality or of human nature as a constraint on the good for us.

The idea of human nature as a feasibility constraint on morality assumes that a realistic approach to understanding morality must take into account cognitive and motivational limitations of human beings: the biological hard-wiring we happen to have. Buchannan (2011), though criticizing, summarizes this kind of argument in an example:

[1] A paradigmatical reference to this argument would be Jürgen Habermas point of view on designing babies. See HABERMAS, Jürgen. The future of Human Nature. Cambridge: Polity, 2003.

> If, for example, by virtue of our evolved biological make-up, we have a limited capacity to act altruistically toward strangers, then a plausible account of our moral obligations to others must take this into account. "Ought" implies "can" and what we can do is limited by our evolved biology.

This view is intrinsically connected with the idea of human nature as a constraint on the good for us, an argument based on a plausible interpretation of Aristotle's writings: the idea that a being's nature determines its good by constituting a constraint on what can count as a good life for that particular being. If something is beyond the limits of our nature, it is no good for us[2].

As one can see, the above claims on human nature and practical rationality, morality and good life simply cannot answer the question on whether embracing an enhancement enterprise or not. Precisely, these claims lack a clear definition of "human nature" and, specially, assumes that altering this so called human nature and thus the constraint on what is a good life for us is necessarily a bad thing, but the only conclusion that really follows the argument, if we take it for granted, is that our concept of a good life would be different if we enhance ourselves. Different is not necessarily worst.

The bioconservative speech traduces the idea of human nature or essence as a source of moral rules. It is a version of cognitive morality or normative essentialism grounded on the belief that is possible to derive substantial moral rules from reflection on human nature. More specifically, it would be possible to derive moral rules that include a prohibition on enhancement[3]. Any changes in our biological make-up that does

[2] Authors like Michael Sandel and Erik Parens hold that enhancement is objectionable precisely because it involves the removal of limitations on what can be done by human beings, since there are irreplaceable goods that depend upon our having limitations. See PARENS, Erik. The Godness of Fragility: On the Prospect of Genetic Tecnologies Aimed at the Enhencement of Human Capacities. Kennedy Institute of Ethics Journal 5(2), 1995,141-53, and SANDEL, Michael. The case against perfection. The Atlantic Monthly 293(3) 2005, 50-62.

[3] See, for instance, KASS, Leon. The wisdom of Repugnance. In: MacGee, Glen. The hunot occur "by chance" (this expression is frequently used to replace "by nature") or as a side effect of a medical intervention would be morally wrong and, thus, should be prohibited.

Some critics of the bionconservative thinking, like Marchesini (2010) see this "human nature" approach on the debate over the moral and legal grounds of bioenhancement as supportive of a reactive vision of simplistic condemnation and rejection of new body-pervasive technologies. A reaction similar to Luddism, since any reasonable definition of "human nature" is provided by bioconservatives, as also points Buchanan (2011).

The claim of absence of empirical evidence against human enhancement procedures - since all the objections commonly presented assume the loss of the ability for practical reasoning or the loss of meaning of any reasonable conception of morality or "good life" – is also a frequent criticism made by enhancement procedures supporters, like Julian Savulescu (2006), John Harris (2007) and, finaly, Allen Buchanan (2009; 2011).

Though, the analysis of a typical bioconservative argument based on the concept of human nature reveals a much more pungent fear: inequality. In fact, although referring to concepts like "human nature", the bioconservatives underlying reasoning reveals an argument dependent upon the relation between the concepts of person and equality.

The passage below illustrates pretty well a bioconservative claim:

> The political equality enshrined in the Declaration of Independence rests on the empirical fact of natural human equality . . . Underlying this idea of the equality of rights is the belief that we all possess a human essence that dwarfs manifest differences in skin color, beauty, and even intelligence. This essence, and the view that individuals therefore have inherent value, is at the heart of political liberalism. But modifying that essence is the core of the transhumanist project. If we start transforming ourselves into something superior, what rights will these enhanced creatures claim, and what rights will they possess when compared to those left behind? (FUKUYAMA, 2002, p. 09)

Fukuyama's mention to the idea of "human essence", contrary to what seems, is not central in his reasoning, but an instrument through which he sustains the claim that all men are equal, for he commits himself with the following structure of argument, as well pointed by Wilson (2007):

1. There is a human essence.
2. This human essence is responsible for our equal moral status.
3. This human essence would be changed if we were to enhance ourselves in various ways.
4. Therefore if we enhance ourselves in various ways we will no longer all be of equal moral status

A being moral status, however, does not depend upon its biological make-up, or, at least, should not. The idea of an equal moral status, therefore, does not lie on the sameness of such biological make-up. The argument seems, first, to externalize a concern on how do we grant each other the status of person, and thus, on a second moment, a concern on how do we sustain the claim that all persons are equal in a society in which genetic engineering, for example, becomes frequent but not widespread over the hole population or all social classes. Fukuyama is worried about persons and equality and thus, departing from the "natural lottery" argument, tries to link personality, an axiological concept, to such thing as a "human essence", an ontological concept, which implies the so-called "normative essentialism". Altering or enhancing the human, in this view, means to put at risk our moral status and the very idea of political equality among persons.

2.2. Being a person and being equal

The reasoning that links the concept of "human nature" or "human essence" to the concept of person contains a dangerous flaw. It turns an axiological concept – the concept of person, a label that indicates the difference between something and someone (SPAEMANN, 2004) – into an ontology.

Therefore, a coherent criticism to the bioconservative speech must, first, clarify the problem of moral personhood and its independence of a particular psychophysical identity. In a second moment, the problem of generating unsustainable inequality among persons due to the use of bioenhancements must be approached from an adequate theoretical point of view.

As seen above, bioconservatives, when talking about a "human nature" or "human essence", tend to equal the concept of person to a biological category: the homo sapiens sapiens species.

The recognition of the status of "person" traditionally occurred with particular focus on the belongingness to the human genre. However, as a mere form of rejection of the positivist formalism of law regarding the category of "person" in the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth century. Indeed, as a measure of rhetorical reinforcement, aiming to avoid the exclusion of any human being from the universe of persons (which means to avoid the denial of dignity to any human being) but not aiming to necessarily exclude any non-human.

As an axiological concept, a nomem dignitates, moral personhood - and also the legal status of person – rely on the presence of some particular features. Traditionally, three distinct crucial co-related features can be identified on the concept of person: the rational self, the psychophysical individuality and the feature of otherness, which means the openness to others or the relational aspect.

These three features put together generate, in time and space, agents able to elect ends or goals and to have interests and desires. They also entail the ability of such agents to reexamine and possibly abandon their goals and desires. The abilities themselves and the person constituted by them are previous to any end, interest or desire. Thus, when one talks about an interest or a desire, a subject of such interest or desire is assumed: a person.

It is also assumed that the identity of a person does not change with his or hers interests or desires. This separation between the person and its ends, interests or desires is what allows her to detach herself from the causal chain of events in which the past, as an empirical phenomenon, is immersed. Therefore, the possibility of electing ends or having desires is not determined by the causal chain of events so that the elected end or interest can be normatively attributed to the person (NINO, 2007) . Ergo, a person is endowed of inherent dignity by the virtue of being able to, in relation with others, constitute for himself or herself an identity and to be able to pursue the ends or goals elected and valuated from this identity.

This is a very traditional and even orthodox description of the concept of person. Though, as one can see, no link can be made between personhood and the possession of something as a human essence or nature, unless one admits that what is defined as human nature is nothing more than the traditional features of the concept of person and, therefore, a useless definition, at least as an objection to enhancement.

It must be noticed that the above description of the concept of person can be translated, for example, to the language of political theory, since they are intrinsic to Rawls's two moral powers, those two properties which between them are certainly sufficient for a creature to count as a moral person (WILSON, 2007). They are, first, a sense of justice: the capacity to understand, to apply, and to act from (and not merely in accordance with) the principles of political justice that specify the fair terms of social cooperation (RAWLS, 2001, p.18). Second is a capacity for a conception of the good: the capacity to have, revise, and rationally to pursue a conception of the good. Such a conception is an ordered family of final ends and aims which specifies a person's conception of what is of value in human life, or, alternatively, of what is regarded as a fully worthwhile life (RAWLS, 2001, p.19).

This is an important remark whereas the major flaw in the "shared human essence" reasoning on how we grant each other the status of persons lies in regarding such properties or the previous above described features of the concept of person not as sufficient or it's presence as a threshold, thus assuming that they vary by degree. Even after a threshold is reached, new variations would imply changes on the legal and moral status of those who present it in a higher or lower level, as if one could be more or less a person depending upon the extension or degree of hers and others moral powers (WILSON, 2007). Further, for bioconservatives, the enhancement enterprise would create differences in our moral status precisely because it would create differences of extension and degree by which we possess those moral powers.

A quite obvious objection to this bioconservative claim is the plain fact that, even without the appliance of biomedical procedures of human enhancement, highly educated people do hold or present more developed moral powers. Though, they clearly count only as a person and no more than a person, even when standing before an illiterate. Their moral, political and legal status regarding equality is absolutely the same.

The assumption that our equal moral status depends upon our shared nature, taken as an obstacle to procedures of human enhancement, is wrong simply because persons cannot be more or less ends in themselves. The concept of person is not gradual. Enhanced humans (i.e. post humans) will be no more than persons.

A brief incursion on the theoretical foundations of the concept of person has showed us that the fear of inequality among enhanced humans and those "left behind" is not properly expressed. It is expressed as a fear of recognition of different moral statuses to different categories or classes of humans that might arise from the use of enhancement procedures. It would be a concern about the possibility of denying a human the moral status of person, thus threatening our equal moral status. The argument assumes that enhancement procedures would drive a political community to a scenario where both Rousseau and Kant considerations on common people moral capacities would be disregarded.

As Wilson ascertains, the wrongness of this objection of political inequality follows logically:

1. Possession of the two moral powers is sufficient to count as a moral person.

2. The unenhanced will retain the two moral powers regardless of whether or not others become enhanced.

3. Therefore the unenhanced will be moral persons regardless of how enhanced or superior others may be.

4. The two moral powers function as threshold properties: amounts of them above the threshold amount are not significant for moral status.

5. Therefore even if enhanced persons have the two moral powers to a higher degree than unenhanced persons, this will not increase the moral status of the enhanced.

6. Therefore any amount of these features above the threshold amount does not render a person more than an equal.

7. Therefore all moral persons are moral equals, and Fukuyama is wrong to think that enhancement could threaten the equal moral status of all persons.(WILSON, 2007, p. 423-424)

It is clear that informing Fukuyama's objection on the human enhancement enterprise there is a fear of denial of the moral status of person to those "left behind", therefore threatening our equal moral status, which generated an appeal to the idea of human nature. His aim, at first, is to preserve something as a "detached value" (DWORKIN, 2000), which means that even if empirically those whose status of person was denied were better of in well being it would be morally wrong to do so.

Though, it doesn't seem really plausible that his concern is merely with formal equality, especially if it is considered that any biotechnological intervention on the human body to be considered an enhancement will, at least at first glance, be seen as an advantage or a positional good.

Thus, the real problem that lies under the debate between bioconservatives and enhancement procedures supporters is, in fact, if substantial inequalities derived from an enhancement enterprise should be accepted or if enhancement procedures itself should be permitted face the risk of such inequalities.

3. Substantial inequalities and human enhancement

Dworkin explains very well what really is at stake when talking about human enhancement:

> Our physical being – the brain and body that furnishes each person's material substrate – has long been the absolute paradigm of what is devastatingly important to us and, in initial condition, beyond our power to alter and therefore beyond the scope of our responsibility, either individual or collective" (DWORKIN, 2000, p.444).

When it is possible to change more and more of what was formerly understood as "given" the boundary between "chance" and "choice" tends to disappear, affecting our notion of shared responsibility for others whose choices – as opposed to chances or luck – differ from our own or differ from the norm. If enhancement procedures and, therefore, the outcome of such procedures, is a matter of choice, what responsibility would enhanced persons hold before those "left behind"?

Unlike the considerations regarding a "human nature" or "human essence" that grants us equal moral status, the idea that enhancement technologies are a threat would be based, in this conception, in the claim that any social cooperation system and the mutual recognition of individuals as persons depends on a so-called "natural lottery" regarding health, intelligence, strength, wealth, social class and skills. The fact that no one is responsible for its winnings or losses in this natural lottery and the indetermination of future results would be what allows the idea that all persons find themselves in a position of equality.

As one can see, this is clearly an attempt to treat derivative values as detached values, which means saying that enhancements are wrong "per se", quite apart from any bad consequences it will or may have for any person. However, the supposed strength of the claim is based in the assumption that the position of non-enhanced persons will be worse and, specially, that the distribution of such enunciated talents is, in fact, out of our horizon of choice.

The boundary between chance and choice is no doubt a crucial one when talking about ethics, morality or law. This boundary, however, presents itself in practical reason as a fact, not a normative judgment. To put it straight: chance is what we cannot control, not what we choose not to control. If we choose not to enhance ourselves, obviously, a choice has been made.

At this point it must be made clear that equality is a value, not a fact (DWORKIN, 2000). This implies that a distinction must be made between equality as a value and a concrete situation of equality among persons.

Equality, as a value, is a detached value and shall not be put at risk as such, and can be defined as an equal concern from a political community for the fate of all its members. This equal concern is understood, here, as Dworkin's version of equality of resources, which implies duties and distributive justice measures aiming a concrete situation of equality.

The present dislocation of the boundaries between chance and choice do not render obsolete equality as a detached value, neither deny its centrality in a moral or legal community. The real problem is that it will possibly create a great amount of substantial inequalities, considering the fact that enhancements are taken to be positional goods and might further increase the advantages of the rich over the poor.

Accordingly, the question to be made is: considering the consequences for the worse off, should we banish enhancement procedures?

One must observe that the problem, therefore, rests redefined as a problem of balancing derivative values and considering the likely impact of any such decision on individual interests.

In a situation like this, equality of resources demands, first, not trying to improve equality by leveling it down. The remedy for injustice is redistribution, not denial of benefits to some with no corresponding gain to others (DWORKIN, 2000).

Follow the above reasoning the conclusion that substantial inequalities generated by the use of enhancement procedures are not a plausible objection to the enhancement enterprise, especially if considered that such inequalities are not qualitatively different from inequalities already existing due to social class, educational level, wealth or access to positional goods in general.

4. Conclusion

After the above considerations, the debate between bioconservatives and bioenhancement supporters seems to be misplaced.

Bioconservatives appear to fell some deeper, less articulate revulsion to the idea of human enhancement and can express it only in heated and logically inappropriate language, like appealing to human nature. This reaction, of course, is due to the fact that the idea of human enhancement dislocates in a radical way the boundaries between chance and choice.

On the other side, bioenhancement supporters seem to "fall into the trap" directing its efforts in denying such think as a normative essentialism reflected from human nature and presenting claims of absence of empirical evidence of the undesirable consequences foreseen by bioconservatives.

The solution to the dilemma on banning or embracing an enhancement enterprise towards a post human future relies in admitting that enhancements put at stake derivative values, not detached ones. These derivative values must be weighted considering the impacts of the decision on particular interests regarding a detached value of equality of resources.

Departing from this reasoning, no reasonable claim stands against the idea of society embracing the enhancement enterprise towards a posthuman stage, which means, according to Buchanan (2011):

a)Allowing considerable freedom to individuals and organizations to develop and use enhancement technologies;

b)Directing resources to research on enhancement;

c)Creating a public debate on risks and benefits of such technologies;

d)Developing effective and morally sensitive policies and institutions for coping with the challenges of enhancement, mainly, risks and substantial inequalities that may arise.

In this hypothetical scenario, equality as a detached value remains preserved, whatever the changes one performs on his/her biological make-up.

A paradigm for Law

Nuria López[1]

Abstract: Is there a paradigm in Law? A real rupture in the way we know and applied Law in time? This article assumes an interpretation of two notes made by Thomas Kuhn about the absence of paradigms in Law in consequence of the difficult in develop science internal coherence (systemic self-reference) simultaneously with the attendance of social expectations (systemic external-references). Hence, analyze the structure of the references taken for the validity of law in the main thesis of Theory of Law. It is an important relation that grew with after the II World War, as the social claims demanded an observance of the hetero-references, such as human rights and justice, despite of the difficulty in adequate this references to the positivist methodology. But there is a right interpretation to be discovered as an object to be seen? Post-modern science philosophy broke the paradigm of subject, observer/ object relation leading the idea of an object to a construction of subject´s interpretation. It demands a reformulation of Law´s Hermeneutics to handle with this philosophic complexity: the subject as a linguistic composition (with multiple references) that interprets the self-references of Law and the external-references as he can. In other words, the references in Law´s Hermeneutics are inside the subject, and it is such a rupture with the past structures that it is possible to demonstrate a real paradigm-shift in Law.

Keywords: Hermeneutic; Philosophy; Paradigm.

Introduction

In Structure of scientific revolutions Thomas Kuhn makes two relevant observations for Law. The first one points out that as social Science maybe Law have not acquired yet a paradigm. The second one, that as Science applied Law has as raison de être attending a social demand (Kuhn, 1996, p. 19) and this prevailed over attend the severity of Science.

Indeed, many of the thesis that searched for internal severity in Law, borrowing methods and paradigms from other fields in Science, found somewhere the social need Law must attend to (because it only exists to attend it). The main thesis about legal interpretation dealed differently with this issue. Kuhn´s observation have been confirmed in the last fifty years: the concern for a scientific method (self-reference) always stumbles in social needs (hetero-references).This nomenclature (self and hetero references) is ordinary in System Theories since Bertalanffy (2009), but here is used in a more particular meaning: the legal interpretation, as Marcelo Neves has done (2008 and 2013).

On the other way, the critics to the concern with the scientific severity and the validation of legal answer became the central issue in legal controversy in the last fifty years. It was strained to the post-II World War and the need to attend the hetero-references that took old pre-constitutional formulas as the Reason of the People, by Windscheid [1878], the Will of Nation, by Puchta [1854] or the Spirit of the People, by Savigny [1814], recycled as the Will of Constitution [1959], by Hesse (1991), as jusnaturalist concepts, the attending to an specific Justice Theory (Dworkin, 1978), or the normatization of Fundamental Rights (Alexy, 2008).

The urgency of include the hetero-references in legal interpretation, however, did not move away the concern with a scientific method to legal interpretation, even with the difficult implicit in establish a methodology able to verify the validity of references with so wide semantic charge. This difficult forced a revision of what we understood for method in Law (Barroso, 2011), and, many times, in the absence of a method (Ávila, 2009), made believe that there was no methodology in Law, while insisted that could settle with an anything goes (Silva, 2007, p.139) in Law, in reference to Feyarabend in Against the method (2011).

From the start point of Kuhn, this paper analyzes the structures of the main thesis of legal interpretation, searching for traces of paradigmatic turns. After the definition of paradigm in which this paper is based, it analyze the philosophical grounds of self-reference thesis from the viewpoint of the major self-reference thesis – the Kelsenian. In this matter, even Kelsen recognize legal norms as social demands, or in other words, he recognizes the raison d´être of Law as attend social demands. This question gets more relevant after the II-World War.

Validity criteria as fundamental rights, will of Constitution, and Justice Theory adopted by the positive law were widely applied in the last decades, while it claimed also for a methodological stringed, an internal systemic coherence. Some works tried to arrange the hetero-references in procedures or application formulas. As will be demonstrated, the efforts in this direction at some point had to admit it application for different individuals would lead to different results, what took us to the problem of the subject. In other words, the modern effort to systematize (here meaning mechanize) legal interpretation lead to the reevaluation of the subject in Legal Hermeneutics. The adoption of the subject post-linguistic-pragmatic turn, singularized in his own pre-comprehension and so, in his interpretation of legal norms, gave origin to another systemic model – dynamic and complex – in which the subject is in a communicative context, linguistically structured.

The hypothesis of this paper is that Kuhn´s dichotomy could be overcome by the adoption of the subject as draw for the post-linguistic-pragmatic turn, since both self and hetero-references are present in the subject´s composition and could be in some level shared for other subjects. This paper intend to draw the hermeneutics structures in order to demonstrate that the change in the philosophical concept of subject, brought by the linguistic-pragmatic turn, overcame the obstacle to an establishment of a paradigm in Law.

1. The possibility of a paradigm in Law

Kuhn saves the word paradigm for the natural sciences. Nevertheless, for many times in Law this word was used in a similar sense, as the example of Boaventura (2008); Morin (2010); Touraine (2006); or the Brazilians Reale (1994), and more recently, Streck (2004).

Although Kuhn gives the word paradigm more than one meaning in his Structure of Scientific Revolutions (1996), broadly he determines it as a theory that attends better or more precisely the answers given or the lack of answers of the last paradigm. And, despite there is no definition of paradigm, it counts with some specific functional characteristics: it exists in a historical context, orient researches, is wide, and shared by scientists (Manochhi, 2006, p. 73).

In this way, it is possible to say that Law does counts with theories that tried to solve open questions or questions treated with poor precision for previous theories, fulfilling the paradigmatic functions described by Kuhn. These theories deal with knowing legal norms and applying them to situations. The elaboration of a scientific paradigm on how we know legal norms and how we should apply them imposed the attending to other sciences´ methodological claims (which paradigms were borrowed), in order to maintain formal correction, validity in reference to its own methods, and also attend the social needs, so the results obtained for Law could be considered valid.

Ergo, the paradigmatic possibilities in Law are in the propositions concerning self and hetero references in legal interpretation. The history of legal hermeneutic moves between them, until the attempts of conciliation (or overcome).

2. Self-reference

2.1 The philosophical grounds of self-reference in the legal system

The so-called objective theories of legal interpretation, for example the thesis by Binding, Wach and Kohler [1885-1886], defended the exteriorization of the reason underlying in law, the release the empirical isolation of individual legal norms and, by the reconduction to a superior principle or to a general concept, dematerialize them, somehow spiritualizing the positive (Larenz, 2010, p.53).

Thereby, the legal norm meaning is its objective meaning, independent of the meaning the legislative could have given to it, such as in the Historical School of Savigny. The meaning given to a legal norm has been detached, since Savigny, and then Puchta, whom established a semantic pyramid. In its apex is the legal text which meaning could be taken from deduction, influenced by Christian Wolff´s rationalism (1679- 1754) (Larenz, 2010, p.39).

So, if we could see the references points of legal interpretation as points in a plan and the path from the subject to what he refers to as a vector, we will that the Kelsen´s Pure Theory [1934] reinforced the existent vectors – preannounced to positivist philosophical basis.

From the viewpoint of theories of objective interpretation the legal norm acquires its own rationality, an objective meaning that could not be missed with the ones at the time of its elaboration. Law should then find its objective meaning, the real meaning of legal norm, to apply it to the facts, given in the real world.

In this sense, subject refers to these two points, fact and norm, both given in the world and related between each other by subsumption logic. Furthermore, there is also a third vector, which refers to the formal validity of the legal norm (self-reference), in order to know if the legal norm is valid according to a superior norm, until the last reference point, that is a logical point, assumed in analogy with Kant´s theory of knowledge (Kelsen, 1998, p.225-226). It is Kelsen´s Grundnorm, defined by him as a transcendental logical point. The transcendental logic is defined by him as "a Science that specifies the origin, the extension and the objective value of these knowledge (...)" and could be distinguished from general logic for referring exclusive to a priori knowledge (Kant, 2007, p. 49).

2.2 The legal norm as social demand: the paradox in Kelsen

On the other hand, Kelsen says that "a norm (...) to be interpreted as a legal norm has to institute a coactive act or have substantial linking as legal norm" – is saying, he relates the legal norm to its original sense of demand. This paradox already existed in Kant´s theory of knowledge and was reproduced in Kelsen. The comparison is made by Larenz, for whom is not possible to conceive Kant´s "thing itself" without assume as "something" thinkable in the same way that is not possible to understand Kelsen´s "should be" without assume its ethical, original, sense of demand (Larenz, 2010, p. 97).

This paradox caused the after recognition (in the end of the 2nd edition of Pure Theory) of legal interpretation as a political act, even if such influences are out of Law´s object of research. Ergo, legal norm as a demand, in its coactive sense is recognized and pushed away from Science´s borderline, but remains present as original sense.

2.3 The relevance of Kelsen´s paradox in the Post-II World War: the need to attend the social claim

Despite the legal positivization of some specific liberal fundamental rights in the first half of XX century, as the classic examples of Mexico (1917) and Weimar (1919), just in the post-II WW, in the second half of the century this need became urgent. As legal positivism were unable to deal with the moral questions the authoritarian regimes imposed to their population it brought back questions about subjective rights and the importance of a approximation between Law and Moral (Piovesan, 2002, p.131-132).

According to Mario Losano, the first German jurist to propose this "resumption" was Radbruch, who defended in 1947 a turn back to jus naturalism, in the article Die Erneuerung des Rechts, "Die Wandlung". In the years that followed this publication many German jurists subscribed this proposal, even with different grounds, since some of them were from neothomist catholic backgrounds (Losano, 2010, p.240). Still, this resumption was not full. Radbruch still used some categories accepted before and though for concrete systems (Losano, 2010, p.241).

The guarantee of fundamental rights should be incorporated to the legal system without disruption the positivist formal categories. Both of them should be combined in what would be the overcome of jus naturalist and jus positivist thesis.

Thus, some historical demands of both thesis were presents: the approximation with Moral should not depend on metaphysical categories and the recognized possibility of legal interpretation should not be arbitrary (Barroso, 2009, p.54). But these values are hard to fit in a positivist system. And it is even harder to elaborate a methodology able to deal with sensitive issues. These values, came from jusnaturalism had several philosophical grounds (as in Germany, with Radbuch), and could be defined in several different ways, always without a well delimitated contented. The positivist method of subsumption was not able to handle the terminological dimension of the fundamental rights.

3. Hetero-reference

The subject interpret in order to apply the norm with reference in positive law (self-reference), but there is also an hetero-reference, a claim, a social demand, that comes out as a stationary point to which the interpretation must be directed. The direction to an hetero-reference varies in the thesis and guarantee that the consequences of decision making (the interpretation of the norm) brings coherence to the system – and this is the common feature of the theories of legal argumentation (Magalhães, 2002, p. 148-149). In general, theories of legal argumentation have been based in three hetero-references, which become relevant for its wide acceptation. There are: the fundamental rights (Alexy, 2008); the will of Constitution (Hesse, 1991); and the Theory of Justice adopted by the positive law (Dworkin, 1978). In the Brazilian National Congress of CONPEDI (2012), Alexy, Hesse and Dworkin were the 8th; 22th and 11th most cited authors of the whole Congress.

3.1 The fundamental rights

Alexy, in his Theory of Fundamental Rights[1986] establishes a connection between semantic and validity, pointing that each theory, to tell that something is valid has to have something from this proposition is possible, and, for that, the most adequate is the norm in its semantic meaning (Alexy, 2008, p.60-62). In other words, the semantic content is criteria of validity for legal interpretation. The semantic content of rules and principles are reasons for legal interpretation (Alexy, 2008, p.107).

The application of legal norm claims for axiological arguments and normative arguments. And despite its relevance they are not in Alexy´s concept of legal norm (2008, p.82). He chooses for the maintenance of the positivist concept of norm, opposing to theories such as Friedrich Müller´s (Alexy, 2008, p.76-82), but admit the use of axiological elements in legal interpretation.

This distinction is relevant for Alexy´s whole theory and particularly in the issue that an argument extra-normative could serve as criteria for the norm validity – but could not be mistake by it. Alexy says that a criteria of something is different then an element of something (2008, p.84).

So, there is the maintenance of the subject with the Kantian model. There is the maintenance of legal norm with the positivist model. But, there is there cognition of extra-normative elements in legal interpretation. This recognition caused objections about discretion and intuitionism. However, Alexy refused what he called "philosophical objections" saying that we get a less vulnerable valorative theory when we presuppose the possible values (as well as the validity criteria) are not a matter of evidence, but a matter of fundamentation (Alexy, 2008, p.157).

The fundamental rights norms, such as the other ones, could not be mistaken by the reasons that sustained them, but in their application, should be optimized, according to some criteria, that could also point formulas (algorithms) to obtain an answer.

3.2 Will of Constitution

The concept of Constitution normative power (die Normative Kraft der Verfassung) is considered today a theoretical reference for the "new constitutional interpretation"(Barroso, 2009, p.57), due to the recognition of Rule of Law and its tension with reality (Faktizität). Developed by Konrad Hesse [1959], it replaces the role of Constitution from a simple paper, in Works as Lassalle´s and Jellinek´s, to sustain its normative Power in the State´s every-day life (Hesse, 1991, p.12) – and there is power as the constitutional interpretation expresses the will of Constitution contained in the text. Hence, we should interpret according to the will of Constitution in other to give power to the Constitution. There is a tautological reasoning here: the interpretation according to the will of Constitution gives power to the Constitution and the power of Constitution is in the will of Constitution.

Furthermore, the interpretation should be done according to the principle of norm´s optimal concretion (Gebotoptimaler Verwirklichung der Norm), in order to relate the constitutional text to the events of life. The interpretation that optimizes the concretion of the norm should prevail (Hesse, 1991, p.23). Hesse proposes a constructive interpretation of the constitutional norm, so it can be optimally concretized into its finality (telos) (Hesse, 1991, p. 23). Bringing this constructive feature to legal interpretation perhaps had been here the biggest advance, since the concept of will of Constitution was not new at all. It leads us back to similar expressions that took place in the process of Germany´s unification, such as Reason of the People, by Windscheid [1878], the Will of the Nation, by Puchta [1854] or still the Spirit of the People, by Savigny [1814].

Thus, when talking about advances (and retrospectively we could might say this) the construction of legal norm for the interpreter to obtain a social finality (goal) changed the hermeneutic structure. The constitutional normal claims for effectiveness (Geltungsanspruch) in social life (Hesse, 1991, p.14-15). This effectiveness will be realized always that its contend point to the same direction that "prevailing tendencies of your time", in such a way that its application will be a need (Hesse, 1991, p.18) as predicted by Kuhn.

Moreover, if the Constitution differs from the "prevailing tendencies of your time" it could still be transformed into active power. In other words, the constitutional norm could be realized because are presents not just the will of power (Wille zur Macht), but also the Will of Constitution (Wille zur Verfassung) (Hesse, 1991, p.19). Structurally, Hesse´s theory is a dynamic system in time, since the prevailing tendencies are in function of its time of application – and this is extremely relevant.

Still about the structure, the will of Constitution is a reference point to legal argumentation, an interpretative vector, as many actually say. But is worth notice that is an empty point, as it does not refer to any specific point and it is able to (equally) justify absolutely different interpretations.

We intend to demonstrate this way that Will of Constitution does not select any element to legal interpretation: it is able to include and exclude elements from legal text, amplifying it or defeating it, all rhetorically justified by the Will of Constitution.

3.3 The Legal Theory adopted by the positive law

Dworkin´s critic is also derived from a liberal tradition, but comes back the "old idea of individual human rights", even that this idea does not presupposes any metaphysical entity (as the collective will or the national spirit). Dworkin´s thesis is derived from utilitarianism philosophy. He comprehends Bentham and Mill as the philosophical basis of his own work. Both of them are philosophical options able to handle the raison d'être of Law, determining it under utilitarianism.

Besides, Dworkin keeps subsumption as the adopted methodology for most of the cases, the easier cases, that would not bring any hermeneutic difficulties. And, for deal specifically with the hard cases (the ones that could not be solved by the method of subsumption, because they are involved with the old idea of individual human rights to be compatibilized with the positive law) he describes another method. So, there is actually the maintenance – and not a disruption – with positivist hermeneutic structure. Dworkin´s theory refers to the specific question of compatibility of individual human rights with positivist method of subsumption.

His thesis defends an objective amplification of the concept of norm, saying an individual has legal rights even if they are not assured by an express rule, express decisions or legal practice. The hypothesis of existence of a legal right despite the absence of a internal positive reference is considered by Dworkin a hard case.

In such cases, Dworkin claim the titularity of the right is in the social need, in the *raison d'êtr*e of Law. These are questions of morality or politics. The case is hard because are absent the methodological references to its solution. Facing this question did not make Dworkin surrender the maintenance of a detail methodological need able to lead to a scientific (right) answer. He supposes, even after recognize the objective amplification of the concept of norm, that there is just one right answer in complex questions about law and political morality (1978, p.279).

So, with his method he intends to be able to determine this right answer (scientifically valid) in the resolution of hard cases. Critics, such as Hart, pointed out that does not exist such thing as a "right answer" in questions about politics and morality, but many possible right answers. Other critics went further and said that there are not even some right answers, but just answers. Dworkin replies all of them in the 1978 Edition with an example. He supposes that to one of his philosopher critics, who claim that is not a right answer, be suggested to go to Law School and then occupy the place of a judge. They would have to judge cases all day long. Philosophically, said Dworkin, there might not be a right answer, but in the end of the day they still would have to decide for one of them. The need for jurisdiction is a social need that Dworkin recognizes. There is no escape from it. From such recognition, his theory proposes a method that intends to reduce judicial discretion.

The (scientific) validity of Dworkin´s right answer is verified with the reference given by the theory of law that best justifies settled law. For him "a proposition of law may be asserted as true if it is more consistent with the theory of law that best justifies settled law than the contrary proposition of law" (1978, p.283).

Moreover, Dworkin presupposes two different subjects-interprets who knows equally the facts and the legal norms, and are equally reasonable. Still, they could get to different answers in the same hard case. This question implies a Theory of Science puzzle described by Edgar Morin as one of the complexity paradigms. It is the relation between observer (subject) and the object (observed). Embracing complexity is also comprehending the introduction of the subject as a singular, social, cultural and historical placed data in every observation he does (Morin, 2010, p.333). Thereby, both subjects, that are not equal as presupposed by Dworkin, could have different opinions about what might be the Theory of Law adopted by the positive law. In other words, they would disagree about the reference that validates legal interpretation of a specific case.

In summary, in Dworkin´s work we found the enlargement of the objective concept of legal norm, in order to recognize rights that are not expressed in the positive system; the (judicial) answer as a social need; the right answer as a claim for methodology able to decrease judicial discretion; the reference for legal interpretation in Philosophy of Law; and the maintenance of the Kantian subject, transcendental, who knows equally the facts and the norms, and is always equally reasonable.

4. The linguistic-pragmatic turn brings another subject

Even with the new questions raised by the enlargement of the concept of legal norm, in order to embrace the social claim for fundamental rights did not change the perspective about the subject. For this reason, is possible to see only the change of one element of the structure (the legal norm) and quantitative and qualitative changes of references of validity. But then came the time for the change in the model of subject.

The subject issue had relevant development not only in theories such as Häberle, that recognizes several legitimate interprets of the Constitution (a quantitative change), but also a qualitative change, with the linguistic-pragmatic turn, that comprehend the subject in his own singularity. In this matter, Legal Philosophy started to deal with more and more complex subjects interpreting (also complex) legal cases.

As the so-called linguistic-pragmatic turn in Philosophy reached Philosophy and Theory of Law to change the structure of legal interpretation we could settle here a paradigmatic shift. But we still have to demonstrate how this structure was changed. With no intention of limit several possible analysis, this paper will work with Heidegger philosophy as an example of such change.

4.1. The subject as start point and destiny of all references

In Heidegger´s work the subject interpret from his own previous elements of comprehension [Vorhabe] (2012, p. 425; 427), in a way that "the perceive becomes determine" [Auf dem Bodem dieses Auslegens im weitesten Sinne wird das Vernehmen zum Bestimmen.] (2012, p. 192-193) and "the perceived and determined could be expressed in propositions and, as so enunciated, retained and preserved" (2012, p. 193). Each moment the interpretation founds itself in a previous have [Vorhabe]. This means that "being is not anymore, as it were in the classic ontology, interpreted as pure permanent presence, but as an advent, as coming to an encounter, as interpellation, that is given to men each time differently" (Oliveira, 2006, 219).

Hence, there is the rupture of the modern science´s dichotomy subject-object, since the subject interprets according to his own previous elements of comprehension and the interpretation gives itself, it will be different for each subject and even for the same subject in different moments, as his own elements change in time. Thus, hetero-referent and self-referent are in the subject. In this context, legal norm is constructed by the interpret in a given moment (Oliveira, 2006, p.219).

Some of the results of this new structure are the impossibility of a right answer in legal interpretation; the impossibility of divide interpretation in almost algorithm methods (and also think about criteria for apply criteria); withdraw analysis about objective enlargement, as well as the later discussions about limit a semantic content of the norms. It demonstrates, philosophically, that the subject is interpret and that his interpretation is result of a complex of references, more complex than the modern science could admit (Pugliesi, 2009, p.179).

5. The possibilities in the game

In summary, the singularities of the subjects because of their unique constitutions make possible and at the same time limited what they know and what they communicate. Clearly, there are post-Heideggerian models that allow us new analysis and open new fields of research. The one we choose to use integrates concepts of consciousness and language to elaborate a set of semantic content always in change (Pugliesi, 2009).

Considering that the subject could be comprehended as a semantic set by which he knows things and decide his actions (including the interpretation of a legal case), Pugliesi establishes that "the individual acts by the rules of the game and by his own knowledge of the circumstances, he corrects his action and tries to confer its effects on the system (subset of the world, considered as his semantic atmosphere and its pollution) and the environment, the totality of possible meanings for him, and then, as it were, retroactive, that is, re-feed his own repertoire of information and redo, when possible, the decision preliminarily assumed, recomposing his theory." (Pugliesi, 2009, p. 185-186).

The possibilities of communication in the linguistic game are detailed described (Pugliesi, 2009, p.168-169) in such a way that if there are common elements in the set of elements (pre-interpretative) between two subjects, will be possibility of communication. The possibilities of communication are the ones into the intersection between the semantic sets. These possibilities could be described as minimal or maximal, both mathematical expressions used in set theory and here matter to refer if there are less or more elements in the intersection. A minimal relation between elements from both sets means that there is no communication between them. A maximal relation between elements of two different sets means there is absolute communication between them. From these categories we are able to say that if there is communication (in any given social relation) it happens in a space between minimal and maximal.

The possibilities of these sets are limited by plenty of meanings socially constructed.

Therefore, what a subject communicate most of the times will be understood partially and differently from what he meant, because it will be understood from the other subject´s semantic set. The things that were communicated will mean something else for who receive the message communicated, after all he had others life´s experience, he apprehend different meanings, he learnt (and that´s a very important point – the learning) different things (Pugliesi, 2009, p.177). And he will act based on what he planned, and he planned based on what he could possibly understood from all these. The semantic set we have been working with is a (in)constant system of learning. An ever-changing set, described with absolute detail in Pugliesi (2014).

In summary, we have two (or more) ever-changing (from learning) semantic sets trying to communicate in some level. Communicate is an ordinary and hard thing to do. The sender does as he could (with his semantic set) and the receiver understood as he could (with his semantic set). Communication just as life, as the Brazilian poet Vinicius de Moraes said, is the art of agreement [encontro], although there are so many disagreements [desencontros] in life. And that is why social relations are potentially conflictive.

6. What comes next?

In this context, Law is a place where are established the rule which reduce complex conflicts to structured (known) situations, so they can be understood as similar others and maintained the status quo (Pugliesi, 2009, p.173). The legal norms are limits to the subject´s possibilities of actions, in such a way that are maintained the power structure (that establishes the rules) and the set of optimum global politics (Pugliesi, 2009, p.217). And every application of a legal norm could be considered as a move in a game discursively structured, according to the rule of this game and the previous moves (Schuartz, 2005, p.34).

The change of the subject´s model from the Kantian to the post-linguistic-pragmatic one will lead us to a Hermeneutics centered inside each one of the subjects in a society. Since every subject is different from the other, each one of them have different semantic sets and will comprehend everything (situations, legal norms etc.) differently.

It is also important to say that subjects occupy different places in the game. Some of them are lobbyists, others are Congresists, or judges, or business men, and so on. In other words, some are in a place to decide what the interpretation of legal norms is and will confront others with their interpretation. The Constitution (or any other legal norm) is not what the Supreme Court say it is, because there is no ultimate true about interpretation. A Court´s position is just a position (one of many possible positions) in a game of power, to see which the limits of the structure we mentioned above are. In other words, there are many possible interpretations of a legal norm coming from every citizen - and they may be organized in civil groups; or perhaps they are a part of a community and socially control the effectiveness of law based in their own understanding. Actually, there is brand new research about Compliance to Law and Effectiveness of the Rule of Law in Brazil (Cunha, Oliveira and Ramos, 2013), demonstrating statistically the relevance of this social control for Law. The vectors of power are not restricted to the State´s authorities such as the Judiciary, the Legislative, the civil (organized) groups of pressure and so on. The network composed for vectors of power may be more complex as we used to think.

This game of power brings the understanding of our Democratic States as a game of resilience in a complex field of power between all the subjects involved. There are also new research about the resilience in this complex system in Brazil, as the excellent example of Resiliência constitucional: compromisso maximizador, consensualismo politico e desenvolvimento gradual [Constitutional Resilience: maximizer compromise, political consensualismo and gradual development] (Drimoulis et al, 2013). Just connected with the legal interpretation limits designing the rules of the game for improve democracy in Brazil is Direito e cooperação nos jogos institucionais [Law and cooperation in institutional games] (López, 2014). And developed from Jenna Bednar´s design of resilience, there is an application of her research in Brazilian cases in Conjectura sistêmica na federação resiliente [Systemic conjecture in the resilient Federation] (Pugliesi, Del Monaco, López, 2014).

None of these complex scenes could be pictured and detailed studied with the maintenance of the modern conception of methodology (always searching for criteria that would lead the interpretation to a "right answer") and the maintenance of the Kantian model of subject (always presupposing a transcendental subject). For what comes next, such as the researches mentioned above, is indispensable a new comprehension of methodology and its limits: exactly the singularity of the subject, with his own ever-changing semantic set, will know things (and legal norms) in his own way, with his own possibilities. All the criteria (self and hetero references) are actually inside the subject, are also part of his semantic set; and will be used to plan the subject´s moves in the game. It demonstrates a clearly change of structure in legal interpretation – from outside (legal text, society, jusnaturalism etc) to inside the subject. Finally, leading law to the most recent theory of science.

Conclusion

Since the structure of legal interpretation suffered a deep change with post-linguistic-pragmatic turn, it allows us to say that there was a real rupture in the way we know and applied Law in time. All the criteria (self and hetero references) are now inside the subject, in his semantic set. And the application of legal norms happens in a discursively structured context, in which communication could be somewhere between minimal and maximal. Also his actions could be analyzed in time, included by him, that is always learning with them. Therefore, the singularities of subjects are considered, and so, the impossibility of a methodology for applying legal norms. Instead, we have a more complex scene involving the interaction of all subjects, such as in a game, where Law play the role of (trying) to draw limits in this resilient field. This new structure surely overcome Kuhn´s dichotomy and could be considered a real paradigmatic point in Law.

On fallacies and fundamentals of legal argumentation

André Ferreira Leite de Paula

Abstract: In this paper I will refer some aspects of contemporary Fallacy Theory which, so far as I can see, weren't object of investigations within the framework of Legal Argumentation Theory until now. My considerations are related not directly to specific fallacies, but to the idea of fallacies at all and to contributions that can be made to the fundaments of Legal Argumentation from the perspective of new approaches on fallacies which were developed within Informal Logic in the last decades.

Keywords: Fallacy, Legal Argumentation, Formal Logic

Legal writings on fallacies proceed usually in the same way as most books on Formal Logic: fallacies are presented, exemplified and classified in formal and informal ones. Behind this standard treatment there is no theory of fallacies at all, but just a resumption of Aristotle's fallacies list with some contemporary additions and a few other classifications. Curiously there is normally in logic books no thematic connection between the fallacy approach – which is normally treated in an independent chapter – and the other chapters of the same book, where profound analysis in Formal Logic are made. Fallacy studies don't seem to have benefited from the developments of formal logic in the last centuries. Instead, they survived through more than two millenniums – since Aristotle's Sophistical Refutations and throughout Whately, Mill, Morgan, Nicole and others – with approximately the same treatment. This has begun to change only in the second half of the twentieth century with Hamblin's book Fallacies (1970), which has inspired many other Logicians to take part on the new debate.[1] After this revival of Fallacy

[1] Hamblin, Fallacies, 1970. Other representative works are: Walton, A Pragmatic Theory of Fallacy, 1995 and Hansen/Pinto, Falalcies, 1995.

Theory, there has been a reception of the debate within Legal Argumentation Theory as well.[2] I would like to make a contribution about the fundamental relation between fallacies in general and Legal Argumentation Theory.

First of all I would like to clarify the reason why studies on Fallacies should be interesting to Jurists at all. Firstly, because Jurists work with arguments. According to the most traditional definition of fallacies, fallacies are arguments that seem to be valid, but are not so.[3] Therewith we have a first sign of relevance, because one of the most important tasks of Legal Argumentation Theories is the development of normative standards of rational argumentation.[4]

Secondly, fallacies are in fact used in legal argumentations as argumentative tactics, either in a subtle way to escape from difficult questions or explicitly as objections against argumentations. Arguments ad hominem, ad absurdum etc. are ubiquitous in legal discussions.[5]

Thirdly, a contemporary comprehension of Logic and fallacies is required to evaluate the justification of judicial decisions. Because of the direct relation between fallacies and Logic, this can be specially relevant in legal systems like the German system, where judgments can be set aside in virtue of violation of reasoning principles (Denkgesetze).[6]

Fourthly – and more important for my purposes – studies on fallacies give rise to think about the fundaments of rational argumentation. Fallacies are complex arguments. In order to evaluate them we need to consider many disciplines, that complete each other, but that are as well partially antithetical. These disciplines are at least: Formal Logic, Rhetoric and Argumentation Theory. There are many relations between these three disciplines. A first approximation could be: Formal Logic has to do exclusively with the form of arguments; it evaluates the correctness of argumentations according to the principle of truth transfer (that means, a conclusion is logic correct if and only if it maintains the truth of the premises according to some inference rules). Although each argument has a logical form, or better, many logical forms,[7] we know that the linguistic way how an argument is posed influences its ableness to convince. That's the domain of Rhetoric. Rhetoric concentrates its efforts on the real situation where argumentation occurs, namely between concrete speakers, about a concrete subject and, in Law, within a institutional framework – the judicial process. In one word, Rhetoric is "the practice and theory of persuasiveness in discourses".[8] Theory of Legal Argumentation concerns persuasiveness as well, although a material, objective correctness of argumentations. It is true, that an ideal argumentation does not exist; that every argumentation about practical subjects is a concrete one, with all its "imperfections" (lack of time and of information, stylistic rhetorical figures, emotional appeal, etc.). But it is also true that there is a categorical difference between argumentation approaches on fallacies and rhetorical ones. This difference can be approximately described on the basis of Stuart Mills differentiation between "intellectual sources" (conscious and reflected factors) and "moral sources" (psychological factors) of erroneous opinions.[9] Recently there has been more common to refer to the perspective of the participant or internal perspective – which is the perspective of Legal Argumentation Theories – and to the perspective of the observer or external perspective – which is, as I mean, the perspective of most rhetorical considerations.[10] These differences can be illustrated as follows: let us imagine a situation in which one speaker wants to convince the other one about the accordance of his position to the legal system. From a rhetorical point of view this is a concrete situation where the speaker has to formulate his arguments in a persuasive form in order to get approval of his position. Legal Argumentation Theory regards the same situation from a material point of view and asks materially what arguments have to be brought

[7] There is not only one Formal Logic, but a great multiplicity of formal logical systems according to what is considered form and what is considered content of a sentence.

[10] There are a lot of opposite concepts that, applied to the legal argumentation Theory, designate approximately the same idea: context of discovery vs. context of justification, perspective of the observer vs. perspective of the participant. In the German context: Herstellung vs. Darstellung der Entscheidung, Rechtsfindung vs. Rechtfertigung.

in order to justify a claim. Argumentation Theory has more to do – but not exclusively – with the semantics of the discourse, whereas Rhetoric works especially on a pragmatic level of discourse.

Discussions about some interesting fallacies like petitio principii, ignoratio elenchi and straw man have themselves a value for a critical evaluation of argumentations. Their value goes even beyond the more practical utility of taking fallacy patterns into account just in order to avoid them and to identify them when committed by others. If we leave approaches on specific fallacies for a while and start to ask more general questions about fallacies, we do not do anymore precisely Fallacy Theory, but more generally Argumentation Theory. If we add material components extracted from the legal system and justice considerations, we do Legal Argumentation Theory.

What can studies on fallacies say us about rational argumentation? They provide instruments to analyze syntactic, semantic and pragmatic aspects of the discourse in order to maintain objectivity (that is, in order to maintain an argumentation ad rem - German [Sachlichkeit]). Which means in Law, an argumentation with orientation to the legal system. For this purpose an honest collision of contradictory arguments is necessary to permit argumentative innovation and progress, which can be achieved through proscription of ad hominem, straw man and petitio principii fallacies.

If it is permitted in legal practical argumentation to use strategies like the straw man fallacy in order not to have to confront strong arguments, then we would fall into a legal discourse, where it is permitted to produce plausibility through mere linguistic strategies. The consequence would be a detachment of the legal discourse from the semantics of positive law. The participants would be permitted to decide a case according to the most persuasive argument, even if it is not sustainable in regard to the positive law. That seems to be the consequence of some rhetorical approaches in the last decades, that defend the use of rhetorical figures to fabricate plausibility and persuasiveness instead of orientation to positive Law. One example of a rhetorical approach in this sense is v. Schlieffen's Legal Rhetoric,[11] that pretends to provide the jurist with a "competence without theory", starting from the premise that the aspiration for justice leads us to another dimension, that could not be achieved with rational means.

[11] Rhetorisches Seismogramm – eine neue Methode in der Rechtswissenschaft, pp. 231-237 and Recht rhetorisch gesehen, pp. 1-7.

So it seems reasonable to require from the participants in legal discourses the avoidance of fallacies, even though this is not without problems in practice. To elucidate this, we can take a look at specific problems of Fallacy Theory. According to the traditional treatment of fallacy – as already stated – a fallacious argument is one that seems to be valid but is not so.[12] Fallacies are normally classified in formal and informal. Formal fallacies are wrong conclusions that violate the rules of Formal Logic. Informal fallacies are the ones, that violate other principles of correct reasoning.[13] So we find in the most logic books traditionally a list of fallacies more of less as the following:

Formal fallacies:

(1) affirming the consequent: conversion of a non convertible consequence: "if Bacon wrote Hamlet, then Bacon was a great writer. Bacon was a great writer. Therefore Bacon wrote Hamlet"[14]

(2) equivocation: syllogism with four terms: "Since he said he would go to Paris if he won a prize in the sweepstakes, I infer that he did win a prize, for he has gone to Paris"[15]

(3) other violations of syllogistic rules[16]

Informal fallacies:

(1) argument ad hominem:

- abusive ad hominem: direct personal attack; doubting the expertise, intelligence or good faith of the other party;[17]

- circumstantial ad hominem: indirect personal attack; casting suspicion on the other party's moves;[18]

- tu quoque ad hominem: pointing out an inconsistency between the other party's ideas and her personal attitude: a sportsman, when accused of barbarity in sacrificing unoffending hares or trout to his amusement replies: "why do you feed on the flesh of animals?"[19]

(2) ad verecundiam: appeal to authority

(3) complex question: "have you stopped beating your wife?"

- petitio principii: begging the question. "Every effect has a cause, otherwise it wouldn't be an effect"; "this doctrine is an heresy; therefore it has to be abandoned"[20]

(5) straw man: misrepresentation of the opponent's position in order to refute it more easily. Example: Hans is committed to a policy that protects the environment. Mark replies: "the extreme high costs that would be necessary to make of our planet a paradise on Earth would be catastrophic for industrialized countries like the US"[21]

(6) ignoratio elenchi: misconception of refutation, irrelevant argumentation.

After this short presentation of the most common fallacies it is clear that every study on fallacies has to take account on a great number of different issues: Fallacies are not just wrong conclusions; they can be also questions (complex question) or just irrelevant arguments (ignoratio elenchi). That issues are far beyond the jurisdiction of Formal Logic and include pragmatic considerations. The fact that most logic treatises on fallacies had not given a specific theoretical account of fallacies and the fact that all this kind of questions are treated under the single title "fallacies" has led Hintikka to refer to this problematic as the "fallacy of fallacies". As he says, „they [fallacies] are not mistaken inferences, not because they are not mistaken, but because they need not be inferences, not even purported ones".[22] The current state of the art in Informal Logic like presents us a mitigation of the traditional concept of fallacy.

That mitigation was a necessary consequence of deeper investigations on fallacies since Hamblins pioneer work, where the pragmatic dimension of fallacies became evident and therewith the insufficiency of Formal Logic. The fact that fallacies are not just violations of the rules of Formal Logic is one of the reasons why most treatises on Logic have not succeeded to make a more accurate connection between profound investigations on Formal Logic and their treatment of fallacies. Especially concerning informal fallacies – but also concerning formal fallacies – it is not correct to say simply that fallacies are always wrong arguments, as if fallacies could be detected by means of the identification of a formal structure. Fallacious arguments have no formal structure whose occurrence could disprove them once and for all. On the other hand, if we see most examples of fallacies given in most logic treatises it would be clear that they are undoubtedly wrong arguments. However, that is an effect of the particular kind of selection of examples: fallacy examples are specially simple and suitable for didactic purposes. The application of this general fallacy patterns to real contexts can pose significant difficulties. As Hamblin states, "if we try to find better examples we meet another kind of difficulty, in that what is non-trivial may be controversial".[23] Stuart Mill for example regards Rousseau's and Hobbes' social contract doctrines as an hopeless circular argumentations that must be wrong because of their circularity – and already for this reason.[24] Here is not the place to discuss the correctness of the social contract theories – that would require long considerations on philosophy of law and state. My considerations about the fundamental idea of fallacy and correct argumentation could begin at this point with the question: could a so complex and profound theory like the social contract be refuted by simple formal logical considerations like the identification of a petitio principii? Recent discussions on Informal Logic have shown how difficult it is to identify a fallacy unequivocally in real contexts – that is, in contexts beyond the simple examples of Formal Logic books.

The difficulty of making a fallacy objection against an argumentation in a real context is that fallacies cannot be identified a priori, that is, as if they were an evidence (in Kants language I would say that they are not "intellectual intuitions" [intellektuelle Anschauungen]). In order to make logical objections like the commitment of a fallacy against a complex argumentation, it is necessary to discuss first how the criticized argumentation has to be formalized. This task cannot be performed without a material argumentation – that is an argumentation that is direct related to the subject in question and not to formal structures in a metalinguistic way –, so that a valid "logical" objection of commitment of a fallacy against an argumentation can only be a result of a previous material discussion, which fixes the exact meaning of each sentence of the criticized argumentation and its logical relations with each other. Thus, a logical objection against an argumentation (which means here a objection based on the fallaciousness of the criticized argumentation) cannot replace a material argumentation on the criticized subject. In other words, fallacy objections against an argumentation are only as strong as the material argumentation that supports them. In this way, our conception of fallacy use within discourses (which means the performance of fallacy objections by discourse participants) receives a nominalistic feature, which makes it close to Johnsons definition: "a fallacy is an argument that violates one of the criteria/standards of good argument and that occurs with sufficient frequency in discourse to warrant being baptized".[25] Which means for our purposes: the use of fallacy objections within a discourse does not make the argumentation stronger than it already materially was; it adds just a designation for the committed error, which means from the perspective of the participant: "your argumentation is wrong due to the material reasons X and Y and this mistake has traditionally the name 'fallacy F' ".

[24] Rosen, The Philosophy of Error and Liberty of Thought: J.S. Mill on Logical Fallacies, pp. 121-147.

Why is this analysis necessary? Because it is common in practical and in legal argumentations in courts to pretend to refute an argumentation or judicial justification by saying about it that it commits a fallacy and letting the material justification for that objection in the background.

An example from a judicial decision could clear this point. The German Court Bundesgerichtshof (BGH) annulled a sentence of a lower court because it contains according to the BGH an argumentative circularity (petitio principii).[26] In that case, the lower tribunal has – also according to BGH – deduced the witness' credibility from the testimony of the same witness. So BGH identified a circulus vitiosus between the witness' credibility and the truth or plausibility of his testimony.

Although I find the BGH decision correct, I would have reservations about the use of the notion of fallacy in it. BGH relies its objection against the lower tribunal's decision on the very abstract logic/pragmatic notion of the petitio principii. However, there is no logical principle according to which one could not deduce the plausibility of a testimony from the testimony itself – Logic is related to the form and not to the content of the discourse. The reasons why a court should require more evidences in order to consider a testimony plausible instead of relying exclusively on the content of the same testimony are material ones. It would be reasonable to formulate an argumentation standard according to which there is forbidden to deduce the plausibility of a testimony from the content of the same testimony, but that would be a material legal argumentation standard, that would have to obey other material rules than Formal Logic principles. It should be formulated based on the legal system and for reasons of justice and adequateness of the concrete case solution. Material legal argumentation standards have priority over logical principles.[27]

Decisions on material grounds with recourse to formal fallacy patterns tend in my view to a rhetorical use of the notion of fallacies – rhetorical in a bad sense. A speaker in legal discourse achieves with this appeal to logic an efficient rhetorical effect in his favor: Accusing the opponent of committing a fallacy, he uses the persuasive power of Logic to sustain his position and to destroy the opposite one. So he can give his argumentation an appearance of logical necessity. Furthermore, an appeal to logic can be an easy way to escape from complex or inconvenient questions that have to be discussed. Fallacies like straw man or ignoratio elenchi are – among other rhetorical strategies using the power of logical necessity[28] – specially suitable for this purpose.

Because of the possibility of a rhetorical use of fallacies it seems convenient to formulate a standard of rational argumentation that regulates the use of logical categories used as objections against an argumentation. Such a standard could be formulated as the necessity of material justification of a fallacy objection. This standard could be understood as a normative rule for the use of arguments based on fallacies in legal contexts. Such a rule would be similar to Alexy's requirement of saturation of arguments (Erfordernis der Sättigung[29]). According to him, the use of traditional legal interpretation methods (e.g. grammatical, systematic, historic, teleological) has to be regulated in order to avoid an arbitrary choice of one method in detriment of others; an arbitrary choice would lead naturally to an arbitrary decision praxis. Similarly, it seems reasonable to require a material saturation of fallacy objections in order to avoid abusive rhetorical effects based on logical appearance.

[27] Also because there is necessary to make a choice between several logic systems in order to apply them in legal practice. The criterion for this choice have to be done in accordance to the legal system. See Kalinowski, De la specificité de la logique juridique, p. 20: „Il reste néanmoins caractéristique de la pensée juridique ratiocinante qu'elle fait son choix de types et derègles logiques de raisonnement selon les besoins créés par les activités du juriste en tant que tel" and also Neumann, Argumentationslehre, p. 33: „Denn soweit eine Entscheidung zwischen unterschiedlichen Kalkülen erforderlich ist, legen nicht die Regeln des (eines) Kalküls die Standards der Argumentation fest; vielmehr entscheiden diese über die Angemessenheit des logischen Kalküls. Das aber bedeutet: Die Standards der Argumentation sind vorrangig gegenüber den Theoremen eines logischen Kalküls."

[28] See for example the use in legal argumentation of expressions like "logically necessary", "on grounds of logic" (in: Simon, Juristische Logik und die richterliche Tätigkeit), or pseudo-logical arguments like the "logical impossibility" of repatriating of someone, who has never been expatriated, as well as the contestation of an invalid legal transaction ("die Anfechtung eines nichtigen Rechtsgeschäfts" – Neumann, Juristische Logik, p. 311).

[29] Alexy, Theorie der juristischen Argumentation, p. 293.

At this point it is clear that Fallacy Theory can provide us with contributions to the fundaments of legal argumentation. It shows that argumentations exclusively or especially focused on methods – and fallacy patterns can be seen as methods in a broad sense – are easily susceptible to subtle arbitrariness.

To summarize my topics:

In order to decide cases in accordance to the legal system (rule of Law) it is required to maintain a material argumentation, which can be carried out only by avoidance of fallacies. Rhetorical approaches that pretend to achieve plausibility through mere linguistic and/or fallacious methods lead to a detachment of the judicial decision from positive Law.

1) The state of the Art in Fallacy Theory shows that fallacies are just prima facie wrong arguments. Fallacious arguments have no formal structure whose identification could disprove them once and for all. The fallaciousness of an argument can be demonstrated only by means of a material argumentation (that is an argumentation that is direct related to the subject in question and is not metalinguistic or based on abstract methods like formal logical structures). Fallacy objections are – from the point of view of the participant – just nominalistic designations for invalid argumentations whose invalidity was already stated by other means.

2) Logic principles and general argumentation standards have to pass the test of compatibility to the legal system and to be selected in accordance to it – they have to be transformed into material legal argumentation standards according to principles of justice and adequateness of a concrete case solution. The direct use of abstract fallacy patterns as an argument in the legal discourse tends to be just apparently logical – also rhetorical in a bed sense.

3) Therefore it seems appropriate to require from legal discourse participants a material justification of fallacy objections. This standard could be understood as a normative rule for the use of arguments in legal contexts. Such a rule would be similar to Alexy's requirement of saturation of arguments based on legal interpretation methods.

Semantic constructions and Law

Lourenço Torres[1]

Abstract: The plan of this study is to debate about the essential "limit" in approaching the legal phenomenon. It is the "limit" of Law "construction" structural techniques from its semantic aspect. More than been affiliated to the belief that Law is conceptually limited, this study inquires the possible extension of legal concepts that could or not be limited by Language. Goes through some linguistic meanings about Semantic science. From Hart's theory it concludes that the linking between the Language and Law has an unremovable indetermination condition in the way that it understands itself as a limitation of human being condition and, therefore, to the legislator's work. Ross dissects the subject of validity and demonstrates that concepts of Law vary according to its contingencies. From Hart's and Ross' compared thesis concludes that Language and Law together are an unexpected category.

1. Introduction - Structural possibilities and techniques of construction of Law.

In this study my purpose was to bring for debate one kind of approach of essential the limit to the legal phenomenon. It is the "limit" of the structural possibilities and techniques of construction of Law from its semantic aspect. More than being affiliated to the belief Law is limited conceptually, this study inquires the extension of the possibility that legal concepts could, or not, to be limited for language. It studies in the origins of the philosophy and the concepts, the "liberating paradox of language" and quotes the main theories that had being applied them to the concept of Law.

As one of my theoretical marks, my study initiates for detaching the concept of "being deficient" in the book The Man, his Nature and his Place in the World, where Arnold Gehlen (1904 - 1976) considers as an essential quality of man the absence of adaptation to one determined environment. He arrives to such conclusion in face of to the high specialization and instinctive security of other animals, and because man's lack of specialization, immaturity and poverty of instincts he configures him biologically as a "deficient being". According to Gehlen, to survive man had and has to compensate this lack of specialization with a proper action, that he calls as "a cultural world", where appears their higher cultural and spiritual accomplishments.

From this notion of man as being needed and, therefore, one "creature in-risk", Gehlen elaborates an imponent theory of culture as an anthropological concept: that man is "a cultural being by its very nature" because he is "not finished" in his relationship with the environment. Therefore, the necessity of the human being for language. He is incapable to perceive any truths regarding the world independently of a linguistic context, which is his only artificial reality capable to deal. Then, language and everything called "intelligence" can be seen as one plus to the man's lack of adaptation to the material world[2].

Thus, language is too valuable to the human being and, as Wittgenstein (1889 - 1951) said, perhaps the language is "one of these things that for being more familiar are the most difficult to understand"[3]. That's why it is so studied as system in Linguistics. Is culture and language's freedom and amplitude what propitiates to the human being concomitantly, unreliability or instability? The linguistics studies are attempts to establish "limits" to the language phenomenon? Are systems, as the legal system, also "closed" in this search for delimiting the "human environment"? Semantic and its constructions "would break" these metalimits one more time?

To understand, in this context, the application of Semantic constructions of words, concepts or theories, it's necessary to understand Semantic itself inside Linguistic knowledge and apply it, then, to other areas of the knowledge, as Law. For this, a little of (its) history must help.

2. Law Validity as a legal Semantic concept.

It seems that the Semantic theory made its first appearance in Philosophy through Parmenides' monism (475 B.C.) when he stated that "only what was true could be expressed". But Semantic theory itself started to have special importance among the Sophists, who differently from their predecessors' philosophers, the "pre-Socratics", had more interest in man (anthopos) than in cosmos. This led them to study language. Protagoras (445 B.C.) can be considered the first grammarian between them, and in his syntactic considerations used Semantics.

Today, the term Semantics in Bréal's (1832 – 1915) doctrine, finds its etymological justification in the Greek verb semainen, and was introduced by Aristotle, to indicate the specific function of the linguistic sign, to "mean" or "assigns" something. In truth, Aristotle is the starting point of two great lines of development of the philosophical quarrel on Language, that is, the relation between language and thought and the communicational function of language. Semantics would be, therefore, and returning to Bréal's meaning, the part of Linguistics, and more especially of Logic, that studies and analyzes the significant function of signs, the nexuses between linguistics signs (words, phrases, etc.) and its significances.

Furthermore, I could not initiate without approaching Frege's (1848 - 1925) theory of formal logic applied to the Philosophy of Language breaking with traditional Logic. His theory of the meaning is: sense, reference and truth. To him, a linguistic statement sense is what it represents of the world, its objects, and the state of things.

Herbert Paul Grice's (1913 - 1988) conversational analysis theory, among others, thinks sense differently from logical ones, and uses the conversational principles: relevance, quantity, quality and modus, to place sense as the subject's intention[4].

Law is constructed on a natural linguistic base that, with greater or minor structural difference, goes on gaining proper connotations to create a specific legal vocabulary with variations among the existing legal systems. Not obstante the appreciable board of differences that set some distance in legal systems, at least some similarities can be identified in order to approach them, and, perhaps, it could be a universal element capable to establish a common theoretical axle between them.

Herbert Lionel Adolfus Hart (1907 - 1992) demonstrates this semantic complexity in his work The Concept of Law, published in 1961. This work transformed the way Law General Theory, commonly presented as Jurisprudence in the English world language and outside there, should be understood and studied. His intention was to deepen the understanding of Law, the coercion and the moral, as distinct social phenomena. However, once related, Law can be considered as an assay on analytical legal theory. His work criticizes the deficiencies of the simple model of legal system, which is constituted according to the lines of Austin's imperative theory, who grounds other XIX century authors, like Sir William Markby

Hart initiates his understanding pointing that all arguments developed by well-known jurists were not capable to answer a central question, which is: what is Law? The most complete and clear attempt in analyzing the concept of Law using the apparently simple elements of commands and habits, made by J. L Austin, do not demonstrate the essential difference between "being obliged to" and "to have an obligation of". Its negation is famous to define Law in a clear way, questioning the possibility and utility of a generic definition.

Another jurist and philosopher who work on the semantic potential for the construction of the concept of Law was Alf Ross (1899 - 1979). He was a representative of the Scandinavian legal realism. His thought diverges sufficiently from traditional currents in science of Law' study. For him, the effective Law does not possess relations that can be explained metaphysically. It must be searched in the experience's plan. It is currently tied to the realistic school. Legal norm, for this author, is constituted by a directive. And by being a directive, it is directed to somebody; that, for Ross, is the judge. The result, therefore, is that the norm effectiveness is measured by the application to that it is directed: that is, it is measured according to the judge's application. Law, to Ross, consists of norms and legal phenomena. Those give substrates to judge's inquires, the questions to tied the facts to social environment existence [5].

Ross' conception of Law system, therefore, is based on national law system, that is composed through an integration that determines when the physical force could be and will be used against a person: it aims to operate the use of the State force.

Faced these previous questions for the understanding of his thought, we can deal with the matter of validity and its concept. He says that the matter of validity has been, until then, argued as an aprioristic concept, endowed with an inherent nature itself. However, it must be analyzed like a legal system's validity.

Validity is a concept that, first, must be understood in accordance with the validity acception above explicated. Validity only exists if a norm is valid law.

> [...] valid law (valid law, different from validity) is that one that represents the ensemble set of normative ideas that function as a plan of interpretation for the Law phenomena in action, what, in turn, means that these norms effectively are observed, and that thus they are so because they are tried and felt as socially obligatory[6].

Therefore, to Ross,

> […] the test of validity is such that in this hypothesis [...] we could understand the judge actions (the courts decisions) as answers armed with meaning in given conditions and to foresee them, in accordance with certain limits[7].

Human being's unforeseeability, in its legislative intervention is much affected when taking for reference its high pretensions to surround the future. Therefore, it does not foresees all the longed and desirable normative consequences. This has its root in the undetermined and not completely inclusive nature of a complex reality composed for a natural language that the jurist takes for loan together with its limitations to construct norms and legal systems, whose linguistics and semantic adaptations and reconstructions will not be able to eliminate the uncertainty (indetermination) areas or with multiple meanings only determinable in the concrete cases where it will be.

> [...] the human legislators cannot have such knowledge of all the possible combinations of circumstances that the future can bring.

[7] ROSS. Direito e justiça. São Paulo: Edipro, 2000, p. 35.

> This incapacity to anticipate causes brings with it a relative indetermination of purpose[8].

Such unforeseeability not only characterizes the mark of construction and structures of legal norms as its projection on the moment of norm interpretation, since the "particular situations `in fact' do not wait for us already separate ones to others, and with labels of application cases of the general norm".[9] Here it is not a case of imperfection of the norm simply, because the fact that we cannot attribute to the legislator a capacity that escapes to the human being, which is, the most perfect and precise anticipation of all the facts and that, therefore, is reflected in the normative structure. The norm is, therefore, undetermined because of these reasons, but, any way, determinable to every concrete case. In short, the idea is "that the legislative cannot create uniform norms destined to be applied to each case in an anticipated form without ulterior official directives". In contrast, what the absolute belief in the completeness of the legal system suggests is its unrealizability, because the difficulties, ambiguities or same legal gaps.

3. Conclusion

Relating Frege, Grice, Austin, Searle and Ducrot's theories with the mark established by Gehlen, we can see some differences in its perspectives, but all converge semantically to language indetermination. In searching security in language Frege perceives that the meaning of a sentence can be established through: the analysis of its constituent elements, the sense contribution and the parts' reference to the sentence's entirety. Therefore, sentences also possess sense and reference. But, according to Grice this is constructed, because, any formularization constructs the simulation of a reasoning of the listener from the statement said by the speaker. That it corroborated by Austin when he perceives that the meaning of a sentence must be established by the conditions of use of the sentence that determine its meaning, in a theory of the action. These conditions allows its changeability. Language, according to Ducrot, is a construction that only language makes of the things of the world, in this search that the human being has for specialization, where a speech is produced as work over other speeches.

In relation to Law, Ross mainly affirms that Law may vary in accordance with its contingencies, mainly with respect to different Countries or States, what makes that the word "law", for example, must be in accordance with the understanding of a specific context, not something universally inclusive. Hart demonstrates the semantic complexity as something marked for its fixed condition of indetermination, which leads to the link between Language and Law.

As observed previously from the displayed theories, a basic theoretical problem seems to serve as a universal junction point of Law norm: the human being's cognitive inaccessibility to the accurate determination of human behavior, which has objective and need to be normatized. The human incapacity to determine language as well as anticipating the future events is what it is on the root of the indetermination concept that marks Law. Yes, "the human being is weak and devoid", as Gehlen had said and therefore he seeks shelter in the system of Law.

Restrictions on fundamental rights:
An interpretation in the light of Friedrich Müller´s structural theory of law

Débora Dossiatti de Lima Nestor Castilho Gomes

Abstract: This article aims to analyze the possibility of restrictions to fundamental rights. Firstly, it is important to clarify that, from the theoretical viewpoint, the very validity of the idea of restrictions to fundamental rights is controversial, for it depends on a certain conception of legal norm. One theory of the norm founded on the distinction between rules and principles, as the one formulated by Robert Alexy, eventually leads to the acceptance of restrictness of fundamental rights. On the other end, one norm theory that refutes principiology, as the one developed by Friedrich Müller, necessarily implies an effort to define the material extension of fundamental right, and not its restriction.

Keywords: fundamental rights, Friedrich Muller´s structural theory of law.

The restrictness of fundamental rights depends on a conception of norm that sees the fundamental rights as definite or prima facie positions. It is in the scope of norm theory that stands the controversy around the scope of protection. The definition of scope of protection of fundamental rights has a direct relation with the concept of restriction or determination of the contents of fundamental rights. These two variations are translated when overlapping "wide scope of protection vs. restricted scope of protection". While Alexy supports the wide scope of protection, which relates to that which the norm of fundamental right guarantees prima facie, that is, without taking into account the possible restrictions, Müller defends that the interpretation of norm program and the definition of norm scope would suffice in order to define, at the same time, the contents and the limits of each fundamental right in each concrete case.

The questions that arise here are not purely theoretical, void of any practical repercussion. The norm theory influences the form of application of fundamental rights: subsumption, Abwägung, embodiment, among others. It does matter, however, to analyze, even if superficially, one of the solution techniques that proposes the overcoming of the mere subsumption: the structuring methodology of right. The enormous influence of the theory of principles and the weighting technique by Robert Alexy in the national bibliography, or even in sentences of the Federal Supreme Court, seems to us as self evident. On the other hand, the exposition of Friedrich Müller´s structuring theory of law serves to demonstrate that the weighting technique is not the only proposal capable of facing the subsumption that characterizes the juridical positivism.

The initial goal of this work is to discuss if Friedrich Müller´s structuring methodology of right can, indeed, be considered an internal theory. Despite the usual identification of a restricted protection scope with the internal theory, such association is not automatic, as pointed out in thesis by Pieroth and Shilink. The goal is to inquire if the structuring method of right will effectively sustain that the fundamental rights have definite essential contents defined a priori and of absolute character.

At last, analyze if the adoption of the structuring method of right will lead to a deficit in argument every time something is taken as not being protected by the protection scope of a fundamental right.

I – The structuring methodology and the internal theory: wide protection scope x restricted protection scope

Part of the Brazilian constitutional doctrine associates Friedrich Müller´s Strukturierende Rechtslehre to the Innentheorie[1].

Those who endorse the internal theory rely on the concept of limit. The process of limit definition of each fundamental right would be something internal to it[2]. However, there would be immanent limits. Starting out from these presuppositions, it would be on the operator´s behalf, in their task of interpretation/application, to simply declare previously existing limits. For beyond this, the internal theory would admit the possibility of revelation of the contents of the fundamental rights in an abstract and a priori manner.

The internal theory sustains a restricted scope of protection. The fundamental characteristic would be the exclusion a priori, the non-guarantee of certain states, actions and juridical positions in the protection scope of fundamental rights.

If these are the presuppositions of the internal theory, we have it that the structuring theory of right by Friedrich Müller cannot be considered an internal theory.

Firstly, because the concretization process, in the scope of the theory and of the structuring method of right, is not summarized into an activity of declaration or revelation of previously existing limits. This presupposition starts out from the conception of Rechtsnorm, typical of juridical positivism. For the structuring theory, Rechtsnorm does not have previously given contents, which must be discovered and declared by the interpreter. In reality, the structuring theory of right differs norm from norm text, which already makes it clear that the task of concretization is not limited to a mere declaration.

In the lesson from the jurist of Heidelberg, the Rechtsnorm does not preexist in the codes or in the laws. What is read in the Federal Constitution, for instance, are simple preliminary forms, norm texts, and not juridical norms[3]. The "constitutional norm" only arises in the concretization process. In a phrase that has become common ground, Müller ensures that "the wording of positive prescription is only the tip of an iceberg"[4]. This because the text – and as shall be seen, as linguistic datum, is considered an element pertinent solely to the formulation of the [3] Müller makes it clear that the Rechtsnorm does not preexist in the codes and in the constitutions: "What can be read in the codes (and in the constitutions) are only the norm texts – in other words, texts that must yet be transformed, through Reichtsarbeit, into juridical norms". Cf. Müller, Friedrich. O novo paradigma do direito: introdução à teoria e metódica estruturantes do direito. p. 274. About the same topic, Müller assures in other instances: "When the jurists speak and write about "the" constitution, they refer to the constitution text; when they speak "about" the law, they refer to their literal tenor". Cf. Müller, Friedrich. Métodos de trabalho do direito constitucional. p. 53; João Maurício Adeodato also underlines the relation between norm and norm text, general norm and individual norm, beaconing differences between the Strukturierende Rechtslehre and the pure theory of law: "It means, not only is the norm of the concrete case constituted upon the case, but also the apparently generical and abstract norm, that is, the general norm is not previous, only its text is. The general norm does not exist, it is a fiction". Cf. Adeodato, João Maurício. Ética e retórica: para uma teoria da dogmática jurídica. p. 239.

[4] Müller, Friedrich. Métodos de trabalho do direito constitucional. p. 53.

Normprogramm. In opposition to the static model of juridical positivism, Müller develops a dynamic model of the juridical norm genesis; the property of law having been produced by competent authority, according to the procedure foreseen by law, does not allow, ipso facto, that such norm text be identified as juridical norm. The norm must be built through the concretization process.

If the norm is not confused with the text, but arises solely in the concretization process, if the law operator is key in this process, the inherent temporality to normativity becomes clear. The social-historical reality is a building condition to the norm and its normativity. For beyond this, legal disposition normativity is branded by real data, which hinders one to believe in any solution given by the abstract form and a priori (as the internal theory advocates).

The inherent temporality to normativity – which arises at the end of the concretization process – makes the structuring theory and method of right reject the positivist concept of "application of law". The norm cannot be simply applied, because it is not yet ready and neither is it substantially finished. It is about, under a theoretical viewpoint, a logical impossibility. Since the norm is not ready and is not restricted to the text (to the linguistic data/norm program), the concretization is not confused with the interpretation, application or subsumption. The Rechtnorm only arises along the concretization process, with the interweaving of the norm program and the scope of the norm. The final step of the concretization process comprises the individualization of the Rechtnorm into Entscheidungsnorm.

The juridical positivism, by identifying norm and norm text, would present the practical-ruling task as a logical deduction procedure[5]. The judge would decide in a syllogistic manner "subsuming the juridical case to the concepts of a previously given Rechtsnorm"[6]. The norm identification with the text (the norm would be formed by exclusively linguistic data) has enabled the understanding of the ruling activity as merely declaratory. The problem of "interpretation", or "interpretation and application of the law", would consist in a purely hermeneutic problem (in knowing what textually-meaningful is about, e.g., from the law)[7].

[5] Müller considers the use of formal logic improbable for the solution of concrete cases. The juridical prescriptions, due to their linguistic character, do not offer, in most cases, any starting point for exact operations of formal logic. In Müller´s words: "the material juridical tenors, by far, are not "contained" in the linguistic elements of the juridical norms, because their nature is necessarily imprecise, so that they could be transformed into moments of logical conclusions". Cf. Müller, Friedrich. Teoria estruturante do direito. p. 47.

[6] Müller, Friedrich. O novo paradigma do direito: introdução à teoria e metódica estruturantes do direito. p. 148. Teoria estruturante do direito. In: Müller, Friedrich.

The structuring theory and method, on the contrary, considered the ruling activity a practical-normative problem. The non-identification of the norm with the text, and the indispensability of the case (either real of fictitious) – which shall contribute with the insertion of the real data into the Rechtsnorm -, makes the structuring theory reject an "implacable interpretation" from the normative text. As put by Castanheira Neves, Müller recognizes the methodic priority of the case, the non-obviation of the case for the concretization of the law. The Rechtsnorm is not dependent on the case, but refers to it[8]. Both (norm and case) yield the necessary elements for the juridical decision. Müller´s theory is inserted in a context where:

> the problem of juridical interpretation is not hermeneutic, but normative. Hence, the object in matter must be correlative to this nature of the problem, being certain that the interpretive problem will be applied by the normative-practical nature of the case to resolve with the support in the solution of this problem. In other words, the interpreted normative object may not be a merely meaningful object, but an object susceptible to offering normative criteria for the adjudicative solution of the deciding case. And then the goal of the interpretation will not be the text of the juridical norms, as the expression or corpus of a meaning to be understood and analyzed, but the normativity that these norms, as juridical criteria, comprise and can offer[9].

By investigating the juridical normativity structure, the structuring theory of law realizes that the Rechtsnorm is also comprised of real data[10]. Thus, the practical-decisory process is not reduced to purely hermeneutic work, since the Rechtsnorm is not exclusively linguistic data. However, it is not simply about discovering the textual meaning of the words of law, which would give rise to further "applicable interpretation" of the normative text[11].

[10] João Maurício Adeodato brilliantly emphasizes the reasons that make Müller propose

Having it said, it matters to say that the structuring method does not despise the importance of interpretation. Nevertheless, by distinguishing the "application" from "concretization", Müller conferred a specific function to the "interpretation", restricted. In the structuring method the interpretation of the literal tenor of the norm is solely one of the elements of concretization (certainly one of the most important)[12]. Müller makes it clear that the Rechtsnorm is not in the text, and that the mere futurity of the juridical cases make interpretation indispensable:

> One norm is not (only) needy of interpretation because and to the measure that it is not "univocal", "evident", because and to the measure that it is "void of clarity" – but overall because it must be applied to one case (real or fictitious). One norm, in the sense of the traditional method (that is: the wording of the norm) may seem "clear" or even "univocal" on paper, as for the next practical case to which it must be applied, may make it to appear extremely "void of clarity". This always becomes evident solely in the effective attempt of concretization. In it one does not "apply" something ready and done to a group of facts equally understood as concluded. The legal positivism claimed and keeps claiming this. But "the" Rechtsnorm is not ready, neither is it "substantially" con-

the difference between the traditional "interpretation and application of law" and its "concretization". According to the Author: "The generic procedure through which one seeks to adequate norms and facts and to decide, traditionally known as "interpretation" and application of the Law", Müller denominates "norm concretization" (Normkonkretisierung), seeking to move away from the traditional hermeneutic and to more precisely determine their concepts and procedures. In this task he insists that concretization does not mean syllogism, subsumption, effectivation, application or concrete individualization of the law upwards from the general norm". Cf. Adeodato, João Maurício. Ética e retórica: para uma teoria da dogmática jurídica. p. 240; Cf. Castanheira Neves, Antonio. Metodologia jurídica: problemas fundamentais. p. 83; Larenz, Karl. cluded[13].

If the interpretation maintains a specific functional status in the structuring theory and method, the same cannot be said about the "application". As has been settled, the Rechtsnorm will be constructed by the law operator along the concretization process. It cannot, thus, be applied syllogistically.

So, the concretization of the norm transcends the mere interpretation of the text. Paulo Bonavides offers timely and definite clearing by saying that: "in relation to the interpretation, the concretization has a much wider span, being that the respective method encompasses all means of work through which the norm is concretized and the law is accomplished"[14].

Bonavides´ assertive brings further important datum; the concretization involves a respective "method". The investigation of the structuring method of law will be done in the next section, so as to investigate if its adoption leads to an argumentative deficit, when put in comparison with theories that sustain a wide factual support.

For now, it is important to say that Müller´s Rechtsnorm has intrinsic inter-relation with its structuring method[15]. So much so that Robert Alexy, in an inspired metaphor, affirms that the *Rechtsnorm´*s structuring theory and the structuring method are two sides of the same coin[16]. Friedrich Müller himself confirms it, thus: "For this concept (structuring of law) the theory (of the juridical norm) and the juridical methodology are necessary and concretely bound to each other, even before its fundament in the Constitution and its effects in the juridical dogmatic were taken into consideration"[17].

But, since the Rechtsnorm is more than the text, the concretization goes much beyond the interpretation". Cf. Adeodato, João Maurício. The structuring theory of the norm and the method are yoked, since the Rechtsnorm´s construction process – of decision making – is ruled by the methodic. The Rechtsnorm is created under the methodic´s leading thread, which seeks to yield the rationality expected in the Democratic States of Law.

Castanheira Neves expressly affirms that Friedrich Müller´s concretization involves the needed inter-relation between the structuring theory of Rechtsnorm and the structuring method of law. The complexity of Friedrich Müller´s theory of the norm (a project that covers both linguistic as well as real data) has as corollary the consideration of the methodological problem as a concretization problem of the juridical norms. In the words of the eminent Portuguese jurist:

> Operating with the distinctions between "Normtext" and "norm" (the concrete-material normativity obtained by the structured concretization) (...) F. Müller thinks the concrete juridical judicium as the result of a constitutive normative process of concretization, which mobilizes structurally (in a process or "structuring method") an extra set of factors or juridical methodical elements ("concretization elements"), from the normative text or from the hermeneutic elements: dogmatic elements, elements from the respective objective domain, juridical-theoretical elements, technical-juridical, etc. Hence, today the methodological problem would be "Normkonkretisierung statt Normtextauslegung" (norm concretization instead of the interpretation of norm texts[18].

II – The structuring method and the argumentative onus of the decision process

Does the adoption of a restricted protection scope eventually lead to a lesser argumentative onus before the decision process? It seems to us that it does not. In the structuring method, e.g., the exclusion of a certain conduct in the protection scope of a fundamental right is not accomplished by a mere act of will. The structuring method of law deals with a series of elements for the concretization of the norm, which evidences a methodical rigor which passes through the argumentative neglect.

Based on the new formulated conception of norm, Müller notes direito. p. 257.

[18] Castanheira Neves, Antonio. Metodologia jurídica: problemas fundamentais. p. 145.

that the inherited elements of tradition (grammar interpretation, logic, systemic and historic) refer only to the treatment of the norm texts. However, for Müller, the norm is more than its literal tenor. In order to solve this aporia, Müller acts in two fronts: on one end, he seeks to develop and reformulate the treatment elements of the norm text; on the other, he seeks to develop methodical elements capable of using up the material tenor of the normative scopes in a rationally verifiable manner.

Especially with regard to the elements of norm text treatment, Müller reformulates Sivigny´s canons (proposing the replacement of grammar, systemic, historic, generic and teleological elements), apart from incorporating (part) of the modern interpretation principles of the constitution.

In view of the juridical Normstruktur developed by the norm theory, the structuring method develops and works with the following concretization elements: (i) "strictiore sensu" methodological elements (grammar, systematic, historical, genetic and teleological interpretation, as well as modern principles of constitution interpretation); (ii) norm scope elements; (iii) dogmatic elements; (iv) theory elements; (v) solution technique elements; and (vi) policy elements of law and constitutional policy. For reasons bound to the imperatives of the Democratic State of Law, the elements directly referred to as norms preponderate in relation to the others in case of conflict.

The structuring methodical concerns with developing controllable means of work of decision and grounds; presenting, therefore, as a decision and imputation technique which demands the submission of the decision norm to the general juridical norm texts. It seeks the formulation and elaboration of rules that enable the imputation of the decision norm to a general Rechtsnorm text, which may serve as foundation. The juridical Normstruktur redefines the juridical practice; it establishes new tasks and introduces new elements, in order to rationalize the decision work.

III – Conclusion

In conclusion, we can affirm that the theory and the structuring methodology may not be classified as belonging to the internal theory. This is because the possibility of abstract definition of the contents of fundamental right is totally incompatible with the structuring theory of law. Müller´s theory does not admit any aprioristic definition in the protection scope of the fundamental law, to be revealed by the interpreter. The protection scope is always defined in the concrete case, through the concretization work. In Müller´s words: "Normbereich and Normprogramm are not means to find, through the manner of natural law, true ontic statements of general validity; neither does it help to ascertain the "true sense" of the normative texts in terms of the defined type and juridically "correct" use of the language in the respective normative context"[19]. In short: the concrete norm of decision is elaborated solely in the particular case and through its connection to it[20].

Constitutional interpretation in Philosophy of Law beyond interpretivism and non-interpretivism

Bernardo Gonçalves Fernandes[1]

Abstract: The article aims to develop an analysis of the north-American interpretation theories that seek to overcome the interpretivism X non-interpretivism dichotomy traditionally worked in the U.S. legal hermeneutics. For that, we will take a path that goes from the delimitation of the terms under debate to later presentation of contemporary theories that aim to overcome them, considering an open mind to a philosophy of law linked to justice theories that take into account the complexity of the legal phenomenon currently in vogue. Common themes to theorists of law such as proceduralism, minimalism, substantialism, consequentialism, economic pragmatism and integrity in law enforcement are going to be brought up to achieve the main purpose of this essay.

Keywords: Constitutional interpretation. Philosophy of law. Interpretivism and Non-interpretivism.

1. Introduction: the dicotomy, interpretivism x non-interpretivism

When the Constitutional Hermeneutic is brought up inside the north-American juridical debate, the first thing that comes up to mind – even because many of the national works seem not to go beyond it – is the debate between interpretivism and non-interpretivism.

This debate, that has found and still finds supporters on both sides, is one of those historic and naturalized dichotomies that seem not to abandon us, in other words, they insist to permeate, in a reductionist and limited way, the juridical discussions, as the old question of jusnaturalism versus positivism, or public law versus private law, and even of voluntas legis versus voluntas legislatoris.

However, in this brief excursus, we intend to demonstrate that the north-American debate has reached higher plans in terms of sophistication, incorporating evolutionary achievements from the hermeneutic-pragmatic turn and thereby, pitching for more complex analyses such as the foundation_and the legitimacy of the law and the judicial decisions.

[1] http://lattes.cnpq.br/9044160342461871

Thus, this article takes as its north the following path: we will start from a reconstruction of the first debate, presenting its basic theses to, then, go to an analysis of theses and authors more complex, that sought to go beyond this dichotomy, enriching the recent theories of justice and of the judicial interpretation.

The current, known today as interpretivists, adopts a conservative position – having as its supporters great exponents like Judge Robert Bork and Justice Antonin Scalia – in which they attest that the interpreter, mainly the judges, when interpreting the Constitution, shall be limited to grasp the meaning of the precepts expressed or clearly seen as implicit (semantic texture). Therefore, when interpreting the Constitution, the reader must be limited to the constitutional text that lies ahead of him, setting as his limit of interpretation the intention of the founders. They claim that taking a step to beyond the borders of the text would subvert the principle of the rule of Law, turning it into a law made by judges (law of judges). This seems to be imperative at the judicial control of the legislative acts, which should be limited to the constitutional border under the claiming of a violation of the democratic principle (fact of the law or legislative act has to be accepted by the majority of the institution).

The second current, which appears to be booming, despite having a constellation of internal differences, seems to prioritize the attainment of constitutional rights over the formalist interpretation. The principles of justice, liberty and equality would compose the "project" of a constitutional self-respecting democratic society, overcoming the blind subservience to a reductive reading of the democratic principle. This way, while the interpretivists would say that the proper solution, constitutionally, to the dilemmas and conflicts that arise in the legal harvest should be sought (and worked out) in the intention of the Constitution creators, non-interpretivists, in general, will seek responses at the values (and traditions) arising from the society itself.

However, as we argue in this essay, the following constitutional debate doesn't end here. There is still a range of hermeneutic nuances and possibilities that deserve our attention.

Currently, there are numerous north-Americans jurists and philosophers whose theories have a prominent place not only at the American scene, but especially at the international panorama. Their theses that, literally, "took over the world" have been generating, alongside the previous theses of the interpretivism and non-interpretivism, fruitful digressions about the direction of north-American Constitutional Hermeneutics.

2. The proceduralism of John Hart Ely

John Hart Ely has earned celebrity for his work "Democracy and Distrust", in which he argues the theoretical insufficiency (inconsistency) of the classic theses, especially when it comes to the role played by the judges when in a situation of judicial review of laws and normative acts. There is a presumption of the illegitimacy of the magistrate, since they don't have to go through an election and also don't have political responsibility such as the members of the Congress or the Parliament who were elected and, at least in theory, represent the people of a country. Ely then proposes to the Constitutional Courts a better understanding of their role, assuming themselves as "reinforcements of democracy". This proposal is a result of a procedimental conception of democracy (rather than a substantive concept, which would allow judges to make choices that could be based on arguments of moral or ethical origin) that has, as its focus, problems of regulating the procedures in a way fair and equal to all. However, it is worth saying that despite the role of the Courts be the regulation and control of the regularity and the proper participation of the people at the politic process, they would also act proactively at situations or at the event of any misrepresentation of the political process, in which a minority couldn't sustain itself with its own forces (stand on its own feet). (Ely, 1980, p.169)

Therefore, the ex-Harvard and Yale professor says that Courts should play a role similar to referees in a soccer game (they don't say who the winner is, just acting in order to guarantee that the game is played cleanly, fairly and on an equal basis), letting democracy take its course, acting only to unclog blockages that form in the democratic process. This way, the Judiciary does not (and should not!) have authority to change decisions made through a democratic deliberative process (legislative), not being part of its role, the task of a supposed axiological interpretation of the Constitution, that is a guarantor of rights (these rights must be specified at a political instance, not being a responsibility of a legal instance). But the Courts can yet act for the purpose of defense and preservation of rights related to the communication and the participation that build up the democratic will at the political processes. Therefore, "Ely's positioning presents itself with an apparently contradictory characteristic, since it strengthens and at the same time limits the performance of the constitutional jurisdiction. Through a retraction and a limitation of the procedural aspect, the role of the Courts is restricted and the political process is strengthened, what doesn't implicate a discrimination of minorities, which must have their fundamental rights guaranteed (where the jurisdiction performance is reinforced). [...] It is a model that intends, at the same time, to strengthen and to restrict the constitutional jurisdiction by returning to a reference control of a procedimental nature, in which the political process is intended to be strengthened without incurring in a renouncement of the minorities rights protection". (Ely, 1980, p.88)

3. The minimalism of Cass R. Sunstein

Cass R. Sunstein is another exponent of the American Constitutional Law of nowadays. His proposal (that criticizes the judicial review) falls within a movement called Judicial Minimalism that has as its proposal a resumption of the role that the judiciary should occupy in a state that considers itself democratic.

The minimalists are jurists that don't believe in any theory of the Constitution and Jurisdiction as something savior or even with emancipatory purposes (goals). So they don't conceive any kind of social commitment on the part of the judiciary that should only concentrate on solving the real case they have at hands.

The basic idea of Sunstein is that the judges, at the course of their sentences, must let the question opened, having no hurry to give substantive and conclusive answers – or even brilliant academic theses – to citizens under their jurisdiction. Sunstein recognizes that the U.S. Congress understands the democratic dimension much better than the Supreme Court and, therefore, is the most authorized to give final answers on all legal matters. Therefore, a minimalist decision has the merit of leaving a space for future reflections at national, state and local level. (Sunstein, 1999, p.10)

For that, the magistrates must understand that they have no need - or legitimacy - to decide questions that can't be regarded as essential for the resolution of the real case, as well as that they should avoid the assessment of complex cases that have not yet reached a maturity level in the course of decisions in society, simply denying certiorari.

Sunstein argues that a minimalist decision must have two features: shallowness and narrowness. So he proposes that the Court decides the case at hand, rather than making an attempt to establish rules to be applied at future or similar cases. This way, the decisions have to be "narrow rather than broad" and "shallow rather than deep". According to this, they "have to be narrow whereas the court should decide (as mentioned) only the real case, without anticipating how other similar cases would be solved. And they must be shallow, as they should not try to justify a decision through fundamentals that involves basic constitutional principles. (Sunstein, 1999, p.18-57)

4. The populist Constitutionalism of Mark Tushnet

Mark Tushnet, a professor of Harvard and also one of the forerunners of the Critical Legal Studies, is currently one of the main critics of the U.S. judicial review, supporting in his studies, in a line that could be called more radical, the thesis entitled "popular constitutionalism "or populist constitutional Law. (Tushnet, 1999) (Tushnet, 2006)

According to Tushnet, his theory is populist because it distributes widely the responsibility for the constitutional law. This way, he claims that in a "populist theory of the constitutional law, a constitutional interpretation made by the courts doesn't have any normative weight due to the fact that they are produced by courts". (Tushnet, 2006, p.27)

Thereby, he postulates the removal of the "Constitution of the courts", since they don't have legitimacy to manifest itself in a final way (give the last word) when it comes to constitutional interpretation.

Tushnet criticizes the judicial review not for the "contramajority objection" aspect (traditional questioning of the legitimacy of the Supreme Court magistrates, given their undemocratic origin, to decide complex issues of constitutional laws) but for the "judicial supremacy" thesis (the consideration that the judiciary becomes the power conductor (the supreme power) above all other powers).

Accordingly, Tushnet presents himself as a critic of the Supreme Court regarding its monopoly on saying what the constitutional law is (its content). He believes that this attitude ends up removing the relevance (importance) of the views that are handed down out of the Supreme Court. Thus, the definition of what a Constitutional Law is and how we should understand the Constitution is only relevant if issued by the Supreme Court. The defended point, then, goes toward the ampliation of the opinions about the constitutional issues. Therefore, the professor says that "although parliamentarians don't think the same way as judges, they also work towards promoting constitutional values even though they don't follow the formal style of the legal tradition. (Tushnet, 2006, p.46)

It's interesting that the digressions of Tushnet allied to a perspective entitled as "populist constitutional" actually approaches them to a typically conservative bias (under the American traditional point of view). He even proposes a constitutional amendment to abolish the judicial review. (Tushnet, 2006, p.53)

5. The Constitutional choices and the defense of substantialism of Lawrence Tribe

Finally, it's worth mentioning the digressions undertaken by the Harvard jurist, Lawrence Tribe. Tribe, at his famous work "American Constitutional Law", as well as at his collection "Constitutional choices", forcefully criticizes the proceduralist theories. (Tribe, 1988)

At his point of view, these theories that only aim to ensure mechanisms of democratic participation (along the lines advocated, for example, by Ely) are insufficient, as it would require a substantive perspective that recognizes, in most constitutional laws and at their application, its axiological bias. For the author, the Constitution is a conjunction of choices and options developed by a plurality of citizens. This way, the decisions to be taken are closely correlated to our unwavering insertion into a tradition, ie, this tradition would work as a limit or a restriction to our decision capacity. However, the decisions, products of choices, are not and should not lead to an univocity of constitutional positionings. Thus, Tribe claims that the constitutional choices should be principiologic. But what is the basis of such a principiologic conception? And where does its legitimacy come from? (Tribe, 1988, p.188)

Tribe, in his extensive work, doesn't have the will of building an alternative methodology (such as the one currently used in some judged cases of the Supreme Court that has an administrative nature) that could lead us to constitutional choices absolutely correct (and unquestionable), since, for the author, "all constitutional interpretations have elements of indeterminacy." Therefore, the difficulty would be that "the Constitution requires a series of indeterminable choices, that present themselves to all of us, ie, we are all called to decide what the Constitution is and what it contemplates in its existence: text, intentions (of who?), moral and political assumptions (of what type?)." But even without having a theory of constitutional interpretation entirely feasible in consistency and security, the Harvard professor does not move away from establishing some guidelines that can reduce the actual interpretive deficit (for example, the deficit of the already overcome dichotomy: interpretivist and non-interpretivist or even minimalist and proceduralist authors). In a provocative work, with Michel Dorf co-authored, the author describes the project titled "constitutional conversations" (constitutional dialogues), in which he faces, vehemently, a relevant number of theories, establishing, from the critics, reflexive parameters such as: the dichotomy hard cases and easy cases, or the overcoming of the quest for a constitutional interpretation based on objective or subjective points of view (of the classic hermeneutics). (Tribe, 1988, p.222)

Therefore, the author (although we don't agree with many aspects of his digressions) goes beyond the interpretivism and non-interpretivism, contributing to the criticism of proceduralist conceptions. (Tribe, 1988)

Tribe, despite recognizing a procedimental character in some constitutional devices (laws), doesn't admit a disregard of the substantive character of the Constitutions and its values, especially if the fundamental rights are at the center of the constitutional debate. Accordingly, (though it's a difficult goal) the process and the substance (proceduralism and substantialism) are linked in his theory, even though he later makes an option for the defense of substantialism.

However, unlike Tushnet, Tribe doesn't advocate the end of the judicial review. The author actually claims the need for the maintenance of the Supreme Court and the judiciary role as a defense mechanism of minorities (that can have their rights harmed), as well as the balance between the powers and the constitutional democracy itself.

6. The economic analysis of Law of Richard Posner

The initial point of the economic analysis of the Law is the work "Economic Analysis of Law" launched at the beginning of the 70s of the last century in Chicago by Richard Posner. This work was divided into seven (7) pieces, involving topics such as the law of firms and financial markets, the distribution of wealth and tax revenues, the American legal process, as well as the nature of the economic legal reasoning. (Posner, 2003, p.26-44)

The center point of this theory is that the law is an instrument to achieve social ends and accordingly its main goal is the economic efficiency. Posner considers that economics is the excellence science of rational choices, stating at his digressions that economics guides the economic analysis of Law and that people are rational maximizers of their satisfactions. Therefore, everybody (except for small children and the mentally retarded) in all activities (except under the influence of psychosis or mental disorders caused by drug use or alcohol abuse) works with choices and should maximize them. (Posner, 2003, p.26-44)

The central thesis of the economic analysis of law could be then synthesized in an utilitarist point view, in which the decision of a judge should be guided by a cost-benefit relation. Thus, the Law is only perspectival when it promotes the maximization of economic relations, and the wealth maximization should guide the actions of the magistrate. (Posner, 2003)

We observe here a subservient basis of the U.S legal pragmatism, of a realistic bias, which sees the Law only through the exogenous (external) consequentialist logic that denatures the binary code of law. (Posner, 1999)

This way, the Law presents itself as a strategic and undetermined instrumental of any internal justification, causing a deficit of legitimacy and judicial correction. Thus, when Posner indicates the criteria of cost-benefit and wealth maximization, he provides a place for the judiciary to guarantee dogmas (for example: private property, contracts) that displace the legitimacy of judicial decisions from the Law to the economic parameters. The juridical decisions lose then their deontological character, guiding themselves by a ratio of costs and economic impacts interconnected by the logic of efficiency. Therefore, we find here a strong strand of consequentialism, which supports that the judicial decisions (judgment) should not be taken looking back to the past (following, for example, a interpretativist bias) but always looking forward to the future (but not as the non-interpretivism), so as to choose among options, the one that brings the greater advantage, that for Posner must always have an economical bias. (Posner, 1999) (Posner, 2003)

Posner, who is a Federal Judge, will be very criticized for many of his positions. One of them even reached the U.S. Supreme Court, as the foundation of the decision of the Bush x Gore election, where by five votes to four, the original result of the election was maintained, even though it was known that it was biased at the state of Florida. (Dworkin, 2006) According to Posner, decide for the recount of the votes (even if it was legally consistent because of possible fraud) would cause a huge loss to the institutions of the country in addition to an excessive instability caused by the lack of a decision on who would be the next president. We note that for the author, it is more important evaluating the decision's consequences than its legality and normativity. (Dworkin, 2006)

Criticizing this idea, we understand that if the market imperatives begin to guide the judicial conduct, the Law will be colonized by another system with a different logic, profit and loss, and then the Law will tend to disappear, with all the obvious risks to the stabilization of a democratic society.

7. The integrity theory of Ronald Dworkin

We understand that the Dworkin's project is much richer (and wider) than the previous debate, mainly because it relies on an understanding of the Law related to the achievements of the hermeneutic-pragmatic turn and intimately concerned about the quest for a justification of the legitimacy of law and legal decisions.

For the North-American jurist and philosopher Ronald Dworkin law must be read as part of a collective enterprise shared by the whole society. Rights would then be creatures of history and morality, to the extent that they have a historical-institutional construction for sharing within the same society the same set of principles and recognition of equal rights and freedoms to all subjective members (communal principles)[2]. This involves recognizing that all who belong to the same society necessarily share a common set of basic rights and duties, including the right to participate in the construction and attribution of meaning to these rights, whether in the field of the Legislative or the Judiciary Power.

Therefore, magistrates neither would be free to exercise strong discretion while deciding concrete cases brought to the courts, nor could base their decisions in the pursuit of collective goals (which benefit only a portion of society over another branch) if individual rights (embodied by legal principles) are under question, because – as wildcards in a game of cards – they hold primacy over the first (collective goals), given their universal character – being valid for all members of that given society (Dworkin, 1986).

[2] The "Communal principles" becomes the fundamental idea in the Dworkian theory, for it is the condition of possibility for the metaphors of Judge Hercules and the "Chain Novel".

The realization that the decision making activity of judges is not produced in the vacuum, but rather in a constant dialogue with history, reveals the influence of Gadamer's hermeneutics. However, Dworkin goes further and advocates a constructive interpretation[3] and, therefore, a critical hermeneutic theory in which the decision of a case produces an "increase" in a particular tradition. Moreover, the construction of the decision of a case and, consequently, of its constitutional interpretation, shows itself as something undertaken collectively and open to constant evolution and – why not – review.

Dworkin devises a metaphor (the chain novel) in which each judge is regarded as merely the author of a chapter in a long collective work about the proper interpretation of a legal system. Each judge is, therefore, not only bound to the past, but also is committed to continue the work of her predecessors and to preserve the integrity of the legal practice by constructing the best possible theoretical scheme of the principles recognized by the community in which she is inserted. (Dworkin, 1986)

Summarizing the thesis: The integrity denies that the manifestations of the Law are mere factual reports focused on the past, as it does the conventionalism linked to the positivism; nor instrumental programs focused on the future, as intends the pragmatism tied to the realism. For the Law as integrity, legal affirmations are at the same time, interpretativist positions directed to both the past and the future. In these terms, "Law as integrity, therefore, begins in the present and only turns to the past when its contemporary approach so determines. It doesn't want to bring up, even to the current law, the practical ideals or goals of the politicians who first created it. It (Law as integrity) seeks to justify what these politicians did (…) in a general story worth telling here, a story that brings a complex statement: that the current practice can be organized and justified by principles sufficiently attractive to provide an honored future. The law as integrity deplores the mechanism of the old view of 'law is law', and the cynicism of the new 'relativism'. It considers that these two points of views are rooted in the same false dichotomy of finding and inventing the law. When a judge declares that a certain principle is steeped in the law, his opinion does not reflect a naive statement about the motives of the past statesmen, nor a claim that could be easily refuted by a good cynic, but an interpretative proposal: the principle fits itself into any complex part of the juridical practice and its justifies; it offers an attractive way to see, at the structure of this practice, the principle consistency that integrity requires." (Dworkin, 1986)

[3] A social practice such as law or courtesy is interpreted in a "constructive" way when the interpreter does two things: 1) first, he acknowledges that this practice is not merely a brute social fact, but rather has a purpose or a "point" that makes it valuable to him/her and to those who join the practice. 2) second, he interprets this practice in a constructive way because he regards the practice as "sensitive" to this point and strives to make this practice the best it can be from the point of view of its very point. (Dworkin, 1986)

A society that accepts integrity as a virtue becomes, according to Dworkin, a special type of community that promotes its moral authority to take and mobilize the monopoly of the coercive force. Therefore, Dworkin's theory (though some Brazilian authors insist to not understand it!), brings at least four (4) points that are worth highlighting, since they are relevant to this debate: (1) the denial of judicial discritionarity (in the strong sense); (2) the denial that the judicial decisions can be based on political guidelines; (3) the relevance of the due process to the dimension of the integrity; and (4) the own notion of integrity, which requires the understanding that each case is a part of a continued story; therefore, a case can't be dismissed without a reason based on a consistency of principles. (Dworkin, 1986) (Dworkin, 2006) (Dworkin, 2011)

8. Conclusion

The scientific turn of the critic rationalism of Karl Popper, as well as the tax law pragmatic-hermeneutic turn of Wittgenstein and Gadamer, ultimately taught us that knowledge paradoxically produces ignorance, because when we get to know something we reduce the complexity, ie, when we launch light on an object of analysis, other objects are darkened. This only characterizes science and scientific knowledge as products of a human condition, which today is known as precarious (against a myopic Enlightenment rationalism) and liable of constantly review and refutation (because it's fallible).

And in these terms, still the old dichotomies insist to haunt our lives, like ghosts that come and go at the course of history. Despite the relative and alleged didacticism of these dichotomies in propaedeutic lessons of the juridical awakening, we believe in a less lazy and more critical point of view, that they hide more than unveil the processes of law enforcement and the highly complex theories of justice that permeate the theory of the Law and the hermeneutics (critical) behind them.

This text grew out of a question asked to Ronald Dworkin, one of the world's most renowned jurists and already worked in this essay. Asked uncritically, by the umpteenth time in the XXI century, if he was, after all, a jusnaturalist or a positivist, Dworkin answered in an ironic tone: "Well, if there are only these two options and if I have to choose one of them, I'm a jusnaturalist, even though, obviously, I am not, in fact, I am quite the opposite!"

The same would happen if the question was about the preference for the will of the legislature or for the will of the Law (or of public Law versus private Law), or about the theme of this essay (interpretivism and non-interpretivism), or about any other dichotomy incompatible with the complexity of our days.

We believe that the weak proceduralism of Ely, the minimalism of Sunstein, the constitutional populism of Tushnet, the substantialism of Tribe, the economic pragmatism of Posner, as well as the integrity theory and the constructive interpretation of Dworkin are all willing to go beyond, what, undoubtedly, has enriched the north-American debate.

Changes in Constitutional interpretation about fundamental rights:
Conditions And Limits

Adriano Sant'Ana Pedra[1]

Abstract: The objective of this study is to analyze the informal constitutional changes and to further examine the limitations to which they are submitted. According to the concretion theory, constitutional norms result from the connection between the normative program (Normprogram), that is, its literal expression, and the normative ambit (Normbereich), understood by the surrounding reality, which results in a decision norm. Constitutional mutations occur from the existing alterations in the normative ambit and contained by the concretion process. Through deductive process, the obtained results enable us to evaluate the limitations that are imposed to constitutional mutations.

Keywords: constitutional interpretation; fundamental rights; judicial review.

1. Introduction

The interpratation of the Constitution will always occur in a certain context, which must not be disregarded. The constitutional interpretation constitutes a creative process of production of the provision, that is, what is had is an attribution of the normative meaning. Thus, the constructive process is fundamentally volitional, and not merely cognitive, which overcomes the traditional idea of interpretation as a process of discovery or disclosure of a meaning previously existing in the linguistic enunciation.

Considering this necessary overlapping between the factual reality and the normative reality, it is necessary to keep the Constitution from being attacked by manipulators of its construction and, for that purpose, conservation devices are important. If, on the one hand, there are limits expressed in the Constitution for the Parliament to make the constitutional reform, without prejudice to the implicit limits also confirmed, on the other hand, for a constitutional change that is operated by action of the constitutional justice, it is necessary to extract from the Constitution such limits, through a sufficient theoretical development.

This paper has as purpose to identify and analyze the boundary lines that apply to the changes to fundamental rights occurred through the decisions of the constitutional justice. The study was made based on the propositions of Friedrich Müller's structuring methodology, considering the opening of the constitutional system, which permits to approach, with this concretist theory, the demands of the contemporary society, which has as traits the social differentiation and the political pluralism.

2. Changes as a phenomenon inherent to the constitutional provisions

The constitutional change performs a highly relevant function in the constitutional concretization process, as it harmonizes the search for normative meaning and the legal security demanded by the Constitutional State. The phenomenon of the constitutional changes is a constant in the life of the State and the Constitution must be understood within its time.

According to the concretization theory (MÜLLER, 2008), the constitutional provisions result from the connection between the normative program (Normprogram), that is, its literal expression, and the normative scope (Normbereich), understood as the surrounding reality (MÜLLER, 2000). As the normative scope is subject to changes along time, the results of the concretization of provisions may be changed, in spite of the fact that the normative text – and, thus, essentially, that the normative program remains the same (MÜLLER, 2007). Thus, the changes to the constitution occur based on changes occurred within the normative scope and must be assessed in the process of the concretization of the constitutional provisions (PEDRA, 2011).

The constitutional change modifies the content of the Constitution as the result of a change to society's general understanding on a certain subject. That is, the constitutional change corresponds to the harmony that must exist between the Constitution in force and the living society.

3. The normative supremacy of the constitution

The limitations to the constitutional changes are imperative. If, on the one hand, the Constitution must conform to the social reality, on the other hand, there must be prudence so as not to permit a state of anomy, even though in the presence of the constitutional wording.

Opposite to what occurs with the constitutional reform, that has its limitations expressly - and implicitly – set forth in the constitutional wording, the constitutional change does not have expressly established in the Constitution its limits and its reach, which will be the result of the supremacy and the normative power of the Constitution.

It is necessary, above all, to preserve the principle of the constitutional supremacy, which indicates that the Constitution is the ultimate provision of the legal system, and that above it no other provision may concretely exist. As Pedro de Vega teaches, in the recognition of the existence of constitutional changes, one cannot challenge the Lex superior characteristics of the Constitution (VEGA, 1999, p. 214-215).

The constitutional changes may coexist with the principle of constitutional supremacy, without adversely affecting it. Pedro de Vega (1999, p. 215) highlights that the problem of the limits of constitutional changes arises when the factuality/normativeness tension socially, politically and legally turns into a conflict that puts into risk the very notion of supremacy.

Besides supremacy, one must also observe the normative power of the Constitution. As Konrad Hesse recalls, "the legal Constitution does not mean a simple piece of paper, as characterized by Lassalle" (1991, p.25). Further, according to the teachings of the German author (HESSE, 1998, p. 503), the existence of the Constitution is, firstly, a matter of its normative power. And, further, the more the constitutional order corresponds to the realities of the historical situation, the higher will be the willingness to recognize the contents of the Constitution as mandatory. And, the firmer is the determination to update these contents, the higher is the chance of threatens being avoided.

The Constitution must be both normative and dynamic. While the normative power of the Constitution will be responsible for the confirmation of life in society, the concrete situation will give dynamism to the constitutional provisions. This is why Pedro de Vega (1999, p. 211) writes that it is not about fiat jus pereat mundus prevailing, let alone imposing the factuality, but, finding a formula that without destroying one or the other, permits normativeness and dynamism to coexist.

4. Boundary lines of constitutional changes

The idea of a normative Constitution demands that the constitutional provisions be responsible for conforming the reality. In this regard, it is imperative to approximate the factual world and the normative world so that, there is no mitigation to the supremacy of the Constitution, considering that the factual cannot overcome the normative. Thus, it is necessary that the constitutional change be restricted to the normative limits created by the Constitution itself, which will be seen below.

I) Elasticity of the wording

As a result of the very nature of the constitutional change, as an informal process of change to the Constitution , the constitutional wording arises as its most peculiar limit. Not the wording of the text, but the elasticity that it permits (PEDRA, 2010). The normative text constitutes the starting point of the constructive activity and will also define its limit.

The content of the constitutional provision can only be modified inside the limits drawn by the text (HESSE, 1992, p. 101) and the enunciations constitute "True barriers to construction for the operator of Law" (TAVARES, 2005, p. 219). Thus, if it is true that a text can have more than one meaning, it is also true that it cannot have countless meanings (CALLEJÓN, 1997, p. 108-109). In view of this, it is possible to say that the text performs a negative function (CANOTILHO, 2002, p. 1202).

But it must be highlighted that, in certain cases, the elasticity of the normative text permits the extraction of a provision that is far away from the wording of the Constitution without this implying its breaking.

This is what happened, for instance, with the concept of family given by the Constitution of 1967/1969, namely, "family is constituted by the marriage and will be entitled to be protected by the Public Authorities" (article 167 of the constitutional text of 1967 and article 175 of the constitutional text of 1969). Within this concept, there was no idea of protection to the situation of a man and a woman who happened to live together as spouses without having married. In spite of the literality of the above-mentioned provision, in its process of concretization, the Supreme Federal Court understood, when judging Special Appeal RE No. 60.657/GO that, because of the changes to Brazilian social and cultural conceptions, law should also protect the relationship constituted based on the cohabitation under the same roof of an unmarried couple. We can say that this gap between the constitutional text – which is recent as regards these decisions of the Supreme Federal Court – and the Brazilian reality is mostly due to the fact that such constitutional text has been enacted in a non-democratic manner, and has not been discussed in a constituent assembly formed by legitimate representatives of the people.

As observed by María Luisa Balaguer Callejón (1997, p. 34), it is very difficult to establish to which extent the construction may be taken.

> In the case of a text reconstructed by a new sociopolitical reality that highlighted another meaning from the written word, the problem becomes a matter of limits of change and thus, returns to the general issue of knowing to which extent the text can be taken without resulting in a constructive excess (CALLEJÓN, 1997, p. 34).

For instance, article 55 of the Argentine National Constitution demands, in order for a candidate to become a Senator, that he or she has an annual income of two thousand pesos fortes. This amount, that would correspond today to about two thousand dollars a month (SAGÜÉS, 2006, p. 34), represents an axiologically unacceptable oligarchic demand.

Thus, it is necessary to distinguish the new readings that are kept within the range of acceptable meanings of a legal text, from those other surreptitious creations of new precepts that occur through constructions that exceed the possible literal meaning of the legal enunciations and end up by transforming their interpreters into "illegitimate legislators" (MENDES et al, 2008, p. 132).

It must be highlighted that the limit is the elasticity of the constitutional text as a whole, and not of a specific enunciation individually analyzed.

II) Binding decisions of the Constitutional Court

Another limitation which can be found refers to the binding decisions of the Constitutional Court. Such limitation must be seen with temperance, since binding judicial decisions are seen as limits to certain interpreters of the Constitution, except v.g. the Constitutional Court itself, which is not bound to its own decisions.

It is possible to notice that the binding decisions of the Constitutional Court adversely affect the capacity of evolution of the construction of the Constitution, as the change of construction must come from this body, which restricts the possibility of occurrence of a constitutional change, as long as the binding decisions inhibit the freedom of construction of lower courts and, thus, the possibility that the changes reach the Supreme Court "from bottom to top".

We are not denying here the legitimacy of the changes to binding decisions, which must occur when they are no longer consistent with the social reality. It is perfectly possible that the Court expresses a change to the case law criteria, even though they are solidly rooted. The Constitutional Court is not bound to its own precedents, and it may decide on a different way (overrule).

The foundation of the Constitutional Court must make reference to the prior binding decision and justify the denial of the criteria that led the Court to decide as it did in the previous time. This burden applies because, in this case, the Court is operating a constitutional change. As a new decision modifies the content of the Constitution, a reinforced foundation is demanded to justify the change of understanding by the interpreter.

III) Progressiveness and prohibition of retrocession for the fundamental rights

The constitutional change that involves fundamental rights and guarantees is a one-way path, that is, a path that admits only advances in the informal changes to the Constitution (PEDRA, 2008b, p. 173-205). This is not only a prohibition of retrocession, but also a demand for advances as much as they are possible.

As it is known, many fundamental rights and guarantees need the legislator so that it can be concretized, more even in relation to the constitutional provisions with limited efficacy. Thus, the prohibition of retrocession will inhibit arbitrary revocations of laws that meet this function, as Jorge Miranda writes:

> Once they are concretized through legal provisions, they cannot purely and simply be revoked, returning to the prior status (although those legal provisions may, and obviously, must be declared unconstitutional when they are not in accordance with the Constitution); the legislator certainly has the faculty (by operation of the pluralist democracy) to change any legal system, what it does not have is the faculty of subtracting in a supervening manner from a constitutional provision, the enforceability that it has, however, acquired (MIRANDA, 2000, p. 254-255).

On this subject, decision nº 39/1984 of the Portuguese Constitutional Court analyzed the revocation of articles 18 to 61, 64 to 65 of Law nº 56/1979, which would correspond to the destruction of the National Health Service, created by this law and set forth in article 64, 2, of the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic. In this judgment, the Court determined that the State cannot step back and breach what it had already complied with.

Ingo Wolfgang Sarlet (2004, p. 255) finds that the prohibition of retrocession "directly results from the principle of maximization of efficacy of (all) provisions of fundamental rights". Besides, the author asserts (SARLET, 2004, p. 254) that, within the scope of the Brazilian constitutional law, the principle of prohibition of retrocession implicitly results from the constitutional system, in particular the following principles and arguments (non-exhaustive list): (i) it is a principle of the democratic and social State ruled by Law, (ii) the principle of dignity of human person, (iii) the principle of the maximum efficacy and effectiveness of the rules that define the fundamental rights (art. 5, § 1, CF), (iv) the principle of protection of reliance and, (v) self-binding of state entities in relation to their prior acts.

It must be reminded that, in Brazil, the fundamental rights are treated by the Constitution as immutable clauses. It must be highlighted that the enunciation of the provision contained in article 60, § 4, of the Federal Constitution, when using the expression "tending to abolish", wished to preserve in any case, the core of the Constitution, forbidding even the consideration and vote by the National Congress, not only the proposal of constitutional amendments that come to suppress any devices highlighted as immutable clause, but also those which come to hit them in an equivalent manner, disclosing a tendency to their abolishment, also affecting its essential content. In view of all of that, it is obvious that the original constituent legislator did not as well wished that the essential core of the Constitution were mitigated by a constitutional change and it is possible to assert that the immutable clauses are positioned as a limit both to the formal changes and to the informal changes to the Constitution.

However, there are those who defend that the immutable clauses do not establish an absolute intangibility of the constitutional asset protected by it. In this line of reasoning, although the essential core of the protected constitutional assets remains preserved, that is, "provided that the essence of the principle remains untouched, circumstantial elements connected to the asset turned into an immutable clause could be "modified or suppressed" (MENDES, et al, 2008, p. 219).

In line with this understanding as regards immutable clauses in general, it must be highlighted that, as the nature of the prohibition of retrocession for fundamental rights is based on principles, such prohibition must be seen in a relative manner.

However, a retroceding measure, in order not to violate the principle of prohibition of retrocession, must, "besides having a constitutional justification, safeguard – in any case – the essential core of the social rights" (SARLET, 2004, p. 260).

IV) Influence of the international courts and the foreign national courts

In this beginning of 21st century, we walk towards a supranational law that is stimulated by commercial, economic, social and cultural relationships, that end up by limiting the state sovereignty and providing a new face to international law.

In this sense, José Joaquim Gomes Canotilho teaches that an internal legal system, "cannot, nowadays, be out of the international community. It is bound to principles of international law (principle of independence, principle of self-determination, principle of compliance with human rights)" (2002, p. 81).

And this international law must have as fundamental principle the international protection of human rights.

A point that must be highlighted here is the world tendency of abolishment of death penalty. Advancing in this regard, many countries have tried to convince those that still adopt these measures so that they carry out a moratorium on the executions, that they extinguish the capital penalty for underaged people and people with disabilities, and even that it ultimately results in their total abolishment.

In this context, the world community turns to the United States of America, which still resists and keeps death penalty, and it would be possible to reflect about an "internationalization" of the US Supreme Court. Many countries seek to interpret their own constitutional law considering the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. However, the US constitutional justice has demonstrated certain reluctance in searching for support beyond its borders, when it is required to interpret the Constitution of the United States. It is worth highlighting that > in a recent and controversial decision adopted by the US Supreme Court, in case Roper vs. Simons (2005), in which an opinion absolutely prevailing in foreign legislation about death penalty to those under the age of 18 was invoked, to assess the constitutionality of that measure in the USA, Justice Scalia, in a dissenting opinion, observed: "The recognition of the international approval does not have a place in the legal opinion of this Court, unless it is part of the criteria for decision of this Court" (TAVARES, 2006, p. 79).

However, in Atkins vs. Virginia (2002), the Supreme Court understood, by 6 votes against 3, that the Constitution of the United States prohibits the death penalty for people with mental disorder. Justice Stevens, who was the reporter for the winning vote, expressed the new understanding that the Court gave to Amendment VIII, observing that the world community disapproves the imposition of death penalty for crimes committed by people who suffer of mental retardation. Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia reproved the position of the Supreme Court because of its reference to the international understanding on this matter, qualifying the thought of the world community as irrelevant, as their notion of justice not always corresponds to that of US people, but theirs were dissenting opinions.

Notwithstanding, the citizens of most countries have shared aspirations, the same sense of dignity and of value and feeling related to justice. Justice Stephen Breyer, who has been the most prominent member of the Supreme Court to seek guidance outside his country, highlights that the "globalization" of human rights is imperative as long as they must be available to all people and not only to the individuals of specific States. And this does not subvert the concept of sovereignty in any way.

It is necessary to distinguish between the situations in which the influencing decision comes from a recognized international court (effective law) or when the referenced case law comes from a foreign national court (non-effective law), a case in which it will be just a matter of a persuasion element. Notwithstanding, the reference to foreign legal provisions or to the international public opinion gives the Constitutional Court an additional tool that is potentially useful for the solution of complex subjects involving constitutional law.

V) Prospective effects of the new interpretation

As the Constitution is the base of the entire legal system, any change to its construction has a large repercussion and may generate strong legal insecurity. Therefore, it is necessary to reduce the legal impact caused by such informal changes to the Constitution, preventing retroactive insecurity, so that the new understanding be applied only to cases that occur after it.

As the provision is construed by the interpreter during the process of concretization of the law, in the constitutional change there is the creation of a new provision, which, because of that situation, will never be able to produce effect for prior events, in compliance with the principle of the legal security. Thus, when a new meaning is given to the constitutional command, it is necessary to save from this new understanding the legal relationships occurred in the past.

> The doctrine of impossibility of retrocession serves the value of legal security: what happened has already happened and must not, at every moment, be legally challenged, under penalty of endless disputes being started. This doctrine, therefore, fulfills a function of permitting the solution of disputes with minimum social disturbance. Its basis is ideological and reports to the liberal conception of law and of the State (FERRAZ JUNIOR, 2001, p. 248).

The legal security must be present in a society, because it represents one's certainty of acting according to the behavior standards in force. People need to know how they must behave in the community where they live, and this is incompatible with the possibility of retrocession of provisions. Ronald Dworkin reminds the objection that "if a judge creates a new law and applies it retroactively to the case before him/her, the losing party will be punished not for having violated any duty he/she had but for having violated a new duty, created by the judge after the fact" (DWORKIN, 2002, p.132).

The normative change can only produce prospective effects, always forward along the time. Such limit could only have an exception in a criminal matter and to the benefit of the defendant, when then retroactive effects would apply in order to reach in time the conduct thereof. In this sense, article 5, XL, of the Brazilian Constitution ("the penal law shall not retroact, except to benefit the defendant") could be read as "the penal provision shall not retroact, except to benefit the defendant".

5. Final Considerations

The considerations presented in this text showed that the study of the constitutional changes based on the theory of concretization permits to understand its nature and to establish its conditions and its limits.

According to the theory structuring the constitutional provisions, it is possible to take the incorporation of reality in the provision. This means that the constitutional reality is a complex and including reality, in which facticity and normativeness flow together and appear reciprocally related.

The evolution of the constitutional case law is a constant in the life of the State and occurs because the meaning of Constitution is not given beforehand, but it depends on the context in which it is concretized. The constitutional feeling present in each moment lived starts to permeate the realization of the Constitution and it, as a living organism, permits that we follow up the evolution of the social, political and economical circumstances.

Notwithstanding, in spite of the fact that the circumstances at the normative level integrate the conception of the provision, this does not mean that the Constitution must yield to the forces of the circumstances of reality because such homeostatic process of dynamic balance has positive and negative limits.

The Constitution must be both normative and dynamic, so that the Constitution's normative force regulates life in society and the concrete situation grants dynamism to the constitutional provisions. The changes to the constitutional case law must not generate traumatizing deformations or subversions to the established order and will only be considered legitimate if they do not exceed the boundary lines resulting from the Constitution's supremacy and normative power.

Gadamer‘s dialectics and its basis on Hegel‘s theory

Danilo Ribeiro Peixoto
Nathália Lipovetsky e Silva
Ricardo Henrique Carvalho Salgado

Abstract:Philosophical Hermeneutics' main purpose is the analysis of understanding itself. From this basis, it represents a major rupture from an instrumental perspective of interpretation. Interpretation no longer reports itself to a group of techniques destined to find a hidden or an obscure meaning of a text. Instead, it is a phenomenon that occurs constantly, moment after moment. Hermeneutics is, then, meant for something far greater. It has an ontological basis, in which language occupies the centre. Considering that reality is essentially the product of men's interpretation, men are hermeneutical beings. In accordance to this thought, all things are destitute of an autonomous and essential meaning. Meaning is given by the being which exercises interpretation; a historical being on a specific context, making interpretation a unique and an unrepeatable event. Hence, interpretation embraces all reality and it is not an instrument operated by a subject in regard of a far object. It presupposes a symbiotic interaction between both, which breaks the archaic dichotomy subject-object. Gadamer encountered on Hegel's work one of the great influences for his own theory, especially regarding Hegelian dialectics. Albeit this major influence, Gadamer's dialectics reveals distinct features. It assumes in part the structure of a dialogue, like seen at Socrates' dialogues. As the Hegelian dialectics, though, it aims the totality of reality, although it is the language that occupies an essential matter. Understanding is achieved through a dialectical process that culminates at the fusion of horizons. Both subject and object possess each one a singular horizon that furnishes them with the conditions – and imposes limitations - within which comprehension is possible. The horizon of the subject and the horizon of the object opposes themselves inquiries and answers on a continuous spiral movement which aggregates new content in each rotation. Fusion of horizons conceals a dialectical structure. At the event of interpretation, both horizons merge themselves on a mutual horizon, process which results in a unique product renewable for new interpretation events.

1. Introduction

Protagonist of Hermeneutic Turn, Hans-Georg Gadamer sought to clarify the understanding phenomenon, conceiving Hermeneutics from an ontological perspective[1]. Thus, Gadamer's Philosophical Hermeneutics departs from an instrumental perception of interpretation, especially considering that language is treated beside reason as ontological to men.

Gadamer was a disciple of Martin Heidegger and it is possible to identify in his work considerable inheritances from his master's thought. Albeit this major influence, his Philosophical thought could not be seen properly as only Heideggerian derived. It receives the injunction of some very distinct sources, from which could be detached Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel as one of the most important. Hegel was not just an interlocutor of Gadamer, like many others; actually, his thought seems to receive a great inspiration of Hegel's Philosophy, especially regarding Hegelian Dialectics. Gadamer himself recognizes Hegel as one of the three major influences of Modernity to his thought, besides Heidegger and Husserl[2].

In accordance to Gadamer's theory as exposed in Truth and Method[3], his greatest work, understanding could be identified as operating in a dialectical process This paper seeks, in general aspects and not exhaustively, an analysis of Dialectics in Gadamer's thought, attempting to approach the theme of Hegelian Dialectics in order to understand the influence of Hegel in Gadamer's work. It also aims a short exam of Gadamerian Dialectics' specificities, presenting its similarities and its unique features in comparison to the Hegelian's.

2. Dialectical Logic

In Hegel's philosophy there is no linearity between cause and effect, the movement is circular.

For example, when Parmenides states that "being is being and not-being is not-being", Aristotle sees the principles of formal logic, meaning principle of identity, principle of excluded middle and principle of contradiction. To Hegel, stating that "being is being" is enough, since it comprehends a subject and its predicate. The "is being" was added to the "being" and in there lies the not-being. Dialectics constitutes itself of the totality's contradiction movement. The thing in its totality carries in itself its negation.

It is important to emphasize that Hegelian dialectic is not a method, it is not a set of directive rules of thought in search of the truth. Surpassing the being/ thought distinction duality, dialectics consists in the inherent logic of the being becoming, it is its expression.

Contrary to what takes place in the Ancient world, in Hegelian dialectics the negation of negation does not result in the elimination of the negated term. Instead, it results in its surpassing into the moment of synthesis, in the totality.

Dialectical logic has three movements, commonly presented as thesis/antithesis/synthesis. The first of the three is the passing from the being-in-itself to the being-there, or the passing from abstract universality to particularity; the second is the passing from the being-there to the being-for-itself, in a subjective movement of negation more extreme than the one before; the third moment is the negation of the being-there by the being-for-itself, concluding the dialectical movement with the surpassing of the for-itself, that returns mediated to its in-itself, constituting the moment of the being-in-itself-for-itself before Reason.

The most famous and didactic illustration of the dialectical logic is the dialectic of recognition, or the master-slave dialectic, narrated by Hegel in the Phenomenology of Mind (or Phenomenology of Spirit, there are both translations from the German word Geist), which we now briefly broach below.

Dialectic of recognition

It is in the master-slave dialectic that Hegel presents the struggle towards the recognition oscillating between physis and nomos, between particularity and universality, until finally Reason achieves its self-recognition as the home of universal consensus.[4]

With recognition man knows himself to be unique and the same at once, in a dialectics in which lies the possibility of a society of equal and free beings, individualized.[5]

In the Phenomenology is described the observation of the experience that consciousness has through history in the development of the absolute knowledge, which basic elements are history and dialectics. The expression of the absolute knowledge is the Reason, once are resolved the contradictions of the self-consciousness (as equality and inequality) through the work of the Spirit. This knowledge is the outcome of the work of all generations, the work of the Spirit in the process of self-knowledge, which most significant moment lies in the concept of work in the master-slave dialectic. The Phenomenology presents two dialectics: the revealed intention of the development of knowledge through the dialectic of certainty of the subject and of truth of the object (the work of consciousness is precisely the one of finding the unity point between certainty and truth) and the dialectic of the development of freedom, in itself and for itself, abstractly and concretely in the relations men brace among themselves in the course of history.[6]

The master-slave dialectics is not restrained to the historical slavery period, but, instead, explains all the relationships of domination between free beings, since it is a deriving risk of freedom itself. It is the explanation of reality revealed in the idea of freedom, reconciling the reality with the concept.[7]

Consciousness is the consciousness of a living being and the consciousness knows what itself is by knowing a living being, in a relation of mere desire and consuming (abstract infinite). To find a permanent object of desire, consciousness needs an object that does not escape from it. It needs the concrete universal, in-itself and for-itself: other consciousness. Before this universal the consciousness finds itself to be the universal and that it is its own object of desire and that only the consciousness remains as universal and for-itself. There no longer exists the relation of desire and consuming, but instead, there is the recognition through which the consciousness knows itself both as subject and object (self-consciousness). It is only in another self-consciousness that the self-consciousness finds satisfaction.[8]

The thinking is the negation of the world presented as a given, to achieve universality, in a way so action is the negation of the given and, thus, dialectical creation. Action is the rationality itself, that negates its reality as a given without stopping being what it was, putting history into motion.[9]

Reason creates a second nature, the nature of Spirit: the culture, which is the work of a Reason that is of all (the I that is we) and not of one only. The master-slave dialectic shows men's exit from its natural and biological world towards the spiritual and cultural world, where he lives as a free being.[10]

The master-slave dialectic takes place in two dimensions, both aiming the desire of recognition: the action of struggle and the action of work.[11]

In the struggle the self-consciousness try to vindicate its identity as absolute self-consciousness, laying the foundations of the spiritual world (culture). In the life and death struggle between self-consciousness life and freedom are at stake, two essential values to the definition of the self-consciousness. Life is risked in the name of freedom, but it cannot be sacrificed because there cannot be freedom without life. The outcome of this struggle is at one hand the free and independent self-consciousness (the master's) and at the other the dependent self-consciousness (the slave's), that renounced freedom to remain alive and now has both life and freedom as gifts subjected to the master. The master, however, keeps its independence through the recognition given by the self-consciousness of the slave, both in the relations of subsistence and in the assertion of its freedom and independence. The struggle for the recognition of freedom puts life, the supreme value of the living, at risk. From the beginning the dialectical action of the struggle has the purpose of spirituality and what the man seeks with the struggle is not the material survival, but the recognition as a free being (but not a mere living being, an animal). In this double movement the self-consciousness finds in the other not a dependent object destined to the fruition of desire, but other self-consciousness, autonomous. The outcome of the struggle is an abstract negation, as negation of the man's immediate and unilateral life and as the negation of life in its preservation, considering that the fear of death shows to the defeated self-consciousness its truth – life, a gift of a winner. Master and slave are, then, respectively, one independent self-consciousness which essence is being-for-itself, and one dependent self-consciousness which essence is being for the other. [12]

The action of work dialectic is superior to the first one. The inequality brought by the struggle is the preservation of life and freedom, equally essential. The two consciousnesses preserve themselves, even if in inequality, because they know that death would not resolve the contradiction and that life has to be preserved because life is the presence of freedom. The slave's self-consciousness gets its free self-consciousness from fear and work. The master consumes the object with desire while the slave shapes it with work, commanding his desire, shaping himself, overcoming his fear, and the servile consciousness becomes the truth of the independent self-consciousness.[13] Positions change: the master becomes dependent of the slave self-consciousness, which transforms the world and transforms itself in an independent self-consciousness. This freedom, initially, is purely interior, stoic. The slave attempts, then, the recover of his for-itself, no longer through the life and death action (which would take the dialectical relation to a infinite negative process) but through the relation of work and modification of the external world as a mediative element to the lifting of the slave's self-consciousness to the same level as the master's.[14]

The struggle and the risk of death make the negativity surface, which accomplishes itself as work, which, by its turn, transforms the nature. The non-freedom of the master consists in the fruition without previous work. He depends on the slave, his freedom is incomplete because he does not see the other as his equal and there can only be logical liberty between peers. The slave, on the other hand, recognizes the freedom of the master and knows himself to be free too, as with his work he freely transforms nature. Phenomenologically, the slave is in a higher degree.

3. Dialectics in Gadamer's thought

Hegelian Dialectics in Gadamer's view

Following this paper's purpose on examining Hegelian roots of Gadamer's thought, it would be convenient to shortly remount how Gadamer himself analyses Hegel's work, more specifically Hegelian Dialectics, since his analysis of the understanding process is developed by a dialectical logic.

Identifying a crescent interest at the study of Hegel's philosophy at the 20th Century, Gadamer praises the profound sibylline of his books and the plasticity of his lectures, deriving from them the great influence it exerted at 19th Century[15]. He argues that assuming Hegelian's idea of science would give appropriate conditions to an adequate confrontation of the contemporary philosophical interest in his readings. Then, Hegel's The Science of Logic should be put on a central position to this matter.

According to Gadamer, with his logic Hegel sought to consummate Kant's transcendental philosophy – of universalist nature. Like Fichte, Hegel would had identified in Kant's auto conscience, which would be capable of spontaneously determine itself – autonomy, the fontal point to every truth of human knowledge. He seeks, however, something more: the self in transcendental sense. Pure self is spirit, and self's truth is pure knowing[16].

In The Phenomenology of Spirit's conclusion appears the idea of philosophical science, which reports itself not anymore to certain figures of the conscience, but to determined concepts[17]. There would be the beginning of logic; the beginning of science is based on results of experiences from the conscience, which is initiated with the sensible certainty and is consummated in spirit's figures that Hegel nominates absolute knowing: with art, religion and philosophy. They are absolute because any opinating conscience will go through what is shown on them in full affirmation and here starts science for the first time because anything is thought but thoughts, the pure concept in his pure determination[18]. The expression pure thought has Platonic-Pythagoreanorigin and represents the comprehension that thought frees itself from turbidities of the senses[19]. Absolute knowing would be result of a purification, emerging as truth of the concept of transcendental self, which is not merely subject, but reason and spirit, and, this way, everything that is real[20]. Hegel reproduces absolute knowing as the truth of Metaphysics, relating his idea of spirit to logos-nous's metaphysics of Plato-Aristotelian tradition. Hegel assumes to himself, says Gadamer, the task of fundamenting again Greek logos above modern spirit's soil, that knows itself from self-clarification of conscience about itself – inside itself anything that is true can be found without ulterior ontotheological grounding[21].

Hegel saw Greek philosophy as the philosophy of logos, which had the boldness to considerate pure thoughts on their own, being the result of that the unfolding of the universe of idea. Gadamer says that Hegel utilized a new expression in order to do so: das Logische (the logical element), and that he characterizes by it a joint scope of ideas, like Platonic philosophy had developed in its Dialectics. Gadamer said that according to his survey he couldn't find the use of this expression before Hegel. In Plato, this joint scope of ideas had as impulse making account of every thought[22].

Gadamer said that in Hegel's work could be seen both an admiration for the Ancient Greek together with the conscience of superiority of modern life, determined by Christianity and its reformer view, as a peculiar combination[23].The task assumed by Hegel in fundamenting again Greek logos would reproduce the Hegelian intent to achieve an authentic philosophical science. This scientific pretension has the light of a proper Modernity's Cartesian ideal and that would implicate the assumption of a method. Hegel assumed the method of Dialectics, says Gadamer explicitly[24][25].

It is necessary to highlight that Hegelian Dialectics consisted in a singular model, distinct from Platonic Dialectics and from the use that [25] As stated before, the authors of this paper assume that Dialectics could not be seen as a method, considering that Dialectics reports to the structure of reason itself and that the reality itself is full of contradictions, or, better saying, is dialectical. Dialectics would be the inherent logical of self's devir. Then, „all that is rational is real, and all that is real is rational". Althought stating Gadamer that Dialectics would be method, as it will be retaken later, the aim that Gadamer assumes with his own Dialectics is similar to Hegel's. Both seems to aim for the totality of reality, each one by his own way.

Hegel's contemporaries made of the term Dialectics[26]. Gadamer states that the "Hegelian Dialectics of Logic" has the pretension of taking clearly account of the property of every thought by means of a systematic unfolding of every thought. The systematic deduction of pure concepts appears in The Science of Logic, in which spirit had conquered the pure element of its existence, the concept, and determines the system of science as a whole. It presents the thought's whole of possibilities as the necessity with that the determination always determines itself a little more[27].

According to the concept of ancient Dialectics, Dialectics essentializes itself in the sharpening of contradictions, in unfolding mutually opposite hypothesis in its consequences[28]. According to Gadamer, Hegel saw in ancient Dialectics a merely negative task, since it only pretended to realize by the elaboration of contradictions a preparatory work to knowledge[29] criticizing the lack of a positive knowing[30]. Hegel would assume to himself this positive task. He sees in Dialectics the task of achieving by means of sharpening contradictions a step towards a more elevated truth, which unifies contradictions. The power of spirit would be the synthesis as mediation of all contradictions. Reason, provided with universal power of synthesis, remains with the task of mediate oppositions of thought and suspend all oppositions from actual reality, what it demonstrates in history[31].

In Gadamer's view, Hegel identifies three moments that constitute the core of dialectics and he did recognize all of them in ancient Dialectics: first, thought is the thought of something in itself by itself; second, as being that, thought is a necessary thinking together contradictory determinations; third, because he suspends itself in the unity of contradictory determinations, this unity is showed as self itself[32]. Hegelian logic is developed in three levels: self, essence and concept[33].

In Hegel, the dialectical moment that unifies contradictions is speculative, which reveals the identity of non-identity, i.e., the identity of difference. Joaquim Carlos Salgado resumes Hegelian Dialectics as the process by which could be detached the three movements of spirit: position – (something stated, thetic), denial of position and denial of denial of position. This last moment is speculative. Dialectics would start itself, then, as the contradiction by which the negative internalizes itself in the positive and vice-versa. Revealing is this movement the totality, speculative moment of duality's overcoming. Contradiction as internal movement and totality characterize this process by which the absolute is shown - Spirit[34].

Professor Salgado identifies three main elements to Dialectics: contradiction, movement and totality. First, if reality is full of contradictions, Dialectics seeks to unify contradictions or the plurality of contradictions the same way that did the quest for science in Greek thought. Second, in the view plurality, by thinking of the fact and of the non-fact, thought must develop a movement from the fact to the non-fact and from the non-fact to the fact; in the view of change, dialectical thought accompanies the process of genesis of reality. Third, dialectical thought does not make the beginning of the process apart from its middle and its end, and identity does not do it either relatively to difference or opposition. To be able to think of something, it would be necessary to think of it as an identity, it wouldn't be possible to think it otherwise as identical to itself. By thinking of it as identical to itself, the thought opposes it to what it is not and by this act includes in it what it is not. This way, it could only be thought as movement of totality, of what is and of what is not, that is, of movement of identity, of difference and unity of these two moments, says Salgado[35].

Gadamerian Dialectics

Dialectics in Hegel's philosophy takes the concept as its result, which is related to absolute and is constituted by a process of revealing self in its essence. Heidegger opposes a well-known comment to this Hegelian conception stating that finding essence is an impossible task. It would only be possible to recognize existence, taking Heidegger's concept of dasein to identify man from a "projected Project", a being-there in the world, a project which seeks meaning on its own existence, recognizably finite and dated. Language is what makes this search for the meaning possible. Hegelian ontology, as opposite as Heideggerian's, is an ontology of infinite[36]. The same way, Gadamer's also opposes himself to Hegelian's in this perspective.

Gadamer parts from this same presuppose stated by Heidegger and also treats language as ontological, as a constitutive part of self. Since language makes possible the individual's understanding of the world, it is important to recognize that language is presented in an intersubjective relation. Where there was before a subject-object relation, now remain a subject-subject interaction mediated by language[37].

Furthermore, Gadamer recognizes in his interlocutions with Heidegger and Husserl the existence of a horizon, which could be understood as historical horizon or horizon of meaning, that adheres every subject and every object involved in the interpretative process. In other words, interpreter and interpreted encounter themselves inserted in a determined tradition, which figures simultaneously as condition and as limit to the understanding. Condition because interpretation and understanding only make themselves possible by previous understandings, pre-concepts that the subject retains about the world around him; limit, because the fact of being conditioned by tradition makes his possibility of understanding limited in amplitude, once it happens parting from what his historical horizon allows him to comprehend.

Interpretative process as seen by Gadamer results at a fusion of horizons between the horizon of a subject who interprets with the horizon of the interpreted object. The product is a shared horizon that contains the meaning and it is only achievable by language. This relation occurs in the form of a dialogue of questions and answers between the interpreter and the interpreted. The interpreter opposes his pre-conceptions as questions to the interpreted text[38], which by its term opposes answers and new questions to the interpreter, in a dynamic interaction that is renewed every single instant at what is called hermeneutical circle. Perhaps it would be more didactic to refer to the hermeneutical circle as some kind of hermeneutical spiral, since that in each turn of this process new contents are aggregated to the understanding.

[38] Text could be here understood as any linguistic reasoning.

It is clearly possible to perceive that this hermeneutical process conceals a dialectical structure. However, Dialectics in Gadamer's theory as exposed in Truth and Method is significantly different from Hegelian Dialectics. Reality is interpreted by Gadamer in the plan of finitude, he doesn't see it as showing itself as absolute. A perspective of finitude implicates contingent history, seeming to make Gadamer refuse Hegelian Dialectics - which terminates at the absolute - seeking in Plato's Socratic dialogues a reference model of open dialectics[39]. Gadamer sees Hegelian Dialectics as a monologue, as reason talking to itself only. Also, it comes to an end, it is finalized with the achievement of an absolute concept. Differently, Gadamer grounds his own Dialectics as a dialogical open process that is constantly renewable. By this task he retakes as reference the referred dialogical perspective of Plato's Socratic dialogues.

His extensive studies of Greek philosophy aside, perhaps the singularity of Gadamer's thought derives itself mostly from the junction of his philosophical influences on Hegel and Heidegger. Although opposing himself to some aspects of Hegelian Dialectics and elaborating his own conception of Dialectics, Gadamer seems to have also metaphysical concerns. He seems to aim totality of reality in a different way, by Hermeneutics, the mode of being of Dasein, considering that reality is essentially interpretative and interpretation consummates itself through language. Language is the necessary medium to this achievement, since it universalizes the understanding phenomenon at an intersubjective shared background. Thus, reality only exteriorizes itself to Gadamer in the plan of existence - being, then, historical and finite - and is shaped from the many interpretations of this same plan of existence by means of each interpreter.

Hegelian dialectics proposes a reflection of self, a total self-mediating of reason. His philosophy brings the idea of historical dimension as a whole, identifying the historical path in reason itself. In Gadamer Hermeneutics is related to experience; it is a "spirit" that experiments reality. Therefore, history to Gadamer wouldn't be a path for mankind in search of an absolute spirit, but something that produces effects in man at any moment of his life, especially when he seeks auto-understanding, thus when he seeks to find the meaning of the things. This way, unity in plurality is achieved by the meaning, not the concept, as Hegel proposes[40]. History in Gadamer is seen as effective and, therefore, funded on experience, capable of assume infinite ways. As Gadamer states, experience presents itself to new experiences. A person is not what she is only by her experiences, but also someone that is open to new experiences. Reaching a concluding knowing is not the purpose of Gadamerian Dialectics, then, unlike Hegelian's.

As states Richard Palmer[41], truth is then revealed not by any methodical means, but dialectically. Method proves itself as incapable of obtaining a new truth, but only the truth already implicit in it. The own discovery of method is not achieved methodically, but dialectically. The theme to investigate orientates controls and manipulates method; in dialectics, it is the theme that evokes questions to answer. The answer only could be given if belonging to the theme and situating in itself. Method involves a specific form of questioning that only unveils one aspect of the thing. Dialectics' aim is, before, phenomenological: to make self reveal itself. A dialectical Hermeneutics opens itself to a questioning by the self of things in a way that things we can find could reveal themselves in their self. In Gadamer this is possible because of the linguistic character of human understanding and, ultimately, by the own self[42]. This way, the title of Gadamer's main work is ironic: method is not the way to the truth; in contrary, truth mocks methodical man[43].

4. Conclusion

In consonance to Gadamer's theory, considering that reality is essentially the product of men's interpretation, men are hermeneutical beings. Thus, all things would be destitute of an autonomous and essential meaning. Meaning is given by the being which exercises interpretation; a historical being on a specific context, making interpretation a unique and an unrepeatable event. Hence, interpretation embraces all reality and it is not an instrument operated by a subject in regard of a far object. It presupposes a symbiotic interaction between both, which breaks the archaic dichotomy subject-object.

Understanding, main object analysis of Philosophical Hermeneutics, is, then, achieved dialectically. Both subject and object possess each one a singular horizon that furnishes them with the conditions – and imposes limitations - within which understanding is possible. The horizon of the subject and the horizon of the object opposes themselves inquiries and answers on a continuous spiral movement which aggregates new content in each rotation. At the event of interpretation, both horizons merge themselves on a mutual horizon, process which results in a unique product renewable for new interpretation events.

Gadamer encountered on Hegel's work one of the great influences for his own theory, especially regarding Hegelian dialectics. Albeit this major influence, Gadamer's Dialectics reveals distinct features. It assumes an open structure of a dialogue, like seen at Socrates' dialogues. As Hegelian dialectics, though, it aims the totality of reality, which is possible through language, that furnishes the universal intersubjective background to the understanding phenomenon.

Decentralization:
New values and new rights

Prof. Juan Alberto del Real Alcalá, PhD[1]

Abstract: Globalization has expanded the areas in which rights can be considered a legal category. Globalization has opened new areas to manage and enforce rights at world level as well as the subnational level, in the Constitutional State. Moreover, state centralism cannot attend to all the rights claimed by the people in Constitutional States. This phenomenon has caused rights to be present at multiple levels. At the subnational level, this multilevel presence is linked to the contemporary decentralization process in the Constitutional State and to the emergence of specific rights: new rights at the federal, regional local levels. This paper approaches the bases of these specific rights in the Constitutional State and their linkage with the new constitutional values.

Keywords: Decentralisation; constitutional values; specific rights.

I. Introduction: Decentralisation and current constitutionalism

The decentralisation processes adopted in many western European countries in the second half of the 20th century and Latin America at the end of the century are ongoing in the 21st century. Decentralisation has not always occurred to the same extent and intensity, and therefore it has a specific singularity in each country via their respective constitutions. Several types of decentralisation can be distinguished in the Constitutional State:

Firstly we can differentiate the case in which decentralisation is deployed in relation to the Constitutional State's institutions. This, in turn, involves two different levels of decentralisation: a minimum and a maximum level. The minimum level corresponds to a "merely administrative" level of decentralisation that does not imply a decentralisation of political power – which is still concentrated in a single location –, but only of the institutions that administrate it. Currently, in addition to the centre, political power is extended to other territorial locations[2]. We can also distinguish a maximum level of decentralisation that is "political", characterised by a re-distribution of political power among the traditional central location and multiple territorial seats, as opposed to a merely administrative decentralisation. The institutions that administrate political power are also reorganised according to said distribution, given that this more intensive type of decentralisation necessarily implies the corresponding administrative decentralisation[3]. The novelty of institutional decentralisation (regardless of whether it is administrative or political) resides in the new administrative locations (merely administrative decentralisation) and/or new seats of political power (political decentralisation). Therefore, I classify this type of decentralisation as "organic decentralisation" because it mainly involves a decentralisation of the functions of the main bodies of a State, either at the legislative, executive or judicial level.

[1] Professor of Philosophy of Law, University of Jaen, Spain. Email: adelreal@ujaen.es.Website: http://www4.ujaen.es/~adelreal

Secondly, apart from the decentralisation of institutions, we can distinguish the decentralisation arising in the citizenship, which could be classified as a "decentralisation with regards to rights". This type of decentralisation emerges as an instrument for the attribution of "new rights" based on the recognition of singular individual and/or collective rights at subnational levels (autonomous communities/regional/local) in the State of Law. In general, the new rights will involve empirical contexts that are more closely and specifically related to peoples' lives. For that reason, such rights often have to do with the content of "cultural diversity" and its manifestations. Whereas the novelty of organic decentralisation processes consists in the appearance of "new locations" for the management of institutions (whether political and administrative, or merely administrative) , the novelty of this type of rights-related decentralisation lies in the emergence of "new rights" linked to the new territorial locations (autonomous communities/regional/local) as result of said organic decentralisation.

In this section, I will address the latter cases of decentralisation related to the assignation of new rights allocated by the Constitutional State, taking into consideration the following characteristics:

Firstly, rights-related decentralisation normally starts with some type of organic decentralisation, such as political decentralisation. In other words, merely administrative decentralisation tends not to involve the allocation of new subjective rights. Rather, its impact is restricted to the institutional context of Public Administration.

Secondly, when decentralisation has operated in relation to rights, it often does so with the intention of opening new avenues and more optimal methods of actually attaining "rights for everyone". The strategy has consisted in bringing rights closer to their holders in order to mitigate the disconnection that occasionally arises between stated rights and people's real lives. This frequently justifies the setting up of new territorial locations (autonomous communities/regional/local) and regulations to which the recognition and implementation of rights can be allocated. In other words, rights-related decentralisation is frequently linked to the issue of the effectiveness of this legal category via the subnational levels of a Constitutional Democracy.

Thirdly, since the new rights linked to the new territorial locations are supposed to be very close to the actual situation, they have much to do with the specific contexts in which the life styles of their holders are expressed. Consequently, in many cases they are linked to the recognition of "cultural diversity" and its various expressions. This has made it possible for closed, monocultural societies to evolve towards open[4] multicultural societies on the basis of the new rights. They are also able to show their multiculturality not as a negative social weakness that should be hidden, as it has been in the past[5], but as a positive empirical-social characteristic that should be recognised, preserved and made visible, despite the problems posed by multicultural management[6].

Despite this, decentralisation in our times is not an ex novo phenomenon. Rather, it is based on the anti-centralist tradition that took shape in the 19th century, which I will outline briefly in the following section.

II. Decentralisation and new values

Whereas decentralisation in a liberal State of Law in the 19th century was not a successful process and the State of Law became strongly centralised, the result one century later has been very different: decentralisation has involved moral and constitutional-legal values, and generated new subjective rights that seek to increase citizens' well-being. To this end, it has promoted not only changes in ordinary legislation but also constitutional amendments, and even fostered processes to set up new constitutions. In other words, from the 20th century onwards, decentralisation has had a clear impact on the theory of rights, the full historical genesis of which could not be covered without taking decentralisation into account. This is because decentralisation is part of the historical process of the extension and specification of rights[7].

In general, the decentralisation that gave rise to citizens' rights required important legal adjustments and a legislative framework that have not been an isolated fact in the legal system. Rather, they have been shaped by a series of norms established in the Constitution and other legal bodies of a general and territorial nature (autonomous communities/regional/local), as well as numerous interconnected legal categories. I will now mention the "legal values" and "subjective rights" that seek to carry them out.

To be precise, following the above explanation, the decentralisation processes that lead to rights are frequently connected with the most important legal values in the legal system. Given the normative value of the Constitution[8], legal values consist of norms – according to PECES-BARBA – "that indicate the aims to be attained, and leave the choice of the best procedures for making them effective to the legal practitioners, despite the fact that the some of the procedures are enshrined in the Constitution: via its configuration as a constitutional legal principle; the fundamental rights[9]; the fundamental duties of the public authorities; and the relations between individuals, via the organisation of institutional authorities"[10]. It follows that there is a conceptual connection between legal values and the other aforementioned legal categories, insofar as the latter constitute mechanisms for implementing the former[11]. Hence, this conceptual connection serves to establish a significant link between the rights arising from decentralisation and the principle legal values of the legal system. Moreover, in reference to rights (and, therefore, to the rights created by decentralisation), the conceptual connection includes the Constitution, because it recognises those rights, and the State of Law, which cannot be conceived without them[12].

Occasionally, decentralisation-related rights and decentralisation as such appear to be the direct expression of an ulterior (or primary) moral value that lays the foundation for the Constitution: human dignity as a universal moral value [13]. This means basing said moral values directly on the material value that presides over the constitutional system and the rest of the legal system. When this occurs and decentralisation is associated with moral values and, by receiving the latter in law, with core constitutional legal values[14], it is highly likely that the rights arising from decentralisation – or at least some of them – will acquire the quality of "fundamental rights". In fact, the conceptual connection between decentralisation-related rights and higher legal values is so strong that when the two are found to be incompatible, decentralisation has been able to promote a constitutional amendment or even prompt a process to provide a country with a new Constitution.

[9] In the next section I address the path of fundamental rights in relation to decentralisation as a mechanism for implementing the content of higher legal values.

[14] To the contrary, when decentralisation does not go hand in hand with citizens' rights and becomes a strictly administrative aspect, it is not necessarily related to the Constitution and could be reduced to a specific legal body that regulates a country in general or in relation to one or more specific territories. In such cases, decentralisation does not need to be based on constitutional values and may reside in the general principles of Administrative Law, that is, functional organisational principles of a general, regional or local nature.

In Europe, for instance, this has occurred in Spain, where the decentralisation process is included in the Constitution, mainly in Title VIII of the Spanish Constitution (SC). Here, decentralisation is not devoid of the constitutional values on which the Magna Carta is based, as stated in Article 10.1 SC: "The dignity of the person, inherent inviolable rights, free development of the personality … are the foundation of political order and social peace"[15].

This has also occurred in the case of Bolivia's Constitution of 2009, to cite a Latin American example. Decentralisation in that country led to the drafting of a new Magna Carta that included the redistribution of the (legislative, executive and judicial) functions of the State. It gave rise to the emergence of new territorial locations (the Autonomous State), a new decentralised government (at the regional and local level), new fundamental subjective rights, the recognition of numerous jurisdictions and the criterion of intercultural interpretation. Bolivia's decentralisation is a long-term process based directly on the value of human dignity, for individuals (personal dignity) as well as groups (collective dignity). It also derives from the recognition of multiculturality and plurinationality by the constituent political power as new legal-constitutional values that are higher than the Constitution and the rest of the legal system.

Moreover, those higher values have been mainstreamed into the Political Constitution of the Plurinational State of Bolivia (PCS) from the normative and institutional points of view. Thus, they permeate the core of Bolivia's legal system, constitutional system and the entire legislative, executive and judicial institutional system. It is worth mentioning that decentralisation in Bolivia has meant nothing less than a transition from a highly centralised neoliberal[16] "single nation/single culture State of [15] Although Spain's decentralisation began late, with the amendment of the Main Law of the Autonomous Community of Catalonia in 2006 and Andalusia in 2007, it clearly established distinct new rights for the citizenship, related to the existing territorial locations (at the subnational level). See, ÁLVAREZ VELEZ, M.I.; ALCÓN YUSTAS, M.F.; MÁRTINEZ GARCÍA, C.: "Derechos y libertades y Estado de autonomía", in Revista Vasca de Administración Pública, No. 87-88, 2010, pp. 47-78.

Law"[17] to a decentralised "State of Law based on national plurality" that seeks to build a social model underpinned by the notion of the "good life"[18].

The connection between higher law-values is further reinforced in Bolivia's constitution from the moment that personal dignity and collective dignity (of the indigenous farmer nations and people, and of the Afro-Bolivian and intercultural communities) have been regulated by the constituent authority as an "inviolable" principle that must be protected and respected as a "primary duty" of the State, pursuant to Article 22 PCS[19]. The moral foundation of personal and collective dignity, which are enshrined in the Constitution, include a series of "ethical and moral principles of a plural society" that are at the heart of multicultural and plurinational values. As such, they are recognised by the Fundamental Law and "assumed" by the State of Law with a commitment to "promote" them (Article 8.I. PCS: "ama qhilla, ama llulla, ama suwa (don't be lazy, don't be a liar, don't be a thief), suma qamaña (to live well), ñandereko (harmonious life), teko kavi (good life), ivi maraei (land without evil) and qhapaj ñan (noble life or path)." Other political principles that underpin the State and are also related to the moral dimension of multiculturality/plurinationality are (Article 8.II. PCS): "inclusion", "dignity", "harmony", "social equality", "common well-being" and "social justice".

This means that the ethical and moral dimension of multiculturality and plurinationality raise these constitutional values to the level of the main "driving force for equality" and an important pillar of the new "justice system" (multicultural and plurinational justice) that Bolivia's new Magna Carta seeks to implement. Such constitutional values underpin the rights arising from decentralisation, which are complemented with other legislative values via the constitutional value of freedom (i.e. positive freedom) and of equality (i.e. equality in the sense of differentiation). They also replace the merely negative freedom and simple equality proclaimed by the former highly centralised republican State of Law.

Naturally, the moral and legal scope of Bolivia's values of dignity and multiculturality/plurinationality do not lessen their importance as "political values" fully assumed by the constituent authority, to be implemented via the Constitution, designed institutionally by the State and set out in the Constitution[20]. Thus, such moral and constitutional-legal values are not of ordinary importance, therefore, but of foundational importance for Bolivia's Constitution, State and the country itself. The Preamble to the Constitution is evidence of this, as well as the regulatory content of the values and their core placement in Section II (Principles, Aims and Values of the State) of Title I (Fundamental Bases of the State) of Part One of Bolivia's Constitution[21].

To conclude, decentralisation is directly linked to the legal category of constitutional values also has a bearing on the function fulfilled by these higher values as legal "interpretation criteria": as the material metanorms for interpreting other norms when there are loopholes in the law and new regulations. In this respect, as PECES-BARBA indicates, legal values "show that we are dealing with an authentic legal norm, although the norm goes beyond the values. An undeveloped critical morality remains to put pressure on the values, as positive law, thus enriching and complementing them by gradually developing them in that direction. Legislators, judges, other legal operators and even the citizenship also develop and interpret the higher values."[22]. Thus, it should be emphasized that when there is a close conceptual relationship between decentralisation (and the rights arising from it) and core constitutional values, the former can have an impact on "criteria that are substantially valid" or "materially" valid in law, and which complement the criteria of formal validity. In such case, they necessarily place a condition on the ordinary legislator's task, and on the implementation and interpretation of legal norms.

[21] This can be seen, among other norms in the PCS, in Article 1, according to which "Bolivia is constituted in a Social Unitary State of Plurinational Communitarian Law, free, independent, sovereign, democratic, intercultural, decentralised and with autonomies." It also appears in Article 5.II ("The plurinational Government…"), Article 13.III ("…the Plurinational Legislative Assembly…"), Article 126.IV ("…the Plurinational Constitutional Court…") and Article 158.I.4 ("…Plurinational Electoral Body…").

III. Decentralisation and the new rights

The conceptual connection between the legal categories of values and rights makes it easier for the decentralisation processes in the Constitutional State that arise from moral and legal-constitutional values to be expressed, as they often are, by creating new "subjective rights" at State level and/or the subnational level. As mentioned in the preceding section, this legal category can even be considered as fundamental (a "fundamental right") that is recognised and enshrined in the Constitution.

Naturally, in such cases, the regulatory recognition of a subjective right is of capital importance for the right to exist, because laws are the main method by which a right can become a part of the legal system[23]. If we have a right, it is because it has been conferred to us by a law[24]. Thus, there is a very close relationship between the right and the law that confers a right. A close relationship must also exist between the conditions for implementing the right and the law. By "conditions" we mean the actual circumstances that must concur before the regulation or right can be implemented[25]. The conditions for implementation are an essential step for the material existence of the law and the right. Thus, taking this into consideration with regards to the laws for rights, the conditions for the implementation of a subjective right will come from the factual circumstances (content) of the law that confers the right. Moreover, if the conditions for implementation can be drawn from the content of the law that confers the right, then they are no different than the conditions arising from the circumstances of that same right. In other words, the conditions for implementing a law that confers a right can be equated to that right.

The decentralisation processes that give rise to rights often seek to eliminate – or at least mitigate – the barriers imposed by too abstract a configuration of the subjective rights that the Constitutional State grants the citizenship, when said rights are excessively uniform. This occurs when three conditions are met:

a) The factual circumstances of a subjective right (and the law that confers it), as well as the conditions of implementation underpinning the right are legislated in a disproportionately abstract and vague manner, with the result that the right is too uniform to be implemented[26].

b) The resulting uniformity arises from the fact that, when making the objective law that attributes the subjective right, the legislator failed to take into consideration the particular and specific contexts that apply to the right, and in which the significant life experience of some of the holders of the rights takes place.

Contexts of "significant life experience" means the singular characteristics that are an essential part of an individual's identity and modus vivendi.

c) The singularities and specifications in the context of implementing a right that were not taken into consideration by the legislator become actual "material difficulties" for carrying out the right for some of the beneficiaries of the right.

It is true that a law that confers a right exists in the cases in which the conditions a), b) and c) are met; and that the conditions for implementing the law and the (subjective) right are also met; and yet the right is not actually carried out for some holders of the right. Therefore, ineffective rights can easily arise from this manner of legislating rights without taking the specific contexts in which they are to be implemented, even when the rights have been recognised in a constitution and/or legislation.

The problem with such cases is that it is extremely easy for them to give rise to situations of "negative discrimination". In fact, the inability to exercise a right because the factual circumstances surrounding it have been too uniformly drawn up in the law may give rise to situations of inequality that are "negatively discriminating" for the holders of the rights insofar as it prevents them from exercising their rights. Naturally, it is not a case of discrimination by operation of law if the subjective right is legally or constitutionally attributed to all the estimated recipients by an objective legal norm. It consists in "discrimination in fact", or factual discrimination, because specific contexts for exercising the right have particularities that affect actual possession of the right and cause material difficulties for complying with it. Thus, a material inequality (discrimination) arises between those whose life experience develops in said specific contexts (which become barriers to exercising the right) and those who are not bound by such contexts.

In view of this situation, to overcome the aforementioned barriers, decentralisation processes seek to resolve factual discrimination arising from material inequality established in a legal system. In this respect, they are guided by a premise of equality, according to which "rights belong to everyone and are for everyone". Consequently, they follow the criterion of the need to extend rights to everyone in an effective manner. The strategy deployed by decentralisation to attain this aim is to attribute "specific new rights" to the holders of rights who are in significantly singular material contexts. Hence, the new rights will take into consideration the particular characteristics of the specific context in which they will be implemented, to the point that said specific context will be integrated into the "factual circumstances" of the right and, as a result, into the factual circumstances of the law that confers the right. This will facilitate its actual implementation from the legislative point of view. Thus, decentralisation generates "specific rights" that objective law attributes to certain individuals only, via the "equality strategy" of reverse discrimination[27]: those who are more vulnerable can enjoy the rights attributed by law because their living conditions are interrelated with factual situations that would lead to material situations of negative discrimination if they were not considered as such by objective law.

The foregoing shows that decentralisation is part of the historical process of the specification of rights. Secondly, that decentralisation operates in the direction of equality in the discourse on rights[28]. Thirdly, that decentralisation affects rights that are also closely linked to the issue of their effectiveness. Finally, as PECES-BARBA asserts, the theory of rights is justified, from a moral, political and legal viewpoint, in basing rights on differences (reverse discrimination with regards to vulnerable groups) and refusing to accept that inequality and negative discrimination can be based on rights[29].

Moreover, the specific rights caused by decentralisation start with the significant relevance of singularities that are an essential part of the life of the holders of rights, and attain significant relevance in the configuration of subjective right. Therefore, such rights often have to do with the diversity of life styles and cultures. Thus, they acquire a cultural meaning and their material content is related to cultural diversity. Obviously, due to the conceptual connection between rights and legal values, some legal-constitutional values constitute the foundation-root that justifies the regulation of certain rights. Accordingly, if decentralisation provides new subjective fundamental rights that have to do with cultural plurality, it must occur this way necessarily, because the value of cultural diversity will be assumed by the political authority (political value) as a higher value of the legal system (legal value).

Such is the recent case of Bolivia's Constitution, which integrates its own highly significant list of specific cultural rights as "fundamental" rights that are clearly founded-rooted in multiculturality and plurinationality as the core foundational and constitutional values of the new Bolivia, as mentioned in the preceding section. Said constitutional values have generated, of their own accord, a "series of fundamental subjective rights" with multicultural and plurinational roots, such as: the "basic fundamental rights for the preservation of live", which are the multicultural/plurinational underpinnings[30]; the fundamental "civil" rights of multiculturality and plurinationality[31]; the fundamental political rights [29] PECES-BARBA, G.: La dignidad de la persona desde la filosofía del Derecho, 2nd ed., Dykinson, Madrid, 2004, p. 72.

[30] Such fundamental rights (or supremely fundamental rights) are enshrined in the Chapter Two (Fundamental Rights) of Title II (Fundamental Rights and Guarantees) of Part One of Bolivia's Constitution. The basic fundamental (supremely fundamental) rights of a multicultural and plurinational nature are to be found, for instance, in the "right to an intercultural education, with no discrimination" (Article 17 PCS); the "right to health" in a single universal, gratuitous scheme that is intracultural, intercultural and developed by public policies at all levels of government (Article 18.III. PCS); or, according to Article 35.II. PCS, the right for "the traditional medicine of the indigenous farmer nations and people" to be a part of the national health service.

[31] Section I (Civil rights) of the Chapter Three (Civil and Political Rights) of Title II (Fundamental Rights and Guarantees) of Part One of the Constitution. Among the fundamental civil rights of plurinationality, mention should be made of the "right to cul-of multiculturality and plurinationality[32]; the "specific fundamental" rights of the indigenous farmer nations and people[33]; the fundamental "social" rights related to plurinationality/multiculturality[34]; the fundamental "educational" and "cultural" rights of plurinationality/multiculturality[35]; and the fundamental rights of social communication based on tural self-identification", for instance (Article 21.1. PCS); the "right to freedom of residence and permanence" as another right of the indigenous farmer nations and people to live and remain in their ancestral lands (Article 21.7. PCS); the "right to dignity", the moral root of multiculturality/plurinationality, as an "inviolable" right that the State has a primary duty to respect and protect (Article 22 PCS); the Constitution also protects the "collective freedom" of the indigenous peoples, and recognises their constitutional right to self-determination (Article 2 PCS).

[32] That right is in Section II (Political rights) of the Chapter Three (Civil and Political Rights) of Title II (Fundamental Rights and Guarantees) of Part One of Bolivia's Constitution. The fundamental political rights include, for instance, the "right to participate (politically) in the Collective Democracy" (Article 26.I and 26.II.3. PCS, according to "their own norms and procedures" (Article 26.II.4. PCS).

[33] These are in Chapter Four (Rights of the Indigenous Farmer Nations and People) of Title II (Fundamental Rights and Guarantees) of Part One of the Constitution. The Constitution makes them particularly relevant as a mechanism for recovering the minorities that have been made invisible as political subjects throughout history. The "right to exist freely" is one example of this (Article 30.II.1. PCS); the "right to their cultural identity, religious creed, spiritualities, practices and customs, and to their own world view." (Article 30.II.2. PCS); the "right to have the cultural identity of each of its members, if wanted, be registered alongside the Bolivian citizenship in their identity document, passport or other identification document with legal validity." (Article 30.II.3. (PCS); the "right to self-determination and territoriality". (Article 30.II.4. PCS); the "right to have their institutions be part of the general structure of the State." (Article 30.II.5. PCS); the "right to the collective titling of lands and territories." (Article 30.II.6. PCS); the "right to an intracultural, intercultural and plurilingual education in all the educational system." (Article 30.II.12. PCS); the "right to be consulted by means of the appropriate procedures (Article 30.II.15. PCS); the "right to the exercise of their political, legal and economic systems according to their world view." (Article 30.II.12. PCS).

[34] Chapter Five (Social and Economic Rights) of Title II (Fundamental Rights and Guarantees) of Part One of the Constitution. The fundamental social rights of plurinationality/multiculturality include, for instance, the "right to engage in work and employment according to the communitarian methods of production (Article 47.III. PCS); the "right to ethnic and socio-cultural identity" of Bolivian children and young people, as a right inherent to their development process (Article 58 PCS), and their right to the integral development of their personality (Article 59.I. PCS).

[35] Chapter Six (Education, Interculturality and Cultural Rights) of Title II (Fundamental Rights and Guarantees) of Part One of the Constitution. The educational and cultural plurinationality/multiculturality[36].

All these correspond to the new subjective rights provided by the decentralisation process in Bolivia at state level and the subnational (autonomic, regional and municipal) levels. The purpose of the subjective rights is to comply with the duty "to be" as a part of human dignity, which is the supreme value of Bolivia's Constitution, to the benefit of vulnerable groups that had been marginalised socially, politically and legally until the Constitution was ratified: the indigenous farmer nations and people of Bolivia. This legal classification of rights is connected to the constitutional values of multiculturality and plurinationality, as well as freedom and equality.

IV. Conclusion

Starting with a centralised state's inability to attend to all the rights sought by the population, one of the consequences that globalisation has on the theory of rights is the "broadening" of the spheres in which the rights should develop. New locations from which rights are to be managed and implemented, from the bottom up to level of the Constitutional State, as well as from the top down. This has given rise to multiple levels of human rights.

When globalisation occurs by extending the Nation-State from the bottom up, it opens rights up to a global/universal level (globalisation of rights), a space that is more inclusive of all human beings as the holders of rights. However, it also becomes more singular, because the location for implementing the rights is too abstract and potentially removed from the specific contexts in which peoples' lives actually develop. Consequently, in practice that sphere has often been reduced to a declaration rights of plurinationality/multiculturality include, among others, the "right to an intracultural, intercultural and plurilingual education within the entire educational system (Article 78.II PCS), which is also a communitarian and decolonising education" (Article 78.I. PCS); the "right to receive the teaching of the world view and spirituality of the indigenous farmer nations and people in public schools" (Article 86 PCS). It also includes the "right to receive an intracultural, intercultural and plurilingual higher education that takes into account the collective knowledge of the indigenous farmer nations and people" (Article 91. I and II. PCS).

[36] Chapter Seven (Social Communication) of Title II (Fundamental Rights and Guarantees) of Part One of the Constitution. Among these rights we could cite, for instance, the "right of the social media to contribute to the promotion of ethical, moral and patriotic values of the different cultures of the country (Article 107.I. PCS).

At the same time, globalisation has also affected the Constitutional State in the opposite manner, by opening rights up to the lower levels of state by setting up new locations (at the autonomous, regional and local level) to implement them, and by consolidating existing rights in such locations. The new locations stand out because they are more specific and closer to the reality of the individuals and groups that benefit from the rights that are declared/recognised there, and which they try to secure. This effect of globalisation is linked to the contemporary processes of decentralisation within the Constitutional State.

In these cases, if decentralisation has created rights and is not limited to a mere decentralisation of institutions and administrations, it tends to have the following effects on the Rule of Law:

On the one hand, decentralisation has generated "new locations" (at the subnational level) for implementing rights. In this respect, as asserted herein, decentralisation may be a useful tool for implementing rights. It may be a highly useful contribution to the effectiveness of rights that complements state protection and guarantees which, on their own (State centralism) may not be able to respond to all the population's demands for rights.

On the other hand, decentralisation also creates "new rights" via legislation. Some of these are general rights and others are specific rights that may be assigned at State level or the subnational (autonomic/regional/local) level. Accordingly, decentralisation is liable to become a valid instrument for extending rights and making them more universal, thus eliminating the material negative discrimination of rights formulated as laws that are too abstract and uniform in their implementation.

In fact, in many cases the decentralisation processes in the Constitutional State have been deployed in both directions and, therefore, they have had a highly positive impact. It could be said that when this happens it is because decentralisation is performing in the field of the value of equality with regards to widely held and effective rights. In other words, decentralisation is integrating the equality referred to in the discourse on rights. Under such premises, decentralisation of this sort is backed by the theory of rights, which allows rights to be underpinned by differences but rejects basing them on inequality and negative discrimination.

To conclude, the reverse discrimination criterion mentioned rejects the decentralisation processes that operate against material equality, that is, that are not oriented towards conferring rights (of reverse discrimination) with which to meet the equality rule of rights for everyone. Rather, they assign privileges to some and not to others, giving rise to discrimination in fact and by rule of law.

Is there a Marxist presence in the 1988 Brazilian Constitution?

Abstract: The current Brazilian Federal Constitution, dated October 1988 has a very rich history. For the first time in the history of Brazil, all social forces participated in the construction of the constitutional text. This experience allowed the Constitution to be composed of various ideological currents, including Marxism. The present article to explore the influence of Marxist and progressive currents in the construction process of the Brazilian Constitution.

1. Introduction

The current Constitution of Brazil, enacted in 1988, had a peculiar formation process, with the participation of various institutions and social actors, defending the most diverse political and ideological interests. Because it is formed by the clash of different social forces, the Constitution has in his body, various philosophical, economic, political and even Marxist bias.

Marx identified the presence of two situations. The first called the Economic Order, chapter in which is built the economic foundation of Brazilian society. In this chapter of the Constitution, although it brought elements of liberal economics as private property, contracts, free enterprise; elements such "liberal" can only be performed within the State. In Brazil, the state acts in the economy indirectly through taxation, regulation, planning and police power, directly or through state enterprises. Although there is a private economy that depends on the state for its activities in Friedrich POLLOCK (1998, p. 72) called state capitalism.

There is such a strong presence of the state in the economy in Brazil, the state can play a role in the distribution of wealth similar to what Marx proposed through the organization of the productive forces.

The second point that demonstrates the existence of a small Marxist orientation in the Constitution is in regard to solidarity among federal entities. The Constitution provides for the creation of metropolitan areas in order to better organize the utilities. It turns out that the creation of metropolitan regions involving several municipalities is only possible if there is solidarity among federal agencies, municipalities in the case. Thus, the Constitution created, based on the old Marxist maxim, each according to their means, each according to his needs, a Principle of Solidarity in which municipalities are required to cooperate with each other on matters of interest to a particular region .

The aim of this paper is to analyze in detail these two points to conclude whether there is a presence of Marxist thought in the Constitution of Brazil.

2. The Brazilian Economic Order

The current economic order in Brazil provides an interventionist State which, while allowing free competition, regulates economic activity, and participates directly in some cases.

The switches throughout Brazil and its history, with Constitutions Constitutions Liberal interventionists. The first Brazilian constitution in 1824 (Empire) and the second from 1891 (Czech), are liberal constitutions that little intervened in the economic order, taking with it the liberal perspectives in both the economic and political fields.

The 1934 Constitution introduced in Constitutional Law Brazilian social rights, and the 1937 creates the authoritarian state, although in the economic field is liberal. The 1946 Constitution and the 1967 has a distinctly liberal prerogative, either in its design philosophy, the design is economical.

The 1988 Constitution changed the paradigm, balancing the old liberal principles with a strong presence of the state, creating what we call above of state capitalism.

The law protects and manages the capitalist economic system, forming what is called the doctrine of State Capitalism[3]. For POLLOCK (1998, p. 72)

> "(1) The Market is deposed from its controlling function to coordinate production and distribution. This function has been taken over by a system of direct controls. Freedom of trade, enterprise and labor are subject to governmental interface of such a degree that they are practically abolished. With the autonomous market the so-called economic laws disappear.
>
> (2) These controls are vested in the state which uses a combination of old and new devices, including a "pseudo-market", for regulating and expanding production and coordinating it with consumption. Full employment of all resources is claimed as the main achievement in the economic field. The state transgresses all the limits drawn for peacetime state activities.
> (3) Under a totalitarian form of state capitalism, the state is the power instrument of a new ruling group, which has resulted from

[3] "The word state capitalism (so runs the argument) is possibly misleading insofar as it could be understood to denote a society wherein the state is the sole owner of all capital, and this is not necessarily meant by those who use it. Nevertheless, it indicates four items better than do all other suggest terms: that state capitalism is the successor of private capitalism, that the state assumes important functions of the private capitalism, that profit interests still play a significant role, and that it is not socialism." (POLLOCK, 1998, p. 72) > the merger of the most powerful vested interests, the top-ranking personnel in industrial and business management, the higher strata of the state bureaucracy (including the military) and the leading figure of the victorious party´s bureaucracy. Everybody who does not belong to this group is a mere object of domination."

All social, cultural and economic are transferred into the state, which maintains the economic logic operation (liberal, going to present a systemic unit above the other forces in society that exist only in reason and in the State. To BERCOVICI (2006, p. 87): "To the extent that the state and society interpenetrate each other, leading to identity between state and society (the state total), all fields become politicians, ie, there is no way to distinguish and that political identification between State and political. "

The creation of a State Capitalism in Brazil since the 1988 Constitution stems from the process of building the charter. The Brazil lived a military dictatorship from 1964 to 1985 the transition to a civilian government elected indirectly. One of the measures of civil government (José Sarney) was to convene a National Constituent Assembly, responsible for drawing up a new Constitution.

After months of legal discussion about the possibility of convening of the Constituent Assembly, and work began that in the initial period did not generate confidence and high expectations in the population. In this context, the leftist political parties begin to work in the drafting of the document, and as natural, draw up a Constitution with leftist ideological profile. With this, are increased individual rights, social rights, especially labor rights are brought into the body of the constitution, leaving the state responsible for providing these rights. Is created in Brazil a model of the Welfare State Social fully state. The health system is universal, is guaranteed for all Social Welfare, and numerous other social activities are placed under the responsibility of the State.

In the economic field, the left has organized to defend the nationalization of the crucial points of the economy, introducing the state monopoly in several points, and ensuring the direct participation of the state in economic activities through state enterprises.

Realizing that Brazil was heading towards socialism, added to the popular movements claim that organized, right-wing parties were organized, forming what is called "centrão" and began to fight the proposals of the hard left. The centrão to realize that it would be impossible to tackle all the work left, focused its efforts on changing the economic order, including the general principles of liberal economics like free enterprise, private property, free competition, among other principles.

With that, the Brazilian Constitution, the Economic Order now possess the following text which was amended during the 90s under Cardoso, the president tried to reform the constitution to reduce the presence of the state in the economy.

The constitutional text, even after the changes of the Fernando Henrique remains that From this we conclude that the presence of the state in the economic domain occurs in four ways: a) institutional b) normative or regulatory c) participatory ed) intervening.

We note, with this structure, the state is replaced with the text of the Constitution a role of central body rationalization of economic life. Every decision, even if taken in private at some point passes through the state and suffer this interference.

There is a very large charge redistribution in the Brazilian Economic Order. The tax system retains approximately 40% of the wealth produced in order to fund social rights under the Constitution, especially the health, welfare and education.

The organization of state enterprises and the establishment of a monopoly in strategic sectors of the economy revealed that there is a rationalization of the distribution of wealth based on the common good, ensuring everyone has access to scarce resources such existing mechanisms including income redistribution, as occurs in the Bolsa Família Program.

The state as the central rationalizing is the same structure proposed by Marx and implemented in Soviet countries. Although Brazil does not have a fully productive structure state, all economic decisions pass through the state that has the capacity to intervene and structure, allowing a fair distribution of income.

3. Solidarity between loved Federated

Brazil, for its geographical features, Adopt a federative model with three levels - Federal, State and municipalities, all politically autonomous. That is, each federated entity has political and administrative autonomy, and skills (performance area) determined by the Constitution.

However, the structure of the division of powers in Brazil is insufficient to achieve the goals of the Nation provided between Articles 2 to 4 of the 1988 Constitution.

The first reason is the transformation of cities into autonomous entities, which implies freedom of management and financial capacity to shoulder their responsibilities, issues in practice imply the lack of connection with the city and state and national policies, the political economic dependence higher powers of the municipality for payment of obligations given that the tax model, and not to favor local entities, is essentially centralized.

The second point to be considered is the size of the continental Brazil implying regional disparities whose solution can not be found in the model of division of competence centers in strategic political powers between federal, state and ignores the entity transfers the "local expertise" to municipalities without adequate financial compensation.

We in Brazil, two distinct realities, one of the North, Northeast and Midwest, whose cities have the size of an entire state, and are generally sparse and low population density, especially in the Amazon region and another, with the urban conglomerates and industrialized regions of the south and southeast. This asymmetry is not confined only to the geographical issue, but also the differences that are reflected in social and economic conditions.

Anticipating the conclusion, overcoming regional disparities will only be achieved if used the Principle of Solidarity, but only in order to support inter-regional, but also in the sense of a relationship of regional development, with the award of satisfactory conditions of dignified life for all citizens regardless of their territorial situation, especially with the homogenization of the provision of key public services.

In practice this implies the development of institutional mechanisms that enforce solidarity among federal agencies. As already stated above, the Union centralized economic power, with remaining 60% of the total public budget. However, not all utilities are the responsibility of the Union, having the other ones, skills (functions) to be exercised.

It is created in Brazil, holding funds, states and municipalities, aiming at the transfer of economic resources from being central to the poorer states and municipalities, as the need for each.

Are created with this two strategic funds. The first and the Municipalities Participation Fund which transfers to municipalities, as its population and poverty rate, money to fund the activities of the municipalities. The second is the participation of the Fund that, similar to the previous background, passes not to municipalities, but the States, funds for the maintenance of the poorest states, especially in the northern and northeastern Brazil.

There is also the distribution of tax revenues. Automatically, regardless of the economic situation of the state or municipality, the Union, and in some cases the state transfers part of the collected value with a specific tax for being smaller. For example, half of the tax collected by the State on the vehicle ownership is transferred to the municipality where the vehicle.

Demonstrating that there is, in the Constitution, institutional solidarity that leads from the rationalization of the central entity (union), the redistribution of income between the richest and the most loved poor. Constitutional Law in this Brazilian institutional solidarity is called “Cooperative Federalism”.

4. Conclusions

Analyzing the theoretical framework of the Constitution of 1988, coupled with the process of historical formation, we can reach the conclusion that there is a matrix Marxist incomplete.

This is because the beginning of the construction of the Constitution had a strong bias is that so many socialist constitutional claim that the Brazilian Constitution is a program (similar to the Constitution of Portugal), a program that leads to socialism. In the course of the constituent process conservative forces altered the original design socializing, however, remaining an array Marxist, recognize and address problems of economic and social inequalities through the strong presence of the state in the provision of public services, and income redistribution.

There is a constitutional solidarity[4] between people and between federal, this solidarity that brings no constitution in the world!

Legitimate power:
Law and the theory of sovereignty

Abstract:The main objective of this paper is to discuss the problem of the legitimacy of power and its relations with the various theories used Sovereignty in the Philosophy of Law, Political Science and Law. The argument made in the article dialogará to the classical authors of the legitimacy of power and sovereignty, especially Bodin, Hobbes, Locke and Rousseau.

from authority can define the size of the freedom of individuals, or even as the right to freedom of individuals can limit the action of the authority .

Theories of sovereignty and its link to the right , where it insinuates there first, whether in a natural law, either in the social contract , or even from the life of society , attempts to match various authors to explain the difficult , tense and problematic relationship between authority and freedom.

The proposal is to discuss the phenomenon of power from the relationships between the law and the classical theories of sovereignty.

For this, you need to map the theories of sovereignty and analysis of the role that the law plays in the inside of these. The authors chosen for this purpose are: Jean Bodin, Thomas Hobbes, John Locke, Jean Jacques Rousseau and Carl Schmitt.

The work has a highly interdisciplinary perspective because, as you know, Bodin and Schmitt were more lawyers to philosophers as Hobbes, Locke and Rousseau, most legal philosophers .

The question we address is to find, at the bottom, which ensures the possibility of the sovereign rule. In addition to the question "Who's in charge? ", Our investigation is to verify the conditions of possibility of a sovereignty which is based on law . In other words, it is about analyzing how the law may affect the policy or, on the contrary, the policy may condition the right.

We can say that the philosophical- political guarantees to their sovereign domain- matrix was constructed by the authors in an attempt to make the architecture of the reasons why the people must obey, or the reasons why the people should rule.

In fact, none of the classical theories of sovereignty, albeit with greater or lesser extent , the right rule in the construction process of its arguments. The appeal to natural law and juspositivism dichotom, for example, is key to understanding the position of the authors.

The place of law in mapping theories of sovereignty is especially important to understand what lies behind the debate between the classical authors. After all, is not new to modern politics, unlike previous historical periods, need to justify the power from rational assumptions . Does not necessarily mean characterize the sovereign as a person who is assigned to the laws.

What we intend to analyze in this way is a certain discomfort regarding the sovereignty / law relationship. Two sides of the same coin, law and politics are present simultaneously in the theories of sovereignty , which can lead to a situation or a situation of legitimate concern: the boss , do not need to explain why its domain.

2 . Bodin and sovereignty as a modern concept

Bodin is considered the first theorist to develop a concept of sovereignty in modern way, although that term was not foreign to the medieval period. It is located there between law and politics in this crucial moment to understand the state. The Six Books of the Republic was written in French in the late sixteenth century, which is especially interesting to note, if we take into account that is in a renaissance period. Bodin defines sovereignty as follows: "The sovereignty is absolute and perpetual power of a Republic"

On appeal to the Republic that we can find the definition, we read that sovereignty is an eminently public and not private power. That is why it is perpetual, does not depend on the representative figure in question at the time of command.

Furthermore, it is absolute. Therefore, indivisible, inalienable, hardcore, independent and supreme. But what identifies truly this author sovereignty, is the holder of sovereignty is the power to legislate without the consent or permission from anyone. All rights derive, in Bodin, this right to legislate. The sovereign, in other words, has the monopoly of law by the legislature .

Nor Bodin, however, the sovereign power is completely unlimited. Despite declaring that it is an absolute power, Bodin writes that the will of God, divine law, civil law and common to all men, natural law, are limiting the action of the sovereign. He does not explain very well how to operate, it is true that can often even be mistaken , and in fact , would have little importance in that no man on earth who would have the power to compel the sovereign to respect them .

The most direct consequence of disregarding the limits of sovereign power seems to give both the legal field and in the moral field. As regards morality, the ruler loses the honor. With regard to the law, the sovereign is obliged to observe the natural and divine law for all people whether they are arranged in order of positive law. In this case, the obligation not to limit arises from the fact that they are positive norms, but they have the divine origin determinations.

Interestingly, the cases in which the sovereign must respect limitations, as highlighted by Alberto Ribeiro G. de Barros, is the obligation of contracts and the inviolability of private property.

On the obligation of contracts, the argument is simple. If even God is bound to fulfill its promises, it is obvious that the sovereign is also. Note that this limitation does not arise in the background of positive law, which may have been drawn up unilaterally by the sovereign, but rather inherent in the bilateral agreement.

As regards the inviolability of property, Bodin is defending the idea that the possession of sovereignty does not mean ownership of the property of his subjects. The sovereign can only get hold of the property of the subjects where a proven and imminent threat to the purposes of the Republic occurs. The power of imperium (sovereignty) is different from the power of dominium (ownership rights).

3 . Hobbes and Rousseau

It is interesting to note how Hobbes Bodin shared with a particularity with regard to sovereignty. Both had the need to figure sovereignty in an individual subject (or in the case of collective Hobbes) physically thought. In other words, sovereignty is an attribute that distinguishes a man from the others and is beyond the possible abstraction of the concept.

But, in Bodin 's sovereign right to initiate calls to your domain, there is a power law, Hobbes, however, is the monopoly of physical force, the power of fact , that points to who is the figure of the sovereign representative.

In Hobbes, everything goes through the logic of a sovereign representative. This office was established by an original social contract. It is there, in the figure of the initial pact, that the right to pronounce. But of course this is just a rhetorical illustration. Sovereign send simply by being in power, there is no need to get through the first justifying contract, who instituted the civil society.

On one hand Hobbes speaks of a natural law that everyone should follow rationally, on the other, there is some way to force anyone to respect you. It is a right as a non - law. No obligation, natural law can not effectively sustain a situation of stability in the state of nature. Moreover, Hobbes puts that positive law which will be established by the sovereign is, this rather effective. Note that Hobbes, therefore, is a kind of natural law in reverse. He elaborates on long pages of his works on natural law, only to ultimately declare their complete uselessness and the consequent need for a mandatory positive law that emanated from the sovereign, all oblige.

It is clear that the sovereign is not submente laws that he himself creates. The figure above is sovereign legem. The balance between law and politics, sovereignty is an attribute, in Hobbes , much more political than legal.

Other interesting to understand the issue of sovereignty is author Rousseau. This formidable author makes a real reversal in the traditional concepts of sovereignty. For him, the attribute of sovereignty is not a man that differentiates it from the others. Sovereignty is an attribute of the people. Instead of thinking as traditionally believed, i.e., ex principis part of the sovereign for the other subjects, it will present the possibility of ex populus of thinking, i.e., proxies for individuals . In Rousseau, those in power is only in so far as it respects the law .

However, this obedience to the law corresponds precisely to the size that the freedom of each is given. Natural liberty does not disappear with the advent of the social contract in Rousseau, but as freedom of independence is readily transformed into legal freedom, which is nothing but a participation in the body politic of freedom , i.e., freedom is bounded by law.

This right that the original pact confers sovereignty does not exceed the limits of public interest, so that individuals are still in a state of freedom even as limited by law.

4 . Locke

There is a theory of sovereignty in Locke , though not explicitly appear . There is hardly on the political work of Locke expression sovereign power. Locke refers, however, several times a supreme power. Unlike Bodin and Hobbes, the philosopher puts this supreme power can only be in the hands of the legislature.

This is because the political theory of Locke, Montesquieu even before, there was already a concept of separation of powers. Locke writes about three distinct powers: the executive, legislative, and federal. It is not, as in Montesquieu, a theory of separation for the containment of power or decentralization. Rather, it is a hierarchical theory of power in the figure as the supreme legislative power. This occurs, according to Locke , because the faculty of creating laws is the most important of all the functions of the organs of civil society.

Even that legislative power is subject to the law, as is also the executive and federative. In the thought of Locke, the powers are clearly limited by law.

5 . Conclusion

If sovereignty is the power to command ultimately in a political society, a supreme authority, the big question is how is the transfer of power in fact, based on the strength, the power of law.

Everything is complicated if we take into account the lessons Schmitt, for whom sovereignty is located in the one who can decide on the state of exception. I.e., when the shift rule and normalcy, true suspension of the legal system, it is possible. So that's where the law can not deal the cards that political power creeps. Ultimately, it is a position that can undergo a series of reviews if we think the democratic point of view, but if we think in terms of praxis, such a conception, however hard it may be, seems to escape the historical examples .

Modern contemporary political theory has increasingly emptied the concept of sovereignty. First because this concept had been thought of as one of the attributes of the modern state. Beside the people and territory, the notion of sovereignty corresponded to one of the legal requirements for the architecture that we call the State.

With the crisis of the contemporary notion of the state necessarily have a crisis of the idea of sovereignty. This fact is reinforced by the growing trend of organizing a world society in supranational communities, international organizations, international courts of justice etc.. Even the world market is positioned towards creating multinational companies. Increasingly being felt degeneration of a paradigm, of State sovereignty, in the era of globalization.

Anyway, a sovereignty that is not enrolled in law seems to be highly questionable nowadays. We have an arbitrary sovereignty trumps when the power of the stronger mere caprice of subjectivity.

Hence the question posed at the beginning of our work appear openly. Sovereignty would be a power in fact, as either a Schmitt for example, that would be a power law such as stands Locke?

Corporate governance and the financial crisis:
The new paradigm of the rule of law after the collapse

Postdoc.Dr. Dawid Bunikowski[1]

The aim of this paper is to explain what corporate governance is, what the principles of corporate governance are, what standards are formally valid at a global level (including both American and European rules) and how deviant practice appeared both prior to and during the financial crisis which began in 2007. It also aims to explain the difference between the institutional axiology (written codes used within companies, the state law) and the real axiology (deviance on the part of companies, breaking promises) in companies. My approach is based on Jonathan Macey's promissory theory of corporate governance and Cornelis de Groot's legal analysis of corporate governance, and this paper takes a stance against hypocrisy in matters of business and of the state. Axiological analysis of the crisis in the global economy is necessary, since corporate governance, as an element of company law, constitutes an important branch of the law and of both legal and business practice. In conceptual terms, it has a close relationship with business ethics. I maintain that the crisis in corporate governance and business ethics was one of the main factors behind the financial crisis, and that the financial crisis brought about changes in the classical rule of law paradigm. States are now willing to take all available extraordinary measures to curb violations of law by companies, to safeguard good corporate governance and to protect human freedom and rights.

Corporate governance: a concept

Corporate governance has been the subject of many studies. The literature in the field is very rich, wide and sophisticated, presenting historical, social, legal, economic, cultural and international contexts of corporate governance[2]. However, to put it briefly, in my opinion, cor-

Corporate governance can also be viewed as a set of values, principles and rules of behaviour for each company. On the one hand, corporate governance seems to comprise written and unwritten rules, and principles laid down in official documents such as statutes, resolutions, legal internal acts or codes of good practices (i.e. the official sphere; business law; the institutional axiology of corporate governance). On the other hand, it also comprises behavioural practices which apply in an unwritten sphere (i.e. the practical sphere; business in action; the real (concrete) axiology of corporate governance). It also impacts on business ethics. Many of these values or principles, such as transparency, honesty or objectivity, have a moral or ethical character. concrete corporate governance.

During the global financial crisis which began in 2007 in the US, the idea of corporate governance acquired an importance which is very difficult to argue against. The existence of badly organised companies whose organs acted with doubtful morality lay at the root of the crisis. A lack of vision and development strategies based on moral values and commonly acceptable aims were key factors behind the collapse of the global economy. The crisis has an especially moral and axiological context, and cannot be viewed purely as an economic or legal issue or one which purely reflects a supervisory problem in the financial sector.

1. Jonathan Macey's promissory theory and Cornelis de Groot's legal theory on corporate governance

According to Jonathan Macey[3], whose ideas on corporate governance are very original, corporate governance is 'a promise' that is 'made to investors'. He rightly wrote that '[c]orporate governance consists of a farrago of legal and economic devices that induce the people in change of companies with publicly owned and traded stock to keep the promises they make to investors' [my italics][4]. Therefore, to put it briefly, corporate governance is a promise given by the management to the investors. Macey goes on to say that '[c]orporate governance is about promises'[5]. What does this mean? He explains it as follows: 'Shareholders have almost no contractual rights and virtually no contractual rights to corporate cash flows. Shareholders investments are based on trust. This trust, in turn, is based on the belief that the managers who run corporations will keep the promises that they make to investors' [my italics].[6] Macey answers the question of why regulation is important by saying: 'Regulation can impede, discourage, and even ban the operation of particular corporate governance devices. Likewise, regulation also can facilitate, encourage, and even require corporate governance devices to operate – or to operate in a particular way'[7]. Now we must consider what is the most important aim of corporate governance. Macey maintains that '[t] he purpose of corporate governance [my italics] is to persuade, induce, compel, and otherwise motivate corporate managers to keep the promises they make to investors'[8]. But he also distinguishes corporate governance from 'bad governance'. The title of his book includes the words 'promises kept' and 'promises broken', and Macey, when talking about good governance and bad governance, goes back to this idea. He states that '[g]ood corporate governance, then, is simply about keeping promises'[9], as opposed to 'bad governance', because '[b]ad governance (corporate deviance) is defined as promise-breaking behaviour'[10]. I take the view that corporate deviance is a form of corporate governance which absolutely dominated in some firms at the beginning of the new century and during the financial crisis which began in 2007 in the US. The managers of the large companies involved in such corporate deviance were guilty of hypocrisy and cynicism or brazenness, and should be treated as corporate and economic/legal deviants.

Macey's view is that corporate governance is not only a normative term, but a rather broad descriptive term. The concept of corporate governance 'describes all of the devises, institutions, and mechanisms by which corporations are governed'[11]. Thus corporate governance also relates to the law – the law made by state institutions (including judges, by way of precedent) and the law made by companies themselves in a manner envisaged by the internal law of the companies (articles of association) and by commercial law (state law or even international law, e.g. EU directives). Macey concludes that 'the governance of an organization such as a corporation is done through a complex framework of institutions and processes, including the law'[12]. It is not only the law which is important to the concept of corporate governance. It concerns different institutions and processes, also including the law. But corporate governance understood as a promise made by or to investors is still the fundamental idea in Macey's reasoning. He argues that:

'The purpose of corporate governance is to safeguard the integrity of the promises made by corporations to investors, but investors and companies are left to their own devices (i.e. the contracting process) to define the content of the promises themselves. Generally, the baseline goal is profit maximization. Corporations are almost universally conceived as economic entities that strive to maximize value for shareholders. But the goal of maximizing wealth for shareholders [my italics] is, or should be, a matter of choice.[13]'

Another problem is that '[i]nvestors should be free to choose to invest [my italics] in ventures that pursue other goals beside profit maximization'[14]. Shareholders and their interests should be the key consideration for companies, because shareholders are the legal owners of companies. When considering the issue of corporate deviance, Macey states that:

> 'For many, particularly those in the law and economics movement, any action by managers, directors, or others that is inconsistent with the goal of shareholder wealth maximization is considered a form of "corporate deviance". Economists call corporate deviance "agency costs" to capture the notion that corporate managers and directors are agents of their shareholders.'[15]

Directors are the real governors of a company[16]. How should one go about reducing corporate deviance? Macey answers interestingly and fairly that '[t]he best corporate governance systems [my italics] are those that do the best job of controlling corporate deviance'[17].

I agree with Macey's use of the 'promissory theory' to explain the way in which companies function. According to him, 'the contracts that constitute the corporation also can, and should be, viewed as a series of promises by management to investors of all types'[18]. It is clear that corporate governance should be conceptualised in contractual terms. What does it mean? Macey views 'the corporation as a nexus of contracts' and corporate governance as 'one of the many societal, legal, cultural, and economic factors that can, if used properly, make the contracting process more efficient and more reliable'[19]. Corporate governance has only one purpose, Macey repeats – 'to control corporate deviance'. But deviance has a concrete meaning – 'deviance from the terms of the contracts between the various contractual participants in the corporate enterprise and the company itself'[20].

Corporate governance, of course, relates to specific companies as well as to the market at large. The corporate governance mechanisms governing the market are very sophisticated. Thus Macey talks about various elements of supervision and control, including the Securities and Exchange Commission, organised stock exchanges, boards of directors, the market for corporate control, initial public offerings, accounting rules and the accountancy industry, litigation governance, derivative and class action suits, insider trading and short selling, whistle-blowing, shareholder voting, credit-rating agencies, stock market analysts, hedge funds, banks and other fixed claimants[21].

Macey is right when he says that 'the importance of corporate law for corporate governance is far too clear'[22]. It is necessary to define the nature of the relationship between corporate law and corporate governance. For this purpose, I will draw on the ideas of Cornelis de Groot, a famous Dutch lawyer and an expert in the field[23].

Unfortunately, before we start with de Groot, we must take into account that corporate governance is sometimes a hot topic in the political sphere when politicians become aware that they must 'do something'. This awareness of the need to do something is then translated into law by politicians in response to a public outcry. Macey offers the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 and the Williams Act of 1968 as examples of this. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act increased 'the power of "independent" directors'. The Williams Act weakened 'the market for corporate control without upsetting the top managers of public companies or any other well organized special interest group'[24]. It is true that 'shareholders are not well organized into effective political coalition; managers are'[25].

It is important to be clear about the relationship between corporate law and corporate governance in order to avoid conceptual errors in defining the terms. First of all, we must state that, generally speaking, corporate law, as the law of companies or the law governing companies, concerns the law created by the state, in some sense. It should be entirely consistent with state law – especially with commercial law and administrative law.

De Groot argues that corporate governance now forms part of corporate law. The use of the phrase 'corporate governance' in corporate law texts appeared after 1975[26]. De Groot explains that corporate governance is largely a branch of what we may refer to as company law[27]. Company law is an aspect of economic law, whose role is to regulate economic activities. Economic law comprises antitrust law, financial law, intellectual property law, employment law, the law of the European Community and of the World Organization, and company law[28]. Economic activities may be undertaken by different kinds of legal entities (from sole traders to listed companies). Legal entities, of course, have legal personality. The purpose of company law is to regulate legal entities, and it contains more rules of a procedural and organisational nature than rules of substance[29]. In my opinion, corporate governance concerns not only companies (understood as big companies or companies in general) but also other institutions such as foundations and associations (de Groot seems to be in opposition to my point of view[30]). Of course, the most important issue in the global financial crisis is that, generally speaking, corporate governance relates to public limited companies (large scale businesses) and private limited companies (small and medium-size businesses).

According to de Groot, there are certain difficulties in treating corporate law as part of company law. Firstly, corporate law uses abstract concepts (e.g. well-founded reasons to doubt good policy or mismanagement) and abstract rules (the business judgment standard, antifrustration, breakthrough rules). The meaning of the concepts must not be derived from common parlance, language and methods of communication[31]. Secondly, corporate law seems not to be only law but 'has a policy component, too, especially where competences lie with (quasi)governmental bodies like specialized courts or takeovers panels'[32]. Thirdly, the purpose of corporate law is to regulate 'legal entities against the background of ever-changing economic circumstances'[33]; due to which it lacks a central idea, a fundamental paradigm. Fourthly, corporate law relates to companies which are often engaged in cross-border economic activities. This makes it impossible to study these companies on the basis of a single national regulatory system[34]. One may analyse corporate law, interpreting concepts and rules, case studies drawn from specialised courts and takeovers panels or 'specifically chosen angle' (such as international activity, relations within a group of legal entities, the way in which a legal entity is engaged in economic activity etc.)[35].

Regulation in the field of corporate governance has different sources – statutory acts, court judgments or special committees' reports. Codes and guidelines are interesting and important sources of regulation. Here are some examples. In the United Kingdom, the Financial Reporting Council published the Combined Code on Corporate Governance (2008; the first version was in 2003), which comprises 17 main principles, 26 supporting principles and 48 code provisions. The Dutch Corporate Governance Code, comprising 21 principles and 113 best practice provisions, was drawn up by the Corporate Governance Committee (2003). These codes are addressed to the listed companies and are generally successors of various reports and recommendations (from the 1990s onwards)[36]. Corporate governance is not regulated at the level of European Union law but the European Commission has set up two advisory bodies in the field[37].

As de Groot maintains (and it is difficult to disagree with his opinion), the aim of corporate law is to regulate the corporate form and 'regulation in the field of corporate governance is an important aspect of corporate law'[38]. But de Groot proposes to 'rethink' corporate governance. What does this mean and what definition does de Groot propose following such rethinking? According to de Groot, 'corporate governance is the regulation of the corporate form – by rethinking corporate law with the purpose of guaranteeing the enhancement of shareholder value in the long term – addresses the roles of the corporation's centralized administration (the unitary or dual board and the managers) and of the corporation's shareholders, by specifically taking into account elements like integrity, transparency, proper supervision and accountability'[39]. De Groot regards the concept of corporate governance as including important aspects such as integrity, transparency, proper supervision and accountability[40]. Of course, it should be added that corporate governance is not only a legal concept but also seems to be embedded in organisational theory[41].

By way of conclusion to these reflections I would like to consider the real reasons for implementing corporate governance within a legal order of any given company. One might say that it is right for a company to be socially responsible and have a concept of corporate social responsibility (CSR) in corporate governance (CSR as a part of corporate governance, as noted above). This aim is often realised by helping to finance the social and regional needs of local communities (e.g. via sponsorship), since in the long term this helps the company build a good image, which may have a high level influence on the company's ability to sell its products. It might also appear an excellent solution for a company to have a code of good practice or a code of corporate governance because this type of codification helps a company present itself to the public as being serious, credible and ethical. This may well be one of the factors behind the implementation of good standards in corporate practice and governance, and generally within the legal order of a given company. However, I take the view that the reasons for implementing good standards and a code of corporate governance within companies should be more axiological and moral and less about pragmatism and public relations. Companies must want to be well organised and to act to high moral standards, rather than applying such standards only in economic categories (accounting for costs and profits) or only for economic reasons.

2. Corporate governance codes in the Netherlands and the United States

In this section, I will give some examples of standard codes of corporate governance. I will start by analysing the Dutch Corporate Governance Code from a legal perspective, before examining it on the basis of organisational theory: a strong European perspective on how companies should be well organised and have respect for fundamental moral principles in the manner in which they conduct business.

[39] Ibid. at p. 18.
[41] Ibid. at pp. 18-20.

According to Article 2:391, section 5 of the Dutch Civil Code, listed companies are are subject to the Dutch Corporate Governance Code[42]. In other words, implementation of the Code is a legal duty for such companies. To put it briefly, the Dutch Corporate Governance Code does not follow the shareholder-oriented model of corporate law, in which the company is primarily run for the benefit of the shareholders (and thus the interest of shareholders should come first because they have invested in the company). Instead, it follows the stakeholder-oriented model of corporate law, in which a company is run in the interests of both the shareholders and the other stakeholders (e.g. employees, creditors, suppliers, and customers). This model places the company in the context of the wider community, in which it has responsibilities not only towards government agencies but also towards special interest groups, the environment and the local community. In Macey's opinion, the stakeholder-oriented model is based 'on the idea that a corporation is just not a vehicle for creating shareholder value but should be aware of its broader responsibilities and must contribute to sustainable development because it is a part of society'[43]. From this perspective, making a profit for shareholders is not the most important role of the company. Activities of a 'profit for profit' nature are not acceptable when company law is viewed in the light of the stakeholder-oriented model. It is notable that during the recent global financial crisis there has been no evidence of the collapse of the ethical foundations underpinning corporate activity in the Netherlands. There were no liquidations or financial problems affecting companies such as ING on the grounds of corporate deviance.

The Preamble to the Dutch Corporate Governance Code states as follows:

> 'The Code contains principles and best practice provisions that regulate relations between the management board, the supervisory board and the shareholders (i.e. the general meeting of shareholders). Relations between the company and its employees (staff representatives) are regulated elsewhere. Nonetheless, the interests of the employees should be taken into account when the inter> ests of all stakeholders are weighed in connection with compliance with the Code.' (point 3)

[43] J. Macey, op. cit., p. 19.

That is the idea of the stakeholder-oriented model of corporate law that seems to be more socially responsible, wider in its terms of reference and less egotistical and commercially driven than the shareholder-oriented model of corporate law. The Preamble repeats directly that:

> 'The Code is based on the principle accepted in the Netherlands that a company is a long-term alliance between the various parties involved in the company. The stakeholders are the groups and individuals who, directly or indirectly, influence – or are influenced by – the attainment of the company's objects: i.e. employees, shareholders and other lenders, suppliers, customers, the public sector and civil society. The management board and the supervisory board have overall responsibility for weighing up these interests, generally with a view to ensuring the continuity of the enterprise, while the company endeavours to create long-term shareholder value.' (point 7)

According to the Code (the following opinion and thesis are the result of linguistic, systematic and functional interpretation of all the principles and many provisions included in the Code), there must be a strict division of responsibilities, duties and competencies in the company, and both the management and the supervisory board must take account of the interests of various stakeholders.

The values (this being my interpretation) of the Dutch Code are as follows:

1) corporate social responsibility;

2) good entrepreneurship, understood as integrity and the transparency of the management board's actions;

3) effective supervision and accountability;

4) stakeholder confidence in management and supervision;

5) good relations between the stakeholders and constructive dialogue;

6) respect for the company's strategy;

7) respect for the principles of reasonableness and fairness with regard to shareholder activities;

8) respect for the law and applicable standards – obeying internal company procedures and legal acts which regulate issues pertaining to corporate governance;

9) honesty in business.

This is in fact the institutional axiology of corporate governance in Europe. To recap, axiology is about values, being a theory of values. Axiology is about what is important and necessary (desirable) in respect of the important and necessary (desirable) states of things. Such is the axiology in Europe, and, as we will see, the situation is fairly similar in the US.

To make it clear, the principles (values) of corporate governance are related to principles and values of business ethics. Business ethics is about how to evaluate economic activity and behaviour in commercial relations (it concerns professionals but also consumers), using moral and ethical criteria. Sometimes these are the same. In general, the principles of corporate governance are on the one hand more concrete in comparison with the general ethical values of business ethics; and on the other hand more technical, legal, and organisational, relating to the company's structure, functioning and processes. There are some subtle differences between them.

The second example is drawn from America, since US standards in the field of corporate governance should also be analysed in the context of the global financial crisis. For instance, the New York Stock Exchange Listed Company Manual applies to companies listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

Section 3 of the Manual deals with corporate responsibility. Section 301 stipulates that every listed company is expected to follow certain practices aimed at maintaining appropriate standards of corporate responsibility, integrity and accountability to shareholders. Section 3 generally 'describes the Exchange's policies and requirements with respect to independent directors, shareholders' voting rights, and other matters affecting corporate governance'. So corporate responsibility and corporate governance are interrelated. 'Corporate governance standards' are included in section 303A. The subsections include such provisions as '[l]isted companies must have a majority of independent directors' (subsection 303A.01); '[t]o empower non-management directors to serve as a more effective check on management, the non-management directors of each listed company must meet at regularly scheduled executive sessions without management' (subsection 303A.03); '[l]isted companies must have a nominating/corporate governance committee composed entirely of independent directors' (subsection 303A.04); '[l]isted companies must have a compensation committee composed entirely of independent directors' (subsection 303A.05); '[l]isted companies must have an audit committee that satisfies the requirements of Rule 10A-3 under the Exchange Act' (subsection 303A.06); and '[l]isted companies must have and maintain a publicly accessible website' (subsection 303A.14). The most important of these provisions is to be found in subsection 303A.09, which requires that listed companies must adopt and disclose corporate governance guidelines. These guidelines must regulate at least the following matters: director qualification standards, director responsibilities, director access to management (and, if necessary and appropriate, independent advisors too), director compensation, director orientation and continuing education, management succession, and annual performance evaluation of the board[44].

Of course, the corporate governance guidelines adopted by the board of a company directly reflect that company's views and do not distinguish between principles and substantive provisions, as is the case in the Dutch corporate governance system (and in European tradition, too.)[45]. When considering the problem of corporate governance standards in the US, we may ask what role they played in the legal and corporate order of many companies, such as (going back a few years) Enron, Bear Stearns, Merrill Lynch, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley, the Lehman Brothers, Citigroup, the Fannie Mae or Freddie Mac and many more firms, not only during the crisis which began in 2007 but also earlier. The investment fund run by notorious fraudster Bernard Madoff hardly embodied any standards of honesty or transparency. Perhaps the standards I write about, were viewed merely as a sap to public opinion and clients, or as a means of reassuring shareholders that ethical principles were being adopted and upheld in practice; but Madoff's activity was an ordinary fraud (maybe even in a legal sense). It was a terrible ethical and corporate 'misunderstanding' in the corporate system, the effects of which remain visible today. The axiological and moral foundations of the activities of many American companies – the real axiology embodying anti-values such as greed, dishonesty, lies, fraud, and misinformation – were very shallow and superficial. And that is the great difference between the two theories of axiology: the institutional axiology (enshrined both in companies' internal regulations and in state law) and the real axiology (the real behaviour of people within companies). To put it simply, it is the difference between corporate governance (good governance, as Macey says) and corporate deviance. That is absolutely clear in theory and research; in practice the world has always been less clear.

[44] J. Macey, op. cit., pp. 16-17.
[45] Ibid. at p. 17.

'Official', 'institutional' corporate governance was deviant in the practice of many of the above-mentioned American companies both before and during the crisis. But the problem persists. In my opinion, bail-outs are an inadequate remedy, and Obama's political approach to the issue is wrong because it implies the moral hazard problem and demoralisation of the management of private companies – it does not appear appropriate to solve the problem by saying that a company is 'too big to fail' if it has no real corporate governance which imposes standards of morality on economic activity (values such as honesty, transparency). It is still demoralising for the companies and the members of their management teams and boards.

3) The new paradigm of the rule of law following the collapse of corporate governance in the financial crisis

In the second part of my paper (the first was about the concept, principles and practice of corporate governance) it is necessary to develop certain ideas which could perhaps also be investigated at greater length in separate research. These relate to corporate governance in the context of the rule of law and the financial crisis. I propose to investigate, for the purpose of my thesis, the new paradigm of the rule of law after the global economic collapse.

First, it would be useful to shed some light on the relationship between the crisis in law and that in companies, corporate governance and business ethics in the face of the financial crisis and the weakening of key institutions managing public resources in the light of the classical paradigm of the rule of law. According to the paradigm, the government and its officials and agents are accountable under the law.

Second, I will examine whether the crises in law and morality have affected the financial crisis; and how the crisis in the normative systems of law and morality (ethics) have affected the financial crisis. The hypothesis is as follows: the financial crisis is also an axiological crisis – the crisis of law (and the rule of law) and the crisis of morality and ethics (ethics and morality among professionals and non-professional market participants). There is a crisis of law, ethics, and corporate governance, which has produced a special morality and ethics in financial institutions (implicit norms and informal institutions).

Third, the question arises as to whether deregulation, autonomous delegation, the application of private law (corporate governance) failed, as appears to be the case, and, if so, whether regulation and recourse to legal intervention are a better option? The question also remains as to whether it is genuinely possible to talk about the rule of law in any given state where corporate governance and business ethics are in decay? Is such a state governed by the rule of law?

Fourth, we must bear in mind Jonathan Macey's theory of corporate governance, which is that corporate governance is a promise given to investors. If that promise is kept, it is good governance (corporate governance); if it is broken, it is corporate deviance. The lack of values such as transparency, honesty, trust, truth, responsibility, and dignity in the behaviour of companies may be regarded as fact; and as a problem of ethics in business. Business ethics is not the same as business etiquette in business, and it is important not to forget the clear difference between them. It is also a problem even of well-organised companies with good organisational structures, systems of supervision and control, and rules concerning the functioning of the corporate body. However, the most important issue is that values are respected in practice, in the ethical life of companies, and do not exist purely in written codes brought into existence purely for public relations reasons.

Fifth, the deregulation of law, the decentralisation of legislation, the privatisation of state services, the legislative autonomy of the state and companies are all factors which explain why the financial crisis was treated as being the result of processes of deregulation, and decentralisation; the autonomous law (the autonomy of companies) resulted in the financial and social crisis, and is also a crisis of law. States lose control and powers of supervision over companies, which do not properly supervise themselves. The crisis of state and law (the crisis of law) is accompanied by a corporate crisis and a crisis of corporate governance – these are parallel processes.

Sixth, changes in the paradigm of law and decision-making by the state are a parallel to a process known as corporate deviance or corporate disorder.

Seventh, the worst aspect of this process, as far as individual freedom is concerned, is the deviant behaviour of companies and the corporate fragmentation involved in this process, which results in legal and organisational autonomy, and leads to a reduction of individual freedom – the freedom which is one of the foundations of law.

Eighth, the situation is paradoxical: the rule of law respects the freedom of companies (private property, free markets, freedom of economic and legal autonomy, employment law, work contracts) and agrees to disregard the freedom of individuals, company employees and clients – by which I refer to civil liberties and political rights and social or economic rights). In response, the state remedy – the state itself being in crisis over the idea of law as the supreme regulator of social relations – is to regulate financial markets and companies, leading to over-regulation and the proliferation of regulations. Another (neoliberal) proposal is deregulation – however, this approach to the matter views regulation as the cause of the crises.

Ninth, the financial crisis has caused confusion in the traditional system of sources of law – we may now find non-spontaneous sources, new sources, which are the basis of the actual actions taken by governments and administrations. It is possible to add to these sources agreements and political arrangements (such as the European Union's so-called fiscal pact), guidance from authorities and bodies not indicated in traditional sources of law (including, for instance, the recommendations of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and the European Central Bank), decisions ex nihilo (e.g. decisions without legal basis but with a strong political influence and social justification – for further information on this issue see C. Schmitt[46]).

Tenth, and in summary, let us look at the following questions and answers. What caused the financial crisis? The financial crisis was the result of corporate deviance, corporate crisis, corporate governance and corporate law. What results have been achieved in seeking to remedy the crisis? The actions taken by Western countries in relation to the prevention of crises led to a reinterpretation of the rule of law (these actions may be regarded with skepticism from a legal standpoint). What can we do? We can say that we need new legislation to monitor the newly established institutions, services, resources and technical systems used to combat the financial crisis. Is that all? No, it is not enough. In my opinion, the financial crisis is a crisis both of law and of morality; it is a deeply axiological crisis.

Eleventh, my research considers whether the collapse of real business ethics and the hypocrisy of the moral values of companies (so-called corporate governance) are self-evident facts. I take the view that deregulation tends to fail. However, regulation is not purely a matter of bringing in legal measures (which may lead to a bureaucratic nightmare of over-regulation), but also one of ethics, morality, a new approach to life based on the idea of less consumerism, less greed, and fewer desires; and that this may bring about change in the axiologically and morally afflicted social and legal orders. That is the correct way to change bad corporate customs and morally dishonest market practices, which are a form of evil based on greed and crazy consumerism. The law is only one of the measures that may be used to resolve the problems raised by the financial crisis, and it does not appear the most important in resolving the problem of the collapse of the global economy. Moral education and the development of social and moral conscience would be more helpful. We must draw a careful distinction between the reasons for the crisis and the effects of it. And we must choose the right measures to tackle the reasons and the effects in a separate but complementary manner. States have recently reacted by using the law as the weapon to fight the effects but not the reasons. I am afraid that we are now able to build the new Leviathan: the state which wants to control everything in the market and society. It would be absolutely contrary to the rule of law and to the Western legal tradition, which is based on rights and freedoms.

Twelfth, it is obvious that the paradigm of the classical theory of the rule of law is still changing.

Thirteenth, the rule of law does not only concern states but also companies, professionals and citizens in the market. Corporate governance with business ethics seems to be part of the rule of law.

Fourteenth, the rule of law may be 'legally' broken in the crisis, because the state must take extraordinary measures which may not always be compatible with the law but are necessary.

Fifteenth, human freedom is limited by companies, which can also break the rule of law in the name of rights and freedoms. This issue relates to the freedom of workers and their rights, especially employment rights and the right to privacy – and also impacts upon the clients' right to privacy.

4)Here are some general conclusions.

1)Corporate governance is about a well-organised company which respects universal moral values such as transparency, honesty, dignity, kindness, and truth.

2)Corporate behaviour often exhibited signs of deviance both before and during the financial crisis which began in 2007 in the US. The rule of law was not fully in force in the country.

3)Corporate governance is a part of the rule of law. Companies should obey the law (internal regulations and the law of the state).

4)Ethics, business ethics, corporate governance and corporate law are all interrelated.

5)A lack of, or a lack of a high level of, implementation or understanding of corporate governance and ethics in business both before and during the global financial crisis of 2007 (especially in US) are too much in evidence in the market. We now see the effects of this state of affairs.

6)The global economy and economic activities cannot thrive without establishing deeper foundations based on moral universal values such as honesty or transparency.

7)The global financial crisis is more an axiological crisis than a strictly economic one because the foundations of, and real reasons for, the financial crisis have a strictly moral character.

8)Greed, profit, fraud and misinformation as a norm – the new morality of homo economicus – have created a new world of consumers and a structurally and institutionally hermetic world of markets and companies, as well as the economic conditions we refer to as the global financial crisis.

9)Honesty, transparency and integrity in relation to behaviour are viewed as too morally odd and lacking in pragmatism to be realised in practice nowadays. This is a sad but realistic view of companies and the global economy. Although it is understandable and necessary that both the law and corporate behaviour must change, the prospects of realising this in practice seem uncertain. It is not purely a problem of human nature or hermetically sealed companies and corporate interests, or sophisticated financial instruments, but also one of political will and public awareness. Does anybody suffer from pangs of conscience nowadays? It seems doubtful.

10)The recent financial crisis led to a change in the paradigm of the classical rule of law.

By way of summary, the new rule of law says that states are willing to take extraordinary measures in order to protect good governance, corporate governance (even where this is illegal but politically and socially sustainable). If companies do not respect their own internal regulations and the law of the state, there is no rule of law in the country concerned. Therefore, the rule of law concerns companies as well as the state, with all the legal consequences and responsibilities that this entails. Companies abuse monopolistic and hegemonic position to limit workers' freedom. This prompts the state to take extraordinary measures to counter such violations of rights, safeguard corporate governance and protect human freedom and rights.

The rule of law has changed greatly due to the economic collapse triggered by the financial crisis. Corporate governance has also changed greatly. The institutional axiology must be the real (concrete) axiology in the concrete corporate governance of the concrete corporations. We may conduct research on this relationship and its consistency with two theories of axiology now only by reference to case studies.

On demarcation problem between libertarianism and neoliberalism

Hashimoto Tsutomu[1]

Abstract: I shall argue that it can be problematic to attempt to identify a significant difference between libertarianism and neoliberalism (economic liberalism). For, the division between the two is sometimes ambiguous. However, I will note that following criterion is the most important: "order-disinterested thinking" versus "order-oriented thinking." To understand this criterion, I shall present two types of dichotomies. The first is "firm level" (medium level) versus "state level" (macro level), and the other is "economic value level" versus "ethical value level." When we use these two dichotomies, we are able to identify four types of ethical issues. The difference between libertarianism and neoliberalism primarily depends on the issue of "economic value problems at the macro level." While libertarians are against government intervention for maintaining market order or market value of specific companies, neoliberals typically support such action. For neoliberals, in order to guarantee a certain minimum level of living standard for society, it is acceptable if government actions to do so result in assisting the wealthy more than others (for example, by way of saving the bank accounts of the wealthiest in society when taking actions to prevent bankruptcies of large banks in order to avoid a collapse of the market order. However, libertarianism and neoliberalism also share several ideological values. Below, I further describe what they share in ethical attitudes.

Keywords: libertarianism, neoliberalism, economic ethics.

1. Libertarianism permits government interventions

In our ordinary usage, "libertarianism" is seen as an extreme type of "neoliberalism." Libertarianism is equated with laissez-faire type of economic liberalism, while neoliberalism is seen as a less radical category of libertarianism. However, some libertarians themselves are not so radical in terms of evaluating government interventions[2].

For example, David Freedman admits that when we have two alternative strategies for libertarianism, i.e. one that abolishes various kinds of laws in which government interventions have been legitimized, and the other that promotes a bill in a legislative body which is beneficial to a certain interest group, it is preferable choose the latter[3]. According to Freedman, since the former is too costly and the latter is less costly, libertarians should pragmatically choose to allow a particular bill to pass. As he noted, this situation however creates a dilemma for libertarians: the process of trying to make a truly libertarianism society leads to "benefits" (in the mind of the libertarian) for all citizens, but imposes costs on libertarians who need to work altruistically to pass a the legislation necessary to achieve the libertarian society. Facing such a dilemma, the libertarian takes any government intervention for granted as a "public bad". Assuming that there are many public bads, libertarians should therefore exert effort to ensure the passage of legislation that works against such public bads. Following such logic, libertarianism must therefore admit a number of government interventions. In other words, the condition of government interventions does not rule out libertarianism. Another dilemma can be identified in Ludwig von Mises' theory. Mises, on the one hand, introduces utilitarianism in his theory, which assumes the value judgments of the majority of people should be subjective, and allows for such value judgments to shape political decisions. On the other hand, Mises' argues for the supremacy of the market economy based on efficiency grounds, and against government interventions on the basis that the accumulative effect of such interventions is to increase government size and impede inefficiency. However, when majority of people prefer government interventions, Mises would not be able to deny it in his theory. Moreover, as Murray Rothbard points out[4], there might be a certain range of government interventions which do not have any accumulative extension effect. If there is no accumulative effect, people would have a good reason to support government intervention from utilitarian perspective. Mises' theory would not be able to deny this possibility. This means that Mises' libertarianism would be compatible with a certain degree of government intervention.

A third example is the case of Susumu Morimura, a leading Japanese libertarian, who proposes to assist people in poverty from a humanitarian perspective[5]. He claims that a humanitarian consideration of "compassion" to help poor people can be compatible with libertarian ideas. Although the idea of compassion cannot be deduced directly from any libertarianism principle, it can be justified ethically in order to avoid extreme misery in a society. Thus, Article 25 of the Japanese Constitution, which states "all people shall have the right to maintain the minimum standards of wholesome and cultured living," is justified under his theory. This justification might be seen as a concession to the idea of a minimum welfare state, moving away from a radical libertarianism. Some libertarians or neoliberals might hesitate to admit this kind of humanitarian consideration because it opens the possibility of greater intervention by the government.

Our final example is the case of Yuko Hashimoto, another distinguished libertarian from Japan, who proposes an original theory of rights-based libertarianism[6]. For her, libertarian society is synonymous to a minimal social welfare state, which both F. A. von Hayek and M. Friedman supported in a consequentialist way. In accord with R. A. Epstein's consequentialist libertarianism, she tries to reconcile rights-based libertarianism with the economic consequentialism of neoliberalism (classical liberalism). She admits two additional rules for the libertarian justification of private property rights: one is to admit the law of condemnation of private property for public use and the other is to admit the law of redistribution of people's income through a proportionate taxation.

However, she raises a question on the consequentialist way of thinking in neoliberalism and proposes an alternative justification of minimal-welfare state[7]. She argues that each individual needs to be dealt with as a separate personhood, who should have a set of rights for seeking his or her own project. In order for allow for proper project-seeking, every individual needs to be afforded access to a certain degree of basic resources. Since libertarianism deals with each individual in their own particular personhood rather than by way of an impersonal treatment, each person's project must be treated equally regardless of its social evaluation for economic contributions. Some individuals might have a project to live an idle life but they also need to be treated equally as a project-seeking person. This idea of rights-based libertarianism would be compatible with government intervention to some degree because it requires a certain degree of redistribution.

Libertarians, who support to offer equal opportunity for each individual, would agree with redistributions among people as long as it does not decrease the level of economic development. This consideration would come close to the idea of "left-libertarianism," in which basic income would be one of the most attractive policy proposals. In fact, project-based-libertarianism described above opens the door for normative justification of basic opportunities of self-realization that might be beyond the minimum standards of wholesome and cultured living. Left-libertarians investigate whether the government can offer a better condition for each individual to seek their own projects under the criterion of the basic standards of wholesome and cultured living.

2. Tension between libertarianism and neoliberalism

As we have seen, there are various versions of libertarianism compatible with government interventions. Then the question arises: can we find a significant difference between libertarianism and neoliberalism (economic liberalism)? The difference between the two sometimes appears ambiguous. Both stances seem to share an idea of "minimum welfare state" which introduces government intervention for redistribution of resources.

However, neoliberalism does not agree with many aspects of libertarian ways of thinking. Neoliberalism would prefer to pursue strategic policies for promoting effective order of the economy[8]. It would prefer to redistribute resources towards those whose projects would contribute to the wealth of nations. For example, a neoliberalist government would invest its resources to the education for unemployed workers. Further, neoliberals are against those who are parasitic to the social order. This prompts the question, when there is a certain degree of parasitic people who don't contribute to our social order, to what degree are such people tolerable in society?

There might be found an optimum degree of parasitic people from both perspectives of project-based libertarianism and neoliberalism. Both stances can be synthetically integrated in terms of economic policies: there is a set of necessary opportunities for each individual's project-seeking as long as it is compatible with economic growth. However, since we are ignorant of this optimum, there exists a tension between libertarianism and neoliberalism. Such a tension is explained in a following manner.

The difference between libertarianism and neoliberalism is not a matter of the degree of government interventions. It is related to the tension between "order-disinterested thinking" and "order-oriented thinking."

3. Four main questions in Economic Ethics

As I have explored elsewhere, the main issues of Economic Ethics can be summarized by way of the following four questions from A to D[9].

The demarcation problem of libertarianism and neoliberalism is related to the question B.

A. Does a firm need to behave morally with a long run perspective, even if doing so might result in short-term losses and other economic disadvantages to its employees and shareholders?

B. Which society is more desirable in terms of economic policies and institutions: one which puts a priority on"fairness," or one which prioritizes "stability/ growth of social order (profit of the whole)"?

C. Should we allow communal or patriarchal relations within a firm as its right under the framework of natural liberty; or, should we require the construction of open and liberal relations, even within a firm?

D. Is it ethically justifiable for firms to pursue economic profit while ignoring other ethical requirements in a society; or rather, do firms need to operate as ethical entities?

[9] Tsutomu Hashimoto, 2008, Economic Ethics: What is Your Ideology?, Tokyo: Koudansha, Ch.1 (in Japanese).

It is possible to divide issues in economic ethics into these four realms by using the following two topics and one noteworthy division: [Topic 1] priority problem of economic versus non-economic values; [Topic 2] particularism versus universalism in ethical value; and [a division] mezzo versus macro societies or groups. Hence, Question A deals with Topic 1 at the mezzo level, Question B concerns Topic 2 at the macro level, Question C considers Topic 2 at the mezzo level, and finally Question D relates to Topic 2 at the macro level.

4. On question B: "Fairness" versus "Stability/ Growth"

The question B is which idea we should prioritize in terms of the operation of our economic policies and institutions: the principle of "fairness", or the request of "stability/ growth" of our social order.

Take the following two examples: (i) should the government lend its hand to rescue those banks that are almost out of business? Some might argue that banks are fundamentally different from other corporations because of the risk of a "run" on when a bank faces economic hardship, which can bring about a self-fulfilling downward cycle leading to definite bankruptcy. When people lose trust in the banking system itself, they will rush to withdraw their deposit from all banks, and as a result, the entire financial system is susceptible to crash. Economic history is awash in examples of such crashes throughout many parts of the world.

Financial crises are undesirable because their negative externalities typically lead to considerable contraction of the entire economic order. Therefore it can be argued to be justifiable to rescue banks so as to keep the economic order stable. However, when the government tries to save banks and the financial system, those who are most immediately benefited are either those working within the financial sector, or those who have large deposits in banks. Why should the government help those people more than others? Indeed, many would argue that such a rescue is blatantly "unfair" because such government rescue action tends to help the rich more than the poor. At the extreme, we might see the government helping banks under the guise of economic stability, even in situations where there is a low possibility of actual financial crisis. Given the ability of the rich to organize political pressure groups to promote their interest, the government can likely behave in a manner that unduly serves to protect in the assets of the most privileged.

From the perspective of fundamental and equal "fairness" directed towards every agent in the market, it is desirable to allow banks facing bankruptcy, as with other firms, to go out of business. A principle of fundamental fairness suggests that there is no special reason to give preferential treatment to banks, even given the possibility of a bank "run". The principle of fundamental fairness requires us to allow failed banks to fall into insolvency and go out of business. Such a principle also holds then that there is no reason to give priority in government assistance to the rich even if there is a possibility of financial crisis or stagnation of the economy.

On the other hand, the desire for "stability/ growth" of our social order would argue to the contrary. Such a principle justifies government intervention in terms of preventing deterioration of the welfare distribution for the poor, even if such actions might bring about simultaneous economic advantage for the rich. The questions, then, is should we put a priority to "fairness" over "stability/ growth" of our social order, strictly as a matter of principle? Or, should we put a priority to "stability/ growth" since it maintains a more stable level of welfare of the poor?

(ii) Let us consider now the case of income tax. When we think about the appropriate design of a system of income tax, we again must do so under the framework of satisfying either the idea of fairness, or the idea of stability/ growth of society. Conventionally speaking, fairness is typically viewed as requiring a strong degree of progressiveness of the income tax system, with a significant amount of income redistribution from the rich to the poor, so as to allow the poor to enjoy a healthy and cultured standard of living. This view of fairness is called "egalitarianism." However, the idea of fairness can also be approached from the standpoint of "libertarianism." From this perspective, what is fair is instead to attribute all income to the earner of said income, since the purest form of the system of individual property rights can be regarded as the absolute criterion of fairness. This stance would deny any redistribution of income as a violation of property rights.

Thus, we observe two contrasting views on the principle of fairness in regard to income distribution: egalitarianism and libertarianism. According to their strictest interpretation, both views insist the principle of fairness needs to be adhered to, even if doing so might lead to a contraction of the economy.. However, there is an alternative, so-called "balanced" view based on the idea of "stability/ growth" of our society, which requires an "appropriate" degree of progressive income taxation in order to both stabilize society, and promote economic growth. This goal is to strategically implement a system of income taxation so as balance the interests of both the rich and the poor. This third view would also allow for strategic government actions which would contribute to the growth of national economic wealth. For instance, if bestowing certain targeted educational opportunities for the poor is believed to increase economic growth rates, the government can justify imposing progressive income taxes on the rich and redistributing resources to improve the educational experiences of children from disadvantaged households. On the other hand, when the income tax system becomes so progressive that the rich are motivated to actively (and successfully) evade income tax payments, it is appropriate for the government to reduce the progressiveness of the income tax in terms of its feasibility. From the viewpoint of this third perspective, the progressive income tax needs to be adjusted with reference to the ideas of both economic stability, and development. The egalitarian ideal would be more actively supported by strengthening income tax progressivity when such action would bring about economic stability and growth. Conversely, the libertarian ideal would be more actively supported by reducing the progressiveness of income taxes when such action would bring about economic stability and growth.

There is also a perspective of "local communitarianism" which requires a particular common good in place of the concept of fairness. This stance would places a priority on protecting common goods in each locality, even if the whole economic order would be caused to shrink or even suffer destruction.

There is also the perspective of revolutionary Marxism. Such a view insists that, as a matter of justice, the ruling class should be dismantled and the ruled people should rise so as to evenly distribute resources and power throughout society. This ideology supports progressive income taxation as its means of such a revolutionary power transformation. Contrary to Marxism's revolutionary ideas, "conservatism" would prefer to minimize the degree of social mobility among classes. This stance would require at most a piece-meal adjustment of income taxation for the sake of social stability.

As discussed above, there exist seven stances on income taxation. In the system of real politics, the immediate issue is typically presented as whether we should increase or decrease the progressiveness of the income tax system. However, from the standpoint of economic ethics, an important demarcation can be drawn between an ethics of fundamental principles, such as "fairness", and an ethics of orders, such as "stability/ growth" of the society. The ethical stances stated above can be categorized in the following matrix in section 6 (question B).

5. Conclusion

The difference between libertarianism and neoliberalism depends on the analysis of question B. Libertarians adopt "(market) order-disinterested thinking," whereas neoliberals adopt "(market) order-oriented thinking." While libertarians are against government intervention for maintaining market order or the market value of specific business interests, neoliberals support it[10]. For neoliberals, it is deemed acceptable if government actions to maintain a minimum standard of living results in greater assistance flowing to the wealthiest in society. Such asymmetric benefits might accrue to the wealthiest when the value of their bank accounts is protected by government interventions intended to save the financial system in order to avoid a collapse of the market order. Libertarians would deny this. They would treat each person or each company as an equal personhood. However, libertarianism and neoliberalism share several ideals. They share responses to the questions A, C, and D (see the following section).

6. Additional Remarks

The following Chart presents a summary of the answers to the four questions, followed by a Table indicating a naming in terms of ideological vision for each of the 16 possible sets of answers.

CHART - a Four Main issues in Economic Ethics

A	X : Profit	Y : Morality
	(1) A firm can pursue its economic rationality. Economic institutions should be purified. (2) We need to promote an evolution of society through a creative destruction. [(3) We should make people economically autonomous as a basis for political citizenry.]	(4) An economic society needs to be ethical so as to be embedded in conventional business practice. (5) A firm should aim to make its members incorporated in an ethical entity.
B	X : The good as principle	Y : The good as order

[10] David Freedman might agree with neoliberal way of thinking in this regard. If so, his stance in this case is categorized in Neoliberalism.

	X-1 : Fairness (1) Request for a fundamental fairness of equality: egalitarianism. (Persist on the idea of equal distribution, even if this necessitates a dramatic reshaping or even the destruction of the current economic order). (2) Request for a fundamental fairness of freedom: Libertarianism. (Protection of individual property rights, even if this necessitates a dramatic reshaping or even the destruction of the current economic order).	Y-1 : Stability/ Growth (3) Request for order (Maintain the stability of the current social order so as not to deteriorate the welfare of lower class, even if such actions allow significant increases in wealth for the upper class). (4) Request for growth (Judge the appropriate policy in the light of sustainable development of the national economy. Deny any request of "fairness" that undermines the functioning of dynamic market activities or the motivation for employment).
	X-2 : Additional stances (5) Request for a particular common good. (Protect common goods in each locality, even if this necessitates a dramatic reshaping or even the destruction of the current economic order). (6) Revolutionist in principle (The strong must be brought to ruin and the weak to rise in a society.)	Y-2 : Additional stance (7) Conservatism (Keep a system of conventional patriarchic morality, even if this necessitates a dramatic reshaping or even the destruction of the current economic order).
C	X : Free relation (solidarity/ patriarchy)	Y : Artificial liberal relation
	• Preserve the values of solidarity • It is immoral to open an insider report as a whistleblower. • Accept collusion (pre-bidding agreements) as a "necessary evil" because it is reasonable as a spontaneous convention in a community. • Accept a feudal morality in a household as a privacy of individuals.	• Penetrate a principle of individual responsibility. • Protect the right of "whistle-blowers". • Inhibit collusion by introducing an artificial bidding system. • Realize a gender-equality within society even in the private sphere by promoting a remunerating calculation of housework for men and women.
D	X : Inclusion	Y : Non-inclusion
	(1) Ethical statism (Governments should restrain or promote the activities of firms in order to place them within the framework of an ethical society.	(2) A man of ethical belief (Firms should behave freely based on the individual beliefs of its ownership. Only a man of ethical belief needs to behave ethically with a long run perspective.) (3) A man of wish (I wish that firms with long-run perspective would spontaneously increase in number, while firms pursuing short-term profit would naturally be eliminated by way of the market process.) (4) Egoism (Whether firms can behave freely in pursuing profit in either the short- and/or long-run is a matter of their own responsibility)

TABLE: Categories of Ethical Attitudes

	A	B	C	D
Neo-conservatism "Neo-con"	Y	Y	X	X/Y*
Neo-liberalism "Neo-libe"	X	Y	X	Y
Liberalism (welfare state type)	X	Y	Y	Y/X
State-communitarianism	Y	Y	X	X
Local-communitarianism	Y	X	X	X
Libertarianism	X	X	X	Y
Marxism/ Enlightenment (1)	X	X	Y	X
Egalitarianism/ Enlightenment (2)	X	X	Y	Y
Modern perfectionism	Y	Y	Y	Y
Republicanism	Y	Y	Y	X
Aesthetic destructionism/ Governor aversionism	Y	X	Y	Y
State deep ecology	X	X	X	X
Developmental Dictatorship/ Developmentalism	X	Y	X	X
Citizen-communitarianism	Y	X	Y	X
Local-communitarian anarchism	Y	X	X	Y

* Neo-conservatism would choose a mixture of X and Y in D, because it is negative to the female priority rule for the employment or the restrictions for the right of dismissal.

 Liberalism might choose X in D when the inclusive policy is understood as such paternalism to make people autonomous. Policies of X in D can be interpreted as a support for individual autonomy.

Law under Fascism:
Fascism anarchy of the monopolistic bourgeois power[1]

Marcus Vinícius Giraldes Silva

The category of fascism which I base myself on in the aforementioned study is not related to an individualized vision which presents itself as limited to the so-called experience of classic fascist regimes, that is, of the dictatorship based in the masses and territorial expansionism through war (as in the German and Italian cases). Fascism is historically related to monopolistic capitalism and, in its historical stage, is the paradigm of open, terrorist dictatorship of big capital. The functions of the political extraction of surplus value, monopolization of the economy and reactionary modernization are present in the historical movement of fascist regression. In my dissertation, I reflect that it is possible to understand fascism - or, at the very least, the fascist tendencies in regimes with varying arrangements between the state and civil society that, in other analytical perspectives appear classified into like military dictatorships or so-called authoritarian regimes, as defined by the sociological interpretation of Juan Linz. This is not to disregard the marked differences, in particular of the existence or absence of a mass base and formal variations in the configuration of repressive and ideological apparatuses2. Rather, it is to identify the determinations that are common (and perhaps for this reason, principal) which were present from the 1920s onward in the dictatorial solutions that emerged in response to conflicts within social formations that were either already at the stage of monopolistic capitalism or that had functionalized these dictatorships in order to politically accelerate the process of monopolization3.

[1] The present intervention was drawn from notes on the relationship (or lack thereof) between law and fascism, contained in my master's dissertation 'Fascism and the Bourgeois Reaction: A Brief Categorical Study', defended in August 2008 for the postgraduate program in Sociology and Law at the Federal Fluminense University, under the supervision of Professor José Fernando Castro Farias. I want to take the opportunity provided by the brief reflection below, which I here present for debate, to develop my lines of research, in the sense of preparing a text that will complement the study presented in 2008. Translated by Sharone Birapaka.

[2] I mention, in particular, Poulantzas' rich study 'A crise das ditaduras', regarding these differences between the dictatorships of Greece, Portugal and Spain, and German and Italian fascism, which, despite the solid empirical knowledge demonstrated and the acuteness of the presented analyses, still end up trapped to some typological rigidness.

The functionality of fascism is inserted into a certain form of the organization of political power, a dictatorial one, despite varying in important aspects of its concrete manifestations, which leads us to question the function, or even if there is a function, of the law.

There is a very interesting phrase in the film "Saló o le centoventi giornate di Sodoma" by Pier Paolo Pasolini (1975), based, as the title makes clear, on the literary work of Sade, entitled 'The 120 days of Sodom or the School of Debauchery': "Noi fascisti siamo i soli veri anarchici, naturalmente una volta che siamo impadrontti dello Stato, infatti la sola vera anarchia è quella del potere."[4]

The words of the character of the Duke translate a characteristic of German fascism highlighted by Franz Neumann and Herbert Marcuse: anomie, the lack of law, that breaks with the modern idea of juridical equality and equal rights of citizens vis-à-vis the State. In contrast, unlimited power is concentrated in the hands of the fascist leadership, as well as a few magnates of industry and monopolized finance, who suppress any sphere of freedom of the majority.

According to Neumann's critique, found in his texts from the 1930s and 1940s (for example, in "Behemoth: the structure and pratctice of National Socialism"), while the legal paradigm of competitive capitalism is the general law which, alongside formal equality, has the function of allowing a certain economic calculability while giving some protection to the weakest, in monopoly capitalism, there is a specific use of individual regulations aimed at specific economic and political situations (NEUMANN, 2005). The general law doesn't disappear, but a new kind of judicial norm emerges. In the context of democracy, even if it is politically weak as in the case of the Republic of Weimar, it is possible to reason that the content of these individual rules is subject to political dispute by the social forces that participate in the State. This is true even in favour of greater material equality, although in my view such a possibility has not been emphasized enough by Neumann, most probably due to the context in which he wrote.

[3] This is the formulation of Álvaro Cunhal as the head of the Portuguese Communist Party.

[4] Freely translated from the original in Italian: "We fascists are the only true anarchists - obviously, once we have gained hold of the State – for the only true anarchy is that of power.'

In German fascism, on the contrary, the individual and retroactive laws turn into mere measures in favour of the interests of the monopolies and the regime by granting privileges or applying terror. The law is only voluntas of power, while the law as ratio disappears (NEUMANN, 2005: 497). It is, according to Neumann, an Empire of anomie, an interpretation that remains close to the 'anarchy of power' mentioned in the work of Pasolini.

The work of Sade shows a fixation with calculability. The four libertines who gather (a noble, a bishop, a magistrate and a financier), before beginning their empire of terror establish an ordinance through which they are restrained by rules and the prospect of severe punishments. Time is calculated and minutely divided. However, in Sade's text, and especially in Pasolini's film, calculability is not realized in practice, because, since the rules are reduced to the voluntas of the four partners, they are altered, adapted, operated retroactively, and previously announced punishments for certain facts are applied in a diverse and unpredictable, in other words, there are technical means for the immediate satisfaction of those that hold the power.

Sade's work is important to study both the conception of citizenship and liberal republic, with its restrictions on popular participation, and fascism which, Pasolini understood, Sade adapted to the Italian Social Republic mock colonial state, during the Nazi occupation of the north of Italy. It is also true that the author sought to critique what he saw as the predominance of individualism and the ideology of consumption in post-war Italy. In other words, there is in Pasolini what we can conclude, with the help of his social and political writings in the 1970's, a strong concern for seeking a critical intervention in his present. Pasolini questioned in which ways a new victorious fascism could be different from that which had been defeated thirty years ago. Despite his preoccupation with the manipulative mechanisms of consumption which have intensified at the time, the film is nonetheless very important, specifically for the study of fascism as it really existed, a regime or tendency, especially from its category of "anarchy of power" .

José Paulo Netto, while studying in Sade a profoundly contradictory relation between liberalism and democracy, and for that drawing on the category of possessive individualism extant in the work of C.B. Macpherson, tells us that "the republic of Sade prefigures exemplarily in the fascist universe" (NETTO, 1986:160). The radicalization of the conception of liberal citizenship, where "some may oppress more than others" (NETTO, 1985:159), could lead to the consequence of the freedom of a minority expanding in such a way (and thereby detaching itself from any limits), that it ends up suppressing the freedom of the majority: we are then faced with fascism at its very birth. It is not the type of freedom that is the affirmation of the emancipated individual and which does not oppose the freedom of others, but freedom according to the capital, that is, functionalized in individuals who are only free as long as they are holders of capital.

I pause to highlight that Pasolini is more radical in the critique of liberalism than Neumann. This is not to say that fascism and liberalism are the same or that fascism is a degree of liberalism. It consists, in my view, in understanding that liberalism, by the exacerbation of its sociopolitical tendencies, carries the germs of its own negation, not exclusively in the sense of a revolutionary suppression, but of a fascist regression.

It is more than well known that liberal Italians supported the fascist government during its first few years, when Mussolini, newly come to power, insisted "on the fact that the State ought to be politically strong, but should shun any intervention in the economic sphere" (KONDER, 1991:20). His economic program aroused much enthusiasm among many liberals, sparking claims like Luigi Einaudi's: "All this (...) is classical liberalism" (LOSURDO, 2004:240).

It is a fact that the arrival of the fascists to power was hailed by many liberals, in the economic sense of liberal (referred to as 'liberistas' in Italy). They considered true liberalism to be contaminated by universal suffrage, because for them "liberalism in Italy was extinguished by democracy"[5]. Such liberals credited fascism with the historic task of redeeming the purity of the regime through temporary and violent suppression of liberalism itself, thereby setting it apart from any democratic contamination. Fascism would then have the same function of a real State of exception in the sense of saving and permitting the return of a certain level of normality and normativity which, for those politicians and intellectuals, was liberalism without the democracy of the masses. You may also remember those who, in the Brazilian 1964 coup d'État believed in a short military intervention which would have lasted just long enough to put things in their proper places.

The State of exception, which fulfills the function of preserving the social order, is theorized by Carl Schmitt in 'Political Theology'

[5] Letter from Salandra to Benedeto Croce. Apud LOSURDO, 2004, p. 241.

(SCHMITT, 1996:83-130) as a time in which a political decision by the sovereign suspends the law and eliminates the occurrence of all norms in function of the self-preservation of the State.[6] The same concept is criticized by Walter Benjamin in his eighth thesis "On the Concept of History" as being a permanent space in the class struggle, though variable in its reach (BENJAMIN, 1996: 226). Schmitt writes from the perspective of the ruling class, while Benjamin does so from the point of view of the tradition of the oppressed.

Benjamin's analysis is easily understood in Brazil where, along with a parallel force to the law, the State of exception is an everyday occurence which a significant part of the population, living in the slums of large cities or in rural areas of agrarian conflict, is subject to. Since June, the resurgence of a strong movement of urban masses in Brazil, spontaneous and contradictory in the energy that they demonstrate, has witnessed the extension of exception to include the streets. This is especially true in my city, Rio de Janeiro, where the Governor of the State closely resembles one of Sade's characters. In late July this farcical character appointed a Commission, by decree, to investigate the protests (referred to as vandalism). The Commission is made up of the police, Security Bureau and the State prosecutor. In the Comission's inaugural speech, the Governor accused "foreign groups" of inciting the protests without, obviously, naming which groups these might be or presenting any proof or even a clue as to who they are. In terms of its rhetorical style (and for lack of another more accurate name), I must say that the speech was "fascist". .

Examples of moments of exception were recently historicized by two Italian authors; Giorgio Agamben's work on the State of exception (AGAMBEN, 2007) and Domenico Losurdo's work on Bonapartism (LOSURDO, 2004). The latter is more extensive, for example, than what is found in the works of Marx and Gramsci, because it includes all cases of hypertrophy of the executive and restriction of parliamentary democracy in the bourgeois State.

Brazil is not on the verge of fascism today, despite our everyday barbarism. Nevertheless, I recall that the installation of a fascist dictatorship can be preceded by a period of transition in which 'fascisization' is processed through various measures of exception that constitute the reactionary preparation and that it will, moreover, always have its course defined by the concrete class struggle. Exception is also linked to the corruption of elites within institutions, that begin to abandon the law, their law, even before the formal measures for their suspension are adopted. This is the theme, for example, of the film 'Z' by Costa-Gavras (1969).

One could say that, in fascism, the State of exception (always present in some space within the class struggle and the repression of the oppressed), becomes hypertrophied and turns into a "permanent State of exception[7]". Since its repressive system is characterized by the complete suppression of all autonomous spaces of the subaltern classes, who are either silenced or pictured in the aestheticization of politics, it should be added that fascism is a state of permanent and totalitarian exception, though only in the sense that Gramsci and Togliatti attach to the term totalitarian (GRAMSCI, 2002: 139).

Saló is quoted here again regarding the State of exception as a space of anomie and the suspension of law, which becomes the rule and prevents the return of the former. However, he is quoted this time to highlight the passage in which the victims are bought to the castle together and the regulation is announced by 'Excellence', the magistrate, who says: "Weak chained creatures destined for our pleasure, I hope you don't expect to find here the ridiculous freedom granted by the outside world. You are beyond the reach of any legality. No one on earth knows you are here. As far as the world is concerned you are already dead. Therein are the laws that will regulate your life in here" .

The passage may seem contradictory because, if Saló's fascism and the Nazi occupation is what exists outside of the castle, how can we speak of liberty and legality? Recall, however, that the reality of Salò is the war of resistance against the Nazi ruler as well as the civil war between divergent positions in Italian society, where fascism and antifascism were battling each other (and every civil war brings a duality of powers, of orders).

Inside the castle walls it is believed that the prisoners were stripped of all freedom, not only formal, but factual, which includes the possibility of revolt ("To everything and everyone you are already dead"). It is total slavery. Would fascism's utopia bring the end even to politics, by the elimination of all and any conflict?

[7] Cf. LOSURDO, 2004, p. 196; AGAMBEN, 2007, p. 13. There does not appear to be much sense in the differentiation established by Agambem, between ''State of permanent exception' and dictatorship , based merely on its origin. If the state of exception becomes permanent it's because its transfiguration already occurred in the open dictatorship.

The castle is a refuge and a utopia of fascism, made possible by total control over life, which ends up being a living death ("don't you know that we would like to kill you a thousand times, to the limits of eternity, if eternity could be limitless!"). Moreover, it is a promise that is not fulfilled given that at the end of both Sade's novel and Pasolini's film, the bodies are systematically destroyed, as if they had lost their use value. To "kill you a thousand times" might be possible through the circulation of exchange values in its expanded reproduction, but the castle, a refuge in the throes of fascism in Salò, is a physical barrier to the movement of goods.

If the fascist legality, while a non-law, is in its very essence mere will to power, ideologically it must match a certain mentality in relation to the order. The film 'El Laberinto del Fauno' (2006), by Mexican director Guillermo Del Toro, presents an excellent opportunity to reflect on the difference between fascist and anti-fascist mindsets. When Captain Vidal, the sadistic Francoist official of obvious aristocratic extraction, asks the doctor Ferrero, a clandestine guerrilla collaborator, why he had disobeyed such an clear order, Ferrero responds: "Only people like you, Captain, can obey for the sake of obeying, without thinking". He then keeps walking and gets shot in the back. On the other hand, when the girl Ophelia, after being asked to undertake certain tasks that she knew nothing of and could not question, discovers that the tasks could entail the shedding of innocent blood, refuses to perform them/do so. From those who live outside the fascist domination, she hears that she made the right choice.

The film opposes two mental patterns: that of the fascist and the anti-fascist. One is to obey without thinking, the other is to think and not obey. It is the consciousness that stresses the need for criticism and subversion, which in the film turns into material strength through the practices of the peasant guerrillas. In Pasolini's film, for example, the only prisoner who, when caught in a crime, does not denounce his companions in agony, is also the one who does the partizziani communist salutation before being executed by bullets. This does not prevent a glimpse of the strong expressions of shock on the faces of the four libertine and liberticide partners. They see that there was an enemy inside the castle. Could the 'political' have been penetrated? The prisoner presents them with the contradiction of a guerilla who exposes himself as being just that and a man who, even under a regime of total slavery, engages in a free sexual encounter (which would in itself be a profound subversion) intensified by the fact that the woman is black.

However, fascism, as despicable as it is, can be seductive. It presents a manipulative aesthetic that is attractive, but it is imperative to refuse the whole fascist banquet. Even in Pasolini's film, where the anarchy of power is devoid of any mediation (which is made clear in Sade's scene of the banquet of excrements), there are victims who adhere to it (it is said that "the refinement of debauchery is to be, at the same time, the castrator and victim"). Furthermore, in both movies a feast appears. In Del Toro, the girl Ophelia is warned not to touch any food from the table. When she does not resist and ends up awakening a monster whose eyes are in its palms, that is, a creature who can only see and destroy that which is within its reach, a representation, therefore, of Captain Vidal, her stepfather and the rest of fascism.

The fascist banquet can only offer, to the great majority, physical death, destruction, extreme exploitation, slavery, and death in life. The imperialist war has been represented seductively to the subalterns, like a banquet capable of bringing them prosperity and security, or in the worst case, a heroic death capable of inspiring those who remain obedient. The result of this banquet (of which the part in power of European social democracy never tired of participating), considering recent interventions in Libya and Syria, are historically a State of exception and, in particular, of fascism.

Does Del Toro want to lead us to believe that the exit from an unbearable reality is escape through free fantasy? This, however, can not completely avoid reality and ends up at some point reflecting upon it: in the fantasy, the parasitic toad, which sucks out the vitality of everything around him in the forest; in reality, peasants massacred by fascism, which supported itself on the parastic Catholic Church; in the fantasy, a destructive monster whose eyes are found in the palm of his hands; in reality, a fascist captain, Vidal, fixated on death, preserving the clock that registers the moment in which his father died (very much in the style of the francoist motto "viva la muerte"). Imagination drives Ofélia to reject any compromise with an unbearable oppressive reality and to establish a subversively disobedient mentality.

Having built his narrative in the francoist past, it is not difficult to see the absolute relevance in Del Toro's film at a time of the greatest imperialist warmongering, noting that when it was filmed it was the time of the government of the neocons and Christian fundamentalists in the United States. On this point, the movie helps in the self-awareness that, in relation to imperialism, as well as with fascism and the State of exception, which are all a rule for the oppressed, no compromise is acceptable.

Humor and Damages:
Civil Liability for offensive jokes in Brazil

João Paulo Capelotti

LL.M. by Universidade Federal do Paraná (UFPR), Brazil. Lawyer.

Abstract: Brazil, in spite of its worldwide fame of non seriousness, is much more concerned with the honor, the name and the image of the victims of humoristic statements than with the freedom of speech and criticism. It is true that not every kind of humor intends to cause reflection or discussion about public issues – characteristics that would make it much more defendable for its proximity with the freedom of information. But the question is: does humor necessarily have to be about public issues to prevail over people's susceptibilities? The attempt of answering such question passes by the discussion of the most relevant decisions about the issue. After analyzing them, the article will defend a wider protection of laughter, considering it is almost always ontologically attached to some kind of offense or bitterness.

Keywords: Humor; Tort; Criticism

1. Introduction

The conflict between humor and honor, privacy and image in Brazil produces a new case almost every day.

This is a clear result of the incredible diffusion and expansion of TV, radio, newspapers, magazines and, of course, the Internet, throughout the country. The urbanization, the decrease of the illiteracy, the economic development and the absence of previous censorship are some factors that can help to explain the increasing access that most of the Brazilians have to both traditional and new media.

On the other hand, people are more conscious of their rights, in part because of the larger access to information. Besides, the creation of centers providing public lawyers to the poor population, and the harassment of private lawyers instructing their clients to sue whatever makes them uncomfortable, probably has contributed to the generalized perception that one's moral sphere can be hurt, and there are legal mechanisms to repair it – including cases in which such damages come from cartoons, TV shows, ironic articles, sketches on YouTube, pictures on social networks and so on.

Although there is an interesting (and increasing) casuistic about the issue, the academic world apparently does not pay much attention to the matter. There are not many studies about how to solve the conflict between this specific form of freedom of speech and the rights of personhood. Most of the books and articles about freedom of speech do not approach humor or, when they do it, they dedicate only a few pages to the issue, leaving behind a considerable number of questions. Maybe because of that the courts have been deciding the cases involving humor with a dizzying variety of positions. In part, the diversity of solutions is due to the lack of a culture of respect to precedents in Brazil. The very conflict between freedom of speech and people's honor cannot accept a unique answer to problems that are naturally different. However, it seems that deeper investigations on the matter are necessary, either to provide argumentative lines to lawyers and judges, or to organize the casuistic into a minimally logical casebook, pointing leading cases and trends for the judicial debate.

Obviously, the vastness of cases cannot be covered in this article. It is necessary to draw boundaries, without losing touch of the main goal of the research behind this paper. The result herein presented intends to portray an overview of the most significant cases involving humor in Brazil, taking into consideration, when necessary, what the national literature has to say about it. This means that many important foreign references were intentionally left aside, in the attempt to convey, whenever possible, the portrait of Brazilian Law about humor as an element of freedom of speech.

It is also important to underline that the article does not explain many important and abstract concepts such as what freedom of speech is, or even how humor is inserted in this theme – however, the intuitive comprehension of such aspects seems to be sufficient to understand the discussions of the paper.

2. A portrait of humor in Brazilian Law

The diversity of cases involving humor, and the angles from which they can be analyzed, would allow uncountable ways of organizing the legal material available about the theme. The choice made herein, although it might not be the easiest one, is the best to show the true problem behind the freedom of speech: the right to say uninteresting or unpleasing things. Dividing the cases of humor into those that clearly have a social interest and the ones in which this relevance is more difficult to be seen or simply does not exist, is similar to separate the easy cases from the hard ones.

2.1. The social relevance of the criticism

The average Press activity – the reporting of facts – is the gold standard for Brazilian judges and lawyers to analyze the conflict between the rights of personhood and the freedom of speech and information. In such cases, the courts underline if the press has or not shown facts that, for its own importance, theoretically entails public interest, if those facts are true and if they were a mere narration (and not an offensive text). If the answer is positive to these conditions, chances are the right to disclose the news will prevail over the subject´s susceptibility. However, articles and other essays carrying opinions, even if they are strong and sharp, are also accepted, as long as the criticism is directed to some issue also considered of public interest.

These standards originally followed by the so-called "serious journalism" apparently also guide the conflicts involving humor.

A good example is the work of Darcy Arruda Miranda, a judge who wrote in 1959 one of the most important books regarding freedom of speech in Brazil: "The abuses of the freedom of the Press". In the middle of his considerations about the right of criticism, there are two pages about humor. Miranda starts with a Latin quotation, "ridendo castigat mores" (that is, laughing punishes the society's behavior). According to him, humor and satire are weapons and instruments of education, if they are headed for society's improvement, that is to say, if they have social interest (MIRANDA, 1959: 391).

What Miranda's doctrine defends is humor as a form of completing the "serious" information, or, in other words, is comedy as a way of catching people's attention to important points that would normally not be noticed. This was the role of humor that Justice Carlos Ayres Britto, from Brazilian Supreme Court, had in mind during the judicial review of the Elections Act, which had been recently changed to prohibit comedians to make fun of politicians during the election period (ADI n. 4451/DF, related by Justice Carlos Ayres Britto, decided on Sept. 2nd 2010). Brazilian Association of TV and Radio Broadcasts argued that this was an unconstitutional act, and had a positive answer from the Court. Justice Britto considered that the Constitution does not authorize the suspension of the freedom of speech clause during the elections. This can happen only during the so-called "exception state", during war or situations of extreme danger to the Nation. The court also considered that humor is a mix of creativity, art and social criticism, inherently attached to the freedom of speech and the freedom of the Press.

Quoting by heart one of the most famous Brazilian humorists, Justice Britto said that humor is not only about laughter, but also a critical way of seeing the world. Thus, the benefits would be widely compensated by occasional excesses of determined cartoons or TV shows. According to the Justice, humor is a component of the Press activity, which also guarantees the right to criticism, even in sarcastic, ironic and tough ways, specially against authorities and politicians surrounding public institutions. In other words: according to this recent decision of the Supreme Court, humor is a way of presenting information, and cannot be detached from the usual guarantees of the Press, even in the elections period.

Another interesting case (Special appeal 459.857/SP) was judged by the Superior Tribunal de Justiça – STJ (that we could call "Superior Court of Justice") –, with jurisdiction all over the country when it comes to the last interpretation about the ordinary law. It was the appeal of a Police officer who felt humiliated by a sketch made by a famous TV show, which criticized, through jokes, the violent behavior of the Police in the suburbs of the city of Diadema, in the Metropolitan area of São Paulo. Justice Aldir Passarinho Jr., who wrote the vote unanimously followed by the court, pointed that the TV show intended to be funny, but also brought up criticism and information, since it was largely based on recent news. Besides, neither the name nor the image of the appealer was shown on the TV program, which satirized the situation with fictional characters.

Another good example of humor addressing social criticism involved a famous politician, who has the fame of not fulfilling most of his promises (Court of Appeals for the State of São Paulo, Appeal 0100597-75.2003.8.26.0000, related by judge Caetano Lagrasta, decided on Oct. 19th 2011). After receiving an ironical prize, called "Troféu Cara-de-Pau" ("Shameless trophee"), the politician sued the radio which gave it to him and lost. The Court considered that humoristic programs are appropriate medias to give special and colorful meanings to the words of public people, which does not necessarily imply aggression to the rights of personhood.

2.2 When the social relevance of the criticism is hard to see or does not exist

Not always, however, will humor convey laughter and clear social or political criticism.

Perhaps the most famous recent case involving humor in Brazil was the commentary made by TV host Rafinha Bastos about a pretty singer and her child (Court of São Paulo, Process 0201838-05.2011.8.26.0100, decided by judge Luiz Beethoven Giffoni Ferreira on Jan. 12th 2012). The suggestion that, if he had the opportunity, he would have sex with both pregnant mother and unborn child became an explosive discussion, with people against and in favor of the comedian, who ended up being fired from the TV show and sued by the singer. The sentence that awarded the singer, her husband and the child damages considered that the joke made by the TV host was absolutely unreasonable and rude. The appeal to the Court of Appeals of São Paulo has not yet been appreciated.

Another relevant case (Court of Rio de Janeiro, Process 2005.001.117530-6, decided by judge Rogerio de Oliveira Souza on Jul. 26th 2006) was about a famous actress, who carries the fame of being unkind. She was targeted by a certain TV show, from a channel different from the one she works for, that used to chase celebrities with such alleged behavior, in an attraction called "Sandals of Humbleness", in which the comedians tried to convince the celebrity to wear those shoes. The actress Carolina Dieckmann, since the first approach of the TV show, declared she was not interested in participating or giving interviews. But the comedians insisted, even trying to reach the window of her apartment with a derrick. The sentence decided that the TV show brought no information and could not claim the typical protection granted to journalism. The decision also considered that the actress had always been explicit about the absolute lack of interest in participating of the show, and she could not be forced to do it by the showmen.

Other cases confirm the necessity that the victims must agree, in a certain way, with jokes that are not limited to speech. Attitudes that involve a positive behavior (such as putting on the sandals), invade the privacy or affect someone physically must be preceded by consent. This is the conclusion of two cases that punished the same TV for some disgusting practical jokes involving ordinary people walking on the street, cockroaches and sand (Court of Appeals for the State of São Paulo, Appeal 529.030.4/9, related by judge Dimas Carneiro, decided on Nov. 29th 2009; Appeal 433.412.4/8, related by Caetano Lagrasta, decided on Aug. 22nd 2006).

But these rigorous precedents do not necessarily mean that humor without public interest is illegal.

Sometimes, the behavior of the victim is evidence that the alleged offense would be even expected. A good illustration is the case involving a curious candidate to the House of the Representatives of the State of Rio de Janeiro (Court of Appeals for the State of Rio de Janeiro, Appeal 2008.001.56057, related by judge Paulo Maurício Pereira, decided on Feb. 4th 2008). He presented himself on TV obligatory election program as "Mazzaropi da carroça" ("Mazzaropi of the cart"). A humoristic TV show presented his video asking for votes, during a special part of the program called "Candidatos toscos" ("Tacky candidates"). After the video, the showmen simply laughed on it. The candidate sued the broadcast and lost. The court considered that it was natural that a candidate who presented himself with an odd and comic name (referring to one of the most famous comedians in Brazil) would be more susceptible of being target of jokes than if he had chosen his real name.

A previous behavior of the board of a TV broadcast also counted against it while judging its action against a showman well known for his sharp tongue. The Court of Appeals for the State of São Paulo considered that the TV board knew the fame of the showman Clodovil Hernandez before hiring him, expecting reasonable audience with his sarcasm, and could not complain if he directed his bitterness to them as well (Appeal 1183644, related by judge Celso Pimentel, decided on Aug. 11th 2008).

Another possibility is the abstraction, the absence of explicit reference to the target of humor, or even the creation of fictional characters.

An interesting case comes from the Court of Appeals for the State of Rio Grande do Sul, and is about an association of bricklayers that did not like a scene of a soap opera in which the villain, Nazaré Tedesco, poked fun of a character – her ex-husband Josivaldo – who had such profession. The court considered that there was not a direct offense to the profession and, after all, the soap opera is an openly fictional form of expression (Appeal 70023682768, related by judge Luiz Ary Vessini de Lima, decided on Nov. 13th 2008).

All the cases mentioned above did not have explicit social interest, but had different denouements according to each one's peculiarities. However, the presence of a social criticism in the humoristic manifestation, although hard to see, seems to be a considerable safeguard to the comedian.

Perhaps the most intense defense of humor as a component of freedom of speech comes from the Special Appeal 736.015/RJ, in which the daughter and the granddaughter of a deceased noble felt dishonored because of an article published in a humoristic magazine called "Bundas" ("Bottoms"). This magazine was a parody of the most famous celebrities' publication in Brazil, "Caras" ("Faces"), that owns castles in France and New York. The comic magazine was also searching for its castle, and conveniently elected the castle of the Baron Smith de Vasconcelos, who made his fortune producing toilet paper in the state of Rio de Janeiro and used to have, in the town of Itaipava, the nickname "Barão da Merda" ("Baron of Shit"). Both the sentence and the decision of the State Court of Rio de Janeiro fulfilled the distinction, often pointed in the literature, between intention to offend ("animus injuriandi") and intention to joke ("animus jocandi"). The decision from the Superior Court of Justice has gone beyond. According to Justice Nancy Andrighi, who wrote the prevailing vote, it is necessary to analyze not only the isolated expression "Baron of Shit", but the context in which it was inserted. The magazine called "Bottoms" was explicitly satiric, and criticized the line followed by the celebrities' tabloids. Quoting again the proverb "ridendo castigat mores", Justice Andrighi was convinced that the purpose of the magazine "Bottoms" was to highlight the excesses of what she called a new social phenomenon: the interest about the privacy of rich and famous people. Adopting this premise, Justice Andrighi recognized that the Baron and his castle were not the final targets of the joke, but only the instruments to poke fun at another magazine. From the complete article, she says, is clear that the ridiculous is not about the castle, but about the editorial line of the other magazine, "Faces". Moreover, the magazine "Bottoms" published, in the following edition, the letter sent by the Baron's heirs, also apologizing for inconveniences. And last but not least, Justice Andrighi refused the final argument of the appealers, that the humor conveyed by the magazine would be a second class and rude humor. For her, the Judiciary should not label high or low quality humor. This distinction would be undesirable, since it divides the humor according to its audience. The appreciation of the humor's quality would fit better in prizes and awards. With these headlines, Justice Andrighi proposed the denial of the appeal.

But the decision was not unanimous. Justice Castro Filho dissented, showing the reasons by which he found the article so offensive that the Baron's heirs would be entitled with damages. This shows that, different from "law in the books", it is hard to define objective criteria to decide if a comic speech is abusive or not.

3. Conclusion

Cases involving humor are easier to solve as much as they get closer to the traditional patterns of classic journalism, that is to say, news about true facts of public interest narrated with some objectivity. In such cases, comedy is qualified as a form of expression that contributes to the society, showing important facts or exposing necessary criticism. The problematic cases are those in which humor does not have this explicit social content. However, the conclusion that this humor more distant from the narration will be always hateful is not correct. Beside the cases with clear offenses, there are complex cases, in which the criticism to society is subtle and dependent on a deeper examination from the judge. Most of the humor indeed contains some kind of criticism, and this is the reason why Claudio Luiz Bueno de Godoy (2001: 103) says that the interpretation of humor must comprehend its inherent exaggeration. It also seems dangerous to always demand a social interest from humor, since it might destroy the spontaneity and the fun that are its most important characteristics.

The international fame of Brazil as a non serious country, with happy and peaceful people, may also hide some hypocrisy in the admittance of jokes. The criticism, having or not public interest, is rarely taken in a positive or constructive way. True freedom of speech must respect the rights of personhood, but people must be tolerant as well with the irreversible consequence of the expansion of the Internet and other means of communication: more people will speak and more people will be heard. The diversity of positions and the difference between them will increase, and so should do our tolerance. We will have more and more targets for our jokes, but we should not forget that we ourselves are also targets.

Abuse of dominant position:
Function versus structure in outwardly equal contractual relationships

Ana Letícia Salomão e Ribeiro[1]

Abstract: The Brazilian Federal Constitution of 1988, in its Article 170, designed for the economic order a profile which establishes principles of great importance for this paper, namely, free competition and consumer protection. It is known that fair competition has always been the most important and effective instrument of consumer's protection and defence, becoming the great bond of the legal system and being able to offer support or restore a certain balance in contractual relations, when some sort of imbalance is evident. There is no way of incurring in a conduct capable of generating such effects except through the misuse (or abuse) of dominant position. However, this kind of abuse was not remembered by the constitutional power as a harmful effect to the economic order. Therefore, in the light of the functionalist theory of law, proposed by Norberto Bobbio in his studies published in the book "From structure to function: new studies of legal theory," it is questioned how the substantive equality, as a promotional function, will focus on the regulation of seemingly equal contracts in order to restrain situations in which can be verified a possibility of abuse of dominant position. This work seeks to deconstruct the premise that all economic power, especially the contractual one, would result from an abusive dominant position. Nevertheless, the overlap of a subject over another will be proved inevitable, however, it will also be demonstrated that, despite this, one should not incur abuse, which would transform this into an illicit relationship. The discussion that this paper proposes takes into account current matters, from which it can be discussed, thus enabling the construction of a connection between state and market, regulated by a Law that, although often casuistic, is seated on general and abstract principles. The convergence of various law branches is identifiable, demonstrating that choices influence the wanted shape of the society and the model of organization and environment that best fits this vision. Based on all these arguments, one can reach the conclusion that to reduce the abuse of dominant position, or the abuse of rights, especially in those contractual relationships in which parity is only apparent, it is necessary to pay special attention to the role of good faith and substantial equality in our legal system, striving for fairness, respect, preserving dignity and protecting the economy's interests consecrated and protected by in our Constitution.

Presentation

This paper explores part of the studies I have been committed to in the past two years, since I went to Camerino – Italy as an exchange student from Juiz de Fora Federal University.

To begin with, I would like to start the exposition of my theme based on the question that means its "kickoff": how will substantial equity relate to outwardly equal contractual relationships, embodying the most important principles of our constitution, in order to curb situations in which could be verified the abuse of the dominant position?

With this question, it is possible to evince that the object of this paper has been to study contractual disparities among corporate relationships, demonstrating situations of vulnerability that could favour the abuse of the dominant position, seeking, in the end, ways to protect the contractor who has been placed in disadvantage because of the occurrence of abuse.

Therefore, analysing contractual abuse as a sort of abuse of the dominant position in outwardly equal contractual relationships, relating private and public law, we analyse how principles of economy and principles of private law relate in our legal system, thus to protect the vulnerable one. Moreover, it is possible to demonstrate how asymmetries arising from economic dependence can result in greater contractual vulnerability, which requires a bigger intervention from the State in the private sphere, especially regarding the jurisdictional action.

From all the concepts that have been studied and exposed in the first chapter of this paper, such as free initiative, freedom of competition, antitrust law, abuse of law, abuse of the dominant position, among others, there happens to exist a premise which is sought to be deconstructed, i.e., that contractual relationships are, as a rule, parity, and, because of their nature, subsists a factual dominancy, which implies an assumed dominant position, and shall the possibilities of abuse be eliminated, as they would jolt and damage the structure of the free market.

In present times, consumerist relationships are identified as those in which there is a contractual imbalance because of the existence of a vulnerable or weak part, subsisting a presumption of equity or parity as regards to civil or corporate relationships, being ignored a variety of situations in which there is, materially, a concrete inequity, exacerbated by the abuse of law committed by corporate actions.

This is the great tenet of this work, in which it seeks, sailing from the reanalysis and conceptual reconstruction, giving it a diverse bias, from the functionalist point of view. As professor Maria Cristina de Cicco states, in her chapter published in Gustavo Tepedino's private law book, the contractor, not only and not necessarily the consumer, must be protected above all because of his status as a person, consequently, in reference the first article of our Constitution, which seeks to protect the person in its dignity.

Despite being flawed, this presumption must be suppressed. Disparities are not to be refuted, on the contrary, they are inherent to the economy, as the economic power is accepted by the legal system, and it must, therefore, serve as an instrument of development and social justice. Must be curbed, notwithstanding, the abuse practised by the one who is in a situation of advantage. Vulnerability permeates, therefore, all contractual relationship in which subsides parts in situation of patent imbalance.

The custody by the legal system cannot occur only when concerning consumerist relationships, and they should be extended to corporate relationships, seeking not only the protection of one part, but a procedure based in honesty, loyalty and in accordance to the principles consecrated in our legal system, imposing functions, duties and roles that seek the completion of our law in its greater values.

At this point, Norberto Bobbio and Pietro Perlingieri's doctrine are important, because, as the second one states, it is of great importance to identify the structure and the function of the legal fact, as they are able to answer two important questions: "how it is", highlights the structure, and "what it serves to", highlights its function.

This dichotomy existent among structure and function, meaning, the funcionalisation of legal structures, is a process that affects most legal situations, as it reveals two aspects – structural and functional – the first one identifies the structure of powers conferred to the holder of the legal situation, and the second one explaining the practical and social finality to which it is designed. The functional aspect determines the structural one.

Thus, the function sets which powers are assigned to the holder of subjective rights, and these, when legit, will only deserve protection according to the extension of relevant social interests should be equally protected.

Between this and that, the problem is not observing the occurrence of a disparity, but the abuse practised by that one part which is in a dominant position, and should be, by the magistrate, discarded the possibility of abuse of rights. As Bobbio states, the judge ceases to be mere systematizer or interpreter of the law, acting more critically, and creatively.

Civil law based on constitutional legality seeks in the idea of unity a way of reading law as a whole, rejecting purely academic limits and legal compartmentalization, since the legal system, however complex it may be, it should be one, even if it derives from a plurality of sources.

Pursuing in the ideas of structure and function, explained by Perlingieri, one reaches the argument that all the institutes studied have not only a structure, but also a function, which would be its purpose, and those, when distorted, can lead to the abuse of rights, a mean to achieve the abuse of the dominant position. This function would be the determining reason established by the legal system to the existence of the contract, virtue to which it is worth being protected.

In order not to misinterpret the function conferred by legal system to contracts, it should be given special attention to the principle of equity, axiological matrix of our constitution, as achieving it means not only a way or regulating corporate transactions, but also lowering contractual differences, ensuring balance, good faith, avoiding the abuse of law and materializing social function.

Only from the perspective of constitutional equity it will be possible to proceed to a greater and effective protection of the disadvantaged ones, the ones who merit the protection of law.

It does not subsists anymore the dogma of formal equity, under the aphorism that everyone should be treated equally before the law, but it highlights the substantial equity in its turn, reflected by the aphorism that unequal should be treated unequally in the measure of their inequality, with the purpose of giving protection to those vulnerable individuals, protecting them in a more incisive way, even if this protection mean a jurisdictional action, triggered through contractual remedies, such as rescission or termination of the contract by the decision of a judge.

What was sought most, in this work, was the harmonization of law, because values, principles and fundamental rights should be applied appropriately to each case, having the Constitution at the apex of the legal system, in order to realize the ideals of integrity, beholding substantive equity when solving a variety of corporate problems, as well as avoiding the abuse of law when drafting contractual clauses and establishing contractual remedies.

Despite the possibility outlined, between the demonstration of possible imbalances and vulnerabilities, even in relationships not consumerists, we seek to state the fact that contractual principles are indispensable to suppress any abuses of law and, therefore, any occurrence of abuse of the dominant position.

Moreover, for of the fact that substantial equity proclaims a different treatment whenever it points out the differences, a greater degree of state intervention will be necessary to ensure the operability of clauses and contractual remedies, when in accordance with the constitutional principles.

Taking into account the expectations of Brazil's Constitution, the State should intervene when economic concentration is achieved through practices prohibited by law, when at expense of free competition and free enterprise, two of those basic principles of the economic order. This seeks to avoid companies to impose restrictions to market competition in which they operate, also increasing their dominancy through alliances, mergers or predatory practices.

I, as a recently graduated law student, do not intend to establish a model of perfect competition, as it would be utopic, but given the fact that the existence of a "power" is a reality, a structural factor, it should be, therefore, given a social function that would serve to the development of the economy and to the achievement of social justice.

On the concept of subjectivity in the promissory theory of contracts from the perspective of Paul Ricoeur's philosophy

Marcin Pieniążek[1]

Abstract: The presentation outlines one of the crucial questions of private law, i.e. the question of subjectivity of a party to a contract. The analysis will be made on the background of the promissory theory of contracts. This theory assumes that contractual obligations originate as a result of a promise made by a party to the contract. Thus, the legal bond (vinculum iuris) in a contract results from the self-expression of the subject communicating the intention of assuming an obligation. This self-expression is valid to the degree to which the subject is capable of forming a promise. For that reason, the notion of subjectivity is defined in the presentation through the constitutive features of the being, namely a party to the contract. As a result, the main part of the presentation focuses on the ontology and ethics of a party to the contract, referring to the philosophical ideas of Paul Ricoeur.

It should be explained that Ricoeur's philosophy shows a particular compatibility with the promissory theory of contracts. A promise made (much like Kantian imperative) provides a paradigmatic pattern of self-identity within it. In reference to the ontology and ethics of the person proposed by Ricouer, it becomes possible to define the non-positivist notion of subjectivity of a party to the contract, as a being capable of valid formation of a self-bond through a promise. Contrary to Ricoeur's philosophy, it is also possible to point to the source of the law-making authority of that party. In this philosophy, keeping the obligations made is an ethically meaningful way of the subject's being (ipse), contrasted by Ricoeur with the being shaped by the variable features of the human character (idem). Thus, the source of the normative authority of the party to the contract in the light of the proposed concept is the capacity of keeping the promises made (expressed in the pacta sunt servanda principle), i.e. the capacity of continued being oneself in the ipse sense.

1. The paper outlines one of the crucial questions of private law, i.e. the question of subjectivity of a party to a contract. The analysis will be made on the background of the promissory theory of contracts. This theory assumes that contractual obligations originate as a result of a promise made by a party to the contract. Thus, the legal bond (vinculum iuris) in a contract results from the self-expression of the subject communicating the intention of assuming an obligation. This self-expression is valid to the degree to which the subject is capable of forming a promise. For that reason, the notion of subjectivity is defined in the presentation through the constitutive features of the being, namely a party to the contract. As a result, the main part of the presentation focuses on the ontology and ethics of a party to the contract, referring to the philosophical ideas of French philosopher Paul Ricoeur.

The point of reference here is a relational theory of subjectivity (being oneself – ipseité) developed by Ricoeur. According to him, keeping the obligations is an ethically meaningful way of the subject's being (called ipse), contrasted with the being shaped by the variable features of the human character (called idem). Consequently, a man (so called "the-one-who-is-himself") remains himself, if he is faithful to "the intention of the good life", namely "the plan for oneself", i.e., to the word given. As Ricoeur states, "the promise serves as a paradigmatic model of the identity of oneself". As a result, the person who remains himself is the one who – regardless of the physical and mental changes that take place inside him – remains faithful to the undertaken obligations [also legal ones – M.P.][2]. Additionally, Ricoeur relates the issue of personal identity with the theory of subject's narrativization. The identity preservation project is considered as a narrative developed by the subject who is under the influence of his own imperative, similar to Kantian concept of self-legislation.

It should be noted that the above theory (in particular, the distinction between being oneself in the sense of ipse and in the sense of idem) can provide a satisfactory answer to the key question about the reason of the validity of contractual obligations. This answer is justified in the case of rejecting the separation of law and morals assumed by legal positivism. It can be legitimately claimed that the fact of abiding by all legally relevant agreements stems from the very ontological and ethical essence of the subject who is himself in the sense of ipse. I would like to point out that one of the oldest legal topoi is the ancient Roman principle of pacta sunt servanda ("agreements must be abided by"). In the light of Ricoeur's theory this topos, fundamental for law, is a concise definition of the subject who remains himself, i.e. the one who performs contractual obligations despite changing factual circumstances, the passage of time, changes in the nature, etc.

Ricoeur writes: (..) It seems that keeping promises (…) represents a challenge to time, a denial of change: even if my desire changed, even if I changed my mind or my preferences, I "shall keep my word". (..) It is sufficient to provide a strictly ethical justification of the promise that we can draw from the obligation to protect the institution of language and of reciprocal trust of another in my fidelity[3].

Another element of the theory of the subject of law, crucial from the legal perspective, is the reflexive relationship which combines the subject of law and Another, interpreted as the relationship of equal subjects of law.

It concerns in particular the recognition of the subjectivity of Another as a prerequisite for establishing the ontologically rooted principle of reciprocity, crucial for some branches of law, especially for law of obligations.

Ricoeur - inspired by dialogical "philosophy of the face" of E. Levinas - states that obligation is always carried out vis-à-vis Another. In other words, the "ethical narrative" of oneself is always addressed to the one vis-à-vis whom we realize ourselves. It follows that, for Ricoeur, recognition of Another's subjectivity constitutes a primordial source of validity (also legal, I presume) and complies with the assumed obligations.

Ricoeur writes that: "Preserving one's self is, in the case of a person, such a pattern of behaviour that another person can count on us. Since someone is counting on me, I am accountable, I can be held to account (je suis comptable) in my actions vis-à-vis Another. The concept of responsibility combines both meanings: to count on …, to be accountable for … This concept connects them by adding to them the principle of answering the question: 'Where are you?', raised by Another who is calling me. The answer to that is: 'Here I am!' (Me voici!) – the answer in which preserving one's self is manifested. (...) The nagging question of 'Who am I' (...) can be incorporated into a proud statement 'That's what I hold on to!' The question is: 'Who am I, unstable, so that you could still count on me?'"[4] tion which is expressed in complying with the commitment assumed vis-à-vis Another. Ricoeur takes another step and develops on this basis the dialectic of reciprocity, in which the substitutability of the roles of "oneself" and "another" coincides with the irreplaceability of the entities as such.

He writes that: "(...) I cannot respect myself without respecting another as I respect myself ... Thus, respecting another as yourself and respecting yourself as another become equally fundamental and crucial"[5]. That is the way in which Ricoeur constitutes the principle of reciprocity, according to which "one should treat oneself as Another" and "Another as oneself". This equalization goes as far as recognizing Another as the onto-ethical basis of legal validity. Ricoeur makes here also certain references to Aristotle's philosophy, in particular to his concept of friendship (philia) as a symmetrical relationship between equals. This element confirms the accuracy of this theory in the field of obligation law, in which reciprocity assumes the form of granting equal rights and duties to the contracting parties.

These remarks allow to draw an outline of Ricoeur's theory which enables us to construct a coherent non-positivist theory of (at least) the law of contracts, the central question of which remains the issue of the nature of the bond that connects the parties to reciprocal agreements. The theory which most closely connects compliance with the contracts with the subject that assumes the commitment comes to the aid of the legal notion of obligation. It should be underlined that the conceptual background of Ricoeur's theory is coherent with so called promissory theory of contracts as developed by the Anglo – Saxon legal thought (it will be mentioned below).

2. Now I would like to introduce the possible application of the above-mentioned elements of Ricoeur's philosophy in the dogma of reciprocal agreements. As I indicated before, it is of particular convergence with the Anglo-Saxon theory of contract law, with a particular emphasis on the so-called theory of a promise.

The Anglo-Saxon theory of contract law (contract theory)[6] developed three main positions, which attempt to clarify the nature of the bond between the contracting parties and which at the same time aim at identifying the reasons why law provides protection of that bond[7]. These theories are developed under the assumption of a necessary connection between law and morality. These are: the reliance theory[8], the transfer theory[9], and the promissory theory[10]. From the perspective of the continental science of civil law[11], the same issues are raised by the theories of the declaration of intent, with the greatest impact of the theory of will and the theory of the declaration[12].

The crux of the promissory theory is the assumption that the obligation arises not so much as a result of an intentional act, but rather as a result of a self-expression of the entity expressing (communicating) the intention to assume the obligation. Communication (or narrative – as I propose to put it in Ricoeur's language) is considered as a prerequisite to express the intent which shows, among others, what the entity knows about the very concept of promise. Thus, the communicated intent cannot be only the intent to take a specific action, but the intent to assume certain liabilities[13]. Therefore, it is emphasised in the Anglo-Saxon literature that the fact of making a legally relevant promise is not merely an additional factor that influences the decision on the performance / non-performance of obligations. A decision to perform the obligation is in fact made at the time of making the promise, while the promise itself is the first and primary source of the action on the part of the obligor[14].

The objections against the promissory theory concern, among others, the bilateral nature of reciprocal agreements in which the formation of a legal bond results from the promise given to the other party (promisee), and not only from the fact of the promisor being bound by its promise. Having in mind the theory at issue, there arises a fundamental question: what it means that the promise "is binding" in some way and what constitutes the basis of "being bound" by such a promise. The answer to these questions is provided by the promissory theory which refers to the analysed topics drawn from the philosophical achievements of Paul Ricoeur[15]. The said achievements demonstrate particular applicability in the promissory theory of contracts, combining the issue of one's own subjectivity and the subjectivity of Another man with the issue of reciprocity in the context of onto-ethics of the entity who remains himself in the sense of ipse[16].

[14] The following example can be provided in reference to S. A. Smith: I made a commitment to paint the roof of my neighbour's house next week, but then I changed my mind and came to the conclusion that this work is not profitable for me. I feel to some extent bound by my promise, yet my final decision is determined on the basis of another important factor, namely purely economic calculation. From the perspective of the promissory theory my reasoning is wrong, since I already made a decision when I made a promise, therefore I am obliged to perform my obligation. See S. A. Smith, Contract Theory, op. cit., p 58.

[15] It should be noted that the analysis of philosophical and legal issues constitutes an important component of Ricoeur's philosophy. A prominent place is taken here by the issue of law as "a grand narrative", developed on the level of just social institutions as well as the issue of the relations between legal interpretation and argumentation. Cf. P. Ricoeur, Reflections on the Just, The University of Chicago Press, Chicago, London 2007; P. Ricoeur, Drogi rozpoznania [The Course of Recognition], op.cit., pp. 194 – 200; P. Taylor, Ricoeur and Law: the Distinctiveness of Legal Hermeneutics (in:) Ricoeur Across Disciplines, (ed.) S. Davidson, The Continuum International Publishing Group Inc., London 2010, pp. 84 – 101.

Most importantly, on the basis of Ricoeur's theory every promise is made by the subject of law vis-à-vis "oneself as Another", which means that the promise is perceived as ethically significant way of being the subject of law, self-determined by the rule of reciprocity[17]. I would like to emphasize that the concept of the subject of law (the one-who-is-himself[18]), derived from Ricoeur, unifies the problem of the promise and the problem of reciprocity on the onto-ethical level of the party who makes the promise. The phenomenon of abiding by agreements thus gains the basis in the very existence of the subject of law (ipse) – the contracting party.

Consequently, in the light of Ricoeur's views, undertaking the promise by the legal subject is equal to determining the subject itself as the party to the contract. What constitutes a prerequisite here is a primordial recognition of one's own subjectivity as well as the subjectivity of the other, as a party to the contract under reciprocity rule. The following activity, undertaken by the party to a contract, is the action which – from the perspective of the contract – constitutes an affirmation of the party's responsibility for complying with the obligation.

The opponents of the promissory theory point out that under the theory of the Anglo-Saxon law a promise is perceived as a unilateral act, while agreements are essentially bilateral in nature. Both the act of making an offer by one of the parties as well as its acceptance by the other party is necessary in order to conclude the contract; in addition, in the standard contracts the responsibilities refer to both contracting parties[19]. In other words, as indicated by Smith, the reciprocity of rights and obligations in the contract is not strictly related to a unilateral nature of the promise (binding the legal subject). The promissory theory, referring to Ricoeur's philosophy, provides the instrument that allows to eliminate the signalled problem, in particular through the relational conception of the person, according to which every promise, also the one made by the legal subject merely vis-à-vis himself, treats as an example the act of the promise made vis-à-vis another person[20].

3. The issue of the promise and reciprocity, though crucial for the law of reciprocal agreements, constitutes a part of Ricoeur's theory which is of a more extensive importance for the theory of law. It is notable from the perspective of the definition of ethical aspirations, as proposed by Ricoeur: "intention of good life with another and for another in just institutions". If promise and reciprocity are placed in the micro scale of the ontology of the legal subject, at the same time are perceived as the foundation of interpersonal relationship. If we recognize a promise and reciprocity as the elements of a specific contract inter partes, they will be considered as the properties of "meso" level, referred to in the definition of ethical aspiration by means of the phrase "with another and for another". At the same time, promise and reciprocity underpin the macro scale of just institutions, among which Ricoeur places positive law. So, if promise and reciprocity in law are considered as universal rules of a formal nature, being the properties of agreements in the sphere of private law, they will be placed on the third level of the quoted definition of ethical aspiration within Ricoeur's meaning, as a part of "the grand narrative" of law[21].

The definition of ethical aspiration thus unifies onto-ethical aspect of the subject, interpersonal relationships, typical for the law of reciprocal agreements and the fair institution of positive law. Since the ethical aspiration is implemented by the subject of law simultaneously on three levels, it becomes possible to justify the individualized protection that the statutory law provides for the promise made by a contracting party. This is due to the fact that the level of just institutions becomes the basis of model and codified patterns of reciprocal agreements which are considered as typification of the common situations of making a promise.

To sum up, Ricoeur's philosophy shows a particular compatibility with the promissory theory of contracts. A promise made (much like Kantian imperative) provides a paradigmatic pattern of self-identity within it. In reference to the ontology and ethics of the person proposed by Ricouer, it becomes possible to define the non-positivist notion of subjectivity of a party to the contract, as a being capable of valid formation of a self-bond through a promise. Moreover, it is possible to point to the source of the law-making authority of that party since keeping the obligations made is an ethically meaningful way of the subject's being (ipse - contrasted by Ricoeur with the being shaped by the variable features of the human character, i.e. idem). Thus, the source of the normative authority of the party to the contract in the light of the proposed concept is the capacity of keeping the promises made (expressed in the pacta sunt servanda principle), i.e. the capacity of continued being oneself in the sense of ipse.

The supremacy of the consumer and the redefinition of the notion of citizenship in supercapitalism

Felipe Meira Marques

Abstract: This work intends to analyze the factors that led to supercapitalism, which is an evolution of the capitalism, where companies and corporations occupy the political sphere that should be occupied by every citizen. Competition, result of changes in the 1970s, such as technology, globalization, and the deregulation, expands beyond economy. In this context, consumption and investment started to be stimulated. This consumerism, however, forced companies to seek higher profits, but with bad consequences, such as work unsafeness, disrespect to Human Rights and devastation of the environment. As a result of the consumerism, Democracy is getting weaker, whereas consumers and investors do not cease to increase. In Brazil, citizenship was linked to work. The following hypothesis is risen: there was a change of citizenship notion to consumerism. Proposals are featured to restore the balance between these two facets of the human condition.

Keywords: Supercapitalism. Citizenship. Consumerism.

Introduction

Supercapitalism, Capitalism 2.0 or Turbo Capitalism are expressions that classify the present stage of the capitalist development. Concerning that, the exercise of Democracy has been uncertain, what contrasts with the expansion of capitalism.

Great corporations are fortified because of consumption advance. They have been interfering directly in other areas without difficulty. They penetrated other spheres that used to be preserved (or at least should be) by different actors: government, labor union, community, politics and environment. This last one seems to be the only force capable to interrupts the uncontrolled advance of capitalism.

It is observed that the options to the consumers have never been wider. On-line shops with express delivery, easy credit, new products and wide range of styles are examples of those options. In addition, actions to contend disqualified products or their manufacturer are rising. In Brazil, the National Consumers League and the Prosecuting Counsel's regular interventions illustrate that posture.

Citizen's role, however, goes an opposite way. Political creed is weaker. Citizens can not unite themselves or demand changes, and their mechanisms keep scarce. Democracy is struggled for being practiced. The power of people as citizens have been replaced as if they were consumers since the 1970s.

At the same time that the consumption society has been established, the impacts are not always perceived, what could be called a kind of double personality, full of contradictions. As consumers, they require low prices and quality; as citizens, they ask for good wages to the workers. Whereas they ask for changes concerning environment, individual energy consumption has never been higher.

Another change is established as time passes, which is parallel with power transfer. Working is source of subjective, in which the individual expresses their activity, integrates social relations and is recognized by society. This used to be constructed according to worker's daily routine.

This role, however, has been replaced by the culture of consumption, in which people get products not only to their own satisfaction, but also to get social status and join groups.

It will be analyzed how capitalism developed into supercapitalism. The rules of the game have changed since the 1970s, specially after new technologies had appeared. A new period is installed in the world. An intense competition among companies for new customers and investors is the main outcome of this change.

Those companies accomplish their role: profit. Consequently, customers and investors receive low prices and new offers. Profit, however, requires salary cut and social welfare benefits, production displacement, pressure on suppliers or environment pollution. Citizens are responsible for that.

Subsequently, it will be verified that, with this advance, consumption has been redefining the notion of citizenship. In Brazil, it was linked to work matters. Precarious work and incentive to consumption in supercapitalism changed this relation in such a way that the consumer acquires sovereignty. Thus, imposing limits to companies has become difficult.

Conciliate supercapitalism with Democracy constitutes a task harder than denounce problems. They can not suggest changes, however, without knowing the situation. Some proposals to make Democracy more effective, free from the power of great companies, will be showed. Authors such as Reich, Barnes and Harvey elaborated theories in order to reallocate citizen in their right space in the democratic game.

1. Supercapitalism

Capitalism has suffered different transformation since it appeared. The characteristics of societies, such as modes of production, technologies, the role of the State, did not keep the same, even though the term capitalism serves to define British society in the nineteenth century as well as Brazil in the twentieth century.

Reich[1] defines supercapitalism as an evolution of the capital in which

Big companies became much more competitive, global and innovative. Something that we call supercapitalism has been born. Within this process of transformation, as consumers and investors, we have effectuated great conquests; however, as citizens, seeking everyone's well being, we have lost ground.

The changes that occurred in the late 1960s and early 1970s caused the supercapitalism. In order to analyze this change deeply, it is necessary to make a brief explanation on what capitalism was like at the time. Most authors describe this period between 1945 and 1973.

1.1 The previous Capitalism: 1945 -1970:

Democratic capitalism, state-controlled or 1.0 are some of the adjectives to refer to tjis time. Its main attribution is the presence of the State in the economy, controlling it and managing it. There is a balance of interests among companies, public interest, workers, consumers and citizens. Prosperity, especially the American one, facilitates the negotiation of those interests.

The balance can also be observed in Brazil. "The organization of work obeys a policy based on a juridical-social apparatus, which harmonizes perfectly capitalists and proletariat interests"[2].

At that moment, market was still local. There was no expansion because of globalization. Capitalism has always aimed that expansion, but there was not interaction as nowadays. There were longer distances, especially for communications and transportation, crucial areas to a global market.

There were fewer investors. Most people would rather keep their money for themselves, or invest it in the few banks. They did not use to give importance to investments. "Very few Americans used to pay attention to Dow Jones Industrial Average. Even fewer were the ones that used to invest on shares".[3]

Consumption existed and was stimulated. The options, however, were a few. The offer was in mass, not personal, predictable and planned. Fordism was the ideal way of production. Products prices and quality used to reflect a weak interest for researches. Reich prescribes[4]:

Success was the common outcome and the pattern of behavior consisted on avoiding unnecessary risks, what almost always meant rejecting innovations and opting for variations in products and service that were already considered popular. This tendency did not promote creativity.

Credit as well as goods was scarce. It was not easy to get loans or financing, otherwise the banks do today. There was no need. Consequently, debts used to be smaller.

Work was more stable, and the workers felt represented by syndicates. It was active and its orders used to be obeyed. It had enough power to oppose resistance to companies. Besides, in general, it used to be cheaper to follow the syndicates reclamations. According to Antunes[5]:

It can be said that together with taylorist/fordist work, it was built, particularly during post-war, a system of "compromise" and "regulation" that was limited to a small group of advanced capitalist countries, and offered the illusion that the system of social metabolism of the capital could be effective, lasting and definitely controlled, ruled and founded in a compromise between capital and work mediated by the state.

Companies were ruled by the State. In Brazil, Vargas was the exponent who created and ruled the companies. In the United States, although there was a sudden fear, companies wished to be ruled, once this stabilized and guaranteed profit. This was possible because of the low number of companies and strong incorporations.

By now, those pieces of information are enough to understand what led to supercapitalism.

1.2 The way to Supercapitalism

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, some facts happened and they at first sight did not cause great impact. Their unexpected consequences, however, changed the structure so far.

Globalization, neoliberalism, technologies and wars are some of the reasons elected by different authors about the main fact to the change. All of them were fundamental to the expansion of companies beyond the economical sphere, to the consumerism revolution and to the redefinition of citizenship.

The story of what happened does not have villains nor heroes, and the plot flowed a very regular line. "Everything started in the 1970s, with the advance of new technologies"[6]. They were the essential condition so that everything happened. Without them, there would not had existed globalization, deregulation, changing of the ways of production and all the following consequences. Schumpeter says[7]:

The ways or conditions of work are the fundamental determinant of the social structures that, in their turn, generate attitudes, actions and civilizations. MARX explains this point with the so called affirmation that the hand mill creates the feudalism, and the steam mill creates the capitalist society. This gives great importance to the technological element, but we need to accept that proposition considering that technology itself is not all.

Cold War between the United States and the Soviet Union provoked a series of races, such as for arms, for the space and imperialist. It was also an ideologic war. The conquest of new partners was extremely important. So, they started to produce new technologies.

At that moment, governments initiated a series of financing and investments on research. Creativity, which used to be seen as disturbing for production, becomes fundamental to get new partners and develop armament or spatial projects.

Researches used to be carried in small quantities. New products were rare. With the incentive, different professionals started to produce warlike materials that can be naturally used by citizens and companies nowadays. It is the case of Internet, which was possible because of the attempts to transmit information in real time about the Vietnam War. Harvey[8] adduces that

It was only during and after the World War II that this aspect of innovative behavior became fundamental, once the arm race during the cold war. The spatial race and all the rest involved directly the state in the activity of research and development, together with capitalist companies, in different sectors of economy (everything from nuclear energy to satellite images to public health care).

Galeano[9] attests that the Pentagon was always the main financial actor and the main client of all the new things. "The satellites of communications derive from military projects and the Pentagon articulated for the first time the Internet, in order to co-ordinate its operations in international scale".

The technologies developed to the war revolutionized the commerce, though it was not the first objective. The main changes were in the sectors of communications and transportation.

In transportation, new structures were combined together to maximize the production in a shorter time. Softer boxes and larger containers that could be easily handled. According to Harvey[10]

The process of globalization was facilitated because of a radical re-organization of the systems of transportation, which reduced the costs for transit. The usage of containers – a fundamental innovation – permitted that the tools made in Brazil could be used to set cars in Detroit.

Communications developed. It allowed countries to contact more easily. The rapid change of information during the cold war was fundamental. Governments noticed that the faster they could communicate the fewer damage they could cause. Therefore, they invested so that the distances became shorter". These two facts changed the relation time-space of the world, reducing them. "The new systems of communications allowed a strict organization of the goods production in the globe[11]".

The technologies so far invented did not restrict their usage to the initial purposes. Great companies, governments and citizens, as long as they could afford them, started to use the products. Thus, this essential condition to the origin of supercapitalism also permitted other three phenomena: globalization, deregulation and changing of the production.

It is not simple to talk about globalization. It is an ample theme, complex and full of contradictions. This article, however, does not aim to analyze the phenomenon fully, but its general characteristics.

"Globalization is characterized essentially by the policy of opening the markets, whose ethical basis follows compulsorily the rules of free market in detriment of the social matters".[12]

Due to the reduction of costs with transport and communications, companies started to open in places where they could reduce the costs with production, besides getting supplies from other places. That way, companies could make larger profits.

With the reduced expenses, new companies were created, contrasting with the few ones that had been operating. They discovered that small markets could be profitable. Thay could be individualist, personalized and answering to the people's desires. Reich says[13] that starting in the 1970s, a great number of technologies replaced the so far prevailing stable systems of production to another one made up of many Sellers capable of producing and selling small quantities".

With the deregulation, new companies entered into the market. State could not avoid them from opening anymore, and they demanded that state stopped intervention. Gradually, the states yielded. We can cite as an example the case of aviation.

In the United States, in the early 1970s, new aviation companies, which were not protected by deregulation, aimed profits through more accessible prices, small airplanes and eliminating everything that could be possible. They pressured the Civil Aeronautics Board to deregulate taxes and routes. "In 1978, the Congress deregulated civil aviation and started to extinguish the Civil Aeronautics Board".[14]

Sector of the Economy started to pressure the governments, finance researches and to show the benefits to the Country and consumers. The neoliberal school based theoretically the movement, which had as main followers Reagan and Thatcher. Then, the deregulation was assumed and expanded, or imposed, to the rest of the world. To Ali[15]

The private financial initiatives that castigated the public sector converted in norm, and countries (like France and Germany) that did not rise fast enough toward the neoliberal paradise were denounced frequently on The Economist and Financial Times.

A sector, however, deserves prominence: the financial sector. Banks multiplied and started to offer unthinkable services so far. Credit was available[16]. Stock market went off. Reich prescribes[17]

The deregulation had changed the psychology of people, in special the youngest generation, transforming the mentality of the individuals, who abandon the idea of being a simple saving person to become investors. Our economy will compete for the resources of the investors.

As a consequence, the investors multiplied. They passed to see more opportunities to improve their income. The study of the market and the functioning spread out. And, obviously, companies passed to depend and compete on this capital. Profit was not enough itself anymore: profit had to be huge, or else the investors could migrate to others that were better valuated.

All these factors led to a huge competition. The fight for markets became wild. The ones who did not participate on the game would be out.[18] The companies that did not attract investors could not survive. The ones that did not offer good products and cheap could be extinguished either.

Then competition lost control. Companies, willing to attract consumers/investors started to fight. This combat invaded different areas of human activity, including Politics. The State started to be the stage for market fight. So, Democracy lost space to big companies, which act in varied ways in the state organization, whether legal or not.

According to what was said above, it is not a game of villains or heroes. If a company would not do it, another one could do it the same way. There were no options left for its maintenance. In case of not entering into the rules of the game, its extinction would be certain.

1.3 The installation of Supercapitalism

Consumers had excellent advantages in this scenario. The new products are much better and satisfy the individual demands. Prices got lower as quality improved. According to Gailbraith, "The ordinary individual has access to amenities – foods, entertainment, personal transportation and plumbing – in which not even the rich rejoiced a century ago."[19]

Travels got faster and cheaper, researches improved the quality of life, the communications became more accessible. Services developed. As though they were investors, people make money applying it on great corporations. A revolution in society that, no doubt, brought huge benefits for the people.

Not everything, however, was well. Those consumers/investors look for the best offers. Competition brought serious problems, not only economical, but also social, political, environmental and communitarian.

There is a great contradiction in this action. As investors, the accomplishments are excellent. As citizens, however, it is criticized what the companies do to make profit. They protest against: the low wages workers earn; the disrespect to the human rights in periphery countries; and environmental pollution.

Reich[20] says that

> Those concerns about economical security, social justice, communitarian life, environment and moral principles were fundamental in the democratic capitalism. They were and still are reasons to worry all of us, as citizens. Today's economy is responsible for doing good business, because it sacrifices other aspects. We can put the blame on big companies, but the choices were exclusively ours.

[20] REICH, Robert, Op. Cit., 2008, p. 100.

A self-reflection can be done and observe, for instance, how energy consumption got higher. One can complain about the companies expenses or the pollution, but individual Technologies, as tablets and laptops, increase the expenses with energy.[21]

Barnes[22] denounces three problems that this revolution brought: "the destruction of nature, the widening of inequality and the failure to promote happiness despite the pretense of doing so."

The first talks about the violence against the environment. The second is about income concentration, which is getting higher. The third mentions the happiness brought by those new products. Instead of the new options and facilities, the feeling of happiness of the human beings did not increase.

The Work Rights initiated a descending line. They became precarious. Keeping the unemployment rate is important for the companies, because it obliges them to compete. With the change of production to other poles, workers lost power to revindicate. When they did it so, the company simply moved to another pole.

The value "work" was reduced in contemporary societies. They do not oppose the capitalism anymore. Dejours[23] shows the pathology of work in contemporary society, what puts the human condition in trouble. This pathology is a result of the way work is looked in supercapitalism.

Nardi[24] demonstrates the precarious work by saying

From a situation of fixed wages, contracts lasting indeterminately with possibilities to functional progression and collective negotiation; we have today an indefinite number of work relations, such as: flexible contracts, temporary, with variable remuneration and telecommuting, individual negotiation, alternation of unemployment periods and temporary work, subcontracting and outsourcing. Finally, multiple forms of precarious work. The syndicate movement became fragile in this new scenario and is disorientated concerning combating the arguments of co-optation present in the new forms of management.

The state, absolute, has weakened. Great companies are now worldwide, with great influence within governments. It is hard to avoid it. There are pressure and lobbies that, in their turn, disguise as if they had public interest.

A consequence of this revolution was the debility of the state. It lost power to compete with the companies. Citizens do not feel represented anymore. Hobsbawn[25] demonstrates the decadence of the State:

The governments of the modern territory states – any one – are based in three presumptions: first, that they have more power than any other unity that operates in its territory; second, that the inhabitants of its territory somewhat accepts its authority; and third, that they can offer to the inhabitants services that they could not found effectively, for instance law and order. In the last thirty or forty years, those presumptions have lost their legitimacy.

The ethical matter starts to be questioned. As examples, the cases of Google and Yahoo in China. Either those companies yielded to the government, disrespecting the human rights, or they would lose a considerable piece of the world market.

A new character is now on the stage. The so called Chief Executive Officer, or CEOs, do not have many choices. They have to make profits at any cost. Many of them say that, as citizens, they would not like to take some decisions, but, as executives of great corporations, they must do it. If they are not efficient to the market dispute, another one will do so.

For that reason, the CEOs are considered by many people the real villains. Supercapitalism, however, happened without considering this game of evil versus good. Even the CEOs are compelled to act. To Barnes[26], "What matters at the end of the day isn't the manager's personal values, but the difference in price between recycled paper and paper made from newly felled trees."

The main problem, however, was the changing of power and citizenship as a political citizen to the consumer citizen and, consequently, the fortification of big companies in politics. Hobsbawn[27] adduces

This all reveals what may be the most immediate and serious problem for liberal democracy. In a transnational world and more globalized, the national governments coexist with forces that have at least the same impact on citizens' daily routine and are, in different degrees, out of their control.

Thus, this all reflects the change of course in which society transferred the Power to consumption.

2 Redefining citizenship in Consumption Society

Defining consumption society is a hard task. It is important to find something different from other societies that also used to get properties to their own satisfaction. We would like to reinforce that consumption bases and strengthen supercapitalism.

Lipovetsky, however, does this very well. He says that what still carachterizes the "hyperconsumption, or consumption-world, is the fact that even what is not economical, family, religion, syndicalism, school, procreation, ethics – is permeated by the mentality of homo consumericus"[28].

This advance brought impacts similar to the ones already mentioned above. In this topic, we defend the thesis that believes that, as consumerism was increasing, the question of citizenship started to be transferred to an individual of consumption.

When the majority of the population is more concerned with buying a defective product than with millions of money put out of the way in public tender, for example, it is time to rethink democracy. "The crisis of the political participation passes by the utilitarian view of the citizen in your society life. It is a crisis that is a reflection of the present ontological universe dominated by homus economicus."[29]

This question, besides being prejudicial for the human being, is excluding. It is known that only a small portion of society has access to luxurious items. In Brazil, poverty is still high, a part of the population can hardly survive.

Capitalism has to show that the system is good for all. Therefore, optimism is fundamental. Either people buy, invest, open stores, publicize and enhance those action, or capitalism may come to an end. This idea is, however, illusory, once inequality has been always increasing, and very few people can consume. In Brazil, nicknamed Belindia, the rich, who consume as if they were in Belgium, cohabit with the poor, who live as though in India.

Kahneman[30], Nobel Prize of Economy, also corroborates:

To what extent will the outcome of your effort depend on what you do in your firm? This is evidently an easy question; the answer comes quickly and in my small sample it has never been less than 80%. Even when they are not sure they will succeed, these bold people think their fate is almost entirely in their own hands. They are surely wrong: the outcome of a start-up depends as much on the achievements of its competitors and on changes in the market as on its own efforts.

Capitalism needs, therefore, this illusion, this constant feedback to survive. That is the reason why there is a lot of incentive. Once you consume, you are favoring all the system and shows that you are doing your part so that everything functions correctly.

Publicity plays an important role. Dreams are sold, projects of life in the simplest products, such as margarine. Reflects of the consumption society, in which being somebody in owning some objects, publicity shows that those who have goods are the happy ones, or you are Young when you own certain products. In the cybernetic era, when the right to citizenship is based on the duty of consumption, the great companies spy the consumers and bombard them with publicity.[31]

In Brazil, citizenship was linked to work rights. Being a citizen meant having working papers and, therefore, the guarantees and exigencies. It used to be the passport to obtain political rights. According to Bercovici[32]

The juridical instrument that proves the bond between the individual and citizenship is the working papers. The extension of citizenship occurs by the regulation of new professions and by the amplification of the rights associated to the professional exercise, that is, the working rights

With the supercapitalism, it is known that work lost its value, as described above. The subjectivity, that for a long time has been linked to work, now is sought in goods and products supplied by companies.

Work fragmented, outsourced, instability is recurring, finally, became precarious. According to Baumant, "el papel – en otros tiempos a cargo del trabajo – de vincular las motivaciones individuales, la integracion social y la reproduccion de todo el sistema productivo corresponde em la actualidad a la iniciativa del consumidor"[33]. Configurations of identity, that used to be built in the relations of everyday life, tranfer to consumption. Multiple identities, ephemeral, superficial, can be found in stores. With this, corporations gain Power. And politics loses space.

Work used to be source of expression and recognition of subjectivity of a person. This used to be built daily, and because of that the notion of citizenship was linked to the notion of worker.

There was, consequently, a changing of the notion of citizenship: work lost its force; consumption gained it. Then, the concept of citizenship followed this transformation motivated by supercapitalism.

We find ourselves in the moment that the commercialization of the ways of life does not have natural, cultural nor ideological resistance anymore; and in which the spheres of the social and individual life reorganize themselves in function of consumption[34]. The changing of this paradigm was necessary in order to rebuild Democracy. If this continues to exist, citizenship will be still linked to consumption, companies will remain strong, and the problems will be recurring.

Some proposals are presented to rebalance democracy, fortifying the role of citizens, who will become the responsible for the limits of the companies, and putting their interests seeking well-being before any other thing.

3 Proposals to overcome Supercapitalism

According to what was said above, some authors show proposals for a change to face the reality. A balance of interests can be sought. Democracy can be reconstituted or built again, because according to Hobsbawn[35] "the ideal of sovereignty of the market is not a complement to liberal democracy, but an alternative to it."

We will present here the proposals of three authors: Harvey, Reich e Barnes.

3.1 Harvey

Demonstrating the problem, Harvey[36] exemplifies saying that > the power of money exercised by few prejudices all the ways of democratic governing. Pharmaceutical, health insurance and hospitals lobbies, for instance, spent more than 133 millions of dollar in the first three months of 2009 to certify that the thing would go how they want in the healthcare reform in the United States.

The author, manifestly Marxist, does not believe that capitalism can be a plausible system. There will always be inequality. The first lesson that one needs to learn is that an ethical capitalism, without exploration and socially fair that benefits everyone is impossible. It contradicts the peculiar nature of the capital.[37]

The same way as the other authors, Harvey emphasizes the role of the citizen and demonstrates the lack of debate about some matters. Concerning the recurring crisis of capitalism, he says that they are moments of contradiction and possibilities, from which any kind of alternatives, including socialist and anticapitalist, may appear[38]

According to the author

> In a great part of the capitalist world, we passed through a surprising period when politics was depoliticized and mercantile. Only now that the state shows up to help the financiers, it was clear that the State and the capital are linked as never before, institutional and personal. It is seen clearly now the dominant class, more than the political class that acts as subordinate, and also dominating.

As already mentioned, diverse forces question supercapitalism.

[35] HOBSBAWN, Eric, Op. Cit., 2007, p.105.
[36] HARVEY, David, Op. Cit., p. 179.
[37] Ibid., p.193.
[38] Ibid., p.176.

"The central problem is that, in total, there is no anticapitalist movement united and decisive enough capable to challenge in an adequate way rhe reproduction of the capitalist class and the perpetuation of its power in the world."[39]

There are five chains of thinking that, somehow, combat the system and should be united. They are the non-governmental organizations, organizations of basis that deny external financing, the reorganization of work and the left political parties, social movements that resist land moving and dispossession, and emancipation movements in question of identity.

Environmental movements, concerned about the planet and the future generations, are the ones which are putting the biggest pressure on companies. An environmental conscience is being created, and even the consumers/investors are punishing the ones that pollute or degrade the environment.

In the search of a reform, four comprehensions by the people are illustrated. First, increase is not the same as development. It is reiterated that is false to say that increase is a previous condition to reduce poverty and inequality or that more respectable environmental policies are, as organic produce, luxury to the rich[40].

The second proposal exalts the one said above, in the union of the anticapitalist movements and the knowledge of how supercapitalism works. Traditional hostilities between, for example, the ones with technical, scientific and administrative knowledges and the movements of social agitation have to be solved and overcome[41].

In third place,

It will also be necessary to face the impacts and the answers from other spaces of the global economy. Different places can develop in different ways according to their history, culture, localization and political-economical condition.[42]

He illustrates that Berlin, for instance, is an antiquated city that has low indicatives of economical success based on capitalism, but it is still a habitable city and good for living in.

To conclude, He shows which objectives must be traced. Norms must be produced. Harvey disposes[43]

You can include the respect to the nature, radical equalitarianism on the social relations, institutional arrangements based in some comprehension of common interests, democratic administrative procedures (oposed to the money schemes that exist today), work process organized by the producers, daily life such as the free exploration of new types of social relations and life conditions, mental conceptions that are reflected into selfrealization to the service of others and technological innovations and organizations orientated to the seek of the common weel-being instead of supporting military force and the corporative greed.

Aduz o autor que esses "poderiam ser os pontos correvolucionários em torno dos quais a ação social pode convergir e girar. Claro que isso é utópico! Mas e daí! Não temos como não sê-lo."[44]

Harvey[45] acredita na transformação através do conhecimento, e na superação do capitalismo por uma outra ordem. Atesta que Talvez nós devamos apenas definir o movimento, nosso movimento, como anticapitalista ou chamar-nos de Partido da Indignação, prontos para derrotar o Partido de Wall Street e seus acólitos e defensores em todos os lugares, e que assim seja. A luta pela sobrevivência com Justiça não só continua, mas recomeça.

A realidade é tratada de forma precisa e detalhada. Realiza seu objetivo ao descrever a situação, demonstrando que o conhecimento e a crítica são peças-chave para uma transformação. Ao propor mudanças, todavia, ainda é bastante tímido. Ações concretas não são bem definidas em sua obra. Não retira, todavia, o brilhantismo de suas ideias.

3.2 Reich

Reich acredita que o capitalismo é provável, e é um bom sistema, apenas deveria ser trabalhado. Sua ideia principal é que a democracia seja valorizada e imponha limites ao capitalismo. Apenas a conscientização do cidadão e, consequentemente, seu desejo de mudança e imposição de sua força é que farão a situação mudar. Aduz que podemos ter, ao mesmo tempo, democracia vibrante e capitalismo exuberante. Para tanto, as duas esferas devem ser segregadas.[46]

[46] REICH, Robert, Op. Cit., p. 228.

Para reduzir a ação de empresas no congresso, uma série de ações são sugeridas. Entre elas, financiamento público para campanhas e limites na doação para candidaturas. Além disso, delimitar a atuação dos lobistas é essencial.

Interessante ponto de vista propõe o autor sobre a competição além do mercado. Se as empresas soubessem que as outras não estão levando vantagem no processo político, não iriam tentar influenciá-lo. Isto diminuiria os custos, que podiam ser alocados de forma diversa, como no próprio processo produtivo. A ação mais eficaz ao alcance dos reformadores é reduzir os efeitos do dinheiro das empresas sobre a política e amplificar a voz dos cidadãos[47].

Reich relembra que as empresas não estão interessadas no bem comum. Seu interesse é atrair investidores e consumidores, valorizando sua marca e oferecendo melhores ofertas. Por isso, não se deve aceitar o que os especialistas dessas corporações relatam sobre o que é melhor para a sociedade. Afirma que

> É até possível que as consequências sejam realmente positivas para o bem comum, mas não se pode aceitar a palavra deles, por que eles não estão motivados para fazer qualquer coisa tendo em vista exclusivamente o interesse público. Sua única motivação legítima, mais uma vez, é atender às necessidades e desejos dos consumidores a fim de gerar retorno satisfatório para os investidores. A única razão das empresas e de seus executivos para defender determinado desfecho político ou judicial é reforçar ou proteger suas posições competitivas.[48]

Por esse mesmo motivo, não acredita em virtudes ou responsabilidade social das empresas. Isto serve apenas para valorizar sua marca. Estas ações são utilizadas, também, para escapar de limites que deveriam ser estabelecidos por lei. Seria uma forma de não ser elaborado um regulamento e ainda ser beneficiada por isso.

Propõe, ainda, uma série de mudanças na legislação trabalhista, para fortalecer o empregado e os sindicatos. Os custos como consumidor e investidor seriam altos, mas o cidadão sairia fortalecido.

Valorizar a saúde e a educação mostra-se fundamental em seu pensamento. O financiamento destas áreas deve ser incrementado através de tributação de grandes fortunas.

[47] REICH, Robert, Op. Cit., p. 219.

[48] Ibid., p. 218.

Um ponto polêmico de suas sugestões é que as empresas não devem ser tratadas como pessoas físicas, pois são contratos. Daí decorre uma série de mudanças, como não ser responsabilizada criminalmente, direito à representação política na democracia além de contratos ou liberdade de expressão. Ainda > Em conjunto com outras medidas – abolição do imposto de renda das empresas, extinção de prática de processar empresa por conduta criminal, abandono da premissa de que as empresas são patrióticas, cassação do direito das empresas de questionar por via judicial as leis vigentes – elas oferecem visão realista e logicamente coerente das empresas como ficção legal e das pessoas físicas como cidadãos[49].

Um ponto escuso ou criticável em sua obra é o "esquecimento" do judiciário. O autor concentra maiores esforços no legislativo, propõe alterações no executivo, mas pouco fala da justiça. Do quanto este último sofre influências, pressões dos mais variados poderes, onde a questão econômica diversas vezes tem sido preponderante sobre outras questões, como ambientais.

As propostas de Reich mostram-se coerentes com a realidade. Boa parte delas ainda parece utópica, pois não há uma conscientização da população. A noção de cidadania ainda permanece fraca e vem deslocando-se para a cidadania do consumo. Necessário seria um esclarecimento e educação para que reformas acontecessem.

As empresas têm o seu objetivo definido, que é o lucro, e fazem tudo por isso. Cumprem as regras do jogo. Tomam atitudes que, embora antiéticas ou criticáveis, estão dentro dos limites da lei. Cumpre aos cidadãos estabelecer esta fronteira.

3.3 Barnes

Em sua concepção, o capitalismo também deve ser mantido. As reformas, todavia, devem ocorrer. As suas propostas levam em consideração entrar nas regras do jogo. Se o capitalismo está na base da sociedade, deve-se utiliza-lo também para satisfazer os interesses do povo.

O autor demonstra que o Estado é uma das formas capazes de regular a atuação das corporações, com atos de taxação, proibição ou de-

[49] REICH, Robert, Op. Cit., p. 228.

marcação, por exemplo. A constante intervenção mencionada, todavia, prejudica esta atuação. Preceitua

> By contrast, ordinary citizens are cash-poor, unorganized, and ill-informed. They amble to the polls a few times per decade, if that. Of all the players in politics, they´re the easiest to fool. And though politicians do read opinion polls, these rarely concern the arcane favors corporations seek. Hence, disciplined cash-rich corporations easily prevail over ordinary citizens[50].

Outra opção seria, então, redimensionar a função das empresas, para estenderem-se além dos lucros. This, however, is like asking elephants to dance – they´re just not build to do it. Corporations are built to make money, and the truth is, as a society we want them to make money.[51] Também não acredita na responsabilidade social dos acionistas, pois estes visam somente o lucro.

Diante do cenário supercapitalista, não acredita que as corporações percam espaço no congresso ou em regulações. A forma possível para que as empresas não exerçam tanta influência diz respeito à propriedade. Por isso, seu enfoque nesta área. Afirma

> Property rights, by contrast, tend to endure, as do institutions that own them. So we should focus on creating such institutions and endowing them with permanent property rights.(…) As we´ll see, I would place it in the hands of commons trustees, empowered with property rights and bound as much as humanly possible to generations hence.[52]

Além de bens individuais e privados, herda-se também bens que já estão disponíveis: natureza, linguagens, cultura e tecnologias. Esta, todavia, costuma ser desvalorizada por não haver direitos de propriedades as protegendo.

Desta forma, defende a transformação dos bens comuns[53] em propriedade. Não uma corporação, mas uma propriedade comum, que abrangeria outros interesses além do lucro. Baseia-se em dois argumentos: há pouca proteção aos bens comuns e que a busca de lucro pelas empresas dominam os demais setores.

Estas novas propriedades, surgidas com funções especificas, dependendo de sua área, tais como defesa dos animais ou um parque ecológico, devem seguir alguns princípios básicos. São eles: colocar os interesses das futuras gerações a frente, uma pessoa uma ação, quanto mais pessoas melhor, liquidez desta empresa e deixar o suficiente enquanto bem comum.

Transfere, portanto, poder aos cidadãos. Estes, ao se apropriarem dos bens comuns, sentir-se-iam responsáveis pelos atos decorrentes contra sua propriedade. E um reforço do interesse publico. Sua proposta busca uma transformação na base do capitalismo, utilizando-se de seus pontos fracos.

O autor mostra, passo-a-passo, como proceder em cada área do bem comum. É um pensamento progressista, um tanto quanto utópico, apesar de extremamente plausível.

Conclusion

Concerning what was exposed, it was intended to clarify, even in a concise way, some forces that balance society: environment, politics, economy, work, community.

Economy, however, became disengaged from this group and initiated a process of intervention in different areas as a way to expand competition. This was possible due to the new technologies of the 1970s, which motivated globalization, deregulation and changing of modes of production.

The searching for consumers and investors became intense. And they both were granted and damaged in this game. On one hand, great advantages, products, accessories that facilitated and improved the conditions for existence. On the other hand, that searching for better prices, excessive investments and consumption brought disastrous consequences.

Environmental destruction, pressure on suppliers, debility of work, income inequality, debility of the State, and mainly the constant actuation of corporations searching for profit in the political sphere are some of the consequences.

Thus, democracy is weak. Efficient mechanisms of action to combat those influences are rare. Consumers have been given power, citizen was devaluated.

We elaborated the hipothesis that citizenship was displaced into consumption, unlike when it was linked to the worker. Depreciation of work in Brazil happened concomitantly with the advance of consumerism. Whereas the first one was losing strength, the second one was gaining, end the axle that used to conduct citizenship has changed.

Proposals show that reality can be different, and the only way to change it is knowing the situation. Reich and Barnes believe that supercapitalism today can be reformed to a capitalism in which everyone is heard concerning their wish. Harvey believes that the essence of capitalism is to maintain the thongs as they are, proposing alternatives to this.

Thus, it is necessary to rediscuss democracy. The citizen must impose their conditions, in order to live in better environments. The actuation of Law is made by movements of Marching and opposite march. A new step must be taken for this to happen.

Searching the validity fundament of Civil Law in a post-national order

Abstract: The crisis of legal thought fell upon Brazilian civil law, conceived in another historic, economic and social context. However, although consistent with the aspirations of its era, civil law proved to be inadequate to the expectations of a welfare society and this contributed to the discredit of civil law as an instrument of regulation of private relationships. In Brazil, The Private-Constitutional School of Thought defended the Constitution as the primary legal norm in private relations. However it is observed that this claim has already been partially overcome, given the emergence of a post-national legal order marked by the development of theoretical world constitutionalism.

Keywords: The Private-Constitutional School of Thought, Post-National Legal Order, World Constitutionalism.

1. Introduction

The intention of this paper is to discuss what would be the foundation of validity of civil law in a post-national legal system, characterized by the weakening of the classical idea that associates national sovereignty with the power to edit norms of mandatory compliance in a given territory.

Even though one does not defend that National States will lose the prerogatives to establish norms of mandatory compliance within their respective territories, the analysis of comparative law, especially of Community law, permits us to infer that, in certain situations, it is admitted that the use of legal standards comes not from the State in which they are applied, regardless of the ratification process. This occurs, e.g., with certain deliberations of the European Parliament.

In this context it is shown that the attempt of theorists, connected to the School of Civil-Constitutional Law, situated in the Constitution of 1988, the central foundation of civil law, has been partially overcome. Contrary to what is preached, it is not the axiological board of the Constitution that civil law draws legitimacy of its norms. The setback, the analysis of some decisions of the Supreme Court finds that this Court has resorted to international treaties and decisions of constitutional courts of other countries to support their understanding, establishing the so-called transconstitutionalism.

Thus, through the analysis of the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union in the trial of Test-Achats, we intend to demonstrate that, in a post-national legal order, or above state, the foundation of validity of civil law can be found beyond the borders of the national state.

2. À la recherche du temps perdu: a contemporary reworking of Civil Law

In concluding his now classic work History of Modern Private Law, WIEACKER said that "the great periods of legal history were always made of epochs in which the image of the right of legal experts had consciously or unconsciously been in harmony with the image of the dominant society at this time" (2004, p.717), to then add to the understanding of contemporary society is crucial in order to develop a dogmatic civilist appropriate to the changing needs of society.

The theoretical precision of WIEACKER confirmed what was already perceived by the operators of the law: the inadequacy of traditional institutes of civil law to meet the challenges posed by a highly complex society. The dissemination of the ideals of the Providence State was put into question:

> private law [conceived] as a system of spheres of freedom of the autonomous individual in the moral point of view. Here were based on the full and equal legal capacity of all citizens, the free use of property, freedom of contract, freedom of association (since Western and Central Europe the constitutional state, in connection with the patronage ceased to deprive working classes of the freedom of association). With this corresponded the great figures of the system of private law: the subjective right such as will power, the legal business activated by the autonomous will of the parties, the contract as a strict inter connection between autonomous subjects of law, the property (and its limited rights) as a right in unlimited principle and in total domination and exclusion, of whose social function does not come to light in its concept; collective people as subjects of rights according to the image of individuals (2004, p. 717).

The persistence of this model in a dogmatic society with aspirations and ideals distinct from that in which such a model was forged, engendered the crisis of civil law and the need to reformulate their ethos. The difficulty in understanding this fact and the resistances to the redesign of the civil law contributed to the discredit and disrepute of this branch, a fact that is further accentuated by overcoming the political role assigned to the Civil Code at least since the French Revolution.

2.1 The dual role of the Code

The Napoleon Code is usually appointed as the legal instrument that ushered in the ideology of civil law in the last two centuries. To have successfully established a single civil set of laws applied equally to all inhabitants in the entire French territory, Napoleon was not only able to demonstrate he achieved centralization of power but also the unification of law, which happened to be a primary source in each State. This second role, incidentally, can not be relegated in its importance: the Code, was more than just a legal document, it was also a political symbol, it represented the overcoming of the Ancien Régime and the concentration of powers in the hands of the monarch.

Overlooking, the unaffected civil codes watched the succession of constitutions that were altered according to the changes of political regime. Until finally, the constitutions were recognized for their normative power and ceased to be understood as mere declarations of intent. Instead, becoming recognized as the document justifying a state and therefore as the foundation of validity of the overall infra planning, that they must necessarily conform to. The mainstay of the state thus becomes the constitution, having codes being relegated as a background nuisance.

In Brazil, it was only with the Constitution of 1988 that this phenomenon came to be truly investigated, and theoretical advancement of constitutionalism encountered obstacles in the conservative attitude of the civilists. Truly, it wasn't few voices which rose against advances contained in the constitutional text, suggesting, for example, that equality between the spouses only bind the legislature, not having the power to alter the legal framework established since the Bevilaqua Code.

2.2 The Brazilian response to the Civil Law crises

For reasons that have yet to be properly studied, the Brazilian civilists did not take the redemocritization for the betterment of civil law, as did the publicists in their area of expertise. What was observed, however, was the rejection of innovations introduced by the 1988 Constitution, maintaining a legal system linked to an ideology that is not representative of national aspirations. As an example of the lack of efforts to reshape the ethos of Brazilian civil law, sufficient to note that, after more than twenty years of the promulgation of the current Constitution, there is no theoretical consensus about the legal content of the social function of property.

Two theoretical perspectives , however , stand out in an attempt to offer to Brazilian society a civil right to a new reality : the School of Civil and Constitutional Law and the School of Economic Analysis of Law. This, in the wake of the work in law and economics has developed in other countries, but especially in the United States where it is focused on economic efficiency, a concept that would guide the drafting and interpretation of legal rules. Although relatively new, the School of Economic Analysis of Law has consolidated rapidly in some very prestigious institutions, however, their studies are still viewed with suspicion and, at least for now, we do not see that the solutions advocated by such current theory represent the model of civil society as contemporary Brazilian society would like to see implemented . Already the School of Civil and Constitutional Law enjoys a long existence and therefore greater penetration both in academia and in the courts. And although some of his theses are subject to quite compelling criticism (SAMPAIO JR., 2009, passim) , one can not deny the importance of their main flag: a hierarchical and principled supremacy of the Constitution over the constitutional legislation.

It is true that one who just began the study of law is not surprised by the affirmation that, in the pyramid rules, constitutional rules are at the top. However civilists, molded under the aegis of the Civil Code as the center of the legal universe, had greater difficulty accepting the "demotion" of codes, which is why we recognize the role played by the School of Civil and Constitutional Law in particular.

2.3 The Supreme Court and transconstitutionalism

Possibly, the transformations in which constitutionalism has gone through constitute the most eloquent sign of the crisis that has faced legal thought in the course of the last century. In fact, from the U.S. Constitution of 1787 to the soi-disant neoconstitutionalist movement, the constitutional ideology incorporated itself into written constitutions, with elaborate rituals of development and reform; the pre-eminence of formal and material supremacy, beyond the allocation of the normative force of their standards; control of the constitutionality of laws and the normative recognition of the right dimension principled by the law (STABLES, 2011, p. 74-76).

Among the vortex theory that revolutionizes the contemporary constitutionalism, one can mention the phenomenon called transconstitutionalism (world constitutionalism, multilevel constitutionalism, interconstitutionality), which "operates between legal systems of different States" and is realized when "different jurisdictions interact and join total efforts to solve difficult and complex cases "in order to resolve conflicts involving human rights, two or more Courts of Justice, in different countries, disrupt their territorial barriers and abandon regionalism on behalf of the conversation and constitutional dialogue" BULOS , 2011, P. 92-93).

It is also BULOS who presents characteristics of transconstitutionalism:

> requires that the student leave, altogether, the idea, of modern constitutionalism, in that the concept of constitution binds exclusively to a determined state, where there is no need to resort to other constitutions of other states;

> Allows outsourcing and insourcing of information between States, organs and completely different activities, the exchange of experiences, knowledge, techniques etc..;
> Two or more legal systems of distinct intertwining States, maintaining the independence inherent to each;
>
> Promotes the existence of transition points between jurisdictions where organs of power in several states shall intercommunicate, solidifying formal and informal relationships (2011, p. 92-93).

The underlying idea of transcontitutionalism is to be able to enjoy the constitutional experience of other countries regarding universal themes such as human rights, on the reason of > although one can not discount the classic constitutional law of the State, usually linked to a constitution, constitutionalism opens into spheres beyond the state, not properly because other constitutions have arisen (non-state), but because the eminent constitutional problems, especially those relating to human rights, pervading both legal orders, which act in an intertwining fashion in finding solutions (NEVES, 2009, p. 240).

In Brazil, constitutional theorists assert that the Supreme Court would have used, if valid, the international experience in some judgements, among them can be highlighted, in the specific area of civil law, the ruling of RE 349.703/RS, dismissed in December 2008, declaring the incompatibility of civil arrest of an unfaithful trustee with the Pact of San José, Costa Rica. Interestingly, the content of the judgment, which mentioned the previous understanding of that court, assigned the opinion of Justice Celso de Mello in the trial of HC 72,131, finalized in November 1995, for whom > civil prison of an unfaithful trustee has, in the Constitution, the foundation of its authority and the direct support of its validity and effectiveness, with no way to make abstraction of the Constitution, with evident prestige of normativity that it emanates, bestows, without legal reason, precedence to an international convention "(BRAZIL, 2009, P. 690).

Just over a decade later, the same Supreme Court, based on super-legal normative status of international human rights treaties, changed its position and it became unconstitutional to civil imprisonment of the trustee (although he decided in that case that the constitutional legislation is hierarchically inferior to the treaties, that is why it doesn't matter if it was before or after the incorporation of international treaty, the fact is that the Supreme Court has eliminated one of the legal events of civil imprisonment allowed by the 1988 Constitution. Worth noting, the international treaty, at the end of the day, derogated expressed constitutional provision).

Also at the trial of ADI 3.510/DF, which occurred in May 2008, the Supreme Court, in considering constitutional article 5th. of the Biosafety Law (Federal law 11.105/2005), drew on international experience in the grounds of its decision, and the same occurred in the trial of ADPF 132/RJ which legitimized the homo-affective union and ADPF 54 decision that dealt with the termination of pregnancy in case of fetal anencephaly.

Therefore, rather than to make use of the law compared to a simple rhetorical reinforcement of a legal argument, the Supreme Court drew on, in several occasions, a true dialogue with other constitutional courts, transplanting "the knowledge of other systems for us "(lobules 2011, P. 96).

3. The Test-Achats Case and the direct effectiveness of the principle of equality within insurance contracts

The Directive 2004/113/CE, published by the Council of the European Union on December 13th 2004, aims to implement the principle of equal treatment between men and women in access to goods and services and their delivery. Although it explicitly stipulates that > any person may enjoy contractual freedom, including the freedom to choose a contractual partner for a transaction. Those who provide goods or services may have subjective reasons for the choice of the other party. Since this choice is not based on gender, this Directive does not affect the freedom of each of these choices, one realizes that the intention was to prevent discrimination based on gender, prohibiting both direct discrimination (occurs when, due to gender, a person is treated less favorably than that of which is given to someone else in a comparable situation) and indirect (where a provision, criterion or practice would put people of a particular genre at a particular disadvantage compared with people of the other sex, unless that provision, criterion or practice is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary).

In the specific case of insurance contracts, art. 5º of the Directive, it was determined that "in all new concluded contracts, after December 21, 2007, consideration of gender as a factor for calculating premiums and benefits for the purpose of insurance and other financial services fails, for the insurers, in differences in individuals' premiums and benefits. "Item 2 of the alluded article, nevertheless, made an exception to the general rule by allowing "proportionate differences in individuals' premiums and benefits where the use of gender is a determining factor in the assessment of risk based on actuarial and statistical data relevant and accurate." However, after five years the desirability of maintaining such an exception should be subject to further examination by the member countries which decided to adopt it.

The exception of item 2 of art. 5º. allowed insurers of most European Union countries to continue to use gender discrimination as a differentiating criterion of premiums and benefits. However, gender as a discriminatory criterion in insurance contracts was not accepted by the Court of Justice of the European Union, although there is explicit statutory provisions in this regard.

Indeed, at the trial of the case C 236/09, in which the Association Belge des Consommateurs Test-Achats ASBL questioned the decision of the Constitutional Court of Belgium who recognized the legality of the Belgian law which incorporates the precepts of Directive 2004/113/EC, the Court of Justice of the European Union considered that the extension for an indefinite period of exception to the rule in art. 5º. of Directive 2004/113/EU violated the equal treatment of men and women advocated by Directive 2004/113/EU, and declared the invalidity of Article 5, n. 2, the mentioned Directive, prohibiting insurers from December 21, 2012, to continue adopting the gender factor for purposes of differentiating the value of premiums and benefits in insurance contracts.

For purposes of this work, it is appropriate to have in view two peculiarities: firstly, because it highlights how, under European law, one can already speak of suprastate standards, issued by the Council of the European Union, and second, because it demonstrates that the Court of Justice of the European Union has the power to effectively invalidate state standards contrary to Directives. Even if one argues that the Directives have to be incorporated into the political structures, the test-achats case demonstrates that the state legislating power, understood as a manifestation of sovereignty itself, longer in practice unacceptable supra-state limitations from the perspective of traditional constitutionalism.

Therefore, it is demonstrated, once again, that the foundation of validity of civil law increasingly departs from the state sphere, finding supra-national elements in its ultima ratio. Perhaps this is not the harbinger of a new ius commune ...

4. Conclusion

On June 28, 2012, the Supreme Court of the United States of America judged the constitutionality of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, which imposed an individual duty to have health insurance to ensure minimum coverage (minimum essential health insurance coverage), subjecting those where you do not have to pay a penalty to the Internal Revenue Service. An Extensive Court decision deeply analyzed the permanent tension between individual freedom and the limits of state power, exposing the phenomenon that is, in countries belonging to the Roman-Germanic legal tradition, known as the public law - private law dichotomy crisis.

The causes and effects of this crisis is one of the main objects of study of contemporary privatists. After all, after losing the central role within the legal framework of countries of Roman-Germanic tradition, it was necessary to rethink the substantation of the civil law itself, the role it played in Brazil was known as the Private-Constitutional School of Thought.

Although one may disagree with some theoretical positions taken by the Private-Constitutional School of Thought, one can not withdraw the merit of trying to adapt to the constitutionalized civil law legal system, proceeding to the retelling of their traditional institutions in the light of the constitutional framework. However, it is now necessary to take a step further in the study of civil law, as noted by the study of comparative law, in particular the study of European private law and the recent decision of the European Union Court of Justice regarding the efficacy of the fundamental right to equality in insurance contracts.

It is observed to be possible to speak of a post-national legal order, which finds its sources not only within state standards, but also in the policies of the European Union, international treaties and decisions of other constitutional courts, characterizing the phenomenon called transconstitutionalism. Even in Brazil where this trend is already seen, the Supreme Federal Court based its understanding of similar observations made by other constitutional courts.

Thus, in the present study, we sought to demonstrate that the Brazilian civil law is ready, beyond what the Private-Constitutional School of Thought intended, to seek its foundation of validity in the context of a post-national legal order.

The naturalization of the legal entity in the Brazilian legal system

Sergio Marcos Carvalho de Ávila Negri[1]

Abstract: This paper, based on the relationship between language and the objects it claims to name, seeks to analyze the process called naturalization of the legal entity, characterized by the constant parallelism between a "natural" person and a legal entity, particularly in the light of the Brazilian legal system.

Keywords: Legal entity, Naturalization, Legal capacity.

1.Introduction

In the verbalized legal world, it is very common to use abstract categories to simplify concrete situations. The resource of abstraction is useful in that it allows the human being to intellectually appropriate the phenomena that surround him, thereby facilitating communication. It just so happens that often these abstract categories become detached from the phenomena depicted, gaining a life of their own, as if they represented an autonomous reality.

The legal entity[2], for example, has been portrayed as an essential element in the description of reality, as if it were an imposition of nature itself. Consequently, we are given the impression that the term legal entity corresponds to a logical and unquestionable piece of evidence, that is, something "given" and not constructed. However, the legal entity is only "false system data" and can not be seen as a universal, timeless category.[3]

2. The Augustinian picture of the legal entity

In 1952, Hart gave a lecture entitled Definition and Theory in Jurisprudence, in which he denounced a common practice in the legal world: the attempt to establish precise definitions of concepts, as if every legal term described an object from reality.[4] For the author, the incessant search for the definition of terms such as "State", "property" and "right", ended up leading to the assumption that every legal concept should necessarily have a corresponding factual one.

Criticism of the modus operandi of lawyers in their way of dealing with concepts was actually a reflection of a broader process. The awakening of a new linguistic awareness was shaking the foundations of traditional philosophy, by giving language a new role in the process of integration of the human being in the world.

Wittgenstein, in Philosophical Investigations, an incomplete work published in 1953, claimed it was impossible to build a perfect language, able to accurately describe the reality of things. For this purpose, he used as a starting point what he himself defined as "the Augustinian picture of language", characterized by the understanding that language would be responsible for the function of describing and especially for the naming of objects and facts in the world.[5]

[3] See Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward (1819). Chief Justice Marshall's opinion emphasized that: "A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible and existing only in contemplation of law. Being the mere creature of law, it possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly or as incidental to its very existence." HALL, Kermit L.The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005, p. 248.

[4] "There is nothing which simply 'corresponds' to these words and when try to define them we find that the expressions we tender in our definition specifying kinds of person, things, qualities, events, and processes, material or psychological, are never precisely the equivalent of these legal word though often connected with them in some way". HART, Herbert L. A. Definition and Theory in Jurisprudence. The Law Quarterly Review. v. 70, 1954, p.38.

[5] "These words, it seems to me, give us a particular picture of the essence of human language. It is this: the individual words in language name objects—sentences are combinations of such names.——In this picture of language we find the roots of the following idea: Every word has a meaning. This meaning is correlated with the word. It is the

The practice of finding "rigid eternal substances behind the concepts" can be compared to the way in which human beings have their first contact with language. From an early age, we learn to associate names to things, so that when the child hears the word, the image of the represented object arises in their mind. To dispel this mist associated with the search for false essences, philosophy was to investigate how language works, determining the meaning of words according to their use in concrete situations in life.[6]

With proper care, it is possible to extend this reasoning to the analysis of the concept of legal entity. Just as there is the illusion that every name corresponds to an object, as reported by Wittgenstein, the analysis of the legal entity has always been characterized by the attempt to determine what the ontological substrate of the institute was.

Questions like "what is a legal entity?", "What is its essence or nature?" are often formulated in such a way as to detract from their response. Underlying the issues of nature, of essence, is molded, even if in a veiled way, the idea that the term legal entity would have the function of describing a real being, like a human being.

In the wide variety of discursive practices that use the term in question, we can see the presence of this type of discourse, marked by the naturalization of the legal entity. In the same way that the first contact with language obscures the meaning of words, the way we learn the term legal entity contributes to create the illusion that there must be some entity portrayed by that name.

object for which the word stands. Augustine does not speak of there being any difference between kinds of word. If you describe the learning of language in this way you are, I believe, thinking primarily of nouns like "table", "chair", "bread", and of people's names, and only secondarily of the names of certain actions and properties; and of the remaining kinds of word as something that will take care of itself." WITTGENSTEIN, Ludwig. Philosophical Investigations. Translated by G. E. M. ANSCOMBE. Oxford: Basil Blackwell Ltd, 1958, p.2.

[6] "Augustine, we might say, does describe a system of communication; only not everything that we call language is this system. And one has to say this in many cases where the question arises 'Is this an appropriate description or not?' The answer is: 'Yes, it is appropriate, but only for this narrowly circumscribed region, not for the whole of what you were claiming to describe.' It is as if someone were to say: 'A game consists in moving objects about on a surface according to certain rules [...]'—and we replied: You seem to be thinking of board games, but there are others. You can make your definition correct by expressly restricting it to those games." WITTGENSTEIN, Ludwig. Op. cit., p.03.

3. The mantra of legal personality

One of the essential topics of the introductory prescription of private law has to do with the attribution of a legal personality to certain human groups, such as associations and societies, which thus come to bear their own legal subjectivity, regardless of that which is acknowledged to its members, considered separately.[7] From a linear narrative, it is commonly claimed that personification promotes the emergence of an autonomous center of imputation, which in turn reinforces the binary code, a characteristic of legal discourse, between subjects, protagonists of legal situations; and objects, which bring together the complexity of those rights and duties.

To confirm the existence of the new unit of imputation of legal relations, the discourse concentrates on listing the consequences that result from this personification. The new subject starts to have its own nationality and residence, which should not be confused with the nationality and residence of its members. In turn, the assignment of a name facilitates the identification of the legal entity in relationships that it will participate in, guaranteeing it independent operation, including when it is in litigation.

With the assignment of personality, there is also the possibility of recognizing a supposed will of the legal entity, expressed through its organs. The assets of the company, as an autonomous subject, cannot be confused with that of its partners. From this separation of assets comes autonomy as to obligations. When a company incurs any debt, it does so in its name, so that its members, individually considered, are not, in principle, responsible for the payment.[8]

[7] "The development of the legal personality of incorporated entities is reported to go back to the efforts of English judges in the seventeenth century to formulate a law of corporations for municipal corporations and church institutions, areas without commercial significance and institutions very remote from business corporation in general and modern large corporation in particular. This jurisprudencial doctrine of the separete corporate personality provides the foundation for corporate law governing multinational corporations today." VANDEKERCKHOVE, Karen. Piercing the Corporate Veil (European Company Law Series). New York: Wolter Kluwer, 2007, p. 136.

[8] "The concept of the ´separete legal personality of the corporation, as understood in the legal literature, is in our terms a convenient heuristic formula for descibing organizational forms which enjoy the benefit of each of the tree foregoing foudational rule types. Starting from the premise that the company is itself a person in the eyes of the law, it is straightforward to deduce that it should be capable of entering into contracts and

The variety of effects of the pedagogical mantra of the subjective otherness converges to a single objective: to ensure that the entity has an autonomous existence. Using the term legal entity allows the expression "X has a right" to be interpreted independently of the revelation of the asset holder. The presentation of subjective otherness, focusing on the simple transposition of rights and duties from an individual to a legal entity, reinforces the perception that there is a perfect correspondence between individual and collective legal situations.

This, however, is only a mirage. If, in the case of a natural person, the unit of interest refers to the singular figure of the human being, in the case of legal entities the center of interest is unified in terms of a particular order, which coordinates actions, activities and functions. In view of the predominant role of this structure, would it be possible to understand the predicate of the sentence "X has a right" without confronting it with this particular order? Do property, credit and debit retain the same meaning when translated to associations, companies and foundations?[9]

Most often, the process is described as if there are only advantages in recognizing this new autonomous center. It so happens that, when misinterpreted, this subjective otherness, characterized by the separation of the legal entity in relation to partners and associates, also produces harmful consequences.

4. What is the "cost" of the legal entity?

Galgano, in an article published in the 60s, with the suggestive title "Il costo della persona giuridica", sought to compare the advantages and disadvantages of the use of the term legal entity.[10] In the author's opinion, the term was used by both courts and lawyers, as if there were a being to be protected behind the label of the legal entity.

According to Galgano, this type of approach generated a serious owning its own property; capable of delegating authority to agents; and capable of suing and being sued in its own name. For expository convenience, we use the term "legal personality" to refer to organizational forms - such as the corporation - which share these three attributes." KRAAKMAN, Reiner. [et. al.]. The Anatomy of Corporate Law: a Comparative and Functional Approach. 2ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009, p. 9.

problem: treatment as a single unit, besides distorting the function of the institute, obscured the diversity of phenomena that were articulated around that term.

The recognition of an autonomous center of legal relations presupposes the existence of a unit. In the case of legal entities, there are a number of different substrates such as associations, companies and foundations, which are reduced, with the help of personification, to a conceptual unit.[11] This view of a unit not only projects outwards, but also affects the relationships that develop within the new subject. Indeed, the subjective unit, artificially wrought, also reverberates in the analysis of the assets, the will and the interests of the legal entity, coming to be seen, similarly to human beings, in a uniform manner.

More than 50 years after that article, we can see that the problem reported by Galgano is not far from our reality. In the question, for example, that involves the extension of rights of personality to legal entities, especially honor, we can see that same treatment as a single unit. It is often claimed that this extension depends on the examination of a supposed compatibility between the rights and the legal entity itself. There is not, however, in the study of this theme, any concern of the doctrine in analyzing the peculiarities present in the process of allocating rights and duties to the legal entity.[12]

In the Brazilian legal system, the discussion concerning the entitlement to fundamental rights is got round by the wording of the heading of article 5 of the Constitution because, even if these rights are not provided exclusively by that device, it apparently draws a sort of general logic to reason out fundamental rights. It just so happens that this device, unlike what happens in some legal systems, does not expressly mention the legal entity, putting in doubt whether this artificial being may be entitled to fundamental rights.

[11]"It is important to recognize that most organizations are simply legal fictions which serve as a nexus for a set of contracting relationships among individuals. This includes firms, non profit institutions such as universities, hospitals, and foundations, mutual organizations such as mutual savings banks and insurance companies and co-operatives, some private clubs, and even governmental bodies such as cities, states, and the federal government, government enterprises such as TVA, the Post Office, transit systems, and so forth." [12]See PERLINGIERI, Pietro, O direito civil na legalidade constitucional. Translated by. Maria Cristina de Cicco, Rio de Janeiro: Renovar, 2008.

Despite the silence of the constitution on the issue, doctrine, jurisprudence and even Brazilian infra-constitutional legislation converge, without much hesitation, to the assertion that legal entities are indeed entitled to fundamental rights. Article 52 of the Brazilian Civil Code extends to the legal entity, where possible, the protection of personal rights. In the same vein we have the precedent number 227 of Superior Court of Justice (STJ), which recognized the possibility of a legal person suffering moral damage based on the understanding that honor, initially seen as an attribute of the human being, involves a subjective aspect and an objective one.[13] Since objective honor is related to reputation, it would also be granted to collective legal entities.[14]

It is interesting to note that this comparison is not restricted to a particular legal system, such as the Italian one or the Brazilian one. The U.S. Constitution, through the 14th Amendment, provides that no State may deprive any person of life, liberty or property, except by due process of law. In several decisions, it has been established that the term "person" in the text refers to both the human being and the corporation, as the latter should be treated as a "legal person".[15]

This kind of argument, which takes as its starting point the legal entity, just like a single subject, reveals a fault in the process of assimilation of legal terms, more specifically of the notion of a holder of rights. The association with the natural person creates the impression that the entity represents a new "being" that could even share attributes that are exclusive to the human being.

[15] "In the 1886 case of Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railway Company, the Supreme Court held that corporation was a ' a person' within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment and could sue to protect rights of due process and equal protection. Remarkably, this conclusion was reached by the Court without any argument. The Chief Justice waved off counsel, telling them the justices were already decided on the issue. 'The court does not wish to hear argument on the question "of whether the Fourteenth Amendment covers corporations, he said 'We are all of opinion that it does'. In addition to granting corporations access to the federal courts this decision opened a vast body of constitutional rights to the corporations." FRIEDMAN, Barry. The Will of The People: How Public Opinion Has Influenced the Supreme Court and Shaped the Meaning of the Constitution. New York: FARRAR, STRAUS AND GIROUX, 2009, p.163. See also Citizens United vs. FEC, ruled in 2010 by the US Supreme Court.

Currently, efforts are being made in an attempt to prevent legal discourse - often based on evaluative elements - from leading to arbitrary postures. In this context, there is no more room for the simple formal correction of arguments; it also requires justification of the assumptions that were used to arrive at a certain conclusion.

The extraction of norms from concepts, a common practice in the legal universe, can, however, compromise this search for rationality in the decision-making process. When we assign a semantic value to the legal entity, as if the term represents a being, it is believed that the concept has the power to act as a reference for any type of reasoning.

We should not think, however, that the problem only exists in the discourse concerning the entitlement to fundamental rights of the legal entity. It is important to remember that naturalization may undermine the very protection of the human being within companies and associations. In 2003, Law no. 10,825 amended Article 44 of the Brazilian Civil Code, adding to the list of so-called legal entities of private law, two more items that dealt with religious organizations and political parties. With the change of the traditional classification of the subject, there is, even if implicitly, a certain mistake in assuming that the label of a legal entity of private law can ensure greater autonomy in the exercise of freedom of association and freedom of belief. The shift of freedom of association of the group to the new subject, given subjective otherness, can obscure the instrumental role of associations to guarantee the free development of the personality of their members.

The naturalization of the legal entity also has consequences for the analysis of business phenomena. By the creation of the individual limited liability company (EIRELI) by Law No. 12441/2011, the legislator sought to fill an important gap in our legal system: the limitation of liability of the individual entrepreneur. It turns out that the choice of creating a new legal entity ends up indirectly reinforcing the false understanding that both separation of assets and limitation of liability necessarily depend on the intermediation of a new abstract subject.[16]

Also in business companies, the discipline of the equity, the social capital, the financing and the allocation of responsibility is greatly influenced by this idea of creating a new subject, not to be confused with its members.[17] This otherness - in most cases naturalized - exacerbates the problem even more insofar as it implements, for supra-individual situations, a whole set of instruments modeled on the individual, considered in isolation.

The construction of the Brazilian legal system around the centrality given to the abstract subject produces a problem in the legal configuration of the company: the idea that the legal entity is the main protagonist in the exercise of business activity.[18]

To avoid this distorted view, we must recognize the conceptual autonomy of the activity itself in a context in which the action is placed on a level of prominence, when it is disengaged from any subjective reference. As an alternative to the action-subject, which has always guided the legal system, it is important to think of a new model, in which the subject is interpreted according to the activity itself.

5. Conclusion

According to Francesco Ferrara, the notion of legal entity acts as a lens placed against the eye of the interpreter. When properly adjusted, it allows a perfect representation of the phenomena, but out of focus, it only helps to deform it.[19]

The search for false essences ends up creating real ontological pitfalls in legal discourse. To avoid these distortions, it is important to realize that the term legal entity does not exactly have a descriptive function. In fact, the legal entity simplifies a number of facts and behaviors, which, with personification, come to be treated in a specific and unitary way. Being an auxiliary concept of the Science of Law, the institute should be seen as a mental shortcut, which facilitates the formation of legal statements, to the extent that the interpreter refers to other elements of the legal system itself.

Equality and justice in children's rights

Patrícia Pereira Cava[1]
Ernani Santos Schmidt[2]

> [...] childhood is the being's well. […] The well is an archetype, one of the darkest images of the human soul. […] A well has marked my first childhood. I would never get close to it, unless I was holding hands with one of my grandparents. Who, after all, was afraid: the grandparent or the child? (Bachelard, 2001, p.109, highlighted by us).

Introduction

Who is this child as subject we speak of? Is it someone we must (as the adult world, being responsible relatives and teachers) introduce the world lived and thought out by adults in their particular and collective life stories? Or is this subject-child someone we should embrace in our world while we learn about their doubts and discoveries? Should we hold their hands or let them walk by themselves? Or are they actually someone we should hold and release hands with, introduce and embrace, protect and let be, every time each one of those possibilities presents itself as the precise form of what we need the most: a hand to lend?

What we aim is to contribute to the assertion of criteria for understanding the boundaries and possibilities of what is due to children, both as attitude and abstention; especially the child's ownership concerning rights that are enforceable against adults, either his parents/guardians or educators. It is in the interface between education and law that we hope to establish our debate, aiming to organize a sensitive theoretical framework concerning what is just/unjust in adult's authority.

So that children's rights aren't just what Arroyo (2004) designates as easy abstractions, a revision of the ways in which the recognition of one as subject of rights is paramount, specifically during a life period: childhood. We will keep in mind the concerns raised by the author about the need of creating proper ways to deal with the radical transformations our time has imposed on "childhood images", changes that, by consequence, bring the need of self-criticism about the perception we have of our own adult world as school and family.

We postulate that the dialectic that makes the father and son, teacher and student identities real, as well as all the power relations they hold, has its definitions blurred in the modern constitutional democracies by the inefficacy presented in the traditional notions that political and juridical culture (especially in Brazil) have made about autonomy as extension and boundaries on faculties and obligations. This way, thinking on the idea of subject in children requires new comprehension about their rights, concerning the ethical implication of thinking how much school and family are providing just or unjust experiences while developing practices aimed at the diverse ways to face the coexistence issues.

Children's subject statute, childhood sentiment and children's rights

About the subject's statute on children, Meirieu (2002) in his book A pedagogia entre o dizer e o fazer (Pedagogy between saying and doing), discussing Hannah Arendt's ideas, proposes that we think of three registers: political, psychological and pedagogic.

The political register relates to an educational authority to "inaugurate the world", "[…] the fact that, before reaching adult age, the child undergoes the restrictions of "the world" and is able to develop while protected from men's violence warrants stability, continuity, it allows the social bond amongst generations" (Meirieu, 2002, p.127, our translation).

The psychological register is about the aid in the continual development of a person and the possibility of expression "of those who, although not yet recognized as adults, have important things to say to adults" (Meirieu, 2002, p.128, our translation). The possibility of expression is paramount to the development of autonomous and responsible thinking.

In the pedagogical register emerges the contradiction between education as "formation" of the subject and education as "recognition" of the subject. In children or teenagers we have a constituted subject that is capable of interacting with us as an equal, a freedom we can only evoke, and, at the same time, a subject still in formation, one to whom we must propose knowledge and method, so they can fully take on responsibility.

When talking about subject, one must not leave any of these registers, political, psychological and pedagogic, untouched, in a manner so we do not narrow the possibilities of reflection about who is this subject we speak of. Therefore, we must understand how much the existence of each one of these registers makes it possible to analyze the adult-child relation under the ownership of rights spectrum and its integration to large notions of equality and justice.

Childhood is realization in history. According to Philippe Ariès (1981), until the end of the 19th century, children appeared mixed up with adults in western civilization's everyday life. It is only by the end of that century that we notice a tendency to separate the adult's world from the children's world. When he talks about childhood sentiment, Ariès points to the conscience of children's particularities through history and how they mark this construction. The three feelings are: the possibility of spoiling them; the concern with disciplining them and preserving costumes; the concern with children's hygiene and health. The consciousness of children's particularity is built under the mark of disciplining body and mind, the "enclosure" and profiling by age, class and genre in school. Distinctions that over time outline being a child, their body, the way they live and occupy time and space. Knowledge about being a child that was constituted in history ended up giving sense to what being a child is.

Just as the childhood sentiment is historical, so are children's rights. Inside a social history of people's rights (touchstone of modernity) there is a considerable variation in juridical positivity of those values brought by the transformations of what "being a child" means. And in the diverse ways of childhood realization, the juridical form of children's rights has its origins in the variation started by rationalists and empiricists in the idea of person and in the appearing of a subject's philosophy that has constituted the needed implication of the questions concerning knowledge and justice.

In civil law systems, the modern day enthusiasm with rational authority creates a large normative system sit upon principles and codifications that have, arguably, its efficacy in hypothesis of ever increasing particularity incidence. It is possible to see in the French Revolution, more precisely in the "Declaration of Rights of Man and of the Citizen", an embracing modern origin of establishing universal rights which had to be respected[3]. In 1924, after World War I, the first "Declaration of Rights of the Children" was written by the League of Nations. It stated "the right of the under-aged to grow up, protected from any kind of exploitation" (Rocha, 2002, p.45, , our translation). In 1948 the U.N., created after World War II, approved de "Universal Declaration of Human Rights", stating once again the dignity and the rights of all human beings. Alongside UN, UNICEF (The United Nations Children's Fund) was created to aid children that were victimized by war and later on it expanded its activities worldwide. In 1989, Brazil took part in the "Convention on the Rights of Children", taking on, alongside other countries, "the commitment to aid parents or guardians of citizens under 18 years of age" (Rocha, 2002, p.46, our translation). As a result of this participation, in 1990 the "Child and Adolescent Statute" [4] was promulgated.

This juridical form of concern with the under-aged, proceeding to the expansion of the generation of rights, forwards the theoretical assertion of a branch of law as legal knowledge on childhood and political affirmation of a particular jurisdiction and public administration required for compliance with the rights then known. In this context numerous imperatives to family and school regarding the treatment of children become clear. The conversion of "paternal power" to "family power", for instance, imposes an equality logic inside the family that demands an accurate reflection about the power of sentiment and of authority in relationships between parents and children; the conversion of authoritarian state forms of political power to democratic ones turns the school into a quintessential space of all fertility pluralism that is typical of contemporary democracies.

Particularly in Brazil, the traditional legal doctrine is founded on the dogmatic assumption that the location of the subject takes place from descriptive systems. That is, in the form of normative statements that assign to each law expression one specific kind of person as its holder. This tradition fixates law reality in the legal entity abstraction, determining that rights exist as people's relationships with each other and with institutions, or as power relations of people over things. Thus, the general rule affirms the capacity to act in civil life to guide the legitimacy of the individual will to the exercise of powers and obligations. With this, liberal individualist culture assumes to ease the theoretical tension in the subjectivity theme from law's point of view. The whole supposedly legal treatment of the subject becomes a strictly formal act of searching in the statutes general statements about who is entitled to what.

Children appear in different State and international legal statutes, in which there's no hermeneutic difficulty to recognize that all children have right to what is good and necessary. What happens is that the description has limited fecundity: the error of a juridical comprehension of the subject limited to enumerating the obligations and responsibilities of individuals and institutions towards children. At best we have reached the idea of ineffectiveness, always important to know the degree of social commitment to rights. But in the idea of inefficacy as simple material denial of the listed rights the problem of just isn't contemplated as a providing and present family and a qualified school (from the point of view of official evaluating methods and systems) can still be tyrannical to children when they choose to educate them limiting the knowledge processes to mechanical forms and the dimension of motives to the demands of the market.

Ricoeur (1995) warns us that when we ask about the juridical form of the subject we are not far from the moral question about who is worthy of affection and respect, as well as the anthropological question about why the "self" is worthy of affection and respect. In this articulation of senses it is possible to notice that the subject realizes himself from constitution levels as a capable subject and that these levels are not due to classification, but demand identification. Capacity is a phenomenon that only occurs to those having a strong personal and collective identity bond, and that is why it happens side by side with responsibility, as some kind of a will to live collectively, as a true will. This way, affection and respect trigger the legal and ethical dimension of the individual as it is established that we can respect and like each other as authors of our own actions, and that we can evaluate those actions from the point of view of what is good and binding.

In this sense, the fecundity of the proposition is that the subject is only capable while upgrading skills in interpersonal and institutional relations, in which the associative vocations forge learning of various forms of alterity – I, you, we – close (face to face relations) and especially, a "we-every-body" (relations with unknown third parties). Fitness for freedom is updated amidst a nature that guides acquiring knowledge, in a somewhat precise sense, on conduct obligations to strangers, identical to those one has with his loved ones. It is the perception that a capable subject is a necessarily responsible one that is subject to allocation. An embracing law will then define a field in which someone (capable subject) will answer for and to when facing an act, and the subject will be either debtor of reparation (civil law) or deserving of punishment (criminal law). What lies underneath this logic is precisely the fact that only the subject is liable of imputation, while things are not. Thus, all attitudes (causalities) are, from the point of view of the imputation idea, acts of freedom. It is from the inherent obligation not to cause damage as an attitude that the justification to force someone to repair or suffer punishment comes.

Now, Ricoeur emphasizes, to upgrade skills for sociability becomes a prerequisite for a real subject of rights, as he is only possible with real power in the infinite relation orders with others in which he proposes himself as a subject of recognition. So it is not enough to list supposed rights this subject owns without measuring the conditions in which this ownership happens.

Notion of justice: equality as movement and dialogue as a condition

Walzer (1997) draws from Aristotle the idea that education is performed as an expression of the deepest collective desire: to survive despite time. But the problem is that there is no consensus on what it is, is becoming or should be. There is no consensus regarding the "best character", nor the "definitive method", much less accuracy regarding the strict duty of the family or school. And for that reason it is necessary to try and understand it under the critical scrutiny of the idea of administering justice. And out of respect for family and school and how much of selflessness we know there is in such institutions, it is known that one should not speak as if you could not speak aloud. Making justice is an ethical implication due by all those who are subjects in relation with childhood, regarding its various interests of professional or affective nature.

In the specific aspect of children, from the rights that require us to abstain to the rights that demand fulfillment, the requirement of the conditions for update of aptitudes becomes evident, since children speak to us about the usurpation of their rights in different ways (Cava, 2007), as already stated in documents and conventions. We hear of the extinction of living spaces and the experience of games and toys; we hear of the distinctions that are still given to children according to social classes: distinctions of school, feeding, housing, leisure spaces, access to culture, among others. If the right to freedom includes the right to have an opinion, expression, to play, to practice sports and have fun, how can we speak of freedom with the restrictions imposed by adults by imposing their particular ways of life? If they do not find what they need, which ideas of being an adult are they building? A helpless, lying adult, removed from its place of authority? How can they build bonds of trust with adult subjects like this? How can they learn without building bonds of trust? This recurring scenario requires us to be able to rescue the virtuous character of the revolt expressed by children. Let us remember with Ricoeur (1995, p.10, our translation) that "our first entry in the dimension of law was screaming: This is unfair!"

Justice, according to Walzer (1997), is related to social goods and happens in its distribution for internal reasons. With a theory of social goods the author reflects on the explanation and limitation of distributive possibilities pluralism. This theory can be summarized in six propositions: 1) any asset considered by distributive justice is a social good – holder of a shared meaning that emerges in the social process that builds its own conception and creation; 2) individuals assume concrete identities by means of creation and conception of social goods and without their histories of transactions among themselves and with the material and moral world, they would not be recognized as humans; 3) there is not a single asset or valid ensemble for all of the material and moral worlds; 4) from the social signification of the asset results the legal parameter of its distribution; 5) social significances have a historical character of their own and, therefore, are variable at best, there are social assets that have a normative structure that reiterates itself in many times and spaces; 6) assets with different social significances must possess relatively autonomous distributive spheres, holders of criteria and dispositions of their own.

In general, the theoretical approaches to distributive justice have taken as reference a process in which people distribute social assets to others. Walzer notes that under this assumption, the distribution assumes significance of donation or exchange centered on individuals placed at the ends of the relationship, just as recipients or distributors. The definition for what is acceptable or what is entitled is sought in the flaunting of distributive principles alleged as controllers of the movement of assets. It happens that this type of formulation is not suitable to the complexity of the world of facts, since it invokes the compulsory assimilation of authority judgments about human nature and morality, which could never be general facts.

The philosopher reminds us that the original meaning of equality is negative: equalitarianism emerges as an abolitionist policy. The guidance is not to eliminate all distinctions, but part of them and in a particular time and place. Your target is always specific – aristocratic privilege, capitalist usury, bureaucratic power, sexual or racial supremacy. In any case, the desire is always the same: to prevent domination. Equality policies are not generated by differentiation, but by the actions taken by the privileged with their peers. It is worth saying that the struggle for equality does not originate in the mere existence of rich and poor, aristocrats and simple men, bureaucrats and ordinary citizens. It comes from the fact that the rich impose poverty, aristocrats impose hierarchy and bureaucrats impose the distance – in short, the struggle for equality comes from what people or groups can do to people or groups without power. Egalitarianism is, therefore, the political movement for a free of domination society. The word equality chains the magnificent hope (WALZER, 1997) to overcome the submission and the command and not a requirement that all have the same things in the same amount; it does not assume the extinction of differences, but preventing the control of means of domination, so that all are equal for all relevant issues in moral and political terms.

The means of domination vary in time and space. Kinship, education, divine grace, state power, capital, and other social assets, in various times and places, have fulfilled the role of favoring that men dominate each other. Walzer (1997, p. 13, our translation) notes that, "even though the experience is personal, nothing in people themselves determines their character", and so he insists that equality does not imply repressing men and women but controlling social assets. His purpose is the description of a society in which no social asset serves or can serve as a means of domination.

Tyranny always has a specific character, drawn on the breach of any border, in the violation of any particular social significance. Walzer uses two assumptions operated by Marx and Pascal and summarizes the following: social assets have a social meaning and in its interpretation we walk towards distributive justice, seeking internal principles for their various spheres of distribution, it is the predominance over assets that materialize dominance of individuals and groups, through means of tyrannical invasion of an autonomous sphere. It is not unfair that inequalities within the spheres based on merit, need and free exchange to the extent that the social good that underlies not allow conversion to another sphere – in this case, there is no domination. The critique finds its fundamental principle: any individual or group that has X may require that Y will be due only for having X and not for any intrinsic connection with Y. This principle urges us to go through the meanings of social assets and study the distributive spheres from within, therefore, it is an open principle.

In affirming the principles of a liberal theory of dialogical legitimacy (rationality, consistency and neutrality), Ackerman (1993) proposes that it is only possible to capture the source of rights under the assumption that these emerge in a community dialogue that takes place in facing scarcity and its normative consequences, because it is at the core of efforts to give reasons for the claims of power that the rights are given reality and meaning. This way, the most essential right is the one to be a free and equal member of a dialogic community. And the basic way in which it can occur is the participation in the public process of deliberation about the essential themes of forms of sociability. It means that all citizens have the right to join the process of political deliberation and take part on the definition of substantive content of other rights. From these postulates, the author strives to enable dialogue as a resource against domination and observes that social justice requires political and intellectual effort under which liberalism is to be conceived beyond its tradition.

There is, however, something peculiar in that endeavor: while effecting a defense of liberalism, it also establishes a kind of internal critique, one of reflection on the western liberal experience that sees a gap between theory and practice, similar to the one between Stalinism and communist principles[5]. If political liberalism is to be a public culture that enables the community in diversity because it does not represent a single substantive conception about good and decent life and promotes anti-sectarianism that allows different strategies of justification, we must also recognize that the postures and notions that believe the classic man of liberalism was the limit of human creation are not satisfactory, nor are the ones those that imply authoritarianism under the guise of going beyond it.

[5] "It would be naive to insist that a political ideal must have a trouble-free implementation, only a silent acceptance of the status quo can ensure the absence of any tension between ideals and reality". (Ackerman, 1993, p. 54, our translation).

Ackerman states the principle of neutrality[6] as the impediment in dialogue to the claims of privileged moral authority. In summary, he states that no demand can be justified in holding that its content or tenderer are inherently superior to others. Every induction in the behavior of others is exposed to critical examination in a just society. And for this, all reasons (material and/or symbolical) that place desiring subjects into conflict will have a more or less just solution, in accordance to their possibilities of legitimation in a consistently rational and neutral dialogue, that is, one in which the popular belief that "no one is better than no one" prevails. This represents the full recognition, the reciprocity in one's condition as subject. Thus, postulating the limitation to those who want an unfair share of the world's benefits, the author emphasizes that no form of power is exempt from proving their legitimacy and he claims critical aptitude in the liberal dialogue in face of major contemporary challenges.[7]

Now, the same way that the sovereignty of the despot or the exploitation of labor by capital does not have legitimacy in a natural law, because they do not withstand a dialogue demanding reasons settled in the goal of reducing the influence of the "hazards of nature in the lives of each person"[8], authorities of family and school are also submitted to the test the dialogue. Families should not act as seeing "weeds preventing its private garden" (Ackerman, 1999, p.187, our translation) when children show themselves resilient to plans formulated by this same family; and schools cannot contain cultural freedom, which is usually done when the teacher summarizes the access to the citizenship experience to [6] Not to be confused with the idea of scientific neutrality from traditional positivist theories.

[7] "The blindness of the supporters of laissez-faire that do not acknowledge that the owner of private property must legitimize his power no less than the government bureaucrat; the blindness of the communist who avoids this first error to immediately protect the leaders of the party power from the tests of dialogue ". (Ackerman, 1993, p. 36, our translation)

the management of prevailing bureaucratic forms. Discussing the fair treatment of children is not so different from the problem of justice in general. It is necessary, then, to understand the limits of the power of adults over children, and knowing that to love sincerely a child requires us to love all children in a very special political and legal way.

In a well-delimited plan, like the authority of adults over the test of neutral dialogue (once again: only where nobody is better than anybody else) the ongoing problem is to find the right means of settling accounts with the seriousness required on the issue of legitimacy as it is peculiarly displayed by children. Initial education – responsibility of the various expressions of family and school – composes a scenario of development of cognitive, language and behavior skills, in which the power of adult authority is under the permanent test of just being real because it is founded on fear, or may be legitimate as it is founded on respect and affection.

Traditionally, political philosophy addressed the issue of children in view of the peculiarity of an alleged incomplete subject to the demands of reason. Ackerman is vehement in stating that this incompleteness, if true, makes children even more due to more complete cultural freedom such as unrestricted access to various modes of conduct demonstrations of value pluralism etc.

The authority of family power as an objective implication of boundaries to the will, which still may imply in coercion, requires something more than the assumption that adults have intrinsic superiority, that age determines reason or even that parents and teachers know what is best. While it is not possible to assume that a single empirical manifestation is "the right one" regarding the adult/child relationship in school and family, in neutral egalitarian dialogue it is possible to arrange elements that make the truth and taking a position on this or that situation simpler. Well, committing to the child, respecting them as a subject, involves thinking about the encounter with others, in the various forms of listening to others, to see them, in the different ways to live with this other who challenges us, instigates us, who resists our intentions. An ethical commitment towards our own process of humanization. A project that passes through the continuity of what constitutes us as humans in the legitimate relationship with each other and also involves the breaking of real ties that condition us. Breaking these ties without losing, however, our references, requires that we become aware of our own "inconclusiveness", pointing toward the eternal search process in which learning is a face.

When it comes to equal treatment towards children, we do not deny that there is a reasonable level of power in adults' determinations, but we hope to find out which aspects are inexorably coercive, because beyond them we must recognize the child as an equal. The contemporary family power consists of expressing restrictions intended to preserve the child of danger and violence. We seek the determination of an adult presence as an obligatory imposition that teaches children to enjoy the experience of life and its many possibilities and does not give reasons for the loss of freedom. Restrictions to children's momentum and inclinations that integrate with several orders in which are developed the conditions for recognition of themselves in their rights throughout their lives. This is how the traditional legal systems of "parental rights" have been replaced by a right of families in which, despite of form, the power in some aspect is not in a supposed strength/nature, but definitely in convention. And the convention assumes pedagogical tone because authority is required when the child insistence of satisfaction needs to be confronted by another subject that does not exist just for her – the family and the school must teach the limits to self-aggrandizement as a condition for cultural coherence (Ackerman, 1999), without which no one learns to be free and freedom cannot occur.

It so happens that there is no single standard of what should be done and what we have seen repeatedly are authoritarian practices which violate the right to recognition as a subject of rights in the child. Particularly in what Ackerman (1993) calls "horticultural school", which understands the pedagogical action as shifting management between pruning and permissions, resulting always in control and repression of the peculiar way that children subvert the order – with tenderness or anger. Education in the broadest sense, made possible by a theory of justice, cannot be considered through its results as a vegetable garden, but on how much it takes seriously the issue of legitimacy posed by children in the resistance movement to the initial containment of impulses and desires up to the capacity to dialogue on responsible decisions in social life.

Final considerations

The conditions under which children join adults in relationships are ones of protest from the beginning. It is with great indignation that everyone comes to the world! Everything else then becomes an experience of determination by adults. In our epigraph we bear the image of holding hands near the well so we could think about the delicate but necessary relations between adults and children. Is it the child who asks the adult's hand to be introduced into the world of knowledge and the world of social life, or are the adults who take the children's hand, afraid of flights they can possibly make? Who releases and who holds tight? It is like the child we – adults – once were insisted on hiding inside the pit, afraid to leave, afraid to take flight, afraid to look for another child and realize that she lives in a world different from that of our childhood time (neither better nor worse, only different).

Amid all the complexity of everyday actions, but also in the countless possibilities to dream and imagine the world, it is that children constitute themselves as subjects. On the other hand, they lose opportunities due to interdictions by family, school, society – the square which cannot be visited, the game that cannot be played, the violence in the streets and in people, the thought that wants to run wild and that the adult will not let go, the impediment to the adventure that is an everyday experience marked by randomness, and finally, the rights that are stolen from them. Children challenge us to think about the family and the school as spaces/points in time where they can apprehend the world and learn to make choices that give meaning to personal/collective identity and not as places to get stuck performing a determined script.

Children are exposed to various forms of sanction when their expressions and behaviors are not approved by adults who have power over them, especially in family and school environments. The forms of this exercise have a direct effect on how children will cope with the various conceptions of good latent in different ways to live and how they will compose expectations and plans for their own lives. And because life always presents scenarios of difficult choices, under which no decision enjoys guaranteed approval, the legitimacy of sanctions and disapprovals is to be always proven, never presumed.

It occurs that choices, particularly regarding the effects of the will and conduct of children, are always operated within limits and the problem is not exactly in the recognition of this reality, but in the extent of these limits. The perspective of the right to treatment as an equal (Walzer/Ackerman) strengthens the reflection on itself –it is possible to debate everything and all values, intentions and motives are subordinate to critical examination. We must remember, concerning the statute of the subject in children, that the political record imposes the education authority as a guarantee of development under the protection against violence, but only an egalitarian stance allows us to know how violence is, when is it happening and what we must do to prevent it. On the other hand, the psychological record admits children have important things to say, and therefore it implies the possibility of expression as a condition for learning autonomy and responsibility. It would be impossible for anyone to even learn to deal with the restriction to impulses and immediate desires and subsequent integration into forms of otherness without ever making symbolic exchanges while being taken seriously.

The liberal individualist tradition has a hard time integrating the relationship with children in the context of thinking about justice because it does not seem to want to admit that this relationship should be governed by the same principles of dialogue and equality that define fairness in any power relationship. The restrictions on children are only legitimate when they may be anchored in something beyond the factual power of adults. And this, rather than prevent it, accentuates the need for adults to exercise their authority as an effort in ethical formation and to realize the fruitful contradiction in the pedagogical record of the constitution of the capable subject – to recognize in formation and to form to recognition – for children provoke us to build a living, human and sympathetic world, in which subjects have the right to learn and teach in all feasible and possible conditions. The persistent inventiveness of the subject-child can constitute itself into an encouraging source for our numbed inventive capacity and our deadened ability to recognize the subject.

Global logic and surrender
How to think about the antipodes

Kory González-Luis, PhD[1]

Abstract: We live a new disenchanted realism, where the discourses of the equality, the justice and the emancipation does not seem to occupy a relevant place on the agenda of the policy; among other reasons, because the instrument designed to carry them out, the State, has also entered into crisis. Not only have crumbled the ideas of communism and socialism or the pride model of the Welfare state, but also the doctrines of the market economy and of the National State. It is the inherent contradiction to the system; the capitalism, even the domesticated one for the democracies and up to sanctified by they, has the great fault that limits their havoc: its link with the process of environmental deterioration in addition to the finding of the destructive effect reconstructs his hereditary trait of privilege to minorities with the derived effect, its Achilles heel: the excluded great majority urges its presence in the forts of the well-being. Poverty already no can be considered in terms of national State (declined in his sovereignty), it is an international and mobile poverty, which arouse entirely new challenges to institutions, politics and science.

> "Far from the distinguished resignation and charming utopia still being possible another way. Today there is a place for the redefinition of a true reform, radical in its analysis and ambitious in its objectives, that gives back, at the same time, a positive sense to a necessary part of utopia in politics. Nothing obliges to be happy with a managerial speech that equals to deny deep transformations, or with dreamer nostalgic speech of rejection. Yes, current tensions are the result of the fundamental dynamics of modern societies and the market economy. But these tensions must be mastered. And they can be. If it wants to regain its role, the policy must be devoted to formalize this diagnosis and perspectives that leads." (Fitoussi and Rosanvallon, The new era of inequalities)

Power and counter-power: readings from Ulrich Beck[2]

The board on the table. –

The new global logic introduces immense challenges. It is a force of regulation that imposes guidelines and global policies. The neoliberal hegemonic discourse generated applying a recipe book whose results have been disappointing. The result of these policies has been a significant increase in social exclusion, amid a series of crises affecting some of the largest countries in the periphery, in the first instance, and then ends up hurting the very stability of the core. At the same time, the accelerating pace of globalization progressively constrains the power of nation states, subordinating them to strict monetary targets that prevent them from practicing Keynesian principles in force in most of the second half of last century. Trying to face these new challenges mean, as a first condition, accept that we are definitely inserted in the global reality, and it defines a very big stagnation.

People are increasingly vulnerable in all parts of the world. The erosion of the welfare state removes safety nets. And the financial crisis is now a social crisis. Globalization erodes the tax base of countries, particularly developing countries, reducing public resources and limiting the institutions that protected the citizens.

Economic liberalization has made many promises unfulfilled. Globalization has not given more fruit than the reproduction of old asymmetries and makes new ones, reflecting the contrast between the rapid internationalization of a few markets and the absence of a global agenda complete and less distorted.

Progress has been frustrating in terms of economic growth, changes in production, increasing productivity and reducing inequalities.

Vulnerability has become a dominant social trace in much of the geography of the globe. The market dominance in the economic life, the economy opened to the world and the withdrawal of the state of the functions that had in the past left insecure broad layer of the population of middle and low income.

The neoliberal hegemonic speech of the period following the end of the Cold War, which promised the largest countries in the periphery a new era of prosperity from the policies of "opening, privatization and estabilization" was ineffective. The results were generally disappointing. The increased flow of trade resulting from the opening benefited the countries with greater capacity to add value to local production, generating recurring trade deficits. The automation and outsourcing of production processes reduced the growth of jobs and expanded the informality of its labor market. The fiscal balance has required very tight public budgets precisely at a time when the perverse social effects of privatization are in full force, further reducing the legitimacy of governments and political classes. And the privatization of public services has required tariff adjustments over the earning capacity of the population.

The world has learned that the global economy presents greater risks than anyone could imagine. The logics of globalization and fragmentation of production chains, very appropriate for the strength of contemporary capitalism, joined the global cheap labor groups without necessarily increase them revenue. The formal jobs grow less rapidly than direct investments. And if there are well-paid opportunities in flexible working, the informal sector basically accumulates more precarious work and misery. Large transnational corporations, responsible for the development of technological options, reinforce structural unemployment claiming that their mission is to compete and grow, and not necessarily create jobs.

In the last two decades of the twentieth century, the neoliberal speech swept the world economies. The theoretical vacuum and the inability of management of the national states, phenomena that followed the post-Keynesian crisis, opened space for the fiery advocates of the minimal state, the reduction of size was presented as fundamental to solving the problems of public sector strangled by debt. And it preached the labor market flexibility as an important condition for facing unemployment.

Indeed, the consolidation of capitalism in the period after the Cold War had clearly defined the contemporary hegemonic tone. The mobility of capital and the emergence of a global market created a new elite that controls the flow of financial capital and information, acting especially in clusters networks, and gradually reducing the ties to their communities of origin. As a result, while the international market was unified, state authority is weakened. With this increased fragmentation, tribalism revived and accelerated the loss of legitimate monopoly of violence by the state, which now competes with armed groups and organized crime in various parts of the world.

The consequence of this process was a series of crises that have caused a significant increase in social exclusion in much of the world and the marginalization of groups that until shortly before, they were integrated into the model of development. To further complicate this picture, the revolution in information and communication technologies, incessantly increased the consumption aspirations of much of the world's population, including the excluded. The process of globalization also progressively limited the power of states, limiting their ability to operate their main discretionary instruments. National borders became transposed all the time, being assumed as obstacles to the free play of market forces.

Nation states failed to continue to respond to calls to ensure the survival of the citizens who are being driven to a large amount of formal labor market. Occurs what may be called "democracy effect": increases the number of unemployed and poor, growing his political base. We introduce, in this way, a clear dissonance between liberalizing discourse of elites and their political practice. Meanwhile, the question of the future role of nation states remains open, and the growing disparity between social demands and the inability of the State to meet them in the conventional way, because while global capitalism thrives and nationalist ideologies move across the world, the nation-state loses significant parcels of their power.

Moreover, while the periphery countries are threatened by speculative resource flows, mature economies have to face sudden liquidity outbreaks and periods of recession. And, especially in the poorest countries, governments have no budget or effective structures to ensure the survival of new excluded.

This context of 'new poverty' and 'generations of uncertainty' has created a wave of immigration, including middle-class individuals, unprecedented in contemporary history. In continental agendas the issue of forced exodus will become, yet a little time, a serious and big problem without management formulas.

The best understanding of this painful and complex picture forces us to deepen the analysis of the mechanisms of the new global logic and identification of structural imbalances it favors.

Pieces of the meta-game. –

This new century has placed in full force a new global logic. It introduces immense challenges in the practice of world politics and has features much more complex than those that were in effect at the end of the Cold War. Using a competent metaphor by Ulrich Beck (2003), we call this new reality 'meta-game'. Consider here the term "meta" in the sense of what transcends previous models. This new system introduces many paradoxes and lots of lack of foresight, because the rules are not already relatively stable, they change in the course of the game, confusing categories, scenarios and plots. In the aftermath of globalization, the state loses more relevant position of power of collective action, its borders are despised and are no longer able to regulate the rules of political action. The nation-state and the welfare state are diluted. With the liberalization of borders arise unknown rules and roles, new contradictions and conflicts. Like a game of checkers where movements occur with unusual freedom of the chess pieces, the most powerful players jump on each other and change direction without notice, inventing new roles. It is true that the old national-international game was dominated by rules of international law that started from the assumption that states could do whatever they wanted with their citizens within their borders.

These rules tend to be questioned. The paradigm of sovereignty is placed in check, making more room for international humanitarian interventions; diplomatic immunity seems more relative. But who decides today the rules to be applied? Beck recalls that the possibility of action of the players, especially the strongest, depends heavily on how they define themselves and their new conceptions of politics. In this new context, nationalism can become extremely expensive, preventing the discovery of new strategies and power resources.

The first condition to unblock this view is to accept the fact that we are finally inserted into a new -and often vicious- global reality. It involves the assumption of a cosmopolitan outlook of citizens and public and private institutions that become part, like it or not, of the overall logic. Is this realistic attitude which maximizes the chances of action of meta-game players. Reversing the Marxist principle, this new essence that will determine the awareness of the future space of action.

Contemporary globalization is a force legislation imposing guidelines and policies. If they lead to serious crises or deadlocks to countries that assume alone the risk of behaving as they were required, the international system, whose current rich countries often systematically violated those rules, wash their hands. Through instruments like the investiment-grade, is decided who behaved according to expectations or not. The former are included in the game, the others will be excluded and suffer the harsh penalties of investment flows.

We can group the actors of the new global game in three main areas: capital, civil society and state. In more recent years, terrorist groups acquired status of new global players, playing with States the monopoly of violence. The countries are under pressure on two fronts. It demands a minimalist state, where autonomy comes down to choices restricted to the implementation of neoliberal rules. On the other hand, the markets are non regulated, services are privatized and we are witnessing a progressive deterioration of the social box, which, paradoxically, requires a strong and very efficient regulatory apparatus, including to have the power to impose harsh conditions to the civil society as the indexation of rates higher than the increase of the salaries, considered necessary measures for the adequate remuneration of capital.

Nations, especially the big countries in the periphery, are forced to take down the costs of their production factors to attract part of the production chains of transnational corporations, what is called specialization strategy, highly competitive and predatory that stimulates an overall decrease of costs of labor and a tax exemptions war.

The traditional concept of state power was linked to the control of territory, population and resources. Large corporations and capital flow - cores of the global economy - circulate freely in the global space, allowing them to maximize their power over the states, encouraging competition and throwing them against each other simply exercising the "exit" option: "I do not invest more, I go to another country". No matter more territorial control but other open access to the market and cheap labor: all factors of production transit freely -corporations derive their profit- excluding labor, eternal prisoner of its territorial boundaries.

Under these conditions, little remains of the foundation of territorial and national economic authority. Real wages decrease as a function of increasing global supply. To participate in the production chain is no longer an option , it becomes an imposed obligation by the global logic: get out of them is even worse.

It operates in the interstices of an unregulated system, in a meta-legal field, taking the digital space and exerting a growing influence on the decisions and state reforms, making them coincide with the priorities of the global market, both in the rules relating to the work and the processes of international arbitration. The ancient sovereignties are now shared between states and economic actors.

Those ones always the "exit" option as a weapon, leading many states to come closer to the interests of the neoliberal regime. With this pass TNCs take almost political decisions. Governments and public opinion are transformed into spectators and democratic legitimacy gets weak. There is no clear definition of responsibilities nor legal, political and social system that approves or legitimize them.

In regard to civil society, on the one hand their power was limited to the ongoing weakness of the union movement, incapable of becoming viable in supporting the growing number of informal employment and unemployment, especially caused by intense processes outsourcing and automation. Despite this, with huge gaps left by the state, the civil society was incorporating into public life countless autonomous civil associations and a media vision for social, economic and political activities of individual groups, increased the demanding public nature of their interests, demanding recognition, regulation and safeguards of its institutions.

In this new public space are mainly what became known as non-governmental organizations (NGOs) , but also a new association from neighborhoods , people, and cultural, environmental and recreational of local character initiatives; small professional associations and solidarity with different social groups; associations of claim or advocacy focusing gender, race, creed, sexual orientation, ethnicity ... or any other identity system for membership. These new players introduce substantial changes in the political culture, since in theory no more aspire to joining the State and defend a new model of collective action linked to territorial criteria and / or theme .

The action of NGOs and social movements, even if they advanced enough, not even know who to claim and how to influence the wider national and global alteration process, which leads to progressive asymmetries, increasing poverty and concentration of income and power.

It is necessary to highlight a very special part of the new global economic logic, who is still out of play and can play a key role in the future balance of power: the consumer, the sleeping giant, which, as may well remember Beck -it might transform his shopping in a vote (or veto) on the political role of large groups in the global scale – in so vital issues as automation, unemployment, environmental pollution and hazardous - technologies, struggling with their own weapons: money: or rather its absence (refuse to buy). But this is not a simple utopia, we have to work hard at transnational level.

While several countries are disputing these investments and playing ones against others, these actions of civil society simply take large companies to wield his fatal threat again: the "exit" option .

In the intense and changing variable geometry that promotes the new game, today's ally may be tomorrow's enemy. It's a classic case of South-South ally, type Group of Twenty (G-20), temporary agreements like India - Brazil - South Africa and the support of international NGOs in specific resistances. Still, there are blocks of interests that define basic conflicts. One of them places multinationals corporations against social movements. Large corporations, with its immense faceless power, define the direction of techno-scientific research and technological vectors, the global distribution of production and products are considered as objects of desire.

They model the means by which penetrate the discourse designed in shaping minds, consciences, desires and lifestyles (including, in the first instance, the ones which seem alternatives). With all this power, are continually exposed to criticism about the consequences that society can attribute to them, environmental degradation, risk of using biogenetic, food toxicity, growing unemployment and informality, misleading propaganda. The effectiveness and legitimacy of social movements will rest on their long-term credibility in the role of fact witnesses and revealing hidden truths or made-up for long time.

As it seems obvious, it is essential therefore to redefine the role of government and public bodies. And hence, the necessary resemantization of 'politics', the speeches, the stages and the field of political action, as tools to rebalance, tame and reverse the forces at play.

Subverting the rules. -

Depending on the impasses configured here, the transnational political gains a new importance as it can become a response to the expansion of market forces. If it is true that states have reduced resistance or adaptation options, it is also true that a federation of states can recover and develop the cooperative power of politics and conquer in the economy world new features and options to influence the directions of balance of power.

Beck reminded that autarchic capital strategies aim to minimize global independence of States. Its goals are achieved through three movements of fusion: capital with law; capital with the state, and of economic rationality with personal identity. Strategies of capital sufficiency are confused with global experience neoliberalization of law. They are incompatible with any state intervention.

The mobility of capital and the investor dictatorship establishes a brutal competition between States and gives the world economy the power to exclude. Its main strategies are the control of transnational space, control of innovation through science and technology, the incentive to specialization and outsourcing to minimize overall costs, the issue of transnational law and submission of communities to their strategic decisions.

The legitimacy of this process is induced by the "authoritarianism of efficacy", a kind of self-legitimation that rests on the rationality of the specialists and the power of the media and the powerful ones. Efficiency and power, here as absolute synonyms, tries to impose the regulatory power of the transnational private 'state' as organizational strength of the global economy.

In the global era, this is the role of the IMF, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) and the WTO, which try to consolidate the power of economic actors in the transnational space. But if private authority replaces or undermines legitimate public authority, not just because it is more effective, but because it gives these powerful actors a means of legitimizing their interests without having to assume the public consequences of their actions, without having to search complex democratic and without the obstacles imposed on the States issued constitutional always required to renew its legitimacy authority consent. The ultimate responsibility for the social consequences of these global actions ends up being of the government, which did not foresee, regulated or prevented.

To which is attending for the first time, Beck recalls, "is the emergence of a state without territory, not political, without public opinion, a state without society, located in a no-place, practicing a no-policy, in which he restricts the power of national societies fracturing them from within." Anyway, is identified on the global stage a sovereignty in formation perfectly symmetrical to state sovereignty, a new form of non public organization, of private power, that is imposed to sovereign states, a network of supranational governance of the economy, unprecedented political combination which causes its flow of legitimation in private authority. Are developed, in this way, new types of private courts and transnational arbitration bodies, governed by private law known as lex mercatoria.

However, and paradoxically, the interests of society and the public good can be re-energized by serious impasses caused by the experience of the current political crisis. The world economy and the market in general are in need of a new state policy that creates a regulatory box key to its operation, especially for dealing with anomalies and disparities created by private economic agents. This could be solved with the legitimizing force of reorganization trans-regional, democratically organized and reintroducing the space of political mediation in the overall picture, now involving citizens and consumers linked by networks.

This new conception of power will be strengthened by a curious coincidence of interests. Apparently, the global economy can not do without the state and its policies. She needs a powerful trans-state in the global political support plan, able to impose an ordering and acceptance without which the power of transnational actors is complicated. Although the strategies of global capitalist generate the adequate accumulation to keep it in expansion -what appears to be the case at present- how to treat the losers of globalization and their barricades, with the continuing crisis in the peripheral countries and fundamentalism mushrooming all over the world?

The periphery countries try to attract capital at lower costs, fewer controls and exemption areas. Specialization is materialized by a paradoxical regulation: abolition of the rules. This is not a free choice, but a kind of "choice of Sofia" –with the option of the less bad-. We walk into a kind of proletarianization of States. The competitive strategy of radical inclusion matches the interests of rich nations, which maintain their cultural values ??and open spaces to the highest rate of accumulation of their capitals. This way, it does not seem to be a light at the end of the tunnel.

Transnational collaboration strategies, including regional cooperation agreements - can enable the start of a new power play. Thanks to its mobility, companies are able to launch some states against others and weak them. This strategy, which aims to increase competition among private actors and decrease it between states, has a high price: restriction of national autonomy. The only way that states react to this system of mounting losses is to understand the game of the companies and imitate it. This can only be achieved with an interstate cooperation, which requires a progressive dissolution of the 'natural' unity between state and nation.

Transnationalization strategies requires a new policy of boundaries. The economy finally turned and went from national to global; but politics, that defines the legitimacy, it remains territorial and prisoner of its national characteristics. Political sovereignty is always understood in its national boundary, determining the way in which we see the international relations of cooperation. The cooperation between nations no longer be designed and developed as a international cooperation but transnational. You can not revitalize politics in the neighbourhood, community, tribal, national space without transcend the narrow and cheats alcoves of the neighbourhood, the district, the tribe, the nation.

In another generation strategy to find a power anti-power, the idea is to open a new transnational public space to convenes the wounded, rescues the expelled, gathers indignant wills, that, ultimately, reverses the idea and the reality of docility of the category 'people', from a re-foundation of the policy as practice of full humanity from an ethic of miscegenation, the only viable for a condition of future.

From Art to Politics
Challenging representation

Lucas de Oliveira Gelape[1]
Thiago Álvares Feital[2]

Abstract: The 20th-century witnessed two convergent movements. The first assumed the form of an aestheticization of the politics and the second of a politicization of the art. Paradoxically, still nowadays the common sense propagates a romantic vision of the artwork, in which art assumes the character of an instance in between the transcendental and the humane. Isolated from the world, the artist, herald of the sublime, would see its works advance according to the inspiration and endowment, notions so naïve as dangerous. Separated from the art by a deep and seemingly unfathomable cleavage, and bound to the materiality of the world, it is found the field of politics. Looking back to the tension which delineated the Modernism throughout its history (during the period of the 1930s to the 1980s, approximately), it is found and increasingly close relation between State and Art first, and big companies and art institutions later. The relevance of the problems offered by the Modernism derives partially from the manner that they were placed. Definitely, the 20th-century art went beyond the geometric space of the art galleries, and its inevitable result ricocheted on the politics of representation, and the political representation. Whether through the reorganization of artworks in a permanent exhibition room, or the recapture of issues related to minority rights, or the search for new ways to exercise political participation, the task of what has been conventionally called post-modern leaves a challenge for law, arts and politics. In the field of politics, from Nadia Urbinati's three perspectives on Representative Democracy, the political representation faces challenges similar to those faced by post-modernism. After the collapse of juridical and institutional perspectives, the representation, this "operative term within a political process that seeks to extend visibility […] [to] political subjects […]", in the words of Judith Butler, is questioned under the sieve of the deconstruction of the subject; the constant tension between emancipation and regulation, proposed by Boaventura de Sousa Santos, sets the tone of the contemporary law, crossed by organized movements with different ideologies, that fight (or bargain) their rights in the stage of civil society. The questions which Modernism proposed itself on the 20th-century are still without answers. Those are the political questions that the 21st-century is trying to respond. Between arts and politics, where is the emplacement of representation in the contemporary world?

Keywords: Representation. Modernism. Representative Democracy.

1. Introduction

Il faut être absolument moderne.
Arthur Rimbaud

In order to understand the history of Modernism in the 21st Century, it would be necessary to proceed to a genealogy of the concept "modern". This intent, by its grandiosity, is beyond the limits of the present article. However, we need to return at least to the 19th Century, to Baudelaire's texts. The fundamentals of the concept of modernity, to which the 20th Century is heir, are found in this author. Modernism is relevant to the present study because the problems of representation are problematized more than ever. Between arts and politics, where is the place of representation in the contemporary world? The answer to this question can be found in Modern Art.

2. Modern, modernity, modernism

If "the modern" is understood as a particular conscience of an epoch which refuses its immediate past when positioning itself with respect to the time, this concept has been recurrently used in the Western history:

> The modern rejects the dead body of a petrified tradition, exalts the absolute beauty of the present moment, but condemns itself in one stroke to the History's tyranny. It is not modern if not by a preliminary instant, by a non-existent length in the inexorable march of Time. One who is pretentiously modern today knows well that he should, tomorrow, yield to other more modern than him. Every > modernity implies its own denial.[3] (FROIDEVAUX, 1986, p. 90).

In this sense, in a way very familiar to Romanic languages speakers, the modern is the opposite of the antique or the classic. It is spoken thus in an indiscriminate way and loosely, for example, of "classical music" as opposed to "modern music" and, more generally, in "modern times" as opposed to "old times"[4]. Probably, this is even the sense of "modern" used by Habermas (1983, p. 02, our italics) in his trendy criticism of post-modernism:

> The word "modern" in its Latin form "modernus" was used for the first time in the late 5th century in order to distinguish the present, which had become officially Christian, from the Roman and pagan past. With varying content, the term "modern" again and again expresses the consciousness of an epoch that relates itself to the past of antiquity, in order to view itself as the result of a transition from the old to the new.

The definition of modern which opposes that concept to what came before is recurrently showed in narratives about art[5]. On the other hand, if one situates the modern on the time of historical narratives, historiography is proved to be vacillating. Accordingly then, it is more useful to think of the modern as a stance. This conception of modernity as an attitude is found in Baudelaire. For this writer, modernity corresponds to the intention of an ironic heroization[6] from the present. In this intention,

[3] In French in the original: "Le moderne rejette le poids mort d'une tradition pétrifiée, exalte la beauté absolue du moment présent, mais se condamne du même coup à la tyrannie de l'Histoire. On n'est moderne que pour un instant liminaire, pour une durée zéro dans la marche inexorable du Temps. Celui qui, aujourd'hui, se prétend moderne, sait bien qu'il devra, demain, céder à plus moderne que lui. Toute modernité implique sa propre négation."

[4] In this same sense, "modern art" assumes the meaning of "abstract art" or "contemporary art" on common sense.

[5] To Bourdieu (1996, p.160), these displacements constitute proper peculiarity of the artistic field: "[…] by virtue of an almost perfect unification of the artistic field and its history, each artistic act which leave its mark by introducing a new position in the field 'displaces' the entire series of previous artistic acts. By the fact that the whole series of pertinent 'coups' is present in practice in the last one, an aesthetic act is irreducible to any other act situated in another position in the series and the series itself tends towards uniqueness and irreversibility."

[6] "Something of this heroism is reflected in the dandy. It is the very absurdity of giving respect and transgression are simultaneous and materialized in a strict practice of structuration of the own being in the present (FOUCAULT, 2001, p. 1390). Modernity presents itself as an obligation to the men of its time. To Baudelaire it is not sufficient to insert itself comfortably on the present-time flux. Moreover, being merely updated, inserted in its own epoch, is characteristic of the fashion which is inferior to the truly modern art. To the poet it is necessary to go beyond: it is not enough to stay modern, it is necessary to be modern, and to be is to make itself constantly:

> One must be forever drunken: that is the sole question of importance. If you would not feel the horrible burden of Time that bruises your shoulders and bends you to the earth, you must be drunken without cease. But how? With wine, with poetry, with virtue, with what you please. But be drunken. (BAUDELAIRE, 2013).

"One must be absolutely modern", Rimbaud would say (2013, without italics in the original). In this sense, modernity is not about liberation. It is not about a continuation of emancipation proposed by the thinking heroes of Enlightenment. It is about a burden always to be fulfilled, an imperative decentralization to which the contemporary must submit itself:

> Baudelairean modernity is an exercise in which extreme attention to what is real is confronted with the practice of a liberty that simultaneously respects this reality and violates it. However, modernity for Baudelaire is not simply a form of relationship to the present; it is also a mode of relationship that has to be established with oneself. The deliberate attitude of modernity is tied to an indispensable asceticism. To be modern is not to accept oneself as one is in the flux of the passing moments; it is to take oneself as object of a complex and difficult elaboration: what Baudelaire, in the vocabulary of his day, calls dandysme." (FOUCAULT, 1984, p. 34).

In order to problematize a history of the contexts which does not transform itself into a history of developments (CHIPP, 1996, p. 08), and in turn to escape the illusory continuity, it is necessary to understand the modern as a mode of action. It is also necessary to escape the risk of succumbing to the vanguard myth. The two movements which loom in such a priority to one's appearance and dress which distinguishes him. […] Baudelaire likens him to a stoic." (TAYLOR, 2001 , p. 436).

the 20th Century, the a*estheticization of politics* and the politicization of art, are shifts consistent with the modern process of decentralization.

The intention of this article is to argue that arts and politics cannot be understood to be detached spheres as in the old and strict system which juxtaposes aesthetics, ethics and politics. Modernism is one of various historic forms of superposition of arts and politics, which goes, according to Habermas:

> […] with the decisive confinement of science, morality and art to autonomous spheres separated from the life-world and administered by experts, what remains from the project of cultural modernity is only what we would have if we were to give up the project of cultural modernity altogether. (HABERMAS, 1983, p. 14).

In its own way, Modernism intends the coronation of modern tradition, the climax of a critical route with origins in Enlightenment. Its almost aseptic neutral discourse – befitting the project of establishing a neutral basis on which to evaluate the painting of its time – is exemplified in the writing of critics such as Greenberg.[7] It is not by chance that Greenberg (1992, p. 754) – the same who will insist on the narcissist neutrality of paintings turned back entirely to its own pictorial means – will bind Modernism to the Kantian critic:

> I identify Modernism with the intensification, almost the exacerbation, of this self-critical tendency that began with the philosopher Kant. Because he was the first to criticize the means itself of criticism, I conceive of Kant as the first real Modernist.

A more careful look at the disputes which have shaped the limits of Modernism makes clearer that the selection of its canons is quite controversial. The delimitation of the field of the modern deviates, naturally, from the sterilized process intended by the intellectual sponsors of Modernist painting. Actually, it is the contrary. Modernism is the most penetrating result of the approximation of Arts and Politics in the 20th Century.

In fact, after Cézanne the painting will change its relation with itself. The pictorial technique will not promote any more illusions by the improvement of the means, but will exercise, to its limits, the intrinsic properties of the act of painting. To Foucault (2001, p. 1512), "the painting has been since Cézanne, the tendency to become transparent to the act of painting."[8] Therefore, it was about developing peculiarities of the painting, highlighting it in the field of arts. However, a change in this direction is not neutral, obviously. First of all, it is about taking a stance according to the impulse of denying the past,[9] identified as the birthplace of the immobilizing tradition. Modernism moves away from its past, the "[…] horrible burden of Time that bruises your shoulders and bends you to the earth […]" (BAUDELAIRE, 2013), overvaluing the creative subjectivity, as if art could do without any and every reference. The master of post-impressionism would say: "one must learn to see by itself" (CHIPP, 1996, p. 10). And more: "[…] we have to transmit the image of what we see, forgetting all that has existed before us." (CHIPP, 1996, p. 16). This search for objectivity – which presupposes the appreciation of the painter-subject – reflects one of the fundamental aspects of modernity's paradigm: the belief of an absolute split between subject and object.[10]

Modernism, since its alleged origin,[11] inserts itself in the modern gesture of the present's capture by the subject, who is one of the many knots which gives cohesion to modernity's speech. Doing so provides the instruments of its critics. One can think no more on the subject, resorting to "anthropological universals" (VEYNE, 2011, p. 107) and must pay attention to the painful process of subjectivity which shifts to the margins of the "subject" all that does not precisely identify with the center. Since subjectivity and representation are concomitant moments of the same discursive process,[12] nothing authorizes neglecting the status of representation on the process of the modern's subject construction.

In the 20th Century, the vanguard's ascension puts into question the sensibility on which was based the arché of the previous periods. Twentieth Century art went beyond the geometric space of the art galleries, openly assuming a political duty. Dislocating the traditional spaces

[8] "La peinture a eu, depuis Cézanne, tendance à se rendre transparente à l'acte même de peindre […]."

[9] Habermas (1983, pp. 3-4) highlights the amplitude of this movement: "modernity revolts against the normalizing function of tradition; modernity lives on the experience of rebelling against all that is normative."

[10] A critic of this paradigm is found in Boaventura (2011).

[11] To Greenberg the historical origins of modernism are found in post-impressionism. Cf. HARRISON and WOOD, 1992, p. 756.

of formation and acquaintanceship from the artistic speech, the vanguards will project their claims on the political sphere in the first half of the 20th Century.

The Dada implodes the traditional art cube and questions its means of intelligibility.[13] Simultaneously born, in its majority, from the Dadaist negation, the surrealists[14] turn themselves against the system of representations which legitimized, complacently and silently, colonialism[15]. Affirms Leclerq (2010, p. 10):

> It's equally to the level of representations and mythifications that happens the impact of surrealism. [...] Since the beginning, the surrealists look to overcome the literary and artistic academicism, but also expect to provoke social disturbance through political engagement and positioning on the intellectual field of its time. This dual ambition is presented as one by the Surrealist Manifesto of 1924. Appealing to the "revolution", to the "reclassification of values" and also to the "over-realism", these young poets made the discourse of their ambitions.[16]

In this movement, the surrealists turned themselves against the politics of representation[17] that forced the center into a civilizing race

[13] Duchamp's suitcases, portable galleries, small universes similar to the art universe, exemplifies the implosion of art spaces in the dadaist questionings, on the iconoclast and mocking way of the French-American artist which foreshadowed the conceptual art. Cf. TOMKINS, 2005.

[14] "The surrealist movement was built by a highly organized group of artists and writers, the majority of them who were old dadaists who, in 1924, gathered around Breton in Paris, when he released his Surrealist Manifesto." (CHIPP, 1996, p. 374).

[15] In this regard, refer to Leclercq (2010).

[16] In French in the original: "C'est aussi au niveau des représentations et des mythifications que se joue l'impact du surréalisme. […] Dès les débuts, les surréalistes recherchent un dépassement de l'académisme littéraire et artistique mais espèrent aussi provoquer un bouleversement social par un engagement politique et par un positionnement dans le champ intellectuel de leur temps. Cette Double ambition est présentée comme une seule par le Manifeste du surréalisme de 1924. En appelant à la «révolution», au «reclassement des valeurs» et même au «sur-réalisme», ces jeunes poètes ont eu le discours de leurs ambitions."

[17] To Leclercq (2010, p. 10) this happens in the beginning of Surrealism: "D'emblée, dans la préface qui inaugure les douze numéros de La Révolution surréaliste, Paul Éluard, Roger Vitracet Jacques-André Boiffard ont conscience que ce qui est tenu pour la «réalité» se construit à partir de représentations, lorsqu'ils écrivent:«Entre Napoléon et le buste des phrénologues qui le représentent, il y a toutes les batailles del'Empire.»" towards the edges of the world. The inevitable result ricocheted onto the political representation, because > […] the avant–garde became, as it were, part of established culture; it became at least partly absorbed into the fabric of everyday life; and – perhaps above all – it became dramatically politicized, perhaps more so than the high arts in any period since the Age of Revolution (HOBSBAWN, 1994, p. 181).

From the surrealists' invectives to the art that will be shaped between the texts of Greenberg and Rosenberg,[18] there is a distance of one War. This distance covers the growing awareness of a historicity of Surrealism. This awareness, inserting the movement in a historical framework because of its conditions of origin and development, provoked the death of the vanguards. Posteriorly gathered in New York, the majority of the arts that would integrate within the Modernists circles, retrospectively disposes the vanguards' elements and practices, as Chipp argues (1996, p. 526):

> Conscientious of the new world view that dominated the post-war years with persistency, matured in the most cosmopolitan of the environments and equally conscientious of its varied origins, they visualized the past as if they had it in their hands and the future, however highly uncertain, opened up with its whole amplitude in front of them.

Always presenting itself in opposition to the Soviet Realism, American Expressionism emulated, at least discursively, the centrality that characterized the vanguards' Paris. Still today, New York, presented as the capital of contemporary art, centralizes the market. If not economically dominant, due to the ascent of other equally powerful markets, New York still retains a fundamental role in the complex networks that characterize the contemporary art world.

Despite massive investment undertaken by countries and the private sector, after the vanguard's death, in the cultural domain[19], the [18] Harold Rosenberg (1906-1978) was one of the American art critics responsible for the construction of the modernist canon. His position is orthogonal to Greenberg's.

[19] "On the 1970s, despite generally continuing in the passive role of receiving donation requests, the companies started to actively participate in the formulation of the contemporary culture discourse. But, contrarily to the prior involvement, unequal in practice common perspective, setting aside the turbulent processes from which originated the contemporary art, still sees the artist's work in an epiphanic way:

> […] a certain understanding of art has run continuously through the modern world since the Romantic era. It is the conception I've been calling epiphanic, and it encompasses not only an aesthetic of the work of art but also a view about its spiritual significance and about the nature and situation of the artist. It is a view not only about art but about the place of art in life, and its relation to morality (TAYLOR, 2001, p. 425).

Probably due to the historical distances between the vanguards and the masses, the common sense still promotes a romantic vision of artwork, in which art assumes the character of an instance in between the transcendental and the human. Isolated from the world, the artist, like a herald of the sublime, would create works according to inspiration and endowment. These are notions so naïve as to be dangerous. The vanguards hardly found a connection point with the masses:

> […] we must never forget that, throughout this period, it [the vanguards] remained isolated from the tastes and concerns of the mass of even the Western public […]. Except for a somewhat larger minority than before 1914, it was not what most people actually and consciously enjoyed (HOBSBAWN, 1994, p. 181).

Perhaps because of the distance between the vanguards and the masses, the association between nonfigurative art and deterioration remains vigorous in the non-academic discourse.[20] On the other hand, the vigorous clash between Expressionism and Realism resulted in a restricted valuation grid which expurgated from the art domain all forms of manifestations which were not framed in its restricted field of intelligibility. What was not Abstract Expressionism should be Soviet Realism and vice-versa. It is to deviate from the isolation to which Modernism is committed that Post-Modernism arises: a rupture to its artistic meta-and with a limited reach, the corporate intervention over the last two decades is becoming universal and embracing" (WU, 2006, p. 26).

[20] As an hyperbolic example of this posture which associates the non-representative to the monstrous, there is the gross "Haus der deutschen Kunst" debuted in 1937.

narratives.[21]

More than a movement, Post-Modernism is the denial of pre-established criteria which can guide the practices. Post-modernism is about breaking away from the exaggeration which led the Modern to a blind field; it is not arrived at by simple historical progression.[22]

Whether through the reorganization of artworks in a permanent exhibition room, or the recapture of issues related to minority rights, or the search for new ways to exercise political participation, the task of what has been conventionally called post-modern creates a challenge for law, arts and politics.

Honoring Greenberg's terms, we could ask if it is the role of the arts to simulate an imaginary equivalent. An answer to this question finds its roots in the idea of representation, and its effects would be extended not only to the artistic field but also to law and politics. As Pitkin points out (2004, p. 336), "the concept [of representation] does have a central core of meaning: that somebody or something not literally present is nevertheless present in some non-literal sense. But that is not much help."

3. Political representation

Pitkin clarifies that the word "representation" has Latin roots, repraesentare, meaning "to make present or manifest or to present again" (PITKIN, 1989, p. 133). However, in its original form, it has no relation to representing people or the Roman State. The word gains the connotation of political agent only with the participation of knights and burgesses in the English Royal Parliament.[23] From this idea, Hobbes delineated in 1651 its classic definition in the Leviathan, which even today influences political representation theory: "a representative is someone given authority to act by someone else, who is then bound by the representative's action as if it had been his own" (PITKIN, 1989, p. 141). After this classic definition, many were the revisions made of this concept through the [21] "Simplifying the most, it is considered 'post-modern' the incredulity in relation to metanarratives." (LYOTARD, 1986, p. xvi).

[22] Boaventura (2011) criticizes the fact that the word is perfectly rendered to justify developmentalists conceptions.

[23] "Although the ancient Greeks had a number of institution and practices to which we would apply the word representation, they had no corresponding word or concept." (PITKIN, 1989, p. 133).

modern age (by Rousseau, Burke, and Condorcet, for examples), giving rise to numerous theories to explain the concept.

The first deep examination of those divergences was made by Hanna Pitkin, in her classic The Concept of Representation (1967). In this book, Pitkin, starting from the idea that representation is "[…] a making present again" (PITKIN, 1967, p. 8), suggests that the problem of conceptualizing this word is not the fact that the many meanings exclude each other, but that all of the meanings are considered by its authors as the correct ones, when they are actually only parts of a whole (she therefore uses the metaphor of snapshots taken from a tridimensional structure from many different angles). She then analyzes different ideas on representation (especially representation as a standing for or as an acting for) to formulate her own concept, based on the tension between substance and institutionalization (PITKIN, 1967, p. 239-240).

From Pitkin's analysis, many new ideas erupt in the field of political representation. Initially, those ideas were restricted to institutional representation. However, the serious crisis of representation (or rather, of representative democracy) experienced by Western societies at the end of the 20th Century stimulated new analysis on this topic of democratic theory.

3.1. A representation crisis?

Currently, it is believed that we live under a crisis of representation. This expression, in established use, is not completely false, and is a worldwide phenomenon. Yves Sintomer cites the rejection by voters in two European countries of the European Constitution when submitted to a referendum, and also shows, in numbers, the disillusionment of the French population in its politicians: "in France, 39% of the electors have little confidence, and 37% have no confidence on the politicians" (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 27)[24]. In Brazil, according to the results of the "ICJ Brasil" research conducted during the fourth trimester of 2012 by the "Fundação Getúlio Vargas", the National Congress and the political parties are, among the researched institutions, the two most discredited in Brazil, with only 21% and 10% (respectively) of the interviewed answering that they have trust in these institutions (CUNHA et al., 2012, p. 21).

[24] In the original, in Portuguese: "na França, 39% dos eleitores têm pouca confiança, e 37% não têm nenhuma confiança nos políticos" (SINTOMER,2010, p. 27).

According to Sintomer, we can list "six structural causes" for the representation crisis. They would be: a powerless politics; the political disengagement of the popular classes; the emergence of a "risk society"; the crisis of bureaucratic public action; the ideological obstacle; and internal causes to the political system (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 29-35). To Sintomer, an aspect of the representation crisis is more pronounced than others: the crisis of party representation. According to him, "[…] an epoch seems extinct: the one in which the democracy was organized almost exclusively around them [the political parties]" (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 35).[25] Performing an important role, as Urbinati stresses (2006a, p. 218), > the political parties articulate the "universal interest" from peripheral viewpoints. They are partial-however-communal associations and essential reference points which enable the citizens and the representatives to recognize each other (and the others) and form alliances and, moreover, enable them to ideologically situate the compromises which they are ready to make.[26]

However, as Sintomer points out, political parties have acquired several vices while developing its functions, transforming into "[…] bureaucratic structures, centralized and authoritative […]" (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 36)[27], which contradict their democratic ideal. Using support from Bernard Manin's theory, Sintomer says that currently we have seen the rise of an "audience democracy" or, as he would also call it, an "opinion democracy."[28] Therefore, "more than the representative democracy crisis, then, it would be necessary to talk about the crisis of a specific model of representative government: the party democracy and its progressive [25] In the original: "[...] uma época parece extinta: aquela em que a democracia se organizava quase que exclusivamente em torno deles [partidos]" (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 35).

[27] In the original: "[...] estruturas burocráticas centralizadas e autoritárias [...]" (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 36).
[28] In the original: "Bernard Manin acrescenta que hoje […] assistimos à emergência de uma nova forma de governo representativo, a 'democracia do público' ou, num outro vocabulário, a 'democracia de opinião'" (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 39).

disappearance in favor of another model" (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 39-40).[29]

In order to overcome this legitimacy crisis of representative democracy, Sintomer asserts that > [...] developing actions capable to even catch the attention of the mass media, a series of social movements, in the last two or three decades, have been developing new organizational and popular forms, based on horizontal coordination and in a strong deliberative dimension (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 40).[30]

Furthermore, one can see an attempt to strengthen the institutional devices of participative or deliberative democracy, which values discussion, debate, and participation (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 42-43). Sintomer calls attention to the participative dimension of democracy, since participative democracy would not only be the result of a criticism to representation, but > also implies another history of democracy, whose chronology is not identical to the one of representative government (even though they both get blended), with its founding moments […] (the revolutions, the Paris Commune, the French Resistance, 1968), its own imaginaries (the libertarian and socialists utopias, certain tendencies of political liberalism or environmentalism, a part of the Anglo-Saxon republicanism etc.), its specific actors, and also its intrinsic inquiries and contradictions (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 44).[31]

[29] In the original: "mais que da crise da democracia representativa, então, seria necessário falar da crise de um modelo específico de governo representativo: a democracia partidária e seu progressivo desaparecimento em favor de um outro modelo." (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 39-40).

[31] In the original: "[...] implica também em uma outra história da democracia, cuja cronologia não é idêntica à do governo representativo (ainda que as duas se misturem), com seus momentos fundadores mais ou menos míticos (as revoluções, a Comuna de Paris, a Resistência, 1968), os seus imaginários próprios (as utopias libertárias e socialistas, certas tendências do liberalismo político ou do ecologismo, uma parte do republicanismo anglo-saxônico etc.) seus atores específicos, e também seus questionamentos e suas contradições intrínsecas" (SINTOMER, 2010, p. 44).

Hanna Pitkin, by its turn, in an article published in 2004, brings other elements to the 21st Century discussion about the representation crisis. The author describes the three main obstacles today to the "alliance" between democracy and representation. The first would be "[…] the scope of public problems and private power" (PITKIN, 2004, p. 341). For her, the problems which currently affect the population are results of the activities "[…] of huge, undemocratic organizations, be they national mafias, transnational corporations, or even government bureaucracies and armies" (PITKIN, 2004, p. 341). However, they are necessary consequences to the political action of the population.

> For local politics to be able to provide the experience of active citizenship, it must be real. Something that genuinely matters to people, some problem in their actual lives, must be at stake. A mere pretend politics, a simulacrum of public action without significant content or consequences, will not do (PITKIN, 2004, p. 341).

The second obstacle would be the money, or rather, the wealth. Reclaiming the Marxist studies of the influence of capital, she states that the obstacle is not the influence of corruption in elections, but "[...] the more general, age-old tension between the power of wealth and 'people power', meaning the power of numbers and of commitment" (PITKIN, 2004, p. 341).

Lastly, Pitkin talks about the obstacle related to the ideas and their formation. To Pitkin, "deception, propaganda, and indoctrination have always played a role in the rough and actual political life, but they take on new, disturbing dimensions in our age of electronic media and satellite surveillance […]" (PITKIN, 2004, p. 341). People, therefore, will get used to their role as spectators, and the thin line between fantasy and reality will begin to blur (PITKIN, 2004, p. 341).

Pitkin's vision is full of pessimism. Sintomer's vision, however, indicates that one should search for answers to the representation crisis in deliberative democracy and, especially, in popular participation. Over the last decades, many political scientists have examined this subject, trying to find answers to the challenges faced by representative democracy, and formulating many theories in order to reach this goal. Those theories have clear connections with the questions raised by Modernism. The current movement of democratic theory does not demand the end of political representation, but rather its strengthening, combining it with participation, greater legitimacy, and other notions that were not previously explored

3.2. Questioning a standard account of democratic representation

As mentioned before, the crisis of representative democracy can also be understood as crisis of party representation. So why not extend this concept to a "State" representative democracy crisis? Some of the main criticisms of classical political representation theory are based on the fact that they are concerned only with a standard account of democratic representation[32], understood by > […] four main features. First, representation is understood as a principal agent relationship, in which the principals—constituencies formed on a territorial basis — elect agents to stand for and act on their interests and opinions, thus separating the sources of legitimate power from those who exercise that power. Second, electoral representation identifies a space within which the sovereignty of the people is identified with state power. Third, electoral mechanisms ensure some measure of responsiveness to the people by representatives and political parties who speak and act in their name. Finally, the universal franchise endows electoral representation with an important element of political equality (URBINATI; WARREN, 2008, p. 389, our italics).

However, as Mark Warren and Dario Castiglione point out (2006, p. 1), "[...] contemporary democracies have evolved in ways that increasingly undermine the adequacy of the standard model." The emergence of transnational decision-making arenas, the control of political decisions by specialized and expert bodies, the increasing demands for group recognition, and the diffusion of more informal structures and opportunities for democratic representation (WARREN; CASTIGLIONE, 2006, p. 1-2) are new developments which call into question the standard account of representation.

Nadia Urbinati, in her book Representative Democracy (2006b), defended the existence of three theories of representation, namely, juridical, institutional, and political.[33] The juridical and institutional theories are intimately related, since both start from a conception based on a State-Person analogy and a voluntaristic conception of sovereignty. Thus, they would both be connected to a state-centered theory of representation.

[32] Leonardo Avritzer (2007, p. 445) states that "the modern representation theory is based on three elements: authorization, monopoly and territoriality."

[33] "All of them can also be used to define democracy (direct, electoral, and representative, respectively)" (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 21).

The juridical theory, older than the others, "[...] treats representation like a private contract of commission (granting 'license to perform an action by some person or persons who must possess the right to perform the given action themselves')" (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 21). This theory follows a nonpolitical and individualistic orientation, considering that the representatives would be chosen by their personal qualities and not by their ideas or political projects. It adopts the logic of "[...] presence/absence (of the sovereign) and detaches representation from advocacy and representativity […]" (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 22). And "[…] it makes representation into a rigorously state-centered institution whose relation to society is left to the judgment of the representative (trustee); and it restricts popular participation to a procedural minimum (election as magistracy designation)" (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 23).

In the institutionalist theory, anchored in theorists such as Sieyès, "[...] representation can be a strategy of institution-building on the condition that the subjects are given only the job of selecting the law-makers" (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 23). The sovereignty, in this case, is kept on a voluntaristic basis, and the nation only speaks through the voice of its representatives.

Both perspectives, therefore "[...] assume that the state (and representation as its productive and reproductive mechanism) must transcend society in order to ensure the rule of law; and that the people must hide their concrete and social identities to make public officials impartial agents of decision" (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 23). In other words, these state-centered perspectives limit the perspectives of political representation to a mere state organization in order to express a unified "will of the nation." There was, thus, a clear separation between the political and the social spheres, so as to ensure "[...] legal equality and the impersonal organization of the state [...]" (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 23).

According to Urbinati, with society's democratic transformation, a third theory emerges, and breaks with the two previous ones: the political theory of representation. In this new conceptualization, representation starts to be seen in a dynamic way, being constructed by representatives and constituents together, and not from a preexistent entity (the unity of the State or the People). "Representation does not just pertain to government agents or institutions, but designates a form of political processes that is structured in terms of the circularity between institutions and society, and is not confined to deliberation and decision in the assembly" (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 24).

This conception is a direct reflection of the author's proposal to change the focus of "representation" from the ideal of sovereignty to the ideal of political judgment as the foundation for the legitimacy of representation. Representation does not arise from sovereignty's delegation, as seen with Hobbes, but from a constantly reconstructed process of the relationship between representative and constituent, based on the idea of political judgment. With the 20th Century democratic transformation and especially with the increase of the complexity of social relations and the creation of new representation instances, the notion of political judgment arises as an important foundation of legitimacy to justify the representative-constituent relationship. This relationship cannot be justified by the sovereign relationship anymore, since this last ignores the political differences among citizens when they are "forming" the representation, in the name of a political unity. It's a making the social political process (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 24).

> Political representation scorns the idea that electors rather than citizens hold this center [center of gravity of the democratic society], that the act of authorization is more important than the process of authorization. It marks the end of a yes/no politics and the beginning of politics as an open and common arena of contestable opinions and revisable decisions. It amplifies the meaning of presence itself because it makes voice its most active and consonant manifestation and judgment about just and unjust laws its content (URBINATI, 2006b, p. 24).

The monopoly of representation in the hands of the elected representative, in a state-centered view, in which this representative would be like a herald of the people,[34] often isolated from the world, surrounded [34] Traditional political theorists, such as Rosseau and Montesquieu, denounced the aristocratic feature of political representation. To Rousseau, the res publica was directly connected to the self-government, while the representative government would be an aristocratic kind of power (URBINATI; WARREN, 2008, p. 391). Montesquieu, on the other hand, argued that the sortition idea would be democratic, whilst the representation would be aristocratic (URBINATI; WARREN, 2008, p. 392). In the 20th Century, many Democratic Theory defenders, such as Joseph Schumpeter, Giovanni Sartori and Niklas Luhman, "[…] replicated Rousseau's view that representation is essentially aristocratic, by the walls of the government palace, is increasingly criticized. The traditional argument, shown by Pitkin (1967, p. 222-223), that the representative has greater knowledge about the matters under discussion, and because of that takes divergent decisions in relation to those his constituents wish (those who he would, at least theoretically, represent — based on a territoriality relation),[35] has been losing credibility. New forms of representation are created and/or theorized. Just as 20th Century art broke away from the geometric spaces of art galleries, political representation, in the post-representative democracy crisis context, has also been creating new spaces outside government arenas.

4. New spaces for political representation

According to Leonardo Avritzer, deliberative democracy, for example, "[...] tackles this problem [of the declining legitimacy of representative government] by arguing that the declining quality of the political process is due to current tools used to aggregate citizens' opinions" (AVRITZER, 2012, p. 11). Thus, it searches to develop new institutional designs to the system which may be capable of aggregating opinions, overcoming the limits set by the traditional design that is based on the state monopoly of representation. Those new institutions introduce a new participative perspective, incorporating "civil society actors in the process of decision-making on public policies" (AVRITZER, 2012, p. 13).

However, as Avritzer also points out, this new movement of political participation, which in Brazil is characterized by an "[…] enlargement of civil society's presence in public policies and the growth of the so-called participative institutions" (AVRITZER, 2007, p. 443), creates an "inescapable" problem, "[…] the emergence of new forms of representation connected to [the civil society]" (AVRITZER, 2007, p. 443).[36] These new forms of representation escape in three aspects from the standard account of democratic representation (as defined by Urbinati and War-while viewing democratic participation in political judgment as utopian" (URBINATI; WARREN, 2008, p. 392).

[35] "[...] although the political representative may ignore or even override constituency opinion, he may offer justifications, rationales, for doing so, in much the way that a substantive representative must be prepared to do. If we ask an American legislator whether he acts independently of constituents' wishes, and why, he is likely to answer in terms of his knowledge and their ignorance and true interest" (PITKIN, 1967, p. 222).

ren, 2008), since there is no stated requirement of authorization and no structure of territorial monopoly, and neither a "[…] assumption of mathematical equality among the individuals who can originate the representation" through elections (AVRITZER, 2007, p. 444).[37] The loss of state monopoly of representation can be seen here: it flees the space in which was enclosed, acquiring new shapes, through new institutional designs.

These new institutional designs stressed by Avritzer are frequently ignored by the majority of the democratic theory literature. Still extremely focused on the northern hemisphere, contemporary democratic theory has been ignoring progress made by new institutional designs on the so-called peripheral and semi-peripheral countries. Similarly, New York still maintains a fundamental role in the complex network which characterizes the contemporary art.

Another important transformation movement is one which questions the fact that "[...] many groups within the established democracies lacked even passive inclusion" (URBINATI; WARREN, 2008, p. 394). Many previously organized civil society groups would be underrepresented or even not represented at all. In the painful process of the subjectivization of the construction of the modern being, common perspectives can be identified among some of these subjects. These perspectives are found on the margins of those subjects, differentiating them, and resulting in their underrepresentation. Using this idea, Iris Marion Young proposes the concept of "perspective representation." For her, "the group differentiation provides resources to a democratic communicative public which aims to establish justice, since the differently positioned people have different experiences, stories and social comprehensions, derived from that positioning. This, I call social perspective" (YOUNG, 2006, p. 162).[38] Young's proposal of perspective representation seeks institutional representation for groups whose subjective construction is based on many common perspectives.[39] This model has the objective of guaranteeing the promotion of certain starting points to the political discussion, and not of inducing a specific conclusion (YOUNG, 2006, p. 168), so as to allow new views to influence the political discussions and decisions and, in addition, to stimulate the participation and engagement of excluded or marginalized groups (YOUNG, 2006, p. 174-175). Thus, the subjectivity process starts to have a singular importance in the appearance of new forms of representation. For example, according to the model proposed by Iris Young, it can be determinant to highlight certain perspectives in the political arena.

[38] In the original: "a diferenciação de grupos propicia a recursos para um público democrático comunicativo que visa estabelecer a justiça, uma vez que pessoas diferentemente posicionadas tem diferentes experiências, histórias e compreensões sociais, derivadas daquele posicionamento. A isso chamo perspectiva social" (YOUNG, 2006, p. 162).

[39] "The social perspective consists in a set of questions, experiences and assumptions through which the more properly starts reasoning than draws conclusions" (YOUNG, 2006, p. 163).

5. Some final thoughts

Our intent is to show that Modernism has raised many questions which pertain not only to artistic representation but also to political representation. Modernism generated and strengthened the process of questioning traditional forms of artistic representation and its exhibition, reflecting political representation. Following Art's movement beyond the art galleries, Politics leaves the government arenas, assuming increasingly more extra-institutional representative functions. The subjectivization process of the modernist echoes the complex issue of political representation, especially in reference to marginalized groups which seek representation. All of this exists within a context of confronting the idea of the political unity of the Nation, sustained by archaic theories of political representation.

The "authoritarian culture" in a historical perspective
A comparative study between the mafiosi police in Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires

Luciana Araújo de Paula[40]

Abstract: During the past decade we observe a growing optimism on the Latin American continent. However, it is also the continent where we see the highest rate of homicides and a political corruption increasingly embedded in "organized crime" from the state and in particular, from the members of its security institutions . We refer to new "mafiosi phenomena" who question the belief that Latin America "organized crime" is always linked to "drug traffickers". These new "mafiosi phenomena" are formed in the heart of the state through an "authoritarian culture" firmly rooted in the political and security institutions in Latin America. The evolution of this "authoritarian culture" has followed a common denominator powered by a dual mechanism: individuals require more security against a rising crime, while the state responds advantage repression. We find in the history of the Latin American countries 'standardization' of the repressive behavior of the state in the name of democracy, while strengthening its authoritarian tendencies. Nowadays the emergence of a kind of "police mafiosi" that imposes tax and the "illegal protection" to the poor and relies on the cooperation of politicians eager to vote is nothing other than the perverse result of this process. This "snowball" is it due to the structural weakness of the Latin - American counties? To what extent this paradox is it intrinsic to the process of democratization of Latin American institutions in a transnational context? To what degree this "authoritarian culture" was the springboard for the consolidation of the phenomena of more and more complex within the state apparatus? To address this issue we will do, at first, a comparative study, observing how the phenomenon of "police mafiosi" has established itself in Brazil through the case of "Milicias" in Rio de Janeiro, then Argentina, through the example of the "Policia Maldita" in Buenos Aires.

1. Avant-propos

During the last decade we see a climate of increasing optimism on the economic level of the Latin American continent. However, it is also the continent where we find a very high rate of homicide as well as political corruption more and more linked to the crime from the state in particular, members of its security institutions. I refers to new "mafia phenomena" groups composed of police officers who have developed and consolidated in this atmosphere of economic and "democratic" euphoria. How to understand this paradox?

These new "mafia phenomenon" appeared and gradually rooted in the heart of the state through an "authoritarian culture" well anchored in the political and security institutions. In this paper I analyze the structure of the "authoritarian culture" present in the security institutions in Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires. I understand by "authoritarian culture" that Paulo Sérgio Pinheiro called a "socially implanted authoritarianism." This means that "certain behaviors and authoritarian values are not affected by the political transitions and institutional change. These behaviors are historical legs, constantly reactivated by the characteristics of social interaction. "

This presentation is part of the fieldwork for my thesis where I analyze some paradigmatic examples of historic joint triptych policy / politics / crime in both Latin American contexts. To understand the phenomenon of "mafiosi police" itself it is necessary to consider other forms of criminal operation of the police who are not necessarily mafia.

Then, how authoritarian culture is present in the practice of security institutions in Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires?

To answer this problem I decided to develop an overview of the functioning of the criminal police and separate it into three major groups: 1) "police corruption", 2) "death squads" and, finally, 3) "mafiosi police".

The "mafiosi police" is the one which best articulates this triad (police / politics / crime) on a "territory" and a specific "population". However, it is very important to note that this division does not refer to a "logical evolution of crime", that is to say, from 1 to 3. These three forms of operation are organized in accordance with the characteristics of each historical political context / social /. Thus, even if they have different modes of action, they often identify with each other because they are from the same institution security: the police.

For example, if the "mafiosi police" uses some features of the "death squads", it can not be mistaken as to the latter. Moreover, there are "territories" or even historical and political contexts that lend themselves to some form of action and not to others. "Police corruption" Brazil is a common mode of operation in certain "territories" of the southern area of the city of Rio de Janeiro usually controlled by factions of drug trafficking. In Argentina, the "death squads" that had a strong nationalist tendencies have spread in specific historical and political contexts: "Ligua Patriótica Argentina" in the '20s and the "Triple A" in the 70s in the third Peron government.

I adopt the binomial "city / territory" in order to better understand the control of certain physical spaces by criminal groups in both countries. The notion of "territory" refers to the idea of a microcosm that includes rules and forms of social organization that differ from those of the city. "Territories" are characterized mainly by constant intersection between formal / informal, legal / illegal which promotes the development of these areas groups.

The "Police mafia" itself feeds such blurred distinctions between the formal / legal - they are members of official security institutions and therefore have a duty to protect - and informal / illegal - they take advantage of the lack of distinction on the "territory" to develop their mafiosi activities, for example, selling protection, the sale of water, electricity, control of alternative transportation, vehicle theft, prostitution, extortion, among others.

In Rio de Janeiro I will analyze 1) "police corruption" through the model of the "arrego" or "mineira", 2) "death squads" through the model of "the Escuderia Le Coqc" et finally, 3)" mafiosi police" through the model of the "milicias".

In Buenos Aires, I will analyze 1) "police corruption" through the model of "Jaurias de perros" («pack of dogs»); 2) "death squads" through the model of the 'triple A' e finally, the «mafiosi police" through the model of "porongos".

2. Police corruption

2.1 Rio de Janeiro

The fact that the police "negotiating" with organized crime is called "arrego" or "mineira". This practice has been very widespread in 90s. The members of the State Security allow criminal groups, including drug traffickers, develop their illegal activities on a "territory" given (usually in a "point of sale" called "boca de fumo") for a percentage on the profits generated by these sales. Insofar as that trading is profitable for the policy it ensures the smooth running of this "business" and therefore "peace" of "territory". However, if the dealers do not pay the "arrego" the agreement is broken and the police reprises his role and combat it.

2.2 Buenos Aires

The model of "Jaurias de perros" has materialized during the mandate of Security Minister Leon Arslanian (2004-2007) that ended the pyramidal system of command within the bonaerense police. This has been positive because it overthrew the entrepreneurial character and hierarchically organized illegal police activities. However, it has also made possible the formation of different autonomous bands of police (called "Jaurias de perros") who disputed the management of illegal activities in the province of Buenos Aires in an uncontrolled manner and extremely violent.

3. Death squads

3.1) Rio de Janeiro

The model of "Escuderie le Cocq" refers to a criminal association formed by the police in Rio de Janeiro to promote the summary execution of suspected individuals bandits. It was founded in 1965 and acts in the 70s, 80s and early 90s. The "Scuderie Le Cocq" was formed to avenge the death of Milton Le Cocq, famous detective and member of the personal guard of Getúlio Vargas. This group was led by the "Twelve gold men" chosen by Luis França, Secretary of Public Security of Rio de Janeiro, to "clean" the city of «bandits». This group has been very active during the Brazilian dictatorship and it solicited its services and used his clandestine methods persecution and torture has against the common bandits to combat resistant left of regime.

3.2 Buenos Aires

The model "Triple A" refers to the "anticommunist argentine alliance", a death squad of extreme right founded by José López Rega, Argentine Minister of Social Affairs in the third Peronist government from 1973 to 1975. Lopez Rega was head of the Ministry of Social Welfare, which funds were diverted to finance the organization and armament of this group to fight leftist (early actions were primarily directed towards the left wing of Peronism). After the coup of 1976, the Triple A was taken over by the army and more concretely by SIDE ("Secretary of State Information"). The "Proceso de Reorganización Nacional" has been responsible for the dissolution of the Triple A since "terrorism" became a state policy and actions of the Triple A (now called "Comando Libertadores de América") become institutionalized by the army itself.

4 Mafiosi Police

4.1 Rio de Janeiro:

The model of the "milicia" refers to the "Police Mineira" formed in the late 1970s in the community of Rio das Pedras, region of Jacarepagua in Rio de Janeiro, after a humiliation afflicted by drug traffickers to a resident of the community. Than, this resident formed a group with other residents to establish their own righteousness, expel traffickers and protect the population. The first informations on the "Police Mineira" were ambiguous: they were referring firstly to the presence of coercion, threats and extortion, and secondly to restore order positively perceived by the population. However, certain abusive attitudes have generated discontent among the local population. Due to this the agents of Public Security (polices, firefighters, soldiers...), residents of the community, decided to intervene and arrest the leaders of the "Police Mineira." These agents have replaced the previous group and have expanded their operations in the community, forming the embryo of what the press began to call the "milicia". This model of "territory" control by members of the police claiming the "protection" of the local population through the "sale security" was adopted in neighboring communities forming the bastion of "Milicia" or "blue commando" (due to the color of the uniforms of the Military Police in Rio de Janeiro which has produced the majority of these groups) in the western part of the metropolitan area of the city, especially during the government of the clan Garotinho (Anthony Rosinha and from 99 to 2007).

4.2 Buenos Aires

The model of "porongas" (thinking head of a criminal gang, also used in prisions Argentina to refer to the chief prisoner. Makes also echo of manhood as associated to the male sexual organ) has materialized during the Government of the Province of Buenos Aires by Eduardo Duhalde (1991-1999). At this time the triad Police / politics / crime in the metropolitan area of Buenos Aires has become systematic and the term "maldita policia" was born. This system is pyramidal, hierarchical, organic and is characterized by illegal financing ("black box") of each police department in the metropolitan area. Thus, the functions are very organized and defined : the anti-drug department is responsible for the management of drug trafficking; the department to combat flight is responsible for the management of flights; the anti-kidnapping department is responsible for management kidnapping and extortion ...This model is reinforced by the policies of "mano dura" because they allow the police play with the feeling of insecurity among the population : when they want to promote a political ally they are placed in the street and protect the population, but when it prevents them from developing their illegal activities, they "liberan zonas" for the bandits allies (this strategy has been widely used for removing of leftist activists under the dictatorship: the police "liberava zonas", that is to say, did not intervene in a "territory" determined by the army allowing the death squads execute the "dirty work"). In the 90s, the "mafiosi police" was also used to demonstrate its dissatisfaction with the government through "political messages" for example, several Israeli cemeteries profanations took place in retaliation for investigations against police accused of involvement in the attack against AMIA.

5 Concluding

At this point of my research I can forward the following differentiation between "mafiosi police" in Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires:

In Rio de Janeiro, "police mafia" consists of officers whose purpose is to control the "territory" the local population in order to extortion, saying the fight against crime, particularly against trafficking drugs. Here we see a close relationship "police mafia" / "territory" / locals. They are those who "protect" at the same time that taking advantage the local population of these territories.

In Buenos Aires, the "police mafia" took place the very heart of the police force with the objective of funding the "slush fund" for each department: for example, those who fight against crime on a "territory" are determined also those who manage, which articulate the same crime and redistribute gains. Here we see a close relationship "police mafia" / "territory" / crime management. They are those who "protect" at the same time take advantage of that crime management of these territories.

The recognition of new social actors and the checkmate of statutory law

Maria Fernanda Salcedo Repolês[1]

Abstract: The starting point of the 'Polos de Cidadania' Research Program of the University of Minas Gerais, in Brazil, is the lack of effectiveness of fundamental rights on a day-to-day basis. Our paper aims to discuss this reality through the theoretical debate of the exhaustion of the legalist paradigm; the concealment of pluralism inherent to legal order; and the questioning of the functions of statutory law in the legal system.

When statutory law was converted into the primary social control in the XIX century a series of presuppositions were constructed. We argue that they can no longer stand because such paradigm ignores the dynamics of the application of statutes and its hermeneutical character and it conceals the political consequences of decision making. We will analyze these two aspects from the stand point of four basic presuppositions that support them: that there is a complete or at least a high standard of transparency between the citizen and the legislator; that the statutes have a message accessible to all; that social relations are standard and, finally, that the State is the only way to the solution of social conflict.

Using examples of ground research of the 'Polos de Cidadania' team in the periphery of Belo Horizonte, Minas Gerais, in Brazil, our paper exposes an experience used to reformulate the traditional presuppositions of the Theory of Law and advance towards a comprehension of Law that can be called pluralist, or dialogical. Our paper will propose a new role for statutory law in a context of contemporary societies, and a path, or a methodology that makes the transition of paradigm an open, inaugural process.

With this paper we expect to contribute to the discussion about new methodology of law, to share experiences from different parts of the world in

Introduction

The starting point of the 'Polos de Cidadania' Research Program of the University of Minas Gerais in Belo Horizonte, Brazil, is the lack of effectiveness of fundamental rights on a day-to-day basis. This lack could be understood as a generalized disobedience to the basic legal system and to the statutory law, specifically. Such phenomenon has been described by sociology as anomy. It also involves the lack of application or the selective application of statutory law by the official power organs. Our paper aims to discuss this second point taking into account the thesis that there is an exhaustion of the legalist paradigm; that this paradigm conceals pluralism inherent to the legal order; and that a path out of this deadlock involves the questioning of the functions of statutory law in the legal system.

The problem we identify is that statutory law when converted into the primary social control in the XIX century constructed a series of presupposition that can no longer stand. First of all, such paradigm ignores the dynamics of the application of statutes and its hermeneutical character. Second, it conceals the political consequences of decision-making. We will analyze these two aspects, but first we must mention the presuppositions that support them.

Such a system could work as a primary social control if there was complete or at least a high standard of transparency between the citizen and the legislator. This presupposition has a close relation to the democratic political system and the questions that rose in contemporary societies about the efficiency of representation and the limits and possibilities of direct participation. The legalist paradigm also presupposes that the statutes have a message accessible to all. This access is understood in two ways: the access to the statutes themselves, the capability to know they exist and that they are valid; and the access in the sense of understanding what is written, the meaning and the duties and rights imposed by the texts. In addition, statutory law as a primary social control presupposes that social relations are standard. In fact, the paradigm of written, codified law carries with it a claim of universality, which ignores that society is by definition pluralistic and that pluralism is an accentuated feature of contemporary complex societies. Thus it is difficult to use as a starting point a claim by which a text can capture "reality" in its wholeness. Finally, and still related to the theme of social pluralism, the legalistic paradigm claims that the State is the only way to the solution of social conflict. That is, the presupposition of a homogeneous, standard society is translated into the legal system in a way that it too, just as it happens in politics, economy and other social aspects, claims itself to be a monistic, closed system.

Using examples of ground research done by the 'Polos de Cidadania' team in the periphery of Belo Horizonte, Minas Gerais, in Brazil, we want to present to the XXV World Congress of Philosophy of Law and Social Philosophy an experience that helps us reformulate the traditional presuppositions of the Theory of Law, based on the legalistic paradigm, and advance towards a comprehension of Law that can be called pluralist, or dialogical. This transition involves questioning the role played by statutory law in the application of the legal system, especially as this application is demanded by a public that is not the typical, expected "client" of this system. The unsteadiness of the legalistic paradigm is made clear by the inclusion of new social actors in public policy, the direction taken by statutes, which try to regulate social behavior in broader ways, and non-legal social variables that interfere directly in the application of law.

As we show this 'crisis' throughout our paper, we will present the role we suggest that statutory law must play in order to be more efficient in a context of contemporary societies. Two roles will be specially analyzed: statutory law as 'due process'; that is, written law has an important attribution to establish conditions for the formalization of relationships when this is demanded by social actors involved. The symbolic force of writing lends legitimacy to political actions and stabilizes the mutual expectations. The other role that will be approached is that of statutory law as a 'value basis', in a way that social actors may project their world views and discuss what are their differences and common grounds utilizing a minimum group of directive principles that they agree to share in order to make the discussion possible.

Our paper also suggests a path, or a methodology, that makes the transition of paradigm an open, inaugural process. Our suggestions are constructed along an 18 year research, that involves numerous professors from different areas such as law, psychology, philosophy, social science, architecture, communication, economy; a solid technical assistant team as interdisciplinary as the first; and most important, several generations of students who changed their view of law. The research team learned the consequences of centuries of the construction of a legal system that perpetuates inequality and prejudice using a technical and impartial discourse. In contrast, it found a way to practice law in a way that it may open society to the construction of emancipation, subjectivity and citizenship.

Accordingly the path suggested starts with the construction of a map of discursive and non violent forms of conflict solution in a way of a sociological diagnosis; afterwards, the recognition and the communication with such forms; especially through the language of art and theater; and third, the establishment of partnerships that stimulate collective organization and discussion of problems and solutions. Through this discussion it is possible to make explicit the political character of statutory law and the necessity to find institutional and non-institutional ways of making rights effective in circumstances of profound and permanent rights violations. Finally, the refusal to idealize the non-official forms of conflict solution, that is, the necessity to do a permanent revision of social and political practices using critical methods of violence diagnosis.

With this paper we expect to contribute to the discussion about new methodology of law, to share experiences from different parts of the world in which the methodology of law has been challenged by situations of rights violations, and to diffuse the results of the research conducted in our university in order to perfection it.

The exhaustion of legalist paradigm and the concealment of legal pluralism

In the margins of Nossa Senhora do Carmo Avenue, which cuts the main neighborhoods of one of the richest sections of the city of Belo Horizonte, there is a small shanty town, only a few poor houses starting to grow in a steep side road. The São Bento Villa, as it is known, has 200 families, considered the poorest among the poor inhabitants of the Aglomerado[2] Santa Lúcia – a shanty town that counts approximately [2] Aglomerado can be understood as a pile of poor houses, a crammed neighborhood. It is the politically correct term for the more commonly used word "favela" or shanty town.

150.000 people. The City Hall has maintained a policy of evictions using the following arguments: Vila São Bento is located in a risk area, easily affected by the strong rain periods; it is a more recent formation from the rest of the "favela". The former has one hundred years, the latter, only twenty; it is located nearby a environmentally protected area which is being negatively affect; the possession of the public land is illegal and it is the duty of the City Hall to empty the area.

Two hundred meters ahead from Vila São Bento a big concrete construction has been lift up. It includes a fancy supermarket and delicatessen, a famous vehicle dealer, and a construction material shop. The buildings have two years, they have been partly lifted in public land, they lack the environmental licenses and two other municipal licenses to function, they have invaded part of an environmentally protected area and some of the construction is out of the municipal parameters, specially the structures built for the rain water control. These structures have several tubes that collect the rain water and throws it directly on top of some of the houses in Vila São Bento. In December 2009, during the rainy period, the water collected by the supermarket building fell over twenty houses of Vila São Bento, it provoked the downfall of five of these houses and turned fragile the other fifteen. Five families or a total of thirty people lost all furniture, clothes, documents, family photos and other personal belongings.

On January 2010, the community leader approached the Mediation Center of the Pólos de Cidadania Research Program[3] opened in the Santa Lúcia Agglomerate since 2003. The community leader wanted mediation between the community association and the families of the Vila São Bento and the construction firm responsible for the supermarket building. The Mediation Center approached the engineers, asked several times for meetings, without success. Finally, a letter signed by the professors that coordinate the Research Program turned the invitation effective. The engineers accepted a meeting to talk about the case, but did not show up the scheduled day. The Mediation Center approached City Hall and discovered the real conditions of the supermarket build-

[3] The Mediation Center staff is composed by Adriana Sena (professor, research coordination), Antônio Eduardo Nicacio (lawyer, chief of staff), Carolina Brognaro P. ing. The government was then pressured to do its job and notify the supermarket and the engineers on the disrespect of the municipal rules and postures.

This case partially shows the "crisis" of the rule of law. Meant to be universally valid and applied to all, rules often have a selective application, in which social conditions have a definite weight: economic, social, political differences account for the different ways of applying the law. It ignores the fact that the State law enforcement organs are influenced by these differences and that their interpretation and application do not work in the same way. Thus practice makes fragile the theoretical presuppositions of the nineteenth century theory of law.

It was especially in the nineteenth century that statutory law became the main kind of social control. Both the constitutionalism movement that brought the model of written Constitutions and the codification movement helped to create an idea that Law reduced itself to statutory law, to those mandates produced by the Legislative Power by the means of preordered procedures. The very idea of law order, of systematization and unity of the system are based on a series of social and political presuppositions that structure themselves into the general notion of Rule of Law.

The Rule of Law presupposes that statutory law is the main source of Law because there is transparency in the relationship between citizen and legislator. Thus, an effective model of Rule of Law cannot work unless there is a correspondent democratic system with communication procedures that guarantee the relationship legislator and legislated. In such a system the legislator is la bouche de la loi, but additionally it is la bouche du peuple, that condensates the "general will". Another presupposition of the legalist model is that the message written into the statute is accessible to all. It raises a pretention of universality, abstraction and generality. Accessibility is to be understood in two ways: first, as if all have access to the text, everybody knows it has been promulgated and it is valid. Second, accessibility is the understanding of the content of law, as if all had the comprehension of the senses of the text, they are able to read its message and understand what expectations it creates.

The third legalist presupposition is that the pretention of universality, generality and abstraction of statutory law creates a pattern for social relationships, in a way that all will be expected to act and to be affected in the same way and in the same level by the text. It is thought that law is equal to all, and it is this factor that turns it just and capable of overcoming concrete inequalities, which are understood as contin-gent elements in face of the stability of the text. Finally, we would like to remember the legalist presupposition that dictates that statutory law is the main social control because the State is the unique source of social conflict resolution. Thus, the model of the Law current in the nineteenth century is profoundly connected to the model of the Nation State since one concept gives theoretical and factual support to the other to such an extent that they become inseparable.

The sum of all these presuppositions form Modern Law in a way that the text and the formal procedures are transformed into a fetish that replaces phronesis so much used by Ancient and Medieval Law. The criticism of this model is generally released and accepted nowadays and finds two general problems connected to the presuppositions exposed above. The dynamics of the application of the texts of law have a hermeneutical character. Therefore, the meaning of texts cannot be fixated looking only at text itself. On the contrary, the meaning demands that the interpreter uses certain instruments that permit him to incorporate these dynamics. The dynamics of application also has a practical sense since it is directed to the resolution of real conflicts from the day-to-day experiences of real people who do not necessarily follow formal logic. These demands from the interpreter phronesis, that is, the use of practical reason related to the experiences of present conflicts and shared values of the community that may serve as a guide for the overcoming of conflict. Second of all, the presuppositions of the legalist paradigm conceal the political consequences of the choices that are justified by a formal logic accepted by specialized and technical discourses. It also fails to accept the stand point of the non-technical social and political conflict, that makes evident the discriminations, the differences and the distance between members of the community and its technical and legal corporations.

We believe that behind the unequal treatment given to the poor community of São Bento Vila and the rich companies involved in the supermarket building one may find a legalist comprehension of Law, a dogmatizing reading of statutory law, and a comprehension of private property that the legal system itself has long overcome, but that continues to operate in the imagination of law enforcers in a way that it becomes an unquestionable truth.

The difficulties to mediate these parties also demonstrate the ignorance of normative pluralism in society. The engineers of the powerful firm that builds the supermarket deny the legitimacy of the community association and the community leaders, as if they were not parties.

The City Hall acts the same way, it denies the legitimacy of the community leaders in this conflict because it argues that it cannot negotiate with whom is in illegal situation. On the other hand, in other circumstances, for instance, when it has to apply public policy against poverty, financed by Federal Government, the City Hall takes initiative to find and hear these same leaders, in order to receive financial resources from taxation.

Function and limits of statutory law and new social actors

Maria Francisca, a divorcée, mother of a 12 year old girl, a cleaning person, lives in the Serra Agglomerate. Francisca approached the Mediation Center[4] in may 2005. She was seeking legal counseling about her labor rights. Arriving in the Center she understood it was a free space of questioning and discussion, so she ended up exposing a conflict with her neighbor. He had built a stairway right beside the window of her house, which took all of her privacy. She was clearly bothered, but she would not say anything to the neighbor because she depended on him to get water. As this conversation went on, the mediators understood that all the people living in the Maestro Alley where Francisca lived had the same problem. They had to depend on one another for water, only a few had installed and functioning water system, some even had to get water from wells distant from the houses. This was not an isolated problem but a collective demand that had to be taken to the water company in order to be solved.

The mediators suggested that Francisca promote a mobilization of the Maestro Alley residents in order to find a collective solution and that the Mediation Center would help to get a meeting with the water company. She accepted to help but she did not show much enthusiasm or hope with the suggestion received. The mediators visit the Maestro Alley, Francisca introduced them to the residents and a diagnosis of the problem was made along with the collection of information. The residents had many complaints, such as, water bills charged with abusive values because of leaks and water connections that served more than one residence, many neighbors that had to share water, the need to get water from distant places, among others. It was clear that the residents of Maestro Alley were, as it is common in many Agglomerates, forgotten by the public policy.

The mediators went to the water company, explained the problem and heard the technicians who explained the difficulties involved in the solution of the case. The mediators insisted on a meeting with the alley residents in order to inform them and give them a chance to find solutions. The mediators formalized their need for a meeting. While they waited for the water company to schedule it, several assemblies were promoted with the alley residents in order to make a mobilization that could take a significant general and collective character. The residents started to collect signatures and visit one another to talk about the importance of being motivated and participant in order to conquer the right to treated water for all.

The day of the meeting arrived and surprised all. More than twenty-five people crowed in the Center' small room together with the water company representatives. They brought more than one hundred signatures that were handed in at the end of the night. At the beginning, the water company representatives explained the problems and difficulties concerning the regularization of the problems exposed. The alley residents heard courteously. The exposition ended with the water company saying that the solution would take long to come. At this point Maria Francisca stood up, loud and clear, and argued that she would not wait any longer, she had already waited for years and that she would mobilize all people in the alley to make a parade in front of the water company, that she would take cooking pots to make noise and would also call the press. She also said: "I am not asking for any favor, I am demanding a right". These were the exact words of a hopeless cleaning lady who first approached the Center with her head down. Francisca's intervention stimulated others to talk and all of them demanded a quick solution. The water company representatives promised to visit the alley first thing in the morning. Two weeks after the mediation, the new hydrometers were installed; it was not long before the water started flowing regularly.

Inclusion / exclusion[5]; recognition[6], citizenship[7] are concepts that can only be understood within a historical process of struggle, in which the ambivalent social positions are taken in one or in the other side. The example above shows how a unmotivated, hopeless person, who has suffered discrimination and has been ignored by the public policy becomes an active social actor, who is willing to unite with others for a cause and confront a powerful company and demand from the government the enforcement of law with equal standard for all.

[5] (Habermas, Jürgen)

[7] (Santos, Boaventura de Sousa)

Law evolves in this historical process. On the one hand, one has the impression that law is static, as the text seems to show; on the other hand, the recognition of new social actors within social conflict bring new arguments and new perspectives to the text, which shows that it is, in fact, dynamic.

This dynamism may open to injustice, since the text may be interpreted in a different manner for different people, using economic, political and social conditions as a way for discrimination. Nonetheless, it also permits that these social actors claim isonomic treatment, or a differentiation that takes into account the social differences in a way that it promotes equality.

To overcome the legalist paradigm of Law – to which this dynamism is invisible – one needs to start by turning explicit the political character of Law and to analyze its impact in practice, in interpretation and in application. This makes easier the diagnosis of the problems generated by the 'crisis of modern Law' and points to possibilities to revise the methods of Jurisprudence towards a new paradigm. 'Polos de Cidadania' Program searches the virtuous circle constructed by the practical experiences of the field actions and the revision of theories by the means of research. This is the basis of the action research methodology developed by the program.

In general lines, the action research developed by Polos Program follows these guidelines. A diagnosis is done, that maps the discursive and non violent forms of conflict resolution used in a given socially vulnerable community or group. Even in socially vulnerable situations it is possible to find legitimate community leaders, associations, sociability groups, mobilization for a common cause, among others. Sao Bento Vila is an example of this since, as it has been mentioned, it is the poorest community within the Agglomerate and despite of this it mobilizes its population for the protection of a right and search for a pacific conflict resolution through the Mediation Center. The example of the Maestro Alley case shows how these leaders can appear spontaneously and the demands of the community are closely related to day-to-day situations and needs in contrast to abstract revolutionary causes. A non-institutionalized discursive space brought to light a demand that was not initially the reason to visit the Mediation Center. In an official legal space such demand would probably not appear or would appear as an individual and isolated problem.

After the identification of these discursive forms, the Program promotes their recognition in different levels: an internal level of the members of the group that legitimate the actions of the group and place their trust in collective organization. There is an external level of these groups and communities with their partners, which can be similar groups, university and its programs, right forums and organized civil society. Additionally, in the external level one needs the recognition of the public powers and of society in general, which includes the economic power. In São Bento Vila the Mediation Center made a concentrated effort to promote and help turn real the recognition in these various levels. There were common obstacles in order to get people to participate in the meetings with the City Hall or the engineers and to have a unique discourse that was also directed towards the different interests that were exposed in the association's meetings. It is also a challenge to get the engineers of a private corporation to recognize those people of the Vila as citizens with an important, legal and legitimate cause. In the Maestro Alley case it is possible to see how the mediation and the recognition of people and their demands by the public powers can redirect their actions towards more effective solutions. In this case the self-recognition was especially important, considering that Maria Francisca is not a "typical" community leader but a person that considers herself as a "normal citizen who is not involved in politics". In an interview made afterwards, when asked about the reasons why they had succeeded, Francisca replied: "I am a fighter, I fight for the things I want!"

Polos Program diagnose the violence, the counter spaces to the discursive forms of conflict resolution in order not to idealize the non-official forms of conflict resolution as if they were a solution to all social problems. Conflicts such as the one brought out in the São Bento Vila provide great mobilization of the community and leadership and opinion and interest contrast are evidenced. It is fairly common that in communitarian meetings the community leaders reproduce non-discursive and authoritarian forms. During the debates that lead to the mobilization and mediation with the engineer company there were "spiritual guides", "nation saviors", individualistic and egoistic people who intended to negotiate "off the line".

The outcome of the mediation case in Vila Sao Bento has brought unexpected results. Not only has the engineering company been oblige to change the rain water system, but the mobilization of the Vila started a massive mobilization of the Agglomerate to discuss the urbanization policy that the government planed without dialogue or participation. This is a long and fascinating case that will be told in other papers. The families who lost their houses have not received any compensation for it. They are now in a judicial process against the companies. Nonetheless, we hope this to be a citizenship learning process. Such a conflict can burst a line of self-reflection and of dialogue between public powers, private entities, university and the vulnerable community about the role, the responsibilities and the rights of each one.

The Maestro Alley conflict is a success case, which makes impossible to describe the happiness of the mediation team who, above all, had unexpectedly created compromises and trust laces with the Alley community. Thanks to their emancipatory movement the solution to a long-term problem had been found. They had tried to solve the problem in individual ways, but a well articulated collective action was enough to achieve results. Additionally one of the best results of the Maestro Alley case is the emancipation of a cleaning lady who did not come from a technical juridical discourse. She used the law to legitimate her political demands originated in a real day-to-day conflict. She succeeded in capturing and internalizing the importance of social mobilization for the conquest of rights, which provided the Polos Program with the fortune of having such an emblematic case. The mediation reached positive results, the water problem was solved and by a domino effect many other neighbor problems. This case gave us a better comprehension of the relations between public power and people in vulnerable situations and of strategies and possibilities of collective mobilization.

Conclusion

Even though the cases do not ever come to an end: poverty and social exclusion are a reality of Brazilian favelas, and similar cases appear constantly, some final considerations on the general question are possible. What is the role and what are the limits of Law as statutory law? The enunciation of a crisis does not mean that we ignore the functional gain obtained with the formation of written Law. Statutory law continues to have an important function in legal dynamics, but it is not the one attributed to it by Jurisprudence in the XIX and XX centuries. A more definite answer to this question would need extensive research much more than what is possible in the limits of this work. For now we simply put into perspective some possibilities given to the functions of statutory law in a new paradigm of Law.

Statutory law can work as the concretization of the form of a principle of "due process". It allows the institutionalization of some social relationship that benefit from its form. It is clear to us that statutory law does not include all social relationships possible. This is why we can speak of legal pluralism, as many social relationships are regulated by legal norms and principles that have not been become explicit in text. On the other hand, the formalization of the statutory texts allows the stabilization of behaviors, gives element for the vindication of rights, and establishes criteria for the debate of rights and the attribution of duties. Thus, statutory law allows organizing the processes of attribution of rights and duties and is a starting point to this debate.

In this path, statutory law has the function of being a minimal value basis that allows directive principles to be introduced in the debate on the attribution of rights and duties. Statutory law gives the format and the procedure that allows to regulate how this debate will occur and to establish a minimal content, open to interpretation, that qualifies the arguments of parties in accordance to a fundamental rights logic. Thus, in the debate on the attribution of rights and duties, each of the parties must prove through arguments that her interest is justifiable in the light of a principle and fundamental rights Law. This is, in our point of view, the main function of the written Constitution.

The other role we attribute to the written Constitution if that of a symbolic authority, a role that was opened as the figure of the medieval kings disappeared. Therefore, the written Constitution would be more than a legal text as the others. In it are written the paths of a political community that thinks itself as a principle and fundamental rights community. The Constitution depersonalizes authority and neutralizes the relations of favoritism and hierarchy. The text does not have enough symbolic power to operate by itself as the unifier of principles; but, taken as a collective production of a community that thinks and rethinks itself, it is able to elevate itself to the degree of maximal authority that guarantees aperture to this process. The written Constitution is a warrant that works more as it allows people to solve their conflicts discursively, taking the text as a directive argument. The difference between a written Constitution and a medieval king is that the latter is not a person that has to be pleased or feared. It is in a neutral position that can be taken by all, as it does not belong to anyone.

This path is precarious and highly risky and it does not diminish the possibilities of the abuse of rights. It is possible to use a constitutional and principle discourse to defend and justify the violation of rights. This is a risk inherent to the dialogical process and to pluralism. Because it is inherent, the risk can be administered but not eliminated. We count on the fact that the same risk that allows an "embezzlement" of the Constitution is the same that allows us to admit that it is constructed in an open process to new subjects and to new conflicts. They can also use the principles in their favor, to construct a free, just and solidarity society. We can admit with Habermas and Dworkin, that this is a process that corrects itself and makes the constitutionally correct answer prevail.

On the dubious position taken by the City Hall, one last note is important. One of the arguments used by the community leaders of Vila Sao Bento an of other Vilas and Slums that are confronted by the compulsory eviction of City Hall is to work this dubiousness in their favor. Thus, if City Hall arguments that these land possessions are illegal and that it is imperative to evict them without any compensation, then why does the same City Hall promote improvements, offers public services and even, in some occasions, charge taxes? The community in slums are included and excluded. This ambivalent position opens to paths and struggle for recognition.

Labour Law and its essential nature within the capitalist scene of the 21st Century[1]

Érica Fernandes Teixeira[2]

Abstract: Labour Law is the main instrument for the insertion of the citizen in any capitalist society. Starting from the fundamental value of work for every citizen, we can say that there are several roles played by an employment relationship, in relation to the citizen's individual and family life. Thus, through a formal relationship of employment, regulated by Labour Law, the labour law branch has largely contributed to the materialisation of human dignity. This allows human beings to get affirmation in the broadest content, whether in the personal, social, economic or even family aspect. The exaltation of dignified work is one of the most effective ways of making Democracy more effective in contemporary societies. Labour Law is a pioneer branch with a social judicial base, of interventionist nature, generating interests of a social ilk. Even though Brazil has not experienced the real experience of the Welfare State, the supremacy of work and employment has been incorporated into the judicial culture, particularly after the enactment of the Federal Constitution of 1988, becoming one of the most significant democratic conquests in the Western capitalist world.

ployment, which is regulated by Labour Law, is indeed an essential instrument of social insertion. Through this relationship, the citizen actually becomes a player in the democratic system, and gets integrated with the capitalist system, making feasible the necessary social justice and also the distribution of wealth.

Like with any judicial phenomenon, the labour law branch also seeks an essential purpose. Having been implemented through the activities of the working classes in the 19th Century, as a reaction to extreme and uncontrolled exploitation of human labour, Labour Law has, in this direction of purpose and greater value, its basic fundamentals for its establishment and perpetuation. Indeed, the very functions of this branch of the legal profession also mirror its strong social character, mainly in the regulation of the relationship of employment, which is the main type of relation which binds the citizen to the capitalist system. For this reason, it can be said that Labour Law is the most efficient instrument for carrying out the principle of Dignity of the Human Being, which is established in item III to Article 1 of the Brazilian Constitution, thus being one dimension within Human Rights.[1]

As Delgado teaches us[2], the main function of the Labour Law branch of the legal profession is that of "improving the working conditions borne by the work force in the socioeconomic order". Delgado also states that "this decisive responsibility of the labour law division, in fact, carries out a basic intention of democracy and also the demercantilisation of the workforce within the capitalist social and economic system restricting the free rein of market forces, exercising control over supply and the management of human labour"[3]. In addition, through this same process of demercantilisation of human labour, Labour Law ennobles and benefits work, with rules that are different from the simple rules dictated by the market, always seeking to reduce the intensity of the conflict between capital and labour.

This is the function that can best be confirmed over more than 150 years of development. Even though, particularly in Brazil, we have been through a scenario of crisis and also resistance to the affirmation of this branch of the legal profession during the 1990s, Labour Law has already overcome this phase and has consistently entered a process of strengthening and expansion, right from the first decade of the 21st Century.

Throughout the 1990s, the spreading of chains of greater precariousness of labour and low prestige given to the protection of Labour Law, led to a high rate of concentration of income.[4]

Official data of the Brazilian Ministry for Labour and Jobs (MTE) show a rise in the number of formal employees as from 2001, when a total of 23 million citizens worked formally. In the period between 2003 and 2020, RAIS data suggest a generation of 15.384 million formal jobs. In 2010 alone, there was the creation of 2.590 new contracts of employment following the Brazilian Consolidated Labour Laws (CLT) and 270.4 thousand statutory workers, which led to an increase in the participation of CLT jobs in the total formal employment, from 79.84% to 80.53% (and hence a reduction in the participation of statutory employment, from 20.16% to 19.47%).

This is a total that is as yet unprecedented in the history of formal employment over a period of eight successive years, which undoubtedly shows the increase in the value of work and also the greater value given to a regulated relationship of employment in our country. Over this period, the average growth in the GDP was 4.32% which reflects a highly favourable formal employment/product ratio.

This favourable performance is also due to some other economic factors, including the strengthening of internal demand by the real rise in the salary mass by 8.2%; expansion in the volume of credit given by

[4] According to official data of the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics (IBGE), mentioned by Delgado "general income increased in Brazil in the 1990s but, together with the rise in income, there is a growing distance in salary terms between the richest 10% and the poorest 40%. In 1992, the difference between the top and the base of the national income pyramid was aboht thirteen national minimum wages. By 1999, this figure had increased to about seventeen. These figures were obtained by the study Synthesis of Social Indicators 2000, which was disclosed yesterday by the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics" (Gazeta Mercantil, São Paulo, 05/04/2001, p. A-10 – Income grows, but inequality remains.) The same research study also shows thet the number of people in formal employment (with a signed work card) has practically not grown throughout the 1990s, having increased from 19.2 million to 19.6 million workers. At that time, Brazil was in 74th position in the world, in he ranking of the Human Development Index (HDI) of the United Nations, PNUD (Monitor Mercantil, Rio de Janeiro, 05/04/2001, page 08). the financial system with free funding for individual people, of 17.6% in nominal terms; and also a rise in investments of 21.8% - the highest accumulated rate in four quarters, ever since the series started in 1986. This positive result in terms of GDP surely affected the situation of formal employment, which recorded a generation of 2.861 million jobs, the highest figure in the RAIS historical series, giving a growth rate of some 6.94%.[5]

Graph 1: Variation of generation of jobs, from 2003 to 2010, in Brazil.[6] Source: RAIS/MTE

According to statistical data from the Brazilian Ministry of Labour and Jobs, in 2010 we counted some 66.3 million Brazilians who were formally employed. In 2011, it is expected that the figure shall edge up to 70 million. Preliminary results from the questionnaire of the Sample of the Demographic Census of 2010, disclosed by the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics (IBGE) on 16/11/11,[7]the percentage of employees with formal employment grew substantially in all the regions of the country, rising from 54.4% in 2000 to 65.2% in 2010. of the "minimum civilisatory threshold"[8]implemented by this branch of the legal profession, we highlight the fact that, as informed by the Brazilian Ministry for Labour and Jobs (MTE), the result for 2011 – which observed a rise in the number of job openings in Brazil – was the third best in the series of the Brazilian Register of Employed and Unwaged People (Caged) between 2003 and 2011 (here we stress the fact that, this being a register aimed exclusively at companies, this register does not include those workers who have been hired by individuals, as domestic workers)[9].

All this data shows the full compatibility of economic growth of the country, with the growing application of Labour Law. Once the crisis phase of this key area of the legal profession has been overcome and after the democratic transition in our country, the number of job openings based on the Brazilian Consolidated Labour Laws (CLT) has increased considerably, which shows and confirms that Labour Law is indeed essential in the promotion of social justice.

Being the main instrument for the insertion of the citizen in any capitalist society, the relationship of formal employment as regulated by Labour Law is directly related to human dignity. It is through it that the human being obtains self-affirmation in the broadest sense, whether in the personal, social, economic or family sphere. For these reasons the greater value of dignified work in the main Western capitalist economies has established itself as one of the pillars of social democracy in the contemporary world[10]. There shall be no human dignity that can survive in places where Labour Law is not minimally assured (mainly through the guarantee of fundamental rights of absolute unavailability).[11]

2. Development of Labour Law and social inclusion

The historical approach is an important instrument to check the progress of the developmental process that has been experienced by Labour Law, as also by Pension Law. Considering that both branches of law have essentially social functions, it is necessary to stress the main social and economic events that have legal repercussions throughout history, and the respective relationships with the promotion of citizenship and social inclusion.

According to the doctrine of NORBERTO BOBBIO:

> "the rights of the human being, however basic they may be, are historical rights, which means they are born out of certain circumstances, characterised by a struggle in defence of new freedoms against old powers, and born gradually, not all at once or once and for all".[13]

Through an analysis of the process of formation and consolidation of Labour Law, experienced by the countries of central capitalism, it is possible to paint a picture of the advances and setbacks of the social justice indices and, hence, of labour inclusion.

According to best doctrine[14] the phase of establishmentof Labour Law started in 1802, with the implementation of some restrictions on the employment of minors through the English document known as*Peel's Act*. This phase is characterised by laws that are still somewhat dispersive and in early stages, seeking only to stem the abusive and brutal exploitation of child and women's labour.

This period for systematisation of this branch of law is strongly marked by growing recognition of the right to free trade union association of the workers, through normative instruments in many European countries. It is also important to note the increase in the creation of labour laws and the development of collective agreements, both in more democratic countries such as France, as also in countries with authoritarian experience like Germany. Maurício Godinho Delgado, quoting Evaristo de Moraes Filho[15], highlights that the Berlin Conference was an important material source for the establishment of Labour Law in the world. This because it was the first formal recognition, by European countries, of the need to regulate the labour market, through edition of different labour standards, in line with the reality of each country.

With the end of the First World War in 1919, there is the start of the phase of formalisation and independence of Labour Law, obtaining effective citizenship in countries with a central economy. There is the creation of the ILO (1919); the constitutionalisation of Labour Law (Mexican Constitution of 1917 and the Weimar Republic in 1919), as well as the enactment of a considerable framework of labour law, as a reply to the harmonisation between the group action of the workers and the dynamics of the state. After the Second World War, the advancement of labour constitutionalism and the hegemony of the*Welfare State* marked the peak of this phase of institutionalisation of Labour Law.

The release of the Communist Manifesto by Marx and Engels in 1848, like Chartism in England and the French Revolution, have had a decisive effect on the phase of intensification of the development of this branch of the legal profession. This is the first moment in the history of the world when there was considerable action on the part of the workers against the institutional order that was current at the time, and more precisely against the entrepreneurial classes.

According to Geovani de Oliveira Tavares:

> "In the French Revolution, the Right to Resistance showed itself with greater efficiency in the defence of the idea of freedom. Backed by the Enlightenment and liberalism on the rise, the French justified their violent resistance to the order established, in the name of freedom, their greatest principle. Thus, freedom would represent > a Fundamental Right of the human being, above any law intending to harm this principle."[16]

The assumption of social rights as being essential, by the judicial order, is crucial to the Democratic State of Right, representing ambitions which had been sought ever since the French Revolution, but not made positive. The action of the State started to become more significant in working towards intervention, through the issuance of heteronomous regulations binding on all citizens, making up the model of private subordinate regulation.[17]

What is certain is that, even with awareness-building and the constitutionalisation of social rights, these first went through an implementation crisis, due to the discretionary action of Government administrators, whose interests insisted on upholding the interests of the bourgeoisie. As Bonavides points out, such rights were referred to the programmatic sphere, in the light of lack of procedural instruments that could implement the rights to freedom, thus passing through a crisis of non-observance and execution. (BONAVIDES, Paulo. Curso de Direito Constitucional.[Course in Constitutional Law] 11th edition. São Paulo: Malheiros. 2001. page518).

The lack of effectiveness of social constitutionalism generated much social unrest at the time, and this was worsened by the inconstancies of the capitalist system. This all played a part in getting the capitalist world to experience one of the most devastating crises in history from 1929 to 1933, causing significant social decline in many countries, with rising unemployment and poverty, together with the destructuring of the productive and the business system.

Since then, Labour Law has incorporated this direction of social purpose in a different way from other branches of the legal profession, with the scope being the search for social justice. This branch of the legal profession started to reorganise the fundamentals that were informed by the liberal system in effect, imposing a new path based on the principle of equality, basically seeking to soothe the imbalance which was inherent to the parts that agree on the contract of employment. The democratic constitutions of France, Italy, Germany, Portugal and Spain, after the Second World War, incorporated not only labour standards as also rules to value human work, and principles as protection, such as the Dignity of the Human Being and Social Justice.

With the end of the Second World War, there was the establishment of a consistent level of rights and guarantees given to the worker. The golden period was marked by a pact in which the state ensured social gains and security for the worker who, in turn, took on a commitment not to get involved in revolutionary movements.[18]What happened in fact was "an implicit or explicit consensus between employers and labour organisations, to keep workers' requests within limits that have no effect on profits."[19]

David Harvey describes this period which "was based on a set of practices for control of labour, technologies, consumption habits, and configurations of political and economic power, and that this package could, within reason, be considered as Fordist-Keynesian."[20]

Within the model of minimum state, the companies started to take up a style of management focused on cost reduction and increase in profits, structuring the Toyotist model of production, in a battle for a market which has become more and more competitive.

At the end of the 20th Century, in 1979 and 1980, developed Western countries have gone through a phase of crisis and transition of Labour Law. A set of factors mentioned by Maurício Godinho Delgado[21]could be confirmed at that time. These include the economic crisis which started in 1973 and 1974, known as the oil crisis, that was not duly tackled by the political forces of the time, worsened by the increase in Government debt, due to increases in interest rates, and low collection of taxes by the State. There was a significant effect on the economic system, thereby increasing inflation, competition between companies, and the rates of unemployment, generated by the intense unemployment which was, in turn, generated by the intense technological progress, which implemented robotisation of the production processes and also significant advances in the means of communication. Prestige was gained by the restructuring of business models forecasting the decentralisation of the production process (outsourcing) and new forma of work provision (teleworking and home office), which seemed not to have been affected by Labour Law. For this reason, even the imminent constitution of a workless society was considered[22]. The model based on the greater value given to work and employment, with the creation of wide social and assistential policies, through strong intervention by the state, seems to have become unfeasible during that phase experienced by capitalism.

In this scenario where little prestige was given to Labour Law, the inauguration of the terms of office of Margaret Thatcher in 1979, Ronald Reagan in 1980, and Helmut Kohl in 1982 all had significant influences on the promotion of deregulation of the welfare state, sustaining individualist Government strategies, averse to social intervention. The affirmation that until then had been achieved by Labour Law, as the most effective instrument for the implementation of social policies that arose during capitalism started to be attacked as from the end of the 20th Century, rather than deregulation, in a process with growing flexibility. This new strategy of political and social management gained momentum, mainly as a result of there not being a consistent counterpoint which could redirect economic growth and social justice. Thus, it became no longer advantageous for sustaining the capitalist model and investment in Government policies and strong intervention in the economy, thus establishing the crisis of the welfare state.

The strong deregulation and lower degree of formality of the labour market, especially in countries on the periphery of central capitalism, was undeniable. Even so,

> "... it also seems clear that there is a historical need of a judicial segment with the essential characteristics of Labour Law. It seems unquestionable, in short, that the presence of an unequal system for creation, circulation and appropriation of assets and wealth, through a social medium based on the economic distinction between their components (like capitalism) but which coexist with individuals' formal freedom and also the judicial and cultural recognition that there is a minimum threshold for coexistence in social reality (aspects made more significant with Democracy), and cannot disregard a judicial system that is so ingrained within the core of social relations, such as Labour Law."[23]

The convergence of different factors that encourage the greater precariousness of Labour Law led to an increase in social exclusion, bringing serious consequences related to human dignity. The concentration of income and the lack of prestige of the imperative control by Labour Law are one of the most efficient ways of promoting a perverse social crisis, thus placing greater and greater obstacles to economic, social, political and cultural development, as also the effectuation of Human Rights.

Jeremy Rifkin, quoted by Nascimento, says that the crisis as here described

> "...showed the cruel side, the replacement of software employees, through data that show an ever-declining need for many employees, and the inversely proportional growth in productivity of the companies, with the use of high technology rather than detached workers, to the point where it can be said that, at present, for the first time, human work is being systematically eliminated from the production process to be replaced by intelligent machines, in carrying out several tasks in a range of sectors, including agriculture, industrial activity and commerce."24

However, what actually led to the rupture and decline of Labour Law was shown in a transition phase, going towards a renewed Labour Law.[25]

In a comparative analysis, comparing with the progress of Labour Law in the world, Maurício Godinho Delgado highlights the fact that in Brazil there was no period of systematisation of this activity, where there would be the maturity of its institutions and consolidation of structures. Due to the strong authoritarian action, in our country there was "a closed model, centralised and compact, also characterised by the incomparable capacity of resistance and duration throughout time."[26]

With the exception of Pension Law, which separated from the corporate trade union structure in the 1960s (with the extinction of the Retirement and Pension Institutes of the professional categories, and creation of one single pension institute, which at that time was the INPS), Delgado says there were no significant changes in the Brazilian model of labour law, not even in the democratic phase (1945-1964), or the military regime which took power in 1964. This period saw the enactment of important labour laws, such as Law 605/49, which sets rules for the concession of a weekly paid rest day and paid holidays; Law 4,090/62, on the special Christmas bonus (thirteenth salary); and Law 4,266/63, which created the family wage.

Also as from 1964, under the military regime, in the search for strict economic development of the country, detached from social destination, there was the implementation of ideas of flexibility and outsourcing, already sustaining significant development in Europe and in the United States of America. In this regard, many laws were passed within this scenario, including Law 5,107/66 which set up the FGTS system, thereby scrapping ten-year stability; Law 6,019/74, which created the figure of the temporary worker, restricting labour rights; and Law 6,709/79, which addressed the twice-yearly salary readjustment.

The phase of overcoming the corporatist model and the democratic institution in the country with the 1988 Federal Constitution, associated to consistent attempts at radical destructuring of the whole specialised legal profession through influent liberalist ideologies, common in the world since 1970, mark the crisis and the transition of Labour Law.

However, here it is important to point out the democratic advances implemented by the Brazilian Constitution of 1988. Here we could mention the scrapping of State intervention on trade union institutions, and also the recognition and encouragement of the fundamental group process of creation of autonomous rules. Thus, state interventionism admits and calls to widespread participation of society in the drawing up of labour rules, so as to generate rules that truly bring out the desires of citizens. However, collective agreements do not prevail over rights to absolute unavailability, which are part of the Minimum Civilisatory Threshold[27], that are essential rights form the effective implementation of the dignity of the human being and assignment of greater value to

3. Opposition to generalisation of Labour Law in Brazil and impasses within social inclusion

Standing out from the European standard of development and generalisation of Labour Law, in Brazil one can see a scenario of social exclusion largely caused by strong resistance to the implementation of their institutes at several different moments throughout history. In the words of Maurício Godinho Delgado:

> "In truth, it seems clear that the decisive secret behind the impressive level of social exclusion in this country lies in the fact that capitalist development here, throughout the 20th Century, took place without a compatible generalisation of Labour Law in the Brazilian society and economy – which did not allow the establishment of an efficient, comprehensive and agile mechanism for distribution of wealth and power within a social and economic context."[28]

The justification for this situation of lack of prestige and opposition to the expansion of Labour Law is surely found in the results necessarily promoted by the generalisation of this branch, based on high levels of citizenship and social justice. The point is that in Brazil the authoritarian tradition of their Government policies has always shown clear resistance to the promotion of distribution of wealth and power to all citizens.

So Labour Law became systematic, which is an important counterpoint to the traditional preceding trend of total social exclusion. However, it cannot be said that this is a style of management based on the full generalisation of this branch of law. However, we can indeed say that this was highly limited progress.[29] This, due to the high number of Brazil-

[29] As Delgado points out in his work, "Article 7 of the Brazilian Consolidated Labour Laws (CLT), as is well known, carefully established that its terms did normally not apply to rural workers. This exclusion also applied to domestic workers." (DELGADO, Maurício Godinho.Capitalismo, trabalho e emprego: entre o paradigma da destruição e os caminhos da reconstrução. [Capitalism, work and employment: between the paradigm of ian workers that this protection has not reached, and, as is clearly shown by Maurício Godinho Delgado "about 70% of Brazilian workers would be left out of the modernising and progressive effects of Labour Law, as the urban development rate of the country in the 1930s and 1940s was only about 30%."[3031]The Statute of the Rural Worker, approved in the Government of João Goulartby Law 4214/63 sought to strengthen the actions of the trade unions at companies and hence this would improve the living and working conditions of the labourers. However, this law never had concrete effects, due to the toppling of the democratic regime, with the military regime's rise to power in 1964.

Thus:

> "the State would show that it has no more interest in the quest for generalisation of Labour Law for the economy and the society as a whole. As a result, the state did not even equip itself with the institutional instruments that are necessary to efficiently perform a similar process of generalisation."[32]

Here, it is essential to exploit the teachings of Paulo Bonavides about the constitutions that have been effective in our country between 1824 and 1969:

> "The crisis is not, therefore, the crisis of a Constitution, but the crisis of the constituent power: a power that whenever it reorganises or enacts a Constitution shows itself, in this act, to be impotent to [31] Delgado also informs, in this passage, that the 1940 Census, "the first to divide the Brazilian population into rural and urban, notes the fact that 31.1% of the inhabitants of Brazil lived in cities". > stamp out the root of the social and political ills that affect the State, the regime, the institutions and society as a whole. This constituent crisis has been, ever since the origin of the Brazilian state, the crisis which has not yet been solved."[33]

One must conclude that, even marked by strongly authoritarian texts through to the end of the military regime, the Brazilian constitutions have also been important in bringing about a group conscience about the lack of implementation of its rules in the face of the tough national reality, which has had a repercussion in the eruption of social movements in the 1980s (20th Century).

Neoliberalism has arisen and spread as a quick formula to overcome the crisis and also for state action to satisfy social needs. Maurício Godinho Delgado says that the hegemony of neoliberal thought has developed through > "...the formatting and generalisation of ultraliberal thought, seeking to become the only valid form of economic thought, allegedly without consistent competitors, in relation to the explanation and management of the contemporary economy and society."[34]

In addition, the process of construction of the liberal hegemony also had the fragmentation of part of critical thinking in relation to capitalism, or at least uncontrolled capitalism, which the author states as being "without reciprocity". The original texts, including some Marxist documents that had an important role in the criticism of capitalism in its unobstructed form, started to be part of explicative proposals of neoliberalism, unveiling the idea of a new paradigm in social and economic life, whose bases were not based on employment or jobs. This retreat shown by critical thinking, according to the author, showed a concession to the idea of the end of the priority given to work and jobs, alleging that these had lost their importance within the dynamics of capitalism and also taking in the arguments of the technological innovations of the Third Industrial Revolution, of post-Fordian productive reorganisation and also the globalisation of the markets.[35]

The neoliberal line within a Minimum State along the traditional lines of laissez-faire was the strategy found to eliminate all barriers blocking limitation of profits, enforced by the interventionism which was characteristic of the Welfare State. The new liberal thought sustained the importance of the private economic market in the structuring and operation of the economy and of society, with the submission of the State and of Government policies to this prevalence. Thus, the north of Government action was aimed at the monetary management of the economy and of society, as also for the creation of conditions more and more favourable to private investments.[36]

The reduction of State intervention started to be implemented through the creation of policies with a maximum deregulation of different economic activities in the quest for more favourable investments and also for programmes for the privatisation of state companies. Maurício Godinho Delgado highlights that this process was an incessant search for > "...new paths for normative deregulation, so as to reduce the former empire of judicial regulations – as the synthesis of a certain general desire – controlling the movements of private economic agents."[37]

Apart from the hegemony of "neoliberalism" and the control exercised by key States that lead neoliberal policies, Maurício Godinho Delgado also highlights another requirement that has made globalisation feasible in the way this has presented itself:

> "The third requirement, essentially political and cultural, can be di> vided into internal and external dimensions. In the external plane, this is the absence, when making international comparisons, of any consistent social and political experience which would be an antithesis or at least an effective counterpoint against the ultraliberal ideological formula – which Hobsbawm calls "a political threat worthy of credit to the system." With the dismantling of the Soviet Union, there is the disappearance of the strongest counterpoint to capitalism in the 20th Century. Internally (even though Hobsbawm essentially concentrates on the international side of the problem), the lack of this effective counterpoint is configured through the weakening of the different projects for popular hegemony in the West (socialists, social-democrats, Labour Parties etc) with the loss of political and programmatic consistency of certain parties somehow related to these projects. To this, we add the weakening of the trade union movement over the last decades (even though this is a phenomenon resulting from factors that are not always common, according to the distinct national historical experiences)."[38]

The so-called "internalisation dependent on ultraliberalism"[39] took place with the officialisation of one same standard economic thought in several countries in the world, including Brazil, with the universalisation of economic policies and practices, in favour of the globalising success of the market. For this, it has been necessary to take away the national obstacles blocking the idea of a world policy, as well as other adjustments as necessary, such as the deregulation of the labour market. This all without a real analysis of the effective gains for the citizens involved.

The absorption of ultraliberal thought was sealed by Brazil in 1982, in the last administration within the military regime. At this time there was the signing of the first of several commitments between Government policies and the IMF, suggesting a path without any commitment to social rights, to be trailed by Brazil in the following years. The end of the authoritarian regime in Brazil in 1985 with the implementation of the New Republic (1985-1987) and the political and institutional transition between 1987 and 1988 ended up braking the full consolidation of ultraliberal policies in the 1980s.Starting with the Government of Fernando Collor (1990-1992), and more significantly under Fernando Henrique Cardoso (1994-2002), the radical neoliberalist formula started to be "enthusiastically followed by the Brazilian State."[40]

Attacks upon the priority given to work and employment were evident as from the entrance of the 21st Century. The technological innovations that were observed with the Third Industrial Revolution were responsible for major alterations in the way work was carried out and also in how factories were structured. Microelectronics, robotisation, computer technologies and telecommunications are the most significant points. The unemployment that came about in the 1970s was thus worsened, and this was made even worse by the multiplication of different forms of labour provision outside the traditional model of a relationship of employment. The gathering of large throngs of workers in large companies was attacked by the introduction of machines that got more and more productive.

The production structure started to be based on lean companies, and to bring formulas used by Toyota, a Japanese automobile company. At the same time, the Fordian techniques for production were maximised, to intensify exploitation of labour. The Toyota Way recommends modern techniques for plant operation, based on the new logic behind capital, seeking internal and external control of production.

> "the internal control arises from the mechanisms of lean production or downsizing, and just-in-time service, with the purpose of inserting total quality in the whole production process."[41]

In a lean factory, goods are produced with high specialisation but are not stocked. This production strategy is conducted by market needs, defining what shall be produced at each moment.

Márcio Pochmann, on discussing the world exploitation of labour in countries peripheral to central capitalism, states that:

> "... the technological advancement, combined with the diffusion of several production chains on a planetary network, enabled a distinction between conception and execution work in a scenario of global misgovernance. Geographically, one witnessed the establishment of a new International Division of Labour which concentrated especially in rich countries, the conception work, which requires continuous education and a compatible level of quality, with more civilised remuneration and working conditions. In peripheral countries, with neoliberal reforms, on a larger scale, there was progress of economic specialisation dependent on execution, normally poorly qualified, underpaid and also in comparable conditions of exploitation (often to those oflabour flexibility) of the 19th Century."[42]

The consequences of the technology impulse can also be analysed from another standpoint, showing positive results in contemporary society. In this regard, with the sedimentation of more modern production methods, the technological innovations and enhancements resulting therefrom were responsible for a significant hike in productivity, production and also in the consumer market of the respective goods produced there. This relationship is described by Maurício, in verbis:

> "The fact is that there is, in truth, also a positive relationship created by the very same technological advances (and not only the negative relationship as usually mentioned). Such advances, while also strengthening the productivity of labour, also strengthen production itself and, hence, bring an important reduction in the price of goods; by logical consequence, they immediately cause a significant expansion of the consumer market for these same goods."[43]

The author also considers that technological innovations, while they did indeed eliminate certain types of labour from society, also created new employment positions as replacements, associated to a new type of production which was not even imaginable in the previous period.[44] Also according to Delgado, to this we add the advances that technology and science have caused to the life expectancy of the people.[45]This meant, according to this author, a considerable expansion of the consumer market, comprising experienced adults who also seek new services and new employment positions for their control (mainly in the health and education sectors, and pensions for the chronologically advantaged).

The vertical production mode and the concentration of the production system were eliminated thanks to the development of means of transport and communication over the last few decades. In tune with the core aim of reducing production time as also its structural size and its stocks, the companies' organisation into networks has become more popular. Thus, there is a growth in the idea of shedding industrial megaplants, strengthening decentralisation or corporate outsourcing, which also leads to a weakening of the trade union movement.[46]

In the process of organisation of labour, there have also been several changes within the companies, to accelerate productivity and reduce costs involved. According to the same author, three formulas have been highlighted, namely: "the reduction of jobs and posts (and, hence, of employment openings) with greater addition of roles and responsibilities to the same individuals; labour outsourcing; and the Toyotist or

Ohnist system for labour management."[47]

Also based on the teachings of Mauricio Godinho Delgado, labour outsourcing is treated as a type of social management, of management of the workforce, that has caused a significant reduction of work benefits in the labour world. The service-providing company, which is inserted in the relationship between the worker and the company using the services, takes on the responsibility for the relationship of employment. Even though this does not lead to a reduction of work posts but rather of costs, this generates an effective disorder in the system of rights and guarantees that are associated with Labour Law, as well as weakening the action of the trade unions. This is explained thus by the author:

> "on the one hand it artificially reduces the number of workers that are statistically allocated to some important business segments (like industrial activity and the financial segment, for example). This is because the outsourced workers, from a legal standpoint, are considered members of the service sector of the economy, being associated to service providers. On the other hand, the outsourcing formula fragments the working class, thereby creating practical difficulties which are very difficult to overcome, blocking the effective application of Labour Law, due to the many peculiarities that are thus created, due to the types of economic segments, companies and workers involved. Such peculiarities lead to dispersion of the understanding and regulation of the phenomenon by the legal system, as also by the operators such as the legal system and the labour inspection system."[48]

The perverse practice of exploitation of labour through outsourcing casts the worker into a laboratory environment which is "immune" to the protective regulations established by labour safety considerations. This is because outsourced personnel are not part of the Internal Accident Prevention Committees (CIPAs) and also lack trade union representation, meaning that they have a strongly reduced possibility of questioning of the working conditions to which they are subjected. "Exploitation moves from capital to those without capital."[49]

The teachings here transcribed from the work of Jorge Luiz Souto Maiorlay bare the social exclusion which has been promoted by labour outsourcing, in verbis:

> "...outsourcing imposes a logic based on attacks against social rights, taking advantage of the perversity of presentation merely as a modern, inevitable and irreversible technique of production. In fact, the only irreversible aspect of outsourcing is the lowering of human conditions. There is no concrete possibility of establishing a legal model recommending outsourcing and effectiveness of social rights at the same time, as its logic is that of masking the relationship between capital and labour, and the fact is that one can only talk about an effective State of Social Rights when there is the social responsibility of capital in its relationship with labour."[50]

5. Final Comments

For all the points mentioned above, we see that there is no compatibility, or even the slightest degree of harmony, between implementation of social rights and the increase in precariousness of labour rights, and in this form of labour exploitation we see that the possibility of implementation of Human Rights is visibly scythed away. In addition, "this is a kind of bomb which helps to implode Labour Law, albeit not the only one"[51], being an efficient instrument for social exclusion. [52]

As one can infer, the absorption of the Toyotist method of production by companies is a strong instrument to make Labour Law more precarious and is therefore a factor that brings about social exclusion[53]. Hence, and regardless of repeated cases of outsourcing and informal labour which are accepted throughout the world, it is believed that the spread of the ideas raised by this system is always an extreme attempt to attack the solidity of Labour Law, as also the imperative nature of its regulations. Thus, to imagine a society without the protection given by Labour Law is to treat the society in an inhuman manner, far detached from the minimum levels of dignity which is due to its citizens. For all this, in the words of Jorge Luiz Souto Maior, "employment has not finished, and indeed never will finish, at least as long as the capitalist system of production remains in effect."[54]

Accessory tax obligations from the perspective of the fundamental duties theory

Henrique da Cunha Tavares[1*]
Adriano Sant'Ana Pedra[2]

Abstract: The fundamental duty fulfillment of contributing to public spending is essential for mobilizing the financial resources needed to implement fundamental rights by the State. And tax obligations named "accessories" play a major role in monitoring compliance of this fundamental duty. However, the institution of instrumental duties to be performed by taxpayers and third parties, in a progressive transfer to particulars of government tasks, taxes management and supervision inherent of the State, should be examined not only from the principle of legality aspect, its own tax field, but also in light of the rights, freedoms and fundamental guarantees of persons. This article aims to analyze, under the bias of fundamental duties theory, the criteria that must be observed for the establishment of accessory tax obligations.

Keywords: accessory tax obligation; fundamental duty; fundamental right.

1. Introduction

The fundamental duties theme was relatively forgotten by the doctrine and jurisprudence, especially when compared to the importance given to the rights. The predominance in the treatment of rights in relation to the duties is further verified in countries that have promulgated their current constitutions shortly after the fall of totalitarian or authoritarian regimes (NABAIS, 2004, p. 16), such as Brazil case.

For most people, the term "fundamental duty" still refers to limitation of rights, spaying of individual liberties and State authoritarianism. However, the fundamental duties study have been consolidated exactly in the opposite direction: fundamental duties fulfillment as a mean of realizing constitutional rights.

The rights achievements such as education, health, security, housing, among others, is only achieved through significant financial resources. Even constitutional rights related to individual citizens freedom, whose participation expected by the State is negative (GARZÓN VALDES, 1986, p. 17-33; LAPORTA, 1986, p. 55-63), that is, not to interfere or limit the freedom, cost money. The locomotion freedom, for example, is a right that, for its exercise, requires, besides State abstention in the sense of not to prevent it, a positive State action aimed to make it possible for everyone, through measures such as editing own legislation, hiring traffic agents, fixing tracks, walkways and signs, etc..

In order to facilitate the supervision and require the effective compliance of fundamental duty to pay taxes, the State may impose positive obligations (issuing invoices, submitting tax return, deeding tax books, etc.) and negative obligations (not denying free access of the tax books inspection, not transporting goods unaccompanied by tax document, etc.) to taxpayers and third parties. These obligations are called accessory tax obligations (Article 113, § 2, National Tax Code, Law No. 5.172/1966).

However, what we see nowadays – in the three spheres of the Brazilian Federation – is the delivery to taxpayers and third parties of a significant part of government tasks, management and even taxes inspection, through the establishment of several and different accessory obligations.

This study proposes to analyze, keeping in mind the fundamental duty of contributing to public spending, how is (not) possible to convert progressively taxpayers and their organizations in a "indirect tax administration ad hoc" (NABAIS, 2004, p. 557), without violating rights, freedoms and fundamental guarantees of persons.

2. The fundamental duty to contribute to public spending in Brazilian Constitution

Differently from other fundamental duties, the duty to contribute to public spending has no express provision in the Brazilian Federal Constitution of 1988. However, is taken for granted that the Constitution recognized, even if implicitly, the fundamental status of the said duty, mainly due to the abundant constitutional norms about tax and budget (Title VI, Articles 145-169).

Considering that Brazil, like most countries in contemporary times, abdicated from the direct economic activity and reserved that right primordially to private initiative (Article 173, Constitution), the resources needed to maintain the State and, consequently, the constitutional rights and guarantees funding will be given essentially through tax collection; in other words, for the compliance by all society, of the fundamental duty of contributing to public spending, which makes even more evident and undeniable essential character of this duty.

Portuguese doctrine, referring to its Constitution, which, as well as the Brazilian one, does not bring express provision of the fundamental duty of contributing to public spending, maintains that > fundamental duties don't require a constitutional enshrinement expressed, being enough itself with a consecration implied as is currently between us with the duty to pay taxes, duty which no one doubts that has consecration is in our Constitution, because it is clear whether the wide and developed "fiscal constitution" that contains (arts. 106 and 107) whether by it State tax nature which incorporates that the recognition and guarantee of fundamental rights presupposes. (NABAIS, 2004, p. 63)

There are, even, those who classify fundamental duty in implicit and explicit one (SIQUEIRA, 2012, p. 173-174), leaving no doubt, therefore, that the duty to contribute to public spending is fundamental and is positivised in Brazilian Constitution, despite absence of express provision in Constitution text.

3. The fundamental duty to contribute to public spending and the tax law subsystem

The study of Tax Law from the perspective of the fundamental duty of contributing to public spending is not something that sticks to the tax lawyers, being this subject practically nonexistent in "courses" and "manuals" of Tax Law, at least under this terminology.

In effect, the logic of the Tax Law evolves generally limited to the norm – broad sense. The principle of legality is the responsible for ensuring, in the final analysis, legal certainty to the parties that compose – in it is own tax expert language – the legal tax relationship: active subject (State; Article 119, National Tax Code) and passive subject (taxpayer or guardian; Article 121, National Tax Code).

In order to approximate the topic covered in this article of the proper language subsystem Tax Law, it can be said that the fundamental duty to contribute to public expenditure encompasses the principal obligation, provided in Article 113, § 1, of the the National Tax Code. According to Aliomar Baleeiro (2000, 697), the main obligation (pay tribute) "constitutes the nucleus of the tax law, as an obligatory law which it is."

According to most tax classic doctrine scholars, the link between the tax authorities and the taxpayer is due to a relationship of tax power necessarily provided by law (see MACHADO, 1998, p. 45), to its interpreted from the institutions obligational logic of private law.

However, an important part of the doctrine, especially international, studies the tax relationship from the constitutional focus, moving away from the legal relations of private law. Ricardo Lobo Torres (2005, p. 235) highlights that "the constitutional overlapping in the tax relationship guides its problematic for connections field between revenue and public spending, important datum in the current phase of public finances."

It is this new vision, of the obligations imposed on the taxpayer interpretation from the bias of the fundamental duty of contributing to public spending, and beyond the strict legality, it is intended to cover in this article.

It is not wanted by it to say that the obligation to pay taxes should or can unlink the law and the legality principle, which would certainly be foolhardy and a regression. But, certainly, the legal standard that governs the relationship maintained between State and citizen in the interest of tax collection should be seen (interpreted) through the lens of constitutional rights and guarantees, extracting from there their limitations and field action.

Contrary to what it may seem, the proposal to interpret the tax law – here, specifically, the rules establishing the accessories obligations – by the bias of the fundamental duty of contributing to public spending, presents itself as an alternative to bring rationality and the standard tax fairness in tax rule and the tax system as a whole.

This happens because the legality principle, accompanied by a deductive interpretation method, literal, did not prevent the Brazilian tax burden to become the highest among the countries with the development stage equivalent to the Brazilian (BIPT, 2010, 1-3). Nevertheless, an important part of doctrine, paradoxically, continues to indicate it as the main or even the only arsenal protecting the citizens against the State.

According to José Casalta Nabais (2004, p. 218), the legality principle, currently, is revealed "hobbling, seeing that, unlike what happened in the liberal State, we are no longer dealing with a minimal state, nor there is assurance that the law is an expression of the common good".

Thus, one can not consider legislation – broad sense – as sole and sufficient fundament for the birth of the obligation to give (principal), do or not do (accessory), imposed on taxpayer, in a logic of private law merely obligatory. The tax relationship should be seen as a result of the fundamental duty to contribute to public expenditure, so that the rules governing the taxpayer obligations are also weighed up through modern techniques of constitutional interpretation, making the correlation with the constitutional taxpayer rights and the collectivity, preventing the pretext of materializing rights, it is actually promoting their annihilation.

4. The accessory obligation as element of fundamental duty to contribute to public spending

Accessories obligations, as told in the introductory part of this article, are the formal obligations which are imposed on the taxpayers and third parties in order to ensure the compliance of the obligation to pay taxes, which effective the fundamental duty to contribute to the public expenses. Hence, accessory obligations have a close connection with the fundamental duty hereof, being an integral part of its core. In this particular, accessory obligations are presented as taxpayer's duty to cooperate in the management and supervision of taxes.

Summing up to this the fact that, pursuant to Article 113, § 3, CTN, "the accessory obligation by the mere fact of its failure to comply with, is converted into the primary obligation on the financial penalty", ie, in the event of noncompliance with a formal obligation, it will be born the very primary duty to pay.

Thus, either became it aims to ensure the compliance with the duty to pay tribute, presenting itself as cooperation duty, or by the fact that his failure to comply with turns accessory obligation into principal, remains clear interrelationship between the obligation said accessory and the fundamental duty to contribute to public spending.

5. The crescent protagonism of accessory obligations: need to fix criteria to establish formal duties

It is ever increasing the protagonism of instrumental duties imposed on taxpayers and third parties in the tax relationship. Just check that the main taxes are currently made originally by the taxpayer as a consequence of compliance of accessories obligations imposed on him.

The Income Tax, the main social contributions, the Tax (of States) on the Circulation of Goods and Services (ICMS), the Tax on Service of any Kind (ISS), among others, are examples of taxes that the taxpayer has the obligation to calculate, collect to the public coffers and transmit the statement by electronic means which will lead the tribute information to the supervision system. All this, without any involvement of the state, to whom it is reserved the power to review the correctness of the procedures performed by the taxpayer or by a third party, within the statutory limitation period of five years.

And to ensure that the taxpayer will run the proper procedures management, collection and inspection tax is imposed on him and others heavy financial penalties in case of noncompliance with hundreds of accessories obligations that carriers of such procedures.

The legislative systematic planned for the institution for accessories obligations also greatly favors their proliferation. This is because, by virtue of which has in its own National Tax Code (Article 113, § 2, and Article 96), the instrumental obligations can be created by infra standards issued by the Public Administration (Decrees, Regulatory Instructions, Ordinances etc.). And, although the penalties for noncompliance with the accessory duty should be provided by ordinary law, such legislative predictions are transmitted by open terminology and typical generic conducts as "untrusted document", "embarrassment to monitoring" or "failure to deliver the declaration", technique that deliberately embraces a multitude of behaviors and instrumental obligations imposed on taxpayers and third parties for infralegal acts.

Anyway, the accessory tax obligations may be freely established by those directly benefiting from them: Tax Administration. Using the popular saying: it is like putting the mouse to take care of the cheese.

To have an idea, only in the framework of the State of Espírito Santo, the Title III from the Regulation of ICMS (Decreto 1.090/2002), which is dedicated to accessories obligations, has more than 200 articles, with almost all the letters of the alphabet, plus numerous subsections, paragraphs and subparagraphs, which certainly must import over 1,000 instrumental obligations conveyed to tax payers and third parties. There are also obligations spread along the Regulation itself and from other state regulatory instruments, which will be added to the obligations – not less numerous and costly – instituted by Federal and local Treasury.

On those grounds, it can be concluded that the simple service to the principle of strict legality, ie completion of formal rules for the imposition of accessories obligations – the competent agency, vehicle specific legal etc. – it is not sufficient to confer limit, proportionality and rationality to the creation of accessory tax obligations, which are responsible for transferring to the particular, in geometric escalation, the onus of tasks essentially state of management and fiscal controls.

6. Criteria for the establishment of accessories obligations

If the principle of legality does not seem sufficient to prevent exceeding in the institution of accessories obligations, what would be the criteria for the imposition of cooperation obligations of the taxpayer in the management and supervision of taxes?

Victor Uckmar, cited by Ricardo Lobo Torres (1999, p. 25-26), proposes some fundamental principles that should be reserved for taxpayers to prevent prevarications and abuses by the Public Administration. Among them, all important, there is one particularly relevant for this study: "the right not to be forced to useless duties or excessively costly regarding to the results".

That precept, extracted from the work of the Italian tax expert, expresses the limit of proportionality that must be observed when the imposition of accessory obligations.

Accessories obligations, for example, that offend the constitutional right to privacy of information and of privacy – such as the obligation of financial institutions to report to the IRS data from their account holders – or instrumental duties imposed to taxpayers who severely limit the principle of free initiative – as the obligation described in Article 21, § 10, of Decree No. 1.090/2002, of Espírito Santo State, which practically prohibits the sale of goods and provision of services to taxpayers not enabled in order with the State Finance Department – show up at first glance, the disproportionate sacrifices to fundamental principles. Nevertheless, continue to be used, simply for filling out the formal requirements of strict legality.

The disproportionality can also be observed in the excess of accessories obligations that aim the same purpose. It is common the imposition of various obligations to the taxpayer, by the same or different agencies to inform the same thing. In many cases, the revenue obtained in the development of economic activity has to be informed by the taxpayer to the National Treasury, for example, monthly or quarterly, and afterwards an accumulated manner annual. This same information should be released in another database to be delivered also to the State or municipal Finance Department, which does not seem reasonable, even taking into account the autonomy of federal agencies, mainly because the National Tax Code, in its article 199, imposes to the Union, to the States and Municipalities the duty of cooperation and information exchange. Added to this books, magnetic files, licenses, permits, registrations, etc., increasing obligations, never in the sense of simplifying, but rather transferring and concentrating on the taxpayer assignments that are originally from the State.

Finally, it should be required, as the main criterion, that the instrumental requirement to be imposed on the taxpayer is necessary and useful in the task of assisting, by proportional and sacrifice supportable (GARZON VALDES, 1986, p. 17), the achievement of the fundamental duty to contribute to public spending.

Whereas analysis of the excess for the identification of criteria, properly, shall be, as a rule, by proportionality means, there is no other way than a case by case analysis, because "the proportionality test is topic" (PEDRA, 2006, p. 198).

Thus, each rule establishing the respective accessory obligation, or group of them, should be analyzed by the postulate of proportionality, more specifically, by examining its three sub principles: adequacy, necessity and proportionality in the strict sense (ÁVILA, 2011, p . 174-175). At the end, there will be offence to the principle of proportionality whenever there is disproportion between one or more ends pursued by standard stablishing the accessory obligations and the means used for their achievement (BARROSO, 1999, p. 215).

7. Final considerations

The fundamental duties constitute as a general criterion of solidarity among members of society (ROIG, 1999, p. 401). The accessory tax obligations, in its turn, constitute a duty of cooperation by the contributors or third parties in achieving the fundamental duty of contributing to public spending.

However, as result of its own idea of solidarity, it should not impose to taxpayers extraordinary sacrifices (GARZON VALDÉS, 1986, p. 17) – or disproportionate – the pretext of fulfillment of fundamental duties.

It is worth remembering that on individuals already rests the onus – which it is not easy - to pay taxes. The State is not allowed to transfer to taxpayers, in any case and at any price, the obligations to administer, collect and supervise, which are originally theirs, especially when these instrumental duties represent, as it happens today, significant administrative and financial onus, without speaking at the assumptions that affect the rights and constitutional guarantees.

Between Two Worlds
Human Rights and Public Policies

Eric Santos Lima

Abstract: In modern society, political issues commonly turned into legal issues. The greater example is the subject of public policy has been gaining importance in the field of law. This is due to the progressive recognition that the effectiveness of human rights requires the achievement of public policy. Public policies, in turn, are guided by rights to be effected to be effected through them. These themes are not only related, as though presuppose each other, challenging legal and political thought. In the language of systems theory, this means that we are facing a difference or form, always defying the crossing from one side to another. Our research turned to this difference, trying to observe the codependency on its two sides. The mythological figure of Janus is inspiring to reflect on Human Rights and Public Policy, as it is the crossing between these two "worlds" that makes it possible, in social reality, some transformations. In this way, we reflect on the role of organizations, as social systems, in the realization of the crossing, that means, the crossing from one side to another in this form.

Keywords: human rights; public policies; organizations.

1. Introduction

In this work, we discuss the relation between human rights and public policy through Niklas Luhmann's systems theory. For Luhmann, society is composed of different communications, and communications builds systems. Among these systems are the law and politics, to which we are alluding to as "worlds" because they are complex systems.

2. Human rights: political and legal issues

In modern society, political issues are commonly turned into legal issues. The greater example of this is that the subject of public policy has been gaining importance in the field of law. It occurs due to the progressive recognition that the effectiveness of human rights requires the achievement of public policy.

Public policies, in turn, are guided by rights. Rights that have to be effected by public policies. These themes are not only related, as though presuppose each other, challenging legal and political thought. In the language of systems theory, this means that we are facing a difference or form, always defying the crossing from one side to another.

Currently, countless social problems are related as human rights issues and that goes beyond the field of law. However, in the semantics of modern law, the label "human rights" comprehend the ambition, translated as a promise, that social problems, in general, can be legally solved. In practice, the legal discourse stands with a pretense of command and control that is wholly incompatible with the complexity of contemporary society. The answer, then, is obvious: in the conditions of social differentiation, the legal system is not in degree to of handling the particularities of politics, economy, education and health, all functionally differentiated systems.

While there may be different definitions of public policy, there are also multiple applications. Public policies, while political communication, their goals are addressed to other social systems. In a democratic environment, all themes in communication can be turned as themes of politics (DE GIORGI, 1998, p. 15), and structuring public policies. Public policy observed as part of the inclusion program conducted by the policy, but it regards many other social systems. Human rights and public policies both address their communications to other systems, exceeding the possibilities of each of these systems in the intention to solve a multitude of problems related to inclusion / exclusion of people. We treat, therefore, human rights and public policy not as separate problems, but as the two sides, legal and political, "of the same coin."

Our research turned to the difference law / policy, seeking to observe the codependency on its two sides. Janus, the mythological figure of the Roman Pantheon, a porter of heaven, as a human was recognized for his life dedicated to transformations and represented with two faces turned in the opposite direction, symbolizing the passage from one universe to another. The mythological figure of Janus is inspiring to reflect on Human Rights and Public Policy, as it is the crossing between these two "worlds" that makes it possible, in social reality, some transformations.

We say "some transformations", since we cannot assure that law or politics by itself will find solutions to all social problems. Similarly to the legal system, the political system is to merge simplified trends in political communication (LUHMANN, 2010, p. 215), trying to suppressing the differences between systems. However, social systems in response to this claim asserting their autonomy, leaving policy innocuous or producing less effects than expected. This implies a recognition that policy, as well as law, can't perform a role as "control room" in contemporary society, such as the labels "public policy" and "human rights" may suggest.

Through the lens of systems theory, our reflection on the theme of public policy is not restricted to political rationality, but think as an appeal from the political system to develop forms of 'structural coupling' between different social systems. For that is necessary that public policies are guided in non-totalitarian conceptions of human rights, which are able to see different operations of inclusion and exclusion, building couplings between these and the others social systems, that is, seeking to create programs for highly complex action.

In this way, we reflect on the role of organizations, as social systems, in the realization of the crossing, that means, the crossing from one side to another in this form. Organizations are able to mobilize different types of communication, building couplings between different operations of inclusion, which allows programs to create highly complex action.

The possible "place" for the implementation of public policies on human rights is an organization. Organizations are able to coupling structurally different social systems. Organizations reveal the complexity of questions involved in the debate between law and politics, law and economics, law and education, or law and health. At Universidade Federal do Rio de Janeiro (UFRJ), we developed a research about the "Bolsa Família" Family Allowance Program, a public policy in Brazil based on human rights that tries to make all these connections.

Bolsa Família is a conditional cash transfer that benefits Brazil's extreme poor families with monthly incomes. In this program, poor families should meet health and education conditionalities. Obviously, a large network of organizations is required for this purpose. Law plays different roles in this social policy, especially stimulating dialogue between organizations. The present work was just a theoretical reflection on the subject.

3. Concluding remarks

The aim of political-legal rationality as a "control room" in the society can be replaced by the daring project of a society that coexists with many forms of rationality, resulting from links and possible couplings between several social systems, capable to produce, in communication, variety and therefore also redundancy and, why not, some consistency in decisions.

Neoliberal hegemony versus social justice

Natalia Pais Álvarez, PhD[1]

Abstract: It is possible that the hegemony constitutes the finished shape, the closing of the rational paradigm in the 20th century, and that from it we have met doomed to this period of disturbances, chaos, uncertainty, a sort of tedium. Already we cannot think the power from the old devices with which the privileged classes or the capital perpetuated its domination. The analyses that were uncovering the alienation, the oppression and the mystification (XIX and XXth) and were giving content to the dialectical draft owner - slave would finish with the relation, already they do not serve us; the question is that the destruction of the social links based on the domain already has taken place: it has been realized technically by means of the virtual emancipation (generalization of the exchange, reconciliation of opposite with the assumption of the Human rights…). The position of the owner is internalized on the part of the emancipated slave and there is solved quite in a paradox that, according to Baudrillard, he supposes the total liberation, the resolution of the conflicts and the free disposition of one itself they have led us to submitting us to the world hegemonic order.

Talking about a concept like hegemony in a time marked by the discourse of the scientific-technical performativity at the market service, involves the risk that it could be read as an infertile abstraction against a conspirator and invisible faceless entity.

Precisely for this reason, what concerns us here is reveal them in the pursuit of the substrate of discourses and alternative/alterative practices to help overcome the historical conditions that have made it possible in the neoliberal and triumphant order on the capitalist world-system stage.

Antonio Gramsci had already established the distinction between domination and hegemony, so the domain would be crossed by a political dimension, which, in times of crisis can get to make use of coercion, while hegemony refers to an ideological-cultural and non coercive dimension, although it also involved political and social forces.

Gramsci will consider the need to traverse economist dimension of hegemony and gives great weight to ideology, that it will be a privilege engine to rethink policy as an authentic redemptive strategy for the conformation of social transformation subjectivities.

The connotation of domination, of prominence, vertical cutting, is clear and the objective of socialism exposed is governed by antagonism. The "normal" execution of hegemony in what has become the classic field of parliamentary regime is characterized by a balanced combination of strength and consensus. Strength does not overcome, but appears to be supported by the consensus of the majority, expressed by the so called organs of public opinion (which therefore, on certain occasions, are artificially increased).

Between consensus and strength, is the corruption-fraud (which is characteristic of certain situations which make it difficult to execute hegemony, in which the use of strength presents too many dangers). In other words, Gramsci purports that corruption-fraud provokes weakness and paralysis in the antagonists (123-124).

Hegemony as leadership arises, as an influence, not as domination, to the extent that is not imposed by force. It also posits the impossibility of a social order derivative of an absolute consensus. The dominance results in an imposition by force of a political-economic and social order, while hegemony, however, arises from the formula of consensus, although the strength can be used at times when it is impossible to reach it.

Now, it is not participatory and decisive consensus but, therein the problem lies, is considered democratic only insofar as it implies the absence of authoritarianism. And this returns not only dangerous reading of the concept of democracy, but that challenges Fukuyama's proclamation that we are witnessing the end of last metanarrative: the final Consensus, absolute order, absence of conflict or virtual empire of good. Are these indicators of a perception of reality that has lost its sense of itself, a virtual reality that defines our historical time: a false "order", "consensus" and "good" that overrides all resistance as simultaneously blurs the faces of what could be susceptible to reluctance.

And this, curiously in a postmodern scene inaugurated by the proclaimed death of the metanarratives in the era of mass media communication ecstasy. During this era, paradoxically perhaps the only metanarrative that has pervaded is that of "the metanarrative evil". We must not forget that the twentieth century, the postmodern century, which saw the expansion of the democratic regimes and the right of intervention in the name of democracy, the Universal Declaration of Human rights, and the emergence of pacifist movements, remains to be the same century of wars, terrorism and gratuitous horror. It seems pertinent to highlight here Marta Giacaglia's definition of hegemony:

> The achievement of moral, intellectual and political leadership through the expansion of a discourse that offers a partial meaning around nodal points. It comprises more than a passive consensus and legitimate actions: it involves the expansion of a particular set of rules, values and positions by persuasively "re-describing" the world (155)

These brands of hegemony are real symbols of our time. And this new symbology dethrones the old and certain concepts or representations we used to read the world, including politics. In fact, this hegemony is based on a fundamental principle of deregulation of meanings and references. Displays, in what Baudrillard calls the "ecstasy of communication" (Foster 193), just a series of signifiers promiscuous, desecrated, uninhibited, without regard where the community has no place, and subjects-seduced-fascinated diluted rolled back and are engrossed to withdraw in their particular symbolic universes.

Reality acquires meaning through a common screen where commonality is not possible: loneliness is the ultimate wake of meaningless hegemony. Nothing that is not part of the scene can be real and thus witnessing the beginning of the story of a fictionalized unreality, des-semanticized, that makes invisible the inhabitants of a reality that, after being touched by hegemonic signifiers, no one wants to dwell. So the hegemony proposes a symbolic challenge, makes invisible to those living in reality and creates a 'not virtualized yet' people desire to make the big jump to the scene of order and consensus, where there are no antagonisms, negating any form of reaction reducibility question u option globalized world system.

Precisely, that hegemony with a "democratic" mask, which accommodates an alleged plurality, is what has made it possible the end of the domain, because, among other reasons, of the absence of the "authoritarian mark" and has served as strategy in the pulse between antagonisms, annihilating them.

Public opinion now made these diluted-seduced-fascinated subjects, has made, of the capitalist hegemony, a cultural practice, an awareness, a sense of life, a way of living. Public opinion, which is no more than the new translation of the old proletariat which Gramsci said would have to aspire to occupy the political-economic-social place of the bourgeoisie.

The question is, what are the historical and philosophical constraints that have shaped this as a permanent entity we have called hegemony? We have seen that deterioration at breakneck speed in the last quarter century with the exacerbation of neoliberalism as economic theory and beyond, as an ideology and doctrine of globalization, which envisioned a self-regulating and self-regulating system where free markets conjugated in direct proportionality with greater progress and greater freedom for the subjects (individuals).

Given that this market preeminence has led to globalization is a vital global sense governed by economic laws, to this new idea-force, States are left without arguments and reveal inefficient.

I use the term globalisation, despite Chomsky's warning which I completely agree with. I have not found a substitute which better encompasses the concept I wish to convey. Chomsky tweeted on February 14th 2013 that "Globalisation is a term of propaganda and we should never use it".

The very concepts of market logic move into the political assessment, appearing then the United deficient or unworkable. These succumb seeking their upgrading in the new rationality they understand powerful. So, with the delegation of business understanding them as improper (the distance between either pure, or mixed private good dissolves becoming everything in private good), ends in their basic duties (Education, Health, Social Welfare, Justice, etc.)

We live today another debacle and explanations to this global crisis offered by the economic arms of global State -International Monetary Fund (IMF), World Bank (WB), World Trade Organization (WTO), the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), United Nations Organization (UN)-, together with the brains of the overall state cabinet-the Group of Seven (G-7)- have been childish, laughable and propaganda.

But the truth is that the progression of the crisis will destroy the propaganda and exposing the inadequacy of explanations while discovering the chaotic nature of the global capitalist system and goes putting faces to those responsible of the chaos.

The real reasons for the crisis basically come from a translocation occurred in the global hegemony of the bourgeoisie. Until the end of the seventies it was a dictatorship of productive capital (Keynesianism).

Such restructuring is, in fact, the establishment of new rules of the game. Thus, what it has been called neo-liberalism is not, as suggested by Chomsky, nor "new" nor "liberalism". This is a conceptual re-semantization of a process facilitated by the corporate elites who held the transnational domain of the capital, with the complicity of media and political legitimacy of the imperial triad, which have resized their position in the great world system board following the strategy of "throw away the ladder with a kick: first we break the rules to climb to the top, then we kicked the ladder so that others can not follow and proclaim justifiably indignant: "play fair and equal" (Esperanzas y realidades 99) inspired by the maxim according to which the aim of matching is reduced to the distribution of risks and costs: the benefits are not distributed (socialization of costs and privatization of profits). The law of the funnel, as Chomsky points out.

Countries grow with protectionist measures and once they gain a favorable position in the marketplace, encourage free trade and prevent other countries from competing on equal terms. Chomsky says: "while protectionism and state violence benefited greatly to England and the United States, and the rich industrial countries in general, liberalization imposed by the imperial powers created, to some extent, the Third World" ("Poder en el escenario global" 236). He clarifies that really it has nothing to do with neo-liberalism seeing as the strategy followed by the US is the same as that which imperial England used during the colonisation: protectionism in the first growth period, liberalism to maintain its dominant position as a super power.

The US did not forge a new path. On the contrary, it followed the footsteps of England, its predecessor as super power. In 1846, England finally adopted a liberal agenda after more than a century of intense protectionism and state intervention. Such protectionism, Chomsky purports, was far from cutting edge, to the extent that competition seemed relatively safe.

On the other hand, these initial protectionist measures which super powers have adopted are not only applied to their country, but transcend the "official" borders. They draw imaginary economic borders which extend as far as their own interests, which are appropriated by means of discourses which contradict the liberal doctrine. A clear example are the declarations of George Kennan (16th August 1954, in the National Security Council 5432) where he urged the "protection of our raw materials", referring to Latin America. Chomsky ironically observes how what is referred to as "our" raw materials, just so happens to be found in a completely different place ("Poder en el escenario global" 236-37).

That inveterate mechanics and interventionist welfare state would be replaced by the state small and expendable, because everything would be in the hands of the "virtuous market." Recall, for example, the words of Anthony Lake (National Security Adviser) when presenting the Clinton Doctrine, announced this new world opening in front of us, presenting "immense opportunities to get to consolidate the victory of democracy and open markets, "only the logic and purposes of that market were ascribed more to a vicious circle to a virtuous one. They shifted the axis of productivity to financial speculation, were made with the management of the world irrespective of any criteria of justice or fairness. Yes, succeeded in forecasting precarious state. What in the thoughtful analysis, Liliana Buschiazzo would say today the state as the main victim of the market and how we have become the Republican utopia to the dictates of the market:

> The state of the new millennium is not missing or perhaps weakened. The new state is under construction: it is a state that has caved in certain fundamental obligations (education, health, research, culture) but was strengthened in others (security, surveillance, repression). (9)

Multilateral agencies increase gradually their power of action and decision on developing scenarios. The UNDP (United Nations Development Programme), IDB (Inter-American Development Bank), the IMF (International Monetary Fund), the OAS (Organization of American States), ECLAC (Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean), WB (World Bank), among others, emerge as authentic references (some as authors, others as recipients) of new economic guidelines to be adopted, and it seems clear that this process has advanced sponsored packages of measures within the neoliberal structural adjustment program, which in any case is focused on the structural solution of poverty, but as a policy patch containing numerous contradictions sui generis and that reverses in an attempt to cut costs and public spending in a process of making a market of the public, including education.

In fact, this is a process of international order, through which they have tried to make public education in to a business. Due to this, according to his notes, in 1998 the WTO (World Trade Organisation) decided to make education one of the twelve services to be transformed in to commercial goods and had to be incorporated in to in to an international fair trade agreement. Consequently education had to be completely privatised in every sense.

We would therefore need to ask ourselves, first, an analysis of the strategies employed by organizations such as the World Bank as one of the visible arms of a project that seeks to limit public policies through privatization and public spending cuts. In fact too many arguments that would lead us to question these agencies and international development, including this one, although this should not be read, following Coraggio thesis, an analysis that denies the contributions of these organisms from positions that could be considered conspiracy. In his speech questions the effectiveness of the measures the World Bank adopted for Latin America exposes some of its theoretical and practical weaknesses (n.pag.) Simply, we will just try to show, according to this author, some structural weaknesses.

First, we find that the WB is an self-legitimized body based on questionable validity criteria. The first is its undemocratic nature: its members are not elected (are elected by their peers, but can not speak of universal suffrage, representative democracy and, of course, participatory). Moreover, the WB works as the banking cooperative that it is, and the number of participants per country depends on these financial contributions to the institution, and this is an important fact to the extent that obviously weakens the legitimacy of their recommendations and makes suspect the possibility of interest that we are exposed to the public openly.

The question is also on this point, who are the beneficiaries of particular interests, that is, who serve their recommendations and if really the countries for which these packets have poured effectively demanding requirements of a group of organisms and unelected people from a democratic procedure.

Finally, it should be noted that social policies which seeks to develop the WB are based on strictly economic criteria, are technical proposals at a time when neopositivism triumphs, where as we believe rightly suggests Samoff:

> Is regard economics as the social science that has the important practical consequences because it handles the money and the power of money defines the sense of wellbeing. No wonder the notion of development is understood particularly as economic growth (Torres 173-74).

These organisms are based on the link between development and economic growth, but in many cases, the packages offered do not consider real economic contexts of the countries for which the prescription is prescribed, nor the fact that these are measures targeted and subsidiaries. But we can not read some perversion of the strategy, while income systemically favors (the object of capitalist accumulation of income, not the development of labor), the proposed measures for developing countries translate into the formation of labor in the service of the renters. In any case it seems load real equity intention or actual modification capitalist world system.

When, for example, the WB recommends investment in primary education, when economic grants loans to countries to launch your project, no guarantees, simultaneously, the results are to be expected. But when they fail, as has happened on numerous occasions, for example in Latin America, not assumes the relevant responsibilities: recognize the error should induce them to write off the debt incurred by some countries that do not knock on their door. When they fail, as has happened on numerous occasions, questioned how countries have implemented their project or only recognize they made a mistake. But those interests are to continue to be paid. In fact, Carlos Torres makes clear that the World Bank is not an agency grants, but loans, there is nothing to indicate that it is altruistic project, while as Bank makes profits (through tax interest) of its loans.

This would lead to a first inquiry regarding the actual purpose of such agencies. Also, as noted by this author, another aspect of the lending policy of the Bank is that it is "pro-active and not re-active", ie, "very often initiates contact Bank for the design of a loan specific contacts that reflect the link between knowledge and expertise on the one hand, and the budgets of funding on the other".

Carlos Alberto Torres suggests that these errors are the fruit of programmes that in many cases been exposed inadequate, especially with respects to their analysis of primary education. Amongst other factors, this is the result of the World Bank "experts'" naive beliefs that on finishing their studies, children living in poverty will be able to compete in a globalised labour market (Torres 174).

It also seems quite naive to think that they actually can not apply for higher paying jobs, could be used in countries with high unemployment rates. Palliative training for a global society that has no where humans occupy these assets. The WB offers solutions within frameworks of little or no operation: labor supply has also been globalized, so that only those who are willing actual mobility can access certain posts, and arguably even more: it is naive to project the link training / employability without providing simultaneously offer / mobility, at least not if you want that employability meets the minimum requirements that won't motivate employees to job insecurity (if indeed it comes to getting a job) that threatens fundamental human rights.

We can not talk about quality of life or well-being when an employee is forced to choose between no employment or precarious employment, when carried to countries whose languages ignored (in fact just have been taught through the Primary) in letters organized, although statistically the challenge of poverty reduction is met; somehow chosen mobility is a privilege, the forced, a fact which indicates the success of a particular economic and educational policy.

Propose job promotion in a globalized market and primary education as a means to reduce poverty is to condemn those who have an unfavorable starting point. The World Bank proposes, as we see, solutions (training) are not geared focused even call into question, to resolve structural errors in the system.

Coraggio is very strong at this point, when he says:

> The slogan of success, for individuals, social sectors and countries, is not cooperation and solidarity, but success in competition with others. Being competitive means being able to pass the tests posed by the market, responding quickly and efficiently to your changes. Nationwide, warned of the danger of achieving competitiveness just perverse short-term, based on the degradation of the value of labor, the environment and quality of life, it is specified that competitiveness should be "authentic", sustainable and based on Investments in human capital (5).

And here we must expose the fallacy of the neoliberal thesis, according to which the market is a cybernetic system, rational, self-regulated by the natural laws of the market. The numerous crises in the different planetary scenarios after implementing international recommendations such as those offered by WB or IMF, evidence the inefficiency of those, and this is proof of that fallacy.

It might be logical to raise competitiveness projects a utopian global system where the gap between rich and poor countries did not exist, but as suggested Coraggio "sustainable competitiveness requires a non polarized, where there are expectations of continued improvement in the quality of life of economic agents [...] Human development can not be seen as a result of competition possible, but as a condition of it" (17).

Also, as suggested by this author, the policy imposes homogeneous WB have not yielded the expected results, especially in Latin America. What may then have political legitimacy not only undemocratic but inefficient? In the name of what followed have unquestionable budgets?

The World Bank proposes measures, "recommendations" on behalf of "truth" self-legitimized, measures to be adopted by many of the countries of the South, however, it assumes no liability related to who claims the right to decide on the economic destinies of much of the planet. There is an appropriation of success, but not the ownership of the prediction errors resulting from the homogenization resulted in packages of measures that do not take into account the particularities of the countries where they could have applied.

Following Agamben, hence it follows the display of violence, public exposure of the threat, the power of repression that would give the character of intangible sacredness that uncomfortable contiguity between sovereignty and police function, "[...] but the investiture the sovereign as a police officer has another corollary requires the criminalization of the adversary [...] Today there is throughout the land a head of state who is not in this sense virtually a criminal".

Agamben agrees here that this condition has a boomerang effect because criminalizing anytime can be treated as a criminal and Agamben, neither regret "[...] because the sovereign, who willingly consented to appear with the character of executioner henchman and now finally shows its original proximity to the criminal"(92).

With the modifications made in the regulatory principles of life and the market in the last thirty years, opens the new era labeled as Neoliberalism and is not more than the emergence of orthodox capitalism founded on the privatization of services, free trade and economic deregulation.

1989, to give a date, was the beginning of the end of the bipolar world. Capitalism came to dominate the world stage. The implementation of neoliberal thesis had a starting point in making economic adjustment measures proposed in the 1989 Washington Consensus, and all public areas until then, begin to be seen as an expense that was to be minimized, through a privatization process which, as it progresses, is resulting in a smaller share of the poorest in the system. As pointed Grassi,

> "The contradiction accumulation / legitimation is in terms different from those of the Keynesian welfare state, including the «naturalization» of inequalities. The relative success of the model lies in part in the conflict have returned to a society entirely fragmented, in which the actors are individualized to the rhythm that subjects lost collective entity. It is understood, then the orientation of social policy and collective consumption, and social rights, but attendance targeted towards those «less pressure capacity»" (21).

Just as Andrea Novy, Washington stipulates, "it means the political-economic-intellectual complex integrated by international organisms (International Monetary Fund, World Bank), US Congress, Federal Reserve, top officials of the Administration and groups of experts as outlined by John Williamson". This discourse agreed on ten clear priorities summarised as follows: fiscal discipline which must guarantee a budget surplus; a change in priorities and diversion of public spending to the most productive areas; enforcement of tax reduction; liberalisation of the financial markets; maintenance of standardised and competitive exchange rates; liberalisation of trade, suppression of contingencies, and lower customs tariff; equal treatment of foreign and local direct investment; privatisation and deregulation (including sectors with social objectives); guarantee of property rights (Novy).

It seems specially worthy of mention, the last of these priorities given that the guarantee of property rights was created by those who are already property owners, without taking in to account the right to possess property of those who have nothing. Furthermore it makes no attempt to justify its protection of private property (as a priority) while the majority of people do not have their basics needs covered i.e. food, water, clothing and shelter.

The disappearance of bipolarity leads us to note the triumph of capitalist hegemony on a global scale and face the thought today for the first time, while a task devoid of illusion and alibis, "everywhere is being fulfilled before our eyes «great transformation» that drives one after another to the kingdoms of the earth (republics and monarchies, tyrannies and democracies, federations and national states) to the integrated spectacular State (Debord) and «capital-parliamentarism» (Badiou), which are end stage of the form of state" (Grassi 93).

Agamben makes us fall well aware that in the same way that after the industrial revolution destroyed the categories of public and social structures of the Ancien Regime, the same way they have transformed the terms sovereignty, right, nation, people, democracy and general will now covering a spectrum of reality that has nothing to do with what these concepts designated: "Contemporary politics is this devastating experiment, which dismantles and void worldwide institutions and beliefs, ideologies and religions, identity and community, and then returns to propose them a form and definitely affected invalidity"(93).

Our reference thinker continues at this point, unraveling the evolution of thought that claims the knot without telos of history in which we are immersed, and leads us to the choice of a thought capable of thinking both the end of history and the State end by facing each other, following Heidegger's style. The man has to take over his very being historical, of the same impropriety.

> "The appropriation of historicity can not so still have a state-form not being the State other than the assumption and stay-hidden representation of historical arche -but must clear the ground for a longer life nonstate policy and legal entities that remain completely still thinking" (95).

It is a proposal that called our partners as before "new historical project" or recovery of "republican utopia," in this case is radicalized and output Agamben appears as return to zero point, urging the abandonment of our political tradition and rethinking the concepts of sovereignty and constituent power from the beginning.

> Sovereignty is the idea that there is a link between violence and right undecidable, living and language, and that this link is necessarily paradoxical form of a decision on the state of exception (Schmitt) or one side (Nancy) in which the law (the language) is > maintained in relation to the living withdrawing from it, abandoning it to one's own violence and lack of respect. The holy life, is life proposed and abandoned by the law in the state of exception, is the bearer of the sovereignty dumb, the real sovereign subject (95-96).

It infers from this that if there is now a social power, will go to the bottom of his own impotence and therefore the problem that has to face a new thinking, a new policy, tear of the questions "Is it possible a community policy that is geared exclusively to the full enjoyment of life in this world? But is not this precisely, if one looks, the goal of philosophy, [...] is not defined by the recovery case for political purposes Averroist concept of "sufficient life" and the "good life"? "Reminding that Benjamin left no doubt when he said that "the order of the profane should be directed to the idea of happiness." To finish deriving the redefinition of the concept of "happy life" as one of the essential objectives of thought that comes.

> The "happy life" should be based on the political philosophy can not be neither so bare life that presupposes sovereignty to make it the subject itself, or the impenetrable strangeness of science and modern biopolitics, the today it is in vain to make sacred, but precisely a "sufficient life" and absolutely profane, who has reached the perfection of one's own power and communicability, and over which the sovereignty and right no longer have any control (Agamben 93).

As rightly observed Viviane Forrester radical application of the neoliberal model in a context of economic and political globalization has created "a strange dictatorship" in which the political powers of national states are subject to institutional supranational powers, such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Trade Organization (WTO), and factual as multinationals.

The power we have come to focus these organizations put in check Western democracies, ironically under an official speech in which show just the opposite: global democratization. A democratic process must pass the filter of these organisms as indicated, there are not chosen. These powers have contributed greatly to the precarious state and the triumph of the neoliberal state.

Neutralization of a symbolic universe is as ingrained as widespread, therefore once the have been eclipsed and subsumed the real antagonisms subjectivities complex challenge for the new millennium opened and already announced Baudrillard, who wrote: "And the answer to the hegemony is not so simple. Antagonism, denial, dissent, violent abreaction, but also fascination and ambivalence. Because-and here lies the difference with respect to domination-all partake of hegemony" (La agonía del poder 26).

Utopia has become anti-utopia. The alleged rationality unifying the market is, obviously, a contradiction in termini: if the market is held on speculation is inherently irrational. Faith in the superior efficiency of the market on any other system or institution holds no empirical evidence, so that is another myth tax to disarm any new choice of economic and social planning. If I was a proven truth would not have fit-among many others-verifiable imbalances, preference for centrally programmed and controlled economies in emergency situations.

There is no excuse, today, from the memories of recidivism, to not to identify, report and disarm the new and always old ways of control of the subjectivities. Those that are reinvented, reproduce, reinstalled from the power over what emerges as threatening.

Today, from a perspective devoid of ingenuity, we find this possibility unlikely, especially given the emergence of the police state, the final entry of sovereignty in the police figure. The limited and ill state allocation of the work of control and repression in the service of a supranational order, a gendarmerie exercise far away from the administrative function of law enforcement original increasingly promiscuous naked next to the interchangeability between violence and Right.

Contiguity is no coincidence and utter confusion is today totally under judgment, constitutionality, providing States with impunity diminished one large capacity, the suspension of the validity of the law and the alibi of exceptionality: the reason of security, public order, set the exception state legitimacy. In the absurdity that has generated a system inspired by the endless accumulation of capital has been no horizon, habited by the simulated subject-seduced-fascinated, postmodernism breaks the infinite mirror fragments presenting the distorted image of a fragmented reality.

If we agree that the desire for progress, development and personal growth and group is found in the history of humanity as an ambition as legitimate as uncontrollable and excessive, we may note that the transformative effects of social mobility are merely substitutions of the actors hegemonic in the same scene.

Only players are exchanges at different times or spaces. The plot of hegemony remains unchanged. Traditionally disadvantaged sectors (not to use terms that may be obsolete such as subaltern classes, proletariat, etc.) greet a welcome descent middle class. In a system that has been commissioned to highlight the robust individualism bonanzas not be expected to generate solidarity between classes. We insist, remains a class war, but a war growing chasm between the contenders: capital is mobile, not workers.

An outstanding example (anecdote cited by Chomsky), which could be applied to any similar situation, is the case of the Illinois workers strike in the 1990s. Here it was made clear the weakness in the bonds of international solidarity between the working class and the idea that capital is mobile, but not the workers. One of the most important syndicates, United Auto Workers, lost the battle with Caterpillar (producers of construction machinery) who decided to substitute the strikers for other permanent workers.

Beside this, which as Chomsky observes, is considered legal in almost all the world, Caterpillar decided to use their capital to produce surplus abroad, even during the strike period. The workers' response around the world, from a solidarity point of view, would have been to stand in solidarity with each other, refusing to work, and joining the cause going beyond the geographical limits of the multi or transnational company operates ("Poder en el escenario global" 244).

So, it is difficult to expect that establishing the complicity necessary to generate a push for change, a change in the directionality only one that could be: from the bottom up, because what is absolutely unthinkable would be a sense of movement to the Conversely, that is, from top to bottom.

Semiotic analysis of tributary incidence matrix-rule

Piera Paula Schnaider do Nascimento

Abstract: Semiotics, outlined by Charles Sanders Peirce, is treated in this article as both science and instrument, starting from the pragmatic bias collated as per the proposition stated in "The Open Work" by Umberto Eco. Afterwards, conceptions of legal norm are devised, highlighting once again the pragmatic perspective, presenting the tributary incidence matrix-rule (sign) as a result of the interpretative process. Having established this as a starting point of the legal statements (object), from which, in turn, are constructed legal norms (interpretant), it is argued that these have the same syntactic scheme, varying, however, at the semantic level. Finally, this rule is analysed taking into the consideration Semiotics of Law and corresponding abductive method, either in its creation as interpretation, attributing it an iconic nature, considering the observation of similarity between legal statements (sign) and events subsequently converted into facts through language (object).

1 Introduction

Envisioned by Charles Sanders Peirce, Semiotics – an endowed science of method (abduction) and objects (sign and semiosis) – is simultaneously treated in this work as an instrument. At first, the emphasis is put on the pragmatic approach to semiosis, in collation with Peirce's theory together with a suggestion presented in "The Open Work" by Umberto Eco, according to which there is an interference of the interpreter during the process of production and apprehension of the meaning of – and through – signs. That said, in the Semiotics of Law, the meaning can also be produced in the context of Law.

Next, conceptions of the legal norms are forged – syntactic, semantic and pragmatic, based, respectively, on Hans Kelsen, Paulo de Barros Carvalho and Tércio Sampaio Ferraz Júnior – from whose is extracted idea of the legal tributary norm. Highlighting again the pragmatic perspective, is presented a tributary incidence matrix-rule as a result of the interpretative process, considering the tribute in its static sense.

Finally, Semiotics of Law is taken into the account as means of undertaking the analysis of the mentioned rule. Thanks to this are understood criteria, that the static conception of the tribute enable its configuration; abductive method, used in the application and creation process; iconic character that if attributed, opens space to the interpretation – through the use of symbols when poured into the verbal language and participation of the interpreter in the construction of meaning.

2 Semiotics for study of law as the open work

Studies of the language date back to the ancient Greece, starting with philosophers Socrates, Plato and Aristotle; in the medieval period among distinct works belong studies of St. Augustine and St. Thomas Aquinas, while in the modern age John Locke was used as a point of reference. More recently, the most prominent names are Charles Sanders Peirce from the United States of America and Ferdinand de Saussure from Europe.

This study focuses on the mentioned North-American author Peirce, who is considered to be the father of modern Semiotics. He derived semiotics nomenclature from the Greek word semeion, which means sign. Although Semiotics had been systematised as a science by the end of the XVII. century by British philosopher Locke – who used the term Semiotics for one of the science disciplines[1] – scientific systematization was essentially done by Peirce, who envisioned universal theory that encompasses both verbal and non-verbal aspects of the language.

According to the author, the objective of Semiotics is study of the sign, which he also calls representamen. Throughout his work he offers more than one definition, intertwined with its correlates that forms the semiotic triadic relation – representamen, object and interpretant – to serve as a basis for establishing their categories. It is understood as more didactic, among others the following:

[1] LOCKE, John. Ensaio acerca do entendimento humano. Trad. Anoar Aiex. São Paulo: Nova Cultural, 1999, pp. 315-316. (Os Pensadores).

> A sign or representamen, is what, in a certain way, represents something for someone. It is addressed by somebody, that is, it creates in the person's mind an equivalent sign, or perhaps a more evolved sign. Therefore this dependent sign is called interpretant of the first sign. The sign stands for something, its object (...) with reference to a sort of idea that I sometimes called a foundation of representamen (...).[2] (highlighted by author) (our translation)

Sign therefore is something that may represent something else or, in other words, is object created by someone – the interpreter – in his mind as an equal or more evolved sign – the interpretant. Taking this into the account, Peirce determines the most important trichotomous classification of the sign, in his understanding[3], linked to the relationship with the object – an icon, index and symbol. The author further explains:

> ...a Sign can be called Icon, Index or Symbol. An Icon is a sign which refers to the object which is denoted only by the virtue of its own characteristics, characteristics that the object should have without the relevance to if it really exists or not (...) An Index is a sign which refers to the object that is denoted by the virtue of being affected by that Object (...) as the Index is affected by the object, it necessarily has some common quality with the Object, and it is with respect to these qualities how it refers to the Object (...) A Symbol is a sign which refers to the object which is denoted by the virtue of some law, usually an association of general ideas which causes that the Symbol shall be interpreted as referring to that Object.[4] (highlighted by the author) (our translation)

Common example of the icon is a photography – assuming there is no interference, whether by taking a certain perspective or by using graphic tools – in which exists similarity between sign and represented object, i.e., person or thing. To the index, that consists of whole sign that refers directly or indirectly to the represented object, can be applied proverb "where there's smoke, there's fire", which once was an indication of the fire. Likewise, water marks on the ground may be evidence of the rain or that the location has been washed, if there are no clouds in the sky and therefore they are not indication of rainy weather. As Peirce explains: "Anything that attracts attention is index. All that surprises us is index, in a way it marks the junction between two pieces of the experience"[5].

As for a symbol, Santaella considers that "(...) extract its power from the representation because is a carrier of a law which, as a convention or collective agreement determines that that sign represents its object"[6] – one example are the words. This is because the symbol is the result of a convention, with relation to which is necessary to familiarise oneself with in order to be able to communicate within the given linguistic system.[7]

Despite the various classifications made by Peirce, irrelevant to the purpose of this approach, his theory is not restricted to the classification and study of the signs. The important distinction is made between object and meaning, in which the object of the sign is a thing or occasion, yet undefined and which is to be applied, while the meaning is idea attributed to the object through assumption, order or assertion.[8] Hence, there exists contribution or direct participation of the interpreter with the sign and semiosis, understood as a process of production and apprehension of meaning through signs.[9]

Semiosis, then, as it is proposed by Peirce[10], in order to be effective can not exist without participation of the interpreter. Hence the relevance of pragmatics – particularly of the theory of Charles Morris – as well as the abductive method, is one of the three types of reasoning established by Peirce based on Aristotle. To arrive, however, to the crux of the matter, we need to present theory of Morris, also North-American author, who understands the Peircean Semiotics as a means of purification, simplification and systematization of the language, explaining that:

[10] Must be noted the consideration of Nöth: "The interpretation of a sign is, thus, a dynamic process in the mind of the receiver. Peirce (CP 5.572) introduced the term semiosis to characterize this process, referred to as 'the action of the sign'. Also conceptualized semiosis as 'the process in which the sign has a cognitive effect on the interpreter' (CP, 5.484). Therefore, to define Peirce's semiotics is necessary to say that's not exactly, but it is semiosis that is its object of study (...)" (our translation). (Noth, Winfried, op. cit., p. 66).

> Semiotics has a dual relationship with the sciences: it is both a science among sciences and an instrument of science (...) But if semiotics is a science coordinated with the other sciences, studying things or properties of things in its role of serving as signs, it is also the instrument to all sciences, in a sense in which each science makes use of and expresses its results in terms of signs.[11] (our translation)

Thus, Semiotics is both a method and science, providing method (abduction) and the objects themselves (sign – linguistic or not – and semiosis). There is even highlighted in the study of semiosis, as Morris asserts, since the Semiotics is not restricted to the study of signs, but embraces semiosis, as a dynamic process that directly engages interpreter.[12]

Morris also establishes three dimensions of semiosis: semantic, syntactic and pragmatic. The first dimension is concerned with the relationship of signs to the object to which they refer and with the study of this dimension. The second with the formal relationship of signs to each other. Finally the third dimension studies relationship of signs to interpreters.

With respect to pragmatics, which emerges in this study as the most relevant perspective, it is necessary to point out the contribution of Peirce, for whom the question of pragmatism – theory according to which any hypothesis accepted is (and only to the extent as is) subject to experimental verification –:

> [...] nothing more is exception to the the question of abductive reasoning. That is, pragmatism proposes a certain maxim which, if solid, should render unnecessary any subsequent norms as to whether the hypotheses are set as hypotheses, i.e., as explanations of phenomena considered to be auspicious suggestions (...).13(our translation)

[13] Id., ibid., p. 232.

Abduction therefore constitutes of "(...) the temporary adoption of a hypothesis because they are liable to experimental verification of all its possible consequences (...)"[14]. This is the only of the three types of reasoning – which include deduction and induction – capable of originating the new ideas.[15] Consequently, if pragmatism is the question of abductive reasoning, what is meant is that it is a creation or, in other words, innovation. As Peirce clarifies:

> The Abduction is a method forming a general prediction without any positive certainty that it will occur, is a special case or typically, its justification being that it is the only possible expectancy of regulating our future conduct rationally, and that the induction from past experiences strongly encourages us to expect that it will be successful in the future.16 (highlighted by author) (our translation)

As the pragmatic dimension of semiosis deals with the relationship between sign and interpreter – whose participation is crucial – it receives special prominence in the theory of Umberto Eco, especially in his proposition presented in "The Open Work". In this work Eco has highlighted participation of the interpreter in the process of construction of meaning, text and signs in general, based on the contributions of reader, taking into account his past experiences.[17]

One can not disregard the volitional or intentional aspect[18] of the process of production and apprehension of meaning nor one can overlook that previous knowledge of the interpreter interferes with the apprehension – and this is precisely Eco's collocation. At the two instances of the semiotic process stand the intent and interference of elements, interests and ideologies that sometimes are not revealed verbally or, although they may be affected by verbal expression, that are not necessarily verbal signs nor they are apprehended at the same manner or all elements that influence construction of meaning. That is why in the context of Eco's "The Open Work" there is reference to the decisive role of the interpreter in the semiotic process, "(...) carrying their lived experience (in praeterito) in the construction of meaning (...)"[19].

Thus one can understand the Semiotics as a science and methodology, considering similarly as Luiz Carlos Assis Iasbeck the method as a instrument[20]. This means that, on one hand, meaning can be produced in different contexts, including the Law – which may be referred to as Semiotics of Law – and, on the other hand, that Semiotics is a science and theoretical instrument for the study of semiosis, i.e., science is provided with method (abduction) and its objects (signs and semiosis). Therefore fully active participation of the interpreter emerges, starting from symbolic signs to the effective meaning or object.

2.1 Tributary incidence of matrix-rule

2.1.1 Legal Norm

The term legal norms – an ambiguous expression, according to Paulo de Barros Carvalho[21] – is rather conceptual than univocal and absolute definition. Thus, exist syntactic concepts – focused on normative statements promulgated by a legislator –; semantics – associated normative formulations of truth and falsehood –, and pragmatic – which emphasizes language as a instrument, observing of what is possible to do instead of focusing on what is meant by a statement[22].

In classical legal positivist theory outlined by Hans Kelsen, legal norms are prescriptions or expressions due to be established by legal authority, which assigns duties and rights to the legal subjects, and may be valid or invalid and non-true or untrue. They are distinguished, however, from the legal propositions, as explained by the author himself:

> Rules of law (in a descriptive sense), on the other hand, are hypothetical judgements stating that according to a national or international legal order, under the conditions determined by this order, > certain consequences determined by the order ought to take place. Legal norms are not judgements, that is, they are not statements about an object of cognition. According to their meaning they are commands; they may also be permissions and authorisations; but they are not instructions.23 (our translation)

For Kelsen, the notion of legal norm presupposes a division into two separate norms, or better to say, two statements of "ought to be", contained in one another; designating the secondary norm as the first and primary norm as the second. While the secondary norm "(...) stipulates the conduct that the law seeks to cause by stipulating the sanction"[24], the primary norm establishes the sanction. This understanding, which places sanction on a secondary norm and conduct regulation on a primary norm is however not predominant.

In egological theory of Carlos Cossio[25], the primary norm is called endonorma, relating to prescript of duty before the supposed fact, while the secondary norm, which is called perinorm, consists of sanctioning providence applied by the State court in the event of failure of the primary standard. Full legal norm, then, has two propositional structures, related by the disjunction "or" and which are not verified simultaneously:

> If the conduct verifies endonorm, if the subject of the provision satisfies the expected behavior, perinorm does not come into play, which provides for the opposite behavior as a precondition of the sanction. However, in the egological theory, they have been parts of one normative whole: of one norm that only, in its constitutive duality, represents conduct in its integrity: as conduct legal and conduct illegal. We can say: legality (endonormative) and illegality (perinormative) are mutually related as meanings of the same domain of discourse, and conversely are required as ontological possibilities of object of conduct.[26] (our translation)

In this way, Cossio attaches importance to the primary norm differently to Kelsen – for whom the so-called primary norm, following the majoritarian doctrine, is treated as the secondary norm –, which relegated the least important condition in relation to its primary norm (sanction), to the most important, to the secondary norm.

As pointed out by Carvalho, positions assumed by Cossio and Kelsen coincide substantially. Based on them, the legal norm is simplified, in a mode "(...) that both perinorm and endonorm (primary norm and secondary norm respectively, according to Kelsen) will have the same logical structure: a hypothesis, to which is associated a consequence"[27]. From the studies of Logic, the same author states that hypothesis and consequence represent corresponding functions of "protasis" and "apodosis", respectively, which together compose hypothetical judgement[28]:

> In the "protasis" we designate the presumption or hypothesis, which can be conceptualized as a set of criteria for identification of fact which having occurred, determines the incidence of certain consequence predicted in the "apodosis". This, in turn, is the set of criteria for determining certain consequence, attributed to the realisation of the fact predicted in the "protasis".[29] (our translation)

For this reason Carvalho conceptualizes legal norm "(...) as all prescriptive proposal of hypothetical structure which imputes the event to certain supposed type of human behaviour"[30]. In endonorms (secondary norms), the assumption is the description of an event that, once materially occurred does trigger the consequence attributed to it. Yet in perinorms (primary norms), the assumption is the prediction of non-compliance with the provision stipulated with a content of consequence of endonorm, with the establishment of relationship of juridical sanctioning as a consequence.

Therefore, the hypotheses of perinorms are equivalent to infringements or, in other words, to behavior that does not achieve benefits (legal duties), fixed in endonormative rules (or secondary, according to Kelsen), according to which sanctions are imputed by the Law. The consequences of perinorms, on the other hand, are equivalent to juridical sanctions.[31]

If, therefore, the legal norm is deontic proposition which attributes a consequence to an antecedent or presumption, then every normative consequence is the installation of a juridical relationship. In other words: "(...) the law is linked to the occurrence of the event described hypothetically, the emergence of a legal bond between people"[32], according to which active subject who holds a subjective right, may require the passive subject to comply with a legal obligation.

Primary and secondary norms are further organized in an enunciation – which differs from the legal proposition. This can be classified with regards to function, to behavior of the recipient and to the criterion of valuation, as descriptive and normative[33]. As for function, the description is to inform; prescription is to modify the conduct of others. In relation to the behavior of recipient, before the descriptive proposition "(...) the recipient's consent should be due to their belief that the proposition is true, since in the prescriptive proposition, the recipient's consent is manifested by implementation of the proposition"[34]. By the criteria of valuation, the descriptive prescriptions are true or false; normative, are valid or invalid.[35]

In this sense, as described by Norberto Bobbio, the juridical norm falls under the category of prescriptive proposals, as a way to influence and shape the conduct of others.[36] While the legal proposition consists of a set of words with united meaning the enunciation is "(...) grammatical and linguistic form through which a particular meaning is expressed, so the same proposition may have many enunciations, and the same enunciation may express number of diverse propositions"[37]. Furthermore, the term legal disposition refers to the enunciation and concerns the physical support of the proposition, whereas the norm, with status of the proposition, refers to the meaning.

In addition, Carvalho explains that the norm is not contained in the enunciation, on the contrary, norm is derived from it, as a result of an interpretative process, since "(...) legal norm is the meaning we obtain by reading texts of the positive Law. This process takes place in our mind, as a result of the perception of the outside world, captured through our senses"[38], thus the written text establishes physical support for the norm. Following the same reasoning, Lourival Vilanova explains:

> The norm, which is, phenomenologically, a significance of propositional enunciation, says that if a fact takes place (if it occurs in reality) through the presupposition referred to it in the universe of law, then a person must do or omit such or such conduct against another subject, term account to the term referent. The antecedent is descriptive and may be a natural fact or indeed an entry to the universe of law.39 (our translation)

The norm is therefore a legal proposition of two parts is formed by antecedent or descriptor – ontological type of possibility to describe a fact, taken as an objective situation – and consequent or prescriber – in which is the obligation, deontic part of the norm.[40] Carvalho also discusses implied proposition or hypothetical and implied proposition or proposition-theory, functioning as a prescriber of inter-subjective conducts. Both are connected by a neutral functor, ought be – or inter-propositional –, not modularised: "When there is antecedent, then there must be consequent"[41].

The case of obligation inside the consequent (intra-propositional) is, on the other hand, modularised in three possible deontic modes: obligatory, prohibited or permitted. In the legal propositions, two functors or deontic connectives – modularised intra-propositional and neutral inter-propositional – connect antecedent and consequent propositions through logical implication. What is meant by this is that there is a logical structure, or better to say, a constant syntactic function, consisting of primary and secondary norm, which differ in the semantic aspect, because:

> ...in a secondary norm the antecedent points to a violator of behavior which should be provided in consequent of primary norm whereas the consequent prescribes juridical relationship in which the active subject identifies with the active subject stated in the thesis of the primary norm but the passive position is occupied by the State, to whom is postulated the exercise of legal coactivity.[42] (our translation)

Thus, the normative propositions are intertwined by operators of logic function. Incidentally as well as Vilanova, Carvalho considers that it is a logical structure that forms the legal norm, which allows two meanings, one in the broad sense, concerned with the prescriptive statements as meanings constructed by the interpreter and, in the narrower sense, generation of messages with fully deontic legal content.[43]

Carvalho explains, moreover, the classification of the legal rule based on distinctions between abstract or concrete and general or individual, resulting in four categories of norms, which are: abstract and general – to which falls the tributary incidence matrix-rule, concrete and individual, concrete and general; and abstract and individual.[44]

For this particular approach, it is important to understand the first three. In the case of abstract and general norm, the abstract qualifier refers to the hypothetical antecedent that precepts hypothetical descriptive statement and, consequently, conduct is determined in general terms – focused on an indeterminate set of people.[45] In order to reach the entire content of their jurisdicity, the edition of concrete and individual norm is required.[46] This relates to the normative implications which in a statement containing description and event of the physical-social world, occur under certain conditions of time and space.[47]

In both cases is required a process to insert the rule in the legal system – this is to be concrete and individual norm whose assumption or antecedent is an event appropriately demarcated in time and space, identified by the issuing authority. The hypothesis relates to fact that effectively occurred and to a consequent of the exercise of authorised conduct of a subject with determined rights, but with pretence of respect for other members of community – which gives it the general character.[48]

As concluded by Márcio Kammer Lima[49], the legal norms have the same syntactic scheme, ranging, however, at the semantic level; this is because the interpreter assigns meaning to the formal structure that supports it. The interpreter's consideration involves addressing the pragmatic dimension, that does not use these conceptions and is what Tercio Sampaio Ferraz Junior intended – understanding the legal norm as a rule whose content is its orientation expressed as a legal proposition with a binding character and that acts on the will of others.[50]

Consequently, as explained by Mirian dos Santos, the legal norm is a result of an interpretative process, as it is the interpreter who creates a norm, that is, through the process of interpretation of the law interpreter extracts individual and concrete norm, the interpretant.[51] Thus, the legal norm occurs only with the application of the Law, as Kelsen categorically stated "(...) application of law is at the same time a process of creation of law"[52].

2.1.2 Tributary legal norm

The normative units describe occurrences, gathered in the social environment, and control the actual occurrence of these events of creation of legal relationship between two or more legal subjects. In the case of general and abstract norms, in the normative instance, the hypothetical prediction implicates the prescription of a legal bond, while on the reality level, there is a factual statement that subsumes the hypothesis and the emergence of a bond by specification of people and regulated conduct, as well as the object of such conduct.[53]

In the case of individual and concrete norms, in turn, the judgement remains conditional and also hypothetical, despite the antecedent pointing to an event that already occurred. "Hypothetical" in this case does not mean that the success reported in stated descriptor has not happened yet, within the realm of possibilities, but represents type of a relationship.[54] Therefore, both the general and abstract norm, as well as individual and concrete keep the structure of hypothetical judgement.[55]

It is therefore clear, that the name "legal incidence" is reduced to two formal operations:

> ...the first, subsumption or inclusion of classes, which recognizes that a concrete occurrence, located at a particular point of social space and a in specific unit of time is included in the class of supposed facts provided by the general and abstract rule; the other, second implication, since the normative formula prescribes that the antecedent implies the thesis, that is, the concrete fact, occurring hic et nunc, also brings out particular legal relationship between two or more legal subjects.56 (our translation)

It should be noted that the incidence will not occur if there is a man making the subsumption and promoting the implication which the normative precept determines because the norms are not affected through their own forces. Instead, a man is required, extracting the general and abstract norms other general and abstract or individual and concrete and, thus, imprinting positivity into the system, i.e., propelling the higher standards of the lower hierarchy.[57]

The incidence, then, is not given automatically and unfailingly, because with the mere event – without acquiring expression in appropriate language, in fact becoming, in the case, tributary – is not necessarily phenomenon of legal incidence. "The percussion of the norm presupposes account in its own language: the language of law constitutes the legal reality"[58].

In principle, there is only one for each tributary figure, accompanied by a multitude of those who could nominate the operatives or functions (...)"[59]. He calls those tributary norms in the strict sense – as opposed to the other (tributary norms in the broad sense).

Rodrigo Medeiros Guardia explains that creating such rules implies the removal of the empirical-existential context in which it occurs – deprivation of the semantic content.[60] In other words, the result is that the interpreter arrives after submitting the legal norm constructed in a process of "de-contextualization" and "formalization"[61], which isolates the constructed object of its significant content – as a consequence of substitution of the words that are composed by element of sufficiently neutral sense.

The construction of the tributary norm in the strict sense – or tributary incidence matrix-rule –, in turn, is the work of the interpreter. It is presented with its own formula of the hypothetical-conditional judgements – since having a hypothesis, assumption or antecedent to which is conjugated a consequence, being that the associative form is deontic copula, obligatory characteristic of the legal-normative imputation.[62]

[61] "Formalizing is not giving a form to data, inserting the data of language in a certain scheme of order. It is to highlight, to considering apart, to abstract the logical form that, as given, is clothed in natural language, as the language of an issuing subject to a recipient subject, with the aim to bring news about the objects. And highlight, by logical abstraction, form, extricating myself from the matter that such form covers. The matter resides in specified concepts in the determined meanings that words have as entities identifiable by their significant individuality (…) As noted, none of these formal structures is proposition that belongs to the language of physics, biology, social science. Nothing tells you about the natural and social world. Nothing is said over anything, fact or particular relationship. Nothing specific is said, because the logical forms are structures composed of constant and variable, that is, symbols replaceable by whatever objects of any domain, and symbols that exercise defined operative functions, fixed and invariables" (our translation). While the hypothesis provides the prediction of a fact, the consequence prescribes the legal relationship (tributary obligation) that is to be established – where and when the cogitated event allegedly happens.[63] Thus, the hypothesis alludes to a fact and consequence prescribes the legal effects that will be propagated by the event, which is why it is possible to speak of descriptor and prescriber, the first to describe the normative antecedent and the second to indicate its consequent. Both in one and in the other are indicative data (criteria), whose combination enables the display, in its entirety, the logical-structural core of the tributary incidence matrix-rule, will occur in accordance to a sequence.[64]

2.1.3 Tributary incidence matrix-rule

It is necessary to distinguish, as per Ferraz Junior, "fact" from "event".[65] Fact is a linguistic element capable of organizing an existential situation as a reality, not something concrete and sensible. The fact will be a mere event until it is constituted in legal language itself. In the words of Carlos Agustinho Tagliari:

> 'Event' (...) is everything that presents itself in the world (of phenomenas), but it will belong to our reality after objectification and interpretation by competent language that will create the fact. The 'fact', in this perspective, is linguistically created through interpretative activity, i.e., is the result of the act of interpreting and pouring language into the event. The language thus creates fact through interpretation and objectification of the event.66-67 (our translation)

[67] Carvalho explains that the facts chosen by the Law represents only balises or signs from which the legal system regards inaugurated bond that preordain human behaviors. (CARVALHO, Paulo de Barros. Teoria da norma tributária. 5. ed. São Paulo: Quartier Latin, 2009, p. 146).

The general and abstract norm (tributary incidence matrix-rule) and the occurrence of the event provided therein therefore are not sufficient. In order to give tribute a legal percussion, on the contrary, is important that this bond is related to an act of subsumption to the fact of norm, which means the creation of individual and concrete norm – this situation permeates the incidence of tributary incidence matrix-rule, as is to be demonstrated.[68]

As recognized by Carvalho, the building of the Tributary Law uses tribute as its point of reference.[69] Having seen his concept of juridical norm, one may conclude that, on purely normative level, in fact, has merely criteria, not necessary legal relations.[70] Such criteria, however, serve to identify facts and relationships that, combined, will govern social behavior. Therefore, the legal norm is to be analysed in its static aspect, i.e., on the exclusively legislative level, and its dynamic character, i.e., after the fact hypothetically predicted occurs.

Considering endonorm as a means to establishing the institute called tribute, it appears that:

> [...] the legislator does nothing more than provides the event of a fact, giving us criteria to identify and associate this event in order to establish a legal relationship, through which the active subject is raised, as a rule of State, the public subjective law to require any person to comply with the legal obligation to pay determined amount of money. First, points to evidence that can not be restricting nature of tribute either to the object of the legal provision – the money – want to own relationship, since in numerous other figures similar phenomenon occurs.71 (our translation)

In tribute, then,

> [...] has a legal relationship that is established between the State (as a rule), as an active subject, and any person (natural or legal), as a passive subject and through which active subject may require passive subject to comply with specific legal duty, which maybe a payment of a certain amount of money. To this consequence leg> islator will allocate a certain class of postulate.72 (our translation)

Assuming that tribute is a legal norm, given that in a static configuration, it consists of a hypothetical judgement – "protasis" and "apodosis" in expected relationship – then it is possible to conceptualize tribute as endonorm which is presented as hypothesis, a set of criteria used to identify facts of physical reality and, as a consequence, a set of criteria to identify a legal relationship established between the State (in a rule), representing an active subject, and a natural or legal person or entity, representing a passive subject, by means of which the first will have a public subjective right to demand the fulfilment of a legal obligation by the second, embodied in a financial benefit.[73] In a dynamic view, however, tribute will occur whenever a legal relationship as described is established by virtue of the supposed event and which fits entirely in the prediction of the endonormative character.[74]

Thus,

> [...] to contradict a tribute, in static terms, the elements that are available to the scientist are the criteria, both alleged as the consequence. On the other hand, by analysing a tribute in its dynamic configuration we are dealing with the real life facts, which occurred in the world of physical reality and precisely for this reason, they determine creation of a legal bond of not only certain and individualized subjects (active and passive), but as well its content of legal duty and its correlate subjective right.75 (our translation)

The occurring fact described hypothetically, the moment in which the tributary endonorm operates should be studied on a case by case basis, since it presupposes knowledge of specific event, which will generate an equally individualized relationship. This study, therefore, can not be undertaken before this relationship emerges in the legal world, that succeeded in the objective reality, event which legislator understood adequately in order to trigger the appropriate legal relationship – the unique instrument that governs human behavior.[76]

Because of this, as suggested by Carvalho, we consider tribute in its static configuration, i.e., as a legal endonorm, although the majority of the theory focuses its analysis on the antecedent (assumption or hypothesis) of legal tributary norm.

> If description of a fact is in the suppose, obviously it is there where we will find criteria for recognizing the event. In a vain we seek extraneous information because suppose does not contain them. However, as a consequence we have a prediction of the legal relationship that will be established when the fact described occurs, it is there where we will reap all the data that allow us to identify it.77 (our translation)

This may serve for identification of a tributary fact, based on normative assumptions, material or objective criteria – objective description of the fact – which is the very core of the hypothesis, the spatial criteria – conditions where the event may happen – and time criterion – time circumstance which enable detecting at what moment the fact occurs. The criteria found as a consequence, in turn, relate to the legal relationship inaugurated with the occurrence of that fact, which can be identified by personal criteria – by determining active and passive subjects – and by the quantitative criterion – how a content of the legal duty will be established, a responsibility of passive subject.[78]

Tributary hypotheses, to reiterate, are attributed consequences – via deontic copula – consistent in combination of criteria. These aim to identify a legal bond that govern human behavior, i.e., the emergence of the legal relationship of obligatory character – which is always subject to economic evaluation.[79] Note that, in endonormative plan, one yet can not speak of a legal relationship, because the abstract bond is inaugurated only with the occurrence of what was hypothetically described.[80]

Therefore, the legal profile of tribute acquires, in the static sense, the normative association according to which, on one side, three criteria identify a fact of a material nature and on the other, entwined by copula of "should be", two criteria recognize an abstract bond that substantiate the legal discipline of human behavior, considered in terms of social relationships. Different situation occurs when there is a legal bond duly individualized and which was inaugurated because of the occurrence of an event, determined in time and space, that fits entirely with hypothetical description (a fact) and which may be called tribute in its dynamic meaning.[81]

Given the above, and taking into consideration fact that the Law is a complex phenomenon, the way of studying it without facing the problem of its ontology, was to isolate normative manifestations, paying attention to the tributary incidence matrix-rule as a tribute norm in the strict sense – classified, in turn, as abstract and general norm. Thus, where there is a Law, there are juridical norms (tributes) and equally, where there are such norms, there certainly is a language in which they are manifested.[82]

3. Semiotics of the law as a means to study tributary incidence matrix-rule

Following Carvalho's classification of standards, we may trace the (chrono)logical thread of tributary incidence matrix-rule formation: starting with the general and abstract legal norm, from which is extracted individual and concrete norm (as a result of interpretation by the interpreter, influenced by his collateral experiences, which include values, ideologies and interests). With that emerges a general and concrete norm bounded spatio-temporally, it may be said the new experience with effects in future.[83]

In fact, tributary incidence matrix-rule does not carry, the description of specifically determined event, but instead, it refers to a class of events, which encases infinite concrete events. The logical process of including an element in a class is called "subsumption", so that the incidence of the norm will not occur in the course of individual and concrete norm, taking into the account fact that the class of events described in the course, will not be issued by the competent organ.[84]

> The general and abstract norm does not directly affect the inter-subjective behavior in order to regulate them. It requires positivization process, i.e., claims the presence of individual and specific norm in order to that prevised discipline can actually achieve success in most cases, modularizing conducts deonticaly. [...] (...) The field of tax law could not be different. Being the matrix-rule one abstract and general norm, in order to reach the conduct and positively discipline it, requires norm individual and concrete.85 (our translation)

Without individual and concrete norm, constituting contemplated event in language of tributary incidence matrix-rule – a fact – and also establishing in language the relational fact, by which subjects of obligation are linked, there is no tribute to be cogitated.

Such application of Law – which, as seen by Kelsen, is simultaneously creation of Law – as an essential a condition in which tributary relation is legally concrete and effective as is also evidenced by José Souto Maior Borges: "For application of the law, it is necessary to establish whether a particular fact, juridical tributary fact, specifically occurs. It consists, in part, of a function characterizing the individual norm brought by launching administrative act"[86].

In this way, law departs from comprehensive conceptions to reach the proximities of the material zone of inter-subjective conducts region, in other words, starting with general and abstract legal norms to reach norms individual and concrete – this is known as positivist process – must necessarily be covered so that the system can foster expectations of effective regulation of social behavior.[87] This occurs as an immediate problem of realization of norms and mediate problem of realization of values, since these function as the foundation of those, as noted by Lourival Vilanova.[88]

In this manner, tributary incidence matrix-rule is treated as a new creation, in a sense which treats facts and discipline behavior starting at the legislated product, to regulate actions that have not happened yet – and without the certainty that they will actually occur. Furthermore, using the verbs in the future tense or even written in the present tense, relates to future actions.[89]

Compared to these characteristics – experience of the new, resulting from the interpretative process with direct and active participation of the interpreter – and with effects in the future, urges the study of tributary incidence matrix-rule based on a properly equipped science methodology in its characteristics and particularities. That is why Semiotics of Law, in bias of the pragmatic dimension of semiosis and its corresponding methodology, namely the abduction, is proposed as a method with the new perspectives in future.

As Peirce explains, and as was already pointed out through this exhibit, there are three types of science reasoning, argument or inference: deduction, induction and abduction.[90-91] Peirce's theory is based on such a division, explaining that:

> These three types of reasoning [as per Aristotle] are Abduction, Induction and Deduction. The Deduction is the only necessary reasoning. It is the reasoning of mathematics. Part of a hypothesis whose truth or falsehood has nothing to do with the reasoning, and naturally, whose conclusions are equally ideal. Induction is the experimental verification of a theory [...] The only thing that induction accomplishes is determining the value of a quantity. Part of a theory is to evaluate degree of concordance of this theory with the fact. Irrespectively, it can never give rise to an idea. Nor can the deduction. All the ideas in the field of science arise through Abduction. The Abduction consists of studying facts and design a theory to explain them. The only justification that it has is that if we someday arrive to an understanding of things, it can only be achieved through this.92 (our translation)

Thus, the deduction consists of a necessary inference to prove that something must be because the inference is valid only if there is a real relationship between the provisions in the premises and the statement of conclusion. Induction consists of an experimental inference, proving that something really is, as part of a theory of how to deduce phenomena to verify its correlation with a theory. Abduction, in turn, proves that something can be (hypothetical inference).[93]-[94] In this manner, Pablo Bonorino states that, in the deduction, exist rule-case-result, in induction, case-result-rule, and in abduction, rule-result-case.[95] Likewise, Peirce explains that:

> Abduction is the process of forming explanatory hypotheses. It is the only logical operation which introduces a new idea, because induction does nothing but determine a value, and deduction merely develops the necessary consequences of a pure hypothesis. The Deduction proves that something must be. Induction shows that something actually is operative; Abduction simply suggests that something may be. Its only justification is that from its suggestion a deduction can draw a prediction that can be verified by induction, and this, if we are supposed to learn something or to understand the phenomena, must be accomplished by abduction.[96] (our translation)

With regard to tributary incidence matrix-rule, by analysing the general and abstract norm, norm is abducted, in a sense that its consequences are deduced, and finally, by its application, individual and concrete norm is realized, which incorporates the event and determines a specific legal consequence for the specific case – in praeterito, according to Peirce.[97] facts[98], denominated by Jakobson,[99] or Carvalho's social – in the ultimate analysis, tributary – as statements have iconic nature, since they are constituted in pictures of a fresh past experience, which is precisely what happens with the enunciation of the event. At the moment of its expression in verbal language, the occurrence itself is now past and in the elaboration of the statement was selection of event predicates, considered important enough to be registered in language, hence the iconic nature of the semiotic facts, social or tributary.[100] Clarice Araujo von Oertzen explains that:

In the meantime, it is important to clarify that the "semiotic"

> Norms, in its abstraction and generality, have an iconic character, in dimension in which hypothesis are described, declare the qualities in which sufficiency determines an incidence. The regulation is also general to the extent that bind classes of legal subjects involved in the situation hypothetically described. So for the incidence to occur, it is necessary to have some attraction or affinity between the characteristics of the factual support and predicates that, assuming the legal rule, reflect the election of the legislator in order to qualify the conduct and to regulate relations.101 (our translation)

As far as the incidence implies similarity between (particular) predicates existing in factual support and (general) present in hypothetical general rule, this association will take place only when the interpreter makes the comparison between quality described in the rule and replication of this quality, effectively present in factual support.[102] This similarity when dealing with factual support, implies the interpretation of experience, along the lines of Peirce's theory, as well described by Lauro Frederico Barbosa da Silveira:

> In a crude game of action and reaction doesn't cease, however,

[98] "This representation of reality, whether verbal or non-verbal signs, is what I call, observing Jakobson, semiotic fact, which is in the condition of social fact for the purposes of legal incidence" (our translation). > process of effectively interpreting experience. The moment of the interpretation manifests what Peirce termed semiosis. We are led to confer meaning to the phenomena and to take possession of a path by which we can interact with it in the future, and teach others to do so. This is the logical dimension of conduit determination through which we integrate the tradition and we collaborate as cultural agents. We shall then be able to perpetuate an experience in the continuity of time.103 (our translation)

Thus, only the iconic function may realize engagement between particular and general, even when there doesn't exist a material identity between object and sign.[104] Therefore, one can not help but notice that the icons do not produce infallible conclusions, since Semiotics proposes the abstraction of reasoning, but consists of a science that produces eminently fallible judgements.[105] Peirce explains further about the iconic quality in comparison with a possibility of opening:

> Every icon participates in a character more or less plain, open (overt) to its Object. Every one and all of them share the most open characteristics of all the falsehoods and deceptions - its (their) Openness (Overtness). However, they have more to do with the living character of truth than with Symbols or Indexes. The icon does not stand for [does not substitute] this or that existent thing, unambiguously - as does the Index. When it comes to its existence, Object may be a pure fiction. Much less is Object something we may discover under normal circumstances. On the other hand, icon provides certainty (assurance) to the highest degree. That is to say, that the Icon exhibits before it is contemplated by mind - Form of the Icon, which is also the Object – has to be logically possible. (...) Now the reason has to manifests its conclusion. Therefore, it should engage primarily in ways, which are the main objects of rational insight. Following this, icons are especially required for reasoning. (…) It is true that we do not learn what should be through the simple inspection of something. But when we say that deductive reasoning is necessary, we do not mean, of course, that it is infallible. What we want to say, precisely, is that the conclusion is derived from the form of the relations proposed in the premise. (...) The principal need that icons have refers to the need to show

> Forms of synthesis of the elements of thought. To be more precise, the icons can not represent anything other than Forms and Feelings. (...) The highest type of synthesis is that the mind is not compelled to make the attractions of their own inner feelings or representations, nor by a transcendental force of necessity, but rather in the interest of their own "I think" synthesizer; and this the mind does by introducing an idea that is not contained in the data, and that produces connections which otherwise these data would not have. (...)[106] (our translation)

It is seen, therefore, that only the abduction allows the creation of new means adopting an explanatory hypothesis that can be subjected to experimenting in order to confirm it or disprove it, marking thus, the fallibility, because it is treated as possible, but not absolute answer.

Hence Flavianne Nobrega clarifies that "The meanings of intellectual concepts of pragmatism [and therefore the resulting abductive method] are not definitive, but dynamic and open, resting on the sum of all foreseeable practical consequences of something which number is undefined (...)"[107]. Even Peirce places the strength of the validity of the meaning of the concept into the consequences because, from the philosophical perspective, the effects "(...) can be 'conceived"[108].

This perspective of openness is consistent with the one proposed by Eco in "The Open Work", by which is the interpreter who holds semiosis. In the specific field of tributary incidence matrix-rule, understanding the semiosis of the legal norm (tributary), as well as the experiences underlying the interpretation are the tasks satisfactorily performed by the Semiotics of Law. By the application, to reiterate, of abductive method – as a creation of the new for the future reference –, and the pragmatic approach –, which is concerned with the relation of signs to interpreters.

This is because legal norm is a result of a series of innovative interpretative processes: starting from the law or normative statement, seeking legal proposition, abstract and general form, to be applied to the case sub judice upon its interpretation – on account of polysemic and open texture of legal texts, which causes that the activity of interpretation introduces a certain degree of creativity and choice[109] – through interpreter, with respect to individual and concrete norm able to solve the concrete conflict.

In this dimension, the conception of Law and, consequently, of the legal norm as presented in "The Open Work" allows interpreter to participate in the construction of meaning – the moment in which his experiences are employed in order to determine the content of the signs contained in the text.

4 Conclusion

As evidenced through this work, Peirce's theory, or Semiotics, revolves around the idea of sign, that is precisely the starting point for the interpreter when taking into consideration the pragmatic dimension of semiosis. In the case of the Semiotics of Law, the interpretation of the legal statements is understood as the formal structures that support legal norms.

The legal norm, in turn, designed as a legal proposition, is constructed from the legal statement resulting precisely in the interpretative (or semiotic) process. Hence one can say that legal norms have the same syntactic schema, but vary on semantic level, at the moment in which, by the tributary incidence matrix-rule hypothesis (general and abstract norm), the interpreter, influenced by his experiences, constructs the meaning, extracting an individual and concrete norm – the interpretant, which represents a new sign.

Moreover, as every legal norm, the tributary incidence matrix-rule also disciplines future conduct, i.e., of what has not happened yet – and with no certainty that it will actually occur –, taking into the account, however, that similar situations bounded in a time and space occurred in the past. Thus abductive method acquires special relevance, because it proves something can be (hypothetically) or can occur, since it conceives possible effects of the legal norm.

Thereby it is affirmed that the tributary legal norms in the strict sense have an iconic character, eventually, constitute images of past experiences, obviously, already occurred – which can be evidenced through the fact that repeated events are selected and converted, by means of language, into the facts.

Hence, the conception of Law as "The Open Work" and, accordingly, the tributary legal norm, more specifically tributary incidence matrix-rule, enables the interpreter to actively participate in the construction of meaning, drawing upon their own experiences in order to determine the content of legal texts and thus the signs involved.

A hermeneutical review of the principle of legality in tax law

Sarah Amarante de Mendonça Cohen

Abstract: Tax Law, while dealing with the relevant value of freedom, is a branch of law where the preservation of legal certainty proves exceedingly necessary. In this context, there are the legal principles that aim to restrict state power, among which the principle of legality is one of the postulates of greater importance. In Tax Law the principle of legality is specialized in a 'formal' sense, and in a 'typical' sense, also known as the principle of 'conceptual specification'. Therefore, in law enforcement or application, strict and textualist interpretation must prevail above legal discretion. Nevertheless, there are authors who advocate a more flexible form of interpretation of Tax Law, loosening the density rules in favor of giving interpreters greater margins of discretion.

Given: the impossibility of conceiving the principle of legality in Tax Law without dealing with the question of the interpretation and application of the standard; the need to rethink the principle of legality in Tax Law, either because: i) the traditional theory does not answer modern criticisms that are leveled against it, either because: i) part of modern reproaches leveled against the traditional view are relevant, whether as a matter of evolution of society and of science itself, either because legal positivism, the philosophical basis that sustains the traditional perspective, does not develop an adequate theory of interpretation of the standard; and, on the other hand, the impertinence of most of the solutions proposed by modern theories that aim to review the principle of legality in Tax Law, once they: i) implode its basis, ignoring the stony historical path of its construction, and ii) most of the criticisms leveled against legal positivism, the philosophical basis that supports the traditional view, fall within unfounded rhetoric; we reach the goal of this paper that is, therefore, to fill these gaps, by rethinking or reviewing the principle of legality in Tax Law within a hermeneutic or interpretive perspective, by means of a new legal and scientific formulation, that is, the 'Planning Theory of Law' of Scott Shapiro, that meets the needs of renewal of the traditional theory, but does not necessarily give in to reverting its logic and opening space for discretion.

Keywords: tax law, principle of legality, legal positivism.

1. Since ancient times, taxation has been sensitive to people's demands and wills. This is why many of the riots triggered in history were launched by reasons involved with taxation[1].

From the moment that, historically, tax transforms itself from being an instrument of power and domination to become subjected to the law, legal standards start to be the basis that will shape tax imposition and even the way to interpret legal norms.

These legal standards usually restrict state power, defining its limits. This is why one can say that the Tax Law deals with the value of 'freedom', as long as it establishes the limits of State action so that there is no abuse in individual freedom.

In this context, whether historical, or involving the characteristics of tax controversies, it can be said that, especially in Tax Law, the maintenance of legal certainty proves to be needed. In the Brazilian legal system, for example, we can highlight the existence of several principles, which are based in the Federal Constitution of 1988, that impose limitations in the power to tax. We can mention, among others, the principles of 'previousness' of the financial year, prohibition of ex post facto laws, ability to pay, prohibition of confiscation[2], and, above all, the principle of legality, which is the foundation of the legal system itself.

In Tax Law the principle of legality is specialized in a 'formal' sense, and in a 'typical' sense, also known as the principle of 'conceptual specification'[3]. According to Derzi[4], in both Criminal and Tax Law, in which the need for legal certainty exists in a stronger sense, 'classificatory concepts' prevail, instead of the typus itself (fluid concepts that accept a great deal of discretion in interpretation).

According to Derzi[5], it was the German doctrine that introduced the term Tatbestand (fattispecie, or typus in the 'improper' sense) in Tax Law, especially Albert Hensel (Steuerrecht 1924), that imported to Tax Law the structure of the criminal standard created by Beling.

The absolute need of the legal standard in Tax Law was also pioneered in Germany by Flume and Kruse, and in Italy by B. Cocivera and

A.D. Gianini[6]. Alberto Xavier[7], in Portugal and Brazil, defends a similar thought, that is, that the legal standard should be complete and detailed to orient the activities of the Executive and Judicial powers.

Nevertheless, there are authors that think in a different perspective, and support the adoption, in Tax Law, of 'open and fluid concepts', that is, the adoption of the typus in its original sense. We can mention the authors Ball, Hanraths, Hoeres, Heigl and Kleist, Wallis, Klausing, Maunz, Spitaler, Schmidt, Ziztlaff, Webwe, Isensee and Arndt[8] that adopt this point of view according to which one can create 'presumptions, patterns of values, sums, etc.' justified by the principle of practicality.

In Germany there was also the emergence of the doctrine of the 'economic interpretation of Tax Law'. Headed by Enno Becker, who was the mentor of the German Tax Code of 1919 (Reichsabgabenordnung - RAO), standards of economic consideration of Tax Law were introduced in it, according to which the formalities adopted by the taxpayer could be disregarded by the agent of the Executive or Judicial powers in favor of its economic content.

According to Derzi[9], the economic interpretation of the tax law 'is fully developed in Germany at various times, but served at one time to the development of tax problems and legal uncertainty, and to the totalitarian and fascist Reich'.

The doctrine of economic interpretation gains strength also in Italy through E. Vanoni and Grizziotti, and Dino Jarach, later settled in Argentina[10]. Apart from the economic interpretation there is also the current trend of the pure and simple criticism of the principle of legality. Casalta Nabais[11], in Portugal, criticizes the 'traditional principle of legality in Tax Law' based on 'legal positivism', and suggests that the principle should be more 'flexible', loosening its normative density in favor of granting a margin of free decision to tax authorities. The portuguese author sets that the principle of legality in Tax Law was a full guarantee for the taxpayer in the historical context of its formation. However, with the rise of the welfare state, the increasing complexity of the tax system and the evolving of economic realities, the principle of legality has been transformed into an impotent force, which makes the empowering of state agents necessary.

Torres[12], alike Nabais, says that in our country 'positivism has sought to minimize the importance of administrative interpretation' and that this 'formalist positivist' view that defends a strong principle of legality would be consistent with an 'authoritarian ideology'. The author defends, alas, that the principle of legality would not be absolute, and that Tax Law could use undetermined concepts that should be completed, and interpreted by the Executive power.

According to Lenio Streck[13] – even though this Brazilian author does not deal directly with Tax Law – we are in a new philosophical paradigm in which Law has assumed a hermeneutical visage, especially after the Second World War. In this sense, the 'liberal-individualistic' paradigm would be over, and the traditional hermeneutics would also be antiquated. He creates, therefore, the basis of what he calls the 'new critics of Law' based on Heidegger's philosophy, seeking to overcome the 'subject-object scheme'.

Therefore, these authors that defend that the principle of legality should be more flexible, are located, more broadly, within the so-called 'anti-positivist rhetoric', accusing this doctrine to be decadent and wrong. By easing the principle of legality, the patrons of this vision implode legal certainty in favor of a more 'modern' or 'postmodern' approach of Law, justifying, therefore, greater freedom of the state and less protection to the citizen-taxpayer.

On the one hand, the criticism that the principle of legality in Tax Law needs new formulation or, at least, needs to be rethought according to a new paradigm, as a matter of evolution of society and of science itself, seems justified. At least, the defense of the principle of legality on its traditional bases does not respond to criticisms that are modernly directed against it. While some of the criticism directed against classical legal positivism (which would serve as the philosophical basis for thinking about the principle of legality in Tax Law in its traditional formulation) , are merely rhetorical and therefore irrelevant, we must admit that the main creators of classical legal positivism, as Hans Kelsen and H.L A. Hart, did not thoroughly and deeply develop a theory of the interpretation of the standard and its limits.

Likewise, the traditional theory about the principle of legality in [12] TORRES, 2000, p. 95.

[13] STRECK, 2011, p. 17-22 e 376.

Tax Law is highly focused on a thorough analysis of the legal norm as such, but has not addressed the issue from the point of view of interpretation.

Thus, one can no longer think about the principle of legality in Tax Law without dealing with the issue of interpretation and application of the standard, because we can no longer understand legality as the simple 'passing of the standard through the engines of parliament', that is, one can no longer conceive tax consent without regard to the previous process of creation of the rule, neither can we think about the principle of legality disregarding the later moment of interpretation and application of the standard itself.

The importance of this issue is the fact that depending on the interpretive rules to be adopted, there could be a complete distortion or emptying of the idea of legality and tax consent, invalidating its own process of creation. In other words, one can no longer think about legality only from its genesis, thus this principle, in complex and organized societies, acquires a dimension that goes beyond the maxim of 'no taxation without representation' established in the Magna Charta of 1215. In other words, thinking about the principle of legality in Tax Law involves tackling, ultimately, the question about the hermeneutics of the standard.

Therefore, an interpretive review of the principle of legality in Tax Law is necessary because the question of legality ends up in a matter of hermeneutics. On the other hand, although an interpretive review of the principle of legality in Tax Law is necessary, because part of the reproaches that are directed against its traditional view are consistent, the review of this principle should not necessarily entail the implosion of its traditional basis and revert completely its logic, as done by the current critics of this principle, as we have seen above, ending up with the consequence of enhancing state power and diminishing legal certainty.

If, on one hand, we defend the need of revising the principle of legality in Tax Law, focused mainly on the hermeneutical question involved in it, on the other hand, modern theories that do review the principal of legality seem to implode its basis, disregarding the hard and painful historical path of its construction. Thus, a reinterpretation of the principle of legality shall be done under a new legal-scientific formulation, which means that this shall be done under an innovative light that answers the needs of renewal of the traditional theory - or at least counters the criticisms that are modernly directed against it -, while, at the same time, addresses the issue of the hermeneutics of the standard, and does not necessarily invert its logic opening room for free discretion.

2. The review that we propose will be done based on the doctrine of Scott J. Shapiro, in his ouvre "Legality", published in 2011, that traces, objectively, a methodology of interpretation of Law in the positivist fashion. The author answers the question of 'what is right' to help the resolution of other major legal issues, among them the question of interpretation. The professor from Yale Law School bases his theory on the 'philosophy of action', and argues that 'law cannot be understood simply in terms of rules. Legal systems are best understood as highly complex and sophisticated tools for creating and applying plans. Shifting the focus of jurisprudence in this way – from rules to plans – not only resolves many of the most vexing puzzles about the nature of law but has profound implications for legal practice as well.'[14]

The main point of the theory of Scott Shapiro is the conceiving the fundamental law as 'plans', that is, that 'legal activity is best understood as social planning, and the legal rules themselves are plans or standards in the style of plans'[15].

Scott Shapiro develops a theory that he calls the 'Planning Theory of Law', according to which the rules of the legal system express the social planner's choices with regard to the system's 'economy of trust'. Thus, Shapiro draws a complete and innovative theory of legal interpretation, according to which the correct interpretive method must be identified from the allocation of trust and distrust in the system.

To offer an alternative to points of the positivist doctrine that he considers flawed, the author provides the solution in order to understand the fundamental rules of a system as plans. The plans function would be to structure legal activity so that members can work together and fulfill values that otherwise would be unachievable. He believes, therefore, that conceiving the fundamental rules of the system as plans not only demands a positivist concept of Law, but responds to the 'paradox of possibility', that is, answers the question of how authority is possible. According to Shapiro, therefore, the fundamental rules of law reside in the ability of individuals to possess and adopt plans, and this power is not conferred by morality, but by the fact that we are 'planner beings'.

The author develops the theory that legal activity is a form of social planning. The legal rules would be 'generalized plans', or 'standards in the style of plans', edited by those who are authorized to plan for others. Trials, therefore, involve the application of those plans to whom they apply .

Shapiro develops what the calls the "Planning Theory of Law", according to which:

> [...] legal systems are institutions of social planning and their fundamental aim is to compensate for the deficiencies of alternative forms of planning in the circumstances of legality. (SHAPIRO, 2011, p. 171).

Thus, the main claim of 'Planning Theory of Law' is that Law is a mechanism of social planning, whose goal is to 'rectify the moral deficiencies of the circumstances of legality'[16].

From the description of 'Planning Theory of Law', the author goes on to demonstrate the practical implications of his theory, especially in relation to the interpretation of statutes, that is, he starts to show how the theory affects the practice of legal interpretation.

From this point the author outlines a theory or methodology of interpretation that conforms to his planning theory. This, in turn, lies within an exclusive positivist conception, and not in an inclusive positivist framework, since the existence and content of a plan cannot be determined by facts whose existence the plan seeks to solve.

Shapiro describes his theory of interpretation (within the 'Planning Theory of Law') , as one that takes the attitudes of 'trust' and ' distrust ' presupposed by the system as central to the choice of the interpretive methodology.

The 'Planning Theory of Law', therefore, defends that the attitudes of trust and distrust are central to determining the interpretive methodology. Trust would be important in the interpretation of Law precisely because trust matters in interpreting plans.

Plans, thus, would be sophisticated devices to deal with trust and distrust, 'allowing people to capitalize on having faith in others, or to compensate for the lack of faith'[17]. Thus, plans deal with distrust by detailed provisions and the use of some evaluative concepts that require a low degree of discretion in their application. Another way to deal with mistrust would be denying to assign important roles to those who do not have appropriate conditions or characteristics to perform the tasks.

On the other hand, the use of generic provisions allows the planner to capitalize on trust on others, either by assigning important tasks to those who have the power to solve them, or even assigning the power to plan to these same individuals . The same plan, incidentally, can simultaneously fulfill the function of assigning and denying confidence.

Thus, plans, since they have no content, can work with the distribution of trust, which the author gives the name of 'economy of trust'. Plans can fulfill their role in managing trust, only if the interpretive methodology respects the 'economy of trust', that is, 'the interpretive methodology must not allocate decision-making power in a manner inconsistent with the attitudes of trust presupposed by the plan'. [18]

Consequently, the more 'generous' a plan is, more discretion does it assign to the applicator, that does not have to stick to the literal meaning of the text. On the other hand, a set of attitudes that generate more distrust, also lead to a more restrictive approach, requiring the applicator to stick more to the text or intentions and expectations of the planner.

Therefore, as the plans take into account the attitudes of trust and distrust, the proper way to interpret a plan cannot frustrate this function.

The choice of a specific methodology of interpretation must be determined in a similar manner, taking into account the 'economy of trust' as 'a distrustful system requires a constraining methodology, such as textualism, whereas a more trusting system demands one according greater interpretive discretion'[19].

Coming back to the question about the interpretation of plans, it shall be consistent with the 'economy of trust' of the legal system, that is, the higher the trust, the lower the regulation of the matter and the discretion of the performer, the greater the distrust, greater the regulation of matter, and lower the discretion of the performer.

According to the author, there is not, therefore, a correct interpretation to a legal text, since the legal interpretation is always relative or dependent on the actor. So proper interpretive methodology, beyond the criteria of the degree of confidence given to actors, must still be based on other criteria, as that of the role played by these actors. Thus, the meta-interpreter, according Shapiro, within the 'Planning Theory of Law', must fulfill three tasks, namely: a) to verify the fundamental properties of various interpretive methodologies; b) extract certain information from the institutional structure of the legal system, that is, the attitude of planners regarding the competence and character of certain actors, beyond the goals they should promote; and c) the interpreter must, finally, from the conclusions reached in the first two steps, determine the appropriate interpretive methodology, that is, should make sure about which methods best achieve the aims in light of these attitudes of trust[20] .

The author, therefore, names these steps as 'Specification', Extraction' and 'Evaluation'. In these steps the interpreter must answer some questions. In verbis:

> 1. Specification – What competence and character are needed to implement different sorts of interpretive procedures? 2. Extraction – (a) What competence and character that the planners believed actors possess led them to entrust actors with the task that they did? (b) Which systemic objectives did the planners intend various actors to further and realize? 3. Evaluation – Which procedure best furthers and realizes the systemic objectives that the actors were intended to further and realize, assuming that they have extracted competence and character? (SHAPIRO, 2011, p. 359)

Thus, in the specification phase it must be taken into account the various interpretive methodologies and their differences, trying to identify in the system what are their differences and the skills required for its implementation. In the extraction phase, in turn, the interpreter must assert, from a systemic point of view, if the interpreters and other actors, in fact, have the skills to implement the methodology effectively. In the extraction process, from the identification of the 'economy of trust', the interpreter must extract the objectives entrusted to the actors in the system. The last step, the evaluation, is more general, and implies a mental experiment on the part of the interpreter .

The author concludes, thus, that, in general, systems with low absolute confidence, for example, systems whose purposes include the protection of freedom and autonomy are incompatible with highly discretionary interpretative procedures. This does not mean, however, that highly restrictive interpretive methods are needed, because if there is a high relative reliability, the system could support a methodology to

Described these steps, and beyond the issue of trust, well dealt by Shapiro while describing his interpretive methodology, he highlights that there is still another factor that has to be considered, that has to do with the competitive relationship between social planners.

Interestingly, this theory of interpretation opens room for theoretical disagreements, that is, interpreters may disagree about the appropriate methodology to be applied in a case, the distribution of trust and distrust, and various other aspects, that is, the proper interpretive methodology is established from the goals of the planners, and not based on a moral argument.

This apparent 'flaw' of the theory is, at the same time, its quality, to the extent that a theory of law '[...] should account for the intelligibility of theoretical disagreements, not necessarily provide a resolution to them' and 'in other words, ought to show that it makes sense for participants to disagree with each other about the grounds of law'[21].

Last but not least, Shapiro argues that the rule of law is only served when those engaged in legal interpretation are faithful to the vision embodied by the system. That is, interpreters should not be based on their own ideas, or take advantage of skills that were not granted to them in the interpretive process. They must also work collaboratively when political relations are competitive , or vice versa .

Nevertheless, in our point of view, and for our purposes, the main quality of the theory of Shapiro and responsive to the aims of this work, is not exactly the question of how he conceives Law, but the fact that Shapiro fills the gap left by legal positivism on legal interpretation. Thus, Shapiro overcomes this lack of the traditional positivist theories, addressing the question of interpretation of the standards and legal argumentation, and proposes a (positivist) interpretation methodology.

Seen the central ideas of the doctrine of Shapiro, we shall apply them to Brazilian Tax Law, for the purpose of the announced 'hermeneutical review of the principle of legality' that we wish to engage in.

3. Addressing the central issue of the hermeneutical review of the principle of legality in the Tax Law, as announced in the introduction, and adopting the interpretive methodology of Scott Shapiro, we shall apply it to Brazilian Tax Law by analyzing the system to identify which is the 'economy of trust' adopted and the degree of conflict in the

We shall do this by following the steps suggested by Shapiro (we shall not address the specification phase, as we consider it quite abstract, because it turns to the analysis, in a generic plan, of what are the skills and character necessary to implement various types of interpretative procedures, which is not relevant for our purposes). Thus, we shall move to the phases of extraction and evaluation:

i) Extraction – (a) What competence and character that the planners believed actors possess led them to entrust actors with the task that they did? (b) Which systemic objectives did the planners intend various actors to further and realize?

Answering this question, we can identify that the 'planners' of the national tax system considered that the tax matter has a high degree of conflict, with a severe level of mistrust (for reasons, moreover, evident, since tax imposition, throughout history, as noted, was the object of many revolts and uprisings, for violating the asset freedom of the citizen-taxpayer). Planners of the national Brazilian tax system consider that the tasks to be assigned to actors in the Legislative power should be larger than the tasks assigned to actors in the Executive and Judiciary power. That means that the system planners have granted more confidence to parliament, giving it more power, claiming that, systemically, there must be a severe separation between the three branches of powers, preventing the Executive and the Judiciary (to whom they granted less confidence) to perform people's representative tasks. Thus, the system planners did not intend that the actors of the Executive and Judicial powers perform the task of legislating, and therefore did not shape the system in this way. These conclusions can be reached from the examination of the Brazilian legal system (Federal Constitution of 1998, National Tax Code and other statutes), because the norms are closely tied up, so as to ensure, firstly, the rights of the taxpayer against the excesses of the Executive and Judicial branches of power, and to a lesser extent, of the Legislative power.

ii) Evaluation – Which procedure best furthers and realizes the systemic objectives that the actors were intended to further and realize, assuming that they have extracted competence and character?

The interpretive procedure that best performs the systemic objectives that actors were tasked to promote and carry out in the Brazilian tax system is the method of strict interpretation of law and adoption of legality and the 'typus' in the 'improper' sense, that is, the adoption of classificatory concepts. This is because this kind of interpretation fulfills the system planner's aims, because the planner has conceived Tax Law as a branch of law in which there is a high level of conflict. The planner, therefore, does not give the interpreter of Tax Law a high degree of confidence in Brazilian law and did not grant him the task of creatively interpreting Tax Law, because it would imply offense to the general framework of the system.

This is, therefore, the hermeneutical review of the principle of legality in Tax Law since, under new legal and scientific formulation, we have confirmed the need to adopt the method of strict interpretation, legality in an absolute sense and the adoption of the 'typus' as mentioned above. This hermeneutical method regards the frame of the national tax system as is was thought and planned by its architects.

In other words, this new interpretative view has the advantage of responding to the shortcomings of classical legal positivism and the traditional theory of closure of the 'typus', but do not give in to unfounded criticism leveled against the traditional theory based on the anti-positivist rhetoric. That is, within the present framework of the national tax system and its rules, we can conclude that the system did not allocate trust to the interpreters so that there can be an abuse of discretionary interpretation techniques, which implies that the best method of interpretation to be applied, that is, the interpretive method that prima facie best responds to the wishes of the planners is still the method of interpretation that adopts strict interpretation of law.

Jurisprudential Ghetto of Zionism

Luís Homem[1]

Abstract: Corroborating at the back some twenty-five centuries of persecution of the Jews, the Papal bull issued by Pope Paul IV in the 1555 Cum nimis absurdum which confined the people from the Land of Judaea, in the case of Venice, to the neighborhood of Ghetto, not only popularized a geopolitical topic of discrimination right after Machiavelli´s death, but also in the state-run ecclesiastical manner lead-sealed and promulgated what was a preexistent reality in Europe, at least since the XIIIth century. Indeed, in the Islamized territory, the Jewish quarters (Ḥāra, Mallāḥ) were for a long time present, and even predated Islam itself. Yet, when this firsthand self and secondhand outer segregated norm took place in the context of the XXth century Shoah, first in Lodz and afterwards widely throughout in the Warsaw Ghetto, it was very different from the historical premises.

In the same line of reflection, Zionism, though intellectually affiliated with the post-French Revolution time of newborn nation-states and fresh nationalisms until the firmness of its ideology under the political spell of Theodor Herzl in the XIXth century, following severe pogroms in Russia and the Dreyfus scandal observed in person, was characterized by reaction to discrimination, instead of emancipation alone.

Therefore, Zionism, especially when materialized Der Judenstaat with the formation of Israel in 1948, was better represented by a direct reflex of the Shoah than by secular liberation and upholding of Jewish identity, just as Messianism (including false Messianism, inside and outside Judaism, in which we include Christianity, from the Jews´ point of view, and Judaism from atheists´ point of view) rose alike from subjugation and discrimination.

It shall not be forgotten, thus, that theoretically the proponents of Zionism (as throughout Jewish History, when Zionism was not even born) did just the same as the Third Reich: the former before the Balfour Declaration and soon after the formation of Israel, the latter before the conception of the final solution of the Jewish Question at the Wannsee Conference, actively sought and restlessly negotiated a world territory Ghetto, a Jewish in situ otherness put far-off in the globe, not necessarily Palestine, and necessarily not Palestine, ever more so.

This was as though both positively in despair and negatively in hate re-enacted Pope Paul IV´s long-dated bull to International Law. Uganda, Argentina, Madagascar, U.S.S.R, etc., as throughout centuries and increasingly many others, were essentially alternatives to the Philosophy of Law, inasmuch as to Palestine.

1. Introduction

This paper purports to present a short digest of relevant elements that can best explain the geo, philosophia et lex situs of the land of Judea and Palestine, most especially of Jerusalem, by presenting in two sections – Mount Zion and Temple Mount Biogeography and Philosophy of Law and Zionism – a simple group of three cogitationes causae for the first section and two ensuing explanationes for the second section, bearing the reasons behind the Ghetto materialization of Political Zionism and of the State of Israel that still rests upon us, turning subsidiary the blemished relation between ius gentium (the expected discretion assent by people´s opinion), and ius inter gentes (archetypal in International Law), of greater conceptual and organic substrata that can help us to understand best the Philosophy of Law and Zionism inter arma et leges confluence.

Mount Zion and Temple Mount Biogeography

If it was imagined the intersection of the Disciplines of Geopolitics and Geophysics, in a canvas drawn by History, ab experimenti usque facti, in spite of most of our maps being mental, and even more so the Historical, for the case of the land of Judea and Palestine, the result would be very illustrative. Jerusalem, in particular, seems to have sublimed the umbilicus mundi status, degrading Imperial Rome to a faint replica. This has majestically encountered expression in the professed orbis terrarum T-O maps, else called Beatine Middle Ages maps, where "T" is the Mediterranean Sea (Mare Nostrum), the Nile and the Don (the Greek Tanais), and "O" the all-surrounding ocean, presumably of either a disc-shaped earth or approximately a sphere, wherein all-equal in size Continents of Europe, Asia and Africa are amalgamated, with the Holy city of Jerusalem as its center (in other versions with the Aegean and Black Sea to the West, and the Red Sea and the Nile at the East). This was so as passing the scorching climate of the land to the south of Libya, all through uninhabited Africa, the antipodes were also outside a meandering red sea, eloquently an elongation of both cartography and imagination.

As Mount Parnassus in Ancient Greece was thought to be ὀμφαλός (the omphalus) of the world, presumably the situs where two eagles sent by Zeus would have met after having each covered the earth's length to opposite sides, so too Mount Zion, place of the Temple Mount, from where Zionism got his name, is Judaism's symbolical religious axis mundi. The meteorite mater et origo belief by the Greeks, in contrast to the dust and clay Hebrew belief wherefrom Adam, the first man, was molded does not have sufficient enough differences not to have permitted the very existence of one ὀμφαλός (omphalus) in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem, the assumed site of Christ's Crucifixion and Calvary.

We know today that the surface area of the Earth is more or less 510 million square kilometers (5.1×10^8 km^2), with only about 150 million square kilometers corresponding to land. As we are referring originally to Ancient World Cosmogony, the peripatetically proportioned surface, as you might say, would have been of approximately 30 million square kilometers, generously a bit more so if we consider the whole Mediterranean and the Dead Sea, i.e., about the size of the Moon (37.9 million km^2 and only about 7% of the Earth). This is to explain how Ancient World Jewish and Post-Christian Medieval Cosmogony was retrospectively nearly a corridor from and to Jerusalem with the heavenly sky as a scenario.

And even more so throughout History, furthermore wholly augmented since the Hellenistic influence, without which Jewish-Christian-Islamic posterity would not have been the same as today's, it seems now greatly that Jerusalem, the Judea and Palestine are vested with the importance of a mundus constituo locus, as if it were its centre, in a T-O map fashion. A navel with encircling Europe, Asia and Africa, as if Tectonics and Geography's profound forces had entered Religious and Law Philosophy along with Geopolitics, behaving as if in actual fact deserved exclusively the laws of Geophysics, it has noticeably shaped both the Abrahamic and Monotheistic plateau of all the three greatest in numbers, Judaism, Christianity and Islam. Conjoining with this the persistent Israeli-Palestine conflict, they are, altogether, the main reasons behind the equivalent time-lasting Jerusalem´s aura as a sort of threefold combination, as we choose to describe:

(1) First, both Euclidian Geometry's and Pre-Christian to Kabbalah's תוֹרִיפְס (Sephirot; emanations) centro et cuore mundi, cast as a kind of Geo-Corporeity in the making, until the advent of Modern Cartography and Machiavelli´s "Geopolitics", wherein the earth is compared to a body, and Jerusalem as the head and heart;

(2) In second order, resulting from and impossible without the previous, a sort of both Newtonian and Hobbesian Universal Gravitation and Law Philosophy combination, wherefrom "Geopolitics" seems to have acquired Classical Mechanics Principia, having also gained a genre of Solar and Telluric Absolutism only to be ended gradually after the French Revolution.

It is to be noted that, having in mind Hannah´s Arendt concept "On Revolution" as a transference from De Revolutionibus Orbium Coelestium to Potestas (Power), what we want to express is that, in terms of a Symbolic Anthropology, the new Heliocentric and Earth Mass XVIIth century Physics had a correspondence in the re-ordering of Power Semiotics. This new Modern Power Semiotics almost, and in the least, reinvented the terms of Neolithic and Proto-Indo-European solar deities, helping to understand best the XVIIIth century category of le Roi-soleil, with this closing, as we see it, the Potestas (Power) cycle that had started with Elagabalo Sol Invictus and Paganism, before Christianity had become the official religion of the Roman Empire. Also to be noted is the fact that this period (from the death of Machiavelli in 1527 to the date of the Constitutional Republic French Directoire in 1799) was the period in History in which Palestine and Jerusalem had the nethermost Demographics (150 to 300 thousands in the range of years for Palestine). This seemingly absens status corresponded not only to the long-dated hard-to-recover pitfall of Black Death in the XIVth century, but also to the Discoveries initiated by the Portuguese that circumvallated Marco Polo's footsteps by oceans, and also to the wait of Ottoman Suleiman´s magnificence in the early XVIth century, liberating Jerusalem from the numbers of a poor hamlet (6 thousand or less in population). Recapitulating, this was the moment at which "Geopolitics" for the first time had an object and a method, and in which, contingently, Palestine was a far historical past dream. This scenario lasted until the end of the XIXth century and the first Zionist Aliyah.

(3) And at last, we ask, what has exactly followed to contemporaneity after the Ancient atlas centro et cuore corpora envisagement, subsequently one Modern potestas, orbis et tellus de revolutionibus so powerful in conception that symbolically reenacts today in mental cartography, Isidore of Seville's description of Jerusalem as center De Terra et Partibus?

We believe that one such orbis terrarum centrum category in contemporaneity's Scientific and Post-Modern community of peoples is only possible by a conjugation of both the traditions, that is, (1) one of more symbolical characterization and the (2) other of a Rationalist Scientific kind. The effect is probably more pliable by one such conceptual array as found in the XXth century original ground of Geopolitics.

The result is, thus, a new dimension to Mircea Eliade's choice of words in the expression axis mundi in the sense that, not only to Jewish Religion, but very often to Geopolitics expertise, Jerusalem and the Palestine are portrayed, conjoining (1) and (2) as axis revolutionis, not only as if though we were revolving the scrolls of History continuously, but also as though it were a pivot cosmological axis around which the World revolves, in a sort of Philosophy of History spindle, in which the land of Judea and Jerusalem situs would represent inasmuch one Geographical Singularity as one Civilizational Distinctiveness.

Interestingly enough, the Mounting of Jerusalem is intimate with the world's lowest area of depression: the Dead Sea, the Jordan Valley, Israel, West Bank and near Jordan (obligatory elements of both the biblical and the geopolitical plots). Indeed, Jericho's springs and built battlements in the West Bank are the History's oldest human settlements, in point of fact, nearly as ancient as the Holocene (9000 BC). Besides, it demands attention of the fact that Jerusalem, in particular, is one inimitable situs in both T-O maps and contemporaneous Geosystem maps: as the Earth is the only densest and graced by-large water planet of the solar system, turning it habitable, Jerusalem is also a very special situs in representing a sort of minuscule T-O map within the original, with the surrounding Mediterranean and Dead Sea, below the Gulf of Aqaba and the Suez proximity at West, both giving passage to the Red Sea, and primarily the vase shape at the vicinity of the Jordan, Euphrates, Tigris and the Nile, fetching deluge narratives and a bounty impression.

What's more, Jerusalem (31º 47′ N 35º 13′ E) is only 579 miles far from the actual superficial barycenter of the Earth´s mass (40º 52′ N 34º 34′ E) (preferable to saying the "Geographical Centre of Earth", as we need to keep in mind the Renaissance Cosmological lesson of the Space's center being a convention). In actual fact, Charles Piazzi Smith, in the XIXth century pre-Technological and Egyptologist epoch tendency, unintentionally located the site on the Great Pyramid of Giza with adjoining Jerusalem. In the sequel, and wholly conventionally, Greenwich was chosen, by naval criteria, to be the prime Meridian, next to the Royal Astronomer having pronounced himself in favor of the prime Meridian location being in the Giza Pyramid situs. A prime Meridian is just a 180º sphere line, though, while in Piazzi's conception it can be said to have accommodated a sort of Geoid Philosophy, very much in the line of Charles Lyell Geology, who drastically changed the conception of the Historical Sciences and most influenced Darwin´s work.

This is so as if – "as if" in Kantian sense, who curiously was behind the firstly consistent Pangenesis Modern Cosmological idea, and simultaneously critically explored Religion within the Bounds of Bare Reason - Geopolitics and Astrobiology would have met by the hands of Time and History, and Jerusalem, the land of Judea and Palestine would have accrued and amassed a sort of Philosophy of History and Religion mosaic, as if it were an inverse carbon copy.

This is, most evidently, the point at which we refute Toynbee's allegation in the 1950's of Judaism as being a "fossil", as if it were, on our side, a critic within the bounds of bare reason.

This is possibly why Jean-Baptiste du Boyer, the XVIIIth century author of the winning and long-winded novel Lettres Juives, in a most probable fictional tell, is said to have replied, when King Frederick the Great of Prussia asked his ministers for "one single, irrefutable proof of God":

> "Yes, Your Majesty, the Jews"[2]

This quote beholds enough Philosophy of History and Religion bleak and seriousness as to have been elected by Werner Keller to be the frontispiece citation to his monumental Und Wurden Zerstreut Unter Alle Völker, in such fashion given a similar status of argumentum ontologicum

[2] Keller, Werner, (1966) Und Wurden Zerstreut Unter Alle Völker, História do Povo Judeu: da destruição do Templo ano Novo Estado de Israel, Galeria Romana.

as it was instituted by Cecil Roth.

Reiterating the aforementioned, Simon Sebag Montefiore wrote in the Preface to his book Jerusalem, the Biography no more no less than the following:

> "This is the history of Jerusalem as the centre of world history (…)"[3]

Having all this in mind and reflecting critically, neutrally and asymptomatically in this suggested widening scope of conventional XXth century Geopolitics, what can be said to be more peculiar than this umbilicus category of the Land of Judea and Palestine conjoining with the διασπορά (Diaspora) of Hebrews and Jews throughout History, as if the contingencies of the Land propelled a whirlpool of the civilizational kind?

More importantly to the aim of this paper, having Geopolitics proved to be the arena most contradictory to Natural Law, derogating statutory, binding, customary ἦθος (Ethos) except for the Hobbesian nasty and brutish "state of nature" of War, and when fulfilled with evenhandedness and justice through humanness ius positum, excessively feeble compared to Physics, the devastatingly single Law at War, what can Philosophy of Law teach us today? Jurisprudence, which is a sort of natural law of ius positum both combined, under the long-lasting Aristotelian influence of φρόνησις (phronesis), which serves not as a source nor as a doctrine to International Law, seems to be wedged in the selective ambivalence of both respect and disregard towards the three primary sources of International Law: Treaties, International Customs and General Law Principles, as listed under Article 38.1 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

Zionism and Philosophy of Law

It is true that the state of Israel - Der Judenstaat - was overwhelmingly originated by the herculean naturali et positum iura, administrative, literary and diplomatic work of pre-Zionists and Zionists. Both Rabbinical Ashkenazi and Sephardic renowned Yehudah Shlomo Alkalay and Rabbi Zevi Hirsch Kalischer cleaved Reformism and Human-based [3] Montefiore, Simon Sebag, (2012) Jerusalem, The Biography, A Phoenix Paperback, xxxii.

Messianism with Judaism and the Tradition; Moses Hess, pacesetter of the blended Socialist formula, and a forerunner of a sort of Nationalistic GeoJurisprudence, could never imagine that the own counterfeit Marxist "Jewish question" would direct to such a perfected Socialist Zionism; the Bilu movement, the Hovevei Zion (Lovers of Zion) in Russia are all, with others, suitable examples of a new tide that was forming, making in the long run more diverged Orthodoxy and Secular Zionism. As for the case of Zionists, the vanguard Herzl himself with a positive faith similar to Prophecy, literally forespeaking history in the most powdered prospects, Ben Gurion's exemplar realpolitik passage from Executive Agency Leading to International Statesmanship, or Eliezer Ben-Yehuda's spectacular vivid lexicography and linguistic turn, from the Sorbonne in Paris to the land of Israel, are all fitting examples of historical premises that represent properly the edifying forces of Eretz Yisrael. The consummate result could not be completed, though, without the staggering, horrific shadow of the Holocaust. Indeed, the 1930's Jewish Aliyah from Hitler's Germany was the fifth, and a turning point in having forced the British Mandate cause allies to block emigration and, consequently, in fomenting clandestine sabotage and insurgency against the British interests.

My suggestion now is we divide the all-encompassing spectrum of the problem – the Zionist Ghetto – into two paragraphs that can concur by overlapping the already referred three from the First Section of the paper. The choice of listing remains, thus, equal.

(1) The land of Judea and Palestine are not, most certainly, one lacunae in International Law. It is not the case that International Public Law, either within a mandatory facet, or within a non-biddable presumption, has ever distrusted preventively, currently or subsequently any sort of event in time, in a sort of legal and communal absenteeism. Furthermore, Balfour's statement is not an epistolary abeyance rabbit on such matter. It is an inter gens fere actum (a diplomatic act wishfully statutory and further enacting), one that is directed and sprung only from the ruling power of Great Britain, holder by legal commission of the Mandate of Palestine, ratified also by the Council of the League of Nations, and, additionally, literally transferred to the International Sèvres Treaty, having been followed indeed by Arab exhilaration. The later Israeli insurgency against the British forces never took the form of declared war, nor did it drag a sense of diplomatic blameworthiness in relation to the Jewish Agency, in fact, very much to the contrary. It was, maybe in the genesis, certainly not in the outcome and proportions, very similar in contours with the Turkish National Movement and establishing of the Republic of Turkey, next to the abolition of the Ottoman Sultanate and the breaking of the allied forces coalition. These two references are important insofar as the Ottoman Empire was a receptacle for unequivocal loyalty from Arab Palestinians (at which time and never before such a thing as a Palestinian Independent entity was rumored) and helps to explain a sort of Islamic, Arab and Arabized brotherhood ad damnum common plead. Likewise, Jewry´s Shoah experience which gave rise to the preferment of Public International Law after World War II (Britain handed over the Palestine question to the UNSCOP) and to the new sense of iud ad bellum, especially through the Cold War, did not seem to have much impact on Israel, which is not explained merely by post-Colonialism, but seems to have been engendered by reimbursement and compensatory sentiments, often trespassed by preventive war actions. To this effect it has also concurred the extinction of a de novo iure opportunity, after the refusal (and further dismissal through acts of war) from the Arab League of the 1947 UN Partition Plan with Economic Union, signed by the Jewish Agency just as readily as Herzl did so with Uganda, even if it amounted to roughly three quarters of the territory. Even if we were to neglect the formal diplomatic findings of the Peel Comission (1936-1937), and presume it was a sort of preemptive Right act after the Arab strike – impossibly so, as seen by the McDonald White Paper (1939) - the truth is it aimed unequivocally for a binational state solution, in the sequel found not implementable due to Arab boycott. Underpinning the context, we shall not forget, primarily, that it was about the territory of Mandatory Palestine, in a post-Imperialist International Lawful frame, and a commission inquiry set to find a bivalent solution, which had foretold already, in compulsory terms, that population exchange would have to take place. A lawful eviction, ejectment or repossession was foreseen to take place for both sides anyway before forcible aggression in the Civil war. This bone fide ex parte logic, with Jerusalem as a corpus separatum, and a sort of abutted desirable contract within the possibly expected legal and territorial boundaries of a chain of title sovereignty, is, though, not the reason for the debacle to have occurred. This happened so as one disarming, concessional and reparative entente such as that of Versailles is blamed to have had war guilt. A more plausible reason is found in the geopolitical characterization and decay of the Ottoman Empire. If observed carefully, it becomes evident that the Ottoman Empire was the only one which could have replicated Mackinder's geopolitical slogan:

> "Whoever rules East Europe commands the Heartland; whoever rules the Heartland commands the World-Island; whoever rules the World-Island commands the World."[4]

Notwithstanding Mackinder having revised his theory to expand the Heartland, as system-forming layers and attribute more strategic command especially to its inner crescent (Rimland), where Jerusalem is placed, the Ottoman Empire denotes several Geo, Cultural and Political assets that are worth paying attention to. Indeed, to such an author as Spykman, it was actually from the Rimland that the influential power of the Heartland was originally drawn from. The Ottoman Empire, apart from representing the Southern Eurasian power, can be said to hold a special importance from the following idea: it was ever the only terrestrial Empire to subdue continuously and long-lastingly the continental plaque at which meet Central Europe, Central Caucasus and Central Asia, in a kind of Eurasian vocation (at this level, it contrasts enormously with the only other Eurasian power, Russia, in that, apart from never having seized the southward Judea and Palestine, was always very deceiving with the political-ideological soviet acculturation model). Furthermore, it encompasses a spread ethnic affinity and majority in all the preceding Empires (the Hun, the Turkic and Khazar, Seljuks, Mongols, Timurid, Ottoman and Savafid, before the Slavic Russians). Also, it has accrued, as if different strata of influences uplifted to emerge in one territory, the importance of the last Caliphate of Islam, elongating from the Arabian Caliphate. This argument is extremely important, as it sets up a Lyellian geo argumentum that not only raises the importance of the land of Judea and Palestine, as for its roots ab antiquo strata it also helps to explain a commonly held feeling of political liberation, and Arab/Islamic belonging of the countries that were short before under foreign European rule. We can even observe that countries that were part of the shredded (political-ideological only) Russian sphere of influence, a very secluded contemporaneous strata, all in "outer crescent" loca such as Cuba, Venezuela, Bolivia or North-Korea throughout all the XXth century and some still today did not recognize the state of Israel, irrespective of the transference of Socialism to Zionism.

(2) It has become evident how much Der Judenstaat and Philosophy of Law, for the case of International Law, have in common. Apart from having been besieged for centuries, straitened by national laws, they can be said to have been effected at about the same time in an anticipated post-war era. And apart from signatorius et cognitio stigma, (one such notatio that is harder to conceive, for it derives from within Democracy and people's Sovereignty, emanating as well from the body of law that governs relations between or among states or nations) both share vilified and loathed in situs anatopism. Less the United Nations, wherefrom Codification and Progressive Development of International Law stems, Treaties registration and publishing rests, and International Courts and Tribunals judicial power branches from, furthermore as being an outgrowth of Atlantic influence, but most specially Israel. Likewise a certain political-institutional adjournment hinges on both due to the same reasons. More profoundly, the Chartering "boundaries" of the United Nations are similar to the self-declared "Constitutional Revolution" in Israeli Constitutional Law. The reason lies in the fact that the Israeli Judicial Law, weaved in Common and Civil Laws, inasmuch as it has been derived by the United Nations Assembly Resolution 181 (in the form of a Potestas transfer from Mandatory Britain to the Jewish National Council), has been, by the immediate conflagration of war and the successive events, exempted from the practice of the formation of a Constituent Assembly assigned for the task of Constitutional codification and writing. This constitutional potestas was transferred, thus, to the Knesset and the legislative and constitutional bodies merged in the Parliament. The Supreme Court in Israel has welcomed the Eleven Basic Laws, but, still, there is no codified Constitution, resting upon laws and administrative acts a sort of Supreme Judicial legislature with a constituency aura. The case with post-war International Law is similar in that the ratification of a founding document is limited to a Charter, never to be fulfilled with a constituency, and it statutes in complete people's sovereignty, an International Court of Justice with Eleven Security Council permanent members, reaffirming faith in fundamental human rights. Not only that, but it is also that Israel admissibly envisages positively a set apart community of people in the Diaspora contending against enemies of Der Judenstaat, as though commanded by a separate body, and for the exact same reasons the United Nations felt the need to base the International Court of Justice overseas, in the Netherlands (there were also tactical and domestic precaution reasons). There are several nuances in the equation and in the whole nexus, but fundamentally the fact is that the State of Israel had as a legal source International Law itself, and a National Israeli Constitution that has been gridlocked by perdu-

rable war, ensued consequentially a custodian and gatekeeper role by the Supreme Court, very much the key role actor in developing the law, as the principal state branch. It has, thus, all the more considering the Diaspora, a fairly international guised vocation and heritage, truly the emphasis being on Human Rights the judicial guardian wall. It has also played importantly the incomparably difficult act of envisaging "oneself as another", as though communitarian consuetudinary life, had elaborated, in a sort of communal equity, a "constituency of consciousness" and both judicial and moral frameworks of hearing, judging, sanction, rehabilitation and pardon were to find each citizen within and outside the wall. This sums up the characterization of the Jurisprudential Ghetto of Zionism, not only by acquiring the perspective of an intramural national constituency practice, as also, complementarily, by being observable that it has to reaffirm its credo to International Law, which, as seen by the episode of the United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3379, almost made anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism International Law de facto et de jure. In the long run and until this very moment, in what concerns post-State Zionism's integrity, it has barred and has been overtly biased against just and legitimate equity propounded in the Charter, just as it has deceptively incentivized "lawfare" proceedings in the international arena, as if it judicially made viable a new Ghetto cum nimis absurdum. Under this scenario, a binational state solution is impeded, which has constitutively been taking the proportions of a pledged International Law habeas corpus of its own.

This helps to comprehend thoroughly the geo, philosophia et lex situs of the land of Judea and Palestine, of which the most binding and inspiring is geo, and the less perennial is lex.

Fundo Clamor

Memories of stories of human rights violations during military dictatorships in Brazil and in the Southern Cone[1]

Anna Flávia Arruda Lanna Barreto[2]

Abstract: This research aims to analyse the contents of Fundo Clamor, located at the Documentation and Scientific Information Centre (CEDIC), from the Pontifical Catholic University of São Paulo/SP, between the years of 1970 and 1992, as well as its contribution to the process of rescuing historical memory of child and teenager abduction, imprisonment, and torture in the course of military dictatorships in Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay. Through the consultation and analysis of documents from Fundo Clamor and the Terror Archives, the Centre for Documentation and Archives for the Defence of Human Rights (CDyA) of Paraguay Supreme Justice Court a compilation will be made with information regarding the disappearance of children and the imprisonment and/or abduction of pregnant militants in an attempt to describe the situation of apprehension and incarceration, the historical context, and the repression forces involved in the operation of arrest, kidnapping and/or torture of militants, children, and teenagers. The main argument in this research states that the archives from the Committee for the Defence of Refugees Human Rights from the Southern Cone, available at Fundo Clamor, contribute significantly to the rescue of historical memory from the dictatorial period and to the achievement of complete citizenship in these countries, considering that Brazil was the protagonist of the National Security Doctrine implantation process in South America.

1. Introduction

In the end of the 1970s, when the Brazilian military dictatorship announced their first measures of mitigation, military regimes from Southern Cone (Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Chile) practiced recrudescence measures of authoritarianism and intensification of repressive apparatus. Arbitrary arrests, summary executions of political activists, exile, political banishments, housebreaks, abductions, and disappearing of children whose parents were political activists or opponents of the regime were practices which endorsed political repression in Southern Cone countries and usurped the human rights from thousands of Brazilians, Chileans, Argentineans, Paraguayans, and Uruguayans.

Our attention turns itself to the cases of disappeared, abducted, arrested, and tortured children whose parents were political activists or opponents of dictatorships from Brazil or Southern Cone countries, registered at the Committee in Defence of Human Rights for Southern Cone Countries (Clamor), from the Documentation and Scientific Information Centre (CEDIC) of the Pontifical Catholic University of São Paulo/SP, between the years of 1970 and 1992.[3]

The reason why we have made this study arose from the verification that, in spite of the incentive from the Brazilian federal government to rescue historical memory, especially from the period of the Brazilian Military Regime, the obstacles and prejudices which are part of the routine of investigations and academic research in the area are still a lot. We believe that the rescue of content from this board and of others which are similar is crucial to the perception of the cooperation politics adopted between Southern Cone countries and Brazil, as well as of the Brazilian leadership in actions of repression, prisoner exchange, and training on intelligence areas and interrogation techniques.

The originality of the research lies in the production of academic work in the area of History that seeks to analyse the information in Fundo Clamor as a contribution to the rescue of historical memory from the period of political and military authoritarianism in Southern Cone countries and Brazil, especially in what relates to abduction, disappearance, and identity appropriation of hundreds of children and teenagers, sons, and daughters of political opponents of dictatorial regimes established in Southern Cone countries and Brazil.

We believe that the reconstitution of that period's memory

(1970-1992) through the analysis of Fundo Clamor's archives will allow a fundamental historiographical research for the recovery of a history silenced by despotic speeches from political and military repression organisations.

2. Methodology

The methodology used in this descriptive and qualitative research embraces two directions: a bibliographical and a descriptive analytic documental research.

This work seeks to describe the cases of abduction, imprisonment, and disappearance of children whose parents were political activists during the period of dictatorial governments in Southern Cone countries – Argentina, Paraguay, Chile, Uruguay – and in Brazil. Through the consultation to Fundo Clamor (correspondence, denunciations, bulletins, leaflets from Abuelas de la Plaza de Mayo, reports, writs of habeas corpus, and files on enforced disappearances), documents will be selected that have information about the disappearance of children and/or the imprisonment and abduction of pregnant activists, seeking to describe the situation of apprehension and incarceration, historical context, the repression forces involved in the imprisonment operation, abduction, and/or torture of female activists and children involved.

The criteria used to the fulfill the bibliographic research will be based on the use of specific bibliography about human rights, about historical memory and history of present time, about dictatorships in Brazil, Argentina, Paraguay, Chile, and Uruguay, and about joint repression operations performed by military authorities from Southern Cone countries.

The primary retrospective sources present in the Fundo Clamor archives are intended to be used as documentary sources, such as, minutes of meetings, flyers, bulletins, primers, newspapers and publications from the Committee, received correspondence and denunciations, meeting's resolutions, reports, mapping of the main activities developed by the Committee and of the refugees attended to by the Committee, and newspapers from the great press. This information shall be obtained through systematic observation of the documentation made available by the board.

Other than this document collection, the patrimony of the Terror Archive at Centro de Documentación y Archivo para la Defensa de los Dere- chos Humanos (CDyA), from the Supreme Justice Court in Paraguay, has also been consulted. It is a register of around 60,000 documents collected in the course of 35 years' general Alfredo Stroessner's dictatorship. They are police files, lists of the prisoners' entries and exits, notes by the investigations chief, confidential assessments, control of political parties, periodic publications, lists of suspects, information about associations and groups which were considered subversive, syndicates control, and objects such as books and identity cards. Within this archive, special attention is given to the images of microfilm 143 that contain the record of activities of Operation Condor in Southern Cone countries and in Brazil.

3. The Repression in Southern cone Dictatorships

Civil and military coups in Southern Cone countries, in the second half of the 20th century, disrupted the revolutionary perspectives of opposing branches in civil society that dreamed with the construction of a new society. Socialist moods were silenced by the speech of Order and National Security, tradition, family, and prosperity. Social and student movements and progressive sections of civil society, stupefying, went from euphoria to doubt, from offense to retreat[4].

It is worth emphasizing that civil society's growing discontent in Southern Cone countries and Brazil was in the context of Cold War, in a world marked by ideological bipolarity amongst the blocs led by the United States of America (USA), that sponsored capitalism, and by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), that defended socialism. It is important to highlight in this context the impact caused in the USA by the Cuban Revolution in 1959, which implanted a socialist regime in a country geographically close to the USA. With the establishment of socialism in Cuba, the interests of leaders from the USA and from Southern Cone countries are threatened by an ideology contrary to North-American and military interests, whose socialist and revolutionary principles questioned the pillars that sustained the economic development of these sectors. USA's interests in Latin America had been shaken since the Cuban Revolution that led "the superpower country to consider the internal politics from each country in the region as an extension of its own external politics".[5]

The Cold War between USSR and USA that dominated the international scenario during the second half of the 20th century had entire generations growing under the shadow of global nuclear wars, which, as they believed, could start at any moment and devastate mankind. The fear of the inevitable mutual destruction would prevent a side or the other to signal the planned suicide of civilization. The peculiarity of the Cold War was that, objectively, there was no imminent danger of a world war.

To Latin America, the greatest impact of Cold War was not the nuclear weapons or the arms race, but the "counterinsurgency war", based on the National Security Doctrine, which aimed to eliminate possible social revolutions in areas submitted to ideological influence from the USA. According to the Secretary of the Kennedy government, Robert McNamara, three types of war were being considered in that context of Cold War: atomic war, conventional war, and non-conventional war. This last type of war was interpreted as a strategy of the International Communist Party to conquer followers to socialism. To this effect, the new challenge to the USA was to stop non-conventional or revolutionary war through the establishment of the National Security Doctrine and the dictatorial regimes in South America.[6]

In that context, the disrespect for human rights had a specific target: all those who politically and ideologically opposed the dictatorships established in Southern Cone countries (Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, Paraguay) and in Brazil.

The action of repressive forces from these countries sought, by manipulating the means of communication and education to silence any manifestation that was contrary to economical, political, and ideological interests for partisans of dictatorships established after the second half of the 20th century. The abduction and disappearance of political opponents and their children was part of a deliberate and organized armed scheme, which counted on the assembled contribution of the armed forces from the other Southern Cone countries and Brazil, to the denunciation, the abduction, and the disappearance of bodies.

The text above refers to a denunciation made by the Committee in Defence of Human Rights for Southern Cone Countries – CLAMOR[8], in 1979, about the disappearance of Uruguayan children Anatole Boris Julien Grisona (4 years old) and Eva Lucía Victoria Julien Grisona (1 year and 4 months old), who were abducted on 26th September, 1976 together with their parents in Argentina and illegally deported to Chile. During the kidnapping operation, the children's parents were murdered and their offspring were taken to interrogation centers. Subsequently, they were abandoned in a square in the city of Valparaíso (Chile) and handed over to an orphanage by a social assistant who was passing by[9].

From September 1976, Anatole's and Eva Lucía's relatives began a desperate search to meet the children again. According to historian Ananda Simões Fernandes, this practice is about a "State Terrorism modality of National Security dictatorships"[10], especially in Argentina, where the alarming number of 230 children[11] were kidnapped during the military regime (1976-1983).

The advance of denunciation and research in this area points to the practice of this "state terrorism" modality in other Southern Cone countries. Data from the Human Rights Special Office in Brazil shows the following numbers as balance of Southern Cone's dictatorships:

> in Brazil there were 50 thousand prisoners, 20 thousand tortured, 356 killed and missing, 4 children probably abducted. In Uruguay there were 166 missing people, 131 killed, 12 abducted babies, 55 thousand prisoners. In Paraguay there were from one thousand to two thousand dead and missing, 1 million in exile. In Chile there were 1,185 missing, 2,011 dead (although unofficial statistics show up to 10 thousand murdered), 42,486 political prisoners just in 1976. In Argentina there were 30 thousand killed and missing and 230 abducted children.[12]

In the Argentinean case, the majority of kidnapped children had their identities omitted and were subsequently illegally adopted by families directly or indirectly connected to the repression. An example of this situation is the story of Mariana Zaffaroni, abducted when she was eighteen months old, together with her parents Jorge Roberto Zaffaroni Castilla and María Emilia Islas de Zaffaroni in Buenos Aires on the 27th of September, 1976 by Argentinean and Uruguayan repression forces. From this date, Mariana's relatives began a search to find her. On the 20th of May, 1983, the Argentinean newspaper "Clarin" from Buenos Aires published an appeal with the girl's photograph requesting from whoever had any information about her to get in touch with Abuelas da Plaza de Mayo[13] or with Clamor group in São Paulo. Twenty days after the appeal, an anonymous letter arrived from Argentina to the Clamor group. This letter informed that Miguel Angel Furci, a member of the State Intelligence Service (SIDE), was supposed to be with Mariana in a suburb of Buenos Aires. The girl had been registered, two years after her birth, as a legitimate daughter of the Furci couple.

Cases like these became state politics in Argentina and were widely adopted in the other Southern Cone countries and in Brazil with cooperation of repression forces from these countries. Usually, children and teenagers were kidnapped with their parents, when the latter were arrested and/or abducted.

The story of the "accursed babies", supposedly kidnapped by the Brazilian army, told by inhabitants of the Araguaia region elucidates these cases of human rights violation and children abduction in Brazil. According to statements by the elderly people who live in the Araguaia region, these missing children were sons and daughters of women that had had relations with guerrillas and had nothing to do with the armed conflicts. José Maria Alves da Silva's testimony, a former Army guide, given to the newspaper O Estado de São Paulo on the 14th of July 2009, confirms this story about the abduction of children by the military forces.

On the 30th of September, 1969, Virgílio Gomes da Silva Filho was arrested with his mother and his two brothers. On the previous day, his father Virgílio had been captured by repression agents and murdered. His mother and brothers were arrested while staying at a beach house in São Sebastião/SP. At the time, his elder brother Vlademir was eight years old, Virgílio was six and Isabel, and his younger sister, was only four months old. They were detained at the headquarters of Bandeirantes Operation (OBAN). The three children were torn away from their mother Ilda and taken to the Office of Juvenile Justice, where they remained for two months. They went through several interrogatories before that. Ilda stayed in prison until 1979, being out of touch most of the time. The children were separated and each of them went to live with an uncle. Sometimes they would reunite and stand in front of a post where their mother, still in prison, could see them. After being freed and reunited with her family, Ilda and her children left to live in Cuba, where they remained until they had concluded their studies at university.[14]

Carlos Alexandre Azevedo died on February 19, 2013, in São Paulo. He was tortured when he was only a year and eight months old at the State Department of Political and Social Order (Deops) in 1974.

[14] Pimenta, Edileuza; Teixeira, Edson. Virgílio Gomes da Silva: retirante of the guerrilla. Sao Paulo: Editorial Plena, 2009.

Carlos was journalist Dermi Azevedo's son, militant and a founder of the Human Rights National Movement (MDNH). On the 14th of January, 1974, Carlos Alexandre and his mother were taken to the São Paulo headquarters of Deops, where his father was imprisoned. During Dermi's interrogation the policemen threw Carlos Alexandre on the ground and hit his head. Carlos suffered from after-effects of the torture and had to submit himself to treatments with antidepressants and antipsychotics for the rest of his life. On the 19th of February this year Carlos Alexandre put an end to his life with a drug overdose.[15]

Actions like these were used as interrogation techniques to get information that were considered essential to the National Security State in force in Southern Cone countries and in Brazil. As the Nunca Mais (Never More) report from Argentina denounces:

> Because I answered negatively, they started kicking my companion with a belt, they pulled her hair and kicked little Celia Lucía, who was 13, Juan Fabián, eight, Verónica Daniela, three, and Silvina, only twenty days old…. The children were being pushed and shoved and asked if friends ever went to the house. After mistreating my companion, they grabbed the twenty-day-old baby; grabbed her feet, turned her upside down, and began hitting her, shouting at her mother: "… if you do not speak, we will kill her." The children cried and the terror was great. The mother begged them, screaming, not to touch the baby. Then they decided to do the "wet submarine" on my companion in front of the children, while they took me to another room. Until today, I know not what became of my companion….[16]

None of the children who had their parents assassinated, clandestine or incarcerated have had the right to enjoy a family, school, or communitarian life. Their relationships were marked by secrecy and restrictions. Weekends were spent in prisons, the only occasions when they could visit their parents.

There are still cases in which pregnant women were abducted and after the occurrence of the birth, usually at clandestine centres, the children were taken away from their mothers with the false information that they would be delivered to their grandparents. After the separations the mother would generally be executed.

Several of the children born in captivity are still missing. This repressive methodology was adopted in Latin America's Southern Cone countries as a strategy to feign a culture of fear and uncertainty, a resource to intimidate the opponents of dictatorial regimes in Southern Cone countries.

The denunciations, correspondence, and testimonials, above all from Uruguay and Argentina, are terrifying. The highlights of the main acts of violence committed by repression forces are assassinations, torture, disappearance, and abduction of relatives of political activists, especially of children whose mothers were pregnant activists arrested by the police of these countries or through the assembled action of repression forces of Southern Cone countries, usually administered by members of Operation Condor.[17] According to reports and testimonials registered at Fundo Clamor, there were adoption lists at prisons for the babies that were born from women who had been arrested during their pregnancy. The women were tortured and were killed after having given birth. Their children were offered for adoption, a great number of them to families of militaries. In the whole, the Committee helped to locate seven missing children.

The Committee has conducted many investigations in order to verify cases of missing children and has collaborated on the solution of several of them. This work allowed the group to get in touch with a group of ladies known as Abuelas de la Plaza de Mayo, founded in 1979 in Argentina. They were women who had started a fight for the defence of life and for the right to keep members that shared the same blood united. These grandmothers became known throughout the world as a symbol of the struggle against the dictatorship in defence of human rights and of the right to live once again with their grandchildren.

The abduction of children of political prisoners and the appropriation of their identities establishes itself as crimes against humanity and are, therefore, imprescriptible. Thus, to research this subject is to guarantee that arbitrariness like these will not go unnoticed by societies victimized by dictatorial governments, above all where these disappearances, imprisonments, and torture were most frequent. To study this subject is to guarantee the relatives of victims of enforced disappearances the right of knowledge and memory of facts that, in a stark and brutal way, took children and teenagers away from family life, who were innocent victims of this "State terrorism".

4. Committee in Defence of Human Rights for Southern Cone Countries – CLAMOR

"Clamor" group is a civil, informal, and clandestine organisation, created in the end of 1977 with the support of Cardinal Archbishop Dom Paulo Evaristo Arns, in the city of São Paulo. This organisation aimed to denounce the violation of human rights that had been happening in Latin America, especially in Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina, Chile, and Paraguay, besides providing assistance for refugees and for the politically persecuted.

The name "Clamor" was given to the bulletin from the Committee in Defence of Human Rights for Southern Cone Countries, whose first volume was published in June 1978. The name "Clamor" was inspired by the Psalm (88: 2) – "LORD, you are the God who saves me; day and night I cry out to you. Let my prayer enter into thy presence; incline thine ear unto my cry." The intention the Committee's founders had was to emphasize one of its main characteristics: to denounce the continual violations of human rights that occurred in Latin America.

The bulletin created by the Committee was published in three languages – Portuguese, Spanish, and English, and sent without being signed to 22 Brazilian states (press), to 23 American countries (Latin-American entities of Human Rights), and to 25 countries in other continents (European and North-American entities). Throughout twelve years of existence, the Committee published 17 numbers of the bulletin. Amongst the subjects it approached, the following stand out among others: human rights violations in Southern Cone countries, the people's struggle to denounce and defeat military regimes, the situation of prisons, the treatment given to prisoners, and pertinent legislation for refugees. The Committee received a budget from the World Council of Churches so that it could maintain the Bulletin.

In 1978, when it was founded, the Committee was composed of three people connected to human rights defence – Jan Rocha, Luiz

Eduardo Greenhalgh, and Jaime Wright. The three met in São Paulo to verify the possibility of publicizing the atrocities committed against human rights of Argentineans, Uruguayans, Paraguayans, Chileans, and Brazilians during the military regime in these countries. They searched for Cardinal Archbishop Dom Paulo Evaristo Arns to communicate the massive arrival of political refugees who told unknown stories of disrespect to human rights. Dom Paulo welcomed the idea and requested that the Committee, for security reasons, remained linked to the Archdiocesan Pastoral Committee for Human Rights and Marginalized from the Archdiocese of São Paulo. At that moment, the Committee in Defence of Human Rights for Southern Cone Countries was born.

The image that marked Clamor's symbol was a drawing of a flame that shines through prison grates, created by political prisoner Manoel Cirilo de Oliveira Neto, who was freed in 1979. Other than the symbol, the Committee also had a slogan: "Human Rights have no borders." With this slogan the Committee traversed every country in the Southern Cone and sought financial and political aid from international organisms such as the World Council of Churches, Amnesty International, the United Nations, and the World Bank.

According to accusations made by political activists and by members of Clamor group, Brazil not only exported its knowledge of police and military violence, but it was also part of a connexion with other repressive forces situated in Southern Cone countries. A proof of that would be the existence of computers with terminals linked to the main airports in the continent in order to follow the movements of all of those considered subversive or enemies of the Nation.

The Committee's initial goal was to give assistance to refugees who were not recognized by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), something that could compromise its personal security for. One of the greatest works done by the Committee was the systematisation of a list of victims of enforced disappearances in Argentina, which subsequently originated the book "Desaparecidos de la Argentina", published in 1982. The book gathered information on 7,791 missing people in Argentina.

In the 1980s, with political openness and the consequential end of military regimes in the Southern Cone region, the Clamor group gradually lost its function of protecting and assisting political refugees and terminated its activities in 1991.

5. Final Considerations

Brazilian military repression consisted in the institutionalization of torture and interrogation techniques, as well as in the development of actions and advertisements that made visible the existence of repressive apparatus in the country. To this effect, besides physical repression, the groups that opposed the Military Regime had to live with constant ideological and psychological intimidation, promoted by the repression campaign.[18]

According to the logic of dictatorial regimes established in Brazil and Southern Cone countries, being an informant working for the dictatorship was the same as being a patriot defending the nation. The assimilation of the National Security Doctrine by militaries took nationalism for a synonym of anti-communism as a component of the capitalist ideology from the Cold War promoted by the United States. The Alliance for Progress, set in the 1960s by president John F. Kennedy and the other countries in South America, gave an economic impulse to military governments in these countries, so these governments became imponderable allies with the United States.

Therefore, it is a research about the reasons, passions, and implicit desires in people's struggles in defence of human rights of refugees who, due to their political convictions, were usurped of their human and civil rights during a period of political authoritarianism. To tell this story is to tell episodes of fights in defence of human rights, but also episodes of usurpation of these rights, with clandestine, although explicit, methods of barbarism, of physical violence, psychological and cultural, capable of generating a culture of fear fed by the State terrorism effective in these countries. To tell this story is to offer the present and future generations the chance to know their past, their leaders, and their armed forces, whose maximum function is to defend the nation. To know this story is to guarantee the remembrance of facts that dishonoured humanity, that fed silence and political and social inaction. To remember these facts is to offer society the chance to know its past, learn with it and, from that, draw its future. After all, according to the psychologist Eclea Bosi, "one of the most cruel exercises of oppression is the spoliation of memories" (Eclea Bosi, 1979, p. 362).

Critics of Human Rights from a historical perspective[1]

Birden Güngören Bulgan, PhD[2]

Abstract: Implementation of human rights is often criticized because it is perceived as being imposed on the rest of the world. In this case, human rights start to be seen as a sole abstraction, an empty word. What are the theoretical arguments of these critics and can we determine any historical grounds for them? In this paper, I will try to point at similar critics after the French Revolution –like that of the Historical School and Hegel- and try to show if some of these critics are still relevant. And I will compare these critics with contemporary arguments of cultural relativists. There are different streams and categorizations of human rights theories in today's world. What differentiates them is basically the source of the human rights. After the French Revolution, the historical school had criticized the individuation and Hegel had criticized the formal freedom which was, according to him, a consequence of the Revolution. In this context Hegel drew a distinction between real freedom and formal freedom. Besides the theory of sources, the theories of implementation such as human rights as a model of learning, human rights as a result of an historical process are worth attention. The crucial point is about integrating human rights as an inner process and not to use them as a tool for intervention in other countries, which we observe in today's world. And this is the exact point why I find the discussion of the sources more important. This discussion can help us to show how the inner evaluation of a society makes the realization of human rights possible and how we can avoid the above mentioned abstraction and misuse.

1. Natural Law Critic of the Historical Law School

The debate after the French revolution is important to understand the source of the conflict. The French revolution which began like a spring with a vital energy, very fast turned into a chaotic period in which the leaders were killed and as time went by, freedoms and rights were forgotten. The influence to other countries is also very important. German intellectuals like Goethe, Hegel, Shelling, Fichte were at the beginning very enthusiastic. Hegel even described the French revolution as a magic sun rising. Also Napoléon was described by him like the "Weltgeist" on his horse, when he arrived in Jena. But after the destructions, many of these enthusiastic intellectuals witnessed the time of terror and were much more sceptical.

When the revolution began, Burke's "Reflexions on revolution in France" was translated into German and defended by Rehberg, Fichte published his judgments of French Revolution as an answer to Rehberg. The revolution had its roots in the natural rights and the contractual theory. Burke thought that law was a result of the traditions and criticised the natural law and the contractual theory of Rousseau.[3] So after the French Revolution there was a very large discussion about rights and freedoms and their sources. On the one hand there was the traditionalist critique, on the other hand, the utilitarians' critique of the natural rights and furthermore also there was the historicist critique. [4]

The dispute between Thibaut[5] and Savigny was basically about the codification after the Code Napoleon.[6] Savigny's book Vom Beruf un-

[4]Binoche and Cléro use the consept "critique historiciste" which include 1) the positivist critique. Here we can find the critics of Benjamin Constant and Auguste Comte 2) the organic historicism which can be analysed in two parts: the linear historicism which is used by Savigny and the dialectical historicism of Hegel. (Bertrand Binoche and Jean-Pierre Cléro, Bentham contre les droit de l'homme (Paris: Puf, 2007),186.

[5] Thibaut's works was his essay on the necessity of a code for Germany (Über die Nothwendigkeit eines allgemeinen bürgerlichen Rechts für Deutschland).

[6] The main Problem was whether the German people are ready for a new codification or not. Savigny wanted to protect the Roman law because he saw it as something which connected different people and regions. Thibaut's wish was to adopt a new code like the Code Napoléon which had its source in the German law and traditions. Savigny wanted to show that the projects of codifications have their bases in an abstraction of natural rights. The codification must show the spirit of the nation and also Hegel said that it is as absurd to give the English constitution to the Prussians as is absurd to give the Prussian Gönner in 1807, who is a college and adversary of Savigny.[7] Savignys first article in Zeitschrift für geschichtliche Rechtswissenschaft ("Journal of historical legal studies" 1815) the base of this school and his fundamental notions appear.

Savigny, in a way, continued the organicism of Herder. In this movement against the rationality of the Enlightenment, notions like popular consciousness, organic development and process of growth as a result of an inner process appear.[8] We can see the principles of the historical school like the organic totality, historicism and particularism.[9] The organic totality is a notion which comes from Schelling but was also used by Savigny and Puchta.[10] It was a reaction against the atomism of the society and the individualism. The notions like historicism and the national particularism comes from Burke and Herder.[11]

The historical law school has a double orientation; one romanist-cosmopolitist and the other germanist national-popular.[12] Gustave Hugo was a Romanist and also criticised the natural law in his book Lehrbuch des Naturrechts als positives Rechts. Savigny saw Roman Law as an example of organic grown law.[13] Savigny, Hugo, Puchta were the representatives of the romanist-universalist[14] stream and Eichhorn, Jacob Grimm and Beseler were representatives of the germanist national-popular stream.[15] The germanist stream wanted to return to the German sources and that was the source of the debate between the two.[16]

Savigny criticised the concept of a universal natural right and described the natural law school as a "unhistorical school". The historical school saw law as something which depends on traditions and developed in the society. According to them, law was something which differs from nation to nation and in each society. But Savigny defended that history has continuity.[17] For him the revolutionary rupture was totally an illusion.[18] The historical law school is against the individualism of the French revolution[19] and criticised the universal and abstract Principles and see them as the reasons of the revolution.[20] Today we can see some aspects of these arguments in the critics of the cultural relativist theory.

The historical law school tried to explain the source of rights with the notion "Volksgeist" (Spirit of a Nation).[21] Volksgeist is a notion used since Herder but has acquired a new dimension with the historical law school. Savigny said that law, like language, lives in the consciousness of a nation.[22] Volksgeist is a concept which is interpreted in many different ways.[23] Hugo used this notion for the Roman law. He tried to understand the Roman law in the spirit of his time and its transformation to his time.[24] Savigny interpreted the notion "Volkgeist" as an ideal notion for the nation and culture and understand it not like Thibaut as the whole of the society.[25] Hegel was also on the side of Thibaut in the codification-dispute and interpreted the Volksgeist[26] different from Savigny. For Hegel the Volksgeist is something which is in a permanent change and not something fixed. Hegel thinks that the Volksgeist embodies this organicism and must be rational. He sees the Volksgeist in relation with the "Weltgeist" (World spirit). For Hegel „Volksgeist" depends on the counsciousness of the Nation and is something that must be constructed. So the notion is not only related to the past like in Savigny's organic view.[27] On the contrary to Savigny's view for Hegel law can only be realised in the state, where law became objectivity but the Nation (Volk) is not yet a State.[28] For Hegel only in the State the nation has the consciousness of its rights. It must be reminded that Hegel's Volksgeist theory must be analysed with his Weltgeist theorie which is in relation with the notion of freedom.

2. Distinction of Hegel between Formal and Concrete Freedom

Hegel's critique of the natural right theory differs from the historical law school and is based on his notion of freedom. Hegel's critique is a get together from the organicism of the historical school and rationalism of the Enlightenment.[29] Hegel also criticises the natural law adopted by the Declaration and says that would be better to rename the natural law as philosophical law because when we talk about nature we understand the unconscious nature.[30] Natural law in Hegel's theory, is not seen from the classical perspective, he says that it is a mistake to separate positive law from natural law.[31] He tries to relative the natural law.[32] Natural Law and traditions must be evaluated together. So we see that Hegel as different from Savigny does not reject the natural law completely but tries to reconcile positive and natural law.

The French revolution is seen by Hegel as a step in the historical evaluation of the notion of freedom. According to Hegel the French revolution asks but can't resolve the question of political freedom.[33] Also, taking natural law as the base of the declaration of human rights and the contractual theory is criticized by him. As it can easily be concluded, Hegel criticised the abstraction of the rights along with the contractual theory which is accepted as one of the pillars of the declaration. In this context, he criticised Rousseau's notion of general will. Hegel says that "Rousseau reduces the union of people in the state of a contract and therefore to something based on their arbitrary wills, their opinion and their capriciously given express consent".[34]

The interrogation of the sense of liberty is one of the main aims of sustaining the legitimacy of human rights.[35] In this context Hegel's differentiation between real/concrete and formal freedom is very important. Hegel makes a distinction between formal and concrete or real freedom. Real freedom can be realised in a learning process. In the Phenomenology of the Spirit Hegel shows that freedom is a process of self-consciousness. We can classify this process as following: 1. Individual consciousness, 2. Cultural consciousness and 3. Absolute consciousness.[36] In the Phenomenology of the Spirit, Hegel attempts to pursue the development of a consciousness that finally transcendent its historical cultural conditions and relativity.

Hegel is not after a destructive form of individualism for the modern world certainly not of the sort that caused the French revolution.[37] He is after an individualism that is compatible and can be synthesized with Sittlichkeit[38] , a notion which is also translated as ethical life. Hegel says that individuals are constructed by their social and cultural worlds. His goal is to get beyond the destructive form of individualism.[39] For Hegel the French revolution is a step in the evolution of the freedom but couldn't realise the concrete or real freedom.[40] The master and slave or lord and bondsman relation is important in this context. The slave becomes a dependent consciousness but also the master is not the independent consciousness he thinks he is. He is dependent of the slave. Fear and work transfer the slave. But fear is also the beginning of wisdom. Kojève analyses the master-slave relation in a historical context, antic Greek, Roman Empire, Christianity and French revolution are steps for the realisation of freedom.[41] Freedom must have four moments. First, it must be subjective, second it must be rational, third it must be concretized and fourth institutionalized embedded in the world which we live.[42] Hegel claims that each individual is the son of his nation at the specific stage in this nation's development. No one can escape from the spirit of his nation. Following this view, all consciousness develops in a specific cultural context and specific historical era.

What does Hegel mean by concrete freedom? The concrete freedom is only possible in the state because state is for Hegel the actuality of concrete freedom. "Concrete freedom consists in this, that personal individuality and its particular interests not only achieve their complete development and gain explicit recognition for their right but, for one thing, they also pass over of their own accord into the interest of the universal".[43] The formal subjective freedom[44] of individuals consist in their having and expressing their own private judgments, opinions and recommendations. The concrete freedom is that the will has not only subjective aims but also general aims which include the well-being of the society.[45] This kind of freedom is a superior form of liberty. So as a result, the real freedom is only possible in a process of the consciousness[46] of the mind which is at the same time a learning process.

3. Human right as a culture and sentimental education

How to bloom concrete freedom in the society? Here we see the importance of the learning process. Hegel's theory of freedom related with the level of consciousness is differentiated but also used by the Frankfurt School. Taking Adorno's negative dialectics and "Education after Auschwitz" as an example, today in Germany we come across "holocaust-education". Trying to analyse the Holocaust and its sources, Adorno concludes that education is the main guarantee of that what happened in Germany never takes place again.[47] The departure point of Adorno's theory of Bildung is the common understanding of it as the subjective side of culture. "Culture" means here the system of representations of what Hegel calls "objective spirit", that is, of ideas, concepts, worldviews, in which the meanings of humanity in their historical development come into being.[48]

Adorno and Horkheimer draw from the assessment made by Hegel in the chapter on "Absolute Freedom and Terror" of the Phenomenology of Spirit, according to which there is a relationship between the ethics of utility of the Enlightenment and terror, which Hegel finds in the French Revolution.[49] Adorno and Horkheimer do not explicitly extend their reflection on ethics to the field of human rights, a bridge between moral sentiments and rights is pursued of Rorty's postmodern approach to moral progress. For Rorty the genocide of the European Jews plays a key role in his recontextualisation of human rights, and he adopts the Holocaust as the inevitable horizon of understanding from which human rights need to be thought when he refers to our rights culture as the Post-holocaust human rights culture.[50] Drawing on Hegel and Nietzsche, Rorty asserts the historical, contextualist, or perspectivist character of knowledge, a knowledge that is not born out of the historical circumstances.[51] "To the metaphysical theories of human rights Rorty opposes a historicist perspective. In the field of the human it is not possible to speak about a human nature because the ambit of the human is precisely the sphere proper of culture. The human nature is cultural".[52]

Rorty in his Article "Human Rights, Rationality and Sentimentality"[53], talks about a human rights culture.[54] Rorty says that historicist thinkers have denied that there is such a thing a "human nature".[55] Rorty recommends abandoning "human rights foundationalism".[56] He rejects any sort of Kantian identification with a transcultural and ahistorical self and replaces it by a Hegelian identification with our own community understood as a cultural and historical product.[57] So maybe we must read the historical critics through a human rights culture which cannot be see apart from a human rights education.

Another important analyse comes from Karl-Otto Apel. Apel uses also Hegel's arguments in his article and draws attention to the problem of the plurality of the good, which is also a very important point for the cultural relativists because they say that the good for one society may not be good for the other. To solve the problem the tolerance is the key in a multicultural society.[58] Apel makes a distinction between negative tolerance which is based on indifference and positive or affirmative tolerance based on appreciation of the deep and manifold values-traditions and resources that can enrich human culture in general and social engagements of individuals.[59]

Affirmative tolerance can be related to Hegel's theory of recognition. Also Taylor refers to multiculturalism with the argument of Hegel's recognition.[60] The hegemony of one culture brings problems after Taylor, so we can see the problematic of multiculturalism with surmount the problematic with the arguments of recognition and tolerance. It is this difficulty that Axel Honneth, a Habermasian commentator of Hegel, tries to correct in his major work, The Struggle for Recognition. Honneth argues that the struggle for recognition is the key ethical relationship or the main form of practical intersubjectivity in the Hegelian system"[61]. To redress this problem, Honneth supplements Hegel by introducing a third type of recognition, which he calls solidarity.[62] Honneth says that Hegel's solidarity has its source in the historical process of the Revolution but he tries to develop the "fraternity" of the French revolution into a intersubjective notion of "solidarity".[63] A personality based on solidarity has all the elements of legal recognition but, it additionally enjoys social esteem, the recognition of its particular characteristics and qualities developed within its group and community.[64] Honneth says that the first recognition is about law but the second recognition of values.[65] Honneths arguments for recognition are also important for human rights. Because the human rights must be recognised by law but they also have a value in solidarity.

4. Human Rights as a Learning Process

Today we can find a similar debate about rights which has his sources in the debates after the French revolution. Today cultural rela-tivists want to reject rights because they are not compatible with their own culture. This main problem in the debate of the cultural relativist can be derived from Herders enlightenment philosophy and the Volksgeist theory.[66] So we can see some arguments of the cultural relativist theories in the historical law school theory. The historical school has relativized rights which are innate. The cultural relativist theories take over this relativisation of natural rights as universal rights. But also the approaches of cultural relativists differ. For example Donnelly defends a "relative and tempered" universalism[67] and shows the defects of a strong cultural relativism.[68]

Hegel is also a philosopher who is by some interpreters seen as a cultural relativist.[69] But the interpretation of the Volksgeist theory as something which is in a permanent change and the relation between the Volksgeist and Weltgeist (World Spirit) show that we can't count Hegel in the cultural relativist theories. Hegel's concept of freedom leads us to another discussion. Real freedom is only possible in a learning process and is in relation with the consciousness. This consciousness is not only subjective but must become an objective consciousness of the society. Real freedom as something learned and not imposed can be a key for [68] Donnelly, in his book Universal Human Rights in Theory and Practice makes an analyse of cultural relativism, and says that the cultural relativism is understood as either strong cultural relativism or weak cultural relativism. The strong cultural relativism tries to takes culture as the source of legitimacy of one rule. On the other hand, weak cultural relativism takes cultural argument seriously but tries to surmount to the excess of universality. Donnelly tries to show the weakness of the radical cultural relativist argument and says that morally to defend this strong cultural relativism has its defects. Donnelly tries to show the weakness of the radical cultural relativist argument and says that morally to defend this strong cultural relativism has its defects. He claims that we mustn't place culture against human rights. We must also see the abuses made in the name of human rights. Donnelly is for the relativity of the universal rights and his functional effectiveness (Jack Donnelly, Universal Human Rights in Theory and Practice, (Cornell Univ, 2013), 120).

[69] Kain sees Hegel as a serious cultural relativist. (Klein, Hegel and the Other, p.234).

the human rights education. The critique of Hegel is that the formal freedom is a step of the French Revolution but not enough can be applied to human rights. Human rights can only trough an internalisation of the rights with a learning process be realised.

We can find some of Hegel's arguments developed in the theses of Horkheimer and Adorno in relation with education but Rorty tries to develop these theses to a human right theory: sentimental education. So we see the importance that not only the education of human rights is important but also how to internalise this education and here the sentimental education can play another key role.

Culture must be understood in this context as something not imposed but something learned. Apel sees the problems when one culture is imposed and sees the solution in the positive tolerance. So in a multicultural society we cannot impose one culture, like cultural relativists try to resolve the problem. But from another perspective, cultural relativists are right, because human rights as something imposed has also no future. The "theory of recognition" developed with Taylor and Honneth's theses becomes more important because the dialogue and the positive tolerance can be a key in resolve some problems. Human rights become a culture but also a method of intervention in other countries. So like Hegel differentiates formal and real freedoms, we must differentiate between formal and real human rights. Human rights are abused by a hegemonic language.[70] Only through a learning process[71] and the consciousness of the society the human rights can be internalised and exercise.

Unconditional legitimacy of Law
Collaboration with the Nazism

Álvaro Ricardo de Souza Cruz[1]
Bernardo Augusto Ferreira Duarte[2]

Abstract: The present paper has the objective of discussing one of the greatest critics to legal positivism: the one that says that this theory has "cooperated" with the Nazi regime. This work boards and discusses many critics about positivism, its problems on its many faces, and its oppositions (post-positivism and jusnaturalism), overcoming the superficiality and generality of some of them, through the discursive rationality. It even analyzes the absence of a real dialogue between positivists and post-positivists, who do not seek to comprehend each other, as victims of their own paradigms. In the end, we wish to show our alternative view, guided by a different rationality, different from the jusnaturalist Radbruch's formula (that involves a moral discussion). Although is doubtful that positivism was a simple support to the Nazi regime, we could notice that while the positivists see the Nazi system as a true "law", and its outrages like a mere narrative, we approach to the vision that does not accept this descriptive narration. A definition cannot be separated from evaluation, mainly from evaluation of law's legitimacy. We claim for the impossibility of an extreme injustice to be called "law", the impossibility of neutrality in law, and the impossibility of a detachment between the human being and his environment, just like between Law and Morality. The main critic is against the positivist concept of science. To us, science cannot be neutral, apart from reality, and only formal. This positivist concept of science takes to unintended consequences such as the "docilization" of people, immunization of juridical agents and, in the end, the "legitimation" of totalitarian legal systems, enabled by the confusion that the popular imagination make between legality and legitimacy. Every totalitarian regime has the veil of legality to base them. That is why, starting from Derrida, Lévinas and Ricouer, we seek for a conception of science from "deformalization", deconstruction and attestation, opposed to the formality and the certainty of the positivist concept.

In the Brazilian scenery, the debate about the possibilities of overcoming the Positivist paradigm of Law is quite sharp. In general, the critiques presented are (1) that it regards to a juridical thought which is already outdated; (2) that its authors would be supporters of a mechanical application of the law; (3) that they would also be partisans of an unconditional legitimacy of Law and of incoherent points of view, as, for instance, (4) the unjustified adherence to the Jusnaturalism.The objection according to which (5) the Juridical Positivism would have "contributed" to the Nazi regime would also be usual. This kind of critiques can be found in countless Brazilian texts of authors like Margarida Camargo Lacombe, Cláudio Pereira Souza Neto, Mário Bigotte Chorão, Lênio Luis Streck, Ana Paula Barcellos, Paulo Bonavides, Lúcio Antônio Chamon Junior, Ricardo Lobo Torres, among many others[3].

This present article aims to go through the last objection with a little more attention. As it is known, it is very common to link the argument of the reductio ad hitlerum, according to which the positivism somehow would have approved the Nazi regime, to the normative inertia supported by the juridical positivists. By working with formal validity criteria and thus supporting the independence of Law in relation to other social systems, such as Moral and Politics, positivism would have worked as a driving force for nameless normative acts to be admitted in the quality of "legal right".

This critique, originally spread by Radbruch, was created in 1950 as a jusnaturalist reaction against the absurdities and atrocities perpetrated by the Nazi system, supposedly "in the name of Law". According to Gustav Radbruch, the moralist approach of Law would be absolutely essential, as wherever there wasn't at least a search for justice, that is, where the equality (justice core) was deliberately betrayed in the creation of a positive system, only a "flawed right" would be characterized, needy of the Law nature itself[4]. In his perspective, people should arm themselves against the recurrence of a criminal law, like Hitler's, by overcoming positivism, which would not only have covered up this "legal antijuridicity", but also weakened all the possible defenses against the abuses derived from the national-socialist legislation[5].Therefore, a "juridical" system that adopted/perpetrated atrocities and an "extreme injustice" could not be regarded as Law.

In Brazil, according to certain degrees, 'Radbruch's formula'[6]would have been consubstantiated in one of the two fundamental accusation pillars. The first one was in the sense that positivism would be insufficient to protect the human rights and, besides, it would have "contributed" to the military dictatorship due to its neutrality. Behind this accusation was the perception that the dictatorship intended to produce agents of Law that were disconnected from the political life, and, therefore, without interdisciplinary knowledge as the ones related to Philosophy, Sociology and Economy, for instance. As simple process technicians, the juridical agents would be little critical or not critical at all in relation to authoritarianism, turning themselves into reproducers of the status quo of the Law. Thus, the juridical positivism, in its conceptual kind, ended up being seen as an ideal theory for the fulfillment of such desiderate.

A second argument would be added to the previous one above: the "(neo) liberal project", predominant during the military time and insensible to people's difficulties in terms of the fulfillment of the social rights, would also be connected to the juridical positivism in the country, so that a neutral posture before the law would be nothing more than a disguised applause to the social injustices experienced around here.

Against all those arguments, Dimitri Dimoulis (2006)adduces that "Radbruch's formula" would reflect a wholly "strategic" option of fight against positivism[7]. In his opinion, as the postwar context demanded a "scapegoat", Radbruch's thesis would end up gaining notability in [4]In this sense, refer to RADBRUCH apud BUSTAMANTE, 2008a, p. 165.

[5]See RADBRUCH apud BUSTAMANTE, 2008a, p. 164.

[6]As explained by Bustamante (2008a), it expresses an argument of injustice with a remarkably jusnaturalist nature.

[7]This confirms an ordinary practice in times of paradigmatic transitions, according to Thomas Kuhn. We recognize that the to know/not to know code of Science is not immune to ethical or moral flaws, so that science production needs ethical and moral interference.

the juridical realm of the 1950's, making the Jusnaturalism thrive again and dominate the scenery of the European doctrine and jurisprudence until the 1960's.However, according to the Greek jusphilosopher, there would be at least four arguments capable of infirming the coherence of the critique based upon the mentioned formula.

Firstly, the Third Reich would not have innovated significantly the juridical system in effect then, exception to the promulgation of the legislation related to the "fight" against the political opponents and the minorities regarded as the regime's "enemies". Therefore, if the legislation had changed little, the positivist action surely could not explain the horrors of the concentration camps.

Secondly, during the Nazi period, the objective teleology method was predominant in the German jurisprudence, whose primary intention was consisted of adapting the norm to the historical picture of the society. The "people's courts", which were emblematic in the Hitlerite period, evoked the use of "values" and "needs" of the German people as a hermeneutical support, something typical of a limitless interpretation (Unbegrentzte Auslegung) and that completely differed itself from the juspositivist theoretical model.

Thirdly, Hitler intended to destroy the Rechtsstaat- that is, the State of Law in its formalist aspect (positivist) - in favor of a Law that complied with the superior morality of the German people. In other words, against a State founded in the "government of laws", Hitler defended a "State of Justice" (Gerechtigkeitsstaat) that was scarily "based" upon a questionable notion of morality, for his own speeches already refuted the connection between the juridical positivism and the Nazism.

Fourthly and last, one of the most important doctrines to support the Nazism would be the "decisionism" by Carl Schmitt –who was a classical opponent of the Kelsen's juridical positivism – which always referred to the high values and ideals of the organic community formed by the German people. For this, it wouldn't be incoherent to conclude that the "jurisprudence of values", considered by many as an icon of the postpositivism, would be closer to the Nazism than the juspositivism effectively.

Taking the assumption that we do not confuse Nazism with positivism, it is still possible to question some of those arguments.

Firstly, it would be viable to ask Dimoulis if Nuremberg's racial legislation was actually marginal as he leads his readers to learn, or if it would have changed the face of German Law fundamentally in the 1930's. Of course an analysis like this could not stick to quantitative aspects, but especially to qualitative ones. It seems to him that the answer is negative. In our perception, Weimar's Constitution, which is clearly born under the auspices of the German re-democratization and which enters history as one of the first texts to constitutionalize the social rights, was the text in effect during the Shoah's period. That's why we take the second alternative. We believe that Dimoulis minimizes excessively one aspect that is absolutely essential to us!

Secondly, the assumption that the juridical positivism as a whole would abominate the objective teleology seems to be too much elastic. Here we refer to Joseph Raz who, before situations in which the interpreter could take a discretionary position, would never be prevented from adopting supplementarily a teleological analysis in order to fix the sense of norm. Thus, even the use of extrajudicial reasons, such as moral ones, would still be covered by the Razian logic of excluding reasons. For him, admitting such argumentation could not be understood as an incorporation that is neither necessary nor at least contingent of the Moral to the juridical normativity. However, what is interesting here is to notice that Raz does not discard the possibility of applying the objective teleology[8] in the Law application, as Dimoulis conceives. Neither do the moderate positivists. The simple assertion that the people's courts in the Nazi regime used it does not imply, by itself, its difference from the positivism.

On the other hand, the third and fourth arguments seem acceptable to us. In fact, the Nazi courts' way of operation embraces Schmitt's juridical decisionism. In addition, we cannot adopt a manichaeistic posture in the sense that positivism would be a follower of fascism and that the jusnaturalism would always be in favor of justice and democracy. It would be absurd to forget that the jusnaturalism was employed to justify a number of abominations throughout history, once its source of transcendent validity varied according to the traditions in time and space. Plato's and Aristotle's arguments defending slavery based upon the natural law cannot be forgotten. In this sense, Ross reminds us that:

> The noble guise of natural law has been used in the course of time to defend or fight for every conceivable kind of demand, obviously arising from a specific situation in life or determined by economic and political class interests, the cultural traditions of the era, its prejudices and aspirations – in short, all that goes to make what is > generally called ideology. (…) Carl Ludwig von Haller (…) claims that according to the law of nature, the strong shall rule over the weak, the husband over the wife, the father over his child, the leader over his men and the teacher over his pupils. In the same way, Thomas Dew (…) upheld the institution of slavery in the Southern States, and (…) if the institution of slavery were abolished, the slaves would be deprived from their natural rights. In the political sphere, it is well-known that natural law (…) has been used successfully to justify all kinds of government, from the absolute power (Hobbes) to the absolute democracy (Rousseau). (…) In the social and economic spheres, the natural law of the 18th century preached extreme individualism and liberalism. The inviolability of the private property and the endless contractual liberty were the two dogmas the 19th century inherited from the natural law; dogmas which were asserted in the North American courts to nullify many social laws. (…) Like a whore, the natural law is available to everyone. There is no ideology that cannot be defended when falling back on the natural law. And, actually, how could it be different when considering that the main fundament of every natural law lies in a direct private apprehension, an evident contemplation, an intuition? Why shall my intuition not be as good as that of the others? (ROSS, 2007, p. 302-304, our emphasis in bold).

This argumentation is really blunt. Following the line that "the best defense is the attack", it has a heavy weight against the naturalist thought. However, the fact that the jusnaturalism cannot overcome the referred accusations does not anyhow invalidate the objection placed against the juridical positivism. This last statement must be explained better in order to avoid some misunderstandings.

Certainly, as many Law theorists remark, it is possible to see the differences between the conceptual positivism and the ideological positivism. However, we have identified a point of connection between these two conceptions that is relevant, problematic and polemic at the same time. The conceptual positivism defends a morally neutral posture in the search of the definition of Law. This metaphysical belief in the neutrality, as Nino explains (2010), is also identified in the ideological positivism, more specifically, in the pretension that the judges take a morally neutral posture and limit themselves to deciding according to the law in effect.

In our viewpoint, the countless conceptions of conceptual positivism happen to get closer to the ideological positivism – even though they do not get confused with each other – by choosing formal criteria of Law validity and, thus, giving up the concern with the juridical norms legitimacy. In other words, we think that the pretension of neutrality would approach or at least be a point of connection between the conceptual and ideological positivisms. We see this approximation both in the positivism exclusive versions and in those called moderate. However, the coherence of our thinking is questioned by Struchiner:

> Supposing that the ideological positivism supports a neutral position is illusory. By demanding that the judges (and citizens) limit themselves to deciding according to the law in effect, one takes a valuational position that claims that the judges (and citizens) must take into account, in their decisions, a single moral principle: what prescribes the observance of the law in effect and exclusively of the law in effect. The ideological positivist, by determining that law, by the simple fact of existing, is fair and must be obeyed, is privileging and choosing certain values, such as security and predictability, over other values that could clash with them. At the same time, he is closing the doors to any possibility of critique of the positive law by juridical subjects and by the judiciary. (...) However, it is hard to find some exponent of the juridical positivism that really supports this conception. In fact, some explicitly reject this possibility. The ideological positivism is nothing but a caricature of the juridical positivism and the main caricaturists are the jusnaturalists and the practical jurists. Although the most prominent positivists do not adhere to the ideological positivism, this is the position that is mostly attributed to the positivists by the jusnaturalists. They attribute this thesis to the positivists and they will criticize them for adhering to it by saying that the positivism is used to legitimate any regime of power (e.g. Nazism). Such argument is deceptive inasmuch as the main positivists do not defend the ideological positivism: the jusnaturalists corrupt the juridical positivism theses to make their opposition easier. Thus, it is clear that the juridical positivism does not identify itself with the ideological positivism, either (STRUCHINER, 2005, p. 30-31 – our emphasis in bolds).

The quote above raises some objections that we need to discuss. Firstly, we would never state that the juridical positivists were Nazists or followers of authoritarian regimes. On the contrary, we believe that the juridical positivists do not adhere to the ideological thesis, standing by Nino in the opinion that this statement is also valid in relation to Kelsen. We did not try to caricature, in any of our previous studies, the juridical positivism based on statements that its followers never defended in order to weaken it or make it less dignified for acceptance. This article intends to briefly elucidate what we really think about this issue. As we still intend to explain, the postpositivist critique differs a lot from the jusnaturalist posture, and this is due to several reasons, among them is the fact that its fundaments are purged by a discursive rationality that overcomes Radbruch's formula. Secondly, we do not believe that an ideological version is really neutral, but we claim that it assumes metaphysical neutrality as he intends that the judges must limit themselves to deciding the concrete cases in compliance with the law in effect. Of course one thing is very different from the other. In other terms, the ideological positivism would act normatively by requiring that the judges limited themselves to judging cases according to the positivist law, but it would do so because it assumed that, by doing it, the applicators would be keeping a morally neutral posture.

Despite these clarifications, at this point of the "debate", there is no way to not take into account the presence of a great incommunicado. We believe that the different assumptions embraced by the positivist and the postpositivist wings, in order to focus on the speech field that interests us more, made them have a dialogue of the deaf between each other, in which some shout on one side and the others shout on the other side, but neither side really understands or listens to what the counterpart is saying. Both assume the incorrectness of the arguments prepared by the opponent party without really considering up to what degree both sides have a part of reason. It is in this great misunderstanding context that, at least in our standpoint, we should try to deepen our arguments so that the debate that "got lost without having been" can be restored. For doing so, we need to go back a little.

The core thesis of the ideological positivism[9] is explicitly criticized by authors like Ross, Struchiner and Dimoulis. Even among the classic positivists, only the Exegesis School would present itself unequivocally receptive to the ideological positivism, by which it is shown to be incorrect to expand this assertiveness to the utilitarian versions defended by Bentham and Austin and, at least questionable, to the Historical School and to the Jurisprudence of Concepts. Furthermore, even if the assertiveness of this kind of consideration regarding Kelsen can be discussed, the reason really seems to be with Nino (2010), Struchiner (2005; 2002) and Dimoulis (2006) in the sense that such accusation also proves to be too much abusive in relation to the Austrian. As Raz elucidates:

> (...) it is clear that the examination of social institutions is an important task, despite its moral value. It does not mean that we should ignore the moral values, but we should recognize that a single social institution can be sometimes used for fair purposes and, other times, for unfair purposes. The fact of being sometimes good, sometimes bad, does not depend on its character as a social institution; it depends on the circumstances. If a certain norm works exactly the same way as the other norms, if its effects on the economic or social activities are as significant as the effects of the other norms, if the attitude towards it by the politics or by the courts is the same, then the statute of law shall not be denied to it just for being unfair. (RAZ, 2010, p. 163).

All of this becomes more evident when we take the question to the inclusive juridical Positivism field[10], specifically to Hart (2001; 2010). For the English jusphilosopher, the notion that the juridical positivism would approve every and any political regime sounds absurd. His juridical positivism version, besides compelling that the juridical norm meets the pedigree requirements in order to belong to the juridical system, some how it also evaluates the juridical system legitimacy conditions themselves, thus taking into account the aspects related to the social efficacy bound to the popular acceptance element. Besides, Hart even supports that any system must contain minimal elements of natural Law to be considered "Law". On the same side, another positivist called Luigi Ferrajoli, a follower of the "critical positivism', fights for a positivism that operates only in democratic political regimes, in which the fundamental rights are effectively guaranteed.

Thus, it is very clear to us the perspective that, for the juspositivists in general, on one hand, it would be very distinct to give unconditional support to every and any kind of political regime, especially the authoritarian ones and, on the other hand, to search for an impartial description of Law without looking for the personal involvement and posture of the one who interprets it. It looks blatant to us that the juridical positivism, in the quality of a Law theory, cannot be understood as a support for the Nazi regime. For sure, it would occasionally be possible to find one or another jurist with a positivist formation that supported the Nazi regime or that, around here, contributed to the military dictatorship. But this would not lead to a relation of direct causality, that is, to the claim that we would have to overcome positivism because it would imply a "Nazi" or radically "authoritarian" theory.

In this context, then, we must ask: Would all the jurists that criticize positivism based on such fundaments be "schizophrenic"? We do not think so! And there are important reasons for that. As we said before, all the conceptual positivists approve the possibility of a normatively inertial approach, as if science could really be neutral and impartial. In this sense, even if they are shown to be widely against authoritarian regimes, by also defending the possibility of overcoming the juridical norms inscribed in them, their approaches bring along a risk of a side effect that is unwished: that of contributing somehow to the "docilization" of people and the "immunization" of the juridical agents as they accept to identify completely abusive systems, and disnatured by the logic of the power by power itself, as being juridical. Thus, supporting that the Nazi regime, the Italian Fascism, the Sovietic Stalinism or the Cuban Castroism, to give some examples, were consisted of juridical systems, that is, that despite all their barbarianism they would have a juridical frame behind them, may mean to award them with an honorable title and encourage attitudes of adherence to their norms.

Therefore, man acquiesces to the world through language and this is not neutral. Man's openness always implies an affective translation of the denotation we give to words. When we prefer to use the expression "disabled person" to "deformed", "monstrosity", "crippled" "mongoloid", we do it because we cannot disregard the illocutionary elements of the language. This also occurs when we choose to use rhetorical expressions like "good faith", "social role" and "virtue". Thus, claiming that "someone acted juridically" gives the connotation that this person acted legitimately, correctly. This is not the only problem herein, though.

The "normative inertia", to use an expression that recurrently appears in Struchiner's thesis to characterize the conceptual positivism, has the subjacent perspective that the jurist is an observer who is able to get away from the observed event. From this point of view, the Law philosopher would become capable of separating the norms content from their form, and of consequently searching for criteria that are likely to characterize whether "this or that" system is juridical, not necessarily due to its content, but, precisely, in light of its form. That is why positivists intend to separate the knowledge clearly, and thus to distinguish the Science of Law from Sociology or Politics, in terms of ethical prescription.

As far as we are concerned, the main controversial point is exactly this one. The critics of the positivism, among which we place ourselves, do not believe in the possibility of neutrality as an element of Science. Besides the fact that the "observer's perspective" is impossible, once the scientist has always been a participant who takes glances from his/her life world, description and prescription, form and content cannot be separated scientifically, under the penalty of the Science itself to vanish. In other words, the sense of which is understood as Science is distinct between the positivists' and their critics' viewpoints. For the latter, the pretension to separate the description from the evaluation would be platonic and irrational and that by the single reason that the observer has always been a thrown being, a participant. That what the former sees as an empirical or essentialist description of the Law, the critics see as an evaluative posture of it. This is a remarkable difference and it should be more stressed between the positivists and their critics.

In particular, we understand that it is impossible to defend the descriptive neutrality as an element that characterizes Science. With regard to that, we emphasize once again that the neutrality is never "neutral", as it also takes the side of something in terms of status quo, whether consciously or not, besides producing internal consequences that are very distant from a supposed normative inertia. Nobody in their right mind would claim that Kelsen was a Nazist! But Kelsen's attempt to "clean" Law from all values, Ross's effort to construct a legal right free from any metaphysical assumptions or Raz's claim that all considerations of a moral character were extrajudicial and that they would only be tolerated due to the inexorability of the discretionary condition of the interpretation of laws, leads to evaluative elements, such as ethical, moral, religious and agnostic ones, to give some examples, that could be disregarded during the definition of what "is" and "what is not Law"[11]. And if law is the way of "re-cognizing" the human, of stating the human condition, our disagreement gets larger as this perspective would bring along a side effect that was not predicted, not thought about, not wished by any supporter of the positivism, but that is typical in the entropy of any Science: the "legitimacy (unwished by them) of totalitarian systems!

We should stress again, in this diapason, that, in general, people today still connect that which is licit, that is, that which is allowed or mandatory inside a juridical system, with the assumptions of "veracity", of "correction", of "fair"! We can corroborate this assertiveness with the fact that all the dictatorships in the 20th century searched for a "veil of legality" as a factor for consolidating their power, that is, an element for stabilization or facilitation for their continuity. Two very clear examples are those of the "People's" Republic of China and the German "Democratic" Republic that incorporated to their names elements that intended to support their legitimacy. They explored explicitly the affective load favored by these words in order to strengthen the "legitimacy" of the "juridical system". Likewise, all Latin American dictatorships always had constitutional texts behind them (if it is possible to address them this way…). Therefore, the assertiveness expressed by Bobbio (1995), that it is very difficult to set apart the concepts of legitimacy and legality in the popular belief, looks correct to us.

Supporting, like Raz, the thesis according to which a norm is juridical since it shows an excluding reason does not stop us from asking: Did Nuremberg's racial norms really act like the other juridical norms? In fact, wouldn't his example, according to which soldier Jeremy understood his superior's order as a reason that excluded all the other ones to use, without authorization, someone else's vehicle, fit the arguments of defense in Nuremberg's court? And the question becomes another one: isn't the contra legem argumentation a fundamental element to define what is licit and what is illicit? And if a norm is illicit, how can it belong to the Law? How can it be a juridical norm? After all, when a norm is declared null, don't we have a reasoning of excluding it from the juridical system as well? And doesn't such exclusion reasoning end up also "defining" what Law is, or better, saying what role the word "law" plays in this language game?

In our standpoint, noticing a necessary connection (and not an identity) between Law and Moral does not result in dis-differentiation from the former, as the exclusivists think, but it is condition for its differentiation from the other systems. This does not only keep us away from the exclusive positivists, but also shows how our conception overtakes the simplistic presumption of the inclusive ones. When, at this point, we partially follow Habermas to defend the existence of a necessary relation of complementarity between the Law and the Moral, we do not disregard that, despite referring to the same problems, they do it from distinct angles. Clearly, Law does not regularize only the interpersonal action conflicts, but also the fulfillment of political programs and political delimitation of goals, with which arguments of a moral, ethical and pragmatic nature relate.

Yet, we cannot deny the clear relation of reciprocal complementation between Law and Moral since, in dialogue with Lévinas and Derrida, liberty and equality do not determine responsibility, but it is the ethical responsibility, as an ek-xistential opening of man, which enables him to be free and by that to be fair to the other.

Going back to Habermas, even though they must be interpreted as juridical, the Fundamental Human Rights have a moral content and, as we know, a "juridical system can only be legitimate" if these moral principles are not contradicted. Therefore, "through the components of the juridical validity legitimacy, law acquires a relation with moral", which is not of subordination or identity (HABERMAS, 2003, p. 140-141). Where as the Law must relieve the reflexive rational moral act (that is, post-conventional), which imposes cognitive (knowledge of the best way of applying the norm to solve the "concrete case"), motivational (the must of acting according to the norm, even against their own interests, in order to harmonize the must and the obligation), and organizational (requirement of an organizational strategy for the best way of fulfilling the moral musts) requirements to the individuals, the Moral contributes with the construction of the system of subjective rights which is fundamental for a discursive practice.

In this context, Law cannot do without Moral just like every Science, Art and Religion can not. Why? Because man is only man as he is a responsible being. The responsibility makes man a human being. How will this association with moral take place? In the current law sphere it is possible to adhere to a dialectical notion between universalism and cultural relativism about a discursive reading of the fundamental rights. But this concept of law adopted here can only "seer" a provisory concept as the recognition of the Other, and with him, the recognition of himself varies in time and space. For instance, yesterday a slave was not recognized as a human being. Today a household worker is not recognized as a worker that deserves the same rights as the other public-sector employees. What is coming next?[12]

Besides, it is exactly for incorporating and assuming pragmatically certain moral requirements that the discourse principle (D) provides the construction of a Law that wants to be legitimate. In fact, the Fundamental Human Rights assumed as a condition of (D), unswervingly have a moral content[13] which is, however, fluid as it is permanently built and rebuilt with its own discourse[14]-[15].In the core of this discourse, consequently, the participants recognize each other in a system of Fundamental Human Rights under the penalty of vanishing their own pretension of regulating its living with the positive law means. By taking the form of democracy principle, transcending the limits of the morality principle (U) and by enabling the possibility of rational decisions in every and any kind of deliberation, the discourse principle is enabled, in dialogue with Bustamante (2008a, p. 185), as "an argument of the universal-pragmatic injustice" that overcomes the one provided by Radbruch's jusnaturalist formula which is already worn out nowadays[16]. After all, as participants of the discourse, people will reiteratively test the legitimacy of the norms, even if the limits for that are different on the basis of justification and application.

[12]This year, in Brazil, a constitutional amendment increasing the rights of household workers was approved. It is the 72nd amendment.

For all this, the view that it is possible to separate the definition of evaluation from what is juridical seems intolerable to us. Saying that the "Nazist Law was juridical", as Kelsen did, does not make him a Nazist. But, it must be observed that such posture cooperates indirectly with the "immunization" of such regime, as it "seems" to give reason to the typical defense of the Nazists that were accused at Nuremberg's Court: "We were just following superior orders! We were under the legality of the German State!" In other words: "We disregarded any other actions but the one of taking the Jewish to the gas chamber once the German legislation was an excluding reason of other behaviors to us".

Anyhow, it is necessary to alert that our point of view attempts to go beyond the limits in which the present debate is set. In this sense, [13]The debate between Apel and Habermas regarding the relation of Moral with Law is very important, and we discussed about it in other books. In this sense, please refer to Cruz (2007) and Duarte (2012). As to a comprehensive approach of Apel's view, see Oliveira (2004).

[14]Thus, we say that the Fundamental Human Rigths are, at the same time, condition and consequence of the discursive practice. For more details, check Habermas (2003), Cruz (2007) and Duarte (2012).

[15]Regarding our concept of discourse, see Cruz(2011, p. 175).

[16] "The image of a Natural Law 'above' the Positive Law goes precisely with Radbruch's Formula.(...) I believe that it is necessary not to eliminate the argument of injustice, but otherwise review it in order to exclude Radbruch's Formula and its platonic elements that come along with it. Habermas' model seems to be more suitable" (BUSTAMANTE, 2008a, p. 187-188, nota 101 – free translation).

the post-positivists notice the needed co-relation between the "e-valu-a(c)tion" and the "de-finition" of Law as a mandatory necessity of "content-giving" of the Law. That is, they notice that the Law deals with human issues and, therefore, scientists need to take the moral and ethical aspects into account in the conformation of the Science of Law. On the other side, positivists claim that such view is inadequate, since it implies a blend of concepts from distinct Sciences, "moralizing the Law" by making it become dependent on the Moral. Such view, to the inclusivists' and exclusivists' eyes, would be supported due to a romantic, "idealistic" and little realistic view of the Juridical Science, which would have the demerit of contributing to the dis-differentiation of the Law. Due to everything that has been said until now, however, there are no longer any doubts that this reading is not only mistaken, but also insufficient.

In our standpoint, the problem can be taken to another level. The lack of dialogue between positivists and post-positivists happens due to the phenomenon of paradigmatic incommensurability, that is, due to the difficulty of an analysis that has been produced since ever from the assumptions of the paradigm itself. In this aspect, our view is in favor of the perspective that the "de-finition" cannot be separated from the "e-valu-a(c)tion" of the Law legitimacy, as we know that Dasein always ontologizes, for man always accepts the world through concepts and these concepts always "take place" through our opening to the mundanity, an opening that is affective. Our position is, thus, based upon arguments of a philosophical ground, which come from the pragmatic-linguistic turn and that open our eyes to the impossibility of valuational neutrality.

It is not absolutely about saying that our position is simply better than the positivists' or stating that they are insensible to human sufferings. This would never be acceptable at all! Our analysis tries to "demo(n)strate" that we have scientific and philosophical arguments that have fully "différance" from the positivists' to claim that, nowadays, the Nazi Law cannot be considered "Law", that an "international war law" is as unacceptable as an order of a robber to anyone (so that he is given the possessions that do not belong to him) which is not juridical either. And these arguments prove to be more suitable to the discursive rationality patterns than those defended by most kinds of positivists. Once it was set on non-discursive bases, against notions of "re-cognition", of "unconditional hospitality", of reciprocity, of pluralism, of respect to the Fundamental Human Rights of the minority, and, therefore, completely indifferent to the post-conventional morality notion, the Nazi "Law" does not pass the test of the democracy principle. It could never be accepted by its addressees, for it did not go through the universal-pragmatic injustice argument, which is post-metaphysical by excellence. Thus, what is being discussed are the bases of the Science itself, or, as we prefer, the conditions of the concept itself of something that is assumed to be scientific!

The "Nazi Law" is far below from what the ontology of the law concept authorizes, sure that any "de-finition" of what is crime against humanity is insufficient to "dé-crire" what took place in Shoah for the simple assertion: How can a man go "beyond" humanity? How can an action be compliant with the "law" of a country and be absolutely/endlessly anti-juridical? The excess that hypostatizes the concept of this crime makes it "im-possible" to conceive Nuremberg's racial laws as juridical. Its own persecution imprescriptibility is an answer to such "im-possibility" as it also implies an excess, a hyperbolic reaction to any temporalization attempt, to any finition/finitude, to any limit of the juridical ontology.

It is a good sense to observe that, actually, the critiques posed against the juridical positivism are too much generalist. Even if Figueroa (2008, p. 203) is right by saying that, to a certain extent, simplifications are unavoidable, especially when discussing such complex theories, the generalization and the superficiality many times do no good to the scientific work. Here is one of the reasons implicit in the critique made by Dimoulis against the postures that do not pay attention to the differences between exclusive and inclusive positivisms. Saving the reservations made until now, this concern is also implicit in Struchiner's objection to those that disregard the differences between conceptual positivism and ideological positivism. However, all the effort we have made until now shows our concern about the risks of excessive simplifications.

At this point, we realize the importance of what Derrida understands by writing, by that which we must understand as writing, an inconvenience ("unheimlich"), as it is about what has just "passed away", "a there" that is also "a not there", an absent presence, "a still here" that "is not here anymore" of the present of "I" (we) who write about the present of the one who is now reading. How to deal with this "gap" in this discourse opening? The maximum we permit ourselves is to try to think about what a positivist would understand about what was claimed in this issue. Perhaps some are supporting that this intricate word game implies a simple and pure return to the jusnaturalism; others may understand that our view is a mere variation of jusmoralism.

May they be right? Accepting the pragmatic argument of co-originality of the law with a non-conventional moral also implies a critique of the logocentrism and a critique of the naturalism of the classic theory of the conditions of the knowledge possibility and validity from an effort of compatibilization (in what is possible) of the Derridean deconstruction and the Lévinasian responsibility.

We will surely be at least accused of eclecticism. How can one try to conciliate a logocentric author, curator of the Enlightenment traditions in the past century, of the Aufklarüng, Kant and Hegel's dignified heir, like Jürgen Habermas with, on the other side, authors like Derrida and Lévinas who, bound to a Jewish tradition, adopt the French language to express themselves and to do it "for beyond the logocentrism", "for beyond the ontology"? "Obje-ction" "(taken) noticed"since we were willing to (take) riskwith such conjunction, especially if someone read the text "The Supplantation of the Temporalized Prima Philosophy: Derrida's Critique of Phonocentrism" inserted in the book "The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity" in which Habermas attempts to mark his approximations with and, especially, his distancing from Derrida's Project.

Nevertheless, we still believe that our proposition has a salvation, maybe because we have been reading Walter Benjamin (2011) very much lately, who is one of the main exponents of the first generation from Frankfurt School, from which Habermas together with Apel form the second one, and that influenced Derrida's work so much. Or maybe due to the historicgathering of these authors in the work coordinated by Giovanna Borradori (2004), "Philosophy in a Time of Terror", in which the distance between them seems to narrow a lot[17].

And what about Lévinas? His proximity with Derrida does not look problematic to us. Despite the originality of each one's project, we believe that the connection, not only the intellectual one, but the friendship that brought them together in a personal sphere, is very much known. Thus, the connection with Habermas sounds more indirect, more subjectile, smoother, but not less evident to us. After all, isn't humanism a mark in Habermas' and Lévinas' thoughts? And the reading of works like "Theological-Philosophical Fragments" and "Between Naturalism and Religion", at least as we feel it, shows interesting approximations between them. This article does not aim at deepening in the theme about the approximation between such giants of philosophy.

[17]In this sense, see Cruz; Duarte (2009, p.37 et. seq.).

We prefer herein to believe in the value of the allusion, of the understanding of such proposition as a hypothesis, as a hypostasis rather than a daydream...

The objections will surely not stop there, though. Even if we admitted (tolerated?) the approximation between such philosophers, wouldn't this post-positivism imply a more sophisticated (complicated?) return to the jusnaturalism? So wouldn't it be possible to suppose that we are here only replacing Grotius' or Kant's straight reason for the "right as an aporia by Derrida"? For Alf Ross's horror (nausea?), by taking Justice as an element of the unpredictable, wouldn't we be diving into metaphysics? Wouldn't it be possible to imagine that we are just exchanging Thomas of Aquino's divine law for Derrida's Justice? And regarding Lévinas, wouldn't the situation be even worse? Wouldn't we be just releasing an idyllic dream of a fair law? A mere pedagogy of a humanism typical of a philosopher (we'd better say 'poet')? Doesn't the inclusion of the third, relativizing/enabling the endless responsibility in Lévinas, imply a new predication which is typical of the jusnaturalism?

The ambiguity is a constant in these authors' thought. Wouldn't it be being employed here strategically in order to gild the jusnaturalism with 'modern' elements of the French philosophy? How to do Science from this ambiguity? After all, as Günter Figal claims, isn't the ambiguity the proper language of the impersonal, a manifestation of the heideggerian's chatter?

We notice laughters! A histrionic laughter that is uncontrolled, desperate, immoderate can be heard now. It ran away from the footnote, escaped from the margins evading from this marginalization and, without asking for any permission, it invaded the text body. What can we understand about a non-linguistic body expression like a laughter? A hint: isn't the ambiguity then the opposite of Science? How can we do Science, how can we search for rational arguments based on subtleties of (in) the language or even in contradictions? Checkmate? Curé? Indecipherable proposition? Performative contradiction that is so beloved by Aristotle and Apel?[18]

[18]In "Beyond the Juridical Positivism", from where this article stems, we worked all the time with a rationality notion which is different from that provided by the Galilean Science Paradigm. This passage, in the mentioned work, attests an evasion from the margin into the text. As Ribeiro (2013) explained well in his preface to the work, the footnote – which herein is part of the text – plays a role which is very different from the usual one. It starts to play an outstanding role as it symbolizes the persistent search for overcoming something simply given that was standardized, as it is known, the modus operandi of

Is, by any chance, anyone listening to a samba-enredo as well? Or is it a carnival cry? Or is it really the American "cavalry" (wouldn't Argentinian be better?) that arrives giving some help? A "baiano being" (how we miss him!) is "presented" in the discussion! We used to call him Luis Alberto Warat! He and his pieces of work:"The juridical Science and its two husbands" and "The carnavilized epistemology". Warat (2000; 2009) always supported that law was not Science but, otherwise, it was hermeneutic, distant from Apolo's harmony and close to the Dionysiac desire, in which the truth is nothing but a delusion. Soon, the pretension that the rationality could keep the uncertainty away is nothing but a tragic summer dream of those "penguinized" jurists (wouldn't they also be "peacocked"?). In his point of view, the necessity of the understanding to include fundamentally the affection would split the Philosophy between its Apathetic thinkers that would describe emotions and sensibility rationally, like Kant and Hegel, and the Pathetic ones that would "des-cri-be" them as an indissoluble condition of the human being, like Merleau-Ponty, Deleuze and Derrida.

Thus, would the way out be pointing out the difference between Social Science and Natural Science? Or stating that the law is not a Science? Or claiming that the epistemology died? We do not think so! (Un) fortunately we are not baianos! We are rooted behind these mountains! We can do nothing but contemplate the infinite that unfolds with and from them. We cannot deny our difference from this one who was and still is one of the most genial thinkers we know. But, yet, we shyly whisper: Warat's thought lacked radicality! (How good it would be to hear his reply!), for his concepts of epistemology as an antimonic of doxa, of science as the opposite of hermeneutics, sound like a return to the conceptual mentalism to the authors of this work, as they seem to "freeze" such concepts. It implies to treat them from an essence that he himself denounced. Science and Law are not purely reason, for man is not! Such conception still represents one letting him/her be tied up by the totalization, by the reduction of any difference from the uniformization of the naturalism as an exaltation of the rationalization as the only means of knowledge. But, "il y a" more than that! If knowledge must aban-doing science. Thus, it is about a clear allusion to someone (the other, the otherness that reads and participates in the permanent and ongoing re-construction of the text) that does not restrain themselves to stay at the text margins, by overflowing into its body. Something that causes strangeness to the one who sees science just in the Galilean styles, but that plays a fundamental role in an attempt to rethink this paradigm. For further details, we suggest the reading of Cruz; Duarte (2013).

donthis "rationalizer", "rationalizing" prepotency, if we need to bet, as Warat would say, in a multi-diversity of the knowledge, or as Boaventura (2007) de Souza Santos prefers, inknowledge "ecology"; we cannot purpose to "close" the concepts of law, of science, of truth, of epistemology and of rationality!

A less prepotent knowledge that knows about the implosion of the Cartesian individual, that knows about everything, that can know about everything, that reduces everything to the objectivity, that denies everything that cannot be reduced to certainty, that deprives the ego in favor of the humanism of this deposed individual (wounded, but never disregarded), but that cannot be deleted/crossed out (stained?), annihilated, as it is seen in the "structuralism" and in Nietzsche. A knowledge that, instead of certifying, of demonstrating, simply "attests", as Ricouer intends.

> Between the need of an absolute guarantee offered by Descartes (that enables the Cogito to have its pretension of final fundament) and the widespread threat of the doubt stemmed from Nietzsche (that shakes any fundament), Ricouer seeks another criterion of verifiability or even of truth; there lies the attestation, which is a certain kind of verification of knowledge. I say "a certain kind" because, if the terms verifiability or verification suggest the deletion of an error, the attestation always goes through doubt. The kind of knowledge that hermeneutics can claim of the self goes beyond the classical opposition between the doxa (opinion) and the episteme (science or knowledge). It approaches the doxa as it is a belief, but it is different from it as it isn't a matter of "believing that" but rather "believing in". In this sense, it is close to the witness. (...) The attestation, thus, is not only of an epistemological order, but, above all, ethical: it is the confidence in man's ability to say, do, recognize himself and take his moral responsibility. (DOUEK, 2011, p. 48-49, our emphasis in bold).

The attestation should not be understood as a mere stretching of the demonstration concept. The attestation goes far beyond the notion that truth is not purely epistemic, it incorporates a doxa perspective. At the same time the attestation rewrites the concept of truth, it can only be understood in Ricouer from its notion of narrative identity of its own reflection with the instancy of the individual's deposition. In this sense, as he sees it, the ipseity supports the "hermeneutics of the self", imposing an overcoming of the static sameness, which is typical in Aristotle's quiddity. The being is contingent on himself, but man keeps himself (mantien soi), supports himself because he attests. This attestation as a renewed criterion of the truth is fundamental to the Ricourean thought, once it only takes place as this support is connected with ethical correction that lies in his notion of reciprocity and an ethic that also takes the role as an element of *prima philosophi*e. Man exists because he promises. And by doing so, he commits himself as he becomes a responsible being. So, as we feel it, this is promoted in the/with the fragmentary dialectic ipse-idem between memory and forgetfulness, as the promise is essentially an act that is fulfilled in time.

If the Cartesian (hyper) certainty becomes an impossibility, the Lévinasian ambiguity and the Ricouerian attestation become bets for saving the reason itself, the Science itself. After all, even harmony depends upon the combination of consonances and dissonances. We are not before an exchange of delusions: the search of the sphinx of security by the positivists for the justice chimera, as Warat would say. What is proposed here is to replace an "egological" way of "knowledge" with an "ecological" way of "knowledge", an overcoming of the Monadic egology, which is a solipsist of the Cartesian inheritance, with the deconstruction of the "ab-ysm" of the positivists' delusions with and from an "ecological" knowledge."Uai", are we green now? Yes and no! We surely worry about the environment and the protection of the ecosystems, but we are "deformalizing" the word "Eco-logy" herein. "Eco-logy" would be a knowledge that is known to be reflective, a non-inertial passivity, because opening oneself to the other is always a "de-cision". "Eco-logy", a knowhow, a knowledge from the Lévinasian echo, so usual (would it also be sectionalism?) in the mountains of Minas. The mountains which confine us in /through the liberty. The Liberty which is imposed by the ethics about the care with the otherness.T he Otherness which enables its own attestation. The Otherness which allows the "self" recognition and of the "Other" and, through it, the way of being of the Law. The Otherness which fixes our necessity of help for the infinite. That demands evasion, inviting to the existence of the ipseity through the need of the answer: "Here I am!"Answer that gives us ground. Answer which is given according to each one's measure, as nobody can make themselves less than they are. Answer that constitutes us as human beings for approaching us to the infinite, something that takes us "to God"-bye!

Deformalizing, deconstructing, attesting would be ways of knowledge that lie beside demonstration. Exactly because of the ambiguity inserted in them, supposing that our adherence to postpositivism implies a return to jusnaturalism does not imply falling into absurdity. However, we just ask for the right to understand in a differe(a)nt way! And we have good arguments for that. The first one has already been clearly shown: Derrida, Ricouer and Lévinas, each with his own way, deal with a notion of existence that is totally different from that of the jusnaturalists and the positivists themselves. The great collaboration of the Phenomenology since Husserl was putting at stake the way through which man knew. Well, it does not suit this article discussing whether Ricouer, Derrida and Lévinas are followers of the Phenomenology, but insisting in the fact that they work from this philosophical language[19]. All the critiques about the scientific objectivity stem from a specific way of treating/conceiving ontology.

Deformalizing, deconstructing, attesting imply, then, ways of evading from an apophantic and totalizing rationality that intends to be unique. Such pretension denies the validity conditions for any alternative way of rationality. However, these ways of evasion must not be considered at all as the only ways of overcoming the jusnaturalist/positivist (JP) paradigm. As we see it, deformalizing, deconstructing, attesting must be understood just as some exemplifications that man can/needs to work with alternatives. They lie next to other ways of overcoming the naturalist rationality of the Galilean scientificism. Among them, we can point out, even here in Brazil, some efforts about Heidegger's philosophical hermeneutic, about the discursive theory of law, about Dworkin's artistic interpretation and about Luhmanian systemic rationality, which, by the single fact of not approving a causality logic, it implies, as far as we are concerned, an evasion from scientificism. In this sense, Deformalizing, deconstructing, attesting do not imply an only way for constructing a new paradigm of law. They do not even imply the "option" of the authors of this work, as the opening has been a constant in the proposition of their work.

In this sense, supported by Figueroa, saying that, at this viewpoint, positivism does not get separated from jusnaturalism implies recognizing a critique that would involve a unique paradigm that, now, tries to overcome itself.

The same can be said regarding the way positivists and jusnaturalists understand what ethic is and what moral is! Both conceptions treat the ethical issue as a way of living, in such a way that the ethical wisdom takes place as a consequence of the theoretical wisdom. The sage is the one who knows how to live according to the Goodness, and for getting to know it, he needs to dominate the "sophia". This inheritance of the Socratic paideia, well developed in Plato's "Republic" and Aristotle's "Ethics to Nicomaco", dominates this paradigm and explains the reasons why it becomes possible to separate description from evaluation, denotation judgment from value judgment, "allowing" the Science neutrality. Well, from the moment the ethics takes the condition of prima philosophie, from the moment the responsibility becomes an ek-stase that is inseparable from man, from the moment a beyondness of ontology (hypostasis) is searched, it seems to us that it is unlikely to suppose that we are purely and simply returning to the jusnaturalism. Thus, in dialogue with Sebbah (2009, p. 87), "if the Lévinasian ethics (…) is not the search done by the Greek philosophy relatively to its good behavior, neither is the simple observance of the rules and, even less, the blind respect of an abstract and formal law".

Dissatisfied with these answers, it will always be possible to say to some reader: this text is nothing but an alphabet soup, a linguistic fruit salad that translates nothing but a desire for justice, a dream of equality, a daydream of humanism that is disconnected from the practice of law. Yes, this interpretation is always as possible as endless others. Nevertheless, it is relevant to remind that Lévinas' work was always in the holocaust horizon and that the innate violence perspective dominates law like the aporia for Derrida. We are all urged by idylls, by dreams or daydreams. However, in our standpoint, saying that the search for what "de-fines" us as humans is nothing but a daydream seems to be an interpretation that is at least unlikely.

Nevertheless, the nomenclature does not matter. For the authors, what is important is the pretension to construct law on new bases, under new assumptions, neither better nor worse than those that guide the JP paradigm, but based on a differentiated rationality. The incommensurability of these assumptions allows us to claim that, in this case, truth yields to the Lévinasian responsibility!

It is on these grounds that we reaffirm what we said before: when countless conceptions of conceptual positivism choose idealistic criteria of validity in Law, such as Kelsen's Fundamental Norm or Hart's Recognition Rule, - as long as this last one is not "necessarily" idealistic when it takes its constitution in its application, but only occasionally in the supposition of an external observer – end up getting away from the concern about the juridical norm legitimacy, thus falling on a serious problem. Obviously, the supposed "neutrality" regarding the question "what is/works as Law" happens to "justify" those who claim that there is a certain approximation with the ideological positivism. As, actually, in our viewpoint, there will never be a neutrality, either because the adoption of any perspective will always be evaluative or because the most varied choices will necessarily bring about direct and indirect effects, we understand that the conceptual positivists are as much mistaken as the ideological ones (at least in what this matter concerns).

Even without explicitly defending a normative posture concerning the decision of difficult cases, at least not in the sense that is defended by the ideological side, regarding the definition of Law, the conceptual positivism contributes indirectly to the "docilization" of the population and to the "mechanization" of the Law agents, as they approve collaterally everything that is in effect with an honorable title of "legitimate" and encourage attitudes of adherence to their norms. Its attitude of equalizing validity and vigor, and, furthermore, of approaching validity to efficacy (Kelsen), even if it does not culminate in the ideological positivism thesis, many times it ends up generating indirect and side effects that are not usually accepted well by the confessed followers of the conceptual positivism only. It is usual to say that the opposites attract each other. In magnetism, this is true. In Law, the dichotomy between the definition of what law is and the evaluation about its legitimacy, therefore, allows one to allude to the Political "Theology" by Carl Schmitt when he states: "The state of exception is law!"

The freedom as subjective right in the William of Ockham's thought

Gabriel Lima Marques[1]

Abstract: The discussion of freedom has long been presented as a problem for humanity, not being different in the medieval period. In the early fourteenth century, the English philosopher William of Ockham, also known as Doctor Invincibilis, surprised everyone when defending for the first time in the history of legal thought the ius as an individual potestas. This feat earned him subsequently the tribute made by authors such as Michel Villey, to regard him as the father of subjective rights. Developing a theory based on the subject and in particular situations, in complete contrast to the classic Aristotelian thought and consequently Thomist, who were concerned in understanding the universal nature of things, Ockham argued that each individual had a right given by God and by nature to choose between yes and no, and between what was or was not appropriate. In other words, using the Evangelical Law, as did all the philosophers at that time, but in a different way, the Franciscan author will defend that the human being has a natural subjective right, and raising the power to make decisions, to the dignity of law, Ockham will challenge the tyrannical power, which he said would only serve to corrupt the subjective freedom, the free will given by God. In this sense, the scope of this paper is to present the subjective right as a corollary of the concept of freedom introduced by William of Ockham in his works, as well as the consequence of such fact to the legal thought.

Little is known about the life of William of Ockham. However, it can be stated based on some works dedicated to study the medieval political thought, that the English philosopher born between the years 1280 and 1290, in the small village of Ockham, Surrey County, near of London (Coleman, 2000: 170). According to Alessandro Ghisalberti (1997: 15), the first record of the author that we have notice, date from February 26, 1306. Such record, is a document that contains a list of Franciscan friars minors who had been ordained sub-deacons in the church of St. Mary in Southward, diocese of Winchester. This ordinance, according to canon law of that time, allowed candidates to the priesthood to attend courses in philosophy and theology, what make us believe that Ockham probably has moved in the following year to Oxford, where was a Franciscan convent with professors that taught such subjects. Furthermore because it was there where he became baccalaureus formatus[2] and received the sacrament of order in the year 1318 (Ghisalberti, 1997: 16).

After his priestly ordination, Ockham began to devote himself to the study of an academic nature. With an effective and innovative potential, the English theologian, for about six years, lived in transit between Oxford and London. In this same period the effervescence of scholastic discussions in the Franciscan houses, gave to him seven[3] Quodlibetas,[4] whose issues were associated with subjects ranging from logic to metaphysics and theology (Spade, 1999: 07). Incidentally, in this vein, it is important to point out also that the characteristic brilliance of his theses was equally responsible for the nickname, Venerabilis Inceptor, attributed to him. This is because, it seems, Ockham, despite the demonstration of its extreme intelligence and have completed all requirements to become Magister actu regens, that is, master in theology, he did not definitely take a catedra, remaining thus as mere Inceptor,[5] mere postulant, due to a conflict with the then Chancellor of the University of Oxford, John Lutterell.[6]

[4] The medieval quodlibets were works philosophical, detailed and dense, targeted to solve contemporary intellectual issues. In other words, were essays used to resolve mainly philosophical and theological problems, aimed to overcoming critical placements of other authors in certain matters (KEELE, 2007: 653).

[5] Title that allowed graduates, candidates for the office of Master, give lectures in universities.

[6] Dominican. Doctor of Theology. Thomist. Was chancellor at the University of Oxford between the years 1317 and 1322.

From what is known, the origin of this dispute began with the deposition of Lutterell from the post of ambassador, by decision of the Bishop of Lincoln, Henry Burwash. This decision was prompted by a request made by the professors of the University of Oxford, including Ockham, who for a long period kept differences with the Chancellor. However, nonconformist with the decision, the former diplomat in the year 1323, after request an authorization to the King Edward II (Baudry, 1950: 86-95), decided to address to the court of Pope John XXII who was in Avignon, France.[7] There sought to assert his reasons against the dismissal from the office of Chancellor, and took the opportunity to give His Holiness a dossier (Mcgrade, 2002: 07) where he listed 51 items extracted from the comments to sentences of Peter Lombard,[8] made by Ockham, who according to his understanding contained errors and heretical professions. Conscious of the accusation, the Pope appointed a commission of theologians to examine such propositions and called Ockham to submit to his court, and present a defense, fact that eventually led the British theologian to leave the college career, before the imposition of the Master's degree.

For three years, the committee which was composed by John Lutterell, former chancellor of the University of Oxford and disaffection of Ockham, Raymond Bequin, Dominican and Patriarch of Jerusalem in exile, Durand of St. Pontian, Dominican and bishop of Le Puy, Domingos Grima, Dominican and bishop of Pamiers, Gregorio de Tauri, Augustin-

[7] In 1309, Pope Clement V, French, convinced by the King of France Philip IV the Fair, transferred the headquarter of the papacy from Rome to Avignon, in the banks of Rhône River. This episode known in the history as the Avignon's crisis, started the period of the Babylonian captivity of the popes, which lasted about 70 years, and only found his final term in the year 1377, with the determination of Pope Gregory XI, that demanded the reinstallation of the papal residence in Rome. However, because of the death of Pope Gregory in the very next year, there was a period of enormous controversy between 1378 and 1414, about the headquarter of the Papacy, and even more on the succession of the pope himself. This historic moment commonly called Western Schism, only finished with the convening of the Council of Constance and the subsequent election of Pope Martin V in 1417.

[8] Peter Lombard was an italian and scholastic philosopher of century XII. Became famous for writing the Libri quatuor sententiarum, The Fours Books of Sentences, a work which made a compilation of passages, phrases, or sentences, of the bible, and from the works of the most prominent medieval thinkers that synthesize the Christian theology . In the centuries following the death of Lombardo, became a constant editing comments to their sentences, examples are the comments made by St. Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus, to name a few.

ian, bishop of Belluno-Feltre, and Paynhota Giovanni, an Augustinian monk and master in theology, met to study the works of Ockham and issue an opinion (Larsen, 2011: 90). After the refusal of the results contained in the first report prepared by the committee on the grounds that it had not been sufficiently severe, the commission submitted a second in which explicitly acknowledged that seven of the articles were indeed heretical, thirty-seven were false, four were daredevils and three did not have any need for censorship (Baudry, 1950: 86-95). However, as the report was a purely advisory opinion, to acquire condemnatory nature, it demanded a pronouncement of the Pope in this sense, something that according to Leon Baudry (1950: 100), never came to fruition.

In this sense, one can say that the excommunication of Ockham of June 6, 1328, is not directly related to the final document prepared by the Commission, but rather with his escape from Avignon (Amman, 1931: 868), at last, as alluded Alessandro Ghisalberti (1997: 20), after becoming aware of the serious crisis involving his congregation and the Pope about the Franciscan poverty,[9] as well as after his frustration with the trial process of their works, there was no other option to Ockham than to flee to Italy, with the general minister of Franciscan Order, Michael of Cesena and close ranks against the pope, under the protection of Louis IV of Bavaria.[10] However, after dock in Pisa, Ockham and his

[9] Conflict involving Pope John XXII and the Franciscans called "conventuals" on one side, and the Franciscans called "spirituals" in another. The dispute had as the spark, the understanding established in the year 1322 at a meeting of the Franciscan order, in the city of Perugia, Italy. On occasion, despite the resistance of the Conventual Franciscans of spiritual thesis that Christ and his apostles did not own anything, neither collective, nor in particular, the thesis of the latter was the winner. This was the same understanding of other popes, for example, the contained in the bull Exiit qui seminat from Pope Nicholas III. However, from the decree of Pope John XXII in the year 1323, that such an understanding was heretical, the political struggle rather than finished intensified and spread further.

[10] Louis IV of Bavaria was elected king of Germany in 1314 by most Germans. However, in the same election, a minority had voted in Frederick of Austria. Because of this, both asked the pope to recognize the right to the crown, but John XXII remained neutral. So Louis of Bavaria proclaimed himself king and after a long internal dispute with Frederick, in the year 1322, Louis becomes sovereign lord of Germany. However, again, John XXII remains inert to recognize Louis as emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. To further aggravate the situation, in 1323 Louis appoints Count Bertoldo Neiffer as his representative in Italy. However, such an appointment infuriates John XXII, who during the war in Germany had taken advantage of the rule that in case of vacancy in the German king, the Vatican administered the Italian throne. Because of this, John XXII demanded Luis, conferees still await for about three months, until finally succeeded a personal encounter with the Emperor. In the context of this meeting, was assigned to the English theologian the famous phrase, o imperator defende me gládio et ego defendam te verbo, that is, the Emperor defend me with the sword that I will defend with words (Baudry, 1950: 124). Now if it was or not uttered by Ockham, we don't known, but it is known that such an event was rather striking in the author's life, since it was from that moment that the Ockham merely concerned with philosophical and theological meditations, left the scene to give rise to an Ockham, who living at the court of Louis of Bavaria in Munich, undertook all the intellectual resources at its disposal, in the composition of works of legal and political controversy that favored the interests of the emperor (Ghisalberti, 1997: 21).

In this context, it is here that lies the crux of this Article: demonstrate how Ockham, dived to head in secular struggles of his time, and carried his philosophical theory, framed in Christian theology, for the plan of the law, and how this in some extent contributed to the formation of modern legal thought. Thus, to achieve the proposed goal, this work is divided into three parts. At first, for a better understanding of the philosophical thinking of Ockham, we intend to present a brief characterization of its nominalist theory. This way we will be able to realize later in the text, the influences of this particular way of thinking in the writings legal-political of Venerabilis Inceptor. Already in the second stage, the proposal is to perform a context from the work Opus nonaginta dierum, about conflicts in which Ockham became involved, namely, the disagreement over the scope of evangelical poverty, and conflict about plenitudo potestatis the pope, that is, the possibility of interference of the pope in temporal matters. In view of this, the last stage of this paper will demonstrate how Ockham, inspired by his nominalism and by the Franciscan philosophy who understood freedom as a requirement for the Christian life, will influence the philosophy of law in the following centuries, to study two issues of great importance, legal positivism, and the individual power, source of the subjective right.

to, under penalty of excommunication, dismiss the Count, and await the Holy See to decide the question of legitimacy. But Louis disagrees, and says that the pope could not intrude in the internal affairs of the empire. So, to solve the problem, the emperor calls convening of an ecumenical council. The idea gains strength, and because of that John XXII in the year 1324 excommunicates Louis, giving rise to a dense political conflict (Eguren, 2005: 110).

2. The nominalist theory of Ockham: emphasis on the singular and instrumentalization of universals

According to Michel Villey (2005: 223), Ockham Ockham was the founder of a "new way" (via moderna), that is, a new way of philosophizing, destined to do great fortune throughout the late of Middle Ages and beyond. In other words, for the French historian, the peculiar nominalism of Ockham, represents a milestone for the philosophy of law. Located on the border between two worlds, takes on the characteristic of being both a legacy of medieval thought, as a opening to the modern legal thought. Without a shadow of doubt, Ockham was not the first to develop a theory nominalist. Before, we even have reports of authors like Roscelin of Compiègne[11] and Peter Abelard.[12] However, on account of his political involvement, and the historical period in which he lived, Ockham, was certainly the most notable thinker of this school.

Thus, consonant the work of Claude Panaccio (2012: 393), it is correct assert that at the time of Ockham, there were a several nominalisms. And just so, it is significant accentuate that each of the exponents quoted of this school has added a special feature to the theory. However, despite numerous singularities, it is possible to assert that all nominalists departed from a common principle, that of all that exists, all that is in the real plane, it's just the particular, the individual (Macbride, 2009: 276). It happens that this assumption was not unanimous in that historical period, and so met strong resistance from those who claimed to be supporters of realism, philosophical current that despite also having disagreements, was based on the belief that the world was not made only by individuals but also by universal. Thus, we can see clearly, that the moment in which Ockham writes his theory was not peaceful, after all, there was a group that understood as him, that only the objects that are presented to our senses constitute an objective reality, and the rest is only content of our mind, however, expressed by a name (nominalism). And in opposite direction, there was another group, that besides not being composed of few, argued that universals, that is, the concepts which expressed by the same name the essence of a thing, objectively exist outside the mind (Armstrong, 1978: 12).

Therefore, is in this path marked by controversy, that Ockham, [11] French monk, philosopher and theologian, who lived between XI and XII centuries.

[12] Roscelin's disciple. Was a french philosopher and theologian, who distinguished himself in the XII century, after the publication of his major work, called the Dialetic.

mainly through two of his major philosophical writings, Summa Logicae e Scriptum in Librum Primum Sententiarum, will state that in the objective world, only exist the substances and qualities of individual (Panaccio, 2012: 396). The universals, would be, superfluous, soul intentions, concepts, signs, whose aim is merely to express many individuals, many singular beings (connote). Thus, "humanity" itself does not exist as a reality extrinsic, but only and solely as an expression, a name used to represent a set of concrete individuals, human beings, those belonging to the real world (Panaccio, 2004: 10). In other words what all men have in common is that they are considered as "human", however, this "humanity" is nothing more than an outside sign, an abstract nominalization, a linguistic classification of individuals, John and Mary, for example, but not its substantial essence, because only the singulars individuals have real existence (Ockham, 1974b: 48). Thus, the man would be singular to Ockham both, in itself, and in its essence (Alféri, 1989: 15).

At seen it, it appears clearly that for Ockham, against the majority of philosophers and theologians before him, as, for example, St. Thomas Aquinas, who understood that the common genres and forms belonged to the world of being the central issue was no longer explain individuals by reference to universal, but rather to account for the universal in a world of individuals (Left, 1975: XXI). Therefore, to the English theologian, the universals are just signs that serve to connote things, there is no way to talk in the real existence of structures, genres, natural law, or any other category universalizing. This is, in a reality exclusively singular, to the universal remains only the function of be an instrument of thought, to explain individual knowledge which is hidden, but that is concrete (Villey, 2005: 231).

In this sense, we can conclude that what the philosophy of Ockham proposes, is to think all things from the individuals, after all, it is clear that for the British thinker, nothing is above the singular. This claim, let us say in passing, revolutionary, brought as a consequence the generation of a new worldview, whose influence can be noted in several disciplines, among them, and the object of our research, the field of law. Until then, the idea that the individual should be the center of it all was almost unknown, which makes Ockham, without fear of error, one of the pillars of a new way of seeing reality. It is from his nominalism, that the basis for the abandonment of natural law are released, because if there are no universals in factual world, there is no plausible justification for the law to be withdrawn from a supposed cosmic order. In fact, if the focus is the individual, the judicial qualities, in turn, only may stem from the individual, this is, can only be subjective (Villey, 2005: 233). Here, then, we have the main germ of Ockham's philosophy which as we shall see in later chapters, will greatly influence his political-legal writings.

3. The political conflicts in which Ockham was inserted: an analysis from the work Opus nonaginta dierum

There is almost a consensus among those who have proposed to study Ockham, that the first political controversy in which the English theologian entered, was the dispute that had dragged on for nearly a century about the Franciscan evangelical poverty. At the beginning of the twelfth century, St. Francis of Assisi proposed those who wanted to follow him, to live a life of absolute poverty in the light of the Holy Gospel. In the rule of life, non Bullata of 1222, the saint urged the religious brothers, to live on alms, and, above all, following the example of Christ, to don't take possession of any place or thing (De Boni, 2003: 218). Already in the 1223 rule, this one Bullata by Pope Honorius III under the title Solet annuere, there was only one item that just limited to say that the religious of order should be poor, however, without specifying whether the poverty should be in fact or in law. Faced with this impasse, some understood that the legislation had just prevented individual property, and as there was no mention to collective ownership, it would be perfectly possible that the order as an entity possessed churches, convents and other goods. However, for others, and among them St. Francis himself, poverty meant literally vivir sin proprio (Eguren, 2005: 147).

It happens that in 1226, St. Francis of Assisi comes to death. And in the same period, the order, that grew precipitously throughout Europe, accumulated numerous assets received through donations. So, as the congregation gained body, internal conflicts regarding the extent of evangelical poverty also intensified, what increased the fear among the religious, that they were being unfaithful to the Franciscan rule. Exactly why, it was extremely necessary finding a solution, which only came in the year 1230, after much insistence with the Pope Gregory IX. The pontiff in the bull Quo Elongati, takes three decisions of utmost importance. The first one, in the sense that it was up to him, as supreme head of the Church, the right to interpret the rule of Franciscan life. The second by its turn, pointed the need to do a differentiation between the Franciscan rule and Gospel, as well as postulated the no obligation of St. Francis' will. As a result, the religious would only be obliged to observe the evangelical counsels expressed in the rule, that is, poverty, charity and obedience. Lastly, the final decision was about the question of ownership. For pope Gregory, according to the rule of life of the Franciscans, the friars could not own property on both the individual and in the collective. Thus, to the friars would only be lawful to use, remaining the properties in the hands of those know that were the owners (De Boni, 2003: 221).

But what at first seemed to facilitate the life of the Franciscans in the end turned out to complicate matters further. The simplicity of the first religious, gradually gave way to a life in spacious convents and universities. The mendicancy confident in divine providence lost space to the monastic life. And the most menial services were delivered to servants. In this context, the legal questions also proliferated, after all, the friars did not know how harmonizing such growth and the poverty required by the founder. To whom, for example, belongs the property donated to the Franciscans, whose owner has already passed away? Hungry for answers, the Franciscans not visualized other solution but to resort again to the pope, this time, Innocent IV, who in the year 1245 establishing two bulls, Ordinem Vestrum and Quanto studiosius. There, the pope declared that all property of the congregation Franciscan were from that moment in ius et proprietatem beati Petri, this is, belonged to St. Peter, belonged to the Holy See (De Boni, 2003: 221-222).

However, the legal output found by the pope deepened the conflicts, and generated strong resistance in some religious, that understood that the real evangelical poverty, required by San Francisco, was being outraged by a supposed legal poverty. For this group, was impossible to live faithfully to the rule under the papal favors. On that account, they postulated the right to live spiritually the rule, this is, in a mendicant way, what led them to become known as the spiritual. Notwithstanding, in a different perspective, there was another group what believed that the changes that were occurring were nothing but a natural evolution of things. This group, was called, the conventuals, or community group. For many, many years, both groups have accused each other of infidelity to the rule and the desire of the founder, what became even more complicated, the extent that the order, had yet to face a strong resistance from both those who held high positions in the church hierarchy,[13] as the university professors, among them, William of Saint'Amor, secular master at the University of Paris, who fearing that the university chairs were colonized by religious professors, taught openly that mendicancy was contrary to the Gospel (De Boni, 2003: 225).

Thus, in order to sanitize the discussions that were accumulating, St. Bonaventure, during the years that he was the minister general of the Franciscan order, wrote two important works, Quaestiones disputatae de perfectione evangelica (questions about evangelical poverty) and Apologia pauperum (poor's apology), in which asserted first that poverty, despite the criticism was, in fact, the greatest grade of evangelical perfection, and second, that the religious brothers were entitled to, wanting, live a life of mendicancy. These arguments were supported by the bull Exiit qui seminat, enacted in the year 1279 by Pope Nicholas III. However, this was not enough. The debate did not stop to intensify, and the conflict seemed to have no more control. The spirituals gained strength, as well as the thinkers who supported them. Peter of Macerata, Angelo Clareano and Peter John Olivi, just to name a few, formed a theological battle front against the conventuals, and even against the Church, accused by them to being carnal (De Boni, 2003: 225-233).

In 1312, Pope Clement V, through the bull Exivi de paradiso still tries, unsuccessfully, trimming the edges, and reestablish the internal and external unity of the congregation. However, it was too late. Conventuals rebels occupied convents by force. Spirituals, in turn, refused obedience to their superiors. Until in 1316, with the ascension of Pope John XXII, the dispute reaches its period of greatest upsurge. By the bull Quorumdam exigit, the pontiff begins a relentless pursuit to the rebels who start to be excommunicated, accused of heresy, tried and burned alive at the stake. Nevertheless, it doesn't satisfy John XXII, who, maintaining his attempt to stifle the conflicts, abrogates, by the bull Quia nonnunquam, all provisions of the bull Exiit qui seminat of Nicholas III. In answer of this, religious, gathered in the city of Perugia in 1322, decided emit a statement confirming the anterior bull, that stated categorically that Christ and his apostles owned nothing. However, the document has only served to further promote the fury of the high priest, who in the same year, by the bull Ad conditorem canonum, first, asserted his right to modify the decisions of previous popes, second, that the goods purchased by the order no longer would be part of the domain of the Holy See, and thirdly that the Franciscans did not exercised the mere use (usus nudus) on the property, but the usufruct (De Boni, 2003: 234-238).

In July 1323, John XXII, also utters, one that would be considered as the final blow against the Franciscans, the bull Cum inter non- nulllos. Through it, the Holy Father declared heretical, two of the most expensive propositions to the Franciscan order: that Jesus and his apostles owned nothing, and that they had no right to use, purchase, and sale goods, in the mode of right civil. The statement put in check the meaning of poverty dreamed by the founder, and consequently divided the order into two distinct groups. Those who placed themselves, at the service of obedience to the Successor of Peter, and those who remained faithful to poverty wished by San Francisco. It is precisely in the group of rebels, that is, in the group that decided to turn against the Pope and defend the ideal of the founder, that William of Ockhan, during his stay in Avignon, decides to enter.

Now, the problem of poverty was the main theme of the first political writing of English theologian, Opus nonaginta dierum. Text published in 1333, and that has this name because according to Ockham, was written in 90 days (Ockham, 1974a: 857). In line of Esteban Peña Eguren (2005: 168), the work had a purpose to comment three documents promulgated by John XXII related to the topic of poverty, as well as the bull Quia vir reprobus, come, by which the pope deposed the minister general of the Franciscan order, Michael of Cesena, and determined the election of a new one. Concerning the issue of poverty, it is noteworthy that Ockham begins his argumentative thesis through a historical-theological analysis of the property, making a tour to the period in which Adam and Eve lived in paradise, that is, before original sin. The English theologian, in the light of Scripture and by this exercise, concluded that during that time there was no division of property, but only and solely the distribution of the common use of things. In this sense, for Ockham, as there was no property in the state of innocence, this would not, therefore, divine creation, but human. So much it is, that according to the author, the first domain division that we know in the Bible, was what happened between Cain and Abel, that is, just after leaving Eden (Eguren, 2005: 169-171).

However, despite the rule being, no divine intervention, when it comes to determining domain, the English theologian, continuing his argument, recognizes that according with the evidences present in the scriptures, is verifiable existence of some moments where God manifests in this sense directly. It happens that with the promulgation of the Gospel, yet according to the author, this no longer happened. Because of that, Ockham comes to another conclusion, that all the properties that existed at the time, could only have your basis in law and the will of man, not in the Divine Right. In this sense, it could be argued that both the duty to give alms as the duty to support the clergy is based on divine law, since it is found in the scriptures. However, belongs to the orbit of the human, deciding how those goods will be delivered to the Church. Thus, if will be translated the using, or the property, of goods, it varies case to case, once it depends on the wishes of the donor, or depends on the legal precepts established by men. This is so because God did not express about it. Thus, in general, it is clear that for Ockham, unlike John XXII, the usus could not be confused with the ius (Eguren, 2005: 172). Thereby, the religious can instead use the goods that do not belong to them, even in a individual or common plan.

From this, Ockham will devote most of the pages of his work to carry out a defense, about the poor life of Christ and his apostles. However, it is not idle to point out that the foundations of his theses are always religious or philosophical, but his horizon, on the other hand, is always to give an answer to the political problems in which he found himself. Therefore, in one of many aspects in which the English theologian will engage, the purse of the apostles, a point of greatest divergence in dispute with the pope, Ockham will seek to answer the following questions, whom was the owner of the bag of currencies? to Christ as head of the group, or to him and his apostles as a community? For the author, there was no doubt that the money contained therein was indeed common property. However, this community aspect, was in a broad sense, since it included not only Jesus and his apostles, but the whole community of believers, and especially the poor, to whom was allowed use the money contained in the bag to minimize their needs. With this, we can say that everyone, including Christ had only the use of money. Regarding ownership, this continued with the donor, who only proffered their possessions for use by the community (Eguren, 2005: 181-182).

This was, including, the understanding that continued in the Church for many years, after all, the same reasoning was proclaimed by Pope Nicholas III by bull Exiit qui seminat. However, as the bull was expressly repealed by another enacted by the Pope John XXII, the understanding that passed effective from then on it was just the opposite. For this reason, Ockham, in his work, under discussion, directed severe and heavy criticism to the pontiff. One was that Church, could not be surrendered to the mere whims of the popes. So if Nicholas III recognized that Christ and his apostles were poor in the individual and collective sense of the term, and if it was accepted by the Christian community, another pontiff can't later contradict the official position of the Church, which has become true unchallenged, and impose a completely different interpretation in the sense of what has already been assimilated by believers. Thus, in the light of the experience of Jesus and the apostles, it was lawful to Ockham, that the Franciscans had the right only to use the goods in their possession, remaining the property therefore, with its donors, or with the Church. That's because, according to the author, the property, as stated in the holy scripture, is superfluous, useless, so that a religious may well perform their tasks without having any full domain, using only nature in case of need (Eguren, 2005: 180-193).

And Ockham does not stop there. The theme of Christian poverty, certainly, is the main point of his work in comment, but, the English theologian also will focus on two other points of great importance to political disputes with the pope, the sense of royalty and lordship of Christ. These points, including, will have direct repercussions in another conflict in which Ockham was inserted, the conflict around the fullness of the power of the papacy. It is worth noting, however, that despite Ockham having been dedicated diligently to this conflict in two of its other works, namely, the Dialogus and the Breviloquium de principatu tyrannico, the germ of his theory that he will work more thorough and specific in these writings, is already here in the work under review.

The idea that the pope possessed both the spiritual and the temporal power, was already been discussed many centuries before the conflict between John XXII and Louis of Bavaria. For example, Boniface VIII and Philip, the beautiful, of France, in the past, came to dispute around the boundaries of the secular power of the pope. However, according to Sérgio Ricardo Strefling (2002: 22), the origin of this dispute goes back many centuries before, from the promulgation of the theory of the two swords, by Pope Gelasius I in 494. On occasion, the Church claimed it was their responsibility to care the souls, while the civilian government had the responsibility on the body. However, as according to the Church itself, the soul possessed a nature superior to the body, the Church, was in a superior position in relation to the civil power. Thus, over the years and through an obvious consequence, it did not take until the Church passed to state that as the pope was the head of the Church, and more than that, God's representative on earth, the pontiff, as consequence, should appear above kings and emperors.

However, in contrast to this doctrine, Ockham, who believed that Jesus was not a king supreme temporal, understood that any claim in this regard by the pontiffs was illegitimate. This is because, firstly, as Christ was not judge in secular claims, nor was concerned with the temporal government, He could not be considered a civil king. Also, if there can't be two legitimate kings in the same territory, and if Caesar was the true king of Judea, therefore, Christ was not a sovereign just as Caesar, because in no time, the Roman emperor shared with Him this authority. Moreover, if Christ taught in words and examples, to contemn temporal kingdoms, would not be correct to say that He himself was a secular monarch, after all, He would be going against himself, which would not be logical. Finally, based on the comments made by St. John Chrysostom and St. Augustine, as well as, drawing on the analysis of two pieces of sacred scripture, one from the book of John[14] and another from the book of Luke,[15] Ockham concludes that when the presentation of Jesus to Pilate, under the accusation of doing himself, King of the Jews, the governor found no fault in Him, because it was clear to the Roman, that the kingdom which Jesus spoke was not civil, but spiritual (Eguren, 2005: 177-178).

Not satisfied, Ockham, apart from weave some considerations about the kingship of Christ, will also seek to work another aspect of Jesus' life, the landlord. For the English theologian, Christ was not the owner of all secular things, neither from its conception, nor then. Basing itself on Scripture quotations, arguments coming from theologians of the Church, and papal bulls, the author comes to the conclusion that Christ borned poor and was poor throughout his life, thereat, would not be possible to say that He was Lord of all temporal goods. In this sense, when Christ instituted St. Peter as His vicar on earth, He didn't give to the saint, unlike that interpreted the pope, the domain of the secular world. Because, He could not give what do not belonged to him.[16] Thus, stating that the successor of Peter holds the fullness of power by inherited, is a complete nonsense. As soon, the primacy of the Pope could only relate to the spiritual plane. It was only on this plan that Christ wanted to engage (Eguren, 2005: 179).

Thereby, based on the brief accounts above, we see that the circumstances in that Ockham lived, making him an occasional lawyer. After all, despite the fact that he was essentially a theologian and a philosopher by formation, the policy framework in which Ockham was inserted, from his escape of Avignon, made him giving a greater legal focus on his texts, unthinkable in his times of academic, in Oxford. Thus, although in his writings we perceived the theology and philosophy occupying a prominent place, we can also realizes, the emergence, concerning the sources of law, of a legal positivism, and concerning to its structure, of a notion of subjective individual right, themes that will be further explored in the following chapter (Villey, 2005: 225).

4. The impact of political writings of Ockham in Law: legal positivism and the freedom as subjective right[17]

According to Arthur Stephen McGrade (2002: 04), the Ockham's political writings were destructive to both the medieval social organization, as for the thought that until then reigned sovereign, the scholastic. Proof of this is that over the centuries, Aristotelian realism, as well as its Christian version, the Thomistic realism, virtually disappeared. Indeed, within philosophy, the thought of Ockham for many years reigned sovereign in Europe. For many generations, we have the information that practically, no philosopher, accepted recognize another start point for knowledge, than by the singular experience (Villey, 2005: 294).

In terms of Law, in turn, many of the essential features of modern legal thought, were already contained, in potency, in the work of the English philosopher (Villey, 2005: 233). After all, as seen above, the nominalism urged the law enforcers to find legal solutions not more through observation of nature and by the order which it emanates, but from the individual, more precisely, from the expressed and positive will of them, men or God himself. In this sense, to replace the natural law by the will of the legislature (Vandrunen, 2010: 48), it can be said that the philosophy of Ockham, applied to political issues of his time, eventually generating the substrate what some centuries later would be adapted and qualified by Hobbes and Locke as legal positivism (Villey, 2005: 295).

In this vein, the expression jus, leaves their traditional meaning to take on a new conception. So if in the past the term was used to designate the relationship fair, as of Ockham, the expression appears as a synonym for law, order, command. That is, every right from then, is expressed through an explicit act of will, and the law therefore, becomes a product of the emanation of individual power. As a direct consequence, the science of Law, changes his eyes before focused in a datum object, that is, in the observation of the order expressed by the social and natural body, or by the share borne by each sharing in the assets, to a plan essentially subjective, individualistic, centered on the nature of man and in his faculties and powers (Villey, 2005: 245-255).

[17] It is worth highlighting that here we'll use especially authors like Michel Villey and Stephen Mcgrade, who visualize the genesis of the subjective right on William of Ockham. In a different sense, however, we must also mention the position of Brian Tierney (1988: 23), who understands that the birth of subjective rights, took place in the twelfth century.

Now, if men were created in the image and likeness of God, and if as God, men have free will, since this was granted by Him, it is obvious that they have a potestas absoluta (Lisska & Tierney, 2007: 325). I mean, it is symptomatic that each individual, be a focus of free conduct, a center of absolute powers (Villey, 2005: 281-282). And thus, with the exception of the power of God, to whom all are submitted through His divine positivism, no other power rests above the power of every man, unless this is granted. In other words, from the divine law, every individual power is in the same plane and in a permanent state of free action. This power, also may be delegated to a third party, usually a prince, when so think fit.

In this sense, both the socio-political tissue, as the set of legal order, are now made by a veritable cascade of power (Villey, 2005: 286), arising, in its turn, by a number of individual concessions, successive and free. God gives to man through His divine laws, read the Holy Scriptures, the power to institute heads, and the power to live freely according to their own wills. The people, in turn, through a contract, elects its princes, giving them the legislative power. Finally, the sovereigns edit laws that engender powers stricto sensu, in favor of the people.[18] The social order now appears no longer as a network of proportions between objects shared between people, but by a system that on the one hand, is marked by powers subordinate to each other and, secondly, by laws, that comes from powers (Villey, 2005: 285-287).

Thus, as seen, one can conclude that Ockham assigns a legal rubric to a power of the subject, the power named indifferent, requirement of the Christian life. This potesta, and behold a trait of Franciscan theology, would be freedom (Villey, 2005: 253). This right granted by God, and that in turn meant the power conferred upon all individuals to choose volitionally (Herbert, 2002: 69), that is, without any causal necessity, for example, if they wanted one thing and not another, if they wanted to do or not to do something, or if a particular behavior was good or bad (Himes, 2004: 45). As to the author, all men had the same capacity, that is, how this power was inherent to individuals in general, and according to his theory nominalist, that accepts only the individual existence, for obvious that to him, both the social structure of a certain nation, like its Law, would not be anything but a representation of choices made free and uniquely. After all, for Ockham, were not the ecclesiastic-spiritual authorities, or the political-temporal authorities, that sustained public life, but the existential authority that is in every individual (Greenaway, 2012: 256).

Thus, it becomes possible to see why the English philosopher vehemently repudiate both the tyrannical power, represented by the plenitude of power of the pope, as the impossibility of the Franciscans reject the right of ownership. After all, if to the author, every Law in the end is composed by individual powers freely considered, any power that stands above the others, without concession for this, as well as, any power that is imposed on individuals, without freedom to use or not, must be utterly rejected. Since for Ockham, the law is legal, but with freedom of disposal (Villey, 2005: 286). Thus, the plenitudo potestatis of the pope should be contained in some divine positive law, and the subjective rights, also known as jura fori, promulgated by human laws, could not be of compulsory observance, since for the author, in the light of Christianity, the brand essential of freedom is the free act.

5. Conclusion

This study aimed to present some considerations about how Ockham, applying his nominalist theory to the political issues of the historical moment in which he lived, contributed in some way to the formation of modern judicial thought. Therefore, it has proved necessary to demonstrate who was primarily William of Ockham, after all, little is known about the author. In addition, we saw what were the essential characteristics of his nominalism. On occasion, we observed that the author's purpose was to build an explanation of the world ruled by the individual reference, and not based on the cosmic order of things. This is, for the English theologian there would be nothing beyond the unitary, nothing above the singular, because it all comes from individuals, be they men, be he God himself. In this sense, the universal, would therefore only a function of instrumental connote singular realities, but which are still eclipsed..

Moreover, it has proved necessary also work with a succinct explanation of the political conflicts in which Ockham was inserted, as well as, from the analysis of the work Opus nonaginta dierum, present the author' position in front of them. Such contextualization was extremely important for the final analysis of the paper, since it was the author's motivation for his inclusion in the Law field. In this context, maintaining the consistency with their philosophical theory, Ockham, laid the foundation for a legal system centered on the individual and their qualities, contributing, thus, for the decline of the influence of natural law, markedly objective, in the following centuries. This is because, as seen earlier, the English theologian, besides equate freedom, to the innate individual power granted by God to all men, raised the men's subjectivity, to the dignity of law. In this sense, the term ceases to represent the equitable partition of goods, for, from then, express individual wills, now expressed by law.

Consilience and Macrophilosophy
Contributions to a post-disciplinary Philosophy of Law

Renato César Cardoso

Abstract: This paper aims to address the problems brought about by the current state of hyper-specialization in both science and philosophy, and analyzes two of the most promising alternatives to the present situation of rigid disciplinarity: Consilience and Macrophilosophy. Such analyses are then followed by a brief evaluation on how these two proposals may connect with each other, and how they relate to legal philosophy.

Keywords: Consilience, Macrophilosophy, Post-disciplinarity.

1. Introduction

Aphorisms of great genius can sometimes transcend their authors; some words of wit may even become untraceable back to their origins. Especially since there came the Internet.

Take this one for example: "A scientist is someone who seeks to know ever more about ever less, until he knows absolutely everything, about absolutely nothing." This intriguing quote, in this form or in similar ones, has been credited simultaneously to many distinct individuals, people such as Gandhi, William J. Mayo, Konrad Lorenz, Nicholas Butler and others. I once even heard a fellow professor attribute it to a wise old doctor, from his unknown hometown.

The authenticity conundrum speaks volumes to the brilliance of the idea: after all, a dull piece of text would never get so many distinguishing "authors". Whoever he may be, the one who came up with this clever jest grasped a very important point about the current state of affairs in the world of sciences and philosophy. Such state is the topic of the text that follows.

2. Disciplinarity

Unlike Athena, the multitude of scientific disciplines we see today did not spring up, perfect and armed, from the aching head of Zeus. Quite the opposite: there is a long list of developments, successes, failures, hard work, luck and, over all, disputes – philosophical and theoretical ones, as well as economic and political – that marks its history. The emergence of todays fragmented scenario in the field of sciences cannot be understood properly without due reference to the history of science itself.

First things first, though. The very term "discipline" is not without its fair share of ambiguity. Originated from the Latin discipulus "student, pupil, follower," itself derived from discere "to learn", and directly from Latin disciplina "instruction given, teaching, learning, knowledge," also "object of instruction, knowledge, science, military discipline", it has nowadays come to mean several diverse things. Collins English Dictionary definitions, for example, include, among others: 1. training or conditions imposed for the improvement of physical powers, self-control, etc; 2. systematic training in obedience to regulations and authority; 3. the state of improved behaviour, etc, resulting from such training or conditions; 4. punishment or chastisement; 5. a system of rules for behaviour, methods of practice, etc; 6. a branch of learning or instruction; 7. the laws governing members of a Church; 8. a scourge of knotted cords.

Actually, it stands very clear that the meaning of "discipline" may vary enormously according to the context: improvement of self-control or punishment? Improved behavior or chastisement? More than that, even in the same context, it can assume radically different uses, depending on whose discourse it is coming from. A postmodern philosophy scholar and a military strategist would, I imagine, largely disagree on the merits of discipline.

In the sense that we are going to address here, discipline is much more than just "a branch of knowledge":

"When we speak of a discipline, therefore, we speak not merely of a body of knowledge but also of a set of practices by which that knowledge is acquired, confirmed, implemented, preserved, and reproduced. Disciplines mark the point at which this knowledge and these practices are institutionalized, or, so to speak, the word is made flesh. Disciplines differ in how they institutionalize knowledge. Disciplines vary in the ways they structure themselves, establish identities, maintain boundaries, regulate and reward practitioners, manage consensus and dissent, and communicate. Disciplines also differ in the internal coherence of their methodology and subject matter." (Post: 2009, 751)

Discipline – or disciplinarity-, in this broader and richer sense, also has its detractors and its defenders. Even if it does not seem that way in the present landscape, disciplinarity is not without supporters, however disparaged it may have recently been in some (many) academic circles.

Christie and Maton (2011, 1-2) assert, for example, on this topic: "For disciplinarity is far from dead, although the nature of disciplinarity – what it means to be 'disciplinary', 'interdisciplinary' or even 'postdisciplinary' – remains largely undertheorized. Alongside calls to abandon disciplines, a more measured reconsideration of disciplinarity is gathering pace that highlights its continuing relevance. (…) These essays challenge the idea that disciplinary formation involves merely constraint and ideological support for the status quo and undermine the comfortable pessimism of Foucaultian scholars who reduce disciplines to mere technologies of control."

Others have emphasized different aspects and benefits of disciplinary standards: "Principles of academic freedom are the primary defense against these efforts to intimidate and censor classroom teaching. These principles protect the freedom of professors to educate their students in the attainment of "a mature independence of mind." But these principles also condemn the abuse of classroom authority to indoctrinate students in ways that are without legitimate pedagogical justification. Academic freedom defends the autonomy of classroom teaching only insofar as such teaching constitutes education rather than indoctrination. Disciplinary standards offer the most cogent and secure way to distinguish education from indoctrination." (Post: 2009, 753)

We must not fail to recognize the importance of disciplinarity and the central role that it played in the scientific revolution that completely changed our civilization. No one should deny the fact that it represented a colossal and necessary step in the direction of scientific development. It seems impossible to overestimate the contributions it has brought.

Like anything else, as Aristotle reminds us, the problem with disciplinarity lays in the extremes. Most of the voices raised today against disciplinarity focus on the current state of scientific hyper-specialization and do not fail to recognize the importance that disciplines had in the past. It is the excess, rather than the process itself, that calls for criticism.

Some have seen the problem earlier. By 1930, Ortega y Gasset had famously warned, long before the process of hyper-specialization became as drastic as it is today, about the devious consequences that the entire practice was leading to. He referred to it as "The barbarism of specialization" and condemned the "learned ignorant". C.P. Snow, for his part, denounced back in 1959 the abyss that separated science and the humanities, which he called "The two cultures". Despite the warnings, the scenario has not changed for the better in the last decades. The two cultures not only continue to exist but have grown as far apart as they could possibly be, appealing to radically different logics, justifications and rationales.

"The university today is, as we know, divided into two broad magisteria, the humanities and the natural sciences, usually located on opposites sides of campus, served by separate funding agencies, and characterized by radically different methodologies and background theoretical assumptions. Although rarely explicitly acknowledged in our secular age, the primary rationale behind this division is a rather old-fashioned and decidedly metaphysical belief: that there are two utterly different types of substances in the world, mind and matter, which operate according to distinct principles. The humanities study the products of the free and unconstrained spirit or mind – literature, religion, art, history – while the natural sciences concern themselves with the deterministic laws governing the inert kingdom of dumb objects. (Slingerland: 2008, 3)

The separation of these two very distinct universes is only the most conspicuous problem. Even inside these broad areas, division has reached the point in which dialogue is ever less possible. The progression of specialization continues to deepen and deepen. Nonetheless, it seems to many that it has finally reached the limit. Aware of the restrictions imposed by traditional disciplines, scientists and intellectuals, from the broadest array of fields, have been trying to overcome these boundaries by the overthrowing of disciplinarity itself:

"Disciplinary boundaries within the natural sciences are disappearing, to be replaced by shifting hybrid domains in which consilience is implicit. These domains reach across many levels of Complexity from chemical physics and physical chemistry to molecular Genetics, chemical ecology, and ecological genetics. None of the new specialties is considered more than a focus of research. Each is an industry of fresh ideas and advancing technology. Given that human action comprises events of physical causation, why should the social sciences and humanities be impervious to consilience with the natural sciences. And how can they fail to benefit from that alliance? It is not enough to say that human action is historical, and that history is an unfolding of unique events. Nothing fundamental separates the course of human history from the course of physical history, whether in the stars or in organic diversity." (Wilson: 1998, 11)

By now, almost everyone has already realized that rigid and limited disciplines do not offer the same benefits they did when the modern sciences were developing. Interdisciplinarity, multidisciplinarity, transdisciplinarity, and crossdisciplinarity have become more than just common jargon in presently academic discourse. In whatever form it may be, it is clear that we are now entering a new time for knowledge – a new paradigm, if we may be so bold – one in which the boundaries are not so clear anymore: post-disciplinarity.

3. Consilience

It is somewhat symptomatic that, nowadays, the recognition of the deleterious effects brought about by the absolute separation between sciences and humanities has been much more troublesome to those dedicated to the first. In fact, it is amongst some hardcore scientists that we will presently find some of the most interesting works seeking to close that gap. There is promising research in various fields, from evolutionary psychologists, linguists, and physicists, to cognitive psychologists, anthropologists, neurophysiologists, primatologists, and so on. All perfectly aware of the difficulties of their endeavor, but, overall, not willing to comply with the restrictions imposed by the separation established between the two cultures. Paramount among those is Edward O. Wilson.

Preeminent biologist, considered the world's leading authority in myrmecology, Wilson had all the reason in the world to embrace hyper-specialization and be glad for it. His brilliant intelligence, instead, led him to a more noteworthy path. The publication of "Sociobiology", in 1975, cemented his name as an important figure in the studies of the intersections between natural and cultural sciences:

"Sociobiology synthesized a vast literature on animal behavior using new ideas on natural selection from George Williams, William Hamilton, John Maynard Smith, and Robert Trivers. It reviewed principles on the evolution of communication, altruism, aggression, sex, and parenting, and applied them to the major taxa of social animals such as insects, fishes, and birds. The twenty-seventh chapter did the same for Homo sapiens, treating our species like another branch of the animal kingdom. It included a review of the literature on universals and variation among societies, a discussion of language and its effects on culture, and the hypothesis that some universals (including the moral sense) may come from a human nature shaped by natural selection. Wilson expressed the hope that this idea might connect biology to the social sciences and philosophy, a forerunner of the argument in his later book Consilience." (Pinker: 2002, 109)

The repercussion that followed Wilson's book is a chapter that deserves another paper all by itself. He suffered several attacks and critics were nothing but ferocious. For trying to cross the line between the natural and the social (cultural) universes, he had to endure all kinds of animosity. Fascist and Nazi were adjectives frequently and loosely used. It appears that there is nothing as controversial as saying that men are, after all, animals.

The polemic, however, would serve him well. In 1998, he published one of his most philosophical works, marinated in years of controversy: "Consilience: the unity of knowledge". In this book, Wilson would attempt to finally show the connection between sciences and the humanities and reestablish the long lost hope for a unified theory of knowledge:

"The greatest enterprise of the mind has always been and always will be attempted linkage of the sciences and humanities. The ongoing fragmentation of knowledge and resulting chaos in philosophy are not reflections of the real world but artifacts of scholarship. The propositions of the original Enlightenment are increasingly favored by objective evidence, especially from the natural sciences." (Wilson: 1998, 8) Moreover: "There has never been a better time for collaboration between scientists and philosophers, especially where they meet in the borderland between biology, the social sciences and the humanities. We are approaching a new age of synthesis, when the testing of consilience is the greatest of all intellectual challenges". (Wilson, 1998, 12)

However, what does consilience actually mean and where does it came from? The term was first coined by William Whewell, in 1840, and appears in his synthesis "The philosophy of the inductive sciences". It literally means a "jumping together" in reference to the proposed linkage of fact-based theories across several disciplines to create a shared basis, to support common explanations. Wilson (1998, 8) defends the use of consilience rather than coherence, for the rarity of the expression preserved its precision.

Consilience, then, is the final goal, the ultimate explanation that would reunite sciences and humanities in the holistic vision that has been lost amidst the ultra-segmentation of knowledge. It is a goal, as much as it is a method, a proposed way to get over disciplinarity and reach new heights and peaks: "The strongest appeal of consilience is in the prospect of intellectual adventure and, given even modest success, the value of understanding the human condition with a higher degree of certainty." (Wilson: 1998, 9)

Let it not be said that there scientists are the only ones worried about this questions though; there are those in the "other side" as well, that are perfectly aware of the mutual gains to be made by everyone once the bridges are placed. That is the only way for consilience to work, and how it should be understood: as a joint effort from natural sciences and humanities, mutually beneficial, without dominance or preponderance on either part. Edward Slingerland has made this point perfectly in his book "What Science Offers the Humanities: Integrating Body and Culture":

"If we humanists have much to learn from the natural sciences, the reverse is also true: humanists have a great deal to contribute to scientific research. As discoveries in the biological and cognitive sciences have begun to blur traditional disciplinary boundaries, researchers in these fields have found their work bringing them into contact with the sort of high-level issues that traditionally have been the domain of the core humanities disciplines, and often their lack of formal training in these areas leaves them groping in the dark or attempting to reinvent the wheel. This is where humanist expertise can and should play a crucial role in guiding and interpreting the results of scientific exploration – something that can occur only when scholars on both sides of the humanities–natural science divide are willing to talk to one another. (Slingerland, 2008, XIII)

The path to achieve consilience, however full of promises it may be, is not without its perils and we will surely find problems along the way. Detractors spring up continuously from both sides and defenders of the status quo are always fast to repudiate any attempts to shake things up and to follow new directions. Those who try to cross borders assume serious risks. If they come from the humanities, they are likely to be labeled "scientificist", "reducionist" or – even worse – "positivist". Scientists, on their turn, would be regarded as "unempirical", "metaphysical", and, most terribly, "philosophical".

In the humanities, the adversaries are well known. The SSSM

(Standard Social Science Model), as denounced by Steven Pinker (2002), has three basic concepts that contradict directly most of the conclusions reached by the natural sciences today. Nevertheless, the Holy Trinity – the Blank Slate, the Ghost in the Machine and the Noble Savage - continues to shape social science in great extent, mainly for political and ideological reasons. The greater enemy of integration, however, seems to lay beyond those three. Widely rejected amidst natural scientists, it appears to have profound and impenetrable roots in the social and cultural sciences. The Golias that has to be tackled is that of omnipresent dualism:

"If we are to take the humanities beyond dualistic metaphysics, these human-level structures of meaning need to be seen as grounded in the lower levels of meaning studied by the natural sciences, rather than hovering magically above them. Understood in this way, human-level reality can be seen as eminently explainable. Practically speaking, this means that humanists need to start taking seriously discoveries about human cognition being provided by neuroscientists and psychologists, which have a constraining function to play in the formulation of humanistic theories – calling into question, for instance, such deeply entrenched dogmas as the "blank slate" theory of human nature, strong versions of social constructivism and linguistic determinism, and the ideal of disembodied reason. Bringing the humanities and the natural sciences together into a single, integrated chain seems to me the only way to clear up the current miasma of endlessly contingent discourses and representations of representations that currently hampers humanistic inquiry." (Slingerland: 2008, 9)

So you have it, the way to integrate nature and culture is a clear one: leave dualism in the gallows and start paying attention to the colossal amount of data that is continuously being produced, aiming to explain the natural evolutionary processes that produce thinking, consciousness, language and culture. This last one, specially, calls for special attention, since it has been paraded as the key element for the distinction between the "human" and all the rest. Culture is the poster boy for many the defendants of dualism, as if it originated in some kind of magic ether and not in biologically grounded bodies. For some reason, Baron von Münchhausen never fails to come to mind when we hear such silliness.

The biggest problem in all of this effort toward integration is that it requires social scientists and alike to actually take and interest and study something outside of their pre-established and comfortable cannons. And that is not something that is easy to do. There is always good rationalization behind the arguments against it, however dogmatic and obscurantist they might be.

Seeing beyond the mind-body problem is not as easy as it would seem. Refusals to accept the arguments in favor of an integrative solution vary enormously in kind, no matter how solid the evidence against them. But we have to keep pushing:

"We need to see the human mind as part of the human body rather than as its ghostly occupant, and therefore the human person as an integrated mind-body system produced – like all of the other body-mind systems running around in the world – by evolution. This is the sentiment behind the arguments for an explanatory continuum extending equally through the natural and human sciences that have recently and prominently been offered by, for instance, the entomologist E.O. Wilson with his call for "consilience". (Slingerland: 2008, 10)

That is, concisely, the case for consilience. As the ideal that it is, it can never be fully vindicated, but that does not mean it should be forsaken. It is just the nature of things: "The idea of the unity of sciences not idle. It has been tested in acid baths of experiment and logic and enjoyed repeated vindication. It has suffered no decisive defeats. At least not yet, even though at its center, by the very nature of the scientific method, it must be thought always vulnerable." (Wilson: 1998, 5)

4. Macrophilosophy

In analogy with macroeconomics, macrosociology or macrohistory, the neologism macrophilosophy has been created by the Catalan philosopher Gonçal Mayos Solsona, to designate a new approach to philosophy itself. One that differs profoundly from the typical academic methodology that dominates philosophical research and departments almost everywhere today.

In itself, no knowledge can be considered big or small; it is a role different thing to state the obvious fact that there are knowledge of big and small things. Macrophilosophy, thus, is interested in concepts and ideas in a wider sense, not as they were postulated and developed by this or that specific work or philosopher (Mayos: 2012, 9) but rather as they present themselves trough much larger periods of time and trough much broader perspectives:

"Macrophilosophy dwells on all fundamental concepts and questions in the way that they have occupied the conjunct of societies and eras, going beyond the more personal contributions made by any specific philosopher, as valuable as they may be in itself. Even though macrophilosophy also accounts for those, of these more idiosyncratic aspects, linked to the individual genius or focused in details and particular aspects, microphilosophy occupies itself, in an equally important way." (Mayos: 2012, 10)

But exactly what is macrophilosophy? How can it be assessed? Isn't all philosophy, by definition, macro? Well, that is precisely the point: if philosophy had kept itself on track, honest to its principles, if academic pressure for segmentation and results hadn't driven it to turn, for the most part, into microphilosophy, strictly closed inside its own traditions and closed to the outside the world, there would be no need for a macrophilosophy:

"Today, microphilosophy – the study of the philosophical tradition from the past and the meticulous analysis of the texts written by those that taught us how to think (which Kant used to call scholar philosophy) – predominates largely, obliterates thinking itself and leads to the overlooking of the problems we face today. It obliterates that which Kant called philosophy's "cosmic concepts", in all its complexity (what we call macrophilosophy)." (Mayos: 2014, 13) "That is why it is so unjustifiable and inexcusable for philosophy to renounce its macrophilosophical inquiries, precisely in the first decades of this new millennium, when we are opening wide the doors to new inter-, trans-, multi-, and post-disciplinary perspectives" (Mayos: 2014, 15)

There is today, everywhere, tremendous pressure in favor of pragmatically effective knowledge, positively validated, bearing quantitative data and clear economic effects. Those disciplinary studies often succeed to impose their ways and their methods on others and exclude those that do not comply. This is why we witness now, amongst professional philosophers and professional philosophy, an overwhelming tendency to turn the eyes back and analyze, repeatedly, the philosophic tradition, sometimes in its most insignificant details. We life in a time of hyper-specialization; the disciplinary scientific and technical model enforces itself in the most extensive way, affecting even philosophy itself. (Mayos: 2014, 12)

In fact, it has been a long time since philosophy last attempted to live up to its original expectations. The holistic, integrating and disinterested view pursued by the philosophical tradition of the past has no place in today's discipline oriented Universities. As some cynic once put it: the world has problems, Universities have departments.

Macrophilosophy address these problems, utterly aware of these difficulties but also of the vital role scientific knowledge has in the pursuit for true philosophy: "It must be sad that, in some way, philosophy today cannot claim any exclusive or special object, nor can it be totally independent from the sciences, for it depends on their contributions". "Sciences have opted - with undisputable pragmatic success – for hyper specialization; that has left to philosophy alone the aspiration to a holistic understanding, as well as the theme of the basic perspectives, common to all distinct forms of knowledge". (Mayos: 2014, 14)

On a finishing note: "What is the macrophilosophy? (….) Macrophilosophy, nowadays, will only be able to clarify a global philosophical "meaning" by assembling, integrating and synthesizing, in an interdisciplinary way, the most solid and recent discoveries from the various specialized sciences. Furthermore, it has to make them rigorously compatible, in spite of the disentangling and discouraging effect that springs from the ultra-specialization of knowledge. That is why we can only talk about macrophilosophy once we have gone through holistic and comparative analysis that, in act or potentially, project themselves in widespread processes." (Mayos: 2012, 13)

By now, it should not take an expert to see that consilience and macrophilosophy share some central features and a lot more. Let us dwell on how those two relate to one another.

5. Consilience and macrophilosophy

Consilience and macrophilosophy are very much akin. They both take part on that intuition once called the "ionic enchantment", the ideal that it is possible to achieve a holistic knowledge, a broader worldview, which has no use for the artificial separation of reality in a multitude of tiny objects, destined to be scrutinized by some few myopic specialists.

Good philosophy, real philosophy, cannot ignore the scientific achievements of its time. It is a reflection mediated by science, not apart from it, not above it. Macrophilosophy does not evade this lesson and, being fully conscious of the problems brought about by the disconnected state of scientific knowledge, cannot look past it. Consilience, as a method to escape the fundamental division that marks the scientific landscape, appears to be the model of investigation upon which macrophilosophy should try to establish its tenets.

A holistic philosophy cannot satisfy itself with some fragmentary model of science. If we are serious about post-disciplinarity, it's specter should orient efforts in both of these realms. It is only logical that both consilience and macrophilosophy must join efforts, for they are not only complementary, but also mutually indispensable.

6. Philosophy of law

There is no denying it, legal philosophy cannot be understood as something apart from philosophy itself. It is a very important and inextricable part of it, but by no means something that stands alone and by itself. It would be an utter mistake to try to separate it from ontology, epistemology or ethics alike, for all of them are essentially linked.

As a matter of fact, we don't need to dwell so much here; all that has been said about academic philosophy nowadays applies perfectly (maybe more) to philosophy of law as well: there is a lot of legal-microphilosophy, petty discussions and textual regurgitation going on, almost everywhere. We could only imagine the improvements, profits and developments that a real macrophilosophy of law could bring to such a weary field.

The Hellespont it would have to cross is not an easy one, though: the bridge between the cultural and the natural sciences has many guardians. Dualism, for one, is not an easy adversary to supplant. Furthermore, even if we could somehow get beyond this point, that would only be the first of many challenges. Consilience is easier said than done. It takes a whole lot of heroism to embrace an entirely brave new world, to leave one's comfort zone in the humanities and adventure oneself through the raw "natural realm".

Nevertheless, it must be done. Knowledge should have no limits, no frontiers. It is time to break the chains and ask ourselves: can we find the answers to the most significant questions inside the boundaries of our narrow-minded legal-microphilosophy? How does this completely new set of knowledge coming from the hard sciences fits in the current paradigm? Can we even ask if it is possible to search for a non-dualistic theory of law? Should we give up free will in favor of a deterministic approach to human behavior? May we inquire into the evolutionary function of justice? Of the law? Can we make way for questions on the natural fundaments of ethics? Could the natural sciences that try to explain human behavior finally be considered worthy of some attention? Or maybe we are supposed to be always relegated to the traditional discourse, that culture has absolutely nothing to do with nature, that it is a reality in itself?

Are we bound to repeat endlessly that truth is a myth, and does not exist anyway, while keeping a serious face and trusting that we will continue to do it with impunity forever? Post-modernism has had its fair run, enjoyed its fair share of flamboyance, but it now seems the time to talk straight: let us raise above the paralyzing suspicion, the sceptic nuisance, and look up to the example of these brave intellects that dare search for wider and better perspectives. Even if they prove, in the end, to be just that.

Communitarianist perspective of Fundamental Rights Issues about the objective dimension

Raoni Macedo Bielschowsky
Rodrigo Antonio Calixto de Pina Gomes Mello

Abstract: A worldview and the freedom perspective are very influent in the political standpoint, consequently in the State conception, in the Constitutional Theory positioning and in the fundamental rights point of view. Especially these rights are very close to the freedom topic discussion, which reveals not only philosophic issues, but, also, pragmatics and dogmatic consequences. Consider the fundamental rights the apex of a cultural system, on its axiological basis, implies to identifies the objective dimension of fundamental rights with a particularly importance. Because if the freedom is understood by a holistic and concrete angle: "my freedom is part of the others community members' freedom and the freedom of each community participant is also part of my own freedom".

*Keywords: Communitarianism – concrete freedom – fundamental rights

1. Introduction

The Liberalism vs. Communitarianism debate takes shape in the '70s and '80s Anglo-American philosophical discussion, especially since the Rawls' publication "A Theory of Justice", first edited in 1971[1]. There are two important aspects in this struggle. The first one concerned to which is the individual subjacent to modernity[2] and another one about the justice idea and sources distribution politics.

Actually, this dispute is inserted in two others wide issues. The first, an ancient epistemological debate, which "Liberalism Vs. Communitarianism" is just a new chapter of a long history[3]. Looking for this discussion, the two sides of this dichotomy are: one stream that involves a deontological, formal and universalist conception of justice and of law – which binds liberalism; and another that offers a different concept of good and justice, material, teleological, historical and culturally contextualized – which binds communitarianism. The second issue is regarding to a political matter related to the question about which are the fundaments of subjects' freedom. If this fundament shall be related just to "individual and atomistic rights" (liberalism) or if is grounded on common standards shared by all community's participants (communitarianism).

Truly, despite this division, neither liberalism nor communitarianism is homogeneous streams. Lining with each perspective there are varied streams. For example, in the liberal side are inserted a cluster of liberal authors, bound to Liberal Equality ideas – Rawls, for instance – as well as conservative liberal authors, known as libertarians – the case of Robert Nozick. While in the communitarianist group can be easily found various streams of thought, represented, for example, for radical anti-liberal communitarianist, such as the neo Aristotelian Alasdair MacIntyre – which aims a community with strong bases in tradition and in virtue ethics –; some with specially identification with Republican tradition – as Michael Sandel – and others as Charles Taylor who tells about a "liberal communitarianism"[4]. And still, there are authors who sometimes are considered liberals and sometimes communitarians, as Ronald Dworkin[5].

These are quite different two worldviews, that influence a whole State conception, a Constitutional theory perspective, hence, necessarily, a fundamental rights theory[6].

Indeed, these two concepts, in some manners, also can be linked with what Alexy calls positivistic fundamental rights theory and non-pos- itivistic fundamental rights theory. It means, the liberalism's fundamental rights speeches incline to split the legitimacy Law argument to the validity Law argument, working closely to the positivist concept of law that has developed around a cluster of ideas, as the social fact thesis, the conventionality thesis and the separation thesis. On the other side, it is common to all communitarianist's fundamental rights arguments identify the necessity of material basis to these rights, thus, approaching to non-positivist concept of law that has developed with the connection between morality and law, the overlap thesis[7] and, in some ways, with culturalistics theories. Therefore, there is a connection between the positivistic standpoint with the liberalism point of view and a link between the non-positivistic concept of law (and fundamental rights concept) and communitarianists perspective[8].

So, concerning the fundamental rights issue the two main questions to this dichotomy are related: in one hand, to the fundament of fundamental rights – if they demand some material basis to theirs jus-fundamentality or if this condition is just established by a formal criterion; and, in the other, to pragmatic implications, especially about the objective dimension of fundamental rights.

A last introductory comment seems necessary. I consider is needed to make an observation considering the English idiom, which the text is written. The issues and considerations here exposed are concerning a Roman-Germanic legal system[9] (continental law, civil law). Some concepts, ideas, definitions and, even, world concepts cannot be precisely described in English as well as would be delineate in continental mother languages, because the common law and the civil law juridical-political reality are quite different. For example, we do not agree that the translation of Rechtsstaat, l'Etat du Droit, Stato di Dirito, Estado de Derecho or Estado de Direito has precisely the same meaning of Rule of Law, the usual translation. They are to different experiences – cultural experiences – truly differents. In fact, the Rechtsstaat's definition is one of the most difficult civil law institutions/experience to translate to English. On this order, "The Rechtsstaat, whether used by Heller or Schmitt, remains the 'state based on the rule of law,' even though Heller and Schmitt bring to it vastly different attitudes and meanings. It is precisely consistency that allows one to map variations in attitude that Weimar theorist had toward their common legal and theoretical heritage"[10].

2. Liberalism and Communitarianism: Freedom and Liberty

Montesquieu had already said about the "Different significations of the word Liberty: [that] There is no word that admits of more various significations, and has made more varied impressions on the human mind, than that of liberty"[11].

Beyond Liberty[12] is a word, and, more than that, a feeling that is very hard to be precisely defined, philosophically, the meaning of Freedom/Liberty also has been comprehended by innumerous different perspectives. As was said, an interesting chapter of this ancient debate has been caught between Liberals and Communitarianists. Naturally this is a very deep and complex dispute, not just because several streams of Liberalisms and Communitarisms can be identified; neither only because this is just a new chapter in an antique epistemological discussion[13]; but also because this debate includes a clash between whole different world perceptions, which interferes in a lot of issues as the appropriate role of State, distributions of goods and, even, about the individual and human self-identity[14]. Despite all the complexity and amplitude of this discussion, the Freedom issue is a particularly important point for the debate about fundamental rights and, particularly, theirs objective dimension.

In this discussion, the Fundamental Rights' history is frequently articulated from a liberal perspective. Likewise, the fundaments of these rights are usually referred on liberal arguments.

In general, the Liberal perspectives understand the man in an atomistic, egoistic, individualistic manner, grosso modo, detached from his community, with a transcendental self-identity explanation. Coherent with this idea, the Liberal's freedom goes along the same path. To them, freedom is realized by an individual perspective, atomized, egoistic, split, transcendental and, a priori, unlimited. Because of that, the legitimacy is just found in formal processes, separated of any substantial argument. Since everyone is unlimited free, with any binds or parameters, the fair political choice is merely found in the simple sum of individual wills, statistically. The State must be neutral, composing uncritically with the will of the majority. In this case, a formal structure and a legitimacy imposition are enough to say that a Right is fundamental, hence, paraphrasing Kelsen, admitting that "any right can be a fundamental right".

However, we should ask if this liberal point of view really comprehends the whole Fundamental Rights frame and its role on the Constitutional Culture. Does this individual and atomistic perspective attends the juridical demands and perceive carefully the Constitutional State frame? Moreover, is this liberal perception really reliable to comprehend and substantiate the Fundamental Rights on all their dimensions? We think it doesn't.

We understand the legitimacy and validity of Law, especially, of fundamental rights, must be connected to material arguments, to a background idea[15]. However, these substantial arguments cannot be established by natural basis, but, in a historical, cultural, community common ground[16].

On its side, the Communitarianism(s) realizes that the man, the Law, the freedom and all the human experience cannot be understood by an atomistic, formally or individually way. On contrary of Rawls and other liberal's standpoint, the Communitarianism understands our identity, at least in part, deeply characterized by our group's belongings, linked to belonging feelings, marked by the fact we born inserted in certain communities and cultural practices[17]. The men just can be perceived as members of a cultural and moral community. All the experiences, frames and rights must be observed as a product of the community interactions[18]. And even the individual freedom just can be truly understood by a holistic perception.

More than that, in the Hegelian manner, Gonçal Mayos points out freedom cannot be comprehended as an individual task, but as a mission to all community members. Because of it, the adequate concept of freedom should create a connection between the persons, so they do not close upon themselves. Included to Hegel, the mutual recognition of individual freedom should imply the shared recognition[19].

3. Fundamental Rights and the Communitarianism Freedoms perspective

Since that, we think the Freedom Culture – the culture that the Constitutionalism realizes and often consolidates – demands a concrete and holistic perception[20], characterized by the individual liberties, but also, by all Fundamental Rights and all community's interests[21]. In this direction, we recognize that the fundamental rights are connected to this cultural background. They are the heart of the maximum ethical from a culture[22]. Without them we could not exercise a lot of other rights, so, they are the fundament of all the other rights[23], because they are "the representatives of a concrete value system, of a cultural system that sums the meaning of the State life contained in the Constitution"[24].

Por isso, o conceito correcto de liberdade deveria ser para lançar pontes entre os indivíduos e não para que estes se feche sobre si mesmos, apesar de se apelar à sua consciência moral. Hegel, tal como Rousseau, Herder e Hörderlin – apesar de estes três, cada um à sua maneira, também denunciarem o despotismo das instituições sobre os indivíduos –, pensa que o reconhecimento mútuo da própria liberdade deve também implicar o reconhecimento do partilhado. Rousseau, Herder e Hölderlin dão igualmente muita importância ao reconhecimento emotivo da amizade, do amor e do sentimento que leva os homens a sentirem-se como irmãos e não só como participantes de frias e distantes instituições – o pior sentido de concidadãos".

Therefore, the fundamental rights are the essential content of the material constitution. With this role, signifying the mainly connection between positive law and community values, the fundamental rights politically represent the community's material integration will and legally the legitimation of the positive legal and state order itself. Indeed, the positive order is valid just while it represents this community system of values[25].

Consequently, a communitarianist Fundamental Rights Theory – not based on a atomistic individual freedom, but on a concrete and holistic freedom – implies different arguments and consequences from the orthodox (and liberal) Fundamental Rights Theory. For example, according to this communitarianist base, the Fundamental Rights – even the traditional blue rights – cannot have their efficacy valuated from an individualistic angle, just concerning singular person standards and his defense against the State. Instead, it shall be considered as values and aims that the political community wishes to promote and achieve. According Taylor, for example, the State shall not be understood only by an instrumental perspective, but, truly, as important part of the individuals themselves[26]. So, considering the individual is part of his cultural community, on the same extent that the community is an essential part of the individual's identity, the concrete freedom is common to everyone.

4. Jusfundamentality and Objective dimension

Naturally, this special axiological basis of a fundamental right, implies, also, some positive specifications, usual and similar in all constitutional world. Recognize the jusfundamentality of a right, based on its closeness with this cultural background, implies some special conditions of protection.

The normal Constitutional rules usually presents a special protection compared to ordinary legislation – at least in the current structure for rigid Constitution. Generally it is recognized a higher hierarchic level of these constitutional rules, with a distinguished legislative process. But, even among the constitutional rules, to the fundamental rights are recognized some others exceptionalities in addition to these superior legislative conditions.

They can basically be identified in six general characteristics about this particular positive protection, typically used by the constitutional frames. They are: a) the fundamental rights' norms are universal and absolute in the legal system[27]; b) the unavailability of fundamental rights, even by their owners, themselves [28]; c) the binding of the constituted authorities (executive, judicial, and even legislative), which have their choices, decisions, actions and controls guided, materially parameterized by the fundamental rights; d) the immediate applicability (directly) of the rules of fundamental rights; e) the fact that the fundamental rights' rules have special protection (or even a real impediment) to the possibility of constitutional amendment through its protection as an entrenchment clause; f) and, considering all these points, we could also identify that the norms of fundamental rights should be placed on the [27] On the universality, that means an abstract universality as an essential feature of the Right. Naturally, there are fundamental rights norms which are targeted to particular groups of citizens, such as workers, children or the elders. However, this is not what is considered "universality" as an essential category of Law. For further developments on key categories of law: SALGADO, Joaquim Carlos. A Idéia de Justiça no Mundo Contemporâneo: fundamentação e aplicação do Direito como maximum ético. Belo Horizonte: Del Rey, 2007.

superordinate level of the legal system.

So, on this argumentative line, even concerning an exclusively positive standpoint, we can see that the objective dimension of Fundamental Rights is not exceptional, instead, it is an important part of the regular normative force of the Fundamental Rights' norms. This point of view implies a whole different structure, particularly on three issues: a) the Fundamental Rights as normative obligations to constituted authorities; b) it is necessary to recognize an immediate Fundamental Rights efficacy (application), objectively binding the State action; c) as well, it is mandatory to identify an horizontal efficacy to the private interactions.

Since the very moment the freedom is comprehended as a concrete freedom, so, the freedom of each community members is part of the freedom of every community member, it is logical recognize the mainly addresser of the fundamental rights' norms are each individual, as well.

Therefore, this objective dimension is a result of this necessarily concrete freedom perception. From which the fundamental rights themselves are comprehended as grounding community values that their effectiveness is in the interest of all its members. And, because of that, it's also an objective duty for the State itself and, even, for all the citizens themselves.

5. Conclusion

So, worldview and the freedom perception are two important topics for the moral philosophy. They are very influent in the political standpoint, consequently in the State conception, in the Constitutional Theory positioning and in the fundamental rights point of view.

These rights are very close to the freedom topic discussion, which reveals not only philosophic issues, but also, pragmatics and dogmatic consequences. Take a position by a communitarianism perception implies to understand a holistic freedom standpoint. Infers in a concrete freedom point of view, culturally communed, parameterized by equality common basis.

This stance causes a different attitude toward the question of the objective dimension of fundamental rights because with a concrete freedom concept the respect to each community member fundamental right is a common task for every community participant.

My freedom is part of the others freedom, and the freedom of each community participant is also part of my own freedom.

General Law versus Specific Law

Rodrigo Augusto Suzuki Dias Cintra[1]

Abstract: The intention of this article is to analyze the differences between the General and Specific Law Act. These institutes, linked to very large systems of Common Law and Civil Law are in a moment of reflection on their limits to globalization. The text will take you to a background thread that is the space of liberalism in the current law.

eral law that clearly and comprehensively, reaches the entire population of a given territory, both in extent and in understanding of the law.

The view that the law should be generic, as taught in Latin American universities is one of the possibilities of analysis of the law. Behind the generic nature of the law is a philosophical and political: Liberalism. This current philosophy and economics argues for the existence of formal equality between individuals, besides being equal, they are free to act. Considering that all men are equal and free, the legal system should follow such patterns, reason reaches all men equally.

The political liberalism, coming from the American and French revolutions had as an essential characteristic individualism, forging a state that allows the free participation of all citizens in the political process given the formal equality among all individuals is also essential requirement of political liberalism.

This liberal model - individual, does not hold with the massification of society, took place mainly after the Industrial Revolution. With the inclusion of the masses in the democratic, that is, elections, political decision-making process removes the element of rationality, philosophical basis of liberalism. The masses act irrationally.

The inclusion of the masses in the political process leads to the impossibility of dialectic debate political issues made in the legislature. This new configuration of the masses, no longer allows the use of the old model of liberal democracy, which must be replaced by a model of technocratic government that is responsible for making rational decisions, the masses away from the political process (deliberative) and transforming them into an element of the government's political legitimacy by acclamation.

By removing the people from the government (democracy stuff) or the execution or decision, arguing that the government should be technical, democracy loses its essential function, which is the government of the people. In thinking of the Brazilian Francisco Campos and German Carl Schmitt, the mass to be unable to make technical decisions (rational) should be removed from power, leaving the function of government to state technicians.

The model of general legislation - arising from the decision of the people in parliament - is replaced by centralized technical decision, which happens to be specific to the case, in opposition to the liberal proposal of the seventeenth century.

This paper seeks to criticize the universalist conception of the law from the authoritarian thinking developed in the 20 and 30 century, this thought that attacks the form of drafting the law, and eventually empty the contents of the universal law.

2. Aristotle: the origin of the universal thought

Aristotle, the founder of the philosophy of law, is the first that deals with the concept of universality applied to law. The Greek thinker works with the concept of Universal Justice and not with the concept of Universal Law, but the structure of their reasoning is based on the universalist thought of centuries later.

The Universal Justice for Aristotle is that everyone should respect the law (positive) of each state and these laws in turn, represent the totality of social life. This representation of social life made by positive law derives from the political model proposed by Aristotle, a model of social life that can be said, was the basis of communism. This is because Aristotle held that every man belonged to a community, and only lived a result of belonging to this community. The man is a political animal, as Aristotle claimed.

> "If the law (nomos) is a prescription of generic and that all links, then your order is the realization of the good of the community, and as such, the Common Good. The action that is linked to the legality follows a standard that everyone and everyone is addressed, and as such, this action must correspond to a fair and lawful form of justice to it consequently is here called legal justice "(BITTAR, ALMEIDA, 2010, p 130).

So life was given to the community and there is no possibility of life alone. There is a shed individualistic in Aristotle's thinking. With this, all participate in community life, and there is the representative model developed after the French Revolution. The submission to law is not to protect the individual but for the common good, the common good that they all participate.

This leads to the concept of equality, which is a conditio sine qua non for the functioning of the political model. All will govern and be governed born there the need for equality between citizens. The models proposed by Aristotle seek justice match, one way or another, so that citizens can exercise political justice (dikaion politikon) that result in self-sufficiency of community life (autárkein). The local authority is linked to the concept of sovereignty is the ability of the community to self-organize, and there is, fill in wealth distribution.

The law for such reasons are exercising sovereignty community. There are, for Aristotle, individual laws, based on the will of the ruler. Soon the law is above the individual will and the man has residual function (complimentary) in the event that the law does not contemplate the case, but always with a view to achieve the common good.

The thought of Aristotle is broken with the Roman law which shall focus on the individual. The Roman society creates essential concepts of liberalism, such as personality and private property. The concept of justice in this period, subsequently endorsed by St. Augustine, was "giving to each what is his." This design focuses on the individual especially considering that in the Roman period there is confusion between public and private.

> "So far from accepting the mere formal distinction that reside says the distinction between public and private as the distinction between what is and what is Roman state interest and usefulness of particular passes to realize that the mechanics of the class dominant, accessibility to public functions and the exercise of political decision making and / or legal jogging on the basis of the lack of distinction between public and private. So much so that the indications for public office stemmed necessarily one that was example of bonus paterfamilias, who possessed wealth and nobility of prominence, ie, their way of being deprived influenced his political rise, and vice versa. " (BITTAR, 2011, p. 121)

St. Augustine radicalized individualist thinking by proposing that the salvation of man, different conceptions of the Greek and Roman, was attained by faith. Thus, human actions (act) no longer mattered. Justice for Augustine was the Laws of God and not the laws of man or his actions. Thus the measurement of justice can not occur by the analysis of the acts of man, but merely the measurement of God. The fair would come from a divine grace, men would fit only have faith to be saved or blessed by God.

Faith, in turn, is an individual act away by the thought of St. Augustine design of any collective or state. The thought of St. Augustine is full of individualism.

The thought of St. Augustine, which lasted nearly a thousand years, was broken with St. Thomas Aquinas that perfects the concept of St. Augustine affirming that salvation comes not only faith, but also of human action. Justice is not a virtue generally. Justice is always relative to another. The sin against the neighbor is not a general sin, but only opposed to the sin committed against himself. Therefore justice is not a virtue generally, as proposed by Aristotle. However, the same relationship that an individual must possess in relation to each other must be considered in relation to all individuals reason, it is generally indirectly. In sum, ultimately becoming a standard of conduct, an order that directs man to the common good.

This Court is also called cool, by the fact that - as St. Thomas Aquinas - Racing the law ordering the man to the common good. The text of the Summa of Theology reads, referring to the response and resolution of the three objections:

> "I answer. Justice orders the man in his relations with others. What can happen in two ways. With others considering singularly, or with others in general, considering that it serves the community, serves all individuals who belong to it. Now, both of these modes can be applied to justice in their own sense. It is, in effect, that all who belong to a community with it have the same relationship of parts to the whole. Now the part, for all that it is, belongs to any and all assets of the party must be ordered to the good of the whole. Thus the good of every virtue, either order the man to himself, whether the order to other people, includes a reference to the common good, which guides the justice. Thus, the acts of all the virtues can belong to justice, while it directs man to the common good. In this sense, justice is a general virtue. And as befits the law ordering the man to the common good, as has been said, that justice is often called cool because, in fact, for her man to submit to the law that guides the common good. (...). The third, it must be said that the things that concern us can be ordered individually to another, mainly because of the common good. Therefore, legal justice, while orders the common good, can be named virtue general. And for the same reason, injustice can be called common sin, hence the biblical sentence: all sin is lawlessness. "(AQUINO, 2005, p. 63)

St. Thomas Aquinas ends up influencing the later Renaissance - movement resumption of classical studies, transferring percent of the knowledge of God to man, which was inaugurated by Machiavelli in his book "The Prince" puts the government depends not only on fortune, but also the virtue of the ruler, in other words, good government depends not only God, but also the quality of the man, although there is also this period Absolutism that justifies government power by a divine will.

To overcome this contradiction, many historians of philosophy have come to designate the Renaissance as a period of transition to modernity or initial rupture against the medieval knowing who prepared the advent of modern philosophy. In this perspective, the Renaissance would have two main characteristics: firstly, it would be a time of great intellectual and political conflicts (between Platonic and Aristotelian between atheists and humanists Christian humanists, between church and state, between secular and religious universities academies, between concepts geocentric and heliocentric, etc..), and on the other hand, a theoretical moment of uncertainty, the Renaissance has not yet found ways of thinking, concepts and discussions that had definitely abandoned the land of medieval polemics.

Alysson MASCARO (2010, p. 133) sums up what happened during this period:

> "The economic and social base on which to develop the legal and philosophical thoughts of this time is the emergence and consolidation of capitalism. The state, which begins to be exalted in the early thinkers and then limited by others, is a typical instance of social causes intimate born with capitalism. Individualism, which implies a specific reflection on the relations between society and the state with the bourgeois private interest, is also a product of an era that is based on individual boldness in pursuit of profit, in individual ownership, private foundations in anyway at all a productive system today present in our reality. "

Capitalism as socioeconomic structure ultimately forge the Philosophy of Law of the modern age, whose main features are: individualism, subjective rights, limitations of state law, the universality of rights, antiabsolutism, contractualism. These characteristics form the Enlightenment which served as the philosophical basis of the liberal revolutions (American and French).

The individual becomes the center of all things, including their own knowledge, and organize society from an agreement will among individuals. For Crawford Brough MACPHERSON (1979, p. 275) there are seven characteristics of individualism:

> "(a) which gives the attribute of human beings is the freedom from dependence on the will of others;
> (b) the freedom of others means freedom from dependence on any relationship with other, less relationships in which individuals seeking to voluntarily enter their own benefit;

(c) The individual is essentially the proprietor of his own person and their own capacities, for which he owes nothing to society;
(d) While the individual is unable to sell all of its ownership of his own person, he can alienate his capacity for work;
(e) Human society consists of a series of market relations;
(f) Since the freedom of the will of others is what makes the human person, freedom of each individual can only be legitimately limited by the duties and standards needed to ensure the same freedom to others;
(g) The political society is a human contrivance for the protection of individual ownership of one's own person and property, and (therefore), to maintain orderly exchange relations between individuals, considered as owners of themselves."

3. The Legal Positivism and Individualism

Transporting this philosophical context for the legal context we are faced with positivism. Legal positivism right away from all metaphysical element, natural, sociological, historical, etc.. In fact, positivism is away is the communal conception of the basis of legal obligations and transferring this legal obligation for the individual, whose reason becomes the source of law itself.

Thus, all individuals, by an act of your reason, know the legal rules in the same way, thus, the same interpretation to the standard positively valued by the state, this argument justifies the universalism of positive law. As the application of the law an act of individual interpretation of the law, by force of reason, will result in universal understanding of law, the validity of positive law becomes a purely formal criterion, not implying the historical and geographical context in which the law positive is inserted.

The function to create positive law rests, turn to the state. This law created by the state, especially the representatives of the people, also has the effect of limiting the state itself to trace the main lines of action of the State. We created the so-called rule of law. Rule of law is a state or form of state-political organization whose activity is determined and limited by law.

The rule of law would be profiling, as well as a legal-political paradigm of Western culture, forming the so-called liberal state in the West.

Was in the natural environment of Western culture, the site of the forge of a state-based consensus on principles and values that, taken together, form the so-called rule of law. Are fundamental dimensions of this legality: government laws (and not men!) General and rational organization of power according to the principle of division of powers, the rule of the legislature, independent courts assurance, recognition of rights, freedoms and guarantees, political pluralism , operating system state bureaucratic subordinate to the principles of responsibility and control, exercise of state power through legal constitutionally determined.

The power of the law is not only to regulate and limit the power of the state but also to regulate the whole society. To this creates a model of division of functions. Initially, representing the people, which happens to be the holder of sovereign power, is the Legislature that has function to create laws that will organize the state and social life, the Executive will comply (execute) laws and the judiciary to intervene in case of breach of the law or doubt in its interpretation.

As we all know through an act of reason, everyone will know also the determination of the law, which made by the representatives of the people, always seek the common good. This is the belief of the liberal model.

4. Reviews of the Liberal Model

Brazil and Germany lived in different contexts in the interwar period (a period of greatest intellectual output of Schmitt and Fields). The first country left the classical liberal model of the First Republic and recovered with relative success of the economic crisis of 1929 while the second sought to rebound from losses of World War I, and the shackles of the Versailles Pact. The World War II seals the end of this historic moment of global reorganization of power and economy in shock state positions arguing for a return to the Belle Époque, the expansion of Soviet communism or even intransigent defense of nationalism.

Although both authors are remarkably illiberal by their positions, there is a curious fact that little is handled by the human sciences. To the authors, although the state is strong, with total presence in social life, allows the existence of a free economy without any government intervention. Thus, the common criticisms Campos and Schmitt restricted to liberal political model, and, in the economic area, the state of the economy remains distant, both believing in the existence of its own rationality of the market that allow the distancing of the state (political .)

The political liberalism, coming from the American and French revolutions had as an essential characteristic individualism, forging a state that allows the free participation of all citizens in the political process given the formal equality among all individuals is also essential requirement of political liberalism .

This liberal model - individual, does not hold with the massification of society, took place mainly after the Industrial Revolution. With the inclusion of the masses in the democratic, that is, elections, political decision-making process removes the element of rationality, philosophical basis of liberalism. With general and abstract concepts, especially issues such as equality and freedom, no longer find space in the new reality, mass. Are "elegant ideas and abstractions of intellectual luxury" (Torres, 1914, p. 93). Both authors recognize that liberalism, and the right - especially the Constitutions do not apply in practice because they do not reach all the individuals, and only an elite, are disconnected with reality. The mass, the people, do not act as rationally propose liberals.

The inclusion of the masses in the political process leads to the impossibility of dialectic debate political issues made in the legislature, this structure extremely clear in parliamentary speeches Francisco Campos which were published throughout his career.

This new configuration of the masses, no longer allows the use of the old model of liberal democracy, which must be replaced by a model of technocratic government, especially in public administration, economics and education (CAMPOS, 1950, p. 37) that is responsible for making rational decisions, the masses away from the political process (deliberative) and turning them into an element of political legitimacy of the government. To SEELAENDER and CASTRO (2010, p. 268):

> "According to Campos, the main consequence of this irruption of the masses and the irrational within the political process was the gradual divorce between liberalism and democracy. Given the emotions of the masses, the regime of free discussion of liberalism, subjected to methodical doubt all the key decisions of the company, started to threaten the very political integration. In this context, democracy, to maintain and sustain the appearance of rationality of the political system, had to resort to methods paradoxically irrational political integration. The brainstorming gora had to be limited to subjects unable to generate tensions threatening the political unity, the fundamental decisions of the national community had to be removed for discussion and made into constitutional dogma, to which would require at least one external reverence."

From this reasoning the masses are limited to a plebiscitary democracy in which only manifest themselves in support or disapproval to the leader, who plays a charismatic leader of the nation that is composed of the mass. Arise then, all the mechanisms of the relationship between the state and the masses, the common fields and Schmitt, as the idea of nation, national unity, charisma, leadership, spirit of the people, among others.

By removing the people from the government (democracy stuff) or the execution or decision, arguing that the government should be technical, which would not happen in mass democracy, democracy loses its essential function, which is the government's people. In thinking of the authors analyzed (Campos and Schmitt) mass to be unable to make technical decisions (rational) should be removed from power, leaving the function of government to state technicians.

Thus, both authors are interpreted as illiberal, because contrary to political model coming from the eighteenth century who believed in the existence of a rational model of decision making which, according to the authors, was obsolete in the twentieth century.

From this premise, is built both in Europe and in Brazil, a theory illiberal, whose leading exponents legal form Francisco Campos and Carl Schmitt, which, based on previous doctrinal formulations - especially Francisco Campos - reinterpret various legal concepts adapting the Law , Politics and Economics reality that historical moment.

Taking as true that one of the fields and the thought of Schmitt is the need of technical rationality, justifies the statement made above that the economic bias, both maintains a liberal stance.

The masses, as stated by Carl Schmitt (2006, P.17), lose their meaning before the technique, which ultimately generates the twentieth century, the era of technical neutrality.

This is because, in the economic field, there is the influence of the irrationality of the masses, making the economy immune to moment decisions, which characterizes democracy. In economics, the rational element is the market itself, which is sufficient to organize economic forces, even should the economic order as a model for some policy decisions, especially in the provision of public services by the state.

Thus, it allows the coexistence frictionless please Authoritarian State, and Economy Liberal one, which in fact was a rearrangement of the structure of social policy for maintaining economic system, creating, in the words of Friedrich POLLOCK (1998, p . 72) as a "state capitalism."

This is because it is society that ensures the economic order and the state to absorb and regulate society, ultimately regulate also the economic order, changing both countries, their state structures, to preserve the capitalist economy.

The political action - state and society - are the essential elements of the training market (Polanyi, 2000, p. 17) and they may not be designed as self-sufficient. The emergence of the "market" as a place of trade, was stimulated by the State as a result of their economic and monetary policies. The Liberal Theory, in the century. Century, with the rise of the political importance of the "markets" the survival of the States, has to defend the hypothesis that the market did not need institutionalization and could organize itself, removing the political participation of the state and society.

Fields and Schmitt restate the policy control of the economy, without, however, making changes in the forms of production and distribution of wealth. These recognize that the human economy is a market economy, but maintains the existence of market society, ie social forces organized to produce and consume, but now, organized by the State and not by the market itself.

5. Final Thoughts

Carl Schmitt and Francisco Campos converge their thoughts toward criticizing the liberal model that provides for the establishment of general laws. For both, the period in which they lived (30s of last century) lived the end of liberal thought of earlier centuries, and the correct path to salvation was in technique. The life of the state (bureaucracy), social life and economic life should become as technical as possible, away from the field of political passions that were irrational.

The field of art, which would lead to the era of neutrality, in turn, ends up denying the old concept that the law has a general, ie, it is valid for everyone, including those who have drafted the law.

In designing the authors, the law is used as an instrument of reason, and is directed to purposes (recipients) specific. What determines the drafting of the law, is the effectiveness, rationality and not the old concepts of universality and equality of all.

In thinking of the authors, especially Carl Schmitt, the political decision is to decide who is friend and who is foe, and the legal apparatus is used to implement state actions within this policy decision.

The laws are directed to specific people or groups, and may even exclude other persons or groups in the same situation, and this was common in economic law German Nazi period, at which time, only a few economic groups were able to exercise their economic activities, with the remaining excluded from the right to economic exploitation.

A journey to review the theory of sources of law to accommodate the new rights generated by nanotechnological revolution

Wilson Engelmann[1]

Abstract: There is a revolution on an unprecedented scale in progress: the nanoscale, which can be represented by the scientific notation 10^{-9}. The positive and negative effects of this revolution are still poorly understood. Because of this, the legal frameworks do not exist yet, being a challenge to Law. The Theory of Legal Fact of Pontes de Miranda is a structural model present in all branches of Law, although it has been created especially for Private Law. This theory shows to be inadequate to account for the new rights and duties arising from nanotechnology. It is proposed the adoption of a dialogue between the sources of Law, in which national and international standards can interact to accommodate new situations, giving them constitutionally and conventionally adequate legal effects. The idea of organizing the rules in a pyramidal structure will be replaced by horizontal forms of arrangement of the several sources, which can be handled as if they were open and flexible rings for formatting Law with the use of discretion in a responsible and creative form.

Products of different kinds, which are available to consumers, are already being produced at the nano scale. In laboratories, research continues in an accelerated process of development. Industries invest on these novelties, trying to increase their profit, considering the added value that nanotechnology can provide. Scientists have not yet reached a consensus on the most appropriate methodology for measuring the potential risks that production and commercialization of products at the nano scale may generate for workers, for consumers and for the environment. Also, legal frameworks do not exist yet. There is a global debate on this topic, but considering the lack of the referred methodology and the absence of an inventory of the number of nano particles that already exist, the establishment of regulation probably will not be very simple. Law, as a representative of Human Sciences, seems indifferent to the effects — positive and negative — of the revolution caused by nanotechnology. It is necessary to bring the innovation that is under development in Exact Sciences into Law. Therefore, this article aims to bring some details about nanotechnology and to enhance that nanotechnology requires changes in legal production. Thus, it is necessary to review the Theory of Legal Fact, formulated by Pontes de Miranda, especially in the setting of factual support and in how the incidence and interpretation of legal production are facilitated, in order to accommodate the new rights and duties that are emerging from the discoveries at nanoscale. The theory of sources of law has to be revisited, so that through the dialogue between the sources of law it becomes more flexible. The topic is relevant and necessary considering the need to integrate Law in the innovative and challenging path generated by nanotechnology. Given these objectives and justification, the article also aims to answer the following question: under what conditions the revision of the Theory of Legal Fact, as planned by Pontes de Miranda, may be sufficient and adequate to account for the new rights and duties generated from nanotechnology and bring innovation to the construction of legal structures? This is a problem that shows up to Law as a whole, but it can be examined from the Theory of Legal Fact, formulated by Pontes de Miranda, as a central anchor of his Treaty of Private Law. As Pontes de Miranda admits, its formulation applies not only to private law, but it also supports the construction of Public Law. So, it seems to be a paradigmatic theory to analyze the need to review the way of construction of law as a whole. From this perspective, it is possible to see the importance of this theory and the need for its reformulation in order to ensure a longer and more effective life to law.

1. Theoretical foundation

There is a technological and scientific revolution in progress. It is developed on a scale that is poorly known, but that has unprecedented possibilities and potential. It is the construction of things at the nano scale, which is, on the billionth part of a meter (ENGELMANN, 2011).

"Nanotechnology is a [new] field of very recent human knowledge, which is transverse, promising, inter/multi and transdisciplinary, in rapid expansion, with potential for innovation and transformation in the XXI century" (BINSFELD, 2011, p. 90). Here it is possible to see an indication of the necessity of innovation in Law, especially in the way legal effect is attached to social facts: nanotechnology. As nanoscale permeates various technologies, nanotechnology is a new industrial and scientific possibility, with unprecedented benefits and risks, considering the physicochemical interactions with different characteristics from those produced at larger scales, it is not a "scientific breakthrough" that will be linked to an area of knowledge, but it will involve all areas characterized yet, each one with specific contributions and looks; Law will have a relevant role, as legal frameworks are all to be built. There will be influences in all branches of law. This will require an effective (r) evolution in the conformation of legal effects; Law must learn to deal and interact with the other areas of knowledge, especially the "Hard Sciences", to understand the Nanotechnological phenomenon. There is a significant difficulty in developing regulatory frameworks, because not even the exact and/or technological areas know all the possibilities and risks that work at nanoscale may generate. There is no consensus or uniformity regarding the methodology for carrying out these assessments. And more than that:

> "[...] The basic principle of molecular nanotechnology is the construction of nanomaterials (nanowires, nanotubes, nanocoated, quantum dots, fullerenes, dendrimers and nanoporous materials) that are useful to life, from nanoparticles, atoms and natural elements that have physical and chemical properties completely different from natural elements, due to quantum effects" (BINSFELD, 2011, p. 90).

Nanoscale has always existed in nature. However, now, human beings are able to visualize them and reproduce them in laboratory because of the development of special equipment. Therefore, another challenge is the artificial production of nanostructures that, when interacting with the environment and with human beings, can produce toxic effects, many of which are still unknown. Anyway, an effective human intrusion in the creation of things is set up. From Eric Drexler on, the history of nanotechnology is told through the perspective of promises and dreams, visions and expectations:

> "[...] Human beings are very bad, very poor at making things. [...] When we can get good at it, the results will be revolutionary. [...] With precision control at atomic level, physics tells us that we can build computers with a thousand times higher capacity, consuming less than 1/100.000 that energy, with about one millionth of the weight and a tiny fraction of the cost" (DREXLER, 2009, p. 46-7).

However, these possibilities are not built separately and the mastery of this technology is complex and emerging, being operationalized with the participation of various actors, which are networked together and make the effects of globalization even more striking. All this will influence the formatting of the Theory of Legal Fact, as planned by Pontes de Miranda, demanding complex and sophisticated answers, combining internal and external order, in a way that has not yet been seen in the history of Law. What should be observed in the propositions of Drexler is the exclusive focus on "Exact Sciences or Hard Sciences" to outline the path of "technological revolution" called nanotechnology: the need:

> "[...] of global partnership for development, with a partnership that gives increasing attention to molecules, to molecular technologies and to nanoscale machines; and to goals that can be achieved through the coordination of scientists and engineers in order to make components that come together to make systems" (DREXLER, 2009, p. 55).

The challenge for Law seems to have come: it must take place in the construction of this "technological revolution", under the penalty of losing its place in history. A beginning proposed in this article is to review and reconstruct the Theory of Legal Fact of Pontes de Miranda, for the importance it has in Brazilian legal scenario.

In Pontes theory, "legal fact comes from the factual world, but not everything that is part of it is, always, in legal world. [...], legal rule discriminates what can and what, by default, cannot enter. Determining the factual support of each legal rule is a task to be done with care" (PONTES DE MIRANDA, 1977, volume II, p. 183, § 159). The "factual world" is split from "legal world" and the first can only join the second if there is prevision in factual support previously drawn in legal rules. The possibilities generated by nanotechnology (the "new", the "unanticipated") could not enter "legal world" because they have not been preliminary consecrated in factual support, at least so far, of any legal rule. What is not yet defined by "Hard Sciences" will have difficulty to be accommodated by "Humanities", especially in Law. Thus, the prospect of Pontes de Miranda, "[...] due to the lack of attention to both worlds many errors are committed, and what is worse, human intelligence is deprived from understanding, intuiting and mastering Law" (PONTES DE MIRANDA, 1983, volume I, p. 3-4, § 1), proves inadequate for understanding and producing Law in the XXI Century. Although it is a theory forged in the early twentieth century reflecting their epistemological assumptions, it now shows signs of inability to accommodate the rights and duties created by Nanotechnological Revolution.

According to Pontes de Miranda, in the context of the mentioned dichotomy, the notion of "factual support" is central: "[...] what is predicted by it [the rule of law] and on which it focuses is factual support, a concept of the highest relevance for exhibitions and scientific research" (PONTES DE MIRANDA, 1983, Volume I, p. 3, § 1). The facts of life that may enter the world of Law are always drawn previously because "[...] when it comes to legal facts, the substance lies in the essential data that integrates its factual support, as described in legal rules" (MELLO, 2010, p. 117). It is possible to say that what is likely to be legal must have been previously enrolled in the characterization of factual support of the rule of law (to use Pontes language). This generates a final result: "so it is important to stress that it is not possible, for the interpreter, to add or to delete elements to the factual support for configuring the legal fact, under penalty of error" (MELLO, 2010, p. 131). The dynamics of human life in our society — postmodern — does not show symptoms of this predictability, people are not born bringing "conduct manuals". Rather, there are actions and reactions from the movements of other social actors and this is becoming more and more unpredictable. Perhaps because of this, instead of reviewing the Theory of Legal Fact, it is more suitable to reconstruct this theory, in order to promote its effective approach to the unprecedented facts of life, promoting the emergence of new rights and duties, such as: a) juridicization of legal facts: looking specifically to the "act of creation" of things from the nanoscale: it will be possible to attach atoms and molecules and build what humans want, or by the opposite path, starting from larger particles and going down to the lowest, formatting what human inventive ability can plan. Here the notion of legal act-fact should be redesigned; b) the concept of illicit: in which it will be possible to launch, for example, the responsibility without damage, the generation of damage without guilt, the question of limits of scientific ethics in this scenario, the question of damage to future generations; c) juridicization of risk, the actual risk of development; d) reduction to nanoscale changes the characteristics of things, this implies a change in the Theory of Goods, reflecting on the question of ownership, as new "things" can be created in laboratories and factories; e) the concept of rule of law, sheltering the principles. When Pontes de Miranda wrote his Treaty of Private Law, the conception concerning principles did not have the normative force that principles have today. Therefore, instead of the "dialogue of sources", designed by Claudia Lima Marques, a more audacious structural action will be needed: the "dialogue between the sources of law". It is time to appraise the lessons of Introduction to the Study of Law and of General Theory of Law, bringing up the topic and the exercise of Sources of Law. Although it is known for a long time that Law is only the most important source, if it still can be this way, but without the proper valuation of the other sources of Law. The dialogue between the sources of Law intends to leave the echelon or pyramidal form of organization of legal sources. Law is still seen from "the great pyramid", designed by Hans Kelsen, where "[...] a rule, from the point of etymology, is something that is set to provide a pattern (standard) upon which other things are judged; a standard is something to what one must conform" (Riddall, 2008, p. 153-4). If it was just this perspective, one could include all sources of Law. However, Kelsen establishes another condition: "[...] in any legal system, the standards that form it can be considered valid if the validity of the basic and original standard is assumed (Kelsen calls it Grundnorm)". With this, "if the system of rules is displayed in pyramid form, with a Grundnorm situated at the highest point, it would be considered that from this highest point the standards appear less general and more specific". The validity of inferior standards depends on a standard that is superior to them. There is a hierarchy among norms and a dependency on the existence of a superior standard. Because of this, "[...] the validity has no relation with the content of law. A law (or as Kelsen prefers, a norm) is valid, because it was created by a determined process" (Riddall, 2008, p. 157-64). The relation between content and form also appears in the proposal of Pontes de Miranda, from the moment that the production of legal effect depends on the prediction of the characteristics of social fact in factual support. If there is any element missing, the rule cannot be imposed, and juridicization cannot occur. To some extent, this phenomenon happens by the following observation: "precisely because it is legal and formal, modern state Law collapses and is always buried in a text. [...] Law has become an extremely tough and rigid reality; reduced to an admirable system, which is logic, right, clear, therefore inevitable" (Grossi, 2010, p. 80-1). It is precisely because of all these characteristics that Law is unable to cope with the unprecedented movements proposed by nanotechnology. Thus, it is proposed that the dialogue between the sources of Law, with the replacement of the pyramid, in which the standards are arranged vertically, by a figure, still without a more specific name, in which the rules are laid out horizontally. This will make it possible to take advantage of the contributions from several sources simultaneously; and the design of the factual support can be supported from this dialogue, permeated by principles and substantially irrigated by Natural-Human-Fundamental Rights, amalgamated, for example, in the article 5 and its sections of the Constitution of the Republic of Brazil of 1988. In the dialogue between the sources of Law, "international standards", especially treaties and conventions dealing with Human Rights, also receive a new approach.

According to Mireille Delmas-Marty, it is necessary to operate the "restoration of a landscape" (2004, p. 1). The French author will be used to support the structuring of the mentioned dialogue between the sources, and not simply a "dialogue of sources", in which one law is only connected to another in order to solve a case of legal antinomy. It is required to open the stage of "evolutionary sources", which is, "[...] to renounce to the past of customary and to the future of laws to resolutely locate the sources of Law in the present, by unstable nature" (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 65). It will be needed to move and to reframe the role of laws as source of Law, by listening to the voice of tradition, announced, for example, by habits. To keep developing its role of providing the rules (or normative parameters) that should guide the behavior of people in society, Law needs to operate an effective recovery in its panorama, here understood as the Theory of Legal Fact: "[. ..] the panorama still inscribed in our memories did not disappear, but its components dispersed. [...]" (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 4). The "promises and disappointments of legal positivism" are still present in tradition and in legal actions of many jurists. Getting free of these jurists is a difficult task, though many of their features have already shown their weaknesses. Thus a model that starts with a threefold phenomenon arises:

> "[...] (phenomenon) of removal of landmarks, of emergence of new sources that would eventually relegate the state and law to the > category of accessories and of displacement of lines, modifying the composition plan, so that the pyramids, still unfinished, are surrounded of weird rings that mock the old principle of hierarchy" (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 4).

These three movements are on the basis of the dialogue between the sources of Law and will be placed one next to the other, rather than one over the other. Instead of placing the Constitution, which in this model should be read from the interaction with international standards, especially those related to Human Rights, the Constitution comes to occupy a central place, through which all legal responses created by inter-sources dialogue should pass. It (the Constitution) will be the referential for the conformation of factual support. Thus, a control of constitutionality will be made, accompanied by the so-called "conventionality control", drawn from the approach of the legal response to the Universal and Regional Human Rights Declarations, as well as a look to the decisions of International Courts of Human Rights. Movements triggered for structuring the legality of the response may be compared "[...] to the image of the ring [that] introduces the idea of an interaction that does not necessarily entail the disappearance of all hierarchies, but rather the entanglement of these and, therefore, the emergence of new modes of generation of law" (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 98). The vision of the ring triggers the movement itself intended for dialogue, something that can flow between several sources, passing and passing several times through the controls mentioned above. With this, a legal-constitutional-conventional response will be ensured.

2. Methodology

The phenomenological-hermeneutic method will be used, oriented by the contributions of Martin Heidegger and Hans-Georg Gadamer. This method starts from the presupposition of ensuring certain amount of freedom to the researcher in the construction of the structures of their investigation, what enables an approximation between the subject (researcher) and the object of the research. The choice of the object is part of the world where there is the researcher. There is the phenomenon. There is no split between these two components. The choice of the object is due to this aspect, being part of the context of the researcher, who assigns meaning to it. The hermeneutic character: "[...] the word 'phenomenology' expresses a maxim which can be formulated in the phrase: 'the things in themselves!' — by opposition to disconnected constructions, to accidental discoveries, to the admission of concepts only apparently checked, [...]" (Heidegger, 2002, § 7, p. 57). This is the point. The research is oriented by the relevant questions to nanotechnology, which are experienced by the researcher, and their (necessary) interface with Law. They are not detached from their experience and are connected with the world of their life. This experience is projected in the time horizon: "[...] from there, any phenomenological investigation is understood as a research of establishment of units of/in time consciousness, which presuppose, in turn, the constitution of this temporal consciousness. [...]" (GADAMER, 2002, § 249, p. 372). The researcher is inserted in a world where nanotechnological revolution is installing its effects. The researcher is in the world and wants to assign meaning to the movements required for Law to give its best contribution, performing its social function, in possible and adequate standardization, in order to safeguard human beings and the environment. In addition to this method of approach, there will be used, as methods of procedure, the historical, comparative and case study methods. As the main research technique bibliographical research will be used.

3. Development

By the aspects seen, Law will not take the role of sovereign source of Law, having to accept the emergence of other sources. The threefold phenomenon (withdrawal of marks, the emergence of sources and the displacement of lines) is necessary and will serve as a tool to update the proposal built by Pontes de Miranda, through the dialogue between all sources of Law. Nanotechnology will eventually produce a "[...] universe of events that, on the verge of misunderstanding, suggests to be apart from any possibility of control [...]. This finding implies, on legal perspective, understanding that Law needs to reframe in face of all this range of information and demands triggered by rapid changes of the social body" (FACHIN, 2012, p. 41). There is a great variety of aspects that are demanding new forms of regulation of society. The jurists (considered here as all actors of Law) are taking too long to realize this challenge. The various possibilities — positive and negative — brought by nanotechnology are incompatible with the legal structures that are still practiced. It is still operated within the following scenario, which — although has been written just for Private Law and within it to Civil Law — will serve to reflect on the situation of Law as a whole: "in the last two centuries a supposedly neutral system, trampled on abstract legal categories, designed for an impersonal being, with pretensions to longevity, printed formulation to the project of support of Civil Law" (FACHIN, 2000, p. 324). The construction of the notion of rule of law and of its accommodation in the elements of factual support keeps a close relation with this system, which goes far beyond the area of Civil Law, but it is still the cloak of legality that covers all branches of law. And more: "the right of the human being alone, centered on a hypothetical self-regulation of their private interests, and conducted by formal equality, served to frame the beautifully finished model" (FACHIN, 2000, p. 324). It is talked about an abstract, hypothetical, and preliminary anticipation of everything people will be able to do in society, driven by the notion of formal equality, which is not concerned with the concrete life and everyday reality. Considering the contours brought by nanotechnology, it is clear that this model does no longer fit, showing blatant signs of disability and of loss of space in the regulatory scenario, as almost all areas of knowledge are opining on the regulation related to nanotechnology. This phenomenon would be healthy if Law was leading the process. However, this is not what happens in reality. At this point, it is possible to observe the danger of the loss of space of Law as a field of knowledge, by excellence, of regulation and specification of the means of formatting of legal effects. The symptoms of loss of regulatory space on new issues emerging from new themes generated by society were already denounced by Franz Wieacker, who also gazed at Private Law, but which, on account of the overcome of the dichotomy between contemporary Public Law and Private Law, can be used to analyze the situation of Law brought by advances in nanotechnology. "Without a new grounding for legal convictions there will not exist any future for the history of European private Law. Thus the conditions of this review are the most burning question of the future of private law" (WIEACKER, 1993, p. 716). As already mentioned, the new foundations for legal structuring lie on the dialogue among sources of Law and on the substantial conformation conferred to legal responses by means of fundamental-natural-human rights. These rights bring to light the learning generated by historical tradition of human beings and of their Law. For this, it is done the proposition of "[...] replace the authoritative pyramidal image by a system of rules that are not placed over one another, but at the same time, connected one with the other by a reciprocal interconnection relation" (Grossi, 2010, p. 83). This set, which operates as a network, starts by finding natural rights — marked at the actual passage of the state of nature to civil state, in a Hobbesian conception, through their consecration especially in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, thereafter, in other texts, especially regional ones, until reaching the constitutionalization of these rights, giving rise to fundamental rights. In the case of nanotechnology, due to the difficulties already mentioned, there will not be traditional regulation — legal — the solution that Law will present. Maybe it is time to adopt voluntary "compliance programs" of existing standards, although not directly related to the nanoscale. This means that the dialogue between the sources of Law is projected onto these programs that will ensnare all social actors who may be affected by the effects of nanotechnology. It will be necessary a "normative power", which permeates integration between hard and soft law, without going into the merits of this dichotomy. This "normative power" has to aim to enable a corporate social responsibility, through a change in the mindset of organizations, what means, promoting a code of good practices, settled on a precautionary attitude that takes into account the current and future generations of living beings on Earth (Gorgoni, 2011, p. 371-83). These are some assumptions for the construction of the dialogue between sources of Law, supported by the principle of solidarity, "[...] which is, of responsibility, not only of governments, but also of society and of each of its individual members, for the social existence (and even for well-being) of each of the other members of society" (WIEACKER, 1993, p. 718). Therefore, with this passage it appears that there should be no concern about the dichotomy between public and private, but that everybody is responsible for the alignment of Law, and for the unconditional respect of its guidelines and standards. Other aspect that should be examined differently refers to legitimacy, which will no longer be "[...] in a single supreme source identified in whom holds the political supreme power, but, most often, in a spontaneous way of that varied and mobile reality that is the market" (Grossi, 2010, p. 83-4). It is not thought of defending the simply market matter. It is suggested to read the term "market" as the set of coordinated relations between the various actors operating in society, especially with the contours of globalization. And more: legitimacy will be promoted by the content — the respect for Rights (of) Humans, from its historical origin embedded in the deepest root of its genesis, which is Natural Law — and not by the presence of authority or power, with a simply formalistic bias. It will be necessary to take the challenge here delineated: "today, the jurist lives a fertile and hard moment: fertile, because their role is too active and stimulating; and difficult not only for the serious responsibilities that weigh on their back, but also for the extensive quotient of uncertainty surrounding their cognitive-applicative action" (Grossi, 2010, p. 86). This is the question: it is required to leave the castle of certainty that does not allow full view of the reality that is presented to jurists and to Law in order to launch a space of uncertainty, but with the probability to envision the new and challenging scenario that human creativity is sketching through technoscience and that will have to be housed by Law.

Final considerations

Federal Constitution, in this space, should be considered as a "moral authority", able to support the constitutional validity of responses obtained in the dialogue between the sources, which has the language as condition of possibility. Law and legal production cannot be satisfied with the abstract prediction of legal rules and of assumptions of factual support. It is needed to interact with the social reality that underlies any regulation, considering local and global transformations, foregrounding "human things". So, paraphrasing Carlos María Cárcova, who mentions the opacity of Law, resulting from the unawareness of legal norms, it is intended to insist on the opacity of Law in the sense of unawareness of effective potentialities of the sources of Law. Besides this, the unawareness of the entanglement of sources existing today, many of them specified by the advances of globalization and by the emergence of new production centers of normativity. Law should not be opaque and motionless; on the contrary, it should be colorful and vibrant, opening its arms to embrace the new rights and duties generated by society. It should be observed that:

> "technological development that enables other forms of human communication; communication that accelerates and turns flows, impacting perceptions and cognitive processes; circulation of power and control, risk and possibility, here are other dimensions of complexity in which we are immersed and that imply challenges of very diverse nature, among others, challenges for the familiar institutional structures and for traditional forms of regulation of social relations" (Carcova, 1998, p. 175).

This is the situation of Law today: it is being challenged as a field of knowledge and also in its intrinsic aspect, in the structuration and in the mode of building and listing the ways of attributing legal effects to the new risks and possibilities produced in nanoscale.

Substituting the pyramid by the horizontal arrangement of the sources of Law, connected by means of rings, in which the movements of communication occur in a much more fluid and fast way, and allow appropriate legal responses in tune with the values of a society that is local and global simultaneously. In this figure, there is also no concern to establish factual support elements previously, but, on the contrary, that are tuned with fundamental-natural-human rights. The dialogue between the sources of Law, by the constant ring movement of coming and going of sources, conducted by the thread of social solidarity, which is excited by the consonance between the three levels of rights, can bring the following composition for the generation of Law (DELMAS-MARTY, 2004, p. 116-7): a) "predetermination, which refers to the conditions of emission of the standard, to the legislator in the broad sense": it should be observed that it is not thought of a strictly state Law, but of large enough opening for the entrance of other sources of Law and of their actors of creation; b) "co-determination, which results from the margin left to the receiver, who must apply the standard, the judge in the broad sense": the standard will be assigned hermeneutic attribution of meaning, from the confrontation with the characteristics of the concrete case, giving to the applicator, who is not restricted to the judge, a creative and responsible margin of discretion for the construction of legal response; c) "overdetermination, which is, the code of values that is imposed to the legal field, to both the legislator and the judge, the implicit cultural code or 'a law that is expressed in silence'": it is worth saying, a "code" that is in consonance with the principles, values and fundamental-natural-human rights, in a substantial conjugation that must be steeped in constitutional control and in the control of conventionality. This "law which is expressed in silence" carries the screams of tradition and of the learning of experience, showing the relevance of flexibility of rings, to facilitate the movements of various formats until one finds the most suitable solution respecting living beings and the environment. This is the format of a new Theory of Legal Fact, able to respond and ensure a legally acceptable implementation of challenges, risks and possibilities — new rights and duties — generated by nanotechnology. These are the conditions, in a preliminary construction, for Law to be able to account for new rights and obligations generated by scientific-technological revolution wrought by human possibility of accessing the nanoscale. Therefore, it will be necessary to deconstruct the legal fort of certainty, so that

Law can follow the path of innovation initiated by Exact Sciences, promoting renewal, even if it is by the path of uncertainty and without the shelter of the fortress of legal precision advocated by legal positivism, notably by the legalistic aspect.

Because of this scenario, which is innovative and challenging at the same time, it is proposed the motion of ideas proposed by Pontes de Miranda to the new figures designed by Mireille Delmas-Marty, especially to enable the construction of a "world statute for scientific expertise, able to work with a "ordained pluralism" (2013, p. 62-3). There is the central point of the dialogue between the sources of Law, envisaged from a resistance to dehumanization, through the responsibility of the authors involved, seeking an anticipation of risks that are arising, for example, from nanotechnology (DELMAS-MARTY, 2013th). It will be necessary to create legal production alternatives that are ethically based on the respect to human beings and on the preservation of the environment. And more: legal mechanisms that can act in preventive or precautionary way, anticipating the likely adverse effects generated by the nanotechnological scientific revolution, changing the profile of juridicization delimitation of social facts: instead of happening after the facts, it should occur concomitantly with them.
